(A) If we were to record exactly every incident relating to the childhood and infancy of Alexander, it would undoubtedly ſwell our work exceſſively; we have therefore choſen as the more uſeful, and at the ſame time the conciſer, method, to throw together ſuch circumſtances, as may ſerve to elucidate his character, and to refer the curious and inquiſitive reader for further information to the life of Alexander written by Plutarch, and to the two orations of the ſame author, which treat of the virtue and fortune of Alexander the Great. As to the reſt of the writers, who have tranſmitted to us the hiſtory of Alexander, they are ſuch as either have written expreſly of his actions, as Diodorus, Arrian, and Curtius; or they ſpeak accidentally of particular actions of his, as Strabo, Polyænus, Pauſanias, and many others. We ſhall make uſe of them all, preferring, however, Arrian, not only on account of his great impartiality, but alſo becauſe his hiſtory is collected from thoſe of Ariſtobulus and Ptolemy, which, of the many accounts of Alexander's expeditions once extant, were always preferred to the reſt. But inaſmuch as Arrian is ſometimes very conciſe, and many circumſtances, relating to the facts he ſpeaks of, are preſerved in other authors, we ſhall make uſe of their writings to ſupply what he has omitted, without pretending to ſet their authority on the ſame level with his.

of diſclaiming the authority of Macedon. In Greece its reſpective ſtates longed to throw off the yoke; and at Athens Demoſthenes, by his example, drew the people into open teſtimonies of exceſſive joy, and to immediate negotiations againſt Alexander, whom he ſtiled a giddy boy, unfit for and unbecoming empire. As for the Perſians, before the death of Philip they were contriving to tranfer the war to Macedon; but now, as if all danger had died with that monarch, they thought nothing of his ſucceſſor, till his fame grew ſo loud they were unable to think of any elſe. Attalus, who with Parmenio had the joint command of the Macedonian army on the frontiers of Aſia, aſpired to the crown, and ſought to debauch the ſoldiers. Thus was the morning of Alexander's reign diſturbed with the noiſe of foreign wars, and at the ſame time overcaſt with the gloom of domeſtic treaſons [e].

In the councils held on this diſtracted ſtate of things, it was judged adviſeable by Alexander's beſt friends, that diſſimulation ſhould take place of force, and that he ſhould cajole thoſe whom he could not ſubdue. Alexander diſliked this; he thought vigorous meaſures at firſt would check ſome preſent, and prevent many future inconveniences; wherefore he betook himſelf to arms, and boldly looked every danger in the face [f]. Firſt he marched ſouthwards into Theſſaly, with a numerous army, yet without committing any act of hoſtility. The princes aſſembling, he made a long and eloquent oration, wherein alledging their common deſcent from Hercules, the kindneſs between their anceſtors, and the victories they had won together, he ſo ſtrongly charmed them to his intereſts, that, as the ſon and ſucceſſor of Philip, they declared him general of Greece. The neighbouring ſtates he drew over in the ſame manner, partly by awing them with his army, partly by the charms of his eloquence; for being perfectly verſed in their intereſts, he ſpoke home and warmly to their paſſions. Having reſtored tranquillity on this ſide, and procured the title of generaliſſimo of Greece to be conferred on him, he returned to Macedon. Heccateus, a perſon in whom he confided, was diſpatched with recruits for the Aſiatic army, with orders to ſeize Attalus, if if it was practicable, or, if not, to dispatch him. As for that ambitious general, perceiving the presence of Parmenio and the fame of Alexander with-held the soldiery from following his purposes, he suddenly changed them, and sent to Alexander an epistle of Demosthenes, and professed himself wonderfully loyal; which professions, whether true or false, had no weight with the king, whose instructions Heccateus followed in putting Attalus to death [g]. Thus the dawn of his government began to clear, and the first rays of his glory to display a pleasant prospect, which afterwards appeared brighter and brighter, till it overspread the noblest countries on the globe.

[e] Arrian l. i. c. i. Plut. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.
[f] Plut. ubi ſupra.

Alexander invades the Triballians and the Illyrians.

At the approach of the spring, Alexander marched with his forces towards Thrace, intending to penetrate into the country of the Triballians and Illyrians, now called Bulgaria and Sclavonia. In this expedition he followed rather his own sentiments than the counsels of others, acting regularly on the principle he had laid down, that the power of Macedon was to be supported by the same vigorous measures by which it had been attained. In consequence of this resolution he ordered his army to assemble at Amphipolis, from whence he marched towards the river Nessus, and leaving the city Philippi and mount Orbelus on the left, he in ten days reached mount Hæmus [h]. This post the barbarous nations, against whom he made war, had seized and fortified, in the best manner they were able. On the tops of the cliffs, and at the head of every passage, they placed their carriages and waggons, so as to form a sort of parapet, with their shafts inwards, that when the Macedonians should have half ascended the rocks, they might be able to push the heaviest of these wains upon them. They reckoned the more upon this contrivance, because of the close order of the phalanx, which, they conceived, would be terribly exposed, by the soldiers wanting room to stir, and thereby avoid the falling waggons. But Alexander, who had studied the art of war under the ablest masters, defeated their design; for, having directed his heavy armed troops to march, he gave orders, that, where the openness of the

[g] Diodor Sicul. ubi supra.

[h] Arrian. expedit. Alex. l. i. c. i. & seq. Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra.

the way would permit it, they ſhould open to the right and left, and ſuffer the falling carriages to go through; but that in the narrow paſſes, they ſhould throw themſelves on their faces with their ſhields behind them, that the carts might run over them. His contrivance had the deſired effect, and the Macedonians reached the enemy's works without the loſs of a man. Then the light-armed troops began to attack. The barbarians made an obſtinate reſiſtance for ſome time, till Alexander himſelf charged at the head of the targeteers. Then they began to break, and on the approach of the phalanx fled out-right, leaving their camp, full of women, children, and cattle behind them. Three days after the king reached the river Iſter, in an iſland of which, called Peuce, the Triballians, Thracians, and other barbarous nations, had conveyed their wealth and women, reſolving to defend them with all their force. Some few ſhips there were, which, through the Euxine ſea, had come to Byzantium; on board of theſe Alexander embarked as many of his troops as he could, and endeavoured to make a deſcent with them on the iſland before-mentioned; but the river being rapid, the ſhore ſteep, and the enemy paſſing thither in great multitudes, he relinquiſhed that deſign, and landed his forces at their old camp. Alexander obſerving, that the Getæ, who inhabited on the other ſide of the river, were inclined to give him all the trouble they could, and had for that purpoſe, raiſed an army of four thouſand horſe and ten thouſand foot, determined to be before-hand with them, and by ſubduing them ſtrike a terror into all their neighbours; the ſame night therefore he cauſed a conſiderable number of boats to be got together, and having ranged them from one ſide of the river to the other, he re-embarked his forces on board his ſmall fleet, which made a line a little higher. He then cauſed the tents, which, as they were made of ſkins, floated in the water, and yet afforded firm footing, to be thrown into the middle ſpace; whereby he paſſed over fifteen hundred horſe and four thouſand foot. He then marched through the ſtanding corn, the ſpears of the phalanx being reverſed, and the horſe behind them, till they arrived in the open country; and then gave the command of the left wing, conſiſting of the foot, to Nicanor, drawing up his horſe on the right, under his own command, with intent to give the Getæ battle. Theſe, tho' a brave and bold people, were ſo aſtoniſhed at his paſſing the river, without either a bridge or a fleet, that they did not ſuſtain even the first shock, but fled immediately to the next town, which they intended to defend; but when they saw that Alexander did not follow them impetuously, but drew his foot slowly along the side of the river, to prevent his falling into any ambuscade, they conceived that no place would protect them against such a general; and therefore abandoning the town, they placed all hopes of safety in the distance of their flight. Alexander entered the city, and having collected the spoil, delivered it to Meleager and Philip, officers of good rank in the army, that it might be conveyed to the sea, and then razed the place. Here he sacrificed to Jupiter Soter, i. e. the Saviour, to Hercules, and to the Ister, for affording him a safe passage [i].

He makes a general peace with the barbarous nations.

The next day he brought all his forces into his camp on the other side of the river, whither immediately embassadors came from all the neighbouring nations to make peace with him; amongst the rest from Syrmus king of the Triballi, who saw that it was to no purpose to resist him; as also from the Celtes, a robust and high-spirited people. The king treated them all with great civility; but, as he was always inclined to indulge his vanity, he could not help asking the deputies from the last mentioned nation, What, of all things, they feared most? supposing they would have answered, his arms; but they very roundly told him. That, except the falling of the clouds upon their heads, they feared nothing; which so pleased the king, that, after saying the Celtes were a haughty people, he granted them his friendship, and ranked them in the number of his allies. Soon after he adjusted his differences with the rest of the neighbouring nations, and then prepared for his return into Macedonia [k].

He defeats the Taulantii and Clytus king of Illyria.

As he passed through the countries of the Agrians and the Peonians, he was informed that Clytus the son of Bradilis, had revolted from him. This Bradilis had been king of Illyria; and his son, it seems, had a mind to remain no longer dependent on the king of Macedon: He therefore entered into a league with Glaucias king of the Taulantii, and into a treaty with the Autariatæ, to defend themselves against Alexander, whom they looked upon as their common enemy. The king immediately resolved to attack these enemies, and began to enquire of the force and situation of the last-mentioned people. Langarus king of the Agrians

[i] Arrian. exped. Alex. l. i. c. 2, 3, 4. [k] Idem ibid.

Agrians being near him, ſaid aloud, Sir, trouble not yourſelf about theſe people; I, with my own ſubjects, will make an inroad into their country, and find them ſo much employment, that they ſhall be able to give no interruption to your march. This accordingly he performed to ſo good purpoſe, that he put it abſolutely out of the power of this nation to proceed in their defection. Alexander, on his return to the camp, received him with great honour, and promiſed him his ſiſter Cyna for a wife; but that promiſe did not take place, king Langarus dying ſoon after. The king being come into the neighbourhood of Pellion, a ſtrong city into which Clytus had thrown himſelf with a great body of troops, reſolved to beſiege him therein; and accordingly cauſed the place to be inveſted; but Glaucias king of the Taulantii, coming with a great army to the relief of Clytus, the king was obliged to raiſe his ſiege, and to give them battle, wherein after a ſtout reſiſtance, he was victorious. Three days after Alexander ſurprized Glaucias and Clytus in their camp, and, after making a great ſlaughter of their troops, forced them to fly for ſhelter to the mountains [1].

He makes a very quick march into Greece.

In the midſt of theſe victories, Alexander received advice, that all Greece was in commotion. This was occaſioned chiefly through the indefatigable zeal of Demoſthenes, the inveterate enemy of Macedon; and the ſeveral diſaffected ſtates were encouraged to ſhew their inclinations more openly, by a report confidently ſpread about, that Alexander was dead in Illyria. The Thebans, laying violent hands on Amyntas and Timolaus, eminent officers in the Macedonian garriſon which held their citadel, dragged them to the market-place, and, without any form of proceſs, put them to death. They then diſpoſed all things for the ſiege of the citadel, and openly excited the reſt of Greece to throw off the yoke. The king, as ſoon as he had intelligence of this, immediately bent his march towards them, with ſuch diligence, that in ſeven days he arrived at Pellene in Theſſaly, and in ſix more entered Bœotia, before the Thebans had any intelligence of his paſſing the Thermopylæ. When they were informed of this, they ſaid it muſt be Antipater with a body of Macedonian militia; nay, when repeated advices acquainted them, that the army was commanded by Alexander, they would ſtill have him dead, perſuading themſelves, that this was Alexander the ſon of

[1] Idem ibid.

Æropus. The king, however, did not leave them long in their miſtake, advancing briſkly to the temple of Iolaus, where he made a halt, that the Thebans might have time to return to their ſenſes, and thereby prevent his having recourſe to extremities; for it was no-way his inclination, as indeed it was no way his intereſt, to embroil himſelf with the Greeks; he therefore endeavoured, by the terror of his preſence, having with him thirty thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, to compel his enemies to lay aſide their malice, rather than to gratify his own [m]. This ſudden march had in part the ſucceſs he wiſhed; for it prevented the reſt of the Grecian ſtates from aiding the Thebans, tho' they were actually aſſembling forces for that purpoſe; and ſo affrighted the Athenians, that, repairing their walls and filling their magazines, they provided, not for their neighbours, but for their own defence, anſwering exactly what Alexander had ſaid when he entered Bœotia, that to this Demoſthenes, who called him a child when he was in Illyria, and youth when he came into Theſſaly, he ſhould certainly appear a man when he approached the walls of Athens [n]. The Thebans, far from profiting by Alexander's moderation, attacked his out-guards; and tho' their troops were repulſed with great diſadvantage, yet they determined to hazard all rather than purchaſe peace by their ſubmiſſion. The king ſeeing this encamped over-againſt the gate leading to Attica, that he might be near the citadel, which they had ſurrounded with a double wall, in order to prevent their cutting his garriſon to pieces before his face He did not, however, inveſt the city, or pretend to beſiege it; but cauſed open proclamation to be made, that he was ready to receive any Thebans who would join with him in defence of the common liberties of Greece. Whereupon the Thebans made proclamation, that they were ready to receive any who would join themſelves to the great king and them, to fight againſt the tyrant of Greece. This exceedingly provoked Alexander; however, if we may believe Ptolemy, he gave no orders for an attack: But Perdiccas, who lay neareſt the walls, perceiving ſome advantage, ſuddenly attempted them, and, being ſeconded by Amyntas, broke into the city. Alexander, ſeeing his friends engaged, was conſtrained to ſupport them; and thus the Thebans were driven to the temple of Hercules. There the citizens recovered lines shew the plan of ye Author, hat of the Modern Geographers;

[m] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

[n] Plut. in vit. Alex.

Vol 3. p. 320.

Stroke Letters shew the present
Countries, Cities &c.

XTEN
lisle Geog Modern

105 110 115

50

45

40

Wolga R.

TR ACA R Y

Scales

S S LA an R: ent
HIR
VAN

Degree according to Aristotles used in Alexander's time

5000 10000 ommon French Leagues

25 50 75 100 125 150

of Alexander accor

I A

This Map Contains only the places which prove the extent of this Empire according to the System of the Author.

A MAP of the EXTENT of ALEXANDER'S CONQUESTS

According to M.r Delisle Geographer to Lewis 14 Compared with those of other Modern Geographers An; 1731.

NB. The dark lines show the plan of y.e Authors the light ones that of the Modern Geographers; and the double Stroke Letters show the present names of Countries, Cities &c.

Meridian at 46 deg. 30 East of Ferro Islands according to Astron: Observations

EUROPE

Danube

Danube

ILLYRIA

Triballes

PONT. EUXIN.

Byzantium

BLACK SEA

Macedonia

Thrace

Byzantium Constantinople

Bithynia

Troy

Granicus

Cappadocia

Gordium

ASIA MINOR

Cilicia

Issus

Candia

Candia

Cyprus

Tyre

MEDITERRANEAN SEA

Alexandria

Rosetta

Damietta

Jerusalem

Memphis

Gr. Cairo

Heroum Civitas

LIBYA

EGYPT

Nile R.

RED SEA

Byzantium

Meridian at 50 deg. 30 East of y.e Meridian according to Modern Geographers

AFRICA

Crimea

Palus Meotis

Tanais Don

Crimea

Palus Meotis

ASTRACAN to RUSSIA

Astracan

Volga R.

CIRCASSI TAR:

Iberia

Trapezus Trebisond

Georgia

Derbent

ARMENIA

Atropatena Aderbijan

Hyrcania

Media

GILAN

ASTRABATH

Arbela

Tigris

Ecbatana Amadan

Caspian Gate

Babylon Hella

Aspadan Ispahan

Parthia

Euphrates

Jerusalem

SYRIA

Tapsaque

Cyprus

Antioch

Tyre

Jerusalem

Perſia

Perſepolis Chilminar

Euphrates

Persian Gulf

Mare Rubrum

ARABIA

Tropic of Cancer

The Mouth of the Indus

INDIAN SEA

Gulf of Yemen

Mineus R.

Gulf of Bachus

CASPIAN SEA

Alexandrian Bay

Trapezus

Aral or Salt Sea

Jaxartes

Maracanda Samarcanda

Sogdiana

Bactra

Bactriana

Aria

Alexandria Heir

Alexandria of Ara

Paropamisades

Alexandria Candahar

Drangiana

Drangæ Segestan

Arachosia

Arachota Aroucage

Alexandria Moultan

Mallæs

Lahor

Indus Sinda

Hydaspes

Acesines

Hydraotes

Hyphasis

Ganges River

Agara Agra

Gemyne R.

Benares

Indus R.

Delly

Duvil

ESTATES of MOCUL

OCEAN

Boundaries of the Emp: of Alexander according to Mod: Geogr:

SCYTHIA

Scales

Stades of 4 to a Degree according to Aristotles Measure us'd in Alexander's time

500 5000 10000

Common French Leagues

25 50 75 100 125 150

Jn.o Barlow Sculp.

covered their conſternation, and having deſperately wounded Perdiccas, fell upon the Macedonians with ſuch reſolution, that the drove them with great ſlaughter out of the city; which Alexander perceiving, he, with a freſh body of troops, attacked the Thebans in flank, routed them, entered the city pell-mell with the flying garriſon, and, after a prodigious ſlaughter, took the place by ſtorm. The Macedonian garriſon, iſſuing from the citadel, contributed not a little to this event; which, however glorious to the king, was extremely fatal to the Thebans, who for ſeveral hours were ſlain and deſtroyed, without regard either to ſex or age. Afterwards the city was razed, excepting only the houſe of Pindar, a famous poet, out of reſpect to the merit of its owner, and for that he had celebrated Alexander the firſt king of Macedon; a circumſtance which might well weigh with his ſucceſſor °. The lands, except ſuch as were deſtined to religious uſes, were ſhared among the ſoldiers, and the priſoners ſold for ſlaves; whereby four hundred and forty talents were brought into the king's treaſury. The king, however, took care to colour this extraordinary ſeverity, by procuring a decree of the Amhpictyons, enjoining him to do what he was already inclined to, under pretence, that the Thebans, in allying themſelves with the great king, were become enemies to the Greeks; wherefore the decree was cloſed with an expreſs prohibition to any Greek, either to conceal or protect a Theban: Yet [redacted] be owned, that theſe generous Thebans fought [redacted] liberty, refuſing quarter, and provoking the Macedonians during the ſack of the place, to take away their lives, eſteeming them not only worthleſs, but burdenſome, when held at the will of a maſter. To carry on the ſame ſhew of zeal for the freedom of Greece, Alexander ordered the cities of Orchemenus and Platæa to be rebuilt, giving ſpecial directions for adorning the latter, out of regard to the generous conduct of its inhabitants, when Pauſanias fought in its neighbourhood that deciſive battle, which deſtroyed the Perſian hopes. This behaviour of Alexander ſtruck all the Greek ſtates with terror; the Eleans reſtored their exiles becauſe they were his friends; the cities of Ætolia deprecated his wrath by a moſt ſubmiſſive embaſſy; as for the Athenians, they were terrified to ſuch a degree, that they made themselves ridiculous; for they sent to compliment the king on his safe return from his expedition against the barbarians, and also to assure him of their great satisfaction in his chastizing the rebellious Thebans [p]. Alexander took all in good part; only he demanded by letter, that Demosthenes, Lycurgus, Hyperides, Poylenctus, Charetes, Charidemus, Ephialtes, Diotimus, and Merocles should be delivered up to him, alledging, that they were the authors of all the mischiefs which had happened in Greece, since his father Philip had been elected general. The Athenians, however, did not comply with his request, tho' Phocion advised them to do it. This was owing to the art of Demades the orator, who having first procured a vote in favour of the persons demanded, drew up afterwards such a decree as might pacify Alexander; the purport of which was, that the orators should submit themselves to the laws of their country, and that the Athenians undertook to punish them, if they appeared to be guilty. Demades himself went at the head of the deputies who presented this decree to Alexander, and who were charged also with other requests, viz. that, notwithstanding the decree, they might be permitted to receive the Theban fugitives; and that the king would for the future regard them as his faithful allies. Alexander, [illegible]ing to shew an extraordinary esteem for the Athenians, granted all their requests, excepting that he commanded the orator Charidemus to banish himself; upon which [illegible]antly fled to Darius. He used Demades with the utmost civility, and commanded him to assure his citizens, that they had nothing to fear [q]. The reader, who remembers, that, in the history of Athens, we have given a different account of this matter [r], must not conceive, that this variation happened through carelessness or mistake; we have the authority of antient authors for both relations, and the reader, by considering the citations, will easily discern why we inserted that in the Athenian, this in the Macedonian, history. All authors agree, that the king was sorry for, and greatly regretted, the mischiefs done at Thebes; insomuch, that Plutarch informs us, he never afterwards afterwards denied any requeſt a Theban made [s]. To ſpeak the truth, there is no part of Alexander's character better eſtabliſhed than this, that as he was violent in his paſſions, ſo he was ſteady in repentance (B).

° Arrian. l. i. c. 7. Dio. Chryſot. Orat

[p] Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. Plut. ubi supra. [q] Arrjan. l. i. c. 10. Diodor Sicul. ubi supra. Plut. in vit. Alex. [r] Univers. Hist. vol. vi. p. 362.

As

[s] Plut. ubi ſupra.

(B) It is an obſervation very juſtly made, in reſpect of the antient hiſtorians, that they ſeldom mention any great event, without introducing it by omens and prognoſtics. With reſpect to this critics are apt to judge according to their own prepoſſeſſions; if they have themſelves any opinion of theſe things, then the antients are in the right; if not, they are in the wrong, or at leaſt diſbelieve theſe ſtories tho' they recorded them; which judgment, by the way, is really more injurious to their memories than the other; for to ſay, that a man writes what he knows to be falſe, is to ſay that he is a deceiver, which is certainly the higheſt reflection that can be thrown upon an hiſtorian: Whereas ſuperſtition, which is the imputation in the other caſe, is a mere human frailty, and affects his character very little. Having premiſed this, we ſhall go on to ſpeak of theſe ominous appearances which are recorded by the antients, as predicting [illegible] of Thebes. Diodorus, tells us, that in the temple [illegible] a ſlender ſpider's web was obſerved to ſpread itſelf a[illegible] cloak, and to repreſent the rain-bow in an arched circu[illegible] upon this deputies were ſent to conſult the oracle at Delphi, t[illegible] know what it imported. The anſwer was,

This web ſtands as a ſign from heav'n confeſt
To thee, Bœotia, firſt, then to the reſt.

The oracle, in their own country, explained it thus:

One party's loſs, the other's gain, this ſhews.

This happened about three months before Alexander's march. About the time of his arrival, the ſtatues in the forum ſweated, ſo that great drops ſtood upon them. In the lake of Oncheſtus the roaring and bellowing of oxen was heard. The waters in Dirce ſeemed of a ſanguine hue; and advice came from the temple at Delphi, that the roof built by the Thebans, out of the ſpoils of the Phocians, was beſmeared all over with blood. Such, continues our author, as ſtudied the explanation of theſe things, gave it as their opinion, that the web portended the re-

Continued generaliſſimo at Corinth.

As ſoon as he had ſettled Greece in tranquillity, he went to Corinth, where, in a general aſſembly of the ſtates of Greece, every thing relating to his dignity as generaliſſimo was exactly ſettled. Here he received the compliments, not only of the ſeveral ſtates, but alſo of the moſt eminent perſons among the Greeks, either for valour or wiſdom, many of whom thought it not below them

[s] Plut. ubi ſupra.

treat of the gods from their city; its having the colour of the rain-bow, various troubles and diſſenſions; the appearance of ſweat ſignified extreme miſeries; and the ſmeared roof of the temple, that the city would be ſtained with ſlaughter and bloodſhed: They therefore concluded, that the Thebans ought to have ſought an agreement, and not have urged all things to extremity (1). But they, it ſeems, were not to be moved; for when Alexander demanded only Phœnix and Prothytes, who had occaſioned the murder of his officers, to be delivered up, they ſent him word, he ſhould ſend them Antipater and Philotas (2). Thus they in a manner ſought their own deſtruction. The circumſtances attending the ſack of this city, are moſt exactly recorded by Arrian, who, tho' in the general, a very ſuccinct writer, expatiates on this ſubject, and ſhews, that it was the moſt terrible [illegible] that any ſtate ever ſuſtained to that time; concluding [illegible] deſcription thus: "They are reported to have been [illegible]arned of this great and tremendous ſubverſion of their city, by ſundry prodigies from heaven, which they all along "diſregarded, till afterwards the events recalling them to their "remembrance, they were forced to own them fulfilled (3)." This author is frequently cited as a perſon diſregarding omens, and having a ſlender opinion all of ſorts of miracles; yet this notion of him ſeems to be raſhly taken up. He does indeed mention them more ſparingly than Diodorus or Plutarch; and the reaſon is clear, becauſe he was a cloſer writer, and extremely careful of ſtraying from his ſubject; yet, on particular occaſions, he records both omens and prodigies, without any tokens, that we can perceive, of diſbelief or diſreſpect; but rather the contrary, as the reader may perceive from the paſſage juſt cited. Thus much we thought ourſelves obliged to ſay in regard to truth; for as to the credibility of theſe things, we meddle not with that matter

(1) Diodor. Sicul. bibliothec. l. xvii. Olymp. cxi. 2. (2) Plut. in vit. Alex. (3) Arrian. l. i. c. 9.

them to travel a conſiderable ſpace for this purpoſe [t]; but Diogenes of Sinope, who was then in Cranium a ſuburb of Corinth, did not ſo much as wait upon the king; which when it was remarked to Alexander, he went himſelf to viſit the philoſopher. He found him, as his manner was, lying on the ground, baſking himſelf in the ſun. When thoſe who attended the king ſurrounded him, the ſage raiſed himſelf a little, and looked upon Alexander. The king with his uſual civility, aſked him, if he wanted any thing? Yes, anſwered Diogenes, I would have you ſtand a little out of the way, that I may enjoy the ſunſhine. Thoſe who were about Alexander laughed at this ſaying, as the effect of a haughty and moroſe diſpoſition; but the king himſelf ſaid gravely, If I was not Alexander, I could wiſh to be Diogenes; the ſenſe of which as it is interpreted by Plutarch, was, that if he had not been capable of philoſophiſing actively, he would have preferred ſpeculative wiſdom to the ordinary employments of life [u]. This is certainly a very noble, if it be not the juſt, ſenſe of Alexander's words. Certain it is, that we ought always to conſider carefully the ſayings tranſmitted to us by the antients, leſt we ſhould reject a diamond for a pebble, merely for want of knowing how to deveſt it of its coat. When the aſſembly at Corinth broke up, the king returned with his army into Macedonia.

At Ægæ he held a grand council of ſtate and of war, in order to adviſe about his expedition into Aſia. [illegible] his preparations for invading Aſia. graveſt of his counſellors, among whom were Antipater and Parmenio, gave it as their opinion, that he ſhould firſt marry, and have heirs to the crown, before he thought of any foreign expedition. Alexander diſliked this, as indeed he did every motion of delay; but, however, he did not reject it without offering a reaſon. He ſaid, that after Greece had elected him her general, and he had drawn together that veteran army, which, under his father, had made ſo many matter here. The facts themſelves either happened, or did not happen; if they happened, and were held ominous, an hiſtorian ought not to be blamed for recording them or their interpretations. They are ſo many points laid before us, which we may conſider as long as we will, and on which we may decide at laſt as we pleaſe.

[t] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

[u] Plut. de virtut. Alex.

many conquests, he should not sit down idle at home, marry, and beget children [w]. He therefore sacrificed to Jupiter Olympius, and revived the games which had been instituted by his predecessor Archelaus. He sacrificed likewise to the muses, consecrating a day to each muse; then he appointed mighty feasts, entertaining no less than a hundred of his friends at his own table; after which he distributed all the crown-lands amongst them, and even the rest of his revenues, giving one a farm, another a village, a third the customs of a port. Perdiccas, observing this waste of the royal revenue, in which he refused to participate, asked the king, What he reserved for himself? My hopes, answered Alexander. Very well Sir, replied Perdiccas, you will not then take it amiss, that among those who are to share your dangers, there are some who desire to share your hopes also [x].

An account of his troops.

These feasts once over, the army had orders to assemble, in order to their passing immediately over into Asia; but what their numbers were, historians by no means agree. Arrian says, that there were above thirty thousand foot and above five thousand horse. Diodorus Siculus is more particular; for he tells us, there were thirteen thousand Macedonian foot, seven thousand of the confederate states, and five thousand mercenaries. These were under the command of Parmenio. Of the Odrysians, allians, and Illyrians there were five thousand; and of Agrians, who were armed only with darts, a thousand. It is generally thought, that our author is mistaken in his first number, and that, instead of thirteen, there were but twelve thousand Macedonians; because in the whole Diodorus says there were thirty thousand foot. It may be the Agrians are omitted in this total. As for the horse, he tells us there were eighteen hundred commanded by Philotas; as many Thessalians under the command of Callas; out of the several states of Greece six hundred led by Eurygius; and nine hundred Thracians and Peonians, who led the van under Cassander. Plutarch tells us, that, according to a low computation, he had thirty thousand foot and five thousand horse; and according to the the largeſt reckoning, thirty-four thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe. As to his fund for the payment of the army, Ariſtobulus ſays, it was but ſeventy talents; and Oneſicritus, who was, alſo in this expedition, not only takes away the ſeventy talents, but affirms the king was two hundred in debt. As for proviſions, there was ſufficient for a month, and no more. Antipater was left behind in Macedon, with twelve thouſand foot and fifteen hundred horſe [y]. Juſtin tells us, that to prevent any diſturbances in his abſence, Alexander cauſed ſuch of the blood royal as he ſuſpected to be put to death [z]; in which, however, he deſerves no credit, ſince neither Diodorus, Arrian, Plutarch, nor any Greek or Latin hiſtorian mentions any ſuch thing; on the contrary, he is ſaid to have checked his mother Olympias for having treated Cleopatra ill in his abſence [a].

[w] Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. [x] Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. Plut. in vit. Alex. Arrian. l. i. c. 11.

He paſſes the Helleſpont.

THE army aſſembled at Amphipolis; from thence he marched to the mouths of the Strymon, then croſſing mount Pangæus, he took the road to Abdera. Croſſing the river Ebrus, he proceeded through the country of Pætis, and after twenty days reached Seſtos; thence he came to Eleus, where he ſacrificed on the tomb of Proteſilaus, becauſe he was the firſt among the Greeks who at the ſiege of Troy ſet foot on the Aſiatic ſhore; he did this, that his landing might be more propitious than that of the hero to whom he ſacrificed, who was ſlain ſoon a[illegible] The greateſt part of the army under the command of menio embarqued at Seſtos, on board a fleet of a hundred and ſixty gallies of three branches of oars, beſides ſmall craft. Alexander himſelf ſailed from Eleus, and, when he was in the middle of the Helleſpont, offered a bull to Neptune, and the Nereids, pouring forth at the ſame time a libation from a golden cup. When he drew near the ſhoar, he launched a javelin which ſtruck in the earth; then in complete armour he leaped himſelf upon the ſtrand, and having erected altars to Jupiter, Minerva, and Hercules, he ſacrificed to them, and then proceeded to Ilium [b].

Sacrifices at Ilium.

STRABO informs us, that at the time Alexander came thither Ilium was little better than a village, diſtinguiſhed only only by a small temple dedicated to Pallas; here the king sacrificed to the heroes buried in the neighbourhood, especially to Achilles, whom he declared to be particularly happy in two things, in having Patroclus for a friend, and Homer to record his actions. Hephestion, as a mark of his friendship to Alexander, crowned the tomb of Patroclus, with flowers; after this the king sacrificed to Minerva, and taking down some arms which had hung there from the time of the Trojan War, consecrated his own in their stead. He sacrificed likewise to the ghost of Priam, to avert his wrath on account of his own descent from Achilles. We have thought fit to mark particularly these steps, because they greatly contribute to shew the genius and temper of this young hero. It is clear from them, that he was a zealous observer of the religious rites of his age, and that he had the greatest regard to decency and order in every thing he did. Indeed, he took his rules of war from Homer, and scrupulously adhered not only to the maxims but to the customs mentioned by him; thus instead of Calchas, who was the augur of the Greeks, he had Aristander the Telmissian for his soothsayer, without consulting of whom he suffered nothing of moment to be done. Hephestion was his Patroclus, and many things more of this kind we might note, if the nature of this work did not require a brevity inconsistent with such re-[illegible]ions.[c] (C).

[y] Diodor. Plut Arrian. ubi ſupra. [z] Hiſt. l. xi. c. 5.
[a] Plut. de virtut. Alex. [b] Diodor. Arrian. Plut.

Alexander

[c] Diodor. Arrian. ubi supra. Plut. in vit. Alex.

(C) Alexander did not neglect the usual application to oracles on the undertaking of his expedition. After the destruction of Thebes he went in person to Delphi, but arriving at the time that was held unlucky, the priestess refused to do her office. Alexander thereupon drew her by force into the temple, and she at last offering to sit down on the tripod, said by way of excuse for breaking through the antient custom of the temple, My son, thou art invincible. At these words Alexander cried out, I accept the answer! (4), and staid for no other. This with some may pass for an act of irreligion, whereas it was far from being so; sudden answers were always held oraculous by the

(4) Plutarch. in vit. Alex.

ALEXANDER continued his march towards the river Granicus without meeting with any conſiderable accident, if we except only the preſervation of the city of Lampſacus, which, on account of its adhering to the Perſians, he had determined to deſtroy. Anaximenes, an eminent hiſtorian, well known in the court of Philip, and for whom Alexander himſelf had a great eſteem, met him on the road in order to intercede for the place of his birth. The king's indignation ran ſo high, that as ſoon as he came into his preſence, he cried out, Anaximenes, I ſwear ſolemnly that I will not do what you deſire me. My requeſt then, Sir, (ſaid the old man ſmiling) is, that you would burn Lampſacus.

He ſpares Lampſacus, through the art of Anaximenes.

the Greeks, if they were applicable to the thing enquired of, as we ſhall elſewhere ſhew at large. While the Olympic games were celebrating at Ægæ, Arrian tells us, there came advice that the ſtatue of Orpheus on mount Pieria ſweated, concerning the import of which, the augurs and ſoothſayers were much divided; but Ariſtander of Telmiſſus, who, as we obſerved in the text, was the Calchas of Alexander, ſettled the king's mind by the following interpretation: Let it not diſturb you, Sir, ſaid he, the ſweating of the image portends that all ſorts of poets ſhall labour and ſweat in deſcribing your great actions (5). When Alexander was at Troy the prieſt of Minerva having obſerved the ſtatue of Ariobarzanes, the king of Perſia's lieutenant, to have fallen down in the temple, with other portentous ſignals, told the king, that if he fought in Phrygia, he would gain a great victory, kill ſome officer of diſtinction with his own hand, and be himſelf ſlightly wounded; and on this account it was that Alexander took down the conſecrated armour in the temple of Pallas, and left there his own (6). Long before this, if we may believe ſome authors, the deſtruction of the Perſian empire by this very prince had been predicted. The prieſts of Diana at Epeſus, when the temple of the goddeſs there was burnt down, are reported to have given it as their ſentiment, that the conqeror of Aſia was that day born (7), which was true of Alexander, who came then into the world. It may be, theſe interpretations, and even the facts themſelves, were forged long after the Macedónian conqueſt; but inaſmuch as they ſerve to enlighten various paſſages in the beſt Greek and Latin authors, they ought to be recorded ſomewhere, and therefore, to avoid perplexing the text, we have thrown them into notes.

(5) Arrian. lib. i. c. 11. Plutarch. ubi ſupra. (6) Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. (7) Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

ſacus. Alexander, charmed with his addreſs, and conſidering at the ſame time the oath that he made, ordered the city to be ſpared [d]. In the interim, the Perſian, had aſſembled a great army in Phrygia, amongſt whom was Memnon the Rhodian; he was indeed the very hopes of Perſia and the beſt officer Darius had. When it was known that the Macedonians were marching directly towards them, this Memnon gave it as his opinion, that they ſhould burn and deſtroy all the country, and tranſport a moderate army over into Macedon. But the Perſians, depending on their horſe, refuſed to comply with his advice, and therefore poſting themſelves along the river Granicus, they determined there to wait the arrival of Alexander. Juſtin would have us believe, that the Perſian army conſiſted of ſix hundred thouſand foot [e]; Arrian ſays, there were but twenty thouſand and the like number of horſe, which* is moſt probable; Diodorus Siculus makes them ten thouſand horſe and a hundred thouſand foot. All agree, that the horſe were drawn up in one line, fronting the river, and the foot behind them [f]. The river itſelf was rapid, and the bank ſteep.

The battle at the Granicus. Year after the flood 2665. Year before Chriſt 334.

As ſoon as Alexander was informed of the poſture the Perſians were in, he ordered his forces to be drawn up in battalia, the foot in two lines, the horſe on the left, and the baggage in the rear, and then moved directly towards the river. Parmenio, perceiving that he intended to fight, immediately addreſſed him in theſe words: "To me, my prince, it ſeems expedient, that we ſhould encamp cloſe "by the river ſide. For the enemy being far inferior to us "in foot, I am perſuaded their courage will not ſerve them "to remain all night in their poſts; and if they decamp, "we may croſs the river by break of day. We ſhall then "have time to take all our meaſures before they can form, "whereas we cannot paſs now without great hazard. "For how ſhall we lead our ſoldiers to ford a river in the "ſight of our enemies, which of itſelf is rapid, full of "eddies, its banks deep, and uneven as you ſee? Be-"ſides, will not the enemy's horſe, who are perfectly "well diſciplined, take the advantage of our heavy-armed foot,

[d] Valer. Max. lib, vii. c. 3. [e] Hiſt. ubi ſupra. [f] Arrian. ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi ſupra.

* The authors in the fifth volume, page 204. make the Perſian foot accordiug to Arrian, to be two hundred thouſand.

" foot, as their order muſt be broke in climbing the op-" poſite banks, to charge them in flank. If any ill acci" dent ſhould happen at preſent, it would not only be at" tended with terrible conſequences, but would be alſo " thought to have an ominous appearance in reſpect to the " future progreſs of the war". " I agree, Parmenio, re" turned Alexander, that what you ſay is very reaſonable ;
" but how ſhameful would it be for us, who have ſo eaſily
" paſſed the Helleſpont, to be ſtopped by this brook. Such " a conduct would reflect on the Macedonians and on my-" ſelf, as if we were not able to look any danger in the " face. The Perſians too would from thence take heart,
" and believe themſelves our equals, if our firſt attempt
" ſpeak not that ſuperiority in military boldneſs for which " the arms of Macedon are already famous g". As ſoon as he had done ſpeaking, the king diſtributed his orders. To Parmenio he conſigned the care of the left wing. The right he commanded himſelf, and under him Philotas. The Perſians, when they ſaw him advancing, for he was eaſily diſtinguiſhed by his armour and by his guards, immediately brought ſome ſquadrons from the right wing to reinforce the left ; ſo ſoon were they ſtruck with his preſence. Ptolemy the ſon of Philip had the command of the forlorn, and entered the river firſt ; Alexander with the whole right wing followed him, but inſtead of marching directly croſs, as the Perſians expected, he ſuffered his troops to ſlope according to the motion of the current, whereby he had an opportunity of forming in the water, and of charging in good order. The horſe and light-armed troops commanded by Amyntas and Socrates were very warmly received ; the ſons of Memnon, and Memnon in perſon, charged them briſkly, and behaved ſo well, that moſt of them were ſlain ; thoſe few who were left retired to the right wing, as it advanced, commanded by Alexander, who inſtantly threw himſelf into the thickeſt of the fight, and performed wonders there till his lance broke. Aretes the maſter of his horſe, when he commanded him to give him another, ſhewed him the broken ſtaff of his own with which he was fighting ; Demaratus however, one of the king's friends, reached him a ſpear, which as ſoon as Alexander graſped, he rode directly to attack Mithridates, ſon-in-law to Darius, who advanced at the head of a freſh body of horſe, and, at their firſt meeting, ſtriking him through the g Arrian. lib. i. c. 12.

the mouth, bore him to the ground; immediately Rhesaces, a Persian nobleman, struck the king over the head with his sword, cut off a part of his helmet, and slightly wounded him; but while he gave the stroke, the king bearing upon him with his lance, struck him through the body, so that he fell down dead. Yet Spithridates, coming behind Alexander, had at the same instant struck off his head, if Clytus had not disabled him, while his arm was lifted up [h]. The Macedonian horse began now to reach the shore in all parts, and the light-armed foot mixing themselves amongst them, the Persians who were unable to stand the shock, began first to break where Alexander charged in person. The king did not pursue them far, because the mercenaries remained as yet firm, till being surrounded on all sides, they were, except two thousand who surrendered, cut to pieces to a man. Of the Macedonians twenty-five of the king's body-guards were slain, whose statues cast in brass by Lysippus, the king sent to Dium, there to be set up as a memorial of their bravery and his gratitude. Besides these there fell of the horse between sixty and seventy, and of the foot thirty. These were the next day interred in their arms by the king's command; he granted also to their children, and to their parents, the freedom of those cities, in which they dwelt, together with the release of all taxes and duties whatsoever; as for the wounded, he visited them in person, saw them dressed, and heard from every man whatever he thought fit to say of his own deeds. He gave directions also for burying the Persians and Greek mercenaries; but for such of the latter as remained prisoners, he sent them back to Greece in chains, saying, it was fit usage for such as he found in arms against their country. He likewise sent to Athens three hundred suits of Persian armour to be consecrated in the temple of Minerva, with this inscription; Alexander the son of Philip, and all the Grecians, the Lacedæmonians excepted, have dedicated these spoils taken from the Barbarians who inhabit Asia [i] (D).

This

[h] Plut. in vit. Alex. [i] Arrian. lib, i. c. 17. Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. Plut. in vit. Alex. Justin. lib. xi. c. 5.

(D) The different accounts we have of the battle of Granicus are in many respects absolutely incompatible. Diodorus Siculus says, that Alexander commanded the left wing, or at least that he

THIS battle put the king in poſſeſſion of all the adjacent country, of which he began immediately to take care, as if The conſequences of his victory he charged there, though at the beginning of the paragraph he aſſigns that command to Parmenio. Inſtead of Mithridates, he calls the Perſian Spithrobates, with whom Alexander fought, and tells us, that with his javelin he ſtruck the king into the right ſhoulder-blade, from which Alexander drew it, and returned it immediately (8). He alſo attributes to Roſaces what Arrian tells us of Spithridates, which in all probability induced Freinſhemius in his ſupplement to Curtius (9) to look on Mithridates and Spithridates as the ſame perſon, in which he has certainly rectified no miſtake in Arrian, but through an itch of criticizing hath fallen into one himſelf. Whoever reads Arrian carefully will diſcern, that Mithridates was dead before Spithridates attacked Alexander; that Mithridates was killed by Alexander himſelf, but Spithridates by Clytus. Beſides, when he reckons up the great officers among the Perſians, who fell in this battle, Arrian ſays expreſly, there were Spithridates governor of Lydia, and Mithridates ſon in-law to Darius. We have mentioned theſe facts, not ſo much on account of their importance, as to vindicate our following Arrian rather than any other writer on this ſubject; and we hope every impartial reader will ſee and approve our reaſon, becauſe his accounts are cleareſt and moſt conſiſtent with themſelves. Plutarch ſays, that the Perſians loſt twenty thouſand foot and two thouſand five hundred horſe in this battle, and the Macedonians only thirty-four; to eternize whoſe memory, Alexander cauſed ſo many ſtatues of braſs to be ſet up (10). This is certainly a little incredible, but Arrian's account inſerted in our text is very clear; he ſpeaks not of thirty-four, but of twenty-five ſtatues, which were made not to repreſent all who fell in the battle, but thoſe only who fell in the king's guards, who were perſons of diſtinction. To ſay the truth, this is wonderful enough, for it is not eaſy to comprehend how in the ſpace of ten years, which includes the whole reign of Alexander after this battle, Lyſippus could make all theſe ſtatues; but that they were made and ſet up at Dium is certain, ſince we know that Q. Metellus ſent them from thence to Rome. It ſeems ſomewhat ſtrange, that Plutarch, who at other times ſpeaks ſo favourably of Alexander's conduct, charges him upon this occaſion with rage and madneſs in offering to paſs a river in the ſight and in defiance of a ſuperior enemy. Arrian's account ſhews, that Alexander offered ſome reaſons for what he did; and though it may

(8) Diodor Sicul. lib. xvii. Plut. in vit. Alex.

(9) Sup. Curt. lib. ii. c. 5. (10)

if it had been part of his hereditary dominions. Calas was conſtituted lieutenant of the province, from which the ſame tribute was exacted as heretofore had been paid to Darius. He himſelf marched towards Sardis, and when he was about ſeventy ſtadia diſtant from that city, he was met by Mythrenes governor of the garriſon in the caſtle, accompanied by the chief citizens; theſe ſurrendering the city into his hands, and Mythrenes the caſtle with the royal treaſures therein contained. He then proceeded to the river Hermus about twenty ſtadia diſtant from Sardis, where he encamped, and from whence he diſpatched Amyntas the ſon of Andromedes to Sardis to take the government of the caſtle, and carrying Mythrenes with him, treated him honourably. To the Sardians and other Lydians he granted the privilege of being governed by their antient laws. He then entered the caſtle which was garriſoned by the Perſians, and ſeemed to him well fortified. It was ſeated on a high rock, which was every-where ſteep and ſurrounded with a tripple wall. He thereupon propoſed to erect a temple on the top of that eminence, and therein to dedicate an altar to Jupiter Olympius; but while he was yet in ſuſpence, which part of the caſtle was moſt commodious for that purpoſe, a dreadful tempeſt aroſe on a ſudden, huge claps of thunder were heard, and a violent ſtorm fell on that part where the royal palace of the Lydian kings had ſtood. Thus the god ſeemed to point out the place where the temple ſhould be erected; and it was ordered to be built accordingly. The government of this caſtle he committed into the hands of Pauſanias, one of his may be alledged, that the harangues in Greek authors are uſually compoſed by themſelves, and therefore cannot be acknowledged as authentic evidence, we apprehend that two anſwers may be in the preſent caſe given to this objection. The firſt, that ſuppoſing the fact to be true, the harangue contains the ſentiment of the author, which amounts to this that Alexander's conduct was defenſible in the opinion of Arrian: the ſecond, that as Arrian tranſcribed his hiſtory from the memoirs of Ariſtobulus and Ptolemy, who were eye and ear-witneſſes of what they wrote, it may be well preſumed, that he had at leaſt the ſubſtance of the ſpeeches he inſerted from thoſe authors too, and if ſo, then they will be the ſtrongeſt evidence. This notion is rendered the more probable from the ſtructure of theſe orations, which are far from being rhetorical, but on the contrary, as plain and natural as can be imagined.

his friends, but the collection of tributes and impoſts to Nicias. Aſander the ſon of Philotas was conſtituted perfect of Lydia and the reſt of the provinces of Spithridates, and had ſuch a number of horſe and light-armed foot allowed him as were judged neceſſary. Calas and Alexander the ſon of Æropus were diſpatched into the province commanded by Memnon, and with them a very conſiderable body of troops [k]. In the mean time the mercenaries in garriſon at Epheſus, ſeizing two gallies of three banks of oars, retired; with them went Amyntas, who, as we have elſewhere obſerved, had deſerted to Darius, as ſoon as Alexander aſcended the throne. As ſoon as the king had information of this, he went to Epheſus in perſon, where he did every thing that was popular; he reſtored the democracy, and ordered the tribute which had been paid to the Perſian to be applied to the rebuilding the temple of Diana. It is ſaid he would have been at the whole expence of that magnificent pile, if the Epheſians would have inſcribed his name thereupon; but this they refuſed, chuſing to keep the honour and the expence to themſelves. His favours encouraged the commons of Epheſus to fall upon ſome perſons of diſtinction, who had been formerly in the adminiſtration of affairs, and, notwithſtanding they had taken ſanctuary in the temple, to drag them to the market place, where they ſtoned them; as theſe men had been guilty of very flagrant oppreſſions, Alexander would not interpoſe to ſave them, but immediately after their deaths, he iſſued out an edict, whereby he ſtrictly forbad any farther enquiry into the conduct of the former magiſtrates, rightly conceiving, that if the people were ſuffered to treat the guilty thus, envy, malice, and avarice would ſoon lead them to treat the innocent in the ſame manner. This conduct of his gained him high reputation, all degrees of people owning him for their deliverer, while at the ſame time the nobles confeſſed that he was their preſerver [l]. By another edict, he ordered the popular government to be reſtored in all the Greek cities, and ſent Alcimalus with a body of troops to ſee it executed; then with the remainder of his army he marched to beſiege Miletus, before which the fleet commanded by Nicanor had lain for ſome time, and the Perſian fleet was alſo in the neighbourhood of that city. The Mileſians themſelves were disposed to submit to Alexander, but Memnon, who with a considerable body of troops had entered the place immediately after the battle at Granicus, resolved to defend it. We have already observed, that he was a great officer, and his conduct here was equal to the reputation he had before acquired; for notwithstanding the Macedonian fleet blocked up the haven, the citizens were disaffected, and Alexander's veteran foot stormed the place almost as soon as they came before it; yet he made a vigorous resistance, and after the city was taken withdrew with his garrison into an island, where part of the mercenaries capitulated, and were received into Alexander's service, the rest with Memnon himself withdrew to Halicarnassus [m]. When the king was fully master of Miletus, he treated the citizens with much humanity, but sold all the strangers he found for slaves. As soon as he was informed that the Persian fleet was withdrawn from Mycale, he dismissed his own (E); this was a very extraordinary

[k] Arrian. lib. i. c. 18.

[l] Arrian. ubi ſupra. Plut in vit. Alexand.

[m] Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. Arrian. ubi supra.

(E) After the battle at Granicus, Alexander's generals were a good deal perplexed as to the manner in which they should advise him to proceed; for they saw plainly, that though their late victory had struck the Persians with great consternation, yet in effect it had very little lessened their power: Besides at sea they were still masters. What the sentiments of Parmenio were on this head and what those of Alexander, we learn from Arrian in the following words: The Barbarian fleet consisted of about four hundred ships. Parmenio advised Alexander to a naval engagement, assuring him, that the Greeks would be victors at sea, because a lucky omen had just happened, an eagle being seen upon the shore from one of the ships of his navy. He also added, that if they overcame their enemies, they would reap an immense advantage from such an engagement during the whole war; and if they chanced to be overcome, he could not perceive that any vast danger could ensue, because the Persians, by virtue of their shipping, already held the sovereignty of the sea without fighting. As for his part, he would willingly enter himself on board, and share the danger of the fleet in his own person. However, Alexander returned him answer, that he was mistaken in his conjectures, and did not interpret the omen justly; for it would be a point of small prudence in him with so few ships to hazard an engagement against a fleet so numerous, and with soldiers so little trained up in naval ordinary ſtep, and authors are pretty much at a loſs how to account for it. Diodorus Siculus ſays, that Alexander, being well informed of Darius's deſign to march againſt him immediately with a mighty army, determined by this means to cut off from his own troops all hopes of ſafety but from their valour; he grounds this conjecture on the conduct of Alexander in the laſt battle, wherein he made his forces fight with the river at their back, ſo that flight was rendered impracticable, there being the chance of war if they fought, but no chance at all if they attempted to run away [n]. Arrian hath aſſigned us ſome better reaſons; he ſays, in the firſt place, that Alexander had no money to pay them; and in the ſecond, that he was afraid to truſt his fortune in an engagement at ſea. There was a third reaſon much ſtronger than the other two; he was determined to poſſeſs himſelf of all the ſea-ports by means of his land-army, and having done this, he very rightly conjectured, that the Perſians would be deprived of all uſe of their fleet for want of their uſual recruits, and from their being deprived of ports where they might refit [o]. He had moreover ſome notion, that his fleet would be more wanting on the other ſide of the Helleſpont, ſo that for many reaſons he was determined to this meaſure, how extraordinary ſoever it might appear; for though it be true, that never any general poſſeſſed perſonal courage in a higher degree than the prince of whom we are ſpeaking, yet it is as certain, that he was a great maſter in naval diſcipline to pretend to attack the expert Cyprians and Phœnicians: Neither was he willing that the Barbarians ſhould try the ſkill and valour of the Macedonians on ſo unſtable an element: And beſides, ſhould they be beaten in a ſea-fight, an inexpreſſible damage would accrue to them from the fame their enemies would thereby gain. Add to this, that if the Greeks were animated by the news of an overthrow at ſea, they would begin to ſtudy innovations. All which things maturely weighed, he deemed a ſea-fight altogether unſafe at that juncture: And for his part he expounded the omen in a different manner. The eagle indeed he allowed promiſed ſucceſs; but as ſhe was ſeen on the ſhore, it ſeemed rather to portend, that he ſhould become maſter of the enemies fleet by beating their armies on the continent (11).

[n] ubi ſupra. [o] Arrian. lib. i. c. 19.

(11) Arrian. lib. i. c. 19.

the art of war, and did many things which had the air of rashness from a superior skill in the military art, which enabled him to penetrate farther into the connection between causes and events, than many who were about him, and than most of the authors who have transmitted his history to posterity, as the reader will discern from the last note.

The siege of Halicarnassus.

Almost all the cities between Miletus and Halicarnassus submitted as soon as the former was taken, and the rest surrendered as soon as the king marched towards them; but for Halicarnassus itself, Alexander was sensible that the reduction thereof would cost him both time and trouble: Memnon, whom Darius had declared high admiral and governor of the Lower Asia, commanded there in person with a very numerous garrison [p]. Alexander encamped therefore at the distance of five stadia from the city, skirmishing daily with the garrison, till he had provided all things for the siege. While things were in this situation, some of the citizens of Myndus privately promised Alexander to put their town into his hands, provided, he would advance towards it in the night with a considerable body of forces; this proposition the king very readily accepted, and drew out a considerable body of horse, supported by a body of light-armed foot, in order to go on this expedition. At midnight therefore he approached the walls according to his promise; but perceiving no signs of a surrender from the citizens, and considering that he had neither engines nor scaling ladders at hand, as coming there not to besiege a city, but to have it delivered to him; he nevertheless ordered the Macedonian phalanx to advance, commanding them to undermine the wall, which they did, and presently overturned one of the towers thereupon, without making a breach in the wall itself. But the citizens making an obstinate defence, and being assisted by the Halicarnassians who sent them succours by sea, Alexander was disappointed in his expectation of taking it at the first assault; wherefore, without more ado, he drew off and returned to his siege of Halicarnassus: and first of all ordered the ditch, which the citizens had dug round their walls, of thirty cubits in breadth and fifteen in depth, to be filled up, that so the wooden towers, out of which they were to direct their missive weapons against the besieged, and their engines to shake the walls might advance forwards.

The

[p] Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra.

The ditch being accordingly filled up, the towers began to advance; but the beſieged iſſued forth by night with a deſign of burning both the towers and engines which were now nigh the walls; and had certainly effected their deſigns, had they not been encountered by the Macedonians who were placed to guard the engines, and others who came haſtily forth at the noiſe of the ſkirmiſh; ſo that they were with ſmall loſs beat back into the city. There fell of the Halicarnaſſians in this conflict one hundred and ſeventy, among whom was Neoptolemus the brother of Arrhabæus and ſon of Amyntas, one of thoſe who had formerly fled to Darius. Of the Macedonians ſixteen were ſlain, and near three hundred wounded; for that ſally being made in the night, they were the leſs able to guard their bodies and avoid the darts and arrows of their enemies [q]. We have in Arrian a very exact journal of this ſiege, wherein the greateſt vigour was ſhewn on the part of the aſſailants, and the moſt obſtinate reſolution diſcovered by the defendants; a moſt conſummate experience in the affairs of war in both; for as the king's troops frequently attempted to ſcale the walls, continued conſtantly to batter them with engines, and in ſome places proceeded by ſap, ſo the garriſon ſallied often, ſometimes burnt the beſiegers engines, at others levelled their works, yet were in all their attemps expoſed to great danger, there happening a vaſt effuſion of blood on both ſides [r]. At laſt Orontobates and Memnon and the reſt of the Perſian commanders, conſidering that they could not now hold the town long, becauſe part of their walls was already beat down, and part ſhaken and ready to fall, and many of the defendants either cut off in the ſeveral encounters which had happened, or wounded and rendered unſerviceable; and having weighed the matter deliberately, about the ſecond watch of the night, ſet fire to the wooden tower which they had built to guard them from the ſhocks of the enemies engines, and to the arſenal where their artillery was lodged, as alſo to ſome houſes near the wall, which laſt blazed out with much fury, becauſe the wind ſetting that way, many flakes of fire were driven from the tower and arſenal thither. Hereupon ſome of the townſmen betook themſelves to a caſtle in an iſland, and others to another caſtle called Salmais. Which when Alexander was informed informed of by ſome deſerters, and when he beheld the raging flames, though it was near midnight, he nevertheleſs detached a body of Macedonians thither, with orders to ſlay thoſe who ſet fire to the city, but to ſpare whomſoever they found in their habitations. As ſoon as it was daylight, Alexander, viewing the caſtles which the Perſians and their mercenary troops had ſeized, reſolved not to lay ſiege to them, as well becauſe the reducing of them, conſidering their ſituation, would take up too much time, as becauſe they would not be of any great importance after he had reduced the city; wherefore taking care to inter thoſe who fell in the laſt conflict by night, he commanded his engineers to convey the artillery to Tralles, which city he laid level with the ground, and marching thence into Phrygia left a body of three thouſand foot and two hundred horſe, under the command of Ptolemy, to keep the country of Caria in obedience [s].

[q] Arrian. lib. i. c. 21.

[r] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

Ada made governeſs of Caria.

At the time Alexander entered this country, there was a lady whoſe name was Ada, who claimed the title of queen of Caria thus: She was the daughter of Hecatumnus, and the ſiſter of Hidrieus, and, according to the Carian laws, his wife too; on his death ſhe ſucceeded him in the kingdom, but was quickly diſpoſſeſſed of it by Pexodorus, whoſe ſon-in-law Orontobates ſucceeded him by the favour of Darius. Ada all this time held the city of Alinda, which was the ſtrongeſt in thoſe parts; the keys of which as ſoon as he entered the province ſhe delivered to Alexander, and, as a farther mark of her reſpect, adopted him her ſon. The king, charmed by her obliging behaviour, and ſtruck with that greatneſs of mind ſhe manifeſted on this ſudden turn of affairs, received the honour ſhe did very kindly, and, after having demoliſhed Halicarnaſſus, he made her governneſs general of all Caria [t]. While his forces remained in Caria, Ada had often ſent him preſents of the beſt things the country afforded; and now when he was about to depart, ſhe ſent him ſeveral cooks and confectioners to ſerve in his kitchen; but the king ſent them back with this compliment, that his governor Leonidas long ago provided him better cooks than they, viz. "Long morning marches "to give him a ſtomach to his dinner, and ſlender dinners, "which were ſure to leave appetite enough for ſupper."

This

[s] Arrian. lib. i. c. 24. [t] Id. ibid.

This conduct of Alexander towards the queen of Caria was of great uſe to him; for it induced many of the princes of the leſſer Aſia to revolt from the Perſian, and put themſelves under his protection. Mithridates king of Pontus was in the number of theſe; he was the anceſtor of that famous king of the ſame name, who gave the Romans ſo much trouble, and was deſcended from the royal houſe of Perſia; and coming to Alexander's camp to pay his compliments to him, he acquired ſuch a love for him, that he accompanied him in his Perſian expedition [u].

DIODORUS Siculus affirms, that the laſt action of the campaign was againſt the Marmarians, an inconſiderable people inhabiting on the borders of Lycia; their city was ſeated among rocks, and thence held by them to be impregnable. Theſe people, either for the ſake of booty, or from their warm attachment to the Perſians, fell upon the rear of Alexander's army, cut a great number of Macedonians to pieces, and took a great part of the baggage; this exceedingly provoked the king, who immediately cauſed the place to be inveſted, and as it had no fortifications but thoſe of nature, he ſtormed it two whole days together. The old men then among the beſieged would have perſuaded them to ſurrender, but they declaring reſolutely that they would never ſubmit, their elders adviſed them to put all the ſuperannuated men, women, and children to death, then to force a paſſage through the enemies camp. This advice the young men embraced, when every one going home made a great feaſt, and after eating and drinking plentifully with his wife and children, ſhut the door of his houſe, and then ſet it on fire. As ſoon as the flames began to mount, they to the number of ſix hundred ſallied out, forced the Macedonian guard, and made their eſcape to the mountains [w].

The ſlaughter of the Marmarians.

WHEN the winter began to come in, Alexander made choice of Ptolemy the ſon of Seleucus, Cœnus the ſon of Polemocrates, and Meleager the ſon of Neoptolemus to lead home to Macedon all the new married ſoldiers in his army, that they might ſpend the winter with their wives, an act very extraordinary in its nature, and for which there was no precedent among the Greeks; but, inaſmuch as it is exactly conformable to the law of Moſes, ſome learned men have been tempted to believe, that Ariſtotle, who was well verſed in the Hebrew learning, adviſed him thereto; however ever it was, Arrian tells us expreſly, that no action of his life endeared him more to the Macedonians than this. He likewiſe ſent Parmenio and ſome other general officers to raiſe recruits, ſome into Europe, and ſome into Aſia [x] (F).

The new-married men ſent home.

[u] Flor. lib. iii, c. 5.

[w] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

A conſpiracy diſcovered.

THINGS being in this ſituation, and the king buſy in providing for the next campaign, a very extraordinary piece of treaſon was diſcovered, Alexander the ſon of Æropus, whom the king had made general of the Theſſalian horſe, held a correſpondence with Amyntas, who was in the ſervice [x] Arrian. lib. i. c. 25. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut in vit. Alex.

(F) The words of the law of Moſes relating to this matter are theſe: When a man hath taken a new wife, he ſhall not go out to war, neither ſhall he be charged with any buſineſs; he ſhall be free at home for one year, and ſhall chear up his wife which he hath taken (12). To this paſſage it might be objected; that Moſes forbids the enliſting of new-married men, whereas Alexander diſmiſſed thoſe who actually ſerved in his army; yet the truth is, that Alexander exactly fulfilled the law; for, in another place, it is enjoined the principal officers of the Hebrew army, when in the field to enquire amongſt other things; What man there is that hath betrothed a wife, and hath not taken her; let him go home and return to his houſe, leſt he die in battle, and another man take her (13). We are well aſſured, that Ariſtotle was acquainted with, and highly eſteemed, the law of the Jews; we know too, that what Philip expected from him was not to inſtruct his ſon in ſcanning of verſes or ſolving grammatical niceties; but that he might become a worthy ſucceſſor of himſelf, and an able king of Macedon. To this end, that truly wiſe man put a correct edition of Homer into the hands of his pupil, and doubtleſs acquainted with whatſoever elſe he had collected in relation to the ſcience of government from books or in his travels (14). This ſuppoſition therefore, that the practice of Alexander was founded on the Moſaic law, is very probable. To ſay the truth, the beſt laws in Greece were but copies of the Moſaic law, as ſome learned men in the laſt century have very fully ſhewn, and of which any impartial perſon may be eaſily convinced, if he will compare thoſe laws, in their original languages, and conſider how nearly the Greek approaches to an elegant tranſlation of the Hebrew, neceſſary allowances being made for the difference in manners.

(12) Deut. xxiv. 5. (13) Deut. xx. 7. (14) Joſeph. cont. Ap. lib. i.

ſervice of Darius. Aſiſines a Perſian was pitched on by the latter to carry letters to this Alexander, promiſing him a thouſand talents of ſilver and the kingdom of Macedonia, if he would undertake to murder the king; this Aſiſines Parmenio apprehended upon ſome ſuſpicion or other, and being examined, he confeſſed the whole buſineſs; whereupon the king ſent inſtructions to Parmenio to apprehend Alexander, before he ſhould be able to debauch the troops under his command, and thereby cauſe a defection, which on account of the man's great quality, might be very dangerous. This commiſſion was very happily executed, and the king thereby delivered from a conſpiracy which had given him no ſmall diſquiet. [z] (G).

As ſoon as the ſeaſon permitted Alexander quitted the province of Phaſelus where he now was, and having ſent part of his army through the mountainous country to Perga by a ſhort but difficult road, he led the reſt by the ſea-ſhore, taking his rout by a certain promontory, where the way is altogether impaſſable, except when the north winds blow. At the time of the king's march the ſouth wind had held for a long time, but of a ſudden it changed, and Alexander proceeds in the conqueſt of the adjacent provinces. Year after the flood 2666. Year before Chriſt 333.

[z] Arrian. lib. i. c. 26. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

(G) We are told by Diodorus, that it was by a letter from his mother Olympias the king was informed of the conſpiracy of Alexander the ſon of Æropus; however, Arrian, beſides the information of Parmenio, informs us of another odd circumſtance, which concurred to make this matter more obſervable. While the king, who then lay before Halicarnaſſus, was faſt aſleep about noon, a ſwallow came chattering about him, hovering over his head, and reſting ſometimes on one, ſometimes on the other, ſide of the bed. He being exceeding fatigued was not eaſily awaked; but when her inceſſant chattering rouſed him from ſleep, he put her away gently with his hand; notwithſtanding ſo far from endeavouring to eſcape, that ſhe perched upon his head, and ceaſed not her noiſe till the king was thoroughly awake. This prodigy being deemed of too great moment to be diſregarded, he immediately conſulted with Ariſtander the Telmiſſean ſoothſayer, who aſſured him, that a conſpiracy was formed againſt his life by one of his domeſtics, but that it would be brought to light, becauſe the ſwallow was a domeſtic bird and moſt exceedingly loquacious (15).

(15) Arrian, lib. i. c. 26.

and blew from the north so violently, that, as he and his followers declared, they by divine assistance obtained a safe and easy passage. This is Arrian's account, not only in substance, but in his own words, of a march held by many to be miraculous, and even compared to that of the children of Israel thro' the Red-Sea, while, on the other hand, it is the opinion of many, there is nothing extraordinary in it at all [a] (H). In this march he was met by deputies from the Aspendians, who desired him to spare putting a garrison into their city, because they were content to be his faithful subjects; to which he readily assented. upon condition they paid him fifty talents, and sent him the same number of horses which they were wont to furnish to Darius, terms to which they also readily agreed. But while the king was employed in reducing other places in the neighbourhood, the Aspendians fortified their city, and refused to comply with the treaties which their deputies had made. Upon which the king marched immediately that way with his army. The city of Aspendus is seated chiefly on a high and steep rock, the foot of which is washed by the river Eurymedon; but round the rock upon

[a] Arrian. Plutarch. ubi supra.

(H) There seems to be no just reason for believing any thing supernatural in relation to Alexander's passage by the sea-side. In his letters he spoke of it himself in terms the most plain and simple, affirming nothing more than that he marched from Phaselis through the streights called the ladders (16). There is, however, a passage in Strabo which seems to set this matter in a clear light, and to prove very fully, that there was in this passage no miracle at all. "Near the city of Phaselis between "Lycia and Pamphylia there is a passage coasting along by the "sea, through which Alexander marched his army. This passage is "very narrow, and lies between the mountain Chinax, which "overlooks the Pamphylian sea, and the shore. It is dry at low "water, so that travellers pass through it with safety; but when "the sea is high, it is all covered over. It was then in the winter "season, and Alexander, who depended much upon his good "fortune, was resolved to set out without staying till the floods "were abated, so that his men were forced to march up to the "middle in water (17).

(16) Epist. Alex. ap. Plut. in vit. Alex. (17) Strabo. Geogr. lib.

upon the plain are abundance of houſes ſurrounded with a ſlight wall. As ſoon as Alexander approached, the inhabitants of the lower town, diſtruſting their ſafety there, fled, and betook themſelves to the higher town or caſtle; which when he perceived, he entered the lower town with his army, and encamped within the walls. The beſieged ſeeing Alexander's force, and themſelves hemmed in on every ſide contrary to their expectations, ſent meſſengers to entreat him to accept of the former conditions. Alexander, conſidering the ſtrength of the place, and how unprovided he was to undertake a long ſiege, was willing to agree with them, though not upon the former terms; but inſiſted now, that their principal citizens ſhould be delivered up as hoſtages; that the number of horſes which they had before promiſed ſhould be punctually delivered, and the number of talents doubled; and moreover, that they ſhould be under the command of ſuch a garriſon as he ſhould place over them, and pay an annual tribute to the Macedonians; and laſtly, that the cauſe concerning the field, which they were ſaid to have wreſtled unjuſtly out of their neighbours hands, ſhould be referred to arbitration. This affair being finiſhed, the king proſecuted his march to Telmiſſus, a very ſtrong city, ſeated on the top of a high mountain, having another as high over-againſt it, and a narrow craggy road between theſe two. This paſs the Telmiſſeans had ſeized, and, if they had defended it as they ought, might in all probability have compelled the king to look for another road. But Alexander, rightly judging that the terror of an attack would oblige them to withdraw, encamped his forces at the very entrance of the paſſage, at the cloſe of the evening, and in the morning as he had rightly conjectured, it was perceived, that the Telmiſſeans were retired into their city, the ſiege of which on account of its ſtrong ſituation the king declined for the preſent, and continued his march through Phrygia, intending to reaſſemble all his troops at Gordium, whither he ſent his orders to Parmenio to march, as he did alſo to Ptolemy and his collegues, who with the new married men and recruits were now returned from Macedonia [b]. On his march he met with deputies from Athens, who in very ſubmiſſive terms beſought him to diſmiſs ſuch of their citizens, citizens, as he had taken fighting in the service of the Persians; but from this the king desired to be excused till the war was over, and then told them he would be content to hear what they could say in favour of their citizens [c].

[b] Arrian. lib. i. c. 29.

Darius puts Charidemus to death.

DARIUS was all this time fighting for Alexander at home; for upon the death of Memnon his admiral, who had begun with great success to reduce the Greek islands again under his obedience, and was on the very point of invading Eubœa, he was quite at a stand, not knowing who to employ in his stead; and being also irresolute as to the choice of a general who should command the land-forces he had raised. There happened to be at this time of his court and council one Charidemus an Athenian, an officer of great merit, and had served long and with much reputation under Philip of Macedon; this man, being heartily zealous for the Persian interest, and seeing it no less in danger from their own feeble councils than from the Macedonian arms, took upon him in few words to set the king and his ministers right. While you, Sir, said he to Darius, are safe, the empire can never be at stake; let me exhort you therefore never to expose your person, but to make choice of some able general to march against your enemy. One hundred thousand men will be more than sufficient, provided a third of them be mercenaries, to compel him to abandon this enterprize: and if you will honour me with this command, I will be accountable for the success of what I advise. Darius, who was a wise and brave man, readily acceded to Charidemus's proposal; but the Persian lords who were present, through envy, inveighed bitterly against it; whereupon the Athenian was so far transported with passion, that he told them they were cowards, who would neither serve their master themselves nor suffer him to be served by others. This moved them to charge him with treachery, and to alledge that he sought the command merely to put all things into the hands of the Macedonians; which made such an impression on Darius, that he ordered him to be instantly bound and delivered over to execution. Those who had pushed the king upon this barbarous and unjust act took care not to let the thing cool, but hurried the Athenian to instant death; to which which as he went, he ſaid aloud, Darius will very ſoon repent his cruelty towards me, when by the loſs of his kingdom he ſhall find with how much injuſtice he has taken away my life [d]. Indeed Dariusrepented in a few days, but, as our author rightly obſerves, powerful as he was, he could not recal from death him whom a haſty word had ſent from the land of the living. He was forced therefore to take the counſel of his own ſubjects, and purſuant to their advice determined to march againſt Alexander with an army, which, as one of his predeceſſors emphatically ſaid, had in it many men and few ſoldiers.

[c] Arrian. ubi supra. Curt. lib. iii. c. 2.

Alexander unties the Gordian knot.

WHEN Alexander arrived at Gordium, and found himſelf under a neceſſity of remaining there ſome time, till the ſeveral corps of his army could unite, he diſcovered an earneſt deſire of ſeeing Gordius's chariot, and the famous knot in the harneſs, of which ſuch ſtrange ſtories had been publiſhed to the world. This Gordius, as the tale went, was a man of ſlender fortune among the antient Phrygians, who had a ſmall piece of land and two yoke of oxen, one of which he employed in the plough, and the other in the waggon ; and that on a certain day, while he was ploughing, an eagle alighted on the yoke, and there reſted till the evening. He, terrified at the ſight, haſted to conſult the Telmiſſean augurs in that caſe (for the art of divination was common to all that people, even to the women and children, ſo that it was in a manner hereditary) ; and when he arrived at a certain village in that country, he met a virgin going to a fountain, who foretold what ſhould happen to him, and ordered him, as ſhe was of the Telmiſſean progeny, to return to his field. and then offer ſacrifice to Jupiter. Gordius, on the other hand, entreated her to accompany him thither, to teach him after what manner ſacrifice ſhould be performed. He, thus inſtructed by the virgin, took her to wife, and ſhe bore him a ſon named Midas, who when he arrived at manhood was both beautiful and valiant. The Phrygians were at that time harraſſed with a cruel ſedition, and going to conſult the oracle were told, that a chariot ſhould bring them a king who ſhould quell their ſedition. Whilſt they were yet buſy in offering their conjectures about this anſwer, Midas arrived with his father and mother, and appeared ſuddenly in his chariot before the council. They hereupon interpreting the anſwer to relate to him, as the man whom the god had told them

[d] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra Curt. lib. iii. c. 5

them ſhould come thither in a chariot, made him their king. Their ſeditions he appeaſed, and conſecrated his father's chariot to Jupiter the king, by hanging it up in his palace as an offering of thanks for the eagle, the bird of Jupiter, ſent to his father, by which he received the kingdom. This was alſo reported concerning the chariot, that whoſoever could untie the knot whereby it hung, ſhould obtain the ſovereignty over all Aſia. The cord in which this knot was tied was compoſed of the inner rind of the corneil tree, and no eye could perceive where it had been begun or ended. Alexander, when he could find no poſſible way of untying it, and yet was unwilling to leave it tied, leſt it ſhould cauſe ſome fears to ariſe in the hearts of his ſoldiers, is ſaid by ſome to have cut the cords with his ſword, and affirmed that the knot was untied. But Ariſtobulus aſſures us, that he wreſted a wooden pin out of the beam of the waggon, which, being driven in acroſs the beam, held it up, and ſo took the yoke from it [e]. Arrian, from whom we have taken this relation, leaves his reader at liberty to receive which ſtory he pleaſes. Curtius, on the contrary, declares poſitively, that the king cut the knot through with his ſword, ſaying, as he ſtruck, It matters not how it is undone. But what is the authority of Curtius compared to that of Ariſtobulus, who was an eye-witneſs of the thing, and who declares as expreſly that the king did not cut it? to which ſentiment alſo Plutarch adheres. However it was, Arrian informs us, that a great tempeſt of thunder, lightning and rain happening in the ſucceeding night, it was held a declarative of the true ſolution of this knot, and that Alexander would become lord of Aſia [f].

His vigilance in entering Cilicia.

On Alexander's arrival at Ancyra a city of Galatia, the province of Paphlagonia ſubmitted to him, which he thereupon added to the government of Calas, proceeding inſtantly to reduce Cappadocia as far as the river Halys, and then marched on to poſſeſs himſelf of Cilicia. This province was bounded on the weſt by Pamphylia, on the eaſt by Syria, on the ſouth by the bay of Iſſus, and on the north by Cappadocia. In it were three famous ſtreights or paſſes: The firſt at its entrance called the gate: The ſecond called the ſtreights of Amanus: the third near the bay of Iſſus. It was the firſt of theſe which which Alexander ſought to ſurprize by a quick march, and which, when he came to the camp of Cyrus, a place ſo called, becauſe Cyrus the younger had once taken poſt there with his army, he had the mortification to hear had been ſeized by the Perſian, who had ſent a conſiderable body of troops to defend it; this did not hinder the king from purſuing his deſign, and marching in the firſt watch of the night with his horſe and light-armed foot to the very mouth of the paſs, in order to attack it as ſoon as day broke. But the enemy ſpared him the trouble, for long before day, forgetting the importance of the place, they abandoned it, and ſought their ſafety in flight; ſo that Alexander immediately took poſſeſſion of it, and the next day marched all his army through into Cilicia without ſo much as a skirmiſh [g].

[e] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 30.

[f] Arrian, ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alex.

His ſharp ſickneſs, and wonderful recovery.

As ſoon as he entered the province, he received advice, that Arſames, whom Darius had made governor of Tarſus, was about to abandon it, and that the inhabitants were very apprehenſive he would plunder it before he withdrew. To prevent this, the king marched inceſſantly, and arrived juſt time enough to preſerve the place; but his ſaving it had well nigh coſt him his life; for either through the exceſſive fatigue of marching, as ſome ſay, or, as others relate, by his plunging when very hot into the river Cydnus, which as it runs through thick ſhades hath its waters exceedingly cold, he fell into ſuch a diſtemper as threatened his immediate diſſolution. His army in a moment loſt its ſpirits; his generals who were wont to adviſe him, knew not what to do themſelves; nay, his phyſicians were ſo affrighted, that the terror of his death hindred them from taking proper methods for preſerving his life [h]. Philip the Acarnanian alone preſerved temper enough to examine the nature of the king's diſeaſe, the ſtrongeſt ſymptom of which was a continual waking, which he promiſed by the help of a draught to take off, and by compoſing his ſpirits to put him in a way of recovery. But while Philip was employed in preparing his medicine, the king received a letter from Parmenio, in which he was adviſed to be cautious of taking any thing from Philip, Darius having ſuborned him to take away his life. Having peruſed the letter, the king put it under his head; and when Philip brought him the potion, he took it out, and reached it to

[g] Arrian. lib. ii. c. 4. Curt. lib. iii. c. 9. [h] Arrian. lib. ii. c. 4. Curt. lib. iii. c. 10.

to the phyſician, drinking the mixture with a ſteady and ſmiling look, while Philip read the letter. The compoſure of the man's countenance, and the anſwer he gave to the letter, by exhorting the king to quiet his thoughts, and to diſpoſe himſelf to reſt, aſſuring him that he would recover his health, if he purſued his directions, convinced Alexander of the falſehood of the accuſation. When, according to Philip's promiſe, the king began to recover his health, he not only teſtified an extraordinary gratitude towards the author of his cure, but alſo aſſured all who were about him that he had the juſteſt ſenſe imaginable of their loyalty and affection to his perſon, notwithſtanding any ſuggeſtion he might have received to their prejudice.

He paſſes by Darius.

IMMEDIATELY on his recovery, he diſpatched Parmenio to ſeize the ſecond ſtreights, while he himſelf reduced ſuch places in the neighbourhood as had not beſought his protection. Being encamped at Soli, he received advice, that Ptolemy and Aſander had beat the generals of Darius, and made great conqueſts on the Helleſpont: this was very grateful intelligence, and Alexander cauſed very magnificent feaſts and ſhews to be made in his camp on that account. A little after he was informed, that Darius was advanced through Syria within two days journey of the ſtreights; upon which the king immediately marched towards him, and that with ſuch expedition, that going through the defiles, he encamped near the city of Myriandrus. In the mean time Darius, led by his ill fate in the ſhape of his flatterers, had paſſed the ſtreights of Amanus, and came down to Iſſus, where he put moſt of the Macedonians he found to the ſword [i].

Darius returns to meet him.

ALEXANDER was ſo much ſurprized, when he firſt received the news that Darius was behind him, that he could ſcarce believe it to be true; but when he was thoroughly ſatisfied of the fact, and that Darius had again paſſed the river Pinarus, he called a council of war, wherein, without aſking any body advice, he only told them, that he hoped they would remember their former actions, and that they, who were always conquerors, were about to fight people who were always beaten. He further obſerved, that Darius ſeemed to be infatuated, ſince he had with ſuch expedition quitted an open and champaign country, where his numbers might have acted with advantage, to fight in a place incloſed, where the Macedonian phalanx might well be be drawn up, and where his multitudes could only incommode him. To theſe he added many other reflections on the antient glory of the Greeks, and the as antient infamy of the Barbarians. When he had finiſhed his oration, thoſe who were preſent ſhook hands, and, commending the king's magnanimity, promiſed that they would do their duty. Alexander then made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for repaſſing the mountains, poſted guards where he found them neceſſary, and then commanded his troops to refreſh themſelves, and to take their reſt till morning [k].

[i] Arrian. lib. ii. c. 6. Curt. lib. iii. c. 16.

Diſpoſitions of both armies.

At break of day he began to repaſs the mountains, obliging his forces to move in cloſe order where the road was narrow, and to extend themſelves as they had more room; the right wing keeping always cloſe to the mountain, and the left to the ſea-ſhore. On the right there was a battalion of heavy-armed troops, beſides the targeteers under the command of Nicanor the ſon of Parmenio. Next theſe, extending to the phalanx, were the corps of Cænus and Perdiccas. And on the left the reſpective bodies commanded by Amyntas, Ptolemy, and Meleager. The foot appointed to ſupport them was commanded by Craterus: But the whole left wing was committed to Parmenio, with ſtrict orders not to decline from the ſea-ſhore, leſt the Perſians ſhould ſurround them. Darius ordered twenty thouſand foot and thirty thouſand horſe to paſs once again the river Pinarus, finding that he already wanted room to draw up the reſt. His firſt line conſiſted of thirty thouſand Greek mercenaries, having on their right and left ſixty-thouſand heavy-armed troops, being the utmoſt the ground would allow. On the left towards the mountain he poſted twenty thouſand men, which from the hollow ſituation of the place were brought quite behind Alexander's right wing. The reſt of his troops were formed into cloſe and uſeleſs lines, behind the Greek mercenaries, to the number in all of ſix hundred thouſand men. When this was done, he ſuddenly recalled the horſe who had paſſed the river, ſending part of them to take poſt on his right againſt the Macedonians commanded by Parmenio, and the reſt he ordered to the left towards the mountain, but finding them unſerviceable there he ſent the greateſt part of them to the right: and then took upon himſelf, according to the cuſtom of the Perſian kings, the command of the main body. As ſoon as Alexander perceived, that the weight of the Perſian horſe was diſpoſed againſt his left wing, he diſpatched with as much ſecrecy as he could the Theſſalian cavalry thither, and ſupplied their places on the right by ſome brigades of horſe from the van and light-armed troops. He alſo made ſuch diſpoſitions, that, notwithſtanding the mighty advantage of the hollow mountain, the Perſians could not ſurround him. But as theſe precautions had much weakened the centre of his army, he ordered thoſe advanced poſts on the enemy's left, of which he was moſt apprehenſive, to be attacked at the very beginning of the fight; and when they were eaſily driven from them, he recalled as many troops as were neceſſary to ſtrengthen his centre [1].

[k] Arrian lib. ii. c. 6. Curt. lib. iii. c. 16.

Battle of Iſſus. Year after the flood 2667. Year before Chriſt 332.

When all things were in order, Alexander gave ſtrict orders that his army ſhould march very ſlowly. As for Darius, he kept his troops fixed in their poſts, and in ſome places threw up ramparts, whence the Macedonians rightly obſerved, that he thought himſelf already a priſoner. Alexander at the head of the right wing engaged firſt, and without any difficulty broke and defeated the left wing of Darius. But endeavouring to paſs the river after them, his troops in ſome meaſure loſing their order, the Greek mercenaries fell upon them in flank, and made them fight, not only for victory, but for their lives. Ptolemy, the ſon of Seleucus, and a hundred and twenty Macedonians of ſome rank were killed upon the ſpot. But the foot next to Alexander's right wing, coming in ſeaſonably to its relief, fell upon the mercenaries in flank, amongſt whom a miſerable carnage was made; they being in a manner ſurrounded by the horſe and light-armed troops, which at firſt purſued the left wing, and the foot that had now paſſed the river. The Perſian horſe on the right ſtill fought gallantly; but when they were thoroughly informed of the rout of their left wing, the deſtruction of the Greek mercenaries, and that Darius himſelf was fled, they began to break and betake themſelves to flight too. The Theſſalian cavalry purſued them cloſe at the heels, and the narrow craggy roads incommoded them exceedingly, ſo that vaſt numbers of them periſhed. As for Darius, he

[1] Arrian. lib. ii. c. 8, 9.

he fled ſoon after the left wing was broken, in a chariot with a few of his favourites; as far as the country was plain and open he eſcaped well enough; but when the roads became rocky and narrow, he quitted it, and mounting a horſe rode all the night; his chariot, in which was his ſhield, his cloak, and his bow, fell into the hands of Alexander, who carried them back to his camp. The loſs of the Perſians did not fall much ſhort of a hundred thouſand men, and Ptolemy in his relation reports, that when Alexander's troops were in full purſuit of Darius, they filled up the ditches as oft as they were obſtructed by them with heaps of dead bodies, and ſo without farther difficulty paſſed on (I). The tent of Darius had been very

(I) In reſpect to the battle of Iſſus, Diodorus informs us, that Alexander looked every-where about for Darius, and, as ſoon as he diſcovered him, with his handful of guards attacked him and the flower of the Perſian army which was about him; being as deſirous of obtaining this victory by his perſonal valour, as of ſubduing the Perſian empire by the courage of his ſoldiers. But when Oxathres the brother of Darius ſaw Alexander's deſign, and how fiercely he ſought to accompliſh it, he threw himſelf with the horſe who were about him between his brother's chariot and the enemy, where an obſtinate fight was maintained, till the dead bodies roſe like an intrenchment about the chariot of Darius. Many of the Perſian nobility were ſlain, and Alexander himſelf was wounded in the thigh. At the laſt, the horſes in the chariot of Darius ſtarted, and became ſo unruly, that the king himſelf was forced to take the reins; the enemy, however, preſſing ſo hard upon him, that he was conſtrained to call for another chariot, and mounted it in great danger. This was the beginning of the rout, which ſoon after became general. According to this author the Perſians loſt an hundred and twenty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe; the Macedonians three hundred foot and a hundred and fifty horſe. After the battle he tells us, that Alexander returned to Darius's tent, and there bathed, and was lodged with all the luxury and magnificence of a Perſian prince. He gives us alſo the ſtory of Alexander's viſit to Siſygambis with this addition, that the king called to him the little ſon of Darius and kiſſed him. The boy coming readily and ſhewing no ſort of terror, the king turning to Hepheſtion ſaid, This boy of ſix years old hath a noble countenance, a high ſpirit, and is more worthy of eſteem than his father. He then promiſed, that he would take the ſame care of the child as if he were very early taken, and in it his mother, his wife, two daughters, and a little son; there fell at the same time into the hands of the Macedonians the wives of the most consiwere his own; and assured the young ladies, that he would be no less careful in providing matches for them, than Darius himself would have been (18). Plutarch assures us, on the authority of one Chares, that Darius himself wounded Alexander in the thigh; yet Plutarch observes, that Alexander in his letter to Antipater, though he mentions his wound in his thigh, says nothing of his having received it from Darius. On his return to the camp after the pursuit, he entered Darius's tent, and immediately cried out, Come, let us cleanse and refresh ourselves in Darius's bath. No, cried one of his attendants, call it rather Alexander's; for the goods of the vanquished belong to the victor by the law of arms. After bathing, participating of a fine entertainment, and being conducted into the magnificent bed-chamber of the Persian king, Alexander could not help saying with an air of transport, This is to be a prince indeed. As to the respect shewn to the ladies, Plutarch's account is only a little warmer and more exalted than that of Arrian and Diodorus (19). Justin informs us, that the Persian army consisted of four hundred thousand foot and a hundred thousand horse. He says, that the battle was hard fought, that both the kings were wounded, , and that the Persians still fought gallantly when their king fled, but that they were afterwards speedily and totally routed; he is very particular, as to their loss, which he says amounted to sixty-one thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and forty thousand taken prisoners. Of the Macedonians, he says, there fell no more than a hundred and thirty foot and a hundred and fifty horse (20). Curtius, not mentioning the armies passing by each other, makes the whole of his relation very confused. Indeed it is so laboured, that it appears rather an exercise of rhetoric than a candid narration, and the close of it, which is what we have most to do with, exceeds all the rest. He agrees, that of the Persians there fell a hundred thousand foot and ten thousand horse. Of Alexander's army five hundred and four, he says, were wounded, thirty-two foot killed, and a hundred and fifty horse. That we may not suspect any error in transcribers, his own observation nails down the fact: Tantulo impendio ingens victoria stetit, so small was the cost of so great a victory (21).

(18) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii. (19) Plut. in vit. Alex.
(20) Justin. lib. xi. c. 9. (21) Curt. lib. iii. c. 20—29.

conſiderable Perſian noblemen; as for thoſe of inferior officers, they had been with the heavy baggage and treaſure conveyed to Damaſcus, which precaution, however, did not preſerve them; for a little after all fell into the power of Parmenio, ſent by Alexander for that purpoſe. In the evening of the day of action, when the king returned to the camp and went to refreſh himſelf in the tent of Darius, he was extremely ſurprized to hear the loud cries and groanings of many women ſo near him; whereupon demanding of ſome who were near him, who theſe women were and what the occaſion of their ſorrow, he was informed, that they were the mother, the wife, the daughters of Darius, and the moſt conſiderable ladies of Perſia who waited upon them; that the reaſon of their lamentation was the report of an eunuch, that he had ſeen in the hands of a ſoldier the cloak of Darius, whence he concluded that the king was ſlain. Alexander is ſaid upon this occaſion to have ſhed tears. However it was, he ſent Leonatus, a perſon of the firſt rank amongſt his officers, to free the women from their fears, by aſſuring them, that Darius made his eſcape; and at the ſame time to comfort them with promiſes of honourabe treatment, a permiſſion to wear royal apparel, and to be called and ſerved as if they were ſtill queens. The next day he went himſelf with Hepheſtion to their tent, that he might farther conſole the illuſtrious captives. Their garb being much alike, Siſygambis the mother of Darius fell down at the feet of Hepheſtion, being ſomewhat taller, ſuppoſing him to be the king. But when ſome of the attendants ſignified to her, by motions of their heads and hands, that ſhe was miſtaken, ſhe immediately went and paid her devoirs to the king himſelf. He ſeeing her in ſome confuſion, took her by the hand and raiſed her up, ſaying, "Do not be uneaſy, mother, you were not "in the wrong, for he too is Alexander."[1] This paſſage is found in Arrian, who confeſſes, that he met with it in the works of the moſt hiſtorians of thoſe times; yet he ſeems diffident of the truth of it, and contents himſelf with ſaying what ought to be always ſaid when it is mentioned; "That there is ſo much worth and beauty in the action as "ought to incline us to wiſh it true at leaſt, if not to be-"lieve it." Other hiſtorians have not been ſo nice; they found the ſtory good, inſerted it therefore in their writings, and, taking occaſion from thence to extol the virtue and clemency of Alexander, have never troubled their readers with any ſuſpicions as to the certainty of the fact. But we in this, as in the foregoing relation of the battle, have ſtuck cloſe to Arrian, from whom indeed there is no ſtirring without danger of falling, not only into incertainties, but into incredibilities; as the reader will perceive from a ſhort ſpecimen of inconſiſtencies, extracted from other writers and digeſted in the foregoing note.

[1] Arrian. lib. iii, 10, 11, 12.

The conduct of Alexander in reducing Cœleſyria.

Alexander made the beſt uſe of this ſignal victory, encouraging the provinces and petty princes in the neighbourhood to come and ſubmit themſelves voluntarily, treating all that did ſo, not as new and conquered, but as old and hereditary ſubjects, neither burthening them with ſoldiers, nor oppreſſing them with tribute. Menon, an antient officer of his, he appointed governor of Cœle-Syria, and aſſigned him ſuch a body of horſe, as he judged neceſſary for the ſafety of the province. The Perſian had all this time a great fleet at ſea, to which moſt of the little provinces on the maritime coaſts had been forced to join all the ſhips they could furniſh, rather out of fear, than any inclination they had to concern themſelves in the preſent diſpute about the dominion of Aſia, which, however it ended, they knew would leave them where it found them, tributaries and dependents. Strato the ſon of Geroſtratus, king of Arados and the neighbouring iſles, took this opportunity of making peace for his father's ſubjects, who were in the utmoſt danger; their king with all their naval force being ſailed to join the Perſian fleet. Strato prevented Alexander's march towards the dominions he held on the continent, by going of his own accord to his head-quarters, where preſenting him with a crown of gold, he ſubmitted himſelf and all his dominions to his pleaſure; whereby Alexander reaped all that he ſought, viz. glory and power, and Strato loſt nothing, but on the contrary avoided the Macedonian's entering his territories in a hoſtile manner [m] (K).

Among

[m] Arrian. lib. ii. c. 13.

(K) We have omitted in our text a very remarkable paſſage in Alexander's life, which is atteſted by many credible authors, amongſt others by Diodorus and Plutarch, though it is not mentioned

AMONG other places belonging to Geroſtratus was Marathus, a city on the continent, very conſiderable in reſpect of its Embaſſadors ſent from Darius, to entreat the diſcharge of his mother, wife, and children.

oned by Arrian at all. The reaſon, however, of our omitting it was, we knew not how or where certainly to place it. The ſtory is beſt told by Curtius, and therefore from him we ſhall take it. He ſays that Strato king of Sidon, being cordially attached to Darius's intereſt, Alexander, when he was in the neighbourhood of the city, gave his favourite Hepheſtion leave to beſtow the kingdom upon whom he would. Hepheſtion having lodged with two brothers, and being extremely taken with their kindneſs towards him, offered them the kingdom; but they alledging, that by the laws of their country it was hereditary, refuſed it on account of their not being of the royal blood. Hepheſtion, charmed with ſo noble a diſintereſtedneſs, deſired them to name him to whom it of right belonged. The brethren readily told him, that there was one Abdalominus of the blood-royal, who was ſo poor that he kept a little kitchen-garden, and wrought in it for a ſubſiſtance, in the ſuburbs; to him by the direction of Hepheſtion they carried the royal robes and crown; they found him weeding, and having told him their errand, made him waſh and clean himſelf, and array him as a king. He was then conducted to Alexander, about whom there were many who could not help inveighing againſt the raiſing ſo mean a man to a throne. Alexander looked on him a little, and then turning to thoſe who were near him, ſaid, "His perſon does not at all diſgrace his birth: "I would be glad to know how he bore his poverty. I would "to God, cried the new king, I may bear my proſperity as "well; theſe hands have miniſtered to my neceſſities, and as I "had nothing, ſo I wanted nothing." Alexander was ſo well pleaſed with this anſwer, that he gave him the palace, furniture, and private eſtate of Strato; nay, and added part of the adjacent country to his kingdom (22). Diodorus, inſtead of Sidon, lays the ſcene at Tyre after the reduction of that place; but in this he muſt be miſtaken, for the name of the firſt king of Tyre was not Strato, neither was he abſent when the city was taken; but on the contrary was himſelf taken in it, and, as we ſhall hereafter ſee, was alſo left king of Tyre by Alexander. Diodorus calls alſo the new king Ballonimus. He ſays too, that he was expreſly recommended to the king by Hepheſtion, as a perſon of his own knowledge (23). Plutarch is wholly ſilent in his life of its extent, its wealth, and beauty ; thither for the ſake of better accommodation, Alexander marched, and remained there a conſiderable time, while he debated in his council on the propereſt means for eſtabliſhing the tranquillity of his new-acquired dominions, and for carrying on the war againſt Darius. As for that prince, after he had a little recovered his aſtoniſhment, he collected, as well as he could, the ſcattered remains of his army, and retired with them as ſpeedily as poſſible beyond the river Euphrates : From thence he wrote to Alexander at Marathus, and ſent alſo embaſſadors to entreat him to ſet at liberty his mother, his wife, and children. In his letter he expoſtulated pretty warmly on the injuſtice of the war commenced againſt him ; he alledged, that neither he nor any of his predeceſſors had ever injured the Macedonians ; that Philip had invaded them without any declaration of war ; and that himſelf had proſecuted that invaſion without ſignifying what grievances he had ſuſtained, or what ſatisfaction he expected ; that as to the end of the war providence would determine ; but that in the interim, he who was ſtill a king requeſted of Alexander as a king alſo, that he would reſtore to him his mother, wife, and children ; and alſo name plenipotentiaries to treat of peace. Alexander ſent back the embaſſadors, and with them Therſippus, charged with a letter to Darius, which ran in theſe words : " Your anceſtors, entering Macedonia " and the reſt of Greece, injured us without having re- " ceived the leaſt provocation. I, as the general of the " Greeks have invaded Aſia, to vindicate them againſt their " antient enemies the Perſians, provoked by their repeated " outrages. You alſo afforded aid to the Perinthians, who " had groſly injured my father, and Ochus ſent likewiſe an " army inro Thrace, which is part of our dominions. My " father of Alexander on this ſubject, but elſewhere he tells us the ſtory. He tranſports us, however, to Paphos, where he ſays, the former king being deprived for tyranny, Alynomus, a poor man, who had no poſſeſſion but his garden, was by Alexander raiſed to the kingdom, becauſe he was of the royal blood (24). But againſt this there is a material objection, which is, that Alexander never was at Paphos. As Curtius has told the ſtory, it is well enough, eſpecially as it is ſupported by Juſtin (25), yet not ſo well as to deſerve a place in the body of the hiſtory, ſince it is impoſſible to ſet this ſtory abſolutely free from all objections.

(22) Curt. lib. iv. c. 4.

(23) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii.

(24) Orat. de Fort. Alex. (25) Juſtin. Hiſt. lib. xi. c. 10.

" father was ſlain by traitors ſuborned by you, as you have " openly publiſhed in your letters; ſo Arſes being diſ-
" patched by Bagoas through your contrivance, in open " defiance of the Perſian laws, you have aſſumed the royal " dignity. You have likewiſe entered into negotiations in " Greece with a view to my prejudice, remitting money to " the Lacedæmonians and other Greeks, received only by " the former, and rejected by all the reſt, in order to " corrupt my allies, and to diſſolve the grand alliance into " which we have entered. I therefore have made war up" on thee, becauſe by ſuch a variety of methods thou haſt
" proved thyſelf my enemy. Having alſo beaten thy lieu" tenants heretofore, and thyſelf lately with all thy army, I " hold through the goodneſs of heaven this country. Such
" of your ſoldiers as have fled to me remain with me, and " ſerve under me, not through conſtraint, but of their " own free will. Come therefore to me, as to the lord " of Aſia. If thou art afraid that I ſhould do any thing
" harſh towards thee, ſend ſome of thy friends to me " who may take my oath. When thou art come, thy " mother, thy wife, thy children, and whatever elſe you " pleaſe, aſk, they ſhall be thine. As to the reſt, when " you write to me again, remember, that you write to the " king of Aſia; treat me no more as your equal, but as " to the lord of all you have. Signify what it is you want.
" If you do otherwiſe, I ſhall conceive myſelf injured:
" If you diſpute my right, prepare to do it in another ge" neral engagement; but do not fly, ſince it is to no
" purpoſe, for where-ever you go, I am determined to
" follow you[n]". It is certain this letter is in a very high ſtrain, and one may almoſt pronounce that it is genuine by comparing the ſpirit it breathes, with that which at all times animated the words and actions of Alexander.

PARMENIO, according to the inſtructions he had received, poſſeſſed himſelf entirely of the treaſure, equipage, baggage, and whatever elſe Darius had left at Damaſcus under the command of Cophenes; all which, by the expreſs direction of the king, he carried back to the ſame city, and there took an exact account of them. Amongſt other priſoners were the Greek embaſſadors ſent from Sparta, Athens, and Thebes, to negotiate with the king the raiſing of a commotion, motion, which might oblige Alexander to return home. Theſe by command of the king were ſent to him as traitors; as for the two Theban embaſſadors Alexander ſaid, as he had left them no city in Greece, they had ſome reaſon for what they did; and therefore Iſmenes being of a noble family, and Dionyſodorus having been victor in the Olympic games, he, partly out of compaſſion to their country, and partly out of reſpect to themſelves, freely ſet them at liberty. When he knew, that the Athenian embaſſador was Iphicrates, the ſon of Iphicrates the famous general, he ſaid his family were under too many obligations to his father for his ſon to ſuffer any thing from his hands, and therefore not only diſmiſſed him, but treated him with great kindneſs. As for Euthycles the Lacedæmonian, he would hear nothing either in favour of him or his country, but ordered him to remain in cuſtody; but afterwards, when affairs were better ſettled he let him too go at large. Thus Alexander wiſely kept terms with all the Grecian ſtates, though at the ſame time he prudently pretended pity and perſonal reſpect, that it might not be at all ſuſpected, his moderation was tinctured with fear; though, as we ſhall hereafter hear from his own mouth, he had but a very indifferent opinion of the affection of the Greeks, and therefore as he truſted them little, ſo he was by no means forward to provoke them [a].

Alexander uſes the Greek embaſſadors to Darius with much moderation.

[n] Arrian. lib. ii. c. 14. Diodor. lib. xvii. Curt. lib. iv. c. 2.

The Tyrians refuſe to admit Alexander.

Tyre was in the number of thoſe places, which, within a ſhort ſpace after the battle of Iſſus, ſent deputies to ſubmit themſelves to the conqueror; the king whoſe name was Azelmicus was abſent in the Perſian fleet; but his ſon was of the number of the deputies, and Alexander received him as favourably as he had done thoſe who came from Byblus on the ſame errand. It is poſſible, the king intended to honour Tyre farther, for he acquainted the citizens that he would come and ſacrifice to the Tyrian Hercules, the patron of their city, to whom they had erected a moſt magnificent temple. But theſe people, like moſt other trading nations, were too ſuſpicious to think of admitting ſo enterprizing a prince with his troops within their walls. They therefore ſent their deputies to him again, to inform him, that they were ready to do whatever he ſhould command them; but as to his coming and ſacrificing in their city, they could not conſent to that, but were poſitively determined not to admit ſo much as one Macedonian within their gates. Alexander immediately diſmiſſed diſmiſſed their deputies in great diſpleaſure. He then aſſembled a council of war, wherein he inſiſted ſtrongly on the diſaffected ſtate of Greece, the power of the Perſians at ſea, and the folly of carrying on the war in diſtant provinces, while Tyre was left unreduced behind them; he alſo remarked, that, if this city was once ſubdued, the ſovereignty of the ſea would be immediately transferred to them, becauſe it would fix their poſſeſſion of the coaſts; and as the Perſian fleet was compoſed chiefly of tributary ſquadrons, thoſe tributaries would fight the battles, not of their late, but of their preſent maſters. Theſe reaſons having perſuaded the council to concur with them, the ſiege was immediately reſolved on. It may ſeem ſomewhat ſtrange, that Alexander, now in the current of his victories, an abſolute prince, and impetuous in his temper, ſhould condeſcend to explain himſelf ſo much at large, as to the nature and importance of his deſigns. But we are to conſider, that his army was compoſed of veteran toops, commanded by old and experienced officers; that their valour did not conſiſt in a ſhort extravagant fury but in a cool and determined reſolution; in order to engage which, there was a neceſſity that the king ſhould ſhew them not only what he would have them do, but why he conceived it fit to be done. Nor did his authority ſuffer at all thereby; for as the Macedonians always held themſelves ſubjects and not ſlaves, ſo when once they were acquainted with the nature and expedience of the ſervice required from them, they were indefatigable, and never refuſed to ſhare any danger, in the execution of an undertaking they had once reſolved on [p].

[a] Arrian. lib. ii. c. 15. Curt. lib. iv. c. 55.

Which induces the ſiege of Tyre.

THIS city was built on an iſland ſurrounded with prodigious walls, the ſea as yet was open, and the Tyrians themſelves had a conſiderable fleet, whereas Alexander had none at all. The firſt thing he projected was an artificial iſthmus, that might unite the city to the ſhore, to which end he cauſed the ſea to be founded, and found the greateſt depth three fathoms; this encouraged him exceedingly, and he was ſtill the farther emboldened when he perceived that the bottom was a ſtiff clay, which ſerved inſtead of mortar, and bound whatever was ſunk into it more effectually than could have been done by art. The ruins of old Tyre furniſhed materials for the mole, which under the inſpection of Alexander was carried on with amazing vigour, till ſuch time as it approached pretty near the

[p] Diodor. lib. xvii. Curt. lib. iv. c. 7. Arrian. lib. ii. c. 16.

the city, for then the Tyrians not only vexed the workmen with all sorts of missive weapons, but also sent armed barks on each side of the mole to harrass them, so that Alexander was forced to build two large wooden towers covered with raw hides, whereby they were defended from fire, as the workmen were by them from the insults of the enemy. The Tyrians for the destruction of these towers contrived a fire-ship, and on the yards thereof, instead of sails, they placed rows of buckets, filled with sulphureous matter, the inside of the hulk was at the bottom filled with dry twigs; over them were laid all sorts of combustible matter, the stern they filled with rubbish, that sinking in the water it might raise the head the higher. Things thus prepared, as soon as they had a favourable wind they towed the hulk to sea, and ran her upon the mole directly between the towers, and then set it on fire; at such time as the masts began to burn, the weight with which their masts were charged broke them, whereby all the buckets fell into the fire, and greatly encreased its fury; so that not only the towers but all the materials that were on the mole were totally consumed. Alexander was not at all discouraged; on the contrary, he laid the foundation of a new mole broader than the former, and consequently capable of holding more towers; ordered new engines to be made, and began to concert measures for procuring a fleet, without which he saw clearly that all his endeavours would be in vain [r].

The tributary princes join Alexander's fleet with their squadrons.

It happened very happily for Alexander, that the moderation of his former conduct fully provided him for his present and future designs; for Gerostratus king of Arados, Enylus king of Byblus, most of the Cyprian princes, as also the Sidonian squadron, in all an hundred and twenty sail arrived at Sidon, and offered him their service; the ill fate of the Persians at Issus having discharged them their service, and Alexander's generous behaviour towards their subjects having attached them to his. To the same city came Cleander with a supply of four thousand fresh troops from Greece, and soon after a fleet from thence, so that after a short excursion into the neighbourhood of Antilibanus, he came again before Tyre, with a new army and a fleet of upwards of two hundred sail. Andromachus, captain of the Cyprian navy, had the command on the left side, and Alexander himself commanded the blockade on the other.

The

[r] Arrian. lib. ii. c. 17.

The citizens ſtill made a deſperate defence, and omitted nothing, which either art could deviſe, or valour execute, for the preſerving of the place. At laſt ſeeing themſelves reduced to ſuch great ſtreights, they reſolved to attack the Cyprian ſquadron poſted at the mouth of the haven, which looks towards Sidon, and, having before that time ſpread ſails aroſs the mouth of the haven, that their ſhips, filled with ſoldiers, might not be diſcovered by the enemy, about noon (at which time the Macedonian ſoldiers were uſually buſied about their private affairs, and Alexander had retired from his fleet to his pavilion on the other ſide of the city) with five choice quinqueremes, as many quadriremes, and ſeven triremes, filled with expert rowers and reſolute ſoldiers, well armed for fight and inured to the ſea, rowed out ſlowly and ſilently one by one againſt the enemy. But when they advanced within ſight of the Cyprians, encouraging each other with a great ſhout and claſhing of their oars, they attacked their fleet. But it happened that day, that Alexander having retired as uſual to his pavilion, tarried there but a ſhort time, and returned to his fleet. The Tyrians aſſaulted the enemies ſhips all on a ſudden, when ſome were entirely empty, and others by reaſon of the noiſe and violence of the attack were ſurprized, unprepared for reſiſtance, Pnytagoras's quinquereme was ſunk at the firſt onſet with another commanded by Androcles the Anathuſian and Paſicrates the Thurian: others were forced on ſhore and beat to pieces. Alexander, hearing of this excurſion of the Tyrian triremes, immediately ordered as many ſhips as he could ſpare and were well armed to block up the mouth of the haven, and thereby hinder the reſt of the Tyrian fleet from coming forth. He then with the quinqueremes, which he had ready, and five triremes well prepared ſailing round the city, haſted to attack the Tyrians. The beſieged ſeeing this from the wall, and perceiving Alexander himſelf there, endeavoured by loud cries to recal their men who were on board; and when their cries, by reaſon of the tumult, could not be heard, they made ſeveral ſignals for them to return, becauſe the enemy was at hand. But finding too late that Alexander was upon them, they turned their ſails and haſtened to the haven, yet few of them could ſave themſelves by flight; for Alexander's ſhips falling in ſuddenly among them, rendered ſome unfit for ſailing, and one quinquereme and a quadrireme were taken at the very very entrance of the port. The ſlaughter of the Tyrians was not great, becauſe, as ſoon as they perceived it impoſſible to ſave their ſhips, they eſcaped into the harbour by ſwimming. The Macedonians, now knowing that the Tyrian fleet would be unſerviceable, moved their engines up to the walls. Thoſe which advanced on the ſide towards the rampart did no execution by reaſon of the firmneſs of the wall there; others moved ſome hulks with engines to that quarter of the city which looks towards Sidon. But when they found their endeavours there fruitleſs, ſailing along the whole ſouth part of the wall towards Egypt, they tried to batter it every-where: And there indeed by the violence of their attacks, it was at firſt ſhaken, and afterwards beat down, and demoliſhed. Whereupon they immediately mounted the breach by the help of their ladders, and began to ſtorm the place: but the Tyrians, without any great difficulty, repulſed them. Three days after this there happening a ſtark calm, Alexander reſolved to make uſe of that opportunity to ſtorm the city; to this end he gave all the neceſſary directions. Firſt he ordered a line of hulks, on board of which his battering engines were placed, to be towed as cloſe as poſſible to the walls, and there brought to an anchor; the engines were immediately brought to play upon the walls, and in a very ſhort ſpace made a tolerable breach. Then the firſt line of hulks weighed and ſtood to ſea, or rather were towed off, and a ſecond line having ſcaling ladders on board took their place; a detachment of light-armed troops under the command of Admetus was aſſigned for the attack on one ſide, another corps of auxiliary foot conducted by Cœnus was to attack on the other ſide. Alexander himſelf at the head of a greater force was preſent, ready to ſuſtain both. As the king took all this pains that the aſſault might be performed with vigour, ſo he was no leſs careful to provide that the enemy might not make as vigorous a defence; with this view he gave orders for ſeveral falſe attacks, and alſo commanded that a ſquadron of armed veſſels ſhould ſail continually round the city, threatening now one part of it, then another, and actually attacking any part where they found it feaſible, which ſo well anſwered his end, that the Tyrians, every-where diſtracted, divided their forces, and knew not where to make their utmoſt efforts. However, they fought very gallantly againſt Admetus and his Macedonians, who firſt mounted the walls; that valiant officer being killed, almoſt as ſoon as he had ſet foot on the wall, by a ſpear; but Alexander, with freſh forces coming to the the ſupport of thoſe who had firſt taken poſt on the wall, quickly drove the Tyrians from thence, and purſued them to the royal palace. In the interim Alexander's fleet broke into the haven on one ſide, and began to burn and ſink the ſhips that were there: on the other, the Cyprians forced the haven, which they had hitherto blocked up, and flu∫hed with ſucceſs, attacked and entered the city on that ſide. The Tyrians, ſeeing it would be to no purpoſe longer to defend their walls, retired in a body to a ſtrong part of the palace, which they hoped yet to hold out; but Alexander following them, fell upon them there with ſuch fury, that they were unable to reſiſt, ſo that, after great effuſion of blood they betook themſelves to flight, and ſought a ſhelter in different parts of the city. A great ſlaughter alſo happened at the haven, where Cœnus and his forces entered the city; for the Macedonians were vehemently enraged at the citizens, partly for holding out the place ſo long, and partly becauſe they, having ſeized ſome of their men ſailing from Sidon, firſt hoiſted them up aloft upon their walls in ſight of their friends, and afterwards ſtabbed them and threw their bodies into the ſea. About eight thouſand Tyrians were ſlain. Of the Macedonians, beſides Admetus, who firſt entered the breach and took poſſeſſion of the wall, about twenty targeteers fell in that aſſault, and during the whole ſiege about four hundred. They who had fled to the temple of Hercules (being ſome of the chief Tyrian nobility, beſides king Azelmicus, and ſome Carthaginian prieſts, who according to antient cuſtom were ſent to their mother city to offer ſacrifice to Hercules) had the benefit of a free pardon. The reſt, to the number of thirty thouſand, including ſtrangers, were ſold for ſlaves. Alexander after this offered ſacrifice to Hercules, at which his whole army aſſiſted; the navy alſo performed a part in the ſolemnity. He moreover appointed gymnic ſports in Hercules's temple, which was then finely illuminated. The engine wherewith the wall was demoliſhed he placed there, as an eternal monument of his victory. And the Tyrian ſhip conſecrated to Hercules, which he had taken in a ſea-fight, he cauſed to be hung up there[s] (L).

THE

[s] Arrian. lib. ii. c. 24. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii. Plut. in vit. Alex. Juſtin. lib. xi. c. 10. Curt. lib. iv.

(L) The taking of Tyre was foreſhown by a multitude of omens, if any credit is to be given to the hiſtorians who have recorded

Alexander resettles Tyre.

The usage the Tyrians received was certainly very severe, and seemed very little reconcileable either to the politeness of recorded them; we have reserved them for a note, that they may not perplex the history; we shall mention only such as are most remarkable, that we may not tire the reader; and we shall leave him to make what judgment of them he pleases, without pretending to regulate his sentiments by our own. Arrian assures us, that the very night after Alexander had taken the resolution of besieging the place, he had a dream or vision, wherein he seemed to be scaling the walls of Tyre, in which he was to be assisted by Hercules, who gave him his hand to raise him up. Aristander explained this to be an infallible sign of his taking the city, but he declared, that it was a sign likewise the siege would prove an Herculean labour (26). Plutarch says, that there is a well in the neighbourhood of Tyre, which the inhabitants shewed, affirming, that Alexander slept near it when the place was first besieged, and that sleeping there he dreamed, that a satyr came and mocked him; that he ran after him a long time in vain; but that, at last and with much ado, he got hold of him. The diviners gave him an easy and elegant explanation of this vision; for dividing the Greek word " atyros "; they shewed its signification to be, Thine is Tyre (27). In the city a man saw in a dream Apollo flying away; when he reported this before the people, they would have stoned him, supposing that he did it to intimidate them; on which the poor man was forced to fly to the temple of Hercules, but the magistrates having better considered it, fixed one end of a gold chain to the statue of Apollo, and the other to the altar of Hercules. A strange expedient this, and a pregnant instance of epidemic madness and superstition; however, when Alexander took the place, he set Apollo at liberty, and ordered him to be stiled Philalexandrus, that is, a lover of Alexander (28). Diodorus is very particular in the account he gives of all the methods practised by Alexander's engineers, and those of the town. It is too long to transcribe, but may be read by those who are skilled in such matters to very good purpose, as well as Arrian's accurate detail of the same siege; for it is certain, that the Tyrians did as much to defend themselves, as the wit or courage of man at that time would allow; neither was it altogether in vain, since it cost Alexander several months, and put all the force he had to the utmost stretch before they were reduced.

(26) Arrian. lib. ii. (27) Plut. in vit. Alex. (28) Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra.

of a Grecian prince, or to that grandeur of ſoul which Alexander affected upon other occaſions. However, as he was a prince of great parts and learning, he knew how to find out very plauſible excuſes for the worſt things he did; and in regard to the fact before us, beſides the cruelties which they had done to the Macedonians, which were revenged by the execution of ſuch multitudes, he alledged, that the ſelling them for ſlaves was an act of natural juſtice, the anceſtors of theſe Tyrians being no other than ſlaves, who, entering among themſelves into a conſpiracy, ſlew all their maſters in one night, then took their wives and became lords of the city, excepting only one Strato, who was preſerved by the fidelity of his ſlave; his family Alexander alſo preſerved, though Azelmicus king of Tyre was deſcended therefrom. To him therefore, as if his quarrel had been with the people, he left the ſovereignty without diminution, and took great pains by draughts from other places to reſtore the city, and reſettle its principality. Thus Alexander gratified his reſentment againſt the Tyrians, by deſtroying their city, and ſelling them for ſlaves; and when he had ſo done, he raiſed a high reputation of clemency by his generoſity towards the king, and the care he took of rebuilding the city [t].

WHILE he was employed in this long ſiege, embaſſadors came again from Darius with theſe propoſals: That he would pay

He rejects the propoſitions made by Darius.

[t] Juſtin. lib. xviii. c. 3.

duced. Plutarch tells us, that Ariſtander, having, from the entrails of a ſacrifice offered at the beginning of the ſeventh month, predicted, that it would be taken therein, the ſoldiers, when the general ſtorm was protracted to the very laſt day of that month, began to deride him; but Alexander, to ſave the prophet's credit, ordered it to be called the twenty-eighth day of the month, inſtead of the thirtieth, which, however, was needleſs, for the place was taken the ſame day (29). Curtius's account of the ſiege ſwells with miraculous mounds, and wonderful triumphs over the ſea. He exhauſts whole provinces for timber, and makes free with mount Libanus, though Alexander never went near it (30). It is certain, that Alexander did great things here, but Nebuchadnezzar had done as much before when he took the ſame place (31).

(29) Plut. ubi ſupra. (30) Curt. lib. iv. (31) Ezech. xxi. 11.

pay ten thouſand talents of ſilver for the ranſom of his mother, wife, and children; that he would reſign to him all the countries beteen the Helleſpont and the river Euphrates; that he would conſent to the marriage of his daughter, and forgetting all that was paſt, would acknowledge him for his friend and confederate. When theſe terms came to be explained to the Macedonian council, Parmenio, who always ſpoke very freely, delivered it as his ſentiments, that when the ends of the war were gained, it was unreaſonable to abide its hazard; adding, If I was Alexander, I would accept theſe conditions. To which the king replied, So would I, if I was Parmenio. However, in his own name, he anſwered the embaſſadors, That he did not want Darius's money: That he would not accept of a part of his empire except the whole: That he would take from him by force his country, his palaces, and treaſure: That he would marry his daughter, if he pleaſed, without his conſent; but if Darius had a mind to try his humanity, he might come to him if he thought fit. This anſwer, how much ſoever it may have of the hero, had certainly not much of the politician. Had he accepted theſe propoſitions, he would have become the peaceable poſſeſſor of an extenſive, rich, and powerful empire, and might have retained his hereditary kingdom of Macedonia and his authority over the Greeks, and in that condition have tranſmitted it to his poſterity. But his boundleſs ambition hurried him on to a wild purſuit of conqueſts without end, as if all the nations of the earth had been created to pay him obedience, or to be made examples of his vengeance. Parmenio ſpoke the language of Philip, who could certainly have taken his advice on the ſame occaſion, or rather would not have needed it[a].

He marches to Jeruſalem, and treats the high-prieſt reſpectfully.

TYRE thus ſubdued, Alexander, notwithſtanding the advanced ſeaſon of the year, reſolved to make an expedition into Syria, and in his way thither propoſed to chaſtiſe the Jews, who had highly offended him during the ſiege of Tyre; for when he ſent to demand of them proviſions for the ſubſiſtence of his ſoldiers, they anſwered, they were the ſubjects of Darius, bounded by oath not to ſupply his enemies. When theſe people knew of the king's march towards them, they were under the greateſt terror, and, as their laſt reſource, had recourſe to ſolemn acts of devotion, to prayers, proceſſions, and parti-particular faſts, till at length God was pleaſed to anſwer their petitions, by commanding Jaddua the high-prieſt, in a viſion to array himſelf in his pontifical habit, to direct the prieſts to put on their proper garments, and with the people cloathed in white, to advance in ſlow and ſolemn order to meet the Grecian prince. Jaddua and the reſt did as they were commanded, and iſſuing out of the gates of Jeruſalem, advanced as far as Sapha, an eminence at a ſmall diſtance from the city, from whence as ſoon as they diſcerned Alexander's approach, they went to meet him. The king, when the high-prieſt drew near haſted towards him, bowed himſelf before him, and ſaluted him with religious veneration. This ſcene which amazed the Macedonians, ſtruck the Phænicians and Syrians, not only with ſurprize, but with ſorrow and diſcontent, for out of mere hatred to the Jews they had taken part in this expedition. Parmenio being near him took the liberty of asking the king, Why he adored the Jewiſh high-prieſt? To whom the king readily anſwered, He did not adore the prieſt, but God, whoſe miniſter he was. For when he was at Dium in Macedonia, and much troubled in his mind about the preparations neceſſary for his paſſing into Aſia, he had a dream, wherein he ſaw this very perſon in his pontifical habit, who commanded him to lay aſide his doubts and fears, and paſs himſelf boldly into Aſia, for that God would be his guide and give him the empire of the Perſians. On ſeeing therefore this perſon, he was convinced, that what he did was by the expreſs aſſiſtance of the deity, who he alſo doubted not would protect him in all his future expeditions; wherefore, in gratitude for former victories and to teſtify his truſt in the divine power, he had humbled himſelf before the prieſt. He afterwards accompanied Jaddua to Jeruſalem which he entered in a friendly manner, and offered ſacrifices in the temple; the high-prieſt ſhewed him alſo the prophecies of Daniel, wherein the deſtruction of the Perſian empire by himſelf is ſet forth, not in dark obſcure terms, in equivocal or unintelligible verſes, but graphically, as if the prophet had ſeen the whole tranſaction, and every circumſtance attending it; whence it came to paſs that the king went away extremely well ſatisfied, and at his departure asked, if there was nothing in which he might gratify himſelf or his people. Jaddua then told him, that, according to the Moſaic law, they neither ſowed or ploughed on the ſeventh year, therefore would esteem it a high favour, if the king would be pleased to remit their tribute in that year. To this request the king readily yielded, and having confirmed them in the enjoyment of all their privileges, particularly that of living under and according to their own laws, he then departed. In his march, the Samaritans, who on the refusal of the Jews, had furnished him with provisions before Tyre, applied themselves to him, in hopes of receiving from him still greater matters than the Jews had done; but though Alexander received them civilly, and afforded a patient hearing of their request, yet he dismissed them with an unavailing answer, viz. That he had now many great affairs upon his hand, but that, when he should return from his Egyptian expedition, he would examine into, and, provided they were reasonable, comply with, their demands. Having thus removed all difficulties so far, he advanced towards Gaza, the only place in this part of the world, which was still held for Darius [w].

[a] Arrian lib. ii. c. 25. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii. Curt. lib. iv.

Gaza besieged and in two months taken.

Gaza was a very large and strong city, seated about five miles from the sea-shore on a high hill, surrounded with strong walls. One Batis or Betis, an eunuch, had the government thereof committed to him by Darius, who, foreseeing what would come to pass, took care to provide all things necessary for a long and obstinate defence, causing all the fortifications to be repaired, magazines to be well furnished, and fearing his garrison might be too small, hired certain Arabian troops to serve in the place. All this did he, knowing of what importance Gaza was to his master, standing as it did in the entrance to Egypt, and being at the same time a bridle to Palestine. When Alexander summoned him, Betis returned a resolute answer, that he would defend it as long as he was able. Many of the king's council looking on the place as impregnable, dissuaded him from meddling with it; but he was not easily diverted from any thing he had once resolved on; Gaza therefore was instantly invested, and where he thought the walls were weakest, he caused a mount to be thrown up, and from thence brought his engines to play upon the city. At the beginning of this siege a very extraordinary accident happened: The king being about to sacrifice and having a crown of gold on his head, a bird of prey hovering sometime over him, let fall at last a stone from between his claws upon his head, and soon after flying to the [w] Joseph. Antiq. Jud. lib. xi.

the engines was there taken, his feet being entangled in the nets which covered the ropes wherewith they were wrought. Upon this Ariſtander was immediately conſulted, and his anſwer was, that the city would certainly be taken; but at the ſame time he cautioned the king not to be ſo adventurous as he was wont, becauſe great danger was threatened to himſelf. The king accepted this advice very kindly, and did not expoſe himſelf for ſometime; but one day, when the Arabians made a furious ſally and ſet fire to his engines, and had well-nigh driven the troops from the mount, he forgot the caution he had received, and advancing with a body of targeteers regained the poſt which had been loſt, and drove the enemy into the place. But in the heat of the engagement he was wounded by an arrow, which piercing his ſhield and breaſt-plate lodged in his ſhoulder. Far from being concerned at this accident, he expreſſed no ſmall ſatisfaction therein, for one part of the prediction being fulfilled, he queſtioned not but the other would come to paſs. As ſoon as the great engines he had made uſe of at Tyre arrived by ſea, he carried his works quite round the city, and battered the wall in ſeveral places at once. In the main time where the battering engines were not at work, he employed miners, who working ſecretly under the foundation of the walls, they ſuddenly fell down, to the great ſurprize of the citizens. When through theſe ſeveral methods a breach was practicable, three ſeveral attacks were made by the Macedonians with great reſolution, in which notwithſtanding they were repulſed with great effuſion of blood. In the fourth the citizens had not ſuch fortune, for the place was taken by ſtorm, and they valiantly fighting were ſlain to a man [x]. Arrian ſays nothing of Betis the governor, neither doth Diodorus. Plutarch alſo is ſilent, and ſo is Juſtin [y]; but Curtius tells us a very ſtrange ſtory, and has had the good luck to be believed. He ſays that he was brought to the king half dead with wounds, to whom Alexander addreſſed himſelf in theſe words: Thou ſhalt not, Betis, die as thou fancieſt, in an honourable way, but ſhall feel in captivity all the torment that can be deviſed for thee. To which the valiant eunuch gave no reply, but looked on the conqueror with a contemptuous ſmile. What, ſaid Alexander, doſt thou neither ſpeak, kneel, nor entreat? I will find a way to van-vanquiſh thy ſilence, and force thee at leaſt to groan. Having ſaid this, he in a rage commanded his heels to be bored, and putting cords through them, bound them to his chariot, dragging him round the city till he died, boaſting that in this he imitated Achilles, who dragged the body of Hector in the ſame manner [z]. Arrian indeed tells us, that he ſold the wives and children of the citizens for ſlaves; which is conſiſtent enough with his practice upon other occaſions; and one would think, that if Bœtis had been put to death in this manner, it could not have eſcaped the knowledge of Ariſtobulus and Ptolemy, from whoſe memoirs Arrian collected his hiſtory. Theſe obſtacles removed, and a garriſon left in Gaza, there was nothing now to hinder his ſo earneſtly deſired expedition into Egypt (M).

[x] Arrian lib. ii. cap. ult. Plut. in vit. Alex. Juſtin. lib. xi.

[y] Diodor Sicul. lib. xvii.

As

[z] Curt. l. iv. c. 26.

(M) If Darius had always choſen ſuch governors as this Betis, Alexander, with all the power of Greece, would not have triumphed ſo eaſily; for tho' this ſiege laſted but two months, yet it coſt him ſuch a number of men, that he ſent Amyntas into Macedonia for recruits, and took pains to encreaſe his army while it was in Egypt. Curtius has a very ſtrange ſtory in his account of this ſiege, and is ſingular in it; for there is not a word mentioned of any ſuch thing elſewhere, if we except one legendary writer, whoſe credit is ſcarce on a par with his own. The ſtory is this; An Arabian ſoldier, pretending to deſert, came to Alexander and fell at his feet. The king put out his hand to raiſe him up, ordering that he ſhould be kindly received; but as he aroſe, he, with a ſword that was concealed under his ſhield, ſtruck at the king's throat. Alexander avoided the blow by a gentle inclination of his body, and immediately after cut off the villain's head with his own ſword (32). It was Neoptolemus, a near relation of Alexander by the mother's ſide, who firſt mounted the walls of Gaza. Plutarch does not tell us any thing of the number of the ſlain. Curtius ſays, there fell of the citizens ten thouſand. Another author reduces this to ſix thouſand (33). As to the Macedonians, we know nothing of their loſs at all; and indeed, whenever we have any accounts of their loſſes, they are ſet ſo very low, that it is difficult to give credit

(32) Curt. l. iv.

(33) Hegeſias Magneſ.

As ſoon as his ſoldiers had refreſhed themſelves, and he had received a body of recruits from Greece, Alexander marched from Gaza, and, in the ſpace of ſeven days, reached Peluſium. Here he found no reſiſtance; for Mazaces the Perſian governor was able to make none [a]. He was diſpirited with the continual misfortunes which had befallen his maſter's arms; he had a very indifferent army, and, which was ſtill worſe, he had the hearts of the moſt numerous nation in the world againſt him. It will afford much help to the ſubſequent narration, and yet take up very little room, to ſet this matter in a proper light. Moſt of the provinces of the Perſian empire ſhewed a great deal of loyalty to Darius; but Egypt, as it had never been faithful to any of his predeceſſors, ſo it was now very impatient of throwing off his yoke, without regarding what other yoke it put on. The chief reaſon of this was the great diverſity between the religion of the Perſians and that of the Egyptians. Not only Cambyſes, who was a tyrant, but Ochus, who was a voluptuous prince, had ſlain their conſecrated Apis, and profaned the moſt ſacred rites of their religion. The Perſian governors and their under-officers ran all into the ſame humour; and thus the whole body of the people were exaſperated in the higheſt degree againſt the government they ſhould have defended, from principles, which, of all others, make men the moſt furious, viz. thoſe of religion. The Egyptians had but a little before ſhewn the exceſs of their rancour, by joining with Amyntas, who, with four thouſand mercenaries, fled hither from the battle of Iſſus, and thought to have ſet up for himſelf; in which the Egyptians furthered him all they could [b]. Mazaces therefore, reflecting on all theſe things and terrified perhaps with the examples of Tyre and Gaza, determined to admit Alexander peaceably. The king having entered ſo eaſily, ſailed up the Nile, after leaving a garriſon in Peluſium, and when he was come to a convenient height, he landed, and leaving the river on his right hand, marched through the deſarts to Heliopolis, then, croſſing the river, he credit to them; eſpecially when, as in the preſent caſe, there are concurring circumſtances, which amount to a proof, that their loſſes muſt have been very great.

The ſtate of Egypt at that time.

[a] Arrian. l. iii. c. 1. Plut. in vit. Alex. Curt. l. iv. c. 27.
[b] Diodor. l. xvii. Curt. ubi ſupra.

he came to Memphis, where he offered pompous ſacrifices, not only to the Grecian gods, but alſo to the Egyptian Apis. He likewiſe celebrated magnificent games, whereat aſſiſted the moſt famous champions in Greece. From Memphis he ſailed down the river to the ſea; having paſſed round the city Canopus, he fixed on the place where the village of Scandria or Alexandretta now ſtands, as a convenient ſituation for a fine port and magnificent city. Alexander himſelf directed where every public ſtructure ſhould be erected. He alſo fixed the number of temples, the deities to whom they ſhould be dedicated, and aſſigned particularly a large and eminent ſite for a temple to the Egyptian Iſis. There was nothing now wanting but to trace, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, the walls of the city; for doing this they had no materials at hand, this project of building a city being ſudden; however a workman adviſed the king to collect what meal there was among the ſoldiers, and to ſift it in lines upon the ground, whereby the circuit of the walls would be well enough marked out. Alexander followed this advice, which anſwered very well; and Ariſtander having conſidered it attentively, told the king, that it was an omen of the new city's abounding with all the neceſſaries of life [c]. Some ſay, that the bounds were no ſooner marked out, than great numbers of birds came and pecked up the meal, and then flew away; which when the reſt of the ſoothſayers held for an ill omen, Ariſtander alone held it to be a good one, affirming its meaning to be, that the city built in that place ſhould become ſo populous as to ſend out colonies, as they had ſeen birds feed and riſe from it [d]. He was certainly an excellent ſervant to his maſter; for he was never at a loſs either for expedients or expoſitions, and perhaps digreſſed as little from the rules of his art as any of his cotemporaries. Certain it is, that Alexander paid great deference to his deciſions; for that prince affected all things which tended to render him popular. At this time he was eſpecially careful to gain the affections of the Egyptians, which he did to ſuch a degree, that they were ready to adore him; for till proſperity rendered his pride too powerful for his reaſon, never any prince acted ſo ſteadily on the maxims of philoſophic policy as he. We never find him him graſping treaſure, in order to gratify either a covetous or extravagant diſpoſition. The richeſt ſpoils he gave to his friends; the moſt curious he ſent home to his mother and the Macedonian ladies; little he reſerved to himſelf. In point of women he was irreproachable, and for thoſe vices which ſo foully tarniſh the virtue of the Greeks, they ſerved only as a foil to him; ſo ſignal was his abhorrence of them. As to government, he was truly a friend to liberty, reſtored it where-ever he came, and ſhewed it as a wonder to thoſe who had no idea of it before. It is true, that with all this he required ſubmiſſion to himſelf; but it was a ſubmiſſion no way inconſiſtent with liberty, but that civil reſpect which is always due to a great captain in war, and a juſt and temperate ruler in peace. The reader may expect ſome reaſon for inſerting this character here; and we ſhall give it in few words: Alexander had been hitherto what we repreſent him; we are now going to ſhew him in quite another light, intoxicated with vanity, and fooliſhly ſeeking to cover the foibles which diſgraced him as a man, by pretending to be more than man, as painters uſe flowing robes and magnificent drapery to conceal defects of ſhape. It is not to be ſuppoſed, that, from this period, he did nothing that was virtuous or praiſe-worthy; all that we mean is, that as hitherto he had acted with ſuch prudence as to commit very few, and thoſe trivial miſtakes; ſo henceforward he loſt that moderation and magnanimity, which had made him ſo much loved and revered, and by attempting to exchange reſpect for adoration. and to extort a blind ſubmiſſion inſtead of a chearful and a rational obedience, he, in a great meaſure, extinguiſhed the luſtre of his former glory, and that authority derived therefrom, owing that affection and regard which the Macedonians ſtill retained for him, to the memory of his former conduct, and to thoſe intervals of humanity, in which he laid aſide the ridiculous notion of his being allied to the divinity. But it is time to proceed to the ſource of theſe diſorders (N).

[c] Arrian. l. iii. c. 1, 2.

[d] Curt. l. iv. c. 32. Diodor. ubi ſupra.

As

(N) We follow the authority of Arrian in placing Alexander's directing the building of the city honoured with his name before he went to viſit the oracle of Jupiter Hammon; Diodorus and other authors placing it afterwards, alledging that it ſo happened. The laſt-mentioned hiſtorian ſays, that it was ſeated very commodiouſly

Alexander visits the temple of Jupiter Hammon.

At this time Alexander formed his extraordinary design of visiting the temple of Jupiter Hammon. As to the motives which induced him him thereto, Arrian tells us, that they were chiefly founded in imitation of Perseus and Hercules, the former of whom had consulted that oracle, when he was dispatched against the Gorgons; and the latter twice, viz. when he went into Lybia against Antæus, and when he passed into Egypt against Busiris. Now, as these heroes, viz. Perseus and Hercules, gave themselves out to be the sons of the Grecian Jupiter, so the Macedonian prince had a mind to take for his father Jupiter Hammon [e]. Maximus Tyrius informs us, that he went to discover the fountains of the Nile [f]. Diodorus tells in few words that he went to consult the oracle [g]. Plutarch is as concise [h]. Justin assigns a very singular reason: he says there had been always great jealousies, about Alexander's birth; that Philip was never thoroughly convinced of his being his son; that a little before his death, he had openly commodiously by the haven of Pharos; that the streets were wisely contrived, so as to admit the cooling breezes, which mightily refreshed the air. In point of strength, he ordered a broad and high wall to be drawn round it, so as to have the sea close on one side, and a great lake on the other, and a narrow pass at each end. Its form resembled that of a soldier's coat. One large beautiful street passed from gate to gate, being in breadth a hundred feet, in length forty furlongs, or five miles. It became in after-times so rich and famous, that our author tells us, in his time there were on its rolls three hundred thousand freemen. Plutarch affirms, that he was directed to the choice of this situation by Horus in a vision; and, according to his account of the matter, a more pleasant, or more convenient place, could not have been chosen (34). Alexander himself was a prince of great taste; he looked upon works of this kind as the noblest monuments, and therefore spared neither pains nor cost in completing them. The architect he employed here was the celebrated Dinocrates, who had raised himself an immortal reputation by rebuilding the temple of Diana at Ephesus; to him he consigned the care of this work, which did the highest honour in succeeding times to its founder and his architect (35).

[e] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 3. [f] Serm. xxv. [g] Diodor. l. xvii. [h] In vit. Alex.

(34) Diodor. ubi supra. (35) Plin. l. c. 10. Ammian Marcel. l. xxii. c. 16. Strab. l. xvii. p. 590.

openly declared, that he was ſatisfied he was not; that Olympias herſelf had confeſſed as much, pretending, that ſhe conceived him by a monſtrous dragon. To ſilence all theſe reports, to clear up his mother's character, and to get himſelf the reputation of his being the ſon of a god, were his motives, if we may believe this author [i]. Whatever they were, certain it is, that he hazarded himſelf and his troops in the higheſt degree, there being two dangers in his march; which, with the example of Cambyſes, who loſt the greateſt part of his army in it, might have terrified any body but Alexander. The firſt was the want of water, which, in the ſandy deſarts ſurrounding the temple, is no where found; the other, the uncertainty of the road from the fluctuation of the ſands, which, changing their ſituation every moment, leave the traveller neither track to march in, nor mark to march by. From theſe impending miſchiefs, all authors agree, that Alexander was miraculouſly delivered; for when the water brought on the camels backs was ſpent, there fell a prodigious ſhower of rain, wherewith they filled all their veſſels; and when their guides could no longer diſtinguiſh the road, they were directed by ſupernatural harbingers; tho' as to them authors do not agree. Ptolemy, the ſon of Lagus affirmed they were two monſtrous dragons, which went with a mighty noiſe before them, Alexander giving ſtrict orders to his officers to follow theſe leaders. But Ariſtobulus, with whom the current of hiſtorians go, aſſerts, that they were led by crows, who as often as they deviated from the way, by their croaking and fluttering before them, ſet them right. Theſe are certainly ſtrange ſtories, yet there is all imaginable authority for them, which made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion on Arrian, that he gives us his judgment of the matter in theſe words: I am fully convinced, that Alexander was conducted by ſome divine power, from the teſtimony of all who ſpeak of his journey, notwithſtanding the diverſity of ſentiments among theſe authors hath greatly obſcured the truth of this ſtory [k].

Where he conſults the oracle.

THIS arduous march once over, Alexander arrived at the temple of Hammon, ſeated in the midſt of a barren thirſty waſte, in a narrow ſpot of ground, the utmoſt extent of which exceeds not forty furlongs, curiouſly planted with olive-trees and palm trees, and watered with dews, which fall no where elſe in all that country. A fountain

[i] Juſtin. l. xi. c. 11. Curt. l. iv.

[k] Arrian. l. iii c. 3. Diodor. l. xvii.

tain alſo has its riſe here, different in its natures and properties from all the fountains upon earth; for at mid-day it is cool to the taſte, but to the touch intenſely cold; towards evening it begins to be warm, which warmth encreaſes by degrees from thence till midnight; after midnight it waxes cool by little and little; in the morning it is chilly, at noon exceſſive cold; and it receives all thoſe various alterations regularly every day. This country naturally produces a kind of foſſile ſalt, which being put into little boxes of palm-tree, ſome of the prieſts of Hammon carry into Egypt, and beſtow on the king, or ſome great men, as a preſent. It is dug out of the earth in large oblong pieces, ſome above three fingers in length, tranſparent like chryſtal. This kind of ſalt the Egyptians and other nations, who are curious in their worſhip, uſe in their ſacrifices, it being much purer than that produced from ſea-water. Arrian tells us, that Alexander himſelf conſulted the oracle, and was well ſatisfied with its anſwer; but as to what he conſulted it upon, or what the anſwer was that he received, that author is ſilent. Strabo concurs with him, aſſerting, that the king entered in his royal robes, conſulted the oracle, and received its anſwer, none being let into the ſecret. Diodorus diſtinguiſhes three things which paſſed at this meeting [l]. Firſt, the ſalutation of the prieſt, whereby Alexander was acknowledged for the ſon of Jupiter Hammon. The ſecond, a promiſe to the king, that he would ſubdue the whole world. The third, an aſſurance that he had fully puniſhed the murderers of Philip [m]. Plutarch's account correſponds pretty well with this, and he tells us beſides, that Alexander, highly pleaſed with what had paſſed, made mighty preſents to the prieſts. He likewiſe acquaints us, that ſome were of opinion Alexander's title to divinity was founded in a blunder of the high-prieſt, who being deſirous to ſalute him in Greek with theſe words, my ſon, inſtead of paidion, pronounced paidios, which the Greek flatterers underſtood pai dios, i. e. ſon of Jove. The ſame author adds, that Alexander, in a letter to his mother Olympias, told her, he had received ſome ſecret anſwer from the god, which he would reveal to her at his return [n]. But Olympias, who was a woman of ſpirit and ſenſe, was ſo little pleaſed with the king's king's propagating theſe vain ſtories, that ſhe ſent to deſire him to forbear embroiling her with Juno. As to Alexander's return there is alſo a good deal of uncertainty, Ariſtobulus affirming, he came back the ſame way he went; and Ptolemy aſſerting, that he returned a nearer, which brought him directly to Memphis.

[l] Arrian. l. iii. c. 4. [m] Diodor. l. xvii. [n] In vit. Alex.

He ſettles the government of Egypt.

ALEXANDER, on his return to Memphis, received there embaſſadors with congratulations from moſt of the ſtates of Greece, as alſo recruits both of horſe and foot; all which was very acceptable to him, as he teſtified by his kind reception of every body, by his making great feaſts, and exhibiting pompous ſhews. Theſe ſolemnities over, he began to think of ſettling the province, and of returning to the proſecution of the war. As he intended the Egyptians ſhould live under their own laws, he made choice of Doloaſpis and Petiſis, eminent Egyptians, to be joint preſidents of the province; but Petiſis deſiring to be excuſed from ſuch a burden, Doloaſpis was made ſole preſident. Into all the places of ſtrength, however, he put garriſons, and thoſe garriſons were under the command of ſuch officers as he thought he could confide in. Thus Memphis was committed to the care of Pantaleon, Peluſium to Polemon; the troops were under Lycidas, that is, the foreign troops; for as to the reſt, they were commanded by Peuceſtas and Balacrus. The fleet had for its admiral another Polemon. Thus he eſtabliſhed ſeveral independent commanders in Egypt; a policy imitated by the Romans: For conſidering the nature of the people, the ſituation of the ſtrong places, and the vaſt conſequence of the province, it was thought too great a charge to be committed to a ſingle perſon, or to be truſted in the hands of men of high quality, it being always held a mark of ſuperior policy to prevent inſurrections, rather than be obliged, with the hazard of war, to quell them. Alexander, as we have ſhewn, was not only aware of this, but in his conduct ſet an example to ot[illegible]. Theſe regulations took up a good deal of ti[illegible]o that the winter was ſpun out before all things were compleated; and then Alexander made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for marching with his army into Phœnicia, that he might open the campaign in good time [o].

TYRE

[o] Arrian. l. iii. c. 5.

Samaritans punished.

Tyre was the place appointed for the general rendezvous of the forces, and thither Alexander with all convenient speed shaped his march. In the way he received an account of a very unhappy accident which gave him much concern. Andromachus, a great favourite of his and a deserving man, had been appointed superintendant of Syria and Palestine. This officer, going to Samaria to collect the tribute, was not only opposed in the execution of his office, but a mighty tumult suddenly arising, the people set fire to the house wherein he lodged, and burnt him and his retinue. To avenge so horrid a fact, the king ordered a strict inquisition to be made after the murderers, directing, that all who were any ways concerned should, without mercy, be put to death; but this was not all, he established a colony of Macedonians in their city, and gave part of its territories to the Jews. Such of the Samaritans as escaped this slaughter repaired to Sechem, which has been ever since, and still is, their capital. The ground of this quarrel in all probability was Alexander's slighting their request at the time he so highly favoured the Jews; a thing which sunk deep into their breasts, and, if possible, heightened that implacable aversion they had conceived against the Jews. From this fact of theirs Alexander took such a distaste to this people, that he dismissed eight thousand of them who had served in his troops ever since the siege of Tyre, sending them as far as the Upper Egypt, where he commanded they should have certain lands divided amongst them [p].

Statira the wife of Darius dies.

When he arrived at Tyre, he there met with Athenian embassadors, who came to renew the request formerly made him, to pardon such of their citizens as he had found serving the enemy. The king, being desirous to oblige so famous a state, yielded to their request, and sent also a fleet to the coast of Greece, to prevent the effects of some commotions which had lately happened in Peloponnesus. These, with some private affairs, once settled, he directed his march to Thapsacus, a city on the Euphrates. There he found a broken bridge, which Darius had made use of in his flight after the battle of Issus; as also a great body of horse, under the command of Mazæus, who had orders to obstruct his passage; but so it was, that, either from a notion of policy, or through downright cowardice, Mazæus, having burnt the country, slighted the post and retired; whereupon whereupon the king, having repaired the broken bridge, paſſed the Euphrates, marching on to ſeek Darius. A little before that the wife of the laſt-mentioned prince paid her laſt debt to nature in child-bed. Alexander cauſed her to be buried at a prodigious expence, tho' he had been ſo cautious of injuring either her reputation or his own, as not only to forbear ſeeing her, but alſo to forbid the commending her beauty in his preſence. Tyræus, an eunuch who attended on her perſon, eſcaped ſoon after, and carried Darius the tidings of his queen Statira's death. He was extremely moved at the news, and no leſs ſo at the recital of the honours paid her by Alexander when living, and the mighty reſpect ſhewn her at her death; which, on account of the youth of Alexander, he attributed in his mind to ſome ſiniſter cauſe; but when the eunuch, with moſt ſolemn aſſeverations, had convinced him, that there was not the leaſt colour for his ſuſpicions, he, in a great tranſport of mind, prayed to God to reſtore the kingdom of Perſia to its antient glory, that he might thereby be enabled to teſtify his gratitude to Alexander; or, if its fatal period was come, he prayed, that his generous victor might ſit next on the throne of Cyrus [q]. After paſſing the Euphrates, the Macedonians marched through Meſopotamia, having the river on their left, and by a round-about road, which they took to avoid defiles and for the eaſier procuring of proviſion, arrived at length at Babylon. On the road Alexander was informed, that Darius, with all his army, lay encamped on the river Tigris, in order to diſpute his paſſage. The current of this river is ſo rapid, that nothing can be imagined more difficult than attempting to paſs it with an army, even without any enemy in view. If Darius had therefore really drawn his troops down to the banks of this river, we may be confident that Alexander never could have paſſed it; but he had committed the care of defending it to Mazæus, who, it ſeems, did not love fighting; for he burnt the forage here too, and then withdrew; however, Alexander paſſed it, tho' not without great difficulty, many of his ſoldiers being borne off their feet, and carried down the ſtream; ſo that at laſt he commanded them to march in cloſe order, ſo that they reſiſted the water like a wall; notwithſtanding which expedient a great deal of time was ſpent in getting them them over, and they were so much fatigued with the passage, that he was forced to let them rest a whole day. If therefore, as we said before, Darius, or any general of his, with a competent body of troops, had been possessed of the opposite shore, how is it possible they should have got over at all [r]? But these precautions being wanting, and Alexander once on the other side, there remained nothing now but a battle to decide the issue of the war, and to determine who should be lord of Asia.

[p] Joseph. Antiq. Jud. l. xi.

[q] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alex.

An eclipse of the moon astonishes the Macedonians

As the king continued his march directly towards the enemy, an accident happened that caused some confusion in the army. This was no more than an eclipse of the moon. If we were to believe Curtius, we must suppose, that the Macedonians were on the very point of breaking out into rebellion, taking this for an evident sign that heaven was against them; but it is so much that author's custom to exaggerate, and the account he gives us of this eclipse shews him to have written after such indifferent memoirs, that we may very well justify our preferring Arrian's account; which, as it is more moderate, so it is also much more probable. He says, the king caused sacrifices to be offered to the sun, moon, and earth, as the authors of eclipses; and that Aristander having inspected the entrails, had declared, that all things would be fortunate to the Macedonians; that a battle would happen within the month, and that they would carry the victory [s]. Curtius [t] says, that the king called for Egyptian astronomers, who, concealing the causes of eclipses from the vulgar, of which causes, by the way, Curtius himself knew very little or nothing, told the soldiers, that the Macedonians were under the government of the sun, the Persians of the moon; and therefore, that a diminution of light in the latter shewed, that those who were under her dominion should shortly be destroyed. This is certainly improbable; for nothing is more notorious, than that the Persians were held to be under the dominion of the sun, and not of the moon; besides, there can be no reason shewn why the king should have recourse to the Egyptian sages and not to Aristander. On the whole therefore we may justly conclude, that having, by a proper compliance with their notions, re-settled the minds of his soldiers, and filled them with the hopes of victory, Alexander made made them continue their march, that they might fight while they remained full of this perſuaſion.

[r] Arrian. l. iii. c. 7. Diodor. ubi supra. [s] Arrian. supra. [t] Curt. l. iv.

The armies meet.

It is unneceſſary to detain the reader here with a long account of the ſtrength of the Perſian army; we ſhall content ourſelves with obſerving, that it is hardly poſſible to gueſs at its real ſtrength. Arrian himſelf ſeems to have been miſled, if his text is not corrupted in this paſſage, wherein he tells us, that Darius had forty thouſand horſe and a million of foot. Diodorus ſays, there were two hundred thouſand horſe, andeight hundred thouſand foot. Plutarch, that the horſe and foot made up together a million. Juſtin gives us exactly half of Diodorus's number. With this vaſt army he remained encamped near the village Guagamela. Alexander choſe a ſtrong camp within about fifteen miles of the ſame place, where he left his baggage, with his ſick and wounded ſoldiers, and with the reſt marched on till he was within ſight of the enemy [a]. Then a council of war was called, wherein it was debated, whether it would be more adviſeable to fight that evening, or to encamp where they were that night. Moſt of the members of that council were for the firſt, Parmenio almoſt alone for the ſecond; but when the king had heard his reaſons, he gave orders that the troops ſhould encamp. Alexander then, with a choſen party of horſe, went and viewed the field of battle, examining every part thereof with the greateſt diligence; and, when he had done this, he returned to the camp, where, in a ſecond council, he gave the neceſſary directions for the engagement, encouraged all who were preſent to do their duty, and, above all, exhorted them to be extremely careful in preſerving order; after which he diſmiſſed them to their reſt. When all things were quiet, Parmenio came again to the king's pavilion, and earneſtly entreated him to attack the enemy in the dark, aſſuring him, that it would be the beſt way to prevent his ſoldiers from being diſcouraged by the diſparity between themſelves and the Perſian troops. To which Alexander calmly replied, I will never ſteal a victory; which has been by ſome cried up as a puerile expreſſion; by others as unreaſonably cenſured as a mark of Alexander's grandeur of mind; whereas it was in truth no more than the wiſe reſolution of a conſummate general, who ſuffered not himſelf to be dazzled by appearances, penetrating trating all things to the bottom, and chose, without hesitation, that measure which was best. The reader will easily discern this, if he will be pleased to consider on what the two kings relied. Darius plainly placed his hopes in numbers; for this reason he chose a plain country, every mole hill of which, in comparison, he caused to be demolished. Alexander depended on the valour and military skill of his veteran troops. In the dark then numbers would still have been numbers, valour would have signified little, and military skill would have been lost; besides, a hundred accidents might have snatched a victory from Alexander, considering the disproportion between his army and that of Darius; whereas we can scarce figure to ourselves an accident which would have been favourable to him. More than all this, Darius was now of opinion, that his last defeat was wholly owing to the disadvantage of the ground; had he been beaten again in the night, he would have imputed that to the darkness, and still have entertained hopes; whereas Alexander sought to convince the Persians, that their fighting was to no purpose: He answered therefore wisely, and like a great captain, as he really was, I will not steal a victory; an expression which ought not to surprize us as sublime; but ought to convince us, that he who spoke it was a soldier, and knew well what he said and did [x].

[a] Arrian. l. iii. c. 8.

The battle of Guagamela. Year after the flood 2668. Year before Christ 331.

THE vast army of Darius continued all night under arms, which must have fatigued them very much, and have given great opportunity for their fear to work upon them. Their king, it seems, was apprehensive that Alexander would attack him in the night, which was the reason that he kept his troops upon so hard a duty. They were drawn up in very exact order, as appeared by many memoirs of their disposition, which, after the battle was over, were found in their camp, and which doubtless had been distributed to their principal officers, to prevent confusion and mistakes. Darius himself was in the main body, surrounded by his relations, some choice troops of horse, certain chariots and elephants, and round all these were posted the Greek mercenaries, on whose courage and skill he chiefly depended. When Alexander marched to the engagement, his right wing was composed of his royal brigade of horse, commanded by Clytus, of several

[x] Arrian. ubi supra. Diodor. Plut. &c.

ſeveral other corps of cavalry, beſides a large body of auxiliary horſe, commanded by Philotus the ſon of Parmenio. The firſt line of the phalanx, which joined theſe, was commanded by Nicanor the ſon of Parmenio. The next by Cœnus the ſon of Polemocrates. The third corps was under Perdiccas. The fourth was commanded by Meleager. The fifth by Polyſphercon. The laſt was the battalion of Amyntas, commanded by his brother Simmias, Amyntas being gone into Macedonia to raiſe recruits. On the left were the troops commanded by Craterus, conſiſting of ſeveral battalions of foot; a body of auxiliary horſe commanded by Erigyus; the Theſſalian under the command of Philip. The whole wing was commanded by Parmenio. This was the diſpoſition of the middle line of the army; for before both wings and the centre there were light armed troops for forlorns, and behind each diviſion of the army there was a corps of reſerve. To the battalions of foot that compoſed theſe, Alexander gave orders, that they ſhould bear their ſpears ſo as to face about immediately in caſe the enemy ſhould ſurround any part of his army. He likewiſe ordered, that they ſhould open when-ever the armed chariots were driven upon them, ſo as to give them a clear paſſage; which diſpoſitions and directions proved of the higheſt conſequence. The forces brought at preſent into the field are computed by Arrian at ſeven thouſand horſe and forty thouſand foot. Alexander's right wing charged firſt upon the Scythian horſe, who, as they were well armed and very robuſt men, behaved at the beginning very well, making a vigorous reſiſtance; and that this might anſwer the more effectually, the chariots placed upon the left wing bore down upon the Macedonians. Their appearance was very terrible, and threatened entire deſtruction; but Alexander's light-armed troops, by their darts, arrows, and ſtones, killed many of the drivers, and more of the horſes, ſo that few reached the Macedonian line; which opening, as Alexander had directed, they only paſſed through, and were then either taken or diſabled by his bodies of reſerve. The horſe continued ſtill engaged, and before any thing deciſive happened there, the Perſian foot near their left wing began to move, in hopes of falling on the flank of the Macedonian right wing, or of penetrating ſo far as to divide it from its centre. Alexander perceiving this, ſent Aretas with a corps of troops to charge them, and thereby to compel them to keep their posts. In the mean time, he remained where he was, and prosecuting his first design broke their left wing, and pursued it till it was fully routed. He then charged the Persian foot in flank, and they being intimidated made but a feeble resistance. Darius perceiving this, gave up all for lost and fled himself. Then the Macedonians, following their victorious monarch, made a vigorous pursuit. The battalion commanded by Simmias only did not stir, that officer being informed, that not only the left wing was in great danger, but that a great body of Persian and Indian horse, taking the advantage of the king's absence, had penetrated through the centre, and were fallen in upon the Macedonian baggage. This misfortune was quickly followed by another; the barbarian prisoners mutinied thereupon, and fell upon the Macedonians in their camp; but the corps of reserve facing about, and being supported by Simmias's battalion, the Persians, after a smart engagement, were routed, and great numbers slain. Parmenio, on the left wing, in the mean time was almost inveloped, the cavalry in the Persian right being both excellent and very numerous; in all probability the Macedonians, notwithstanding their courage and military skill, would have been overborne at last and totally destroyed, if Alexander, on the first intelligence of this misfortune, had not immediately returned from the pursuit, and charged the enemy in flank and rear; yet did they not then fly, but facing about continued to defend themselves against Alexander, and pressed hard upon Parmenio at the same time. Hephestion, Cœnus, and Menidas were wounded in this conflict, which was very long and bloody, but ended at last in the total defeat of the Persians; whereupon Alexander continued the pursuit of Darius about ten miles, and then passing the river Lycus, encamped his men, that they might take some repose. Parmenio in the mean time and the troops under his command secured the enemy's tents, baggage, elephants and camels. Such was the end of this battle, which decided the fate of Asia [u].

The loss sustained in this battle.

According to Arrian, the Persians lost here three hundred thousand men, and the field of battle, and much more more than that number taken priſoners [w]; but how this ſhould be done by an army ſhort of fifty thouſand men, is not eaſy to be conceived, and therefore, not without reaſon, ſome corruption hath been ſuſpected in the number. Diodorus is more moderate; for he ſays, there were only ninety thouſand killed. Priſoners, to be ſure, there were at leaſt as many as Alexander's army knew what to do with. With reſpect to the loſs of the Macedonians, Arrian puts it at one hundred horſemen and one thouſand horſes; which is ſurely beyond all bounds of belief, if we conſider how hardly this battle was fought, and that the Perſians were once maſters of the Macedonian camp. About midnight Alexander obliged his ſoldiers to continue the purſuit, in hopes of overtaking Darius; but tho' he failed in this, yet at Arbela he took all the heavy baggage and all the rich equipage of that monarch. This great victory, as Arrian obſerves, was obtained within the ſpace of time fixed by Ariſtander, which gave him great reputation (O).

[u] Arrian, l. iii. c. 13, 14, 15. Diodor. ubi supra. Curt. l. iv. c. 46. & seq.

ALEXANDER

[w] Arrian. ubi ſupra. [x] Idem ibid.

(O) Diodorus, in his account of the battle of Arbela, (for ſo moſt hiſtorians call it, tho' it was fought near Guagamela) differs in ſome circumſtances from Arrian in the account he gives us of the order of battle; but if we conſider, that Arrian wrote from the memoirs of eye-witneſſes and perſons of great quality, we cannot but ſuppoſe, that in theſe particulars he muſt have been well informed. In other reſpects it is fit that we ſhould ſet down what Diodorus hath recorded. By him then we find, that ſucceſs which for a time attended the Perſian troops, entirely aſcribed to the conduct and valour of Darius. It unfortunately happened, that Alexander, attacking his guards, threw a dart at Darius, which, tho' it miſſed him, ſtruck the charioteer who ſat at his feet dead; and he tumbling forwards, ſome of the guards raiſed a loud cry, whence thoſe behind them conjectured, that the king was ſlain, and thereupon fled without looking behind them, which created ſuch a confuſion, that Darius found himſelf obliged to follow their example. The duſt raiſed by the flight of ſo vaſt a multitude, gave Darius room and leiſure to retire to a place of ſafety; for he knowing well that the Macedonians could not perceive what rout he took, turned off immediately

Alexander enters Babylon.

Alexander receiving certain intelligence, that Darius was retired into Media, thought it at that time unneceſſary, and indeed impracticable, to follow him. He determined to march directly to Babylon, which accordingly he did.

with the troops under his command, and, marching with convenient ſpeed, took poſt in ſome villages that were directly behind the Macedonian army; from whence he ſafely departed, while Alexander by forced marches endeavoured to overtake him, on a vain preſumption that he fled ſtraight forwards. According to this author the Perſians loſt ninety thouſand, and the Macedonians five hundred, men; however, he owns, that a great number of the latter were wounded (36). Plutarch, Diodorus, and many other authors agree, that the evening before the battle, when Alexander had given the neceſſary directions, he went to bed, and ſlept ſo ſoundly, that Parmenio and the reſt of the generals were forced to do many things in the morning according to their own ſentiments, becauſe they did not care to awake him. At laſt Parmenio was conſtrained to go to his bed-ſide, where he called him ſeveral times before he anſwered. At length he aroſe, and dreſſed himſelf with great ſerenity; while he was doing this, Parmenio could not help ſaying, I wonder, Sir, conſidering you are to fight the moſt important of all your battles, that you could ſleep as ſoundly as if you were already victorious. Why, ſo I am, my good friend, returned the king, ſince I ſhall no more be obliged to follow Darius hither and thither, through a country already deſtroyed by the length of the war (37). We have another inſtance of the wonderful coolneſs and penetration of this great prince. When Parmenio perceived that the Macedonian camp was in danger, he ſent to recal the king from his purſuit. When Alexander heard the meſſage, Parmenio, ſaid he, is certainly beſide himſelf; if I am victorious over theſe enemies, we ſhall have their baggage and our own too; whereas if I loſe this advantage, we ſhall have nothing to fight for but our lives. But when Parmenio ſent again to inform him, that himſelf and the troops under his command were in the utmoſt danger, the king came immediately to his relief; but, ſays our author, ſuſpicions began to ariſe, that either the vigour of Parmenio was diminiſhed by his age, or that out of envy he ſought to diminiſh his (36) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. Hiſt. l. xi. c. 13.

(37) Plutarch. in Alex. Juſtin.

did. Mazæus commanded there in chief, the ſame perſon who had been intruſted to defend the paſſages of the rivers Euphrates and Tigris. He acted here juſt as he had done there; that is, at the ſight of Alexander's army, he put the place into his hands [y]. The Babylonians were very his maſter's greatneſs (38). The truth ſeems to be, that Parmenio had too much concern for him. Philip of Macedon confeſſed him the only general he knew; and we find nothing recorded of him in hiſtory, which doth not ſpeak him a moſt conſummate, tho' at the ſame time a very cautious, commander. If the wing under hit command had been beaten, that corps of Perſians would have been able to keep the field, and would have been quickly joined by moſt of thoſe who fled before. Such a multitude, encouraged by a taſte of ſucceſs, would have quickly ſwallowed up the Greeks, and recovered all they had conquered. Alexander, who fancied himſelf the ſon of a god, had his head full of nothing but victory where-ever he appeared; but to Parmenio, who was a mere man, conduct ſeemed as neceſſary as courage, and the preſervation of half the army eſſential to the whole. It is true, we are not, properly ſpeaking, bound to enter into the characters of thoſe whoſe hiſtory we write; yet ſometimes it is neceſſary; for what is hiſtory without truth? Or to what end do we read, but to be acquainted with things as they were? There were in the court of Alexander many who hated Parmenio and his family; of theſe ſome wrote, and from the memoirs of theſe writers Plutarch had his informations: We do not therefore preſume to blame him for tranſmitting what he read to poſterity; but we take the liberty of doing the ſame thing: And becauſe Arrian, who copied Ariſtobulus and Ptolemy, ſays nothing of Parmenio's envy, we report the ſuggeſtion as doubtful, that a character, which ſeems to have the faireſt title to honour, may not, at this diſtance of time, be ſullied by inſinuations once thought too idle to deſerve mention. Ariſtander, during the battle, rode by his maſter's ſide, covered with a white mantle, and with a crown of gold upon his head. He it was, who, in a great meaſure, contributed to fix the victory, by ſhewing the Macedonians an eagle hovering over the king's head. After the battle, the king ſacrificed in a magnificent manner, and ſent preſents

[y] Arrian. Diodor. Curt. ubi ſupra.

(38) Plut. in Alexand.

very glad of this revolution, and therefore, with great joy, came out to meet Alexander, with presents of great value. This joy of theirs proceeded from their excessive hatred of the Persians, as again that excessive hatred took birth from their principles of religion; for the Persians being deists had pulled down all their temples, and in every other respect curbed that propensity to idolatry, which was so extravagantly warm in this nation. Alexander, on the other hand, answered all their expectations; for he immediately commanded, that every one of their temples should be rebuilt, particularly the famous temple of Belus. He sent also for their priests, conversed with them, and left to their care the decree he had made in favour of their religion [z]. He offered sacrifices himself to Belus, left Mazæus in possession of the government; but removed Bagophanes, who had put the citadel and the royal treasures into his hands, yet he entertained him in his court, and treated him with marks of confidence and esteem [a]. As he was a prince of great learning, he enquired after the astronomical memoirs of the observations which were said to have been made in that city for a long tract of time, and he caused the best account that could be got of them to be transmitted to his tutor Aristotle; so desirous he was that the republic of letters should reap some advantage from his labours and victories [b]. On the whole, however, his stay at Babylon did him no good; for he and his officers began there first to taste of luxury, and to fall in love with that magnificence and delicacy which had enervated and destroyed the Persians [c].

It

[z] Diodor. ubi supra. [a] Arrian. l. iii. c. 16. [b] Porphyr. ap. Simplic. l. ii. de cælo. [c] Diodor. ubi supra.

presents of the spoils to all the Grecian states (39.) Justin says, that few battles had been so bloody as this; that Darius, when he saw that the battle was lost, endeavoured to throw himself into the thickest of the fight, that there he might be slain; but, against his will, was forced to fly by those who were about him. Being persuaded by these to break down the bridge on the river over which he passed, that it might prevent the enemy's passage, he answered, I will never purchase safety to myself, at the expence of

(39) Idem Ibid.

The conduct of Antipater in Greece.

It is now time for us to turn our eyes a little towards Greece; for tho' the main hopes of the Macedonians followed their royal leader thro' the great continent of Aſia, yet were they not aſleep as to their intereſts in Europe, where ſeveral attempts were made to leſſen their power. While Memnon lived, the Perſians were not only lords of the ſea in name, but in reality ſo. He retook many of the iſlands which had fallen under the power of Alexander; he ſent ſhips of war to cruize on the coaſts of Macedonia; and, if he had lived, he would have made a deſcent on Eubœa, where queſtionleſs he would have been joined by a great number of the Greeks. After his death, things were in a languiſhing condition till the battle of Iſſus, when new efforts were made to ſtir up troubles in Greece. Thoſe, however, were rendered abortive by Antipater, who kept ſuch a fleet at ſea and made ſuch diſpoſitions of his land-forces, as rendered it not ſafe for any of the Greek ſtates to declare againſt his maſter[d]. However, when advice arrived of this laſt victory, theſe ſmothered diſſenſions broke out into an open flame. The Greeks in general began to be afraid that if they made no attempt before the Perſian empire was abſolutely deſtroyed, all they could do afterwards would be to no purpoſe. As ſoon therefore as they had news that Memnon governor of Thrace had rebelled, and that Antipater was making great preparations to march againſt him, they took arms, Agis king of Lacedæmon being declared their general. Antipater being informed of this, immediately drew together an army, and, having compoſed matters in Thrace, marched into Greece. It was not long before the armies met; that of Agis conſiſted of twenty-two thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe; Antipater had about forty thouſand men; for when he came of ſo many thouſands of my ſubjects, as muſt by this means be loſt; or take from them that paſſage which has preſerved me (40). Indeed all authors agree, that Darius behaved very honourably in this action; and we ſhall ſee hereafter, that he loved his ſubjects ſo well, as to be ſatisfied with dying by their hands, rather than to owe his ſafety to the fidelity of ſtrangers.

[d] Arrian. l. ii. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Demoſt.

(40) Juſtin, Hiſt. l. xi. c. 14.

came with a well-disciplined army out of Macedonia, many of the Greeks joined him out of fear, who would otherwise have been neuters, or have fought against him. The engagement that ensued was very obstinate and bloody; but at last Agis was killed, and the army he commanded routed, with the loss of five thousand three hundred men. Antipater himself lost three thousand five hundred; but it put an end to the war, for the Greeks seeing the fatal issue of this business, and that the Athenians sided with the conqueror, they were constrained to forget their resentments, and to implore mercy [e]. Such was the state of Greece.

Alexander takes possession of Susa.

After thirty days stay at Babylon, Alexander continued his march to Susa, which had been already rendered into the hands of Philoxenes. Here the king received the treasures of Darius, amounting to fifty thousand talents, or upwards of nine millions sterling, as also curiosities and furniture of an immense value [f]. It was delivered up to him by Abulites, to whose care Darius had committed it; yet it is said, that what the Persian did was by order of his master, who was in hopes, that while Alexander was employed in taking great cities and heaping up riches, he would not march so speedily as hitherto he had done, but afford him time to collect a fresh army [g]. Among other things that were found in the treasury of Susa, were the brazen statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which Xerxes had carried away when he plundered Athens. These Alexander very carefully sent back, and having taken a view of the fair palace and other things of note at Susa, he began to think of quitting the province. Abulites he left in possession of his command as governor of Susa; but the care of the citadel he committed to Mazæus. The command of the forces he left for the defence of the province he gave to Archelaus. Menetes he constituted president of Syria, Phænicia, and Cilicia, to whom, at his departure, he gave three thousand talents of silver, with orders to send over as much of it as should be necessary to Antipater, that he might the better preserve the peace of Greece, and carry on his designs there. About this time arrived the recruits under the command of Amyntas. They consisted of

[e] Diodor. ubi supra. [f] Arrian. ubi supra. [g] Diodor. ubi supra.

of five hundred horſe and ſix thouſand foot, all Macedonians; ſix hundred Thracian horſe, and three thouſand five hundred Trallian foot; about a thouſand horſe and four thouſand foot from Peloponneſus; in all about two thouſand horſe, and thirteen thouſand five hundred foot. Theſe he incorporated into his veteran army, without forming any new corps. He dealt alſo very kindly by them all, taking care to let them have pay in advance, procuring for them good quarters, and being preſent himſelf at the reviews, and as often as they were exerciſed [h] (P).

At

[h] Curt. l. v.

(P) Authors vary a little as to the money which Alexander ſeized at Suſa. Arrian ſays it was fifty thouſand talents (41); with him Curtius agrees (42). Diodorus Siculus ſays there were forty thouſand talents in bullion, and nine thouſand coined; ſo that he comes within a thouſand talents of the ſum (43). Plutarch tells us there were but forty thouſand talents; yet his account riſes higher than any other hiſtorian's, which ſeems not to have been well obſerved; for theſe forty thouſand talents, he ſays, were in coined gold, and diſtinguiſhes it from the reſt of the treaſure, of which he does not give us the particulars; only he ſays, there was purple to the value of five thouſand talents, which was freſh and lively, tho' it had been laid up a hundred and ninety years. He ſays too, on the authority of Dinon, that veſſels filled with water from the Nile and the Danube, were ſet in this treaſury, as monuments of the mighty extent of the Perſian empire (44). Juſtin ſays expreſly there were but forty thouſand talents; which agrees well enough with Diodorus, whoſe ſteps he is obſerved to follow; yet this author hath a very curious paſſage, which, for the ſake of brevity, probably Juſtin omitted (45). Alexander, as he informs us, coming in perſon to take an account of theſe treaſures, ſat down on the royal throne, which, it ſeems, was ſo high, that his feet did not come near the foot-ſtool. One of his pages obſerving this, took up Darius's table, and placed it upon the foot-ſtool, for which Alexander, who now ſat at eaſe, commended him; but one of the eunuchs of the old court, fixing his eyes on the table, fell a weeping. Tell me, friend, ſaid Alexander, what it is you ſee here that moves you

(41) Arrian. l. iii. c. 16. (42) Curt. l. v. c. 2 (43) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. (44) Plut. in vit. Alex. (45) Juſtin. l. xi. c. 15.

He reduces the Uxians.

At laſt he thought of proſecuting the war; and ſo moving from Suſa he paſſed the Paſitigris, and entered the country of the Uxians. Thoſe who inhabited the plain country ſubmitted without giving him any trouble; but the mountaineers were fooliſh enough to ſend a deputation, to inform him they expected a ſum of money by way of tribute for paſſing through their country, pretending, that the Perſian monarchs had always paid it them. Alexander anſwered coldly, That they would do well to come to the paſſage to receive it [i]. As ſoon as they were gone, he diſpatched Craterus to ſeize the tops of the mountains, while he in the mean time, with a body of horſe and light-armed troops, entered the country by night, through private and troubleſome roads; ſo that he was in the midſt of the Uxian villages before the inhabitants knew any thing of the matter. Theſe he plundered and burnt, and continuing his march ſeized the paſs, whither numbers of people were crouded, in hopes of receiving the money. They pretended at firſt to make ſome defence: but before they could form themſelves into any order, Craterus with his ſoldiers appeared over their heads, and began to puſh them in cluſters over the precipices. They then fell into confuſion, and fled into holes and caverns; however, Siſygambis interpoſing and ſending to entreat Alexander to pardon them, he readily acquieſced on the following terms, viz. that they provided for the army a hunyou to grieve ſo much? O king, anſwered the eunuch, I was once Darius's ſervant, as I am now thine. As I loved and honoured my maſter while I ſerved him; ſo I cannot even now behold, without extreme diſquiet, that table at which he ſat, placed under thy feet. Alexander, moved at the blunt honeſty of the man, commended him, and ordered it to be taken away, but Philotas interpoſed; As this table, Sir, ſaid he, was not placed here by your command, there is nothing of inſolence in the uſe you have put it to. To me it appears to be a thing ordained by providence, to ſhew the mutability of empire. The king then ordered it to remain where it was (46). This Philotas was the ſon of Parmenio; and we ſhall hear quickly of his being tortured and put to death, on a ſuſpicion that he bore no good will to the glory of his maſter.

[i] Arrian. l. iii. c. 17. Diodor. ubi ſupra.

(46) Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

a hundred horſes of war, five hundred baggage horſes, and thirty thouſand head of cattle [k].

As we have mentioned the mother of Darius, we will take this opportunity of ſpeaking of Alexander's conduct towards her, and of her behaviour towards him. From the time ſhe was taken at the battle of Iſſus, Alexander afforded her not only the title, but the obedience due to a mother, left the children of Darius under her care, and omitted nothing which might contribute to leſſen, or even to obliterate, her misfortunes. In the late engagement, it is ſaid, that when the Perſian horſe broke into Alexander's camp, they came to the tent where ſhe was, and would have perſuaded her to make her eſcape; but ſhe conſtantly refuſed, ſaying, That ſhe would not quit Alexander with his fortune [l]. The king, when he purpoſed to purſue the war, left her at Suſa, having aſſigned her and her grand-children a tutor, that he might have the pleaſureof converſing with them without an interpreter; and hence it was that ſhe ſent to entreat him to pity and ſpare the Uxians, who, through raſhneſs and folly, had incurred his diſpleaſure. And we have ſeen what deference Alexander paid to her mediation [m] (Q).

Alexander's reſpect towards the family of Darius.

AFTER

[k] Arrian. ubi ſupra. [l] Diodor. ubi ſupra [m] Arrian. ubi ſupra.

(Q) There is nothing in the life of Alexander which hath afforded the rhetoricians, who have made his actions their theme, ſo happy an opportunity of exerting their genii, as his tenderneſs to the family of Darius. Plutarch and Curtius are particularly fond of theſe paſſages, and have taken all poſſible care to ſet them out to the beſt advantage. The laſt mentioned author hath inſerted in his work a very extraordinary relation of an interview between Alexander and Siſygambis at Suſa. We were afraid of ſwelling the text too much, otherwiſe it had been inſerted there; yet conſidering the manner in which it was told, perhaps it will appear with great propriety in a note by way of appendix. Alexander having received from Macedon ſeveral pieces of purple and other rich veſtures, he ordered them to be ſent to Siſygambis, together with the perſon who had wrought them, with a compliment, as he intended it, that if the fabricature of theſe garments pleaſed her, ſhe might let her grand-children be taught how to make them for their diverſion; but working in wool being then held in Perſia a very mean and diſhonourable thing, Siſygambis ſhed tears when ſhe heard the meſſage. The perſon who carried it returned therefore

He forces a paſſage to Perſepolis, and deſtroys it.

After chaſtiſing the Uxians, Alexander ordered Parmenio to march with the Theſſalian horſe, the royal brigade, the mercenary foot, with the carriages and baggage, through the ordinary open road againſt the enemy. In the mean time, he with the Macedonian foot, and the light armed troops, and a body of horſe and archers, marched over the mountains to the Perſian ſtreights. Theſe he found effectually fortified with a ſtrong wall, flanked with towers, and Ariobarzanes, with an army of forty-thouſand foot and ſeven thouſand horſe, poſted behind to diſpute his paſſage. The king, truſting to his uſual fortune, immediately ſtormed the wall; but after a long and bloody conflict, in which he loſt abundance of men, he was forced to ſound a retreat, having been able to effect nothing [n]. He then began to enquire for ſome other way, and having met with a man who had been formerly a priſoner, his father a Lycian, his mother a Perſian, ſo that he fore in haſte to Alexander, and acquainted him, that Siſygambis was much diſpleaſed; whereupon the king went inſtantly unto her apartment, in order to conſole her, and to remove any miſconſtruction ſhe might have put on his meſſage. "Dear mo"ther, ſaid, he, the robe, in which you ſee me arrayed, was "not only preſented me by my ſiſters, but is alſo the work of "their hands; be convinced, madam, from thence, that I meant

[n] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 18.

"not to offend you, but as I was led into an error through "the cuſtom of my country, impute what is amiſs to my igno"rance, and not to any fault in my will. Hitherto I have made "it my ſtudy never to tranſgreſs any of your cuſtoms, As "ſoon as I was informed, that it was held diſreſpectful in
"Perſia for a ſon to ſit before his mother, till licenſed ſo do
"by her, I made it a rule with me never to ſit before you,
"till I received your commands. As often as you have offered "to proſtrate yourſelf before me, I have taken care to prevent "it; and as the laſt and moſt higheſt token of my eſteem, have "always ſtiled you mother, a title, ſtrictly ſpeaking, belonging
"only to Olympias (47)". Curtius concludes his chapter here without telling us that Siſygambis was more than ſatisfied. In all probability, ſhe could not but be well pleaſed at an explanation which took from her all apprehenſions of Alexander's prejudice towards her family; but that this is the very ſpeech which Alexander made to her, will perhaps not eaſily be credited on account of its rhetorical quaintneſs.

(47) Curt. lib. v. c. 9.

he ſpoke both tongues; this man told him, that having long kept ſheep on theſe mountains, he could lead him to another paſs, but that in truth it was difficult enough too. Alexander thereupon left Craterus in his camp, with orders, that as ſoon as he perceived that himſelf had paſſed the other ſtreights, and was about to attack the Perſian camp, he ſhould ſcale the wall [o]. Then following his Lycian guide, he marched that night an hundred furlongs, and by an intricate road arrived at laſt at the ſtreights; and though he met with a river in his way, yet he paſſed it, and advanced ſo ſpeedily, that by day-break he ſurprized the firſt guard, whom he cut all to pieces, as he did moſt of thoſe in the ſecond poſt, whereby Ariobarzanes received no intelligence of his paſſage, till Alexander attacked him in his camp. Craterus, as ſoon as he heard the trumpet ſound, attacked the wall; this ſo diſtracted the Perſians, that they would have fled, but it was impoſſible. Ptolemy ſeized the wall with three thouſand foot. Alexander charged them before, Craterus behind, when they fled to the wall, Ptolemy drove them back. Thus diſtreſſed they knew not what to do, and the far greater part of them were put to the ſword. Ariobarzanes himſelf with a few horſe eſcaped into the mountains. Alexander then returning in haſte to the river, ſtrengthened the ſlight bridge he had thrown over it, and paſſed over all his army; then by long marches he ſought to reach the capital of Perſia; at Paſargadæ he ſeized the treaſures of Cyrus, and appointed Phraſaortes governor of Perſia. Diodorus and other hiſtorians tell us, that when he was near Perſepolis, he met eight hundred Grecians, all of whom had their bodies grievouſly mangled, and that they with one voice cried out, on the barbarous treatment they had met with from the Perſians, among whom they were priſoners. In compaſſion to which miſerable tale, the king generouſly relieved them, promiſed to ſend them ſafe back to Greece, and vowed deſtruction againſt Perſepolis. Arrian and Plutarch have not a word of this tale; without doubt they had heard it, and their not inſerting it ſeems to carry in it a ſtrong indication of its being fabulous. In all probability, it was calculated like another ſtory we ſhall mention preſently, to excuſe a fact that can never be excuſed. However it was, the king came at laſt to Perſepolis, [o] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alex. [p] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Curt. lib. v. c. 17, [q] Arrian. lib iii. c. 18.

lis, and meeting with no oppoſition, he made war on the royal palace, and under colour of revenging what Xerxes had done at Athens, moſt barbarouſly deſtroyed the moſt magnificent pile, this, or perhaps any other, part of this world could boaſt. Parmenio, the friend of Philip, a man always of moderate counſels, interpoſed in vain. In vain he repreſented to Alexander, that the deſtruction of this moſt noble palace would make him appear a barbarian to the Aſiatics, and put them in doubt whether he intended to keep Aſia, or only to plunder it; that beſides it was no revenge upon the Perſians to raze what was no longer theirs, but his [q]. The king was poſitive, as indeed he generally was; the city of Perſepolis was given up to the plunder of the ſoldiers, and then the palace ſet on fire and deſtroyed. Diodorus tells us, that Alexander having aſſembled his troops, made them a long ſpeech, wherein he ſet forth the reaſons, ſuch as they were, of his proceeding in this cruel manner; he charged this city with having cauſed innumerable miſchiefs to Greece, with implacable hatred towards her, and with growing rich by her ſpoils; and to avenge all thoſe injuries, he gave it up to them, to do with it, the inhabitants, and their eſtates, whatever they thought fit. Upon this the Macedonians ruſhed into the place, and put to the ſword, without mercy, all they could lay hands on, plundering and tearing away all the wealth, jewels, rich furniture, and gorgeous veſtments, with which the houſes were full; and though they every-where loaded themſelves with ſilver, gold and purple, their thirſt of ſpoil did but ſo much the more encreaſe, every one thinking himſelf had too little, and others had too much; ſo that quarrels enſuing, many had their hands cut off, as they endeavoured to ſnatch and tear away prizes, and others were killed. Women of all ages and conditions they ſeized for the ſake of their cloaths and ornaments; ſuch as their beauty made deſirable, they raviſhed; ſtripping all alike, they ſold them for ſlaves; ſo that in the ſame proportion, whereby Perſepolis excelled all other cities before the Macedonians approached it, ſhe was by them depreſſed in miſery and calamity below the moſt wretched village on the earth [r]. In the palace, Alexander ſeized to his own uſe a hundred and twenty thouſand talents, which he immediately ordered to be tranſported on mules and camels, for he had ſuch an extreme averſion to the inhabitants of Perſepolis, [q] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 18. [r] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii.

Perſepolis, that is, even to the miſerable remains of them, that he would leave nothing valuable with them, nor truſt any thing near them. Many authors tell us, that the palace of Perſepolis was not deſtroyed through any deſign, but from an accident; that Alexander having made a great entertainment therein, whereat, himſelf, his friends, and their miſtreſſes were preſent, one Thais, an Athenian courtezan, who lived with Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus, when they were well heated with wine, ſaid, It would be a glorious thing to ſacrifice to the honour of Greece this proud palace, the habitation of its implacable enemies; this being approved by the company, they cried out, come on, bring us fire-brands; and the king, taking upon him to lead them, they with ſongs, pipes, and flutes, marched to execute this glorious propoſal; Thais acting as lieutenant-general, and throwing the next fire brand to the king [s]. The reflection of Diodorus on this ſtory is very ſingular. It was, ſays he, very obſervable, and a thing deſerving admiration, to ſee the ſacrilege and impiety of Xerxes king of Perſia, in his outrages committed in the citadel of Athens, ſo ſignally revenged ſo many years afterwards, through the advice of a courtezan of the ſame city [t]. As there is not a word of Thais or this drunken entertainment in Arrian, there are juſt grounds to ſuſpect that the whole ſtory is a forgery, the intent of which is explained to us by this remark. The deſtruction of Perſepolis had in it a barbarity unbecoming a Greek and moſt unworthy of Alexander. To reſolve therefore that deſtruction into a judgment from the deity, and to make the execution thereof the ſudden effect of ſome irreſiſtible inſpiration, is certainly a good way of taking off the load from Alexander; but where then is it to be laid? Why, upon heaven! a practice no ſober hiſtorian will ever countenance, or preſume to favour a prince at the expence of providence.

Alexander follows Darius.

DURING the time that Alexander continued at Perſepolis, he received advice, that Darius remained ſtill at Ecbatana in Media. He determined to march after him, which he did in a moſt precipitate manner, for in twelve days he reached Media, moving near forty miles a day; in three days more he reached Ecbatana, where he was thoroughly roughly informed of Darius's condition, that he had not with him above three thouſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot, and that with theſe he had retired five days before, with an intent to paſs into the remoteſt provinces of his empire. This put ſome ſtop to his rapid progreſs, and perceiving that there was no neceſſity for thus hurrying himſelf and his ſoldiers, he began to give ſuch orders as were neceſſary in the preſent ſituation of his affairs [u]. The Theſſalian horſe, who had deſerved ſo well of him in all his battles, he diſmiſſed according to his agreement, gave them their whole pay, and ordered two thouſand talents over and above to be diſtributed among them. He then declared that he would force no man, but if any of them were willing to ſerve him longer for pay, he deſired that they would enter their names in a book, which a great many of them did; the reſt ſold their horſes, and prepared for their departure. The king named Epocillus to conduct them to the ſea, and aſſigned him a body of horſe as an eſcort; he likewiſe ſent Menetes with them to take care of their embarquement, and that they were ſafely landed in Eubœa without any expence to themſelves. Parmenio he directed to ſee all the ſeveral ſums of money, which had been collected throughout Perſia, delivered to his treaſurer Harpalus at the caſtle of Ecbatana, to whom he aſſigned a guard of ſix thouſand Macedonian foot and a conſiderable corps of horſe. This Harpalus was one of Alexander's principal favourites, and as he was a monarch remarkably ſteady in his affections, ſo this man had experienced his clemency as well as his kindneſs; for having after the battle of Granicus, been appointed treaſurer, he had by degrees got large ſums into his hands, and being terrified by ſome artful people with ſtories of the king's rigid temper, he fled, and carried away great ſums with him. Alexander, enquiring thoroughly into the matter, entertained a favourable opinion of the man, notwithſtanding all this, and therefore ſent to invite him back again, aſſuring him, that he would forget all that was paſt, which he not only performed, but reſtored him to his favour and former poſt. The reaſon of all this was, that Harpalus had been his friend and confident in his father's time, and at that time too, when to be well with Alexander was no no way to be well with Philip; he had even been baniſhed on his account, and durſt not return to the court of Macedon, till Alexander had aſſumed the crown [w]. Hence the gratitude of this prince appears, who, in the midſt of victories, and after conquering ſo many provinces, could remember and reward thoſe who ſided with him, when he was but the ſecond perſon in the little kingdom of Macedon.

[s] Plut. in vit. Alex. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Curt lib. v. Diodor. ubi ſupra.

[u] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 19. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alex. Curt. lib. v.

The affairs of Greece, and of the royal family of Macedon.

ABOUT this time the king received advice from Greece, that all troubles there were happily ended through the extraordinary care and conduct of Antipater, who had reduced the Lacedæmonians ſo low, that they were conſtrained to accept any terms of peace which he was pleaſed to afford them; and, on the other hand Antipater, to do his maſter honour, would come to no agreement, but on condition that they ſent deputies into Aſia to beg pardon of Alexander, and to implore his favour [x]. Theſe ſervices gave him a great intereſt in the heart of his prince, who as yet had not learned to diſtruſt his ſervants, or to conceive jealouſies of thoſe, who, by their important ſervices, had ſhewn the extenſiveneſs of their capacities. He ſent therefore inſtructions to that miniſter to keep always a guard about his perſon, made him ſuch remittances as were ſufficient to pay his army regularly, and to ſupport the expence neceſſary for preſerving the tranquillity of Greece; he likewiſe ſent immenſe ſums to his mother and relations, as alſo moſt magnificent preſents to his old friends and acquaintance. This bountiful temper of his Olympias looked upon as extravagance, and on this topic ſhe wrote him long and frequent letters, telling him, that though it was fit he ſhould give, and give like a king, yet that ſome bounds ſhould be ſet even to royal munificence. That his rewards did not render men grateful, but rather made them independent: That his favourites were ſo rich, they were continually ſtudying how to engage new dependents; ſo that while they were obliging all men to their ſervice, he was like to have few ſervants left [y]. The king read theſe letters, and knowing the temper of his mother, laid them by carefully, without ever ſpeaking of their contents; only one day it happened, that he opened an epiſtle from [w] Arrian. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alex. & in vit. Demoſthen.

[x] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. [y] Plut. in vit. Alex.

Olympias, when Hephæſtion ſate behind him. Alexander perceived that he read over his ſhoulder, yet he forbad him not; but when himſelf had read the letter out, he took his ſignet off his finger, and clapped it on his favourite's mouth. But the great ground of expoſtulation between Olympias and her ſon was, the king's ſteady refuſal to permit her to have any hand in the regency. But he knew her too well, and was afraid to ſuffer a woman of her intriguing ſpirit to intermeddle with the government. On the other hand Antipater wrote often in the ſame ſtile, lamenting his condition, as being continually expoſed to the artifices and malice of Olympias. When Alexander one day had read a very prolix letter of this nature, and which was written with more than ordinary ſpirit, he could not help ſaying; I wonder Antipater does not know, that one tear of a mother can blot out a thouſand of theſe letters [z]. Thus in the midſt of all the favours of fortune, while he was ſeizing crowns in Aſia, and had them ſent after him from Europe, Alexander found his head little the eaſier, and himſelf as uneaſy in his private family, as any man within the bounds of the numberleſs provinces he had ſubdued. It may be, theſe cares contributed to make him more ready to enter on new expeditions, in hopes of burying private diſquiet in public diſorder, and make the loud tumult of war drown thoſe ſmaller and harſher noiſes which forbad him reſt.

The death of Darius.

On new informations, as to the poſture of Darius's affairs, the king with a body of horſe and light-armed troops ſet out once more on the purſuit, marching as far as Rhages, a city one day's journey from the Caſpian ſtreights; there he underſtood that Darius had paſſed thoſe ſtreights ſome time before, which information leaving him again without hopes, he halted for five days. Oxidates, a Perſian whom Darius had left priſoner at Suſa, was appointed governor of Media, as the king departed on his Parthian expedition. The Caſpian ſtreights he paſſed immediately without oppoſition, and then gave directions for collecting proviſions ſufficient to ſerve his army on a long march through a waſted country. But, before his officers could accompliſh his commands, Bagiſtanes the Babylonian, and Antibelus the ſon of Mazæus came from Darius to acquaint quaint him that Beſſus governor of Bactria, Barzaentes preſident of Arachoſia, and Nabarzanes a general of horſe, had conſpired againſt and made that prince priſoner [a]. Alexander, as ſoon as he heard this, marched with his horſe and a few choſen foot without intermiſſion, except a few hours at noon, ſo that the next morning he entered the camp, from whence theſe noblemen came; there he was further aſſured that Darius was bound in his chariot, that Beſſus had aſſumed the imperial title, and that all the army had ſubmitted to him, except Artabazus, and his ſons, and the Greek mercenaries, who, not being able to hinder what had paſt, left the great road and retired into the mountains. He alſo received advice, that thoſe who had the king in cuſtody had determined, if Alexander continued his purſuit, to deliver him up, and conſult their own ſafety; but if he left it off, they would raiſe as great an army as they could, and ſhare the empire among them. That Beſſus was declared general of the army, at preſent, as well becauſe of the great neceſſity there was for him about Darius's perſon, as becauſe he was taken priſoner in his province. Alexander hearing this, reſolved to continue his march with all poſſible ſpeed; and though his men as well as their horſes were haraſſed with inceſſant labour, he nevertheleſs proceeded, and travelling hard all that night and till noon the next day, arrived at a certain village, where they who led Darius about had pitched their tents the day before; and being there farther aſſured, that they deſigned to march by night, he enquired of the inhabitants, if they knew any nigher road than that by which they fled, that he might the ſooner overtake them? they told him they did; but that it led through a country deſart and deſtitute of water. He notwithſtanding, ordered them to be his guides, and when he underſtood that the foot could not poſſibly keep pace with the horſe in ſo haſty a march, he commanded about five hundred horſe-men to alight, and the captains of foot, and others of their beſt men, ſuch as were heavy armed, to mount their horſes. He alſo ordered Nicanor captain of the targeteers and Attalus commander of the Agrians to march with thoſe who were light-armed along the great road, which Beſſus and his companions had taken. The reſt of the foot were left to follow in order. He ſet forwards at the cloſe of the evening, and proceeded with the utmoſt vigour; and having marched four hundred furlongs that night, early the next morning came up with the Barbarians, who were flying all in diſorder and unarmed. A few of them drew up in ranks, as if they had deſigned to defend themſelves; but the greateſt part at the firſt ſight of Alexander turned their backs without ſtriking one blow; and when few of thoſe who betook themſelves to their arms were cut off and fled, Beſſus and his companions ſtill carried Darius about in a chariot; but perceiving Alexander at hand, Satibarzanes and Barzaentes, after having given him ſeveral grievous wounds, there left him, and with a party of ſix hundred horſe haſted away; ſoon after which Darius, before Alexander had yet ſeen him, died of his wounds [b]. This is the account of Arrian. But Plutarch relates it ſomewhat differently; he informs us, that the king had not with him above threeſcore horſe when he came up with the Barbarians; that they trampled over heaps of rich booty, and even large quantities of ſilver and gold, without offering to alight, that they might if poſſible come up with the foremoſt of the party who were about the chariot of Darius; which at laſt they did, one Polyſtratus being the firſt that perceived him; he making up to the chariot, ſaw the unfortunate king ſtretched at his full length, mortally wounded and gaſping for breath. However, he earneſtly deſired ſome drink. The Macedonian preſenting him with a cup of water, Darius taſted a little of it, and then ſaid, That to receive ſuch a benefit, and not have it in his power to make any return, was the laſt and ſevereſt ſtroke of his ill fortune; however, continued he, Alexander, whoſe kindneſs to my mother, wife, and children may God recompenſe, will doubtleſs gratify thee for thy humanity towards me. When therefore thou ſhalt give him an account of this event, tell him that I gave him my right hand in teſtimony of my ſenſe of his kindneſs. Saying this, he gave his hand to Polyſtratus, and breathed his laſt. Alexander when he ſaw the dead body, covered it with his own cloak, and ordered it to be ſent ſent to Siſygambis, that it might be interred in the royal ſepulchre of the Perſian kings [c].

[z] Idem ibid.

[a] Arrian, lib. iii. c. 21. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alex.

[b] Arrian, ubi ſupra.

As ſoon as Alexander had collected his forces together, and had ſettled the government of Parthia, he entered Hyrcania, and having, according to his wonted cuſtom, committed the groſs of his army with the baggage and carriages to the care of Craterus, he at the head of a choice corps of horſe and foot paſſed through certain craggy roads, while the army took an open and eaſy paſſage, and before their arrival ſtruck all the province with ſuch terror, that all the principal places were put into his hands. Nabarzanes, who was one of the conſpirators againſt Darius ſurrendered himſelf here, ſo did Pharadaphernes, governor of Hyrcania and Parthia. Artabazus and his ſons arrived ſhortly after, and were all graciouſly received; Alexander teſtifying a high reſpect for them on account of their fidelity to Darius. Then the Greek mercenaries, who had fled into the mountains, ſent deputies to deſire that he would pardon what was paſt, and admit them to his ſervice; but the king would not hear of any treaty, becauſe, as he ſaid, they were infamous perſons, who had taken up arms againſt their country, and had obſtinately perſiſted in their rebellion; yet, in conſideration of their behaviour towards their late maſter, he conſented to receive them as priſoners at diſcretion; to which terms they at laſt ſubmitted, beſeeching the king to ſend ſomebody to conduct them to his camp. The king thereupon ſent Andronicus and Artabazus for that purpoſe, and on their arrival treated them with great lenity, receiving them not long after into his ſervice [d].

Hyrcania reduced by Alexander.

THAT burning deſire which Alexander had to become the lord and maſter of every nation, of whom he had the leaſt intelligence, induced him to enter the country of the Mardi, merely becauſe its rocks and barrenneſs had hindered any body hitherto from making a conqueſt of it, or even from attempting it. However, he ſucceeded very happily by dint of a ſtratagem; for giving the neceſſary directions for the march of his forces, he ſuddenly turned back with a body of light-armed troops and choſen horſe, with which he acted ſo vigorouſly, that the Mardi, aſtoniſhed at an expedition they ſo little expected, fled to inacceſſible rocks and caverns, a few only pretending to take up up arms, and they to very little purpoſe; for where-ever they appeared in the plains, the king drove them with his horſe; and when-ever he diſcerned them encamped on the tops of mountains, he ordered all the paſſages to them to be ſo well guarded, that the Barbarians, finding it impoſſible to ſubſiſt, were conſtrained to ſurrender. While he was thus employed, it happened that a party of the Mardi, ſeized and carried off his favourite horſe Bucephalus. No accident could poſſibly have diſturbed the king more than this, for he had an extravagant love for this creature, on account of its ſingular properties and the long ſervice it had done him. He therefore began to hew down all the trees in the neighbourhoood of his camp, and to burn whatever hutts and houſes could be found, cauſing proclamation to be made in the language of the country, whereby he ſignified, that if his horſe was not reſtored without injury, he would burn and deſtroy all things that were capable of feeling the effects of his indignation; which ſo terrified the Mardi, that they ſent back Bucephalus immediately, accompanied with a deputation loaden with preſents, and veſted with full authority to ſubmit the whole nation to the kings pleaſure [e]. Alexander then appointed Autophradates, preſident of the Tapuri, to be governor alſo of this country, and, well ſatisfied with his conqueſt, returned to the main body of his army, where many things required his care, and where the ſoldiers impatiently expected his return, in hopes of having ſome bounds ſet to their labours, and the end of the war talked of at leaſt with ſome degree of certainty [f].

The Mardi reduced.

[c] Plut. in vit. Alex. [d] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 23.

Satibarzanes ſubmits, revolts, and is defeated.

Alexander at his arrival found not only the Grecian mercenaries brought ſafe to his camp by Andronicus, but alſo four Lacedæmonian embaſſadors, with Diopithes the Athenian embaſſador, and many others, cloathed with the like character, who till he was made a priſoner, had attended on Darius. The Lacedæmonians and Athenians he ordered to be kept in ſafe cuſtody; as for the miniſters of ſuch ſtates as had been ſubject to the Perſians, theſe he diſmiſſed, for he thought it but juſt that while any ſtate owned a dependence to another, it ſhould ſend miniſters to recognize that dependence, and to receive inſtructions from the ſovereign. As to the Greek mercenaries, he diſtinguiſhed them

[e] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii. Plut. in vit. Alex. Curt lib. vi. c. 5. [f] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 24.

them thus; ſuch as had been in the ſervice of the Perſian before the Greeks entered into the general alliance for carrying on the war, he ſet at liberty, and left them free to act as they thought fit; but for ſuch as had entered into the Perſian ſervice afterwards, and had knowingly and avowedly fought againſt their country, theſe he ordered to be enliſted and enrolled among his own troops, allowing them, however, the ſame pay which they had heretofore received from Darius, appointing at the ſame time Andronicus, who had negotiated their ſurrender, to be commander in chief of that body which he had taken into his pay [g]. After this he marched to Zeudracarta, the capital of Hyrcania, where for fifteen days he celebrated ſolemn games, and ſacrificed with great magnificence to the gods of Greece; afterwards he entered Aria, and coming to the chief city thereof, Satibarzanes, the governor thereof, came and ſubmitted to him; upon which Alexander continued him in his government, and aſſigned him a guard of Macedonian archers on horſeback commanded by Anaxippus. Here he received advice, that the traitor Beſſus had cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king of Aſia by the name of Artaxerxes; this exceedingly provoked the king, who inſtantly prepared to march after him into Bactria, in order to call him to a ſevere account, for his former treachery and for this his new act of inſolence. He was ſcarce, however, out of the province of Aria before advice came to him, that Satibarzanes, immediately on his departure, had maſſacred Anaxippus and all the Macedonians, and having aſſembled a great body of forces in the neighbourhood of the chief city, which was called Aritoana, was about to declare either for himſelf or for Beſſus, according as he ſhould be encouraged by the ſucceſs of his enterprize; but Alexander was not a prince of a temper capable of allowing time for the ripening of ſuch deſigns; for, as ſoon as he was told this, he marched inſtantly with a body of horſe and light-armed troops, and, travelling ſeventy miles in two days, arrived in the neighbourhood of Aritoana before Satibarzanes had the leaſt intelligence of his march. Then it was this Perſian diſcovered how unfit he himſelf was for the management of ſuch an undertaking; for though he had with him a very conſiderable body of forces, yet, inſtead of attacking Alexander and his troops, fatigued with ſuch an exceſſive march, or of intrenching himſelf himself in order to defend the army under his command, he instantly quitted the field with a body of horse, and fled with all the expedition he was able to Bessus, who willingly received him [h]. Curtius tells us, that thirteen thousand Arians retiring to a high rock, which was absolutely inaccessible, refused to treat with Alexander, in hopes that, seeing it impossible to come at them, he would, when he quitted the country, leave them as he found them. The king, however, took quite a contrary course; for while he with his horse pursued Satibarzanes, Craterus with the foot surrounded the bottom of the rock, and held the Arians in a manner prisoners till Alexander's return. As soon as the king came into the camp, he ordered wood of all sorts to be cut, and having laid a foundation of large billets, reared up a vast pile, till it was even with the rock; the same thing being done on the opposite side, and at each corner, according as the wind served, they set their piles on fire, and the flames being driven violently upon the rock, the people were compelled to throw themselves from thence, some half burnt, others naked; some few who cried out for mercy were saved. Throughout the whole province, Alexander made it his business to search out the chiefs and the accomplices in the rebellion, all of whom he either put to death, or sold for slaves; then he appointed Arsames the son of Artabanus governor of Aria, and thence marched with his army against the Zarangæ, who, under the command of Barzaentes, one of those who had conspired against Darius, were up in arms, and threatened to make an obstinate defence; but their hearts failed them when Alexander drew near, insomuch, that numbers daily falling off, Barzaentes, being afraid they would purchase their own safety at the expence of his, privately withdrew from his camp, and crossing the river Indus, sought shelter among the nations beyond it; but they, either dreading the power of Alexander, or detesting the treachery of this Persian towards his former master, seized and delivered him up; whereupon Alexander immediately ordered him to be put to death, as well for the sake of his own safety, as that he might seem to revenge that perfidy which had been used towards his unfortunate predecessor [i]. But it is now time to quit for a short space the story of foreign wars, in order to turn our eyes on the dissensions, factions, and conspiracies,

[g] Id. ibid. Curt. lib. vi.

[h] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 25. Diodor. ubi supra. Plut. in vit. Alex.
[i] Curt. lib. vi. c. 25. Arrian. ubi supra.

cies, which began to deform that victorious army, wherewith in so short a time the greater part of Asia had been over-run.

Dissensions in the Macedonian army, their causes and effects.

THE first and indeed the grand source of those troubles which embittered Alexander's victories was, the immense treasure acquired by them, and the beneficent temper of Alexander himself. For, while with a lavish hand he bestowed all things on all who were near him, many made a wrong use of his bounty, and foolishly indulged those vices by the practice of which the former possessors of that wealth, which was now theirs, had lost it. Among other instances of Alexander's favourites, Plutarch informs us, that Agnon the Teian wore silver nails in his shoes; that Leonatus employed several camels in transporting powder from Egypt, which he used when he wrestled. Hephæstion wore very rich garments, and affected in every thing the Persian manner of living; but above all Philotas is said to have been nice in his dress, his table, his equipage, and most munificent to his friends; one of whom asking him to lend him a sum of money, he instantly ordered it to be given him by his steward; but the steward affirming there was no money in his coffers, Philotas replied warmly, have you not then plate and cloaths of mine, turn them into money rather than let my friend want [k]. Alexander himself began to be very sensible of the mischiefs that would be produced by the introduction of luxury among his people; he therefore sought to extinguish it by discoursing the most eminent of his courtiers, whom he saw giving into this way of living; he told them, that he was surprized, that they, who had experienced that solid satisfaction which results from an industrious and laborious course of life, should sink into that supineness and indolence which had destroyed the Persians, and which without question would enervate and enfeeble themselves; he told them, that to possess wealth and use it was great and noble, but to make it the instrument of riot and luxury was base and effeminate; he expostulated with them on the impropriety of such a conduct in men who were still soldiers; he asked them, how it could be expected that a man should keep his arms bright, and exercise them with activity, who would not so much as employ the own hands in doing things necessary about his own body, but would rather call in the aid of a servant, as if by gaining riches he had had loſt the uſe of his limbs. By his own behaviour alſo, he to the utmoſt diſcouraged this ſort of lazy and inactive pride; for when at any time he relaxed a little from the toils of war, he diverted himſelf with hunting, in which he could endure not only all the rigour of the ſeaſon, but would alſo faſt ſometimes throughout the whole day. Once when he was engaged in this exerciſe, a lion of a prodigious ſize attacked him; the king defended himſelf with great courage, and at laſt, though with much ado, he ſlew the beaſt; upon which the Lacedæmonian embaſſador made him a well-turned compliment: You have, Sir, ſaid he, vindicated your title to royalty even againſt the lion. Craterus was ſo much pleaſed with this adventure, that he cauſed the whole of it to be expreſſed in figures of braſs by the hands of Lyſippus and Leochares, which noble piece he dedicated in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Yet neither Alexander's diſcourſes nor his actions prevailed; the manners of his courtiers proceeded from bad to worſe, in ſpite of all he could ſay or do to prevent it; and at laſt they proceeded ſo far, as to cenſure his conduct, and to expreſs themſelves with ſome bitterneſs on the ſubject of his long continuance of the war, and his leading them conſtantly from one labour to another. All this at firſt drew no harſher language from Alexander than this: That to do well and to be ill ſpoken of, was becoming the royal dignity. But by degrees, as things went farther, he was obliged to alter his behaviour: for when the whole army was ſplit into factions, and the ſoldiers were ever openly inveighing againſt his adminiſtration, Alexander was under a neceſſity of reproving them, talking to them ſeverely, and of taking other methods to oblige them to keep their ſpeech within the bounds of decency, and their actions within the limits of their duty [l]. Curtius tells us, that, to eradicate this ſpirit of mutiny and to reſtore the antient Macedonian diſcipline, he was forced to cauſe fire to be ſet to the ſpoils collected by the ſoldiers, and reduce them all to aſhes [m], which, however, is very incredible; and therefore we prefer Plutarch's account of this matter. He ſays, that when he led his army out of Hyrcania, he perceived in them an unwillingneſs to follow him, that is, he firſt perceived in them that ſullen diſreſpectful humour which generally precedes mutiny. Upon this occaſion he had not recourſe either to harſh words or ſevere uſage;

[k] Plut. in vit. Alex. & in Orat. de Fortuna Alex.

[l] Diodor. Sicul. ubi. ſupra. Plut. in loc. citat. [m] Curt. lib. vi. c. 6.

uſage; but having ſummoned the ſoldiers to an aſſembly, he in a long and eloquent harangue gave them to underſtand. "That hitherto the Barbarians had ſeen them no otherwiſe "than as it were in a dream; and if they ſhould think of "returning when they had only alarmed Aſia, and not "conquered it, thoſe Barbarians would ſet upon them and "deſtroy them like ſo many women. However, he "would detain none of them againſt their will, but give "ſuch as deſired it free liberty to return; but withal pro-"teſted againſt thoſe who ſhould be ſo mean-ſpirited, as "to deſert him and his friends, and thoſe who were willing "to fight under him ſtill in an enterprize ſo great and glo-"rious, as it would be to make the Macedonians lords of "the habitable world." What the reſult of this exhortation was, the ſame author informs us from a letter written by Alexander to Antipater, wherein is thus expreſſed: "That when he had ſpoken to them after this manner, "they unanimouſly cried out, they were ready to go with "him whitherſoever he ſhould be pleaſed to lead them [n]" From this time forward, however, Alexander began to alter his conduct, and, by giving himſelf a little into the cuſtoms of the orientals, endeavoured to ſecure that obedience from his new ſubjects, which he found it ſo difficult to preſerve among his old ones; he likewiſe endeavoured to blend the cuſtoms of the Aſiatics and the Greeks by various methods. The form of his civil government reſembled that of the antient Perſian kings: in military affairs, however, he preſerved the Macedonian diſcipline; but then he made choice of thirty thouſand boys out of the provinces, whom he cauſed to be inſtructed in the Greek tongue, and directed to be brought up in ſuch a manner, as that from time to time he might with them fill up the phalanx. The Macedonians ſaw with great concern theſe extraordinary meaſures, which ſuited very indifferently with their groſs underſtandings; for they thought after all this fighting to be abſolute lords of Aſia, and to poſſeſs not only the riches of its inhabitants, but to rule over the inhabitants themſelves. Whereas they ſaw plainly, that Alexander meant no ſuch thing; but that, on the contrary, he conferred governments, offices at court, and all other marks marks both of confidence and favour indiſcriminately on the Perſians and Greeks. Plutarch has taken great pains to inculcate a notion of Alexander's doing this from a principle of exalted virtue, and from an earneſt deſire of uniting, as it were in marriage, the people of the two great continents, Europe and Aſia. Of this he ſpeaks everywhere in raptures, as of the moſt ſublime and glorious kind of philoſophy, invented and practiſed by Ariſtotle's royal pupil, that he might ſpread peace, plenty, and politeneſs over the face of the whole earth; with this ſingle proviſo, however, that the earth own no maſter but him. But it may be, that Plutarch thought more of this matter than Alexander, ſince, without having recourſe to any ſuch ſublime principles, we can account for his conduct in as ſatisfactory a manner. Wealth and pleaſure were the ends for which the groſs of his army had undergone ſuch exceſſive fatigues; and now when thoſe were in their power, they did not greatly care to fight any longer. Dominion and fame were what Alexander had in view, and finding that theſe could ſcarce be ſecured by an army already full of diſſenſion, he began to turn his eyes on thoſe whom he had ſubdued, and to expect from them as much as had been performed hitherto by the Macedonians, as if all men were capable of all things under his auſpice [o].

[n] Plut in vit. Alex.

A conſpiracy againſt the life of Alexander diſcovered.

With all theſe mighty deſigns in his head, a conſpiracy was formed in his camp in order to take him off, before any of them could be carried into execution; this conſpiracy, like moſt others, was by thoſe who were concerned in it, involved in ſuch obſcurity, that few were able to know what to make of it even at the time it broke out; and authors have related its circumſtances ſo variouſly, that it is very difficult to give a tolerable and conſiſtent account of it from the lights they afford us. Our old guide Arrian was as much in the dark as the reſt, and, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, met with different relations under the hand of the ſame author. In ſo perplexed a buſineſs, we ſhall draw out as clear and diſtinct a detail of facts as we can, and, having furniſhed the beſt materials in our power, ſhall leave our readers to decide for themſelves. One Dymnus a Macedonian, of no great rank in the army, having determined in [o] Arrian. lib. iii. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Curt. lib. v. 6. Juſtin. lib. xi. Plut. in orat. de fortun. & virt. Alexand.

in his mind to kill Alexander, communicated his deſign to one Nicomachus, a young man for whom he had a great love, earneſtly inviting him to bear a part in the action; the lad, terrified at the very mention of it, revealed it to Cebalinus his brother, whom Plutarch calls Balinus; and he, eager to ſave his brother and himſelf, was reſolved to make a diſcovery; but inaſmuch as Dymnus had told Nicomachus, that thoſe who were concerned in this plot would execute it in three days, Cebalinus went to court, out of an apprehenſion, that if his brother was ſeen there, it might alarm the conſpirators, and engage them to execute their purpoſe before proper meaſures could be taken to prevent it. When Cebalinus came to the royal quarters, the firſt perſon of diſtinction he met with was Philotas, to whom he diſcloſed this matter, and begged him to bring him to the king. This was eaſy for him to have done, becauſe he was twice a-day admitted to the royal preſence; however, he omitted it, though he had a very long conference with the king that very day. The next day Cebalinus ſolicited him again, when Philotas told him, that he had no opportunity of ſpeaking of it to the king, but promiſed him that he would do it ſpeedily; yet he omitted it throughout this day alſo. Whereupon Cebalinus, growing impatient, and doubting with himſelf if this ſhould come to the king's ear any other way, his own and his brother's life would be in danger, applied himſelf to one of the king's pages, and having intimated to him what the diſcovery was which he was deſirous to make, received directions from him to hide himſelf in the armoury, together with a promiſe, that the king ſhould be acquainted with it when he was in the bath; which was accordingly done. When Alexander had heard all the page knew, and was farther acquainted, that Cebalinus himſelf was in the armoury, he ſent for him, and heard from his own mouth, not only all that Nicomachus's brother had told him, but alſo how Philotas had trifled with him, and had for two days together concealed this matter from his knowledge. The king, extremely offended, ordered Dymnus to be ſeized, and Philotas to be ſent for to him [p]. The former, as ſoon as he

[p] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut in vit. Alex.

he was apprehended, ſtabbed himſelf ſo deſperately, that he died juſt as he was brought into the king's preſence, or, as others ſay, was killed in his own tent by him who went to apprehend him, becauſe he ſtood on his defence. However it was, he died without being examined, or making any confeſſion, which gave the king great diſquiet, who fancied, that if the man had been brought to him alive, he might one way or other have drawn from him the whole ſecret. As it was, he ſent for Philotas, and taxed him with perfidy, for not informing him of Cebalinus's diſcovery: Philotas excuſed himſelf, by affirming that the ſtory ſeemed to him altogether improbable, and that he was unwilling to fill his head with needleſs fears and ſuſpicions; as he ſaid this, he threw himſelf at the king's feet and embraced his knees; and it is ſaid the king gave him his hand in token of forgiveneſs. Indeed it is very probable, that Alexander thought himſelf bound to paſs by ſuch a neglect, in a perſon who had ſerved him faithfully, whoſe father had done ſuch important ſervices to his father and himſelf, and who had loſt two brothers in fighting his quarrels [q]. At ſupper Philotas was invited, and the king talked to him as familiarly as he was wont to do; but it ſeems he retired early, and went to bed. When he was gone, ſome who were about the king, Curtius mentions expreſly Craterus for one, began to infuſe it into Alexander's head, that Dymnus could never be the prime author of ſo extraordinary an attempt, but muſt have been influenced thereto by perſons of ſuperior rank. That it looked very ſuſpicious in Philotas never to diſcloſe any thing of this matter, nor to take any meaſures for ſeizing the conſpirators. That in things of leſs importance pity and tenderneſs might interfere; but that where the king's life lay at ſtake, and in him the fortune of Macedon, compaſſion was no virtue, but rather a kind of treaſon, it being the duty of every loyal ſubject to ſacrifice all private conſiderations to the peace and ſafety of his prince. By ſuch diſcourſes they extorted, as it were, from the king an order to ſeize Philotas, and put him to the queſtion. Which when they went to execute, they found him faſt aſleep; however, they waked him, and put him in irons, at which he is ſaid to have burſt out into this exclamation:

[q] Curt. lib. vi. Arrian. lib. iii.

on; O! my prince, the malice of my enemies hath overcome thy inclination to mercy. When he was first put to the rack, he denied every thing; but at last, unable to bear the pain, he impeached many, and amongst the rest his father. In all likelihood, he said any thing that he thought would deliver him from his torments [r].

Philotas first tortured, then put to death.

CURTIUS gives us a fuller, and we should say a better account of this matter, if we could at all rely on the harangues inserted in his writings; but these have evidently so rhetorical a turn, that it is difficult to conceive how they should have proceeded from the mouths of persons so strongly agitated by their passions. It is, however, probable and consistent with the best historians, that Philotas was brought to an open trial according to the laws and customs of the Macedonians, wherein he was charged by the king with having a hand in Dymnus's conspiracy. Against this charge he made a long and laboured defence; he said, that his father and himself, with his brothers, Nicanor and Hector, who were now no more, had often hazarded their lives in the king's service, and had some share in the victories purchased by the valour of the Macedonians: that the conspiracy of Dymnus no ways reached him, his name having never been mentioned by any of the accomplices impeached by Nicomachus; he observed, that it was highly improbable, if he had any concern in the plot, that he should suffer Cebalinus to remain two days at court at full liberty to apply himself to others; he acknowledged his offence in not acquainting the king sooner with the discovery, and then addressing himself, as it were, to Alexander, whom he conceived to be within hearing, though he affected not to be present, he put him in mind that he had immediately implored his clemency, that he had given him his hand as a pledge of his pardon, and had invited him to his table; his own innocence and the king's assuring him of mercy had so quieted his mind, that, as he remarked, those who came to seize him had much ado to awake him; he therefore conjured the king not to abandon him to his enemies, nor to suffer them to triumph at once over an innocent man and the word of a merciful prince. Alexander, however, pretended to leave all things to the assembly, and they, managed by the capital enemies of Philotas, adjudged him to the torture, and afterwards, upon the confeſſion extorted from him by the pains he then endured, to death [s], which he ſuffered, as Arrian informs us, by being ſtruck through with darts by the ſoldiers [t]. Curtius ſays, that according to the manner of the Macedonians they ſtoned him [u]. Diodorus tells us, that he was puniſhed as a traitor according to the cuſtom of his country [w]. All agree that he was put to death, and that his execution was attended with many conjectures and ſuſpicions that he fell rather through the effects of private malice, than by the ſtroke of public juſtice.

[r] Arrian. Diodor. Plut. ubi supra.

The certainty of this plot diſcuſſed.

THOSE who have ſought to excuſe Alexander from the imputations which the death of Philotas and its conſequences drew upon him, have ſuggeſted in their accounts many things, which, if they were true, would certainly prove that Philotas was an indiſcreet and ambitious man at leaſt, if not a traitor. They alledge that he affected a pomp in his manner of living, a ſplendor in his equipage, a nicety at his table, a complaiſance for his friends, a large and ſwelling retinue, and in fine, many other things inconſiſtent with the moderation which ought to be obſerved by a ſubject. They ſay, that many years before he had diſcovered a contempt of the king, and a very high idea of his father's merit and his own; that after the battle of Iſſus, growing paſſionately enamoured of one Antigona of Pydna, a very handſome woman, who as a priſoner, fell to his ſhare; he ſaid to her in his cups, What was Philip, but Parmenio? What was Alexander, but Philotas [x]? Which being talked of by the woman, came at laſt to Craterus's ear, who introduced Antigona to Alexander, to whom ſhe told this and many other things, and received a ſtrict charge from the king to continue a ſpy on Philotas's words and actions. It is likewiſe alledged, that Parmenio himſelf was not a little diſpleaſed with his conduct, and would often give him this caution; My ſon appear leſs [y]. But theſe tales carry their refutations in themſelves; if Philotas's behaviour had been ſo generally offenſive, he would not ſurely have held his command, and with it the confidence of the king till till this buſineſs of Dymnus. If Antigona could bring herſelf not only to impeach a man who loved her, but to remain with him in order to extract his ſecrets, ſhe muſt have been of a diſpoſition unworthy of belief. Beſides, Craterus was the capital enemy of Philotas, and her being brought by him to the king renders the whole buſineſs very ſuſpicious: If Parmenio's caution to his ſon reflects at all upon his conduct, it certainly juſtifies the father, and yet we ſhall ſee he eſcaped no better than his ſon. On the whole, Arrian tells us from Ptolemy, that Philotas was once tried and acquitted; but that upon ſome new diſcoveries he was a ſecond time impeached and convicted [z]. However it was, after putting him to death, the king thought it not fit to let Parmenio ſurvive him long; he therefore diſpatched letters by Polydamas one of his friends, to Cleander, Sitacles, and Menidas, who commanded under Parmenio in Media, with orders to take him off, which accordingly they did; and, if we may believe Curtius, in a very extraordinary manner. He ſays, that Polydamus, who undertook the management of this matter, was Parmenio's deareſt and moſt intimate friend; he carried with him not only a letter from the king to that general, but alſo another written in a hand like that of Philotas and ſealed with his ſeal. When he arrived in Media, and had communicated the king's orders to Cleander and his aſſociates, they concerted all things together, and the next day preſented Parmenio with his letters as he was walking in his park, where while he was commending the king and looking on the letter which he ſuppoſed came from his ſon, Cleander ſtabbed him in the ſide, then in the throat, his companions afterwards ſhamefully mangling the dead body; at laſt Cleander cut off the head and ſent it to Alexander, the miſerable remains being mournfully interred by the ſoldiers [a].

[s] Curt. lib. vi. c. 19—23. [t] ubi ſupra. [u] ubi ſupra. [w] ubi ſupra. [x] Plut. in Orat. de virtut. Alex. [y] Idem in vit. Alex.

Conſequences of theſe proceedings.

THESE executions made way for more diſcoveries or pretended diſcoveries. Amyntas the ſon of Andromenes, Attalus, and Symmias, all brethren, were ſeized on account of their intimacy with Philotas, and becauſe their fourth brother Polemon had fled to the enemy; they were brought to an open trial, and Amyntas defended himſelf ſo well, that they were all acquitted; after which [z] Arrian. ubi ſupra.

[a] Curt. lib. vi. Arrian, ubi ſupra.

Amyntas desired Alexander's leave to go and search for his brother, which was granted him, and he accordingly brought him back, which was thought a convincing proof that they were all innocent; this is Arrian's account; Curtius carries the matter still farther; he gives us the defence of Amyntas at large, and informs us, that while he was in the midst of it, Polemon was brought in prisoner by those who were sent in pursuit of him. When he came to speak, he told the assembly very frankly, that his intimacy with Philotas was the reason that he fled; that he was so terrified with the thoughts of the tortures that unfortunate person had suffered, that he left the camp; and that having lost his companions on the road, while he deliberated with himself whether he had best proceed or return back, he was taken. Demetrius, one of the king's guards, fell also into suspicion, and orders were dispatched into Macedonia, directing, that Alexander Lyncestes, who had been some years a prisoner, should be put to death; his friendship with Antigonus had hitherto preserved his life, but now he was given up to slaughter [b]. These things disturbed the army very much, especially the Macedonians, who though they adored the royal virtues of Alexander, did not think themselves obliged to be in love with his vices; they therefore did not content themselves with speaking very freely, but wrote home to their friends their thoughts of the present state of affairs, the king's suspicions of his friends, and his inclination to hunt out enemies at the very extremities of the world. Alexander, having intercepted these letters and taken the best information he could, he picked out these dissatisfied people, and having disposed them into one corps, gave it the title of the turbulent battalion [c], and appointed Leonidas to command it; hoping by this means to stop the contagion, and to prevent this spirit of disaffection from spreading through the whole army.

Having provided against future conspiracies, he pursues his former designs.

As a farther precaution against any future conspiracy, Alexander thought fit to appoint two generals of the auxiliary horse, being apprehensive, that if this authority was lodged in the hands of a single person, it might prompt him to dangerous undertakings, and at the same time furnish him with the means of carrying them into execution.

[b] Arrian. Curt. ubi supra.

[c] Ἀτάκτων τάγμα.

execution. Hepheſtion and Clytus were therefore appointed joint commanders of theſe horſe, nor can the king be juſtly blamed for this caution, if it be ſuppoſed that Alexander Lynceſtes, and Philotas were juſtly puniſhed [d]. To keep his forces in action, he ſuddenly marched into the country of the Euergetæ, i. e. benefactors. This is an inſtance of that ſtrange way of writing, into which, out of a fondneſs for their own language, the Greeks conſtantly ran; it is impoſſible that this nation ſhould have been really called by this name; the truth is, that it is no more than a tranſlation of a Perſian name beſtowed upon them by Cyrus, and it would have been well, if any of the Greek hiſtorians or geographers had preſerved this Perſian name. Arrian tells us, that they were before called Agriaſpæ, and Diodorus calls them by two different names; ſuch differences are common in Greek writers, nor is it eaſy to diſcover which is the true or the beſt reading. Theſe people were celebrated for their wiſdom, beneficence, and politeneſs. When Cyrus the founder of the Perſian empire marched this way againſt the Scythians, his army was grievouſly diſtreſſed for want of proviſion, inſomuch, that they were compelled to eat each other; from this deplorable ſtate they were relieved by the kindneſs of this nation, who brought thirty thouſand loads of proviſion of all ſorts into the camp. Cyrus, in conſideration of this extraordinary act of generoſity, honoured them with ſome Perſian appellation equivalent to the Greek term Euergetæ. Alexander found their ſucceſſors full of the ſame kind of hoſpitable diſpoſition; he therefore treated them with great reſpect, and ſtaying among them ſome ſmall time in order to celebrate a feſtival to Apollo, he at his departure added to their dominions ſome lands, which lay contiguous, and which for that reaſon they had requeſted of him [e]. Turning then to the eaſt, he entered Arachoſia, the inhabitants of which ſubmitted without giving him any trouble; whereupon he appointed Memnon to be governor of theſe provinces, as Arrian aſſures us, though Diodorus affirms that he appointed Tiridates. While he paſſed his winter in theſe parts, the king received advice, that the Arians whom he had ſo lately ſubdued, were again up in arms, Satibarzanes being returned into that country with two thouſand horſe aſſigned him by Beſſus. Alexander inſtantly diſpatched Artabazus the Perſian with Erigyus and Caranus, two of his commanders, with a conſiderable body of horſe and foot; he likewiſe ordered Phrataphernes, to whom he had given the government of Parthia, to accompany them. Theſe, with all convenient ſpeed, marched back into Aria, where Satibarzanes met them with a well-appointed army; a general engagement enſued, wherein the Arians behaved very well, as long as their commander Satibarzanes lived; but he engaging Erigyus, the Macedonian ſtruck him firſt into the throat, and then drawing forth his ſpear again through the mouth, ſo that he immediately expired, and with him the courage of his ſoldiers, who inſtantly began to fly, ſo that Alexander's commanders made an eaſy conqueſt of the reſt of the country, and ſettled it effectually under his obedience[f] (R).

[d] Arrian, lib. iii. c. 27. [e] Arrian ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Curt. lib. vii, c. 9. Juſtin. lib. xii. c. 5.

The

[f] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 28. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Curt. lib. vii. c. 17.

(R) There is nothing more warmly complained of by the critics, than the vaſt miſtakes and inſuperable difficulties, which occur in the deſcriptions of rivers, mountains, provinces, &c. in antient authors. Without queſtion, theſe complaints are not altogether groundleſs, and yet, from a ſtrict compariſon of the antients with each other and with the relations of modern travellers, we are induced to believe, that there is not always ſufficient authority for thoſe vehement declamations, which ſome, in order to paſs for great geographers, have made, not only againſt Curtius, but againſt Arrian and Diodorus, on account of their ſuppoſed errors in theſe matters. To touch on this ſubject, as often as we meet with theſe complaints in the commentaries of late writers on thoſe who have lived ages before them, would lead us into a prolixity, alike troubleſome to ourſelves and tedious to our readers; to ſay nothing on this head at all might betray our own want of care, and leave them in great perplexity. We ſhall therefore, once for all, lay down the reaſons which have induced us to pay a greater regard than is uſually done to the deſcriptions met with in antient authors, and the motives which have led us to paſs this ſentence on thoſe who have treated the antients in another manner. Arrian, in his account of Alexander's march through Paropamiſis, tells us, that it was performed with the utmoſt toil and difficulty, his ſoldiers paſſing through deep ſnows, and enduring all the extremities of want (48). Diodorus ſpeaks more largely of theſe difficulties; but

(48) Arrian. lib. iii.

THE king, notwithſtanding the inclemency of the ſeaſon, advanced into the country of Paropamiſis, ſo called from the mountain Paropamiſus, which the ſoldiers of Alexander called Caucaſus. We are told by Diodorus, that he found the country for the moſt part open and plain, without trees, covered with ſnow, having large open boroughs ſcattered here and there. The houſes in which the inhabitants dwelt, but as we have inſerted what he ſays in the text (49), there is no neceſſity of repeating it here. Curtius has followed Diodorus exactly (50); Strabo in his geography agrees very well with what the reſt (51) ſay, and yet it has been ſurmiſed, that they are every one miſtaken; and on account of this province lying between the thirty-fourth and thirty-ſeventh degrees of latitude, it has been aſſerted, that the cold could not be greater there than in Italy or Greece; yet Tavernier (52), and in general all the travellers that ſpeak either of this province, or of places near it, agree, that in the winter it is exceſſive cold; that the ſnow renders it almoſt impaſſable, and that it is to this very time as barren of wood, as it is deſcribed to be by the before-mentioned authors. Perhaps it might be very poſſible to aſſign the natural cauſes of ſuch ſevere winters in theſe parts, but there is no neceſſity of doing that; for if the matter of fact be, as the antients have deſcribed it, it fully juſtifies them and us in following them. To ſay the truth, the moderns have been too aſſuming, and without proper grounds; it is but very lately that we knew either the true form or the exact ſituation of the Caſpian ſea, and yet the miſtakes of the antients about it have been cenſured long ago, and with great quickneſs. The ſource of all this is too great a dependance on theoretick knowledge, and an abſurd affectation of not believing what we cannot bring to ſquare with our hypothetic notions. One would have thought, that an error of the antients might have taught us to have acted with greater caution and modeſty in this way; we know, that the moſt learned men of all ſects and ages were of opinion, that the torrid zone was abſolutely uninhabitable, and very fair and plauſible reaſons they produced for their opinion; and yet experience has convinced us, that they were abſolutely miſtaken; and if they were, why may not we? In matters of fact, the evidence neceſſary to conviction is of a different nature than in matters of ſpeculation; and therefore it was, and will be everlaſtingly wrong to exclude authentic relations, becauſe they do not concur with our favourite theories.

Continues his marches in the moſt rigorous ſeaſons, and through the moſt barren countries.

(49) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii. (50) Curt. lib. vii. c. 3.
(51) Strab. Geogr. lib. xiii p. 723. (52) Voyag. de Tavernier, Vol. I. Tit. Hiſtoire de Candahar.

dwelt were covered with tiles; the roof riſing up like a ſpire, but open at the top, whereby they received light and let out the ſmoke; the walls of theſe were ſo well built, and the mortar made uſe of for them ſo excellently tempered, that they had in them no flaws or cracks, but were perfectly ſecured from the inclemency of the air. In them therefore the people dwelt all the winter, having ſtore of all ſorts of proviſions laid up, and having previouſly ſecured their vines and other fruit trees, by covering them with matts, from the effects of the froſt. In their marches through this melancholy plain, the Macedonians were expoſed to vaſt inconveniencies, the reflection of the light from the ſnow and ice grievouſly affecting their eyes, and the exceſſive cold ſeizing ſuch as, through wearineſs, either walked ſlow, or ſat down; and many of them periſhed. Alexander, however, pleaſing himſelf with the hopes of having reached Caucaſus, in ſixteen days marching croſs Paropamiſus, came at length to an opening leading into Media, which, finding of a ſufficient breadth, he directed a city to be built there, which he called Alexandria, as alſo ſeveral other towns about a days journey from thence; and in theſe places he left thirty thouſand perſons, part of them ſuch as had hitherto followed his camp, and part of his mercenary ſoldiers, who, weary of continual fatigue, were content to dwell here. Having thus ſettled things in this province, he ſacrificed ſolemnly to the gods, and appointed Proexes the Perſian preſident thereof, with a ſmall body of troops under the command of Niloxenus to aſſiſt him, he reſumed his former deſign of penetrating into Bactria [g] (S).

Bessus

[g] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 28, 29. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Curt. lib. vii. c. 15.

(S) We have omitted in the text a very remarkable inſtance of the inequality of Alexander's temper, and of that ſavage cruelty which in ſpite of his many virtues ſtill lurked in his breaſt. The reaſon of our omitting it was, becauſe we find nothing of it in Arrian; the reaſon of our inſerting of it here is, its having been approved by the beſt compilers of hiſtory, though it is found in Curtius. It muſt be owned, that there is a chaſm in Diodorus, wherein for ought we know this ſtory might have been inſerted. However it be, the reader ought to find it ſomewhere, and therefore we have made it the ſubject of a note, "While the king expected Beſſus to be brought "to Bessus, who with the imperial ornaments had aſſumed the title of Artaxerxes, when he was aſſured that Alexander was Alexander reduces Bactria and Sogdia, Beſſus being taken.

" to him, he came to a little town inhabited by the Branchidæ.
" Theſe were a family of Mileſians, removed thither by " Xerxes on account of their putting into his hands the ſacred " treaſure repoſed in the temple of Apollo Didymæus. They " had not quite forſaken the cuſtoms of their antient country,
" but their language was a ſort of medley, made up of their " own and that of the country they now inhabited. They ex-" preſſed a great deal of joy at the king's arrival, and readily ſur-
" rendered both themſelves and their town to him. Hereupon
" Alexander called together the Mileſians that ſerved in his army.
" Now we muſt obſerve, that the Mileſians bore an old grudge
" to the Branchidæ. The king therefore referred it to them,
" whether they would conſider their extraction, or revenge
" their former injury; and as they varied in their opinions, he " told them he would adviſe with himſelf what was beſt to " be done in the matter. The next day, when the deputies " from the Branchidæ came to meet him, he commanded them
" to attend him, and being come to the town, he entered " the gates thereof with part of his army, and ordered the " phalanx to ſurround the place, and upon the ſignal given, to " pillage the receptacle of traitors, and put them all to the " ſword. Theſe poor wretches, being in a defenceleſs condition,
" were every-where butchered, and neither conformity of lan" guage, the humble poſture of ſuppliants, nor the moſt fervent " entreaty could put a ſtop to their authorized cruelty. The " very foundations of the walls were dug up, that there might " not be the leaſt footſteps left of the town. Their fury did not
" ſtop here, for they not only cut down the conſecrated wood,
" but alſo grubbed up the very roots thereof, that there might " be nothing left but a barren waſte ſolitude. Now, had their " cruelty been practiſed on the firſt tranſgreſſors, it might have " been thought a juſt puniſhment of their crime; but here po-
" ſterity is puniſhed for the ſins of its forefathers, without ever " having ſo much as ſeen Miletum, far from being able to betray
" it to Xerxes (53)." There is a paſſage in Strabo which ſeems to confirm what is here related by Curtius; he is deſcribing Bactria, and from thence takes occaſion to ſpeak of Alexander's exploits there and in Sogdia; and amongſt other things relates this: " Finding here-abouts the city of the Bran-
" chidæ, he demoliſhed it. Theſe people followed Xerxes out
" of

(53) Curt. lib. vii. c. 21.

Year after the flood 2670. Before Christ 329.

was marching towards him, immediately began to waste all the country between Paropamisus and the river Oxus, which river he passed with his forces, and then burnt all the vessels he had made use of for transporting them, retiring to Nautaca a city of Sogdia, fully pursuaded that, by the precautions he had taken, Alexander would be compelled to give over his pursuit. This conduct of his, however, disheartened his troops, and gave the lye to all his pretensions; for he had affected to censure Darius's conduct, and had charged him with cowardice, in not defending the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, whereas he now quitted the banks of the most defensible river perhaps in the whole world. As to his hopes, though it cannot be said, they were ill founded, yet they proved absolutely vain; for Alexander continuing his march, notwithstanding all the hardships his soldiers sustained, reduced all Bactria under his obedience, particularly the capital Bactra and the strong castle Aornus; in the latter he placed a garrison under the command of Archelaus, but the government of the province

" of their own country, after having betrayed to him the treasures " of Apollo Didymæus; but Alexander, to express his abomination " of their sacrilege and treason, razed their city (54)." In several other places this author assures us, that the Branchidæ did betray these treasures into the hands of Xerxes, and followed him into Asia. Yet Herodotus seems to give another account of this matter, for he ascribes the plundering of this temple, and reducing it to ashes, to Darius the father of Xerxes; and tells us farther, that all the Milesian prisoners were conducted to Susa, from whence Darius, without any other ill usage, sent them to inhabit the city of Ampe, seated near the mouth of the river Tigris (55). Perhaps the Branchidæ were at this time left behind, and, after the temple was repaired, and the oracle restored, betrayed the treasures to Xerxes on his return from the Grecian war, when he seized all the wealth laid up in temples, to indemnify him for the loss he sustained in that unsuccessful expedition. However, if Alexander really massacred the people, as well as demolished their town, Curtius had reason to reflect, as he does on the proceeding, which was flagrantly cruel and unjust.

(54) Strab. Geogr. lib. xiv. p. 518. (55) Herodot. lib. vi.

vince he committed to Artabazus [h]. He continued his march then to the river Oxus, on the banks of which when he arrived, he found it three quarters of a mile over, its depth more than proportionable to ſuch a breadth, its bottom ſandy, and its ſtream ſo rapid, as to render it almoſt unnavigable; neither boat nor tree in its neighbourhood, ſo that the ableſt commanders in the Macedonian army were of opinion, that they ſhould be obliged to march back. The king, however, having firſt ſent away under a proper eſcort all his infirm and worn-out ſoldiers, that they might be conducted ſafe to the ſea-ports and from thence to Greece, deviſed a method of paſſing this river without either boat or bridge. He ordered the ſkins, of which the Macedonians made their tents, to be made into a kind of bags, and to be ſtuffed with certain light and buoyant matter; then they were rolled and ſtrongly ſtitched to prevent the water from breaking in; by the help of theſe he paſſed over his whole army in five days, and marched directly towards the camp of Beſſus, where when he arrived, he found it abandoned; but received at the ſame time letters from Spitamenes and Dataphernes, who were the chief commanders under Beſſus, ſignifying, that if he would ſend a ſmall party to receive him, they would put Beſſus into his hands. Alexander thereupon diſpatched Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus with three ſquadrons of the auxiliary horſe, a party of archers, the battalion of foot which had been commanded by Philotas and a conſiderable corps of light-armed troops to receive the priſoner; and Ptolemy having in four days paſſed over as much ground as might have taken up ten, arrived within an ordinary day's march of Spitamenes. There he received advice, that Spitamenes and Dataphernes were not thoroughly reſolved whether they themſelves ſhould put Beſſus into his hands; whence he, rightly judging that they would be glad to have that done by force, which by fraud they were afraid to do, put himſelf at the head of his horſe, and by a quick march ſurrounded the village in which Beſſus had been left with a few ſoldiers. As ſoon as he had done this, Ptolemy ordered proclamation to be made, that the inhabitants of the place had nothing to fear, if they delivered up Beſſus. This had the wiſhed-for effect, the people reſolved not to ſuffer ſuffer for the ſake of ſo wicked a perſon; they therefore opened their gates, and Ptolemy entering ſeized Beſſus [i]. Curtius has given quite another account of this matter; and there are other accounts which differ from his; but it ſeems to us impertinent to trouble the reader with any but this, becauſe we are convinced that it is the true one [k]. Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus took him: from the memoirs of this Ptolemy we have the account before given: To what end therefore ſhould we have recourſe to other memoirs, the materials of which muſt have been collected at ſecond hand? When Ptolemy had him in his power, he ſent advice thereof to the king, and deſired to know after what manner he ſhould be brought to him. Alexander returned for anſwer, that he ſhould be brought chained and naked, and that in this condition he ſhould be placed on the right hand ſide of the road, by which he was to march with his army. This being accordingly performed, Alexander, as he paſſed by him, ordered his chariot to ſtop, and with a loud voice aſked him, What could induce you to ſeize upon Darius, your ſovereign and friend, who had always deſerved well at your hands? and what, after you had ſeized and led him about priſoner, could tempt you to murder him in ſo baſe a manner? To whom Beſſus anſwered, That it was not his act, nor done by his advice alone; but was performed by the joint conſent of all who were preſent, from an opinion, that it would procure them the favour of Alexander. The king ordered him to be whipt; directed the queſtion he had aſked to be proclaimed aloud throughout the army, and then commanded that Beſſus ſhould be conducted priſoner into Bactria [l]. A ſupply of horſes being now arrived, and the Macedonian cavalry being remounted, Alexander continued his march to Maracandá, the capital of Sogdia, from whence he advanced to the river Iaxartes, called by Arrian and the reſt of the hiſtorians who have written his life, Tanais, but doubtleſs without any foundation; for beſides a very large tract of land on this ſide, and a much larger on the other, the whole breadth of the Caſpian ſea is between that part part of the river Iaxartes, to which he came, and the fall of the Tanais into the Palus Mæotis. It is true, that Arrian diſtinguiſhes between this Tanais and that, which ſhews he had more ſkill in geography than the reſt; but we ſtill want a proof, that the Iaxartes was ever called Tanais by any but Alexander's ſoldiers, who were fond of impoſing falſe names to flatter their own vanity, and amuſe the reſt of mankind. On the ſide of this river, as ſome of his troops were foraging they were ſurprized by the Barbarians, and a conſiderable number of Macedonian horſe ſlain. After which exploit between twenty and thirty thouſand of theſe rude people betook themſelves to a high rock, the aſcent of which was on all ſides ſteep and rugged, in hopes that there they ſhould be ſafe from Alexander's ſoldiers. But the king, as ſoon as he received advice of what had happened, marched thither with his horſe and light-armed troops, and notwithſtanding the danger and difficulty of the attack, led his troops in perſon to aſcend the rock. The Barbarians, having ſo great an advantage from the ſituation of the place and fighting alſo for their lives, repulſed the Macedonians more than once; at laſt, however, notwithſtanding the king himſelf was wounded in the leg, ſo as to have the ſmaller of his ſhin bones broken, the Macedonians carried it, compelling numbers of theſe unhappy wretches to throw themſelves over the rock, ſlaying without mercy thoſe that fell into their hands, ſo that of the multitude retiring thither not above eight thouſand eſcaped [m].

[h] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 30.

[i] Arrian. lib. iii. c. 30. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alex.

[k] Curt. lib. vii. c. 22.

[l] Arrian. ubi ſupra.

Subdues certain rebels.

WITHIN a few days after, the Abii, a famous Scythian people, ſent embaſſadors to Alexander to deſire peace; with them came embaſſadors from the European Scythians; to theſe he gave fair words, and ſent ſome of his own people home with them under colour of concluding the negotiations; but in truth to bring him advice of the ſituation of the country, the nature of its inhabitants, their force, and after what manner they made war. The Scythians having ſome notion of what he deſigned, that is, the Scythians whom he had already ſubdued, and being alſo informed, that he had projected the building of a city to keep them in awe, they at once took up up arms, cut off his garriſons, and joined with the diſcontented Bactrians and Sogdians. As ſoon as Alexander was informed of this, he directed his ſeveral battalions of infantry to furniſh themſelves with ladders, which as ſoon as they had done, he marched inſtantly towards Gaza, the neareſt city of ſeven which the Barbarians had ſeized. At the ſame time he diſpatched Craterus to Cyropolis, the greateſt of theſe cities, into which moſt of the Barbarians had retired, commanding him to encamp nigh the walls, to draw a ditch or rampart round the city, and plant his engines where-ever he thought convenient; ſo that the citizens there, finding employment enough to defend themſelves at home, might not be able to ſecure other places elſe-where. As ſoon as he approached Gaza, he ordered the wall, which was but of mud and low built, to be aſſaulted, and his ſcaling-ladders every-where got ready. Then his ſlingers, and archers, and darters, mixed with the foot, beginning the attack, incommoded the beſieged with miſſive weapons, and at the ſame time galled them with darts from their engines; inſomuch, that the walls were deſerted by the Barbarians, and the ladders being immediately fixed, the Macedonians mounted, and entering killed all the men they met, for ſo Alexander had commanded; but the women, and children, and the riches of the place, were given as a ſpoil to the ſoldiers. Thence he moved to another of thoſe cities, which was built and fortified like the former; which he aſſaulted and took the ſame day, and diſpoſed of the captives in the ſame manner. Thence proceeding to the third city on the next day, he took it at the firſt attack. In the mean time, while he at the head of his troops of foot was buſied in reducing thoſe places, he diſpatched his horſe to two other cities not far off, with orders to take care that the citizens, when they heard of the ſtorming of their neighbour towns and his nigh approach, ſhould not betake themſelves to flight, and ſo render it a difficult taſk for him to overtake them. And as he judged, ſo it happened, that the diſpatch of theſe troops thither was neceſſary; for the Barbarians, who held the other two cities not yet taken, ſeeing the ſmoke of that over-againſt them, which was then on fire, and beſides ſome who had eſcaped out of that calamity bringing them the news, they fled out of both the cities as faſt as they could; but, falling in among the horſe poſted for that purpoſe, were moſt of them ſlain. Theſe five cities thus taken and deſtroyed in two days, he haſted to Cyropolis, the greateſt and moſt populous of the whole country. It was ſurrounded with a wall much higher than any of the reſt, and was built by Cyrus; and as many of the Barbarians both ſtout and well-armed had fled for ſhelter thither, it was not to be ſuppoſed that the Macedonians ſhould gain it at the firſt aſſault. Wherefore Alexander having planted his engines in places convenient, determined to batter the wall, and where-ever he made a breach to ſtorm the place. But finding the channel of the river, which uſually run through the town like a torrent, at that time dry, and the wall disjoined, ſo as to afford an entrance for his ſoldiers, he with his body-guards, his targeteers, his archers, and Argians, while the Barbarians were employed in guarding themſelves from the engines and the aſſailants, privately entered the city at firſt with a few men through that channel, and having burſt open the gates with that party, gave an eaſy admittance to the reſt. The Barbarians then, notwithſtanding their perceiving their city taken, falling upon the Macedonians, a ſharp battle enſued, wherein Alexander himſelf received a blow on the head and neck with a ſtone, and Craterus and many more of his captains were wounded with miſſive weapons. However, the Barbarians were at laſt driven out of the market-place. In the mean time, thoſe who battered the wall, ſeeing it void of defendants, took it, and at their firſt entrance ſlew about eight thouſand of the enemy. The reſt (for the whole number there gathered together was eighteen thouſand) retired into the caſtle: but theſe, when Alexander had continued his ſiege but one day, being deſtitute of water, ſurrendered the place. Thence moving to the ſeventh city, he took it at the firſt aſſault. Ptolemy indeed ſays, it was delivered up without fighting; but Ariſtobulus on the contrary affirms, that it was taken by ſtorm, and all who were found therein ſlain. Ptolemy tells us, that the captives were diſperſed throughout the army, and kept chained till he ſhould depart out of that country, leſt any of thoſe who had occaſioned the revolt ſhould be left [n]. The Scythians in Aſia laying hold of this opportunity, came down in great bodies to the river's ſide to watch when they might attack Alexander advantageouſly; this irruption was followed by an account that Spitamenes had beſieged the garriſon left in Maracanda, [n] Arrian. lib. iv. c. 2, 3. Curt. lib. vii. c. 26.

[m] Arrian. lib. iii. c. ult. Curt. lib. vii. c. 26, 27.

two

Maracanda, and that the Macedonians were in great danger. Alexander, however, would not abandon a deſign he had once formed; having therefore diſpatched relief to the city before-mentioned, he proceeded to mark out the city he had formerly projected, to ſerve for a fortreſs againſt the Scythians. In twenty days he walled it round; the ſoldiers vyeing with each other in the performance of the taſks aſſigned them. This once done, he gave the city to ſuch of the Barbarians as had ſerved in his troops, to the mercenaries who were deſirous of ſettling there, and to ſuch of the Macedonians as, being unfit for ſervice, were willing to have houſes and lands allotted to them in this place °.

Defeats the Scythians, but with difficulty.

The king having accompliſhed all that he intended in theſe parts, and being no ways deſirous of entering into a war with the Scythians, from whom he knew there was nothing to be got but blows, prepared to march away. The Scythians, having notice of this, came down in vaſt numbers to the river's ſide, upbraided him and his ſoldiers, called them cowards and bullies, who, proud of having ſubdued the effeminate Perſians, were afraid of attacking men, and durſt not engage the antient conquerors of Aſia. Alexander was exceedingly nettled at theſe reproaches, and yet was at a loſs how to paſs the river in the ſight of ſo daring an enemy; however, he ordered Ariſtander to offer ſacrifices, which he did again and again, but conſtantly aſſured the king, that the omens were altogether inauſpicious; this gave him great concern, but could not engage him abſolutely to drop his deſign. On the contrary, when he reflected on the diſhonour which Darius the father of Xerxes had ſuſtained from his unfortunate war with this people, he began to fancy that his own fame would be no leſs injured; wherefore he at laſt determined at all events to paſs the river, and to attack the enemy, having firſt put them into ſome diſorder by the darts and ſtones thrown from his engines, which doing great execution croſs the river, were new to the Scythians and amazed them very much. The Macedonian horſe being few in compariſon of the enemy, the Scythians repulſed them at the firſt attack, and diſordered them pretty much; but Alexander taking care to ſupport them with light-armed troops, they charged again, and made ſome impreſſion on the enemy, which as ſoon as the king perceived, he brought up

° Arrian. ubi ſupra.

up the heavy-armed troops, and the weight of their charge determined the matter; for the Scythians, being unable to ſuſtain it, broke and fled, leaving a thouſand men dead upon the ſpot, among whom was one Satraces an eminent general, and a hundred and fifty were made priſoners; much more execution would have been done in the purſuit, if the Macedonians, thro' exceſſive heat, and violent thirſt, had not been hindered from continuing it. Alexander, who was always one of the number of the moſt forward and vigorous ſoldiers, finding himſelf very faint, drank freely of ſome ſtanding water, which threw him into ſuch a flux, as endangered his life, which was held an accompliſhment of Ariſtander's prediction [p]. It may be truly ſaid, that this was a hard-fought battle, and that the Macedonians bought their victory much dearer than they were wont to do, loſing one hundred foot and ſixty horſe upon the ſpot, and having a thouſand wounded. The king ordered the priſoners to be releaſed, and ſome days after, when embaſſadors arrived from the Scythian king, excuſing the buſineſs and aſſuring him that the late proceedings were againſt his orders, Alexander took all in good part, received them into his protection, and being by no means willing to have any thing farther to do with them, granted them a peace on their own terms, and began to turn his head to the care of his other affairs, which was indeed in no little diſorder; the war reviving when he leaſt expected it, and the troops under Spitamenes ſeeming to be beat at laſt both into diſcipline and courage [q].

The Macedonians under Pharnaces defeated by Spitamenes.

We have before mentioned the relief ſent by Alexander to the garriſon in the caſtle of Maracanda; it conſiſted of ſixty auxiliary horſe commanded by Andromachus and Menedemus, eight hundred mercenaries under the command of Caranus, and fifteen hundred foot led by Pharnaces the interpreter, who, though a Lycian by birth, yet was perfectly ſkilled in the language of thoſe countries, and could therefore upon occaſion treat with the Barbarians, in caſe they ſought to avoid farther miſchiefs by ſubmitting themſelves. While theſe troops were upon their march, the Macedonians in the caſtle made a deſperate ſally on Spitamenes, and drove him and his forces from their works. The loſs ſuſtained on this occaſion and the news of Pharnaces's march engaged that general to raise the siege, and to retire towards Sogdia. Pharnaces pursued him, and in his march meeting with a body of the Nomades, he attacked them; whereupon they retired, and joined Spitamenes, who, elated with so sudden and unexpected a reinforcement, determined no longer to avoid, but rather to seek, the Macedonian army. There are two relations of the subsequent engagement, both in Arrian; one taken from Ptolemy, th other from Aristobulus; they agree in the main, that the defeat and slaughter of the Macedonians was owing to the ill conduct of their officers. Pharnaces was a man void of military skill, of which he was very sensible, and offered to resign the command of the troops; but this the Macedonian generals would not yield to; for they foresaw that this business would be attended with great loss, and therefore were not willing to make themselves accountable for an unfortunate battle, and for exceeding their commission at the same time. The issue of the matter was, that while they were full of doubts and confusion, the Scythians attacked them, supported by Spitamenes and his forces. The Macedonians behaved with great bravery, and in all probability would have made a good retreat, if they had either had a good general, or if the officers they had had acted in concert. But Caranus with his squadron of horse, without consulting the rest, entered the river, upon which the greatest part of the foot followed, not his command, but his example, and with much ado gained a little island not far from the shore. This shadow of safety proved their utter destruction; for the Barbarians cut off many as they entered the water, more when they were in it, and as for all those who got into the island, they shot them to death with their arrows; so that of two thousand three hundred and sixty men, horse and foot, there did not escape above forty of the former, and three hundred of the latter; their officers being all slain, after having shewn much more courage than conduct [r].

[p] Arrian. lib. iv. c. 4. Curt. lib. vii. c. 7. [q] Juſtin. lib. xii. c. 5.

Alexander causes the siege of Maracanda to be raised.

As soon as Alexander received the news of the defeat, which Pharnaces and the troops under his command had sustained, he determined to revenge it; with this view he took half his auxiliary horse, all his light-armed foot, and a battalion of the Macedonian phalanx; with these he marched (if there be no mistake in the numbers) fifteen hundred furlongs in three days; on the fourth he drew near to Maracanda, which which Spitamenes had again beſieged; but on the news of Alexander's approach, he raiſed the ſiege with great precipitation, and retired with all the celerity imaginable. Alexander purſued him, not only to the edge of, but even a good way within, the deſart; when he found it was impoſſible to overtake him, he returned and buried all the ſoldiers who had fallen in the late engagement with honour. Then he cauſed all the country thereabouts to be burnt and waſted, putting to death the inhabitants of ſuch villages as he had been informed had not only refuſed ſhelter to the flying Macedonians, but had alſo mal-treated, and even murdered them. After this the king marched to Zariaſpa, where he put his army into winter quarters. Thither came Phrataphernes, governor of Parthia, and Staſanor, who had been diſpatched into Aria to ſeize Arſanes, who had begun to raiſe ſome diſturbances there; him they brought bound, and with him Brazaentes, whom Beſſus had made governor of Parthia; a ſhort time after arrived the Macedonian officers who had been ſent to take care of the recruits, and alſo thoſe who had conducted ſuch as were diſcharged to their imbarkation [6]. Thus the army was again reſtored to a formidable greatneſs, and at the ſame time the court of Alexander ſhone with extraordinary ſplendor from the reſort of the nobility of the adjacent provinces, and the arrival of ſo many illuſtrious perſons from Greece. The king therefore took this opportunity of calling a great council, into which he ordered Beſſus to be brought; where, having reproached him with his infidelity and treachery, his cruelty and treaſon, towards his ſovereign Darius, he ordered his noſe and ears to be cut off, and then ſent him under a guard to Ecbatana in Media, that he might abide his trial according to the laws of the Medes and Perſians. Arrian, who is otherwiſe very ſparing of his reflections, cenſures in warm terms this ſeverity towards Beſſus; he ſays, it was a ſign the king was departing from the maxims of his anceſtors, and leaving the generous notions of the Greeks, to take up the proud, cruel, and inexorable cuſtoms of thoſe Barbarians whom he had lately conquered, and whoſe vices he now ſuffered to conquer him; as to the ſubſequent fate of Beſſus, the relations of authors are ſo contradictory, that, to avoid confuſion, we have digeſted what they ſay into a note (T).

[r] Arrian. lib. iv. c. 5. Curt. lib. vii. c. 36.

It

[6] Arrian. lib. iv. c. 7. Curt. lib. vii. c. 38.

(T) Diodorus tells us, that Beſſus, at a great feaſt to which he had invited his friends, growing warm with liquor, grievouſly Affects the Persian customs.

It is certain, that about this time Alexander began to throw off in a great measure the manners of a Macedonian prince, insulted one of them whose name was Bagadoras, and even attempted to kill him; that this man, flying in the night to Alexander, the rest of the counsellors of Bessus were exceedingly alarmed, fearing on the one hand the cruelty of the usurper, and on the other, dreaming of great rewards, if they put him into the hands of Alexander; which at last they resolved to do, and to that end seized and bound him. They were not disappointed in their expectation; the king rewarded them bountifully; as for Bessus, he delivered him to the brother of Darius and the rest of his relations, who, after offering him all the indignities they could think of, and exercising on him variety of torments, cut his flesh into small pieces, and hurled it bit by bit out of their slings (56).—Curtius informs us of a quarrel Bessus had with a friend of his, but he calls him Cobares, a Median and one of the Magi. This man, after Bessus had been vilifying Darius, and exalting himself, told him plainly, it was in vain to think of flying from such an enemy as Alexander; and that the only method he had to take was submitting himself, and trusting to the mercy of the victor; this put Bessus into such a passion, that Cobares was forced to retire out of the room for his immediate safety, and afterwards fled to Alexander. Spitamenes is characterised by this author as an envious and ungrateful traitor; that he told Bessus, two of his best friends had conspired against him, and that he, having discovered the conspiracy, had caused them to be apprehended; for which Bessus, thanked him, and desired they might be brought into his presence. Upon this Dataphernes and Catenes, who concurred with Spitamenes, were brought in with their hands tied, surrounded by eight chosen men, as if they had been their guards. But no sooner did Bessus rise and approach them, than the pretended guards seized him, pinioned him, took his crown from his head, and tore his robes; whereupon he cried out, that they justly revenged Darius, but were too propitious to Alexander. Spitamenes afterwards led him with a halter about his neck into the presence of Alexander, who delivered him to Oxathres, Darius's brother, with directions to see him crucified, after having his nose and ears cut off, and then shot to death with arrows, which Oxathres accordingly undertook to do; Catenes being to fulfil the last part of his punishment, which was to guard his body, that no part of it might be interred in the bowels of birds. He afterwards tells us that he was sent to Ecbatana, there to suffer death (57).—Plutarch relates, that, by the prince, and to affect thoſe of a Perſian king. Authors vary not a little in the accounts they give us of this matter. Arrian ſays expreſly, that he laid aſide the Macedonian for the Median habit, adding, That to him it appeared wonderful, the king did not bluſh when he changed the modeſt the direction of Alexander himſelf, Beſſus was faſtened to a couple of tall ſtrait trees, which were bound down ſo as to meet; and then, being let looſe, with a great force returned to their own places, each of them carrying that part of the body along with it which was tied to it (58). —Juſtin acquaints us in few words, that Alexander delivered Beſſus to the brother of Darius, that he might crucify him (59). It is impoſſible that he ſhould die all theſe deaths, and, amongſt this great variety of ſentiments, it is as impoſſible to determine what death he died; that he loſt his noſe and ears by the command of Alexander may be eſteemed certain. and that he afterwards ſuffered capital puniſhment is alſo certain; as to the manner in which he ſuffered it, nothing can be poſitively affirmed In all probability, Beſſus might have eſcaped all this ſeverity, if he had taken the advice of Cobares, and ſubmitted himſelf, and the provinces under his power, to Alexander; for there is good reaſon to believe, that his aſſuming the imperial title was at leaſt as heinous in the ſight of Alexander, as his murder of Darius; and therefore, if he had not joined this to his former crime, he might have eſcaped better. The anſwers given by Beſſus, as they are recorded by Arrian and Curtius, hint plainly at this; for he told the king, Firſt, That Darius was murdered to obtain his favour; and, Secondly, That he was not the ſole author of the murder, but that all who were preſent concurred in it. Among theſe was Satibarzanes, who, on his ſubmitting himſelf to Alexander, was not only well received, but had his government reſtored to him. As for the other conſpirator Barzaentes, he indeed was put to death, in revenge, as it was ſaid, of the treaſon he had committed againſt his maſter; but then he had always continued in arms againſt Alexander, and flying to the Indians for ſafety was delivered up by them (60). On the whole therefore we may ſafely conclude, that this extraordinary ſeverity, this laboured ſcene of doing juſtice on Beſſus, was altogether affected, and had nothing of that ſpirit and generoſity which Alexander had ſhewn at the opening of the war.

(56) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii. (57) Curt. lib. vii, c. 20.

(58) Plutarch. in vit. Alexand. (59) Juſtin. lib. xii, c. 5.
(60) Arrian. lib. iii. c. 29, 30.

deſt covering of his head, which he had worn in ſo many battles, for the Perſian tiara. Yet Plutarch as poſitively affirms, that he did not follow the Median faſhion, that he neither wore their breeches, long veſt, or tiara, but made choice of a garb inclining to the Perſian habit, more pompous and magnificent than the Macedonian veſture, yet not ſo rich or gaudy as that worn by the Perſian kings. But it may be, Alexander proceeded by degrees in the alteration of his habit, as we know he did in the uſe of it; for at firſt he only dreſſed himſelf in this manner, when he had buſineſs to tranſact with his new ſubjects; but when he converſed with the Greeks and commanded the Macedonians, he wore his own country cloaths: If therefore this conjecture of ours be right, Plutarch and Arrian may be reconciled; and indeed it is very probable, that in his great council, wherein he imitated the oriental ſeverity, he appeared in habit as a Perſian king; that is, as the lord of Aſia, or, as the Greeks were wont emphatically to ſtyle him, as the Great King [t] (U). This mightily grieved his Macedonians, and this very grief ſhewed

[t] Arrian. lib. iv. c. 7. Plut. in vit. Alex.

(U) Curtius gives us a very extraordinary ſtory in relation to the revolt of the Sogdians, which, on account of its length and its having ſo ſtrong a mixture of the wonderful, we thought more proper for a note, than for the text; where if it had been curtailed it would not have been clear, and if inſerted at full length, it would have interrupted the current of the narration. "Among the captive Sogdians, he ſays, there were thirty of the "chiefeſt nobility of the country, who were remarkable for "their prodigious ſtrength of body. Theſe being brought before the king, and underſtanding by the interpreter, that his "majeſty had ordered them to be executed, they began to "ſing and dance, and by other wanton motions of their body "endeavoured to expreſs the chearfulneſs of their mind. "Alexander, being amazed at their unuſual alacrity on ſuch "an occaſion, commanded them to be brought back, and "aſked them the cauſe of their exceſſive joy, when they beheld death before their eyes; To which they anſwered, that "if any other but himſelf had ſentenced them to die, they "ſhould have been concerned; but ſince they were to be reſtored to their anceſtors by ſo great a king, who had conquered all the world, they looked upon their death to be ſo "hononrable, ſhewed that they were ſtill loyal and affectionate to him; for men of traiterous or rebellious principles do not grieve for the errors of their prince, but magnify them into crimes; and, as if they were conſcious of the enormity of their own guilt, endeavour to transfer a part of it to their hated ſovereign. When therefore Alexander perceived this diſpoſition in his army, he ought certainly to have ſoothed them, and endeavoured either to convince them of the rectitude of his behaviour, or to have quieted them by yielding in ſome meaſure to their deſires. But this was not in the nature of Alexander, or at leaſt was no longer in his nature after he had viſited the temple of Ammon. Beſides, he had about him a multitude of ſycophants, who, as Arrian well notes, are, and ever will be, the bane of princes; he might have added, and the curſe of nations. Theſe, by complying with his humours and heating his paſſions, carried him daily into new extravagancies, and brought him to be a proper inſtance of the truth of another of Arian's obſervations; that an ability of conquering vaſt provinces and of acquiring ſupreme dominion is of little conſequence to a man's happineſs, unleſs he preſerves a philoſophic conſtancy and moderation of mind; however ſpecious appearances may deceive a deluded world, and make them conceive gilded miſery true felicity; whereas no two things in nature are farther

" honourable, as even to deſerve the envy of all brave men,
" which made them ſo tranſported when they underſtood his plea-
" ſure. The king then aſked them, if they would be his friends
" hereafter, if he ſhould give them their lives; They replied,
" that they had never been his enemies, but had only defended
" themſelves when they were attacked in an hoſtile manner by " him: And that if any body would make trial of them by " good offices, inſtead of injuries, they would willingly con" tend in the generous ſtrife, and uſe their utmoſt endeavours
" not to be overcome. He aſking them afterwards, what " pledge they would give him for their fidelity; They an-
" ſwered their lives, which they received through his bounty,
" and which they would at all times be ready to reſtore to " him whenever he required them. Nor were they worſe than " their words: for thoſe of them who were ſent home kept " their countrymen in due ſubjection to Alexander, and four of " them being received into his body-guards, were inferior to " none of the Macedonians in their ſincere affection to the
" king (61).

(61) Curt, lib. vii. c. 37.

ther removed. But to return to the ſeries of our hiſtory, for which theſe reflections are to make way.

Murders Clytus at a banquet.

The Greeks, and eſpecially the Macedonians, obſerved an anniverſary feſtival to Bacchus. This year it ſeems the king, omitting Bacchus, transferred the honour of this feſtival to the Dioſcuri, i. e. Caſtor and Pollux; and, not ſatisfied therewith, ſtrictly commanded, that for the future, to them, and not to Bacchus, theſe ſolemn rites ſhould conſtantly be dedicated. Theſe ſacrifices were followed by a magnificent banquet, to which all the principal commanders in the army were invited, and Clytus the ſon of Dropidas, who ſtood as high in the king's favour as any of them, amongſt the reſt. At ſupper the diſcourſe turned on the heroes to whom they had ſacrificed; and a queſtion was ſtarted, With what propriety they were ſtyled the ſons of Jupiter, when it was notorious that Tyndarus was their father? It may be, this was introduced to give ſome ingenious flatterer an opportunity of reconciling things, which hitherto the Macedonians could never underſtand, how Alexander could be at once the ſon of Ammon and the ſon of Philip. Some who ſat near the king laid hold of this fair opportunity to magnify his actions above thoſe of Caſtor and Pollux; and when their hands were in, they laid hold of the fame of Hercules too, and ſet that a ſtep lower than the glory of Alexander: to give theſe things a colour, they inſiſted on the natural envy of men towards their cotemporaries, and how unwilling they were to worſhip thoſe virtues in the living, which, with the utmoſt readineſs and the moſt profound reſpect, they adored in the dead. Clytus took fire at theſe expreſſions; he ſaid, he could not bear to hear ſuch indignities offered to the gods, or the credit of antient heroes depreciated, to tickle the ears of a living prince. As to Alexander's actions, he allowed that they were great and glorious, but he affirmed that they had nothing in them ſupernatural; beſides, they were not performed by him alone, but by his army; and that therefore all the Macedonians had a right to ſhare in the praiſe due to thoſe deeds, in which they, as well as he, had exerted themſelves. Theſe reflections made Alexander very angry. To ſooth this anger, ſome of his flatterers began a diſcourſe about his father Philip, in which they ſought to leſſen his actions, and to repreſent him as a prince who had done nothing extraordinary; which provoked Clytus ſo far, that he began to detract from the merit of Alexander, and to ſuggeſt, that nothing

he

he had done deſerved to be compared with what had been performed by his father. Upon this the king loſt all patience, and when Clytus proceeded to upbraid him with the preſervation of his life at the battle of Granicus, ſtretching out his arm, and ſaying, This hand, O Alexander, ſaved thee; the king leaped upon him, and endeavoured to kill him, but was prevented by the interpoſition of his friends, who caught hold of him, and with much ado got between them: Clytus in the mean time continued his reproachful expreſſions; whereupon the king called for ſome of his guards; but none appearing, he began to bemoan himſelf exceedingly, ſaying, That he was now in the ſame condition with Darius, when in the hands of Beſſus: That he had the empty name of king, and nothing more. His friends upon this retiring and leaving him to himſelf, he ſnatched a lance, or as ſome ſay, a long Macedonian pike, and therewith ſtruck Clytus through, and killed him. In this account we have followed Arrian cloſely; for to have collected into one relation what different authors have delivered, could have only ſerved to perplex the reader. What may be wanting to his farther information, and could be had from other authors, he will find below [u] (W). Here let us purſue the hiſtory

[u] Arrian. lib. iv. c. 8.

(W) The detail given us by Plutarch of what happened at the death of Clytus differs ſo much from what has been inſerted in the text from Arrian, and is in itſelf ſo curious, that it well deſerves the reader's peruſal. He informs us, that the king having a preſent of Grecian fruit brought him from the ſea-coaſt, ſo well preſerved, "that it ſeemed to be but juſt ga"thered, ſent for Clytus that he might ſee and partake of it.
"Clytus was then ſacrificing, but he immediately left off, and "went to wait on the king, followed by three of the ſheep,
"on whom the drink offering had been already poured, in "order for the ſacrifice. Alexander, being informed of this "accident, conſulted his two diviners, Ariſtander and Cleo-
"mantes the Spartan, and aſked them, what was portended
'by it;' they aſſuring him that it was an ill omen, he 'commanded them in all haſte to offer ſacrifices for Clytus's
'ſafety; foraſmuch as three days before he himſelf had ſeen a
'ſtrange viſion in his ſleep of Clytus all in mourning, ſitting
'by Parmenio's ſons, who were all dead. Clytus, however,
'ſtaid not to finiſh his devotions, but came ſtrait to ſupper
'with the king, who the ſame day had ſacrificed to Caſtor
"and hiſtory without entering into any debates upon the queſtion which

" Pollux. And when they had drank pretty hard, ſome of " the company fell a finging the verſes of one Pranichus, or " as others ſay, of Pierion, which were made upon thoſe cap- " tains who had been lately worſted by the Barbarians, on " purpoſe to diſgrace and turn them to ridicule; which ſo of- " fended the grave antient men, that they reproved both the " author and the ſinger of the verſes, though Alexander and " the blades about him were mightily pleaſed to hear them, " and encouraged them to go on. Till at laſt Clytus, who " had drank too much and was beſides of a froward and wilful " temper, was ſo nettled, that he could hold no longer; ſaying, It " was not well done thus to expoſe the Macedonians before " the Barbarians and their enemies, ſince though it was " their unhappineſs, to be overcome, yet they were much " better men than thoſe who laughed at them. To this " Alexander replied, That ſure Clytus ſpoke ſo tenderly of " cowardiſe, when he called it misfortune, only to excuſe him- " ſelf. At which Clytus ſtarting up, This cowardiſe, as you " are pleaſed to term it, ſaid he to him, ſaved your " life, though you pretend to be ſprung from the gods, " when you were running away from Spithridates's ſword; " and it is by the expence of Macedonian blood, and by theſe " wounds, that you are now raiſed to ſuch an height, as to de- " ſpiſe and diſown your father Philip, and adopt yourſelf the " ſon of Jupiter Ammon. Thou baſe fellow, ſaid Alexander, " who was now thoroughly exaſperated, doſt thou think to " utter theſe things every-where of me, and ſtir up the Mace- " donians to ſedition, and not be puniſhed for it? We are ſuf- " ficiently puniſhed already, anſwered Clytus, if this be the re- " compence of our toils; and eſteem thoſe happieſt who have " not lived to ſee their countrymen ignominiouſly ſcourged " with Median rods, and forced to ſue to the Perſians to have " acceſs to their king. While Clytus talked thus at random, " and the king in the bittereſt manner retorted upon him, the " old men that were in company, endeavoured all they could " to allay the flame; when Alexander turning to Xenodolus " the Cardian, and Artemius the Colophonian, aſked them, If " they were not of opinion that the reſt of the Grecians be- " haved among the Macedonians, like ſo many demi-gods " among ſavages? All this would not ſilence Clytus, who " calling aloud to Alexander, bid him, if he had any thing " to ſay, to ſpeak out; or elſe, why did he invite men who " were free-born, and uſed to ſpeak their minds openly without " reſtraint, to ſup with him? He had better live and converſe " with Barbarians and conquered ſlaves, who would not ſcruple " to adore his Perſian girdle and white tunic. Which words " ſo provoked Alexander, that not able to ſuppreſs his anger which has riſen upon the fact, Whether Clitus's indiſcretion could excuſe Alexander's intemperance and cruelty. As " any longer, he took one of the apples that lay upon the " table, and flung it at him, and then looked about for his " ſword. But Ariſtophanes, one of his life-guards, had hid that " out of the way, and others came about him, and beſought " him to ſtay his fury, but in vain; for breaking from them, " he called out aloud to his guards in the Macedonian lan- " guage, which was a certain ſign of ſome great diſturbance " in him, and commanded a trumpeter to ſound, giving him " a box on the ear for delaying, or rather refuſing, to " obey him, though afterwards the ſame man was commend- " ed for diſobeying an order which would have put the whole " army into tumult and confuſion. Clytus continued ſtill in " the ſame quarrelſome humour, till his friends with much ado " forced him out of the room; but he came in again immedi- " ately at another door very irreverently, and inſolently ſung " this paſſage out of Euripides's Andromache. Ye gods, what " an ill cuſtom have you introduced into Greece! When an " army has erected a trophy upon the defeat of the enemy, it " is never conſidered that the victory is owing to the valour " of the troops who fought, but the general puts in for all the " honour of it; though he had expoſed himſelf to no more " danger than many thouſands beſides, and had done no more " than a common ſoldier, yet he only is celebrated in the " ſongs of triumph, and robs the reſt of their ſhare of the " glory. Then Alexander, ſnatching a ſpear from one of the " ſoldiers, met Clytus as he was putting by the curtain that " hung before the door, and ran him through the body He " fell immediately, and, after a few piercing groans, expired. " In the very inſtant the king's indignation cooled, and he " came perfectly to himſelf; but when he ſaw his friends all " about him in profound ſilence, as ſeized with horror at the " fact, he pulled the ſpear out of the dead body, and would " have turned it againſt himſelf, if the guards had not held his " hands, and by main force carried him away into his chamber " (62)." The relation of Curtius agrees pretty well with that of Plutarch, only he attributes more moderation to the king at the beginning (63). Juſtin tells us in a few words, that at a debauch Alexander killed his friend Clytus for extolling the actions of his father Philip; but this author inſiſts very largely on his repentance, attributing his recovery from that ſtate of dejection

" any

(62) Plutarch. in vit. Alex. (63) lib. viii. c. 2, 3, 4.

As ſoon as the king came to himſelf, his brains were perfectly cool, and he began to remember what had paſſed, he fell into a fit of exceſſive grief. He accuſed himſelf, as indeed well he might, of having ſlain his father's brave ſoldier, his own faithful friend, the conſtant companion of his toils, his foſter-brother, and him to whom he owed his life: It was then, that in the bitterneſs of his ſoul, he diſclaimed all kindred to the gods, and, with a laudable ſorrow, mourned like a man for having done a baſe and cruel act unworthy of a man. It was then he cried out on Clytus, on his ſiſter Hellanice, whoſe breaſts he had ſucked, and inveighed againſt himſelf as one forgetful of the bond of gratitude, the ties of friendſhip, and the laws of nature, depriving his friends of life, and executing thoſe as evil-doers, who could not patiently hear or ſee him do ill. For three days he refuſed meat, neglected his apparel, and, as ſome ſay, with the pike that killed Clytus, would have ſlain himſelf. The army in the mean while were diſconſolate to the higheſt degree; their regard to Clytus is ſaid to have given way to their love and loyalty to Alexander, inſomuch, that to ſooth their afflicted prince, they condemned Clytus, and prohibited his interment, ſeeking thereby to colour the fact, or at leaſt to comfort Alexander by ſeeming to think his reſentment juſt. This was excuſable in ſoldiers. The prieſts and philoſophers went greater lengths. The former told the king, that what he did was not the error of his own will, but the effects of a fury inſpired by Bacchus on dejection and grief, as Curtius does, to the advice of Calliſthenes (64). If we had Diodorus's account of this buſineſs, in all probability we ſhould find it correſpond with Curtius and Juſtin; but, as we have heretofore remarked, theſe authors, when they differ from Arrian, frequently agree with him; the reaſon is, that among a multitude of writers, who undertook to tranſmit the actions of Alexander to poſterity, the collectors of general hiſtory followed, at their pleaſure, ſometimes one, and ſometimes another, and not ſeldom mixed ſeveral relations together. Authors of abridgments copied from theſe indiſcriminately, as the later writers of particular hiſtories did frequently too, adding ſuch embelliſhments, inſerting ſuch deſcriptions, and framing ſuch ſpeeches for the amplifying and adorning their works, as they thought fit, on account of his feſtival being transferred to the Dioſcuri. Thus did theſe execrable diſſemblers ſeek to transfer a crime unworthy of a man to one whom they worſhipped as a god, and moſt impudently called that a divine fury, which at beſt was beaſtly drunkenneſs; all flatterers are deteſtable, becauſe they inſult human nature; but theſe ſpiritual flatterers are doubly ſo, becauſe as far as in them lies, they proſtitute the gods to pleaſe the worſt of men. Anaxarchus of Abdera, whom moſt hiſtorians ſtile a philoſopher, but Arrian rightly a ſophiſt, was the next who undertook to moderate the king's grief; and finding him upon his bed ſighing and dejected, thus he addreſſed him: "Is this the "Alexander whom the world looks upon with ſuch admira- "tion? Behold him extended on the ground, and weeping "like an abject ſlave for fear of the law and reproach of "men, to whom he himſelf ought to be a law and the mea- "ſure of equity, ſince he conquered for no other end "but to make himſelf lord of all, and not to be a ſlave "to a vain idle opinion: Do not you know, that Jupiter "is repreſented ſitting on his throne, with law aſſiſting on "one ſide and juſtice on the other, intimating thereby, "that let a ſovereign prince do what he will, all his "actions are juſt and lawful". Theſe were admirable doctrines, tending not only to ſet the king's mind at reſt, as to the murder he had committed, but to prevent any more qualms, in caſe rage, envy, or drunkenneſs ſhould plunge him again into the ſame circumſtances. Calliſthenes, the ſcholar and relation of Ariſtotle, ſought to ſettle his mind by honeſt and moral diſcourſes. Arrian ſays, that the ſuggeſtion of the prieſts, in relation to Bacchus, did not diſpleaſe the king. Both Plutarch and the laſt mentioned author ſay, that Anaxarchus allayed the king's grief at the ſame time that he corrupted his manners; but Curtius aſcribes the king's recovery to Calliſthenes; we may well ſuppoſe that they had all a hand in it, though the ſubſequent hiſtory will ſhew, that in all probability the laſt had the leaſt [w].

(64) Juſtin. lib. xii. 6.

Alexander aſpires to divine honours.

If the tragical death of Clytus had brought Alexander to a right way of thinking, perhaps poſterity, like the Macedonian ſoldiers, would have drawn a veil over this dark

[w] Arrian. lib. iv. c. 9. Plut. in vit. Alex. Curt. lib. vii. c. 7, & 8. Juſtin. lib. xii. c. 6 dark ſcene, and have choſen rather to commend the king's compaſſionate concern, than to have cenſured his drunken cruelty. But no ſooner was his ſorrow for the death of this worthy man alleviated, but he began again to give up himſelf to the management of thoſe ſycophants, whoſe poiſonous ſpeeches had wrought that miſchief; and ſtill they were dinning his ears, that in their opinions he was ſomething more than man, and that it was injuſtice and diſloyalty in other people not to think him ſo too. The reſult of all theſe diſcourſes was, that a god he ſhould be, or at leaſt have divine honours paid him, as heretofore had been given to Perſian kings, and Anaxarchus the ſophiſt, Agis a miſerable poet, Chærillus, Agnon, and other paraſites, undertook to bring this matter to bear, and to engage the Greeks as well as the Aſiatics, to pay him adoration [x]. Alexander was mightily pleaſed with this, and a great banquet was appointed, at which this hopeful ſcheme was to be carried into execution. At this entertainment, Anaxarchus propoſed the adoring of Alexander in a ſet oration; he inſiſted that Bacchus was a Theban, and though he admitted that Hercules was a Greek, and without reproach, yet he affirmed, that Alexander's being deſcended from him was at once the moſt certain and the greateſt honour which could be attributed to him; hence he inferred, that if Bacchus and Hercules were worthily worſhipped, ſo without doubt would Alexander be, whoſe actions ſo far exceeded theirs, at ſome diſtance of time; but inaſmuch as that worſhip would be of ſmall conſequence to him then, he alledged, it would be more rational, as well as more obliging, to offer it him now, while he was living, and could take pleaſure in it. The Macedonians, who were not in the ſecret, were ſtunned at the ſpeech, and knew not either what to think of its author, or what anſwer to afford themſelves to what he had propounded; ſo a long and deep ſilence enſued. Calliſthenes at laſt broke through it, and, as Arrian tells us, delivered himſelf in theſe words: "Indeed Anaxarchus, I "count not Alexander unworthy of any honour, how "great ſoever it be, that is fit to be aſcribed to man; "but [x] Arrian. lib. iv. c. 11. Plut. in vit. Alex. Curt. lib. viii. c. 18. Juſtin. lib. xii. c. 7.

" but there are preſcribed differences amongſt men be" tween divine and human honours; amongſt many " others, in the building of temples and erecting of ſta-
" tues; for to the gods we conſecrate oratories, offer ſa-
" crifices and drink-offerings: To the gods are ſung
" hymns; men are praiſed, but not adored: kiſſes in ſa-
" lutations are given to men, but the gods are placed on " high, and 'tis not lawful to touch them, and therefore " they are worſhipped with adoration. Solemn times of " dancings are performed to the gods, and pæans ſung to " them; neither is it to be wondered at, inaſmuch as the " honours given to the gods are various; ſome ſort of " honours given to one, and others to another, eſpecially
" thoſe honours of later times; nay, thoſe honours given to " ſome of the heroes differ from divine honours. 'Tis not
" therefore fit to confound theſe things, nor to advance
" men above themſelves and all mankind beſides, and to " degrade the gods by worſhipping them with the ſame
" worſhip wherewith we adore men. Alexander himſelf
" would not ſuffer any private man to uſurp the regal
" dignity and honours due to himſelf, though he gained
" them by the unjuſt ſuffrages of the people; much more
" juſtly therefore may the gods be angry, if any mortal " man aſſume to himſelf divine honours, or accept of " them from others. However, let Alexander be eſteemed,
" as in truth he is, by many degrees the moſt valiant
" of them that are valiant, the greateſt king amongſt all " other kings, and amongſt generals the moſt worthy to " command. But as for thee, Anaxarchus, 'tis thy duty
" above any other to inſtruct Alexander in thoſe things " that have been ſpoken, and to deter him from the " contrary; for thy converſation he daily makes uſe of in " order to improve in wiſdom and in learning. Neither " does it become thee to be the beginner of this diſcourſe,
" but rather to remember, that thou art not adviſing Camby-
" ſes or Xerxes, but the ſon of Philip, deſcended from Her" cules and Achilles, whoſe anceſtors came out of Argos into " Macedonia, and maintained their empire, not by ar" bitrary power, but by ruling according to the laws
" and cuſtoms of the Macedonians. But divine honours " were not conferred upon Hercules himſelf by the " Grecians while he was living; nay, nor when he was " dead, before the oracle at Delphos commanded that " he ſhould be worſhipped as a god. But if there be

" but few that are in the country of the barbarians, we " ought to entertain the same sentiments with them. " And I earnestly entreat thee, Alexander, to remember " Greece; for whose sake this expedition was under- " taken by thee, in order to add Asia to Greece; and " now consider whether, when you return thither, you " can be able to compel the free people of Greece to " adore you as a god, or, excepting them of Greece, " you can impose this dishonour and slavery upon the Ma- " cedonians only, or whether it be fit that quite different " honours be there allowed you, seeing the Grecians " confer only those that are human, according to the " custom and manner of the Greeks, when, at the same " time, only the barbarians worship you as a god, after " the manner of barbarians. But if it be objected, that " Cyrus son of Cambyses was the first of all mortal men " that was adored by men as a god, and that, since that " time, this adoration has continued amongst the Medes " and Persians; yet you are to consider, how his pride " was curbed by the Scythians, a poor and indigent peo- " ple; and how other Scythians again reduced Darius " to more sober thoughts of himself; and the Athenians " and Lacedæmonians Xerxes; and Clearchus and Xeno- " phon Artaxerxes, only with ten thousand men; and " Darius now overcome by Alexander, at a time when " no divine honours were decreed him [b]." Alexander was highly provoked at this speech, and the more for that the Macedonians could not forbear applauding it; however, he ordered the business to go on, and settled the ceremonial of his adoration thus: When he drank to a person, it was expected, that the guest should immediately rise up, adore him, and, having received a kiss from the king, should depart. The eldest and most considerable of the Persians complied first; in doing which they followed their old custom, and were perhaps not displeased at the embarassment of the Greeks (X). Leonatus, one of

[b] Arrian. l. iv. c. 2.

(X) All who have treated this subject agree, that the Persians were as ready to comply with Alexander's motion for adoring him, as the Greeks were averse to it; yet we are not to suppose from thence, that the former were as prone to idolatry of the king's friends, as Arrian has it; or, as Curtius reports, Polyſperchon, obſerving a Perſian touch the floor with idolatry as the latter; if we ſhould, it would be a very great error: And therefore, to preſerve that conſiſtency which is neceſſary between the ſeveral parts of this work, we have thought fit to add this note, in order to explain the conduct of the Perſians, and to acquit them of that groſs adulation which has been charged upon them by ſome raſh and inconſiderate writers. Bowing down to, and even proſtrating one's ſelf before a prince, ever was, and ſtill is, held in the eaſt an act of civil reverence, and no more. The Perſians therefore, as deiſts, paid theſe profound marks of ſubmiſſion to their king, not as ſuppoſing him a deity, but from a perſuaſion that he derived a ſupreme authority from god. It may be, and indeed it is probable, the Perſians did not explain this matter, either to Alexander or thoſe about him; but contented themſelves with ſatisfying the king by their actions, and themſelves by their thoughts (65). The Greeks proceeded upon notions directly oppoſite. They were poly-theiſts, and tho' they every day did a thouſand ridiculous things in their public worſhip, yet, to pay divine honours to a man, was too groſs for them; and therefore, as is frequently the caſe, they acted right upon wrong principles; for with reſpect to the ground of this ſubmiſſion, the king and they were agreed in their ſentiments. He ſought to be taken for ſomething more than man, and they, with good reaſon, refuſed to acknowledge him ſuch. As the Perſians could not but have the higheſt contempt for their idolatry in all its ſhapes, ſo, without queſtion, they were well pleaſed to ſee their zeal for idols embaraſs the Macedonians with their natural prince, which ſo ſtrongly tended to put him into their hands. There is one objection which may poſſibly be made to this account, and ought therefore to be anſwered. It is this; There are various inſtances in ſcripture, where bowing down to, or, as it is uſually phraſed, worſhipping, a man, is prohibited as idolatrous (66); whence it might be inferred, that, amongſt the Perſians, who were deiſts as well as the Jews, this practice was not, ſtrictly ſpeaking, lawful; but if we conſider, that thoſe prohibitions never extend to the caſe in queſtion, but are always directed againſt worſhipping private men, on a ſuppoſition of their being cloathed with ſome divine character, we ſhall eaſily perceive, that theſe marks of civil reſpect to ſupreme magiſtrates were always accounted innocent, with his chin, laughed at it, and bid him hit it a little harder; for which Alexander caught hold of him, threw him from his couch, and, as he lay on the floor, told him, he made as ridiculous a figure as him whom he had despised. When it came to the turn of Callisthenes, he pledged the king, and then came for his kiss. Alexander being deeply engaged in discourse with Hephestion, did not perceive he had missed any part of the ceremony; but Demetrius one of his friends told him, that the philosopher had not adored him. The king thereupon put him back with his hand; and Callisthenes going out, was heard to say, So then, I have only lost a kiss [c]. But the king afterwards revenged himself more severely, as we shall shew immediately, that we may not again interrupt the thread of our narration (Y).

(65) Univerſ. hiſt. vol. v. p. 36.

(66) Acts xiv. 14: Rev. xxii. 9.

[c] Arrian. l. iv. c. 12. Curt. l. viii. c. 20. Justin. ubi supra.

cent, and very conformable to the divine law. Thus Daniel complied with all the customs of the Persian court, bowed himself when he entered the royal presence, and saluted with the usual compliment, O king, live for ever (67)! In a word, as the intent of the mind renders all actions either good or evil, so, in the present case, the Persians did that without idolatry, which was flat idolatry in those Greeks that did the same thing: because the former honoured Alexander only as a man, the latter, whatever they conceived of him, paid him that respect which they thought only due to a god.

(Y) Arrian represents Callisthenes a man exceeding proud of his knowledge, and, in point of vanity, very little behind Alexander himself. His temper was morose; but he had a vehement and persuasive elocution (68). Aristotle made a right judgment of him and his abilities, when he said, he was an excellent orator, but had no judgment. The same great man foresaw what would one day be the fate of this philosopher; for, hearing him treat Alexander with that unbecoming harshness which was too natural to him, he could not help repeating what Thetis in Homer says to Achilles, (67) Dan. vi. 21. (68) Arrian. l. iv. c. 10.

Methinks

WHILE the minds of men were yet warm, the murder of Clytus unforgot, and the king's affectation of foreign manners continually provoking his natural ſubjects, a new conſpiracy was diſcovered, which very narrowly miſſed taking effect. The king had neareſt his perſon fifty Macedonian youths of the firſt quality, who, according to the rules of waiting, continually attended him in the field, at his exerciſes, when at table, and when he retired to his reſt. A new conſpiracy againſt him.

Methinks I ſee thee dying, ſee thee dead.

He is reported to have been a great declaimer, and that on this account he was chiefly admired by Alexander. Once at an entertainment the king commanded him to make an extempore oration in praiſe of the Macedonians, which he did with ſuch facility, in terms ſo juſt and proportionate to their atchievements, that all who were preſent, in token of their approbation, threw their garlands upon him, exceping Alexander, who contented himſelf with repeating theſe lines from Euripides ;

Without ſurprize I hear thy language flow ;
For happy ſubjects pleaſing words beſtow.

He then commanded Calliſthenes to point out the errors and miſtakes of the Macedonians, that they might the better know how to correct them. The orator laying hold of this opportunity, immediately entered into a long and bitter invective againſt the Macedonians in general, and againſt Philip of Macedon in particular, to whoſe greatneſs he applied theſe lines ;

When civil broils declining ſtates ſurprize,
There the worſt men to higheſt honours riſe.

This imprudent declamation loſt him the hearts of his auditors ; to which alſo the king's obſervation contributed not a little. Calliſthenes, ſays he, has not ſhewn ſo much of his eloquence, as of his ill-will to the Macedonians, in this ſpeech (69). But however he might loſe himſelf on this occaſion, when he came to oppoſe the king's aſſuming divine honours, he was again cried up, and all the Macedonian youth followed him as the patron of liberty and the teacher of true philoſophy ; ſo much does a man's character depend on his going with, or going againſt, the people's humour.

(69) Plut. in vit. Alex.

reſt. Among theſe there was one Hermolaus the ſon of Sopolis, who had contracted a violent antipathy to his maſter; the occaſion this: One day, when he attended Alexander in the chace, a boar croſſed him as he rode before the king; whereupon the young man, eager in his ſport, ſtruck the boar with a ſpear, and killed him on the ſpot. Alexander, provoked at loſing an opportunity of ſhewing his dexterity, ordered the boy to be whipped in the ſight of all his companions, and his horſe taken from him. Hermolaus, almoſt diſtracted with the deep ſenſe of the diſgrace he had ſuffered, complained of it in the moſt moving terms to Soſtratus the ſon of Amyntas, one of his companions, alledging, that he ſhould never be at peace till he had revenged on Alexander the injury that had been done him. Soſtratus, who loved him tenderly, came eaſily into his meaſures; and they two having formed the deſign, afterwards drew in Antipater, Epimenes, Anticles, and Philotas, all youths of quality like themſelves and ſquires of the body to the king, to be concerned with them. The event of their conſultations was, that when it came to be Antipater's watch, they ſhould kill Alexander in his ſleep. It does not appear, that any of the conſpirators relented when the very day came; nor is it probable that the king could poſſibly have eſcaped, if an unforeſeen accident, or, as ſome would have it, a miracle, had not interpoſed and defeated all their purpoſes. Ariſtobulus in his memoirs relates it thus: There was a certain Syrian woman who attended the camp of Alexander, and who frequently acted and ſpake as if beſide her ſenſes. This woman pretended to foretel future events; but ſhe delivered her predictions in ſo odd a way, that, till their accompliſhments compelled people to take notice of them, ſhe was laughed at and ridiculed; but when by degrees the falling out of things ſhe had foretold had gained her ſome credit, the king, who had always a leaning to theſe ſort of things, directed that ſhe ſhould never be reſtrained from entering his preſence. It happened, that the night the conſpirators had fixed on for the execution of their deſign, Alexander drank pretty late with his friends. As he was retiring from the place where they were drinking to his own apartment, this woman threw herſelf in his way, and, in one of her frantic fits, bid him go back and drink all night, in which, 'tis ſaid he obeyed her. However it was, ſo it fell out, that that he did drink all that night, which rendered the conſpirators ſcheme abortive. The next day Epimenes the ſon of Arſeas, who was one of the number, diſcovered the whole to Chariclus his friend, and this Chariclus communicated it to Eurylochus the brother of Epimenes; Eurylochus immediately addreſſed himſelf to Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus, who informed the king of it; upon which directions were immediately given, that all who were named by Eurylochus ſhould be immediately apprehended and examined apart. They did not make any difficulty of confeſſing the whole deſign; and each of them named thoſe who were in it. Some time after, Hermolaus, according to the Macedonian conſtitution, was brought before the army, and there charged with intending the murder of his ſovereign. Inſtead of a defence, the young man, with great ſerenity of mind and chearfulneſs of countenance, ſaid, "That a man of ſpirit, who was born free, "could never tamely ſupport the indignities which had "been offered him by the king. He alledged alſo, that "not himſelf only, but his country, had been groſsly injured; that Philotas had been murdered without proof; "Parmenio aſſaſſinated without pretence; numbers put "to death on ſlight ſuſpicions; Clytus butchered in "drink; the Median habit and cuſtoms preferred to "thoſe of Macedon; edicts iſſued to eſteem a man a god, "while that man plunged himſelf in drunkenneſs, luxury, "and other vices, ſcandalous to himſelf and detrimental to the ſtate. From all which, by giving him death, "he ſought to ſet himſelf and the Macedonians free." His ſpeech ended, himſelf and his accomplices were ſtoned by the army [d]. As all the Macedonian youth were auditors and admirers of Calliſthenes, and Hermolaus his particular friend, he was charged with this conſpiracy and apprehended. Arrian ſeems to be in ſome doubt, whether the apprehenſion of Calliſthenes was founded on any proofs, which, however, Ptolemy in his memoirs affirmed, or was ſeized merely from the malice and ſpite of Alexander. We have a better authority on this head, than either Arrian or Ptolemy, which yet is not ſufficient to determine it. This authority is a paſſage in a letter from Alexander to Antipater, as follows, "The young men were ſtoned "to death by the Macedonians; but for the ſophiſt, i. e. "Calliſthenes, I will take care to puniſh him, and them "too who ſent him to me, who harboured thoſe in their "cities who conſpire againſt my life." Plutarch tells us, that Ariſtotle was threatened by theſe inſinuations; however, certainly the king grew very inexorable, and at the ſame time very ſuſpicious. As to Calliſthenes, what became of him it is impoſſible to determine. Ariſtobulus, who was an eye-witneſs of all he wrote, affirms, that he was carried about in chains, till he died of a natural death. Ptolemy, who was alſo an eye-witneſs of all he recorded, aſſerts, that he was firſt racked, and then crucified. Beſides theſe we have many other ſtories about him, which, as they are all uncertain, we think, we may ſafely omit, eſpecially, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of him again in another place [e].

[d] Arrian. l. iv. c. 13. 14. Plut. in vit. Alex. Curt. l. viii. c. 23.

He forms new deſigns.

When the ſeaſon of action approached, embaſſadors from Scythia arrived, whoſe errand was to inform the king, that their monarch, to whom he had ſent embaſſadors, was dead, and that his brother had ſucceeded him, that this new prince was willing to receive his commands, would give him his daughter in marriage, if he thought fit, and, if he deſired it, would come to wait upon him in perſon. Alexander anſwered them in terms of friendſhip, but declined a Scythian alliance. Pharaimanes, king of the Choraſmeni, came about the ſame time to Alexander's camp, with a body of fifteen hundred horſe. He informed him, that his territories bordered on the Euxine ſea, and offered his ſervice, both for providing his army with neceſſaries, and furniſhing himſelf whatever quota the king ſhould think fit, in caſe he ſhould turn his arms on that ſide. With this Alexander was perfectly well pleaſed, commended the king, entered into an alliance with him, and recommended him to Artabazus, preſident of the provinces bordering on his dominions; however, as to the expedition propoſed, he declared, that his intentions were firſt to reduce the Indians, and then to return into Greece; after which he propoſed to make uſe of this prince's offer, and with his whole forces to invade the countries bordering on the Euxine ſea. With this anſwer he diſmiſſed Pharaimanes and immediately prepared for the carrying of

[e] Arrian. l. iv. c. 15.

of his own projects into execution [f], tho' they were far from being pleaſing either to his council or to his army (Z).

He re-enters Sogdia.

He firſt directed his march to the banks of the river Oxus, and then determined to enter the country of the Sogdians, on account of their refuſing to yield obedience to the governor he had appointed over them. Polyſperchon, with ſome other generals and a conſiderable body of forces, he left in Bactria. The reſt of his army he divided into five columns; the firſt under the command of Hephæſtion; the ſecond under Ptolemy Lagus; the third was commanded by Perdiccas; the fourth by Cœnus and Artabazus; the laſt he led himſelf. The reſt of the corps ſpread themſelves over the country, reducing all the caſtles and other fortreſſes they met with, and which were held by the enemy. The body commanded by Alexander marched

[f] Arrian. l. iv. Curt. l. viii.

(Z) Whoever peruſes the critical notes in the beſt editions of Arrian and Plutarch, will perceive, that ſome miſtakes are imputed to the former, and many to the latter, in the accounts they give us of theſe marches, and other tranſactions of Alexander; yet whoever reads Strabo's geography, wherein theſe matters are treated more largely, tho', generally ſpeaking, with conformity enough to the deſcriptions of the writers above mentioned, and compares them with authentic relations of the ſtate of the Uſbec Tartars, and of the north-eaſt provinces of the preſent Perſian empire, will find, that theſe cenſures are, for the moſt part, very indifferently founded; and that theſe antient writers are very far from being in the wrong. This deſerves particular regard in reſpect of the tranſactions we are now coming to; for it is certain, that the countries are well deſcribed, and that what is ſaid of fortifying rocks, and making granaries under ground, are not either dreams or fictions. On the contrary, if an European army were again to make war in theſe countries, the hiſtory of their actions would not only tranſcend any thing recorded by Arrian, but, in all probability, appear more romantic to us than any of the ſtories of Curtius himſelf, who, on a careful and impartial peruſal, will appear not to have erred ſo much in facts, as in his manner of relating them, attending more to the method and elegance, than to the certainty and accuracy of his hiſtory.

marched on to Maracanda, where ſhortly after the reſt of the columns arrived, the whole province being reduced under his ſubjection. Spitamenes, however, who was at the head of the revolted Sogdians, retired towards Scythia, and having procured a ſupply of ſix hundred horſe, he ſuddenly entered Bactria, ſurpriſed a caſtle, where he put the governor and garriſon to the ſword, and then advanced to the very ſuburbs of Zariaſpa; but, not having a force ſufficient, he could not beſiege the town. However, ſome Macedonian horſemen, who had been left there ſick, finding themſelves now a little better, immediately mounted and followed him. The Scythians were ſo terrified at their approach, that they abandoned all their booty; but while the Macedonians were employed in collecting it together, Spitamenes prevailed on his Scythians to take poſt in a wood behind them, from whence, perceiving the victors to return careleſly and without order, they ſuddenly iſſued, and cut them off to a man. As ſoon as the news of this defeat came to Craterus, he immediately marched againſt the Maſſagetæ, who when they heard of his approach, fled towards the deſert; but were hotly purſued by him; and they, and others of the ſame nation to the number of about a thouſand horſe, were overtaken juſt at the edge thereof, and a ſharp conflict happening thereupon, the Macedonians were victors. Of the barbarians about one hundred and fifty were ſlain; the reſt eſcaped into the deſert, Craterus and his ſoldiers not being able to purſue them farther. In the mean while Artabazus begging to be diſcharged from his government of Bactria, by reaſon of his advanced age, his petition was granted; and Alexander ſubſtituted Amyntas the ſon of Nicolaus to ſucceed him, and having left Cœnus there, with his own and Meleager's troops, beſides four hundred of the auxiliary horſe, all the pikemen on horſeback, and the Bactrians and Sogdians under Amyntas, the chief command over all thoſe was given to Cœnus, who ordered them to winter in Sogdia, partly for garriſons to defend the country, and partly to encounter Spitamenes, if he ſhould attempt to make any in-road there during the winter. But Spitamenes, notwithſtanding that all places were filled with Macedonian garriſons, and that it would be a difficult matter for him to make a retreat, if he had occaſion, reſolved at once to turn his whole power againſt Cœnus and his forces, imagining he would penetrate the moſt eaſily into the country try that way; and when he approached Gabæ, a fortified place belonging to the Sogdians, ſeated on the borders between them and the Maſſagetæ-Scythians, he drew in four thouſand Scythian horſe to join his forces, that they might make an irruption into Sogdia. Theſe Scythians being extreme poor, as having neither cities, nor fixed and certain habitations, nor poſſeſſing any thing which they were affraid to loſe, were eaſily induced to join their forces with any nation. Cænus, having intelligence of Spitamenes's approach, marched forth with his army to meet him; and a ſharp battle thereupon enſued, in which the victory fell to the Macedonians. The barbarians loſt above eight hundred horſe, and Cœnus about twenty-five horſe and twelve foot in this conflict. The Sogdians who ſurvived this day's action, as alſo many of the Bactrians, leaving Spitamenes in his flight, came to Cœnus, and, having ſurrendered themſelves into his power, ſwore fidelity to him. But the Maſſagetæ and other Scythians, after the loſs of the battle, having ſeized upon the baggage of the Bactrians and Sogdians their allies, accompanied Spitamenes in his flight into the deſert; but when they came to underſtand, that Alexander was preparing to ſcour theſe places, they ſlew Spitamenes, and having cut off his head, ſent it as a preſent to Alexander, hoping by this action to make him ceaſe his purſuit after them. This is Arrian's account; as for that of Curtius, it is ſo little conſiſtent therewith, that we are under a neceſſity of giving it by itſelf, and leaving it to the reader, whether he will credit the foregoing very probable, or that very ſurprizing, ſtory [g] (A).

At

[g] Arrian. l. iv. c. 18.

(A) Spitamenes had a wife on whom he doated, and as the dangers and fatigues ſhe was expoſed to in accompanying him where-ever his misfortunes drove him, were become troſome to her, ſhe employed all her charms to prevail with him to deſiſt from flying any farther; and as he had already experienced Alexander's clemency, to try to appeaſe the anger of an enemy he could hope no otherwiſe to eſcape. She had three ſons by him, who were pretty well grown up. Theſe ſhe brought to his embraces, and begged he would at leaſt take pity of them; and, to enforce her prayers, ſhe told him

Alexander

The Sogdian rock beſieged and taken.

At the opening of the ſpring, the king marched into Sogdia, in order to beſiege a fortreſs built on a rock, to which Oxyartes the Bactrian had conveyed his wife and family, as to a place impregnable. It was indeed the laſt reſource of the rebels, and Alexander rightly judged, that, unleſs he could reduce it by force, it would afford them a conſtant retreat, and ſo ſpin out the war to an exceſſive

Alexander was not far off. But he thinking he was betrayed, and not adviſed, and that it was the confidence ſhe had in her beauty, which made her not care how ſoon ſhe came into Alexander's power, drew his ſword, and would have killed her, if her btothers had not happily interpoſed. However, he commanded her, to be gone out of his ſight, threatening her with death if ſhe offered to come into his preſence; and that he might not be ſenſible of her abſence, he paſſed the night with his concubines; yet as his paſſion for her was great, it was the more inflamed by the diſtaſte he took to their company. He therefore gave himſelf entirely again to her, conjuring her never to ſpeak to him more on that account, but willingly undergo with him whatever fortune did allot them; ſince, for his own part, he had rather die than ſurrender himſelf. Hereupon ſhe excuſed herſelf, telling him, that ſhe had adviſed him only to what ſhe thought was moſt for his intereſt, and admitting ſhe had talked like a woman, yet it was with a faithful intention; however, for the future ſhe would conform to his pleaſure. Spitamenes, won by this counterfeit complaiſance, gave a great entertainment on account of their reconciliation, where having loaded himſelf with wine and good chear, he was brought half aſleep into his apartment. As ſoon as his wife perceived he was in a ſound ſleep, ſhe drew a ſword ſhe had under her garment for the purpoſe, and cut off his head, and, all beſmeared with the blood, gave it to a ſervant who was privy to her crime; and, being attended by him, came in this bloody condition to the Macedonian camp, where ſhe ſent word to Alexander, ſhe had ſomething of importance to communicate to him, and which he muſt hear from her own mouth. The king immediately ordered her to be introduced, and obſerving her to be ſtained with blood, imagined ſhe came to complain of ſome affront offered her; he therefore aſked her what ſhe had to ſay? Hereupon ſhe called for the ſervant that waited in the entry, who, having Spitamenes's head under his garment, gave the guards a ſuſpicion, and, upon their ſearching him, he pulled out the head and ſhewed it; but the bloodleſs paleneſs had ſo diſfigured its features ceſſive length. When he arrived at the place, he found it ſtrong beyond his apprehenſion; for the rock was not only rugged and ſteep, but ſo ſlippery alſo, that it was almoſt impoſſible to aſcend it; beſides, it was covered with ſnow, which melted afforded the beſieged plenty of water, their granaries being filled with corn; ſo that there was as little probability of ſtarving them by a blockade, as reducing them by a ſiege; yet Alexander reſolved to attempt it by the method laſt-mentioned. To this he was the more ſtrongly urged by the anſwer ſent him, when he ſummoned the place; for the commandant then told him, That when he had a corps of ſoldiers with wings, he might expect to take the place. In order to puſh matters as far as they would go without loſs of time, of which the Macedonians were always frugal, he cauſed a proclamation to be made, offering the ſoldier who ſhould firſt gain the rock twelve talents, and prizes of an inferior, but ſtill great, value to thoſe who ſhould mount after him: the laſt being to have three hundred darics, which amounted to about three hundred pounds. On the publication of this reward, no leſs than three hundred of the Macedonians offered themſelves for this ſervice. Theſe men taking with them their tent pins and ſtrong ropes, went to make their attempt on that ſide of the rock which was leaſt acceſſible, on a ſuppoſition, that tures, that it was a hard matter to diſtinguiſh whoſe it was. Alexander being informed that it was a man's head that he brought, went out of his tent, and enquired into the matter; which he accordingly told him. The king's mind was now perplexed with variety of thoughts; for, on the one hand, he looked upon it as a conſiderable piece of ſervice, that he who was firſt a refugee, and had afterwards proved a traitor, and was like to have delayed the execution of his great deſigns, was killed; but then again he deteſted the barbarous action of her having thus treacherouſly murdered her huſband, who had deſerved well of her, and by whom ſhe had ſeveral children. At laſt the foulneſs of the fact got the better of the ſervice it did him, ſo that he ſent her word to be gone from the camp, leſt the Greeks more humane minds and gentler manners, ſhould be corrupted by the example of ſo barbarous an action (70).

(70) Curt. l. viii. c. 12.

that there they ſhould find the leaſt oppoſition. In this conjecture tho' they were not deceived, yet in the very getting up they loſt thirty of their number, whoſe bodies were never found, being, by the height of their fall, deeply interred in the ſnow; for the manner in which they aſcended the rock was thus: They ſtruck their iron-pins into ſuch places as would afford them faſtening, and having fixed ropes to theſe pins, they aſcended by thoſe ropes; whenever therefore either the pins or the ropes gave way, the Macedonians fell, and, as we obſerved before, were loſt in the ſnow. Thoſe who got up ſafely making the appointed ſignal from the top of the rock, Alexander ſummoned the place a ſecond time, giving the beſieged to underſtand, that he had now a corps of winged ſoldiers. The Macedonians above, in compliance with the ſignal from below, making a loud ſhout and clattering their weapons, the garriſon were ſo much affrighted, that, without making any enquiry as to the number of thoſe who were got up, they ſurrendered the place at diſcretion. Oxyartes was abſent when this fortreſs fell thus into the hands of the king, who entertained his wife and family with that civility and honour for which he was ſo juſtly famous. The daughter of Oxyartes, whoſe name was Roxana, was eſteemed the moſt beautiful woman in Aſia, after the death of the wife of Darius; and ſhe had the good fortune to ſubdue the heart of Alexander, who hitherto had not given any ſigns of an amorous diſpoſition. Some writers ſay, that he ſaw this lady at a feaſt, and that he was ſo taken with her beauty, that he immediately ordered bread to be divided between them, according to the Macedonian method of eſpouſing; but Arrian ſays nothing of this. He only tells us, that Alexander, falling violently in love with his captive, was yet a man of ſo much honour and temperance, that he would not make uſe of the privilege of war, but openly and generouſly eſpouſed the lady; of which Oxyartes having advice, he inſtantly came and rendered himſelf and was received with all the teſtimonies of kindneſs and reſpect [h].

As alſo another fortreſs held impregnable.

After the reduction of Sogdia, Alexander determined to march into the country of the Paratacæ, where there was [h] Arrian. l. iv. c. 20, —— 24. Curt. l. viii. Plut. in vit. Alex.

was another fortreſs on a rock held to be abſolutely irreducible. This was called the rock of Chorienes, becauſe one of the principal noblemen of the country of that name had retired thither for ſhelter, and had with him a very numerous garriſon, well ſtored with all ſorts of proviſions. The ſloping height of this rock was near five miles, its circuit near fifteen; but it was every-where ſo ſteep and craggy, that, except by a narrow way wrought by art, it was abſolutely inacceſſible. The whole was ſurrounded by a deep and broad ditch. Theſe difficulties ſerved only more ſtrongly to determine Alexander to overcome them; he therefore provided inſtantly for the ſiege, by cutting down a vaſt number of trees, of which ladders were made for deſcending the ditch, it being dry. One half of his army was employed all day in this labour; the other half, by three diviſions, wrought all night in the ditch itſelf, where they began to drive huge piles, and to cover them with hurdles, and other proper materials for eſtabliſhing a ſolid bridge, over which the army might march to the aſſault. At firſt thoſe in the fort derided their attempt; but when they ſaw them proceed briſkly in it, and found, that themſelves, with all their advantage of ſituation, were not able to injure them with their miſſive weapons, by reaſon of their contrivances to cover themſelves in the ditch, they began to be diſmayed: ſo that at length Chorienes ſent to deſire that Oxyartes would come and confer with him; which was accordingly granted. Oxyartes having aſſured him, that nothing was inacceſſible to the ſpirit and induſtry of the Macedonians; and that, on the other hand, there could not be a more generous or merciful enemy than Alexander, he ſo wrought on Chorienes, that, with ſome of the principal perſons who were with him, he deſcended the rock, and went to wait on Alexander in his camp. The king received him ſo obligingly, that he preſently ſent back ſome who accompanied him, to direct the garriſon to yield up the place; which was performed without delay. Alexander then aſcended with five hundred armed foot, to take a view of the place, which afforded him great ſatisfaction, on account as well of its capaciouſneſs and converiency, as of its extraordinary ſtrength. However, in reſpect of Chorienes, he left no garriſon there; but having enrolled him in the number of his friends, committed it again to his charge. This nobleman, to give ſome teſtimony of the ſenſe he had of

ſuch

ſuch honourable treatment, finding Alexander's army was much diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, diſtributed corn, wine, and ſalt-meat for two months to all his ſoldiers, and at the ſame time declared, that he had not exhauſted the tenth part of his own ſtores. This made the favour appear ſtill greater in the king's eyes, ſince it demonſtrated the ſurrender of Chorienes to have proceeded ſolely from the ſenſe of Alexander's generoſity, and not of any neceſſity he was under [i] (B).

Catanes

[i] Arrian. l. iv. c. 24, 25.

(B) The accounts given us by Curtius of the Sogdian rocks are really irreconcileable to probability, or to themſelves. The commander at the firſt rock he calls Arimazes. He deſcribes the rock itſelf as if it were hollow within; and as he is fond of any opportunity of digreſſing, deſcribing, and exerciſing his talent in rhetoric, ſo on this occaſion he introduces Alexander making a ſpeech to thoſe who were to mount the rock, obliges us with their anſwer, and afterwards enters into a long and pompous detail of the difficulties ſurmounted by them in ſcaling of this rock. Laſt of all he tells us, that when Arimazes came down and ſubmitted himſelf to the king, with thirty of the principal perſons who had taken ſhelter with him, he ordered them to be firſt whipped, and then crucified, notwithſtanding that he was in great doubt of their throwing his handful of men down who had ſcaled the top of the rock; a proceeding directly oppoſite to common ſenſe and reaſon (71). In the province of Naura he tells us, that Alexander beſieged another prodigious rock, of which Siſimithres, was governor. This man, he ſays, had two ſons by his own mother; which, he informs us, was a thing cuſtomary in that country; and that this wife and mother of his witheld him, by her arguments, from ſurrendering the place, when his friend Oxyartes had taken pains to come and treat with him. At laſt, however, Siſimithres yielded himſelf, his family, the people under his command, and the rock to Alexander, who treated him with great humanity (72). A little after Curtius tells us of the king's entering into a province governed by one Cohortanus, who treated the king with great magnificence; and that his daughter Roxana coming in at this feaſt, the king fell paſſionately in love with her, and being

(71) Curt. l. vii, c. 39.

(72) Idem ibid. l. viii. c. 9, 10.

CATENES and Auſtanes were now the only rebels remaining in this country. Againſt theſe Craterus was diſpatched, with a conſiderable body of horſe and foot; and a battle enſuing, the barbarians were entirely routed, Catenes ſlain, and Auſtanes taken alive, and put in chains. The war transferred towards the Indus.

All things being now in a ſtate of quiet, Alexander advanced over mount Caucaſus, as his ſoldiers called it, and in ten days time reached the city of Alexandria, which he had founded. There he diſplaced the governor, becauſe he had been wanting in his duty; and leaving here ſuch of the Macedonian foot as were unfit for further ſervice, he, after pompous ſacrifices to Minerva, advanced to the river Cophenes. Thence he diſpatched a herald to Taxiles and the other princes on this ſide of the river Indus, directing them to come forth and meet him, as he advanced towards their territories; which they accordingly performed, bringing with them the moſt valuable preſents which their dominions would afford; Taxiles in the name of the reſt, making him a promiſe, that they would preſent him with twenty-five elephants [k]. Curtius tells us, that this Indian king, or his ſon, whom he calls Omphis, preſented Alexander with twenty-ſix elephants, and three thouſand bulls, a crown of gold, and a conſiderable ſum of coined ſilver; which preſents, as they beſpoke the reſpect and being immediately betrothed to her afterwards married her (73). Here are a multitude of miſtakes, if we credit the beſt Greek authors; for Roxana was not the daughter of Cohortanus, but of Oxyartes; nay, this Cohortanus is met with no where elſe. In all probability he was the ſame with the Chorienes of Arrian. As for Siſimithres, he is mentioned by Plutarch, who tells us, that Alexander aſked Oxyartes, if this man was a man of courage? To which he anſwered, No. Then, ſaid the king, the rock is our own, if it were indeed impregnable in its nature (74). Theſe paſſages are evidently diſcordant, and therefore we have not inſerted them in the text, that they might not perplex or impede the reader in his proſpect of Alexander's conqueſts.

[k] Idem ibid.

(73) Idem ibid. l. viii. c. 16.

(74) Plut. in vit. Alex.

and kindneſs of the giver, had ſuch an effect on the mind of the conqueror, that he not only reſtored the king his own preſents, but added a thouſand talents to them [l]. Plutarch has the ſame ſtory with reſpect to theſe thouſand talents; but, in all probability, they were extracted from ſome of the memoirs of Alexander, written rather to ſurpriſe and amaze mankind with fictitious adventures, than really to inform them of what he did [m]. Hephæſtion, with part of the army, was ſent, with king Taxiles and the reſt of the Indian princes, abſolutely to reduce the country as far as the river Indus; and on their coming thither, they were directed to make the neceſſary preparations for the king's paſſing over with all his forces. Hephæſtion executed this commiſſion with little trouble, only one of the petty princes in the country preſuming to make any reſiſtance; and he being ſlain, and the city, where he had fortified himſelf, taken by ſtorm, it ſtruck ſuch a terror as kept all the adjacent country in great quiet. Alexander, in the mean time, bent his march, with the reſt of his forces, towards the river Choe, by ſome called Choaſpes, on the banks of which he found a rough and barbarous people, whoſe cities he prepared to reduce. The firſt he attacked was ſurrounded by a double wall; and yet the people therein were ſo hardy, that they iſſued out into the field and offered him battle. Alexander, with his horſe and light-armed troops, immediately engaged them, and, after a ſhort and ſmart conflict, compelled them to take ſhelter in the place; he was, however, ſlightly wounded in the ſhoulder. Ptolemy ſon of Lagus and Leonatus, two of his principal captains, ſhared the ſame fate. He then cauſed the place to be inveſted, and the next day attacked the firſt wall where he thought it weakeſt. The inhabitants made a vigorous defence; but finding it abſolutely ineffectual, they at laſt retired within the inner wall, and while the Macedonians were preparing to attack that alſo, they opened their gates on the other ſide towards the mountain, whereby many of them made their eſcape, tho' numbers were ſlain by Alexander's ſoldiers, who were ſo enraged at his being wounded, that they gave no quarter.

[l] Curt. l. viii. c. 39.

[m] Plut. in vit. Alex.

quarter. The king then ordered the city to be razed, and afterwards proceeded to Andaca, a moſt conſiderable city in thoſe parts. This was rendered to him upon terms, and he left Craterus there with the heavy-armed forces, to reduce all the reſt of the country and to ſettle it. Himſelf, with the horſe and light-armed troops, continued their march to the river Euaſpla, where the chief ſtrength of the Aſpii, the principal nation in thoſe parts, was aſſembled. After two days hard march they drew near the city, which the enemy immediately fired and withdrew towards the mountains, whither, however, the Macedonians purſued them, and cut off great numbers in their rear. Here it was, that Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus gave a ſhining proof of his bravery; for he attacked the general of the Aſpii, who was poſted on a little hill, and in a ſingle combat ſlew him. The barbarians, on the other hand, fought deſperately to preſerve his body, till that Alexander, at the head of ſome diſmounted horſe, aſcended the hill, and charging them in flank, obliged them to retire, without carrying off their dead general. He paſſed next over one of theſe mountains, and advanced to the city of Agriganus, which he found burnt and deſerted; but Craterus having now rejoined the army, he left him there with orders to repair it, and people it with ſuch of the inhabitants of the country as were willing to dwell therein, and ſuch invalids as were glad to have a place to dwell in. The king ſtill advanced, till encamping at the foot of a mountain, Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus informed him, that he diſcerned a great camp of the barbarians, and a multitude of fires therein. Alexander thereupon divided his army into three bodies; the firſt under the command of Leonatus; the ſecond under Ptolemy; and the third commanded by himſelf. All three advanced towards the enemy; which when the barbarians perceived, truſting to their numbers, they ruſhed into the plain; but their violence putting them into confuſion, though they behaved bravely, and fought ſtoutly, yet the Macedonians had the victory in the centre, where Alexander commanded, after putting vaſt numbers to the ſword. Ptolemy was conſtrained to attack a conſiderable body of the enemy poſted upon a hill. He, marching up that ſide of it, which was moſt acceſſible, without attempting to ſurround it at the bottom, conſtrained the enemy to fly, and, by leaving them an open paſſage, tempted them to fly the ſooner. Leonatus on his ſide alſo prevailed; but the victory was bloody every-where. According to Ptolemy's memoirs, the enemy loſt forty thouſand men, and two hundred and thirty thouſand head of cattle; which Alexander perceiving to excell thoſe of Greece, both in ſize and beauty, he cauſed the largeſt and faireſt to be choſen out and ſent them into Macedon, where they might ſerve to mend the breed, and to perpetuate the memory of his conqueſts. After this battle he continued ſome time encamped, that Craterus might have time to join him; which when he had done with the heavy-armed foot, Alexander began immediately to project a new expedition for reducing the Aſſaceni, who were ſaid to have twenty thouſand horſe, thirty thouſand foot, and thirty elephants, ready to take the field [n].

The city of Mazaga with much difficulty taken.

In order to reach theſe Aſſaceni, Alexander was forced to paſs through the territories of the Guræi, which he did with his horſe and light armed troops, and croſſed a very rapid river in that country, not without much difficulty, on account of the ſwift current of the water, and of round ſlippery ſtones at the bottom, whereon neither man nor horſe could tread with ſafety. The Aſſaceni, when they were well aſſured of this, retired into the city and abandoned all thoughts of defence of the plain and open country. This capital of theirs is by Curtius called Mazaga, by Strabo Magoſa, by Diodorus Maſſaca, by Arrian Maſſaga. It was certainly a well-fortified city, from the pains that it coſt Alexander to reduce it; and if Curtius took the deſcription he gives us from any author who had really ſeen it, we might reaſonably eſteem the ſiege thereof one of the boldeſt enterprizes that Alexander ever undertook. The government of this country, at the time Alexander invaded it, was in the hands of a woman, as Plutarch, Curtius, and Juſtin agree; the latter calls her Cleophes. She was according to them the wife of Aſſacenus, but Arrian ſays nothing of her, though he ſeems to acknowledge that the fact was ſo [o]. This lady had very providently entertained a body of ſeven thouſand mercenary Indians, who, from the upper India, came to put themſelves into the place, and, as Plutarch tells us, they alſo hired themſelves out for the defence of other cities. Theſe

[n] Arrian, ubi ſupra. [o] Arrian. lib. iv. c. 26. Curt. lib. viii. c. 34. Juſtin. lib. xii. c. 7. Plut. in vit. Alex.

Theſe Indians, perceiving that the army of Alexander was far from being numerous, perſuaded the garriſon to iſſue out, and try their fate in the field, that ſo, if it were poſſible, a ſiege might be avoided. This was accordingly done, and Alexander rightly conceiving, that if the battle was fought immediately under the walls of the city, the enemy would reap great advantages therefrom, drew up his phalanx a mile behind his horſe and archers, cauſing theſe to advance before the enemy, and then, as if amazed or diſmayed, to retire towards thoſe. His ſtratagem had its deſired effect, the Indians, conceiving highly of their own valour, followed the Macedonians, as if they had already defeated them; but when they drew near the hill where Alexander had poſted his phalanx, the horſe and archers attacked them in both wings, and the king with his foot charged in the centre. Thus the Indians were broke at the firſt ſhock, and expoſed to great ſlaughter in their retreat to the city, though they behaved with great bravery, and taught Alexander to conceive better of them, than of any of the nations he had yet met with. Immediately after this victory, Alexander cauſed the city to be inveſted, and going to take a view of the works which he had ordered to be erected before it, he had the misfortune to be wounded in the leg. Curtius enlarges mightily upon this accident; he informs us, that the king, notwithſtanding this wound, continued his obſervations on horſeback, without ſuffering it to be bound up; that afterwards, feeling himſelf exceedingly pained, he was forced to have it dreſſed, but continued, however, giving the neceſſary directions, till all things were done that he deſired; being, however, ſo ſenſible of pain, that he could not help ſaying, Though I am called the ſon of Jupiter, I feel like other men the ſmart of wounds and the pain of diſeaſes [p]. Arrian tells us, that he was wounded indeed, but that the very next day he ordered his engines to be brought to batter the place. A bridge being made, the king gave directions that it ſhould be immediately aſſaulted, which was accordingly performed, with that vigour and vivacity ſhewn by the Macedonians upon all occaſions. The Indians, however, repulſed him with conſiderable loſs. The next day the city was ſtormed again with the like ill ſucceſs. On the third day Alexander cauſed a large wooden tower to be drawn before the breach, and a draw-bridge to be let fall from thence, that his men might paſs over the more eaſily. This was a good contrivance, and anſwered the end; but, the ſoldiers ruſhing forwards in too great numbers, the bridge broke, and they fell all into the ditch, where the defendants from the wall plied them with ſtones, arrows, and darts, ſo that Alexander was forced to ſend Alcetas with a freſh body of troops to bring them off. The fourth day a new bridge was made, and the ſoldiers again attempted the place, but to no purpoſe. The mercenary Indians, as long as their general ſurvived, behaved themſelves ſo gallantly, that Alexander was not likely at all to gain the city; but he being killed by a dart from one of the engines, and many of the ſoldiers diſabled by their wounds, the reſt were deſirous of treating with Alexander, which they did by a herald; and for the ſake of avoiding unneceſſary effuſion of blood, the king granted them theſe terms, as Arrian affirms, that they ſhould ſafely march out of the city, and ſerve under him upon the ſame terms they did there. On theſe conditions they accordingly marched out, and armed as they were, encamped on a hill at ſome diſtance from Alexander's camp. In the evening Alexander received advice, that theſe Indians were determined to march off in the night, that they might not be obliged to ſerve amongſt the Macedonians againſt their brethren. Upon this he ſurrounded their camp with his own ſoldiers, and cut them all to pieces [q]. Diodorus Siculus gives us a very diſtinct account of this buſineſs, and treats it as the blackeſt act of perfidy that ever was committed; he does not indeed ſay, that the Indians were to be taken into the ſervice of Alexander, but that they had leave to march out of the place, and that when they were marched out, the king followed them, and fell upon them. This engaging them to cry aloud, that he had violated his faith, and to call upon the gods to revenge it; he equivocally anſwered, that he had given his oath that they ſhould come ſafely out of the city, but not that they ſhould remain friends to the Macedonians; in conſequence of which impious diſtinction, he killed them and their wives too, who bravely fought to defend their husbands [r]. Plutarch allows, that this barbarous action left an indelible ſtain upon his memory [s]. The city of

[p] Juſtin. lib. xii. c. 7. Curt. lib. viii. c. 35.

[q] Arrian. lib. iv. c. 27. [r] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii.
[s] In vit. Alex.

of Maſſaga was ſoon after taken, and therein, according to Arrian, the mother and daughter of Aſſacenus; according to all other authors, his widow. Curtius ſays, that ſhe went out at the head of a proceſſion of noble ladies, carrying golden goblets of wine in their hands; and that ſhe procured to herſelf, not only pardon, but the continuance of her dignity, rather from her excellent beauty, than from her eloquence, or from any inclination of pity in the king. He adds, that ſhe had ſome time after a ſon, who, whatever father he had, was called Alexander [t]. Juſtin is ſtill more plain, he ſays, that ſhe procured this indulgence by proſtituting herſelf to Alexander, and that the Indians ever after were pleaſed to ſtyle her the royal whore [u]; "ſo far, it ſeems, Alexander travelled to find a more ſteady and ſettled virtue, than was known in the ſchools of Greece".

Ora taken, and Bazira.

THE next undertaking of Alexander was the ſiege of Ora, in order to which he detached Attalus, Alcetas, and Demetrius, to inveſt it, while in the mean time Cœnus marched to beſiege Bazira, another ſtrong city. Neither of theſe places ſurrendered on the arrival of the king's forces, as it had been ſuppoſed they would; but on the contrary, made all the neceſſary preparations for a vigorous defence; ſo that Cœnus was forced to turn his ſiege into a blockade, and the king himſelf was conſtrained to go in perſon to the ſiege of Ora. This city was ſurrounded with a ſtrong wall, and had in it a conſiderable garriſon of mercenary Indians; yet Alexander quickly reduced it, ſeizing all the elephants therein for the uſe of his army. The inhabitants of Bazira, when they were informed of this, took the advantage of a dark night to paſs by the troops left by Cœnus to block up the city, and eſcaped to the mountains behind them. From theſe hills the inhabitants of Bazira, aſſociating themſelves with ſuch as were willing to defend their liberty to the laſt, withdrew to a certain rock, which, if not impregnable by its ſituation, they thought might be rendered ſo by their own ſkill and courage [w].

The ſiege of Aornus reſolved on.

THE rock of Aornus was in circuit two hundred furlongs, or not much leſs than twenty-five of our miles. It's height even in its loweſt parts eleven furlongs, the way leading to it artificial, and very narrow: On the top of it there was a fine plain, part of which was covered with a thick wood; the reſt arable land with a fountain, furniſhing abundance of excellent water. There was a report among the inhabitants of the adjacent country, that Hercules himſelf had beſieged this place in vain. Arrian delivers it as his opinion, that this report was without foundation; but it is more than probable, that the report itſelf was raiſed after Alexander had taken it, in order to magnify his exploit. However it was, after making the neceſſary diſpoſitions for preſerving the country in peace behind him, he marched to Embolina, the neareſt city, from whence he afterwards advanced to the rock itſelf. While he was preparing all things for the ſiege, an old man and his two ſons, who had long lived in a cavern near the ſummit of the rock, came to offer their ſervices to Alexander, to ſhew him a private way of aſcending it; which propoſition was readily embraced, and Ptolemy, with a conſiderable body of light-armed troops, were ſent with him; with orders, in caſe they ſucceeded, to intrench themſelves ſtrongly upon the rock, within the wood that the old man was to direct them to, before they attempted to attack the Indians. Ptolemy exactly executed all that had been given him in charge, and when he had ſo done, cauſed a lighted torch to be erected in his camp upon a pole, as a ſignal to Alexander, that they were ſafely got up.

[t] Curt. lib. viii. c. 35. [u] Juſtin. ubi ſupra. [w] Arrian lib. iv. c. 27—28. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Curt. lib. viii. c. 36. Juſtin. lib. xii. c. 7.

The rock of Aornus reduced.

THE king gave immediate orders for a body of troops to attempt the paſſage, whereby the rock was ordinarily aſcended, from which, however, they were repulſed by the Indians with great ſlaughter. Then the king ſent an Indian, whom he could truſt, with letters to Ptolemy, directing him at ſuch time as he attacked the rock next, to iſſue from his camp, and fall upon the enemy behind. But in the intermediate ſpace, thoſe who defended the rock attacked Ptolemy with great vigour, and were, though with much ado, at laſt repulſed. This, however, did not hinder that general from obeying the orders that were ſent him; for when Alexander renewed the attack, the next day he on his ſide came out of his camp with a part of his ſoldiers, and attacked the enemy in the rear: the Indians repelled the Macedonians on both ſides, and though Alexander did himſelf aſcend as far as Ptolemy's poſt with a detachment of choſen men, yet ſtill all they could do was ineffectual, ſo that the king was forced to turn his thoughts another way; he ſaw clearly, that the great advantage vantage of the Indians was the ſtreightneſs and declivity of the way by which they were attacked; in order therefore that his forces might fight upon more equal terms, he cauſed a vaſt quantity of trees to be cut down, and with them filled up the cavities between the plain where the enemy was encamped, and the higheſt of his advanced poſts. When the Indians underſtood his deſign, they deſpiſed it as a thing impracticable; but when they ſaw with what ardor this work was carried on, and felt the effects of it from the miſſive weapons which were now thrown among them by the Indians, they began to change their ſentiments, inſomuch, that they ſent deputies to propoſe terms of ſurrender, which when Alexander had heard, he preſently ſuſpected their true deſign was to amuſe him till they had made their eſcape; upon which he withdrew his guards from the avenues, and as ſoon as he knew that the Indians were deſcended, he with ſeven hundred light-armed foot from Ptolemy's poſt, took poſſeſſion of the deſerted rock, and then made a ſignal for his forces to fall upon the flying enemies. They, ſetting up a loud ſhout, ſo terrified the fugitives, that numbers of them fell from the rocks and precipices, and were beat to pieces; of the remainder, the greater part of them were cut off in the roads. Thus, as Alexander's ſoldier's boaſted, that rock was taken, before which Hercules himſelf had been foiled. Certain it is, that the king ſacrificed there with great pomp, and left a garriſon under the command of Siſicottus, who had formerly ſerved Beſſus, but had now for ſome time been in Alexander's army, and behaved with much fidelity [x]. From thence he marched again into the territories of the Aſſaceni, where the brother of the deceaſed king had taken up arms; however, when he came he found the cities deſerted, and the country totally abandoned. Finding therefore that little could be done there, he made it his buſineſs to find out and ſeize ſuch elephants, as the Indians had been forced to leave in the plain country; and after a march of ſixteen days, he arrived at the river Indus, where Hephæſtion and Perdiccas had already provided a bridge of boats for the paſſage of the army [y] (C).

ARRIAN

[x] Arrian. lib. iv. c. 28. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii. Curt. lib. viii. c. 36.—38. Juſtin. lib. xii. c. 7. [y] Arrian lib. iv. cap. ult. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Curt. ubi ſupra.

(C) Diodorus Siculus informs us, that after the taking the rock of Aornus, the king was adviſed that one Aphrices, an Indian,

Alexander passes the rivers Indus and Hydaspes. Year after the flood 2672. Year before Christ 327.

ARRIAN is very nice in his account of Alexander's passing this river; but neither the importance of the thing, since he passed it without opposition, or the nature of this work, which would be rendered tedious thereby, allow us to dwell here upon matters which must be retouched, when we come to the history of India. The king refreshed his army for thirty days in the countries on the other side of the river, which were those of his friend and ally Taxiles, who at this time performed all that he had promised to the king, giving him thirty elephants, and joining his army now with seven hundred Indian horse, to which, when they were to enter upon action, he afterwards added five thousand foot; the true reason of this seems to have been his enmity to Porus, a famous Indian prince, whose territories lay on the other side of the river Hydaspes. During this recess, the king sacrificed with great solemnity, receiving also embassadors from Ambisurus, a very potent prince, and from Doxareas, who was also a king in those parts, with tenders of their duty and considerable presents (D). These Indian, lay not far distant with an army of twenty thousand men and fifteen elephants, in order to oppose his passage. But before the king had time to think of reducing him, the Indians themselves, whether out of hatred to their general, or in hopes of Alexander's favour, our author pretends not to determine, put their commander to death, and brought his head and armour as a present to the king (74). Curtius calls him Eryces; but he varies little in the rest of the story; it should seem that he was the general of some mercenary Indians (75). How Arrian came to omit this event we cannot pretend to say, unless we suppose that he doubted the truth of it, because it was omitted in the memoirs of Aristobulus and Ptolemy.

(D) There is not the least notice taken in Arrian of the Taxiles here spoken of, being another Taxiles than him mentioned before. Diodorus Siculus and Curtius, however, are positive that it was the son of him heretofore mentioned and that the name of this man was Mophis or Omphis (76); and that he refused to take upon him the name of Taxiles, which was common to all the kings of the country, till Alexander commanded him so to do, and put the crown upon his head, which he did with great willingness, being extremely pleased with this extraordinary mark of submission (77). Strabo tells us,

(74) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. (75) Curt. l. viii. c. 39. (76) Diodor. l. xvii. (77) Curt. l. viii. c. 39.

Theſe ceremonies over, Alexander appointed Philip governor of Taxila, and put a Macedonian garriſon into the place, becauſe he intended to erect an hoſpital there for the cure of his ſick and wounded ſoldiers. Theſe things once performed, he ordered the veſſels, of which his bridge had been compoſed when he paſſed the Indus, to be taken to pieces, that they might be brought to the Hydaſpes, where us, that the city of Taxila, which was the capital of this kingdom was ſeated between the rivers Indus and Hydaſpes; that it was extremely well built, governed by good laws, the country round about being extremely fruitful and well planted; the ſame author tells us, that this kingdom was as large as Egypt (78), which is alſo confirmed by Plutarch; he adds, that at the firſt interview between Alexander and Taxiles, the latter, who was reputed a very wiſe man, addreſſed him thus: To what purpoſe ſhould we deſtroy the ſubjects of each other, if it be not your deſign to deprive us of our fruits and our water, which, as they are the only things neceſſary to preſerve the lives of men, are only worth fighting about? As to what the world calls riches, if I am better provided than thee, thou ſhalt ſhare with me with all my heart; but if thou art already richer than I, I am not ſo proud as to refuſe being obliged to you, or ſo baſe as to think of being ungrateful for your favours. To which Alexander replied, Do not think, Taxiles, that by theſe fair ſpeeches you ſhall avoid contending with me; I will no more be overcome in civility than war; and therefore, do what you will, I will oblige you ſtill more. Which promiſe of his he accordingly made good, not only by beſtowing on the king great preſents, but alſo by making large additions to his dominions (79). After this, Arrian and indeed all other authors agree, that Alexander proceeded to reduce Nyſa, a famous city ſaid to be built by Bacchus, at this time governed by its own laws, and living in a ſtate of freedom: We did not think fit, however, to enter into a detail of what paſſed between Alexander and the deputies from this city in the text, becauſe Arrian himſelf, though he has related it at large, ſeems to doubt very much of the fact or rather to look upon it as a fable (80). To ſay the truth, there are ſo many things of importance belonging to the hiſtory of Alexander, that we are willing to paſs by, as briefly as we may, ſuch romantic ſtories as theſe, that we may not omit things at once more pleaſing and more profitable to the reader.

(78) Strab. Geogr. l. xv. (79) Plut in vit Alex. (80) Arrian. l. v. Diodor. Curt. Juſtin. Plut. &c.

where he was informed, that Porus, with a great army, lay encamped to hinder his paſſage. When he approached the banks of this river with his army and the auxiliaries under the command of Taxiles, he found that the people he had to do with were not ſo eaſily to be ſubdued, as the Perſians and other Aſiatics. The Indians were not only a very tall and robuſt, but alſo a very hardy and well-diſciplined, people; and their king Porus, a prince of high ſpirit, invincible courage, and great conduct. It was about the ſummer ſolſtice when Alexander reached the Hydaſpes, and conſequently its waters were broader, deeper, and more rapid than at any other time; for in India the rivers ſwell, as the ſun's encreaſing heat melts the ſnow, and ſubſide again as winter approaches; Alexander therefore had every difficulty to ſtruggle with. Porus had made his diſpoſitions ſo judiciouſly, that Alexander found it impoſſible to practice upon him, as he had done upon others, and to paſs the river in his view; wherefore he was conſtrained to divide his army into ſmall parties, and to practice other arts, in order to get the better of ſo vigilant a prince [z]. To this end, he cauſed a great quantity of corn and other proviſions to be brought into his camp, giving out, that he intended to remain where he was till the river fell, and, by becoming fordable, ſhould give him an opportunity of forcing a paſſage. This did not, however, hinder Porus from keeping up very ſtrict diſcipline in his camp, which when Alexander perceived, he frequently made ſuch motions as ſeemed to indicate a change of his reſolution, and that he had ſtill thoughts of paſſing the river. The main thing the Macedonians ſtood in fear of was the elephants; for the bank being pretty ſteep on the other ſide, and it being the nature of horſes to ſtart at the firſt appearance of thoſe animals, it was foreſeen, that the army would be diſordered, and incapable of ſuſtaining the charge of Porus's troops. But after ſome time that the kings had amuſed each other, Alexander, who hated inactivity, determined to paſs at all events; yet, before he took that reſolution, he contrived a method of paſſing with the leaſt danger poſſible, which was this: There was at the diſtance of one hundred and fifty ſtadia from his camp, a rocky promontory projecting into the river, thick covered with wood, and over-againſt this promontory montory there lay a pretty large uninhabited iſland almoſt over-grown with wood. The king therefore conceived within himſelf a project of conveying a body of troops from this promontory into that iſland, and upon this ſcheme he built his hopes of ſurpriſing Porus, vigilant as he was. To this end, he kept him and his army conſtantly alarmed for many nights together, till he perceived that Porus apprehended it was only done to haraſs his troops, and therefore no longer drew out of his camp, but truſted to his ordinary guards: then Alexander reſolved to put his deſigns in execution. A conſiderable body of horſe, the Macedonian phalanx, with ſome corps of light-armed foot, he left in his camp under the command of Craterus; as alſo the auxiliary Indians, giving theſe orders to be obſerved in his abſence: That if Porus marched againſt him with part of his army, and left another part with the elephants behind in his camp, Craterus and his forces ſhould remain where they were. But if it ſo happened, that Porus withdrew his elephants, then Craterus was to paſs the river, becauſe his cavalry might then do it ſafely. Alexander having marched half the way, or about nine of our miles, ordered the mercenary troops, under the command of Attalus and other generals, to remain there; and directed them, that as ſoon as they knew he was engaged with the Indians on the other ſide, they ſhould paſs in veſſels provided for that purpoſe in order to aſſiſt him. Then taking a round-about road, that the enemy might not perceive his deſign of reaching the rock, he marched as diligently as he could towards that poſt. It happened very fortunately for him, that a great ſtorm of thunder, lightening, and hail, roſe in the night, whereby his march was perfectly concealed, his veſſels of thirty oars put together, and his tents ſtuffed and ſtitched, ſo that they paſſed from the rock into the iſland, without being perceived, a little before break of day; the ſtorm ceaſing juſt as he and his ſoldiers were ready for their paſſage. When they had traverſed the iſland, they boldly ſet forward to gain the oppoſite ſhore in ſight of Porus's out-guards, who inſtantly poſted away to give their maſter an account of this attempt. Alexander landed firſt himſelf, and was followed as expeditiouſly as poſſible by his forces, whom he took care to draw up as faſt as they arrived. When they began their march again, they found that their good fortune was not ſo great as at firſt they eſteemed it; for it appeared now, that they had not reached

[z] Arrian. lib. v. Diodor ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alex. Juſtin. lib. xii. c. 8. Curt. lib. viii. c. 42.

reached the continent at all, but were in truth in another iſland much larger than the former. They croſſed it as faſt as they could, and found that it was divided from the terra firma by a narrow channel, which, however, was ſo ſwelled by the late heavy rain, that the poor ſoldiers were forced to wade up to the breaſt; when they were on the other ſide, the king drew them up again carefully, ordering the foot to march ſlowly, they being in number about ſix thouſand, while himſelf with five thouſand horſe advanced before. As ſoon as Porus received intelligence that Alexander was actually paſſing the river, he ſent his ſon, with two thouſand horſe and one hundred and twenty armed chariots, to oppoſe him. But they came too late, Alexander was already got on ſhore, and even on his march. When the Macedonian ſcouts perceived them advancing, they informed the king, who ſent a detachment to attack them, remaining ſtill at the head of his cavalry in expectation of Porus. But when he found that this party was unſupported, he inſtantly attacked them with all his horſe, and defeated them with the ſlaughter of many, and the loſs of all their armed chariots, the ſon of Porus being ſlain in the fight. The remainder of the horſe returning to the camp with this diſaſtrous account, Porus was in ſome confuſion; however, he took very quickly the beſt and wiſeſt reſolutions his circumſtances would allow, which were, to leave a part of his army with ſome of his elephants to oppoſe Craterus, who was now about to paſs the river alſo, and with the reſt to march againſt Alexander and his forces, who were already paſſed. This reſolution once taken, he marched immediately out of his camp at the head of four thouſand horſe, thirty thouſand foot, three hundred chariots, and two hundred elephants. He advanced as expeditiouſly as he could, till he came into a plain, which was firm and ſandy, where his chariots and elephants might act to advantage; there he halted, that he might put his army in order, knowing well that he need not go in queſt of his enemy. Alexander ſoon came up with his horſe, but he did not charge Porus; on the contrary, he made a halt, and put his troops in order, that they might be able to defend themſelves in caſe they were attacked. When he had waited ſome time, his foot arrived, whom he immediately ſurrounded with his horſe, that after ſo fatiguing a march, they might have time to cool and breathe themſelves before they were led to engage.

Porus

Porus permitted all this, becauſe it was not his intereſt to fight, and becauſe he depended chiefly upon his order of battle, the elephants covering his foot, ſo that the Macedonians could not charge them. When Alexander had diſpoſed his foot in proper order, he placed his horſe on the wings, and obſerving that he was much ſuperior in them to the enemy, and that the cavalry of Porus were eaſy to be charged; he reſolved to let the foot have as little ſhare as poſſible in this battle. To this end, having given the neceſſary directions to Cænus who commanded them, he went himſelf to the right, and with great fury fell upon the left wing of Porus. The diſpute, though ſhort, was very bloody; the horſe of Porus, though they fought gallantly, were quickly broken; and the foot being by this means uncovered, the Macedonians charged them. But the Indian horſe rallying, came up to their relief, yet were again defeated. By this time the archers had wounded many of the elephants, and killed moſt of their riders, ſo that they did not prove leſs troubleſome and dangerous to their own ſide than to the Macedonians; whence a great confuſion enſued, and Cœnus, taking this opportunity, fell in with the troops under his command, and entirely defeated the Indian army. Porus himſelf behaved with the greateſt intrepidity and with the moſt excellent conduct: he gave his orders, and directed every thing as long as his troops retained their form; and when they were broken, he retired from party to party as they made ſtands, and continued fighting till every corps of Indians was put to the rout. In the mean time Craterus had paſſed with the reſt of the Macedonian army; and theſe falling upon the flying Indians, encreaſed the ſlaughter of the day exceſſively, inſomuch that twenty thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe were killed, all the chariots hacked to pieces, and the elephants not killed were taken: two of Porus's ſons fell here, as alſo moſt of his officers of all ranks. As for himſelf, Alexander gave ſtrict directions that no injury might be done to his perſon; he even ſent Taxiles to perſuade him to ſurrender himſelf, and to aſſure him, that he ſhould be treated with all the kindneſs and reſpect imaginable; but Porus diſdaining this advice from the mouth of an old enemy, threw a javelin at him, and had killed him, but for the quick turn of his horſe. Meroe the Indian, who was alſo in the ſervice of Alexander, ſucceeded better; he had been the old acquaintance of Porus, and therefore, when he entreated that prince to ſpare his perſon, and to ſubmit himſelf to fortune and a generous victor, being weary and almoſt choaked with thirſt, Porus ſtopped his elephant, alighted, and, having refreſhed himſelf with a little water, deſired his friend to conduct him to Alexander. As ſoon as the Macedonian knew that Porus was coming, he went with ſome of his friends to meet him. At this interview, Alexander was greatly ſurpriſed; the Indian king was ſeven foot high, exactly proportioned, of a noble aſpect, and in his air and behaviour preſerved ſuch an unconquered ſpirit, that Alexander was charmed with him, inſomuch that he deſired Meroe to aſk him, how he would pleaſe to be treated? Porus anſwered, as a king; which when it was reported to Alexander, he ſaid, that for my own ſake I ſhall do. And therein, returned Porus, is comprehended all that I can aſk. This ſo well ſuited the genius of his conqueror, that we may ſay, the condition of this Indian king ſuffered nothing by the loſs of the battle. Alexander gave him his liberty immediately, reſtored him ſhortly after to his kingdom, to which he alſo annexed provinces almoſt equal to it in value. Neither was Alexander a loſer by his munificence, for Porus remained his true friend, and conſtant ally [a].

Porus,

His proceedings in the conqueſt of India.

Alexander, to perpetuate the memory of his victory, ordered two cities to be erected, one on the field of battle, which he named Nicæa, which ſeems to have been the ſame which Plutarch ſays was built to the memory of his famous dog Peritas; the other on this ſide of the river, where his camp had been, which he called Bucephala, in honour of his horſe who died here, as Arrian ſays, of mere old age, being on the verge of thirty. All the ſoldiers who fell in the battle he buried with great honours, offered ſolemn ſacrifices to the gods, and exhibited pompous ſhews on the banks of the Hydaſpes, where he had forced his paſſage. After this ſhort receſs from war, he, at the head of his horſe and light-armed troops, entered the territories of the Glauſæ, in which there were thirty-ſeven good cities and a multitude of populous villages; all which were delivered up to him without fighting; and as ſoon as they were given unto him, he preſented them to Porus; and having having reconciled him to Taxiles, he ſent the latter home to his own dominions. About this time embaſſadors arrived from Abiſſares, profeſſing, that himſelf and his kingdom were at his devotion; among theſe embaſſadors was his brother who brought a large preſent and forty elephants. Alexander directed Abiſſares to repair to him in Perſon, and having given orders to Philip to march with a body of troops to reduce the Aſſaceni who were revolted, himſelf with the reſt of his army marched to the river Aceſines, which being fifteen furlongs broad, extremely rapid, having great rocks in the midſt of its channel, he paſſed it with much difficulty, making uſe both of his veſſels and his ſkins. However, thoſe on the latter eſcaped beſt, for when they ſtruck againſt the rocks, the very force of the blow threw them off again; whereas the like accident daſhed the veſſels to pieces. On the other ſide of this river lay the territories of another Porus, whoſe conduct had been very fluctuating during the courſe of this war; for at ſome times he had thoughts of ſubmitting himſelf to Alexander, at others he determined to oppoſe him, at laſt he abandoned his dominions, and led away with him thoſe ſoldiers who ought to have defended them. Alexander in purſuit of him paſſed the Hydraotes, another Indian river, and having now conquered the whole kingdom of this other Porus, he gave it to Porus his ally [b].

[a] Arrian. lib. v. c. 14, 15, 16. Plut. in vit. Alex. Curt. lib. viii. Juſtin. lib. xii.

The Indians confederate againſt him.

In the midſt of all this ſucceſs, Alexander received advice that the Cathei, Oxydracæ, and the Malli, the moſt warlike nations in India, were confederated againſt him, and had drawn together a great army. The king immediately marched to give them battle. In a few days he reached the city of Sangala, ſeated on the top of a hill, and having a fine lake behind it. Before this city the confederate Indians lay encamped, having three circular lines of carriages locked together, and their tents pitched in the centre. It was evident enough to the Macedonians, that the forcing of theſe people would be a work of great difficulty; however, Alexander reſolved immediately to attack them; in purſuance of which reſolution, he encamped as near as poſſible to their firſt intrenchment of carriages, and having taken a view of it, choſe out a place which which he thought the moſt proper for an attempt to be made on. The Indians made a noble defence, but at laſt the firſt line of their carriages was broken, and the Macedonians entered. The ſecond was ſtronger by far, yet Alexander attacked that too, and after a deſperate reſiſtance, forced it; the Indians without truſting to the third, retired into the city, which Alexander would have inveſted; but the foot he had with him not being ſufficient for that purpoſe, he cauſed his works to be carried on both ſides as far as the lake, and on the other ſide of that, ordered ſeveral brigades of horſe to take poſt; he likewiſe commanded the engines to be brought up for battering the walls, and in ſome places employed miners. The ſecond night he received intelligence that the beſieged, knowing the lake to be fordable, intended making their eſcape through it. Upon this he ordered all the carriages which had been taken on forcing their camp to be placed up and down the roads in order to hinder their flight, giving directions to Ptolemy, who commanded the horſe on the other ſide of the lake, to be extremely vigilant, and to cauſe all his trumpets to ſound, that the forces might repair to that poſt where the Indians made their great effort. Theſe precautions had all the effect he could wiſh; for of the few Indians who got through the lake, and paſſed the Macedonian horſe, the greater part were killed on the roads; but the groſs of their army was conſtrained to retire through the water again into the city. Two days after the place was taken by ſtorm, in which ſeventeen thouſand Indians were killed, ſeventy thouſand taken priſoners, with three hundred chariots, and five hundred horſe. Alexander is ſaid to have loſt but a hundred men in the ſiege, but he had twelve hundred wounded, and amongſt them many perſons of diſtinction. This done, he ſent Eumenes his ſecretary with a party of horſe to acquaint the inhabitants of the cities adjacent of what had befallen the Sangalans, with a promiſe that they ſhould be kindly treated, if they ſubmitted; but they were ſo much affrighted at what had happened to their neighbours, that all Eumenes's good words and promiſes were loſt upon them, inſomuch, that abandoning all their cities, they fled into the mountains, chuſing rather to expoſe themſelves to wild beaſts, than to thoſe invaders, who treated their countrymen ſo cruelly. When the king was adviſed of this, he ſent detachments of horſe to ſcour the roads, and theſe finding aged, infirm, and wounded people, to the number of about five hundred, put them to the ſword without mercy. Perceiving that it was impoſſible to retrieve the inhabitants of this country, he razed Sangala, and gave the territory to the few Indians who had ſubmitted to him. Theſe points once ſettled, he prepared to paſs the river Hyphaſis, having nothing in view, as Arrian tells us, but ſtill to ſeek out new enemies, when he had ſubdued the old ones [c].

[b] Arrian. Diodor. Juſtin. Curt. Plut. in vit. Alex.

five

His reſolution to paſs the Hyphaſis.

THE chief reaſon which induced the king to think of this expedition was, the informations he had received of the ſtate of the countries beyond this river. He was told, that they were in themſelves rich and fruitful; that their inhabitants were not only a very martial people, but alſo very civilized; that they were governed by the nobility, who were themſelves ſubject to the laws; and that, as they lived in happineſs and freedom, it was likely they would fight obſtinately in defence of thoſe bleſſings. He was farther told, that among theſe nations there were the largeſt, ſtrongeſt, and moſt uſeful elephants bred and broke; he was fired with an earneſt deſire of reducing ſuch bold and brave people under his rule, and of attaining to the poſſeſſion of the many valuable things that were ſaid to be amongſt them. As exorbitant as his perſonal ambition was, he found it impracticable to infuſe any part of it into the minds of his ſoldiers, who were ſo far from wiſhing to triumph over new and remote countries, that they were highly deſirous of leaving thoſe they had lately conquered, and returning to their own. When therefore they were informed of the king's intentions, they privately conſulted together in the camp on the ſituation of their affairs; at this conſultation, the graveſt and beſt of the ſoldiery held down their heads, wept and lamented their misfortune, that the king ſhould make uſe of them, not as lions, who fall fiercely on thoſe by whom they are injured, but as maſtives, to fly upon and tear ſuch as were ſhewn them for enemies by their maſters; the reſt were not altogether ſo modeſt, they expreſſed themſelves roundly againſt the king's humour of leading them from battle to battle, from ſiege to ſiege, and from river to river; proteſting, that they would follow him no farther, nor laviſh away their lives any longer to purchaſe fame for him. Alexander was a man of too much penetration not to be early in perceiving that his troops were very uneaſy; he therefore harangued them from his tribunal, and, if we might depend upon them, Arrian and Curtius both have given us the ſubſtance of that harangue; but they differ widely from each other, and the frame of each of the ſpeeches agrees exactly with the genius of the author, in whoſe works we find it. That in Arrian is grave, ſolid, and at the ſame time very ſpacious; whereas that in Curtius is very copious, florid, aud full of ſtrong rhetorical figures, which ſerve rather to amaze than to perſuade: We may therefore reaſonably ſuppoſe, that Arrian and Curtius compoſed each his harangue; as to that of Alexander, it turned probably on the ſame general heads with theirs, and conſiſted in a warm repreſentation of the glory that would redound to them, if, after conquering Aſia, they went on to ſubdue the habitable world; a recapitulation of the victories they had already gained, and large promiſes of vaſt rewards and gratifications, if they continued to be the companions of his labours, and enabled him to maintain the character of invincible, which as the ſon of Jupiter the oracle of Hammon had beſtowed upon him. His eloquence was great, and the love his army had for him was yet very ſtrong; however, they did did not relent, but remained ſullen and ſilent, and at laſt turned their eyes on Cœnus, an old experienced general, whom Alexander loved, and in whom the army confided. He had generoſity enough to undertake their cauſe, and to tell Alexander frankly, that men endured toil and labour in hopes of repoſe; that the Macedonians were already much reduced in their numbers; that of thoſe who remained, the major part were invalids, and that they expected, in conſideration of their former ſervices, he would now lead them back to their native country; an act which of all others would contribute moſt to his own great deſigns, ſince it would encourage the youth of Macedon, and even of all Greece, to follow him in whatever new expedition he ſhould pleaſe to undertake, whether to the north or to the ſouth, againſt the Indians beyond Hyphaſis, or the unknown nations bordering on the Hyrcanian ſea. The king was ſo far from being pleaſed with Cœnus, and much leſs ſatisfied with the diſpoſition of the army, which continued buried in a deep ſilence. He therefore diſmiſſed the aſſembly; but the next day he called another, wherein he told the ſoldiers roundly, that he would not be driven from his purpoſe, that he would proceed in his conqueſts with ſuch as would follow him voluntarily; as for tne reſt, he would not detain them, but leave them at their liberty to go home to Macedon, where they might publiſh, that they had left their king in the midſt of his enemies. Even this expedient had no ſucceſs, his army was ſo thoroughly tired of long marches and deſperate battles, that they were unanimouſly determined to go no farther, either for fair ſpeeches or foul. The king thereupon retired to his tent, where he refuſed to ſee his friends, and put on the ſame gloomy and diſcontented temper which reigned among his forces. For three days things remained in this ſituation; at laſt the king ſuddenly appeared, and as if he had been fully determined to purſue his firſt deſign, he gave orders for ſacrificing for the good ſucceſs of his new undertaking. Ariſtander reported after the ſacrifices were over, that the omens were altogether inauſpicious; upon which the king ſaid, that ſince his proceeding farther was neither pleaſing to the gods, nor grateful to his army, he would return. When this was rumoured among the army, they aſſembled in great numbers about the royal tent, ſaluting the king with loud acclamations, wiſhing him ſucceſs in all his future deſigns, giving him at the ſame time hearty thanks; for that he, who was invincible, had ſuffered himſelf to be overcome with their prayers [d] (E).

[c] Arrian. lib. v. c. 25. Diodor. Plut. Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

ALEXANDER

[d] Arrian. lib. v. c. 25—29. Diodor. lib. xvii. Olymp. cxiii. 2. Plut. in vit. Alex. Curt. l. ix. c. 5—10. Juſtin. lib. xii. c. 8.

(E) Diodorus Siculus inſiſts largely on the battle between Alexander and Porus; he tells us, that king was ſo wounded, that he fell from his chariot to the ground, that he loſt in the engagement twelve thouſand men, and that of the Macedonians there fell two hundred and eighty horſe and ſeven hundred foot: after this he deſcribes the countries through which Alexander paſſed, and the ſingularities obſerved in them. He aſſerts the Hyphaſis to be ſeven furlongs over and ſix fathoms deep; and he tells us, that Alexander was informed, that if he continued his march, he would meet with a deſart twelve days journey over, and then the river Ganges, the largeſt and deepeſt in India; on the other ſide of which, he would find Xandranes

The king is prevailed on to return.

Alexander, having once resolved to make the Hyphasis the limits of his conquests, divided his army; and having king of the Gangarides at the head of an army of twenty thousand horse, two hundred thousand foot, two thousand chariots, and four thousand elephants. The king looking on this story to be a mere romance, sent for Porus, and charged him to tell him the truth, who assured him, that the thing was so, and that he was not imposed on. These accounts, joined to the hardships they had endured, induced the Macedonians to refuse to be led farther, which at first exceedingly displeased the king; but when he found they could not be moved, he consented to return, having first given orders that they should first erect twelve altars, each fifty cubits high, to draw a trench round his camp fifty foot broad and forty deep, casting up out of the earth, which was dug from thence, a very strong retrenchment on the inside; every foot soldier was likewise directed to provide two beds of five cubits; and all the cavalry, besides these beds, were ordered to put up a manger twice as big as the ordinary size; these things were done to amuse posterity, and to make them believe that Alexander had led an army above the common standard of men into India (81)—Plutarch says expressly, that the battle with Porus took off the edge of the Macedonian courage, and made them unwilling to meddle any more with the Indians, especially when they heard that beyond the Ganges the kings of the Gangarides and Præsians had assembled eighty thousand horse, two hundred thousand foot, eight thousand armed chariots, and six thousand fighting elephants. Our author assures us, that this was no vain report; for that Andracottus, who was then a youth, and saw Alexander in his camp, lived afterwards to conquer all these countries with an army of six hundred thousand men, and made Seleucus a present of five hundred elephants at once; which prince was often heard to say, that if Alexander had pursued his design, he would in all probability have succeeded, the king then reigning in those parts being hated for his cruelty, and despised for the meanness of his birth. We have also from Plutarch an account of Alexander's causing arms of an extrordinary bigness, mangers of an excessive largeness, and bits for bridles of an unusual size to be left behind in his camp, when he was compelled by his soldiers to think of returning (82).—Strabo in his description of India agrees very well with Diodorus, relating almost the same things which he does:

(81) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii.

(82) Plutarch. in vit. Alex.

having ordered twelve altars to be erected equal in height, and exceeding in breadth redoubts of an ordinary ſize,

 he

does: we have in both ſtories of venomous ſerpents, of a nation putting children to death for want of comelineſs and well-portioned limbs, and dogs ſo ſtrong, and of ſuch ſpirit, that they encounter lions, with many other tales of the like nature taken from Oneſicritus, who was indeed the captain of Alexander's galley, but had the honour alſo to outlye every author that meddled with his hiſtory, which was in truth no ordinary performance (83).——Curtius in the main agrees pretty well with the authors mentioned in this note; however, he differs in certain circumſtances; ſome of no great moment, and ſome which deſerve notice. He makes the diſtance from the Hyphaſis, which he ſtiles Hypaſis, and the Ganges, eleven days journey; he calls the king of the Gangaridæ Aggrannes, and ſays he had twenty thouſand horſe, two hundred thouſand foot, three thouſand chariots, and three thouſand elephants. In relating the ſedition in the Macedonian camp, he hath inſerted rhetorical ſpeeches of exceſſive length; as to the extraordinary altars, arms, and beds, he agrees with Diodorus and Plutarch (84).——Juſtin gives a ſhort, but very magnificent detail of the battle with Porus, whoſe character he has raiſed more in a line or two, than many authors in pages; he places the Gangaridæ amongſt the nations conquered by Alexander, and ſays, that when he came with his army to engage the Cuphites, the Macedonians perceiving they were to fight with two hundred thouſand horſe, entreated him to ſpare the ſmall remains of the forces his father had made uſe of, and allow them the moderate favour of carrying home their mangled carcaſſes to be buried in the ſepulchres of their anceſtors; to which reaſonable requeſt he at length with much ado aſſented (85)——Polyænus amongſt many inſtances of Alexander's wiſdom and military ſkill mentions ſeveral which happened in his Indian war, amongſt others the paſſage of the river Hydaſpes and the battle with Porus; the ſucceſs of the former of which he attributes to the king's invention, and the victory obtained over the latter to the maſterly diſpoſition Alexander made of his troops before the engagement (86). This we have fully explained in the text, and it is without queſtion one of the nobleſt acts which ſtands recorded of this conqueror.

(83) Strab. Geogr. lib. xv. (84) Curt. lib. ix. c. 2. & ſeq. (85) Juſtin. lib. xii. c. 8. (86) Polyæn Stratagem. lib. iv. c. 3. 5. 4. 9.

he caused sacrifices to be offered on them; and having exhibited public shews after the Grecian manner, he added all the conquered country to the dominions of Porus, and then began his march towards the river Hydraotes; from thence he marched on to the Acesines, where he found the city which he had directed Hephæstion to build, to which he invited all the inhabitants of the adjacent country, and left also therein such of his mercenaries as were infirm, and desired to reside there. Abissares, a petty king, who had submitted to him in his march this way, and whom the king had ordered to repair to him, sent deputies to excuse himself on account of sickness, which excuse the king was pleased to accept, because that prince had sent the thirty elephants which he had promised, and offered to submit to whatever terms the king should impose. Alexander therefore ordered Arsaces, president of the province adjoining to his dominions, to inspect his conduct; and having settled the tribute he should pay, marched on to the river Hydaspes, where finding the new cities, Nicea and Bucephala, somewhat damaged by the great rains which had fallen in his absence, he ordered his soldiers to repair them, gave the necessary directions for the security of his conquests, and then addressed himself to the care of the preparations necessary for passing down the river Indus into the ocean [e] (F).

The

[e] Arrian. lib. vi. c. 1—3.

(F) Alexander's design was to sail down the Hydaspes to its junction with the Acesines, and then through the Acesines into the Indus, and through the last mentioned river to the ocean. As the king was a diligent inquirer into whatever regarded natural history, when he first arrived in these parts, he from general informations took up a very odd opinion; it was this, that he had found out the source of the Nile. The grounds of this mistaken notion were these: Alexander had seen in the river Indus crocodiles, and on the banks of the Acesines such beans growing as in Egypt; putting these things together, he fancied that this great river, rolling on into vast deserts, lost in them its name; but entering again the well-inhabited country of Ethiopia, was there called the Nile, and thence rolled down with the same name into Egypt. He was confirmed in this odd conjecture by Homer's calling the Nile, from its entering

THE care taken by Alexander for the execution of this project, ſhewed much more prudence than the project itſelf, he had ordered vaſt quantities of timber to be felled in the neighbourhood of the Hydaſpes, through which he was to ſail into the Indies; he had cauſed the veſſels with which he had paſſed over rivers to be brought thither; and had aſſembled a vaſt number of artificers, capable of repairing, re-building and equipping his fleet, which Embarques his army.

tering Egypt to its fall into the ſea Egyptus; for this ſeemed to imply, that the ſame river running through different countries, acquired different names. At laſt he became ſo confident, that amongſt other things which he wrote to his mother Olympias, he ſet down this; that he had found the ſprings of the Nile. But enquiring farther, and receiving full ſatisfaction that the Indus did not loſe itſelf in any deſart, but by two large mouths entered the ocean, he cauſed the paſſage beforementioned to be ſtruck out. It may to ſome ſeem ſtrange, that we have inſiſted ſo largely upon a point which at firſt ſight may ſeem trivial; our reaſon is this: many have erred in the like manner with Alexander, though few have had the good ſenſe to retract their errors like him, even when they have diſcovered them. The matter here ſtated is a fact, and a fact attended with very curious circumſtances, ſufficient to direct us in all caſes of a like nature, and to engage us not to depend too much on the conjectures of the greateſt men, and the greateſt travellers, but to rely on them only for facts (87). A little before this his embarkation died Cænus, Alexander's old captain, and who had dared to take upon him the arduous employment of being the army's orator againſt the will of their prince; Curtius tells us, that Alexander was afflicted at his death, but that he could not help ſaying, that he had made too long a ſpeech, conſidering the ſhort time he had to live, with other things to the ſame purpoſe; however, he was interred with great ſolemnity, and if Alexander's ſorrow was not over ſincere, we may be ſure that of the army was unfeigned; for they had now loſt their beſt friend, as well as a moſt experienced general. Diodorus (88) and Curtius, in what they ſay of the king's paſſing down theſe rivers, vary in ſome reſpects from Arrian, and in others contradict him; but there is no need of troubling the reader with particular accounts, becauſe they are matters of ſmall importance, and ſuch as have in them more of the wonderful, than of the credible or the uſeful (89).

(87) Arrian. lib. vi c. 1. (88) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii.
(89) Curt. l. ix. Arrian. l. vi. c. 2.

which, when finiſhed, and in a condition to be launched, conſiſted of eighty veſſels of three banks of oars, and of leſſer ſhips and tranſports about two thouſand. As for thoſe who were to manage this fleet, he collected them out of the Phœnicians, Cyprians, Carians, and Egyptians following his army, and who were held to be perfectly well verſed in all the branches of the nautic art. As for the diſpoſition of the army, it was ſettled thus; the archers, Agrians, the light-armed foot, and ſome horſe, he took on board the fleet; Craterus, with a body of horſe and foot marched on the right-hand bank; Hephæſtion, with the major part of the army, and two hundred elephants, on the left-hand. Nearchus, was admiral of the whole fleet; and Oneſicritus captain of the royal galley. When all things were ready, the army embarked about break of day, the king in the mean-time, ſacrificing to the gods, according to the rites uſed in his own country, and to thoſe of that country where he now was. Then he himſelf went on board, and cauſing the ſignal to be given by ſound of trumpet, the fleet began to move. Craterus and Hephæſtion had marched ſome days before. From the third day, we are informed by Arrian, Alexander came to that part of the river which was over againſt their camps. Here he had information, that the Oxydracæ and the Malli were raiſing forces to oppoſe him; whereupon he determined to reduce them, for he made it a rule with him in the courſe of his voyage, to compel the inhabitants on both ſides the river to yield him obedience; but before he arrived on the coaſts of the people before-mentioned, he himſelf ſuſtained no ſmall danger; for coming to the confluence of the Aceſines with the Hydaſpis, from whence both rivers roll together into the Indus, the eddies, whirl-pools and rapid currents ruſhing with tremendous noiſe from the reſpective channels of thoſe rivers into the great one formed by them both, at once terrified thoſe who navigated his veſſels, and actually deſtroyed many of the long veſſels, with all who were aboard them; the king himſelf being in ſome danger, and Nearchus the admiral not a little at a loſs. As ſoon as this danger was over, and the fleet and army had once more joined, he went himſelf on ſhore, and having ordered his elephants, with ſome troops of horſe and archers, to be carried a-croſs, and put under the command of Craterus, he then divided his army on the left-hand bank into three bodies; the firſt commanded by himſelf; the ſecond by Hephæſtion; the third by Ptolemy. Hephæſtion had had orders to move ſilently through the heart of the country five days march before the king, that if on Alexander's approach, any of the barbarians ſhould attempt to ſhelter themſelves, by retiring into the heart of the country, they might fall into the hands of Hephæſtion's forces. Ptolemy Lagus was commanded to march three days behind the king, that if any eſcaped his army, they might fall into Ptolemy's hands. As for the fleet, it had orders to ſtop at the confluence of this river with the Hydraotes, till ſuch time as theſe ſeveral corps ſhould arrive [f].

He reduces the Malli.

ALEXANDER himſelf, at the head of a body of horſe and light-armed foot, marched through a deſart country againſt the Malli, and ſcarce affording any reſt to his ſoldiers arrived on the third day at a city into which they had put their wives and children for ſecurity, and a good garriſon for their defence. Theſe people having no apprehenſion that the king would attempt to march through a barren country, were all unarmed and in confuſion. Many of them therefore were ſlain in the field; the reſt fled into the city, and ſhut the gates. But this only protracted their fate for a ſmall time; for the king having ordered the city to be inveſted by his horſe, attacked it, and, with ſome loſs, took both it and the caſtle by ſtorm, putting all he found therein to the ſword. He ſent at the ſame time Perdiccas with a conſiderable detachment, to inveſt another city of the Malli at ſome diſtance; but when he arrived he found it abandoned; however he purſued the inhabitants who had but lately left it, and ſlew numbers of them on the road. After this the king took ſeveral other cities, not without conſiderable reſiſtance; for the Indians ſometimes choſe to burn their houſes and themſelves therein rather than ſurrender. He ſeems, in reſpect to this nation, to have acted with more than ordinary reſentment, hunting them rather as beaſts, than fighting with them as men, and taking pains to cut off not only ſuch as reſiſted him, but thoſe who fled into woods and deſarts to eſcape him. At laſt he marched to their capital city, and finding that abandoned, he proceeded to the river Hydraotis, where he found fifty thouſand men encamped on the oppoſite bank. He heſitated not to enter the river, tho' he had with him only an inconſiderable party of horſe; and the Indians were were ſo affrighted at his preſence, that even with all theſe troops, they retired; but when they ſaw how few accompanied the king, they returned, and charged him; but by this time the reſt of his forces were paſſing the river, ſo that the Indians were conſtrained to retire to a city which lay behind them, which Alexander inveſted that very night. The next day he ſtormed the city with ſuch violence, that the inhabitants were compelled to abandon it, and to retire to the citadel, where they prepared to make a very reſolute defence. The king inſtantly gave orders for ſcaling its walls, and the ſoldiers prepared to execute thoſe orders as faſt as they could; but the king, who was impatient, catching hold of a ladder, clapped it againſt the wall, and mounted it himſelf, covering his body with his ſhield, Peuceſtas following him, after him Leonatus, all by the ſame ladder. Abreas, a man of great courage, who on that account had double pay allowed him, mounted by another. The king having gained the top of the battlements, cleared them quickly of the defendants, killing ſome of them with his ſword, and puſhing others over the walls; but when he had done this, he was in more danger than ever, for the Indians from the adjacent tower, galled him with their arrows, tho' they durſt not come near enough to engage him. His own battalion of targeteers mounting in haſte to ſecond him, broke the ladders; which when Alexander perceived, he threw himſelf down into the caſtle, as did alſo Peuceſtes, Leonatus and Abreas. As ſoon as the king was on the ground, the Indian general ruſhed forward to attack him, whom the king ſlew preſently with his ſword, as he did ſeveral of thoſe who followed him; upon which the reſt retired, and contented themſelves with throwing ſtones and darts at him at a diſtance. Alexander was ſtruck into the head with an arrow, and fell upon the ſpot, and ſhortly after another ſtruck through the king's breaſt-plate into his body. As long as he had ſpirits he defended himſelf valiantly, but, through a vaſt effuſion of blood, loſing his ſenſes, he fell upon his ſhield. Peuceſtas then covered him with a ſacred ſhield of Pallas on one ſide, as did Leonatus with his own ſhield on the other, though they were themſelves dreadfully wounded. The ſoldiers on the out-ſide, eager to ſave their prince, ſupplied their want of ladders, by driving large iron pins into the walls. By the help of this contrivance, many of them aſcended, and threw themſelves over, where ſome covering the body of the king, compelled the Indians to retire, and others having pulled down the bars, broke down a gate between two towers, and thereby gave admittance to their companions. The ſoldiers in the heat of their reſentment, put all that they found to the ſword, women and children not excepted. Then they took up the king, and bore him away upon his ſhield to the camp. There he continued for ſome time in ſo weak a ſtate, that his recovery was very doubtful. The news of this accident having reached the camp on the river-ſide, where was the head quarters of the whole army, it ſtruck ſuch a pannic, that they ſcarce knew what to do; for they immediately reckoned that he was dead; and when, from time to time, they were informed that he grew better, they attributed this to the arts of the general officers who were about him, nor would they ſuffer themſelves to be convinced, even when they received advice that he was returning to the army. The king was perfectly ſenſible of all the miſchiefs which might attend theſe fears and apprehenſions of his ſoldiers: As ſoon therefore as his health would permit, he cauſed himſelf to be put on board his galley, and rejoined his forces. When he came to the camp, and ſhewed himſelf, both on horſeback and foot, the ſoldiers gathering round him, eargerly kiſſed not only his hands and his knees, but his feet and his robes, and reſumed in a moment that courage and alacrity which had hitherto rendered them invincible. The officers however of the firſt rank, who were Macedonians by birth, after the firſt compliments were over, did not ſpare to tell the king, that he had done very much amiſs in hazarding his perſon after ſuch a manner. At which Alexander, who was no longer a lover of truth, was very much diſpleaſed; but received into his favour, and ever after treated with the greateſt kindneſs, an old Bæotian, who told him, to ſooth his vanity, That ſuch extraordinary attempts became a hero [g] (G).

[f] Arrian. l. vi. c. 6. & ſeq. Diodor. ubi ſupra.

the

THE

[g] Arrian. lib. vi. c. 12, 13. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Curt. l. ix. c. 14. & ſeq. Juſtin l. xii. c. 9.

(G) Arrian ſpeaking of the king's misfortune, vindicates his own credit, and that of his hiſtory. He tells us, that it is not certain, whether a phyſician or Perdiccas opened the king's wound, and drew out the arrow; but he aſſures us, that a great

The Malli and Oxydracæ ſubmit.

THE Malli being by this time convinced, that nothing but ſubmiſſion could ſave the ſame remainder of them, ſent their deputies to beſeech Alexander to forget what was paſt, and to accept of the dominion of their country, which they offered him. At the ſame time arrived deputies from the Oxydracæ, to tender their ſubmiſſion. They had formerly entered into an alliance with the Malli, to oppoſe Alexander, and put a ſtop to his conqueſts; and in order thereto, they aſſembled a great army, with which they propoſed to have joined the forces of the Malli; but Alexander's marching through a deſart, and thereby entering the country of the laſt mentioned people, when they did not in the leaſt expect it, rendered this project impracticable; and the ruin which then fell upon the Malli induced this other Indian nation to ſeek their ſafety by a timely great effuſion of blood happened at that time, and that the king's fainting ſaved his life; for the blood then ſtopping, gave them time to apply medicines and bandages, for want of which he muſt otherwiſe have periſhed. He then acquaints us, that many ſtrange things relating to this accident are to be found in hiſtorians, who drawing their materials from romantic memoirs, were in danger of deceiving poſterity, if no ſtop were put to that way of writing. He proceeds to give many inſtances of the flights of ſuch kind of writers, and then returning to the fact before us, takes notice, that it was the vulgar opinion, that Alexander received his wound before the capital of the Oxydracæ (90). It is not eaſy to pronounce what was Diodorus's opinion; for in many copies we have Syracuſians inſtead of Oxydracians. However, it is moſt probable, that he held that which Arrian (91) calls the vulgar opinion in which he is followed by Curtius (92). Plutarch is right as to the place; but he is among the number of thoſe authors, who report, that the king received a blow with a club upon his helmet, which ſo ſtunned him, that a miſt ſeeming to fall over his eyes, he fell down; but recovering his ſpirits, roſe again, and continued fighting till he was ſhot in the breaſt (93); yet Ptolemy, who could not but be well informed, wrote expreſly, that he was only wounded in the breaſt (94). We might inſiſt here on many other particulars, which to avoid prolixity, we chuſe to omit. Theſe are ſufficient to ſhew what care ought to be taken in writing the hiſtory of Alexander, and how dangerous it is to truſt any author too much.

(90) Arrian. l. vi. c. 2. (91) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. (92) Curt. l. ix. (93) Plut. in vit. Alex. (94) Arrian ubi ſupra.

timely compliance with the king. Their deputies therefore acquainted him, that, not out of any diſreſpect to his perſon, but merely from the love of liberty, they had hitherto declined ſubmitting to him; but that now they were ready to accept of ſuch terms as he ſhould pleaſe to give them. Alexander commanded, that they ſhould ſend him no leſs than a thouſand of the principal men among them to ſerve in his army, and to remain as hoſtages for the fidelity of the reſt. As for the Malli, he added them to Philip's province, commanding them to have a ſtrict eye over them. While he continued in this camp, at the confluence of the Hydraotes with the Aceſines, for the recovery of his health, and in expectation of Perdiccas, the thouſand men he had demanded of the Oxydracæ arrived, together with five hundred chariots of war, properly harneſſed and equipped: which being over and above his demand, and a free gift of the people, he was ſo pleaſed therewith, that he gave the whole thouſand men leave to return home, adding that the faith of a ſo generous an action was a full ſecurity for their obedience. Theſe affairs ſettled, he employed his thoughts, firſt about augmenting his fleet, to which end he cauſed ſeveral new veſſels to be built, as alſo in erecting a city; to which he was led from the commodious ſituation afforded by the confluence of two great rivers. Oxyartes, the father of his wife Roxana came hither to pay his reſpects to him, and was kindly received, having the government of Paropamiſis beſtowed upon him, the old governor having been diſplaced for male-adminiſtration. To this province, that he might further gratify his father-in-law, the king joined all the country, from the falling of the Aceſines into the Indus, to the ſea joining Python, with him in commiſſion; then having tranſported Craterus and his forces croſs the river, and giving him ſuch directions as he thought fit, Alexander with a larger part of his army than before, embarqued on board his fleet and continued his voyage. He had received information, that the kingdom of Muſicanus, which lay at no great diſtance, was one of the richeſt and moſt populous in India. He was therefore higly incenſed, that this prince ſhould neither have ſent embaſſadors to make his ſubmiſſion, nor have taken any other method to beſpeak his favour; and for theſe reaſons would not hear of making any ſtop or ſtay till his fleet arrived on the coaſts of this kingdom. Muſicanus, ſurpriſed at his ſudden viſit, immediately went

went forth to meet him, with all his elephants in his train, and having offered him presents of the highest value, delivered himself and realms into his hands, and acknowledged his offence; which kind of behaviour always weighed much with Alexander towards obtaining whatever was requested. Having therefore pardoned him, and admired at the wealth and beauty of his kingdom and capital city, he delivered the government of both again into his hands; but, lest he should attempt any innovation when he was at a distance, he ordered Craterus to build a castle in the city, and himself tarried there to see it finished. This done, he left a strong garrison therein; because this fort seemed extremely commodious for bridling the neighbouring nations, and keeping them in subjection. Then with his archers and Agrians, and all the troops of horse which he had on board his navy, he marched against a neighbouring prince named Oxycanus, and invaded his dominions; because he neither came forth to meet him nor sent embassadors with the surrender of himself and country. He took two of his chief cities at the first assault, in one of which the king himself was taken prisoner. Alexander gave the spoils of them to his soldiers, and carried away his elephants; whereupon all the other cities belonging to Oxycanus immediately submitted without blows. So much did the courage and fortune of Alexander prevail against the Indians in those parts. After this he led his forces against Sambus, whom he had before declared governor of the Indian mountaineers; but who had fled, when he heard that Musicanus was dismissed in a friendly manner, and had his dominions restored; for he was at enmity with Musicanus. When Alexander approached the capital city of his province, called Sindomana, the gates being set open, the friends and domestics of Sambus came forth to meet him, with presents of money and elephants, assuring him, that Sambus did not retire out of his territories by reason of any sinister designs against him, but for fear of Musicanus after his enlargement. Having then received the homage of these, he attacked, and won a city which had revolted from him, and put to death as many of the Brachmans as fell into his hands, having charged them with being the authors of this rebellion. About this time he received advice, that king Musicanus was revolted; whereupon Python the son of Agenor was dispatched with a body of troops sufficient to reduce that kingdom again, which he performed effectually, distributing garrisons throughout all the country and bringing with him, on his return to the camp, Musicanus in chains.

chains. Alexander directed that prince to be carried back into his own dominions, and there crucified, together with all the Brachmans who were about him, and had inſtigated him to this revolt [h] (H).

THE

[h] Arrian. l. vi. c. 15. & ſeq. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alex.

(H) Diodorus from the embarkation of Alexander, to his entering the territories of Sambus, hath abundance of paſſages which are not to be found in Arrian. The reaſon ſeems to be, becauſe they are either ill-founded or trivial (95). Curtius however hath tranſcribed the ſame tales very carefully, and, as uſual, with ſome improvements (96). But what is not a little odd, neither of theſe writers have obliged us with any diſtinct account of Alexander's war with Muſicanus, tho' they have both mentioned it ſlightly. Strabo treats of it accurately, as indeed he does of every thing, of which, by his ſubject, he is lead to treat at all. He informs us, that the ſubjects of this prince were a very wiſe and polite people; and therefore we need not wonder, that they could not long brook ſlavery (97). As to Oxycanus, Diodorus and Curtius are alſo very conciſe; however, they differ with Arrian, for they expreſly affirm that the king was ſlain; whereas, he ſays, he was taken priſoner. Diodorus calls him Porticanus, and he is called ſo likewiſe in the beſt edition of Curtius. As to Sambus, whom Diodorus calls by the ſame name, but who is called by Strabo Sabutas, by Plutarch Sabbas Curtius, who calls him Sabus, inſiſts very largely (98) all authors agree, that the revolt of this prince was, by Alexander, charged upon the Brachmans, whom he puniſhed moſt ſeverely for it, till ſuch time as he became acquainted with their wiſdom and generous notions; for then, if we may believe Plutarch, he reverenced and uſed them kindly, eſpecially on account of an excellent maxim in government taught him by Calamus, one of the principal philoſophers of the country; which happened thus: Calanus, through the intreaty of Taxiles, came contrary to the cuſtom of the Indian ſages, to viſit the king; and when Alexander deſired to receive from him ſome mark of his extraordinary ſcience, he called for a dry hide, and throwing it upon the floor, firſt trod on this ſide, and then on that; which made it continually riſe in one place, as it became flat in the other. At laſt he

(95) Diodor. ubi ſupra. (96) Curt. ubi ſupra. (97) Diodor. Curt. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alex. Strabo. Geog. l. xv. (98) Ubi ſupra.

Alexander ſails into the ocean.

THE king of Pattala, a noble iſland in the river Indus, came and ſubmitted himſelf to Alexander, who reſtored him his dominions, promiſing to come ſhortly and viſit him, and directing him to furniſh all his army and fleet with proviſions. The king then diſpatched Craterus with a conſiderable body of horſe and foot to eſcort the invalids through the countries of Aarachoſia and Drangia into Caramania, where they were to embark for Macedon, the elephants alſo being committed to his care. As to the reſt of his army, part of it, under the command of Python, marched on one ſide of the river; another part, under Hephæſtion, on the other ſide; the reſt remained on board with the king, who, as ſoon as his affairs would permit him, continued his voyage to Pattala. When he came thither, he was exceedingly ſurpriſed to find that the prince who had lately ſubmitted to him, was fled with almoſt all his ſubjects, leaving the cities empty, and the fields deſtitute of huſbandmen. The king thereupon diſpatched ſome light-armed troops, in order to make priſoners; which having done, and brought them to the camp, the king kindly diſmiſſed them, ordering them to tell their countrymen, that they might ſafely return to their habitations, for that he would do them no injury whatſoever. Perceiving that, at the point of the iſland Pattala, the river Indus divided itſelf into two vaſt branches, he ordered a haven and convenient docks to be there made for his ſhips; and when he had careened his fleet, he ſailed down the right-hand branch towards the ocean. In his paſſage however, he ſuſtained great difficulties through the want of pilots, and at the mouth of the river Indus very narrowly miſſed being caſt away; yet all this did not hinder him from purſuing his firſt deſign, tho' it does not appear that he had any other motive thereto, than the vain deſire of boaſting he had entered the ocean beyond the Indus; and this is confirmed by what he performed when he did enter the ocean; for he ſet his foot in the middle, which made the whole hide lie even; thereby inſtructing Alexander that to keep ſo great an empire quiet, he ought to reſide in its centre, and not make expeditions into remote countries, to endanger the reſt of his dominions (99).

(99) Plut. ubi ſupra.

for having consecrated certain bulls to Neptune, and thrown them into the sea, performed libations out of golden cups, and thrown them also into the ocean, he came back again, having only surveyed two little islands, one at the mouth of the Indus, and one seated farther in the ocean [i] (I).

On

[i] Arrian. l. iv. c. 18, 19. Diodor. ubi supra. Plut. in vit. Alex.

(I) When Alexander sailed down the right-hand branch of the Indus, he found its mouth to be there two hundred furlongs broad. Here the flux and reflux of the sea, with which himself and his principal commanders were unacquainted, exceedingly amazed them (100). Curtius has described their surprise in too rhetorical a manner, and for it has been severely censured (1). At this mouth of the river there lay an island, called by Arrian Cillutas; by Plutarch Scillustis (2). Curtius has given it no name. Here his fleet anchored, while himself sailed out farther to sea, and took a view of another island; after which he returned to his fleet, offered sacrifices on that island where he had left them, and afterwards sailed again beyond the other island, that he might boast of his daring exploits in the ocean. He then sacrificed once more to the gods, and besought them, says Plutarch, that no other man might exceed the bounds of his expedition (3); which carries in it little probability. What is said in the text of his sacrificing for the safety of Nearchus, who was to sail from thence through the Persian gulf to the mouth of the river Euphrates, is reasonable and just. It is said, when this design was first undertaken by Nearchus, that Alexander affected a degree of coldness. He who feared nothing for himself, had a mind to pass for one who was apprehensive of all things for his friends, and who could scarce think of exposing them to the peril of such a voyage, when he was not to share with them their dangers in person. But Nearchus overcame all these real or pretended scruples, by assuring the king, that he believed it very practicable for him to fulfil all that had been proposed; and, on the other hand, Alexander was himself extremely cautious

(100) Arrian. l. vi. c. 19 (1) Curt. l. ix. c. 31. (2) Plut. in vit. Alex. (3) Idem ibid.

He reſolves to leave the navy and proceed by land.

On his return to Pattala, he found, that the commands he had iſſued when he left that place, were, in a great meaſure, complied with; that the fort was in a defenſible condition, and the dock capable of being made uſe of. He then reſolved to ſail down the other branch of the Indus into the ocean, that he might ſee whether it were ſafer and more commodious for his fleet than that which he had already tried; nor did he fail of offering very plauſible reaſons for his conduct in this reſpect. He was informed, that the ſeaſon of the year would not permit a favourite deſign of his to be executed; which deſign was this: He had reſolved to ſend Nearchus with his fleet by the ocean, through the Perſian gulf, up the river Tigris, to meet him and his army in Meſopotamia; but the poſſibility of this voyage depending on the ceaſing of the Eteſian winds, there was a neceſſity of laying up the fleet, till the ſeaſon ſhould prove favourable. Alexander therefore ſailing through this branch of the Indus, ſought on the ſea coaſt for Bays and Creeks where his fleet might anchor in ſafety, he cauſed alſo pits to be ſunk, that they might fill with freſh water for the uſe of his people, and took all imaginable precautions for preſerving them in eaſe and ſafety, till the ſeaſon would allow them to continue their voyage. In this he ſucceeded to his wiſh; for he found this branch of the river Indus at its mouth, ſpread over the plain country, and formed a kind of lake, wherein a fleet might ride without any danger; he therefore appointed Leonnatus, and a part of his army, to carry on ſuch works as were neceſſary, and cauſe them to be relieved, as occaſion required, by freſh troops. Then having given his laſt inſtructions to Nearchus, he departed with his army, in order to march back to Babylon by land. Before his departure, there wanted not ſome who had ſo much love for him, and concern for his army, as to inform him that nothing could be more raſh or dangerous than this reſolution. They acquainted him that the country through which he was to travel in providing for the ſafety of his fleet, by all the methods that human wit could deviſe, or human labour execute, as we have ſhewn in the text, therefore need not expatiate further on it here. The curious and inquiſitive reader may, if he pleaſes, inform himſelf further on this head from the authors mentioned at the bottom of the page (4).

(4) Strab. Geog. l. xv. Arrian. Hiſt. Ind.

travel was a wild uncultivated deſart, where his ſoldiers would be doubly expoſed to the danger of dying for hunger, and to the peril of being loſt through heat and thirſt; they added, that Semiramis, when ſhe fled out of India, endeavouring to lead her army this way, brought but twenty of them home; and that Cyrus doing the ſame thing, eſcaped with out ſeven. This was ſo far from having the deſired effect, that it more then ever determined Alexander to this very method; for it was his peculiar vanity to deſire not only to overcome all nations, but even nature herſelf, and to attempt and perform thoſe things which none but himſelf would have dared to think of. He remained therefore fixed to his firſt purpoſe, and as ſoon as he had put things in order, marched at the head of a convenient body of troops to reduce the Oritæ, who had been hitherto free, and who had never vouchſafed either to make ſubmiſſion, or to court his friendſhip; their territories lay on the other ſide of the river Arabis, which river Alexander croſſed ſo ſpeedily, that they had no intelligence of his march, and ſo made an eaſy and quick conqueſt of the whole country, though not of the inhabitants, for moſt of them fled into the deſarts. Their capital he found to be ſo well ſituated, that he reſolved to take it out of their hands, and to cauſe a new and noble city to be erected there, the care of which he committed to Hephæſtion; then he received the deputies of the Oritæ, and the Gadroſi, and having aſſured them, that if the people returned to their villages, they ſhould be kindly treated, and having appointed Apollophanes preſident of the Oritæ, and left a conſiderable body of troops under Leonnatus to ſecure their obedience, he began his arduous march through Gadroſia. The moſt ſober writers of the affairs of Alexander find themſelves conſtrained to launch out a little into rhetorical deſcriptions of this more than Herculean labour, which the king impoſed upon himſelf and his ſoldiers, merely that he might have the reputation of ſurpaſſing all the heroes of antiquity; we ſhall, as the nature of our work requires, give as diſtinct, but at the ſame time as ſhort an account of it as we may [k].

[k] Arrian. lib. vi. c. 21——27. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alex.

The Miſeries ſuſtained by the Macedonians.

The road itſelf was expoſed to many inconveniencies: For, firſt, it was very uncertain; ſecondly, it was extremely troubleſome on account of its lying through deep and loſe ſands, riſing in many places into hillocks, which forced the ſoldiers to climb, and at the ſame time ſunk under their feet: Thirdly, there were no towns, villages, or places of refreſhment to be met with, ſo that after exceſſive marches, they were forced to encamp among theſe dry ſands. As to proviſions, they hardly met with any during their whole march; the ſoldiers were therefore forced to kill their beaſts of carriage; and ſuch as were ſent to bring ſome corn from the ſea ſide, were ſo grievouſly diſtreſſed, that though it was ſealed with the king's ſignet, they cut open the bags, chuſing rather to die a violent death for diſobedience, than to be famiſhed. But Alexander, when he was informed of the matter, freely pardoned them, conceiving that his own commands were diſpenſed with by the neceſſities of nature; he was likewiſe forced to overlook the excuſes that were daily made him for the loſs of mules, horſes, &c. by exceſſive heat, which were in truth eaten by the ſoldiers, and their carriages broke in pieces to avoid farther trouble. As for water, their want of it was a great misfortune, and yet their finding it ſometimes in plenty was a greater; for as by the firſt they periſhed thro' thirſt, ſo by the latter they were burſt, thrown into dropſies, and rendered incapable of travel. Frequently they met with no water for the whole day together; ſometimes were diſappointed of it at night, in which caſe, if they were able, they marched on, ſo that it was common with them to travel thirty, not ſeldom they were forced to march forty, ſometimes they were conſtrained to go fifty, nay, and ſixty miles without encamping; numbers through theſe hardſhips were conſtrained to lag behind; and of theſe, numbers, not to ſay few, for indeed ſcarce any ever joined the army again, but were left behind, and periſhed; ſo that of all others, this was the moſt dreadful misfortune that had ever befallen them, which however they ſuſtained with the more patience from the example of their king, who not only ſupported all theſe evils with invincible patience, but even carried his courage and ſelf-denial farther, and performed ſuch things as nothing but the authority of the authors who relate them could engage us to credit (K). When

(K). When he arrived at the capital of Gadroſia, he allowed his fatigued army ſome reſt. Here he removed Apollophanes for non-execution of his orders. Thoas was the

(K) Theſe extraordinary acts of Alexander are recorded by Arrian after this manner. As the forces continued their march through theſe ſands, which reflected the burning rays of the ſun upon them, it was neceſſary that they ſhould ſend out parties daily to ſeek for water; the king though ready to faint away with thirſt, marched on foot at the head of his troops, that his officers and ſoldiers, as is uſual in ſuch caſes, might the more patiently endure thoſe hardſhips which their general ſhared in common with them. In the mean while, ſome light-armed ſoldiers, who were diſpatched to ſearch for water, found a ſmall quantity not far from the army in the channel of a brook almoſt dried up, but it was very muddy: However they drew it up, and bringing it in a ſhield, preſented it to the king as a choice gift: he received it, and returning due thanks to thoſe who brought it, poured it immediately upon the ground in preſence of the army. This action of his encouraged the ſoldiers, as much as if every man had drank a ſhare of that water, which he refuſed to taſte; and his extraordinary ſelf-denial is no leſs praiſe-worthy than the noble example he ſhewed of a wiſe and conſummate general. Another accident happened here, which, if it had not been ſpeedily remedied, might have occaſioned the loſs of the whole army; for the ſands being moved to and fro by the winds, and all the ſurface reduced to a level, their guides themſelves were at a loſs how to conduct the army any further. In this difficulty Alexander was forced to proceed as chance directed him. However, he ordered his army to turn to the left, and himſelf with a few choice horſe, went before to point out the road; but their horſes quite ſpent with heat, were moſt of them left behind; inſomuch that only he, with five of his followers, paſs'd through the ſands to the ſea ſhore ſafe on horſe-back. However on their arrival there, they dug nigh the coaſt, and found plenty of water ſweet and clear; whercupon he ordered the army thither, and after that travelled ſeven days along the ſea-coaſt, and always found plenty of water. Then his guides aſſuring him they knew the way again, they left the ſea, and led the army into the inland parts (95).

(95) Arrian. lib. vii. c. Plut. in vit. Alex.

the ſucceſſor aſſigned him, and he dying ſoon after, Sibyrtius had the government given to him. About this time Alexander was informed that Philip, whom he had left preſident in India, had been murdered by the mercenary ſoldiers, but that moſt of theſe had been put to death by the Macedonians; which occaſioned his writing to Endemus and Taxiles to take upon them the adminiſtration of affairs there, till ſuch time as he ſhould ſend another preſident. The king then began his march into Caramania, a very plentiful country, where the troops made themſelves amends for the hardſhips and fatigue they had ſuſtained. Here the king again halted to give time to thoſe who were appointed to meet him to come thither. Craterus firſt joined him with the troops and elephants; then came Staſanor, preſident of the Arrians, and Phariſmanes the ſon of Phrataphernes, governor of Parthia; they brought with them camels, horſes, and other beaſts of burthen in vaſt numbers; for they foreſaw, that the king's march through Gadroſia would be attended with the loſs of moſt if not all the cavalry, and beaſts belonging to his army. Their care in this reſpect was highly commended, as alſo that of Craterus, who ſeized Ordones a Perſian nobleman, who had been practiſing to raiſe a rebellion [1].

The male adminiſtration of governors puniſhed by the king.

The king's return into Caramania made a vaſt alteration in the affairs of his empire; for as from the moment he entered it, he heard and redreſſed all grievances, ſo the people from all the neighbouring provinces, who had been grievouſly oppreſſed in his abſence, came readily to inform the king of their griefs. Clitander, Sitalces, and Heracon, who had ſince the death of Parmenio commanded in chief the forces quartered in Media, came hither with their troops; and were hardly arrived, when they were accuſed of many flagrant crimes, ſuch as ſuppreſſing the Perſian religion, extorting vaſt ſums of money from the people, raviſhing women, and in ſhort giving a looſe to their paſſions in all things. Clitander and Sitalces being fully convicted, were immediately put to death; but Heracon, baffling his accuſers, was acquitted, yet the inhabitants of Suſa preferring a new charge againſt him, he was ſeized, convicted, and executed; which effectually fixed the affections of the people in all the provinces to Alex-

[1] Arrian. lib. vi. c. 27. Diodor. Plut. ubi ſupra.

Alexander, and at the ſame time obliged all the magiſtrates acting under him to behave as became them. The king after a ſhort receſs continued his march through Caramania, not with a Bacchanalian ſolemnity, as ſome authors, and particularly Plutarch, have reported, but gravely, and in good order; as Arrian aſſures us from Ptolemy and Ariſtobulus, who in their memoirs contradicted the vain relations which others took pains to propagate (L). In his march,

(L) Diodorus Siculus, after having given us a dreadful picture of the miſerable condition of Alexander's army, when it returned out of India, tells us expreſly, that as ſoon as they entered a rich and plentiful country, the king cauſed them to celebrate a feaſt to Bacchus, himſelf leading the dance, and the army following dreſſed in the Bacchanalian mode, ſeven whole days being ſpent in rioting and drunkenneſs (96). Plutarch heightens this ſcene a good deal, and runs into a long deſcription of the pomp and ſplendor of this romantic cavalcade (97). Curtius exceeds Plutarch, and diſplays his rhetoric in a very pompous detail of this Dionyſian feſtival. At the cloſe of his account he has added ſome political reflections, which do indeed ſhew that ſuch a march was exceſſively fooliſh and ridiculous, but at the ſame time bear ſo hard on the probability of the fact, that one would think they were ſufficient to overthrow it. He obſerves, that if but one thouſand men of courage had attacked this drunken and diſſolute rout, they muſt at leaſt have defeated, and might have eaſily cut them all to pieces (98). Arrian however aſſures us, that Ptolemy and Ariſtobulus who accompanied the king in his march, ſaid nothing in their memoirs of the celebrating any ſuch feſtival (99). The great Sir Walter Raleigh (100), and the learned dean Prideaux (1), both mention this march, without giving their readers the leaſt notice, that there is reaſon to doubt what ſome authors have delivered about it. Nay, the latter actually quotes Arrian in ſupport of this paſſage, which however he flatly contradicts. This ſhews the neceſſity ~~of ſe~~parating the relations of different authors; if we intend to inſtruct, and not to confound readers; and this ſhews too the uſe of a hiſtory written truly from what is delivered by the antients, and not after the collections of the moderns,

(96) Diodor. lib. xvii. (97) Plut. in vit. Alex. (98) Curt. lib. ix. prop. fin. (99) Arrian. lib. vi. c. 28. (100) Hiſtory of the world, Book II. ſect. 22. (1) Connection of the Old and New Teſtament. P. 1. B. 8. A. A. C. 325.

march, Nearchus his admiral joined him, and gave him an account that all under his command were in perfect safety, and in an excellent condition; with which the king was mightily pleased, and having treated him with singular marks of favour and respect, sent him back to the navy. Some informations having reached the king's ear of great disorders committed in Persia during his absence, he immediately set out with a body of horse, and light-armed troops, for Passargadæ, where was the tomb of Cyrus. It was a small, but neat pile of building, with a fine plantation about it; and near it a convenient house for some of the magi, who were appointed to take care of it. In the tomb itself lay the body of Cyrus in a coffin of gold, placed on a bed of state, the appartment being in every respect royally furnished. This place to his great concern and amazement he found rifled, all things valuable taken away, except the coffin, which was strangely battered and bruised. All the enquiry he could make produced no discovery of the authors of this villainy; for the magi either could not or would not declare by whom it was done. All that in such a case therefore the king could do, was to direct that every thing should be restored to the state it was in before this accident, which accordingly was done, and Aristobulus was appointed to see those orders executed. Orsines a Persian acted at this time as governor of Persia, not by any appointment from the king, but of his own head, the governor settled there by Alexander dying while he was in India; this Orsines was charged by the people with many grievous crimes, particularly with putting many persons of distinction to death, merely to gratify his own resentments. Upon which accusations, after due proofs exhibited, he was condemed to be crucified. This story by some authors is related in a very different manner, as if not he, but Alexander himself, had been the criminal; however, there seem to be no just grounds for any such charge, and therefore we may justly wonder moderns, who are too apt to regard the symmetry and beauty of their own works, to intersperse those doubts which necessarily arise from the consideration of divided authorities. We thought this no less necessary to be said in defence of our own work than proper for the information of the reader, since we presume not to dissent from the opinions of men of so great worth as Raleigh and Prideaux, but for the sake of siding with truth and justice, which no authority ought to overbear.

wonder that modern writers of great credit have given into it, and thence taken occaſion to charge Alexander with a vice which the beſt authors tell us he vehemently deteſted (M). Peuceſtas, who had ſaved the king's life when he

(M) Curtius tells us, that Orſines the Perſian was lineally deſcended from Cyrus; that he met the king with a moſt prodigious train of carriages filled with all ſorts of proviſions and refreſhments; to which he added preſents of great value, and four thouſand talents in ready money. He was alſo, as the ſame author tells us, extremely liberal to Alexander's friends; but paſſed by Bagoas the eunuch, whom this author makes Alexander's catamite, without affording him any taſte of his bounty. Nay, when he was put in mind of him by his friends, he anſwered, that he loved the king, and honoured his counſellors and captains; but as for ſuch infamous fellows as Bagoas, he contemned and deſpiſed them; upon this the eunuch determined to deſtroy him, and for that purpoſe hired certain mean wretches to forſwear themſelves by vouching upon their oaths certain ſtories which he taught them. Himſelf took pains to poiſon the king's mind with the moſt malicious tales, and the moſt cruel ſuggeſtions againſt this innocent and worthy man, whom at length he took this opportunity to deſtroy: The king going to viſit the tomb of Cyrus, which we have elſewhere deſcribed, found it robbed of every thing valuable. Bagoas ſeeing Alexander ſurprized, immediately ſaid, he wondered not at all at it, for that ſome governors were ſo rich, that their houſes would not contain their wealth; and that in all probability Orſines would not have parted with his money ſo freely, if he had come by it very honeſtly. Then Bagoas put his falſe witneſſes upon accuſing Orſines, and on their teſtimony he was condemned and executed. Curtius tells us, that as he went to death, Bagoas ſtruck him; and that thereupon Orſines ſaid, I have heretofore been informed that the Perſian empire hath been governed by women; but that it ſhould be ruled by an eunuch, is a new thing (2). We are not able to trace any part of this ſtory in any of the hiſtories remaining of Alexander's life, excepting this of Curtius. Arrian ſays expreſly, that Orſines was put to death for ſacrilege oppreſſion and cruelty (3). Plutarch ſpeaking of the robbery committed in Cyrus's tomb, ſays, that Alexander put to death Polymachus, a man of quality, a native of Pella in Macedonia. (4) As to the fact, we can ſay no more; but as to the dying words he fought againſt a whole garriſon, was appointed governor of Perſia. Which dignity was no ſooner conferred upon him, than he laid aſide the Macedonian garb, and put on the Median habit, being the only one of Alexander's captains, who by complying with the manners of the people he governed, acquired their affection. Baryaxes a Mede, who had put on the royal tiara, and aſſumed the regal ſtyle, being brought priſoner hither by Atropates, governor of Media, with thoſe who had counſelled him to revolt, was with them by order of the king put to death: After which Alexander marched to Perſepolis, the ruins of which when he had a while conſidered, he is ſaid to have expreſſed great concern for what he had done. In theſe marches, Calanus the Indian, who had accompanied Alexander at his intreaty, finding himſelf declining in health by reaſon of a flux which hung upon him, beſought the king that a funeral pile might be prepared, which with ſome difficulty was granted. The ſage, now ſo weak as to be carried in a litter, cauſed himſelf to be placed therein on the top of the pile, after having taken an affectionate leave of the Macedonians, particularly of Lyſimachus, who was his diſciple, and ſtretching himſelf at full length, remained without voice or motion in the midſt of the flames [m].

(2) Curt. lib. x. (3) Arrian. lib. vi. cap. 30. (4) Plutarch in vit. Alex.

Endeavours to unite the Macedonians and Perſians.

The king having diſpatched Atropates to his government, marched himſelf to Suſa, where Abulites and his ſon Oxathres being diſcharged with great crimes in the adminiſtration of public affairs, were put to death. Afterwards the king gave an extraordinary looſe to pleaſure, reſolving to make himſelf, his officers and ſoldiers, an amends for the difficulties they had hitherto undergone, purpoſing at the ſame time ſo effectually to unite his new-conquered with his hereditary ſubjects, that the jealouſies and fears which had hitherto tormented both ſhould no longer ſubſiſt. With this view he took himſelf two wives of the royal blood of Perſia, Barſine, or Statira the daughter of Darius, and Pariſatis, the daughter of Ochus. Drypetis, another daughter of Darius, he gave to Hephæſtion; Amaſtrine the daughter of Oxyartes, the brother of Darius, mar-words, they certainly belong to Curtius for Orſines could not poſſibly uſe them. He muſt have remembered the empire ruled by a name-ſake of this very eunuch; nay, he muſt have remembered this very eunuch in the higheſt favour with Darius. Let the reader decide of the reſt as he thinks fit.

[m] Arrian. lib. vii. c. 3, 4, 5. Diodor. Plut. ubi ſupra.

married Craterus; and to the reſt of his friends, to the number of eighty he gave other ladies of the greateſt quality. All theſe marriages were celebrated at once, Alexander himſelf beſtowing fortunes on them; he directed likewiſe that the numbers of his officers and ſoldiers who had married Aſiatic wives ſhould be taken; and though they appeared to be ten thouſand, yet he gratified each of them according to his rank. He reſolved next to pay the debts of his army, and thereupon iſſued an edict directing every man to regiſter his name, and the ſum he owed; with which the ſoldiers complying ſlowly from an apprehenſion that there was ſomething elſe behind, he ordered tables heaped with money to be ſet in all the quarters of the camp, and cauſed every man's debts to be paid on his bare word, without ſo much as making any entery of his name; though the whole ſum came to twenty thouſand talents, on ſuch as had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in an extraordinary manner, he beſtowed crowns of gold. Peuceſtas had the firſt; Leonatus the ſecond; Nearchus the third; Oneſicritus the fourth; Hephæſtion the fifth; and the reſt of his guards each of them one. After this he made other diſpoſitions proper for conciliating, as he ſuppoſed, the differences among all his ſubjects. He reviewed the thirty thouſand youths, whom at his departure for India he had ordered to be taught Greek, and the Macedonian diſcipline; expreſſing high ſatisfaction, that the fine appearance they made rendered them worthy of the appellation he had beſtowed on them, viz. Epigoni, i. e. ſucceſſors. He promoted alſo, without any diſtinction of nation, all thoſe who had ſerved him faithfully and valiantly in the Indian war. When all theſe regulations were made, he gave the command of his heavy-armed troops to Hephæſtion, and ordered him to march directly to the banks of the Tigris, while in the mean-time a fleet was equipped to Eubæus for carrying the king and the troops he retained with him down to the ocean [n].

The Macedonians mutiny.

It is clear from this ſhort expedition, that Alexander began to have a great taſte in maritime affairs, which had been too much neglected by his predeceſſors, his father Philip only excepted. It is ſaid, that he meditated a voyage to the coaſts of Arabia and Ethiopia, and thence round the whole continent of Afric to the ſtreights of Gibraltar.

[n] Arrian. lib. vii. c. 6. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra. Curt. lib. x.

Gibraltar. However, of this there seems to be no great certainty; but that he really intended to subdue the Carthaginians, and make some attempt on Italy, is more than probable. When he arrived with his fleet in the ocean, he directed his course to the mouth of the river Tigris, which he entered, and sailed up to the camp of Hephæstion, without meeting either with any extraordinary obstacle, or himself performing any thing worth recording, except that he directed certain engines to be removed, which the Persians had placed in the river to render it less navigable; for he conceiving this to be a cowardly and scandalous practice, worthy of the old masters of the river, though not of him, would not permit these incumbrances to remain any longer and therefore set the river free. When the king came to Opis, a city seated on the Tygris, he issued an edict, purporting that such of the Macedonians as through infirmity or wounds, were incapable of serving longer, or who through the hardships they had undergone, were unwilling to make any more campaigns, might have their discharges, and return home; but such as chose rather to remain with him, should receive so great encouragement, that those in their own country should envy their condition; this was certainly intended to please the soldiers, and to make them perfectly easy: it had however a quite contrary effect; for as soon as the army was informed of his intent, they began immediately to clamour; in an unusual manner, and to transgress all the bounds both of reason and duty; insomuch that when the king mounted his tribunal, they assembled round it, demanded, That they might all be discharged, reproached the king with the favours he had done to the Barbarians, bid him take his dancing boys and conquer nations; and some of them had the insolence to tell him, That his father Hammon and he might go and subdue the world by themselves. It was upon this occasion that the king performed the most shining action in his whole life; he leaped from his tribunal, and calling to his guards, made them seize one by one thirteen of the ring-leaders whom he pointed out, and ordered to be put to death upon the spot; this struck such a terror into the rest, that they were all silent; whereupon the king remounted his tribunal, and in an eloquent speech, shewed the justice of his own conduct, and the folly of theirs. When he had done speaking, he leaped again from his tribunal, and retired to his palace, where he neither put on his robes nor admitted any of his friends for two days; on the third he called the Perſian nobility round him, promoted them to the principal commands in the army, and permitted ſuch of them as were become his relations by marriage to kiſs him. In the mean-time the Macedonians ſtood moſt of them about the tribunal, like ſtatues; but when they were told that the king was forming a Perſian army after the Grecian manner, and that he intended to give the title of the royal regiment to a Perſian corps of horſe, they ran like diſtracted people to the palace; and ſurrounding it laid down their arms, offered to deliver up the authors of the ſedition, and proteſted that they would remain there day and night, till the king had pity on them. When Alexander was informed of this, the came to the gate in order to ſpeak to them; but when he ſaw their arms upon the ground, and their dejected looks, he melted into tears, and loſt the power of ſpeaking. A quarter of an hour paſt in deep ſilence; at laſt Callines, an antient man, who had ſerved in an auxiliary troop of horſe, broke it: Thy Macedonians, O king! ſaid he, are full of grief, becauſe you have ſtyled the Perſians your kindred, and have ſuffered them to kiſs you, while they were excluded. The king anſwered, I now make you all my kindred, and hence forward will have you reputed ſo. Callines thereupon ſtepping forward, kiſſed him, as did every one of the Macedonians. After this Alexander gave a ſolemn feaſt, at which were preſent nine thouſand perſons. The Macedonians ſat next the king, next them the Perſians, and after them perſons of all nations. This vaſt company eat together, and drank all out of one golden cup, to the proſperity and perpetual affection of all the nations over whom Alexander was king [o].

on

Alexander marches into Media.

THE Macedonians who were ſent home as invalids, amounted to ten thouſand; they had each of them their pay, and a talent apiece given them over for their expences; Craterus was appointed their commander, and Polyſpercon nominated to aſſiſt him; orders were likewiſe ſent into Macedonia, directing that theſe old ſoldiers ſhould have great reſpect paid them, and themſelves and their children enjoy large privileges; their ſons, however, by Aſiatic women the king retained, appointing them ſchools

[o] Arrian. Diodor. Plut. Curt. & Juſt. ubi ſupra.

ſchools and maſters at his own expence. The ſeverity with which he puniſhed ſuch of the governors as had offended during his abſence, as it extremely pleaſed the people in general, ſo it frightened ſuch as were guilty, as thoſe who were executed, inſomuch, that many of them fled. Amongſt the reſt, Harpalus, who had done ſo once before; but now, to ſecure himſelf effectually, he took five thouſand talents out of the king's treaſury, and having collected about ſix thouſand mercenary ſoldiers he left them at Tænarus, and went himſelf to Athens; from whence, after ſome time, being obliged to withdraw, he returned to his troops, and was killed by Thimbro, one of his intimate friends. As for Alexander, having cured the army of ſedition, he was plagued with diſputes among his friends. Hephæſtion his favourite eſpecially preſumed too far on his kindneſs towards him, and had once the inſolence to remove Eumenes, the king's ſecretary, and the man of the cleareſt head in his whole army, out of his lodgings, for the ſake of a muſician belonging to himſelf; whereupon Eumenes went to the king, and in the height of his paſſion told him, That the way to be in his favour now was to lay down their arms, and turn fidlers. The king was very angry with Hephæſtion, and after having reproved him ſharply, obliged him againſt his will to be reconciled to Eumenes. Then the king continued his march through Media, in which, as Arrian informs us, it was ſaid that he received from Atrobates a troop of female warriors, who were ſuppoſed to be Amazons; but the ſame author tells us, that no author of any dignity had preſumed to publiſh ſuch a ſtory in his writings; he therefore rejects it as a fiction, as we alſo do, nor ſhall we trouble the readers with what other authors relate of Thaleſtris, her corps of female warriors, and her deſiring Alexander to get her with child; tales fitter for a romance, than for any thing which bears the name of hiſtory, much leſs the hiſtory of Alexander, the moſt proſperous captain of the Greeks, once the moſt eminent and deſerving people in the world. The cauſe of the king's march this way is not expreſſed by Arrian, or indeed, by any other author; but it may with probability be imputed to Harpalus's flight, and the danger there was, that the reſt of the royal treaſures might be diſſipated; however ever it was, the king continued his rout to Ecbatana by pretty quick marches [p].

The death Hephæſt: On his arrival at that noble capital, he offered ſacrifice to the gods, and exhibited ſolemn ſports and plays, making alſo a royal banquet on that occaſion; but the joy and mirth, as well of the king as of his army, was very ſhortly interrupted by Hephæſtion's falling ſuddenly very ill, and appearing to be in great danger of death. Authors are not agreed as to the occaſion of his ſickneſs; ſome expreſly affirming that he over-drank himſelf; others, that he took a ſurfeit; however, on the ſeventh day of his illneſs mortal ſigns appeared, of which when the king had notice, he immediately quitted the place of exerciſe, where he was at that time, and went to ſee him; but he came too late, for before he reached his lodgings, Hephæſtion was dead. It is ſaid, that his phyſician having preſcribed him a low diet, he refuſed to comply with it, eat a boiled capon, and drank freely of ſome wine which he liked that day; whereupon his fever, returning with greater violence than ever, carried him off. The king expreſſed very deep concern for the loſs of his friend, and did him all the honours he could poſſibly deviſe. Plutarch ſays, he ordered ten thouſand talents to be ſpent on his monument; Arrian mentions the ſame ſum ſpent in his obſequies at Babylon: as for what Ælian tells us, that he razed the caſtle of Ecbatana, crucified Hephæſtion's phyſician, and forbad the ſound of the flute, or of any other muſical inſtrument in his camp; it really deſerves no credit [q]. One thing Arrian informs us relating to this buſineſs, which is more probable, and at the ſame time more curious, and better worth relating, viz. that all the great officers in Alexander's army devoted themſelves and their arms to Hephæſtion at the motion of Eumenes, who took this method of ſhewing, that, far from being pleaſed at the death of a man who had differed with him, he was deeply coneerned at it [r]. In the neighbourhood of Ecbatana dwelt the Coſſeans, a race of rude and barbarous people, ſheltering themſelves in the Median mountains, and whom ſome writers affirm never to

[p] Arrian. lib. vii. c. 13. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii. Plut. in vit. Alex. Juſtin. lib. xii. [q] Ælian. Hiſt. Var. lib. ii. c. 41. [r] Arrian. ubi ſupra.

to have been ſubdued by the Perſian kings. Againſt theſe people on account of their having committed ſome new robberies, Alexander, though it was winter, reſolved to march, which accordingly he did, dividing his army into two bodies, one under his own command, the other under that of Ptolemy Lagus. The Coſſeans, as ſoon as he entered their country, fled to their old hiding places, ſuppoſing they would be now, as they had been heretofore, ſo many inacceſſible fortreſſes; but they were quite miſtaken, for Alexander and Ptolemy continually purſued them, and at the head of the light-armed foot clambered up the rocks, and either compelled thoſe who had taken ſhelter there to come down, or blocked up the mouths of their caves, and left them to ſtarve. Whereupon the Coſſeans in deſpair ſent deputies to ſubmit themſelves to Alexander's mercy. Some authors have affected to call this expedition man-hunting, and tell us, that Alexander, having ſlain many thouſands of theſe poor people, called it offering a ſacrifice to the manes of Hephæſtion. But if, as all authors agree, the Coſſeans were no better than a race of highland robbers, who preſuming on the natural ſtrength of their country, thought to plunder ſuch as paſſed through the ſkirts of it with impunity; with what propriety can the king's puniſhing theſe criminals be ſtyled man-hunting; as to his ſacrificing to the manes of Hephæſtion, we are told, that at Babylon he offered ten thouſand beaſts of different kinds to h'm; yet even this is taken from romance writers; for neither Ptolemy nor Ariſtobulus mention any ſuch thing; what credit then ought we to give to this ſtory of ſacrificing men? If we may be indulged a conjecture, we can offer ſome account of the origin of this tale. It is highly probable, that ſome of Alexander's officers might propoſe the undertaking of this expedition to cure his grief, and in all likelihood ſome rhetorical flouriſher in his memoirs after Alexander's death, took from thence a hint of calling this a ſacrifice to the manes of Hephæſtion, and, as is natural enough, ſome dull writer or other tranſcribed this flouriſh for truth. Arrian often complains of ſuch things, and Eratoſthenes had before expoſed them; we may therefore juſtly wonder when we find modern writers tranſcribing theſe improbable ſtories without giving their readers the leaſt caution, or putting them in mind that they are taken from writers of doubtful credit. If the following a different ferent method hath ſomething lengthened this hiſtory, the judicious peruſer will not complain, ſince it is certainly of equal importance to be acquainted with the authority on which facts are founded, as to be told the facts themſelves [s]. But to return to Alexander; while he was at Ecbatana, he gave orders for felling a great quantity of timber in the mountains for building a navy, with which he deſigned to examine the Hyrcanian or Caſpian ſea, and to make himſelf as thoroughly acquainted therewith, as he now was with the coaſts of the ocean, and the paſſage into the Tigris by the Perſian gulph. Theſe directions given, and the neceſſary orders diſtributed for the quiet adminiſtration of affairs in the province, he ſet out for Babylon.

Alexander marches to Babylon.

In his march from Ecbatana to the laſt mentioned city, he gave directions for collecting whatever Grecian ſtatues or other curioſities had been brought by Xerxes or any of his officers in any of their expeditions out of Greece into the Perſian dominions, and ordered they ſhould be carefully ſent back. He likewiſe gave audience to many embaſſadors, not only from the ſtates of Greece, but alſo from Barbarian princes, who came to congratulate him on his ſafe return from his Indian expedition, giving them not only courteous and obliging anſwers, but alſo gratifying them in what ever requeſts they made him. When he drew near Babylon, the magi are ſaid to have ſent a deputation, requeſting the king not to enter that city, becauſe they foreſaw that it would be fatal to him. Others ſay, that they were afraid to deliver the meſſage they were charged with to the king himſelf, but that they applied themſelves to Nearchus, who was then at court, and informed him of the king's danger; however it was, all agree that the king had notice of theſe predictions of the magi, and that at firſt they made great impreſſion on him; but that when he had heard the Grecian philoſophers reaſon upon this ſubject, he began to ſlight ſuch things, and to return to his firſt reſolution of marching directly to Babylon. When the Chaldeans found this, they offered the king another piece of advice, which was this; that if he would needs enter Babylon, he ſhould march round it, and ſo enter it with his face towards the eaſt. To this the king aſſented; but when he attempted to put it in execution, he found it impracticable, for the country, on the other ſide of Babylon, being a deep impaſſable marſh, he was conſtrained to return, and to enter it with his face to the weſt. This with ſome other preſages, and unlucky omens, ſome of which fell out, and others were remembered about this time, gave the king great uneaſineſs (N). However, when he had been ſome time

[s] Athen. Deiponoſoph. lib. x. Plut. in vit. Alex. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

(N) The preſages referred to in the text are thus related by Arrian. Ariſtobulus tells us a ſtrange ſtory which happened to one of Alexander's men in this manner: When Apollodorus the Amphipolitan, one of the king's friends, who had been deputed to preſide over the army, which was left for the ſecurity of the province, Mazus being then governor, met him at his return from India, and perceiving how ſeverely he had treated ſeveral governors of provinces, he wrote to his brother Pythagoras, one of thoſe augurs who gave anſwers by inſpecting the entrails of beaſts, and conſulted him about his own ſafety. Pythagoras aſked him in anſwer to his letter, of whom he principally ſtood in fear, that he might divine accordingly? and when he replied, that he chiefly dreaded Alexander and Hephæſtion, and when he ſaw the laps or fillets of the liver wanting, he wrote a letter, and ſent it ſealed to his brother Apollodorus then at Ecbatana, wherein he aſſured him he need not ſtand in fear of Hephæſtion, for he would ſhortly be taken off by death. And Ariſtobulus tells us, that Apollodorus received this letter the day before Hephæſtion's deceaſe: Then Pythagoras again conſulting for Alexander, and finding the fillets of the liver wanting thereto, wrote to the ſame purpoſe a ſecond time to Apollodorus. He never ſo much as endeavoured to conceal the matter, but freely communicated the whole ſtory to the king, as a teſtimony of his ſincere good will towards him; and entreated him to beware of the danger which threatened. Alexander hereupon commended him for his fidelity, and when he entered into Babylon, he demanded of Pythagoras by what means he was informed of thoſe things which he had written to his brother concerning him? and being anſwered, that the livers of the ſacrifices offered for that purpoſe were defective; he again enquired what that portended? to which the augur replied, ſome great miſchief. However, the king was ſo far from being offended at him, that he reſpected him the more for relating the whole matter to him ſimply and ſincerely. Ariſtobulus tells us, that he received this ſtory from Pythagoras's own mouth, who alſo afterwards inſpected the entrails for Perdiccas and Antigonus, and gave the ſame reſponſes, and the events happened accordingly; for Perdiccas was ſlain making war againſt Ptolemy, and Antigonus loſt his life in a battle againſt Seleu-

cus

time in Babylon, he reſumed his former ſpirit, and began to bend his thoughts to the execution of certain vaſt deſigns he had formed, ſuch as the conqueſt of the Arabians, the draining the Babylonian fens, and making a baſon at Babylon capable of containing a thouſand gallies. As to the firſt of theſe deſigns, he directed proper enquiries to be made concerning the country, people, and moſt proper time for invading Arabia. For his third project, he inſtantly aſſigned a number of ſhip-builders, architects, and labourers to carry it on; and as to the ſecond, he went in perſon down the Euphrates, about fourſcore of our miles, to examine the canal called Pallacopas; by which the waters of the Euphrates were to be let out in order to judge the better of the propoſals he ſhould receive for remedying theſe evils which fell ſo heavy upon Aſſyria. From thence he paſſed to the mouth of the canal, and ſo to the Arabian confines, where finding an agreeable ſituation, he built a new city, and left in it a colony of Greek mercenaries. Then he determined to ſail back through the marſhes, having the city on his left hand. To ſhew the ſkill he had acquired in naval affairs, he directed the royal galley himſelf; but as he was upon deck for this purpoſe, his tiara and fillet, which, according to the eaſtern mode, he wore to denote his regal dignity, were blown off by the wind. The tiara by its weight was carried to the bottom of the river; but the fillet was born by the winds to the ſepulchre of one of the Aſſyrian kings, and there it ſtuck upon the reeds. A ſailor ſeeing this, and being deſirous to ſhew his zeal and courage in his maſter's ſervice, jumped into the water, ſwam to the monument, and recovered the fillet. But being afraid that cus and Lyſimachus, at the river Ipſus. A ſtrange ſtory is alſo related concerning Calanus the Sage, to this effect: When he was carried towards the funeral pile, immediately before his death, he kiſſed all his friends, and took his leave of them, except Alexander, and when he drew near the king for that end, he refuſed to kiſs, and take his leave of him then; but told him, he would find him again at Babylon, and do it there. Theſe words were not at all regarded at that time by thoſe who heard them; but the deceaſe of Alexander afterwards at Babylon brought them freſh into their memories, and they then looked upon them as a prophecy of his death (5).

(5) Arrian. lib. vii. c. 18.

it might be wet as he ſwam back again, he put it upon his head, which was believed to encreaſe the preſage already held ominous enough [a]. Some writers have informed us, that this ſailor on his coming aboard had a talent given him as a reward for his boldneſs, but that he was immediately put to death; but what Ariſtobulus ſays, beſides the credit it derives from his ſaying it, is much more probable, viz. that he was rewarded with a talent for ſaving the fillet, and ſcourged for his indiſcretion in putting it on his head. When the king returned to Babylon, he found there Peuceſtas who was come from Perſia with twenty thouſand regular troops, beſides a conſiderable corps of Coſſeans and Tapurians, nations lately reduced. Philoxenus alſo arrived with an army out of Caria, Menander with a body of troops from Lydia, and Menidas with ſeveral ſquadrons of horſe. Embaſſadors from Greece alſo arrived, who approached the king with garlands on their heads, and preſented him with golden crowns, intending thereby to offer him divine honours, a thing which had been fatal to his father, and proved no leſs ſo to the ſon. He was extremely deſirous of forming the Perſian troops on the Macedonian model, and having firſt appointed them officers of that nation, he next determined to incorporate them into his grand army. For this purpoſe having directed a review, he aſſiſted thereat for ſome time with great pleaſure; but finding himſelf on a ſudden very dry, he quitted his throne to go and take ſome refreſhment. A mean fellow, who was a priſoner, but ſometimes permitted to go without chains, ſeeing the royal ſeat empty, paſſed briſkly through the eunuchs, and ſat himſelf down on the throne. When the king was informed of this, he ordered the man to be ſeized, and examined whether any body put him upon this, or what was his motive, if he did it of his own accord. The man anſwered, that him ſelfonly was to blame, and that he did it from a levity of mind, for which he could not account. On this account the thing was held ſtill the more ominous, and the unhappy wretch for his unaccountable preſumption, immediately put to death. A few days after this, when he offered the accuſtomed ſacrifices for the ſucceſs of his affairs, and had added ſome new ones, by the advice of his ſoothſayers, he feaſted his friends, and continued the banquet till late at night. He is

[a] Arrian. lib. vii. c. 22. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii.

is alſo ſaid to have given the fleſh of the ſacrificed beaſts to his army, and ordered wine to be diſtributed among them, according to their numbers in each troop and company. Some authors add, that he was then willing to have retired from the banquet to his bed-chamber, but was met on his way by Medius, one of his friends at that time in high favour, who entreated him to go and make merry with him that night, for that the ſports and entertainments in his apartments would not diſpleaſe him. The royal diary gives us an account that he eat and drank with Medius, and then retired to reſt, and when he awaked and had waſhed and refreſhed himſelf, he again ſupped with Medius, and drank till late at night. When he retired from the banquet, and had waſhed, he eat a little, and lay down there, becauſe he had ſome ſymptoms of a fever. Afterwards he was carried in a chair to the temple, and there ſacrificed after his uſual manner, and this he repeated ſeveral days; and when the ſacrifices were performed, he lay in an apartment prepared on purpoſe for him, till the evening. In the mean time he iſſued out orders to the captains of his troops to make ready for a march in four days time, and even nominated thoſe who ſhould travel on foot; but thoſe that were to go on board the fleet with him were to prepare themſelves againſt the fifth day. After this he was carried to the river, and being put on board one of his gallies, was conveyed to ſome pleaſant gardens on the other ſide, where after he had waſhed he went to reſt. The next day he again bathed, and performed his accuſtomed ſacrifices, which done, he entered his chamber, and held diſcourſe with Medius, having given orders to his officers to attend him in the morning. He then ſupped moderately, and being conveyed to bed, had a continued fever upon him all that night. However, the next morning he again waſhed and ſacrificed, and ordered Nearchus and the reſt of his captains to prepare for ſailing the third day. The next day he waſhed and ſacrificed as before, but his fever ſtill continued; notwithſtanding which he again called his captains to him, and ordered all things to be made ready for a voyage, and having bathed, his fever encreaſed towards the evening. The next day he was carried into a houſe adjacent to the bath, where he performed his uſual ſacrifices, and once more called his chief officers about him, to give orders concerning the intended voyage. The day following he was with great difficulty carried to ſacrifice; however, he ſtill continued to renew his orders, and notwithſtanding he grew manifeſtly worſe, could not be reſtrained from ſacrificing the day after. He then commanded his chief officers to remain with him in the hall, and the inferior ones to wait at the gates, and growing ſtill worſe, he was conveyed from the hall in the garden, where he then was, into the palace; and his chief officers approaching near to pay their attendance, he made ſigns, that he knew them, but was not able to ſpeak, nor pronounce any thing articulate; and thus he remained all that night. The day following his fever ſtill encreaſed, and all that night and the next day continued ſtrong and violent. The army by this time began to ſuſpect that the king was dead; and as all crowds are violent in the purſuit of whatever they believe, they openly publiſhed this opinion of theirs, and when it was contradicted by thoſe about his perſon, ſome of the ſoldiers had the aſſurance to force into the royal apartments, and even into that where the king lay. He was by this time ſpeechleſs, and ſcarce able to ſtir: however, he raiſed himſelf up, and made ſhift to extend his hand for them to kiſs; which when they had done, they retired. A little after Python, Attalus, Demophoon, Peuceſtas, Cleomenes, Mænidas and Seleucus came in. They had watched all night in the temple of Serapis, and had propoſed the following queſtion to the god, Whether Alexander ſhould be brought into his temple to recover his health? To which the oracle anſwered, That it would be beſt for him to remain where he was. They had been in the room but a ſmall time when the king expired, ſo that it was conjectured the oracle meant death was beſt for him. This is Arrian's account. As for thoſe of other writers, the reader will find them in a note, it being abſolutely neceſſary to let whatever is ſaid upon that ſubject reſt on the particular credit of him who writes it [z] (O).

We

[z] Arrian. l. viii. c. 24, 25, 26.

(O) Diodorus Siculus, ſpeaking of the death of Alexander, uſhers it in with an account of his loſing his Tiara and Fillet, to avert which ill omen, he informs us, the king was injoined

to

We have ſeen from the before-mentioned relation, as alſo from what we have noted out of other antient writers, that Alexander died a natural death. There was however an opinion propagated very early, that he died of poiſon; and the ſtory is told thus. Antipater, ſay they, perceiving that he declined much in the king's favour, that to offer certain ſacrifices; which having performed, Medius invited him, on his return, to a banquet, where the king drinking off the Herculean cup, was immediately ſtruck with exceſſive pains, ſo that he was carried inſtantly to his lodgings. His ſickneſs encreaſing, he began himſelf to deſpair of life, and gave his ring to Perdiccas. His friends enquiring to whom he left the kingdom, he anſwered, To the moſt worthy. He alſo intimated his foreſight of their broils, by ſaying, He could already view the funeral games, which would attend him. This author mentions the report of Alexander's dying by poiſon, through the contrivance of Antipater, with the circumſtances alledged to ſupport that opinion. But he leaves the reader to judge of the facts and reaſons produced (5). Plutarch relates the manner of his death circumſtantially. He ſays, that after having given an entertainment to Nearchus, as he was going from the bath to bed, Medius would needs conduct him to a banquet. There, he ſays, the king drank all night and the next day, which threw him into a fever and carried him off. He expreſly rejects the ſtory of the Herculean bowl, and of the king's being taken ill in an extraordinary manner. As to his being poiſoned by Antipater's contrivance, he mentions it, and all its circumſtances; but openly profeſſes his diſbelief of it. He cites the king's diary, as Arrian does; from whence it is clear, that there was nothing haſty or violent in Alexander's death, but that he was taken off by a fever (6). Curtius copies the ſame authors with Diodorus, but either delivers what they ſay more at large, or amplifies out of his own head. He tells us, that the king directed his body to be carried to Ammon; that when Perdiccas demanded at what time divine honours ſhould be paid him? he anſwered him, when you are all happy. He is poſitive that the king was poiſoned, and affirms, that this black affair was ſtifled by the power of his ſucceſſors. This is at leaſt very improbable, for the king died at Babylon, Antipater commanded in Greece, a ſedition followed on the king's demiſe, that Craterus was aſſigned him for a ſucceſſor, and that himſelf was ſent for into Perſia, began to be fearful of the event. He therefore firſt of all ſent his ſon Caſſander to apologize for his conduct, with directions if he found the king inexorable, to take him off; for which purpoſe, by the contrivance of Ariſtotle, who was in fear that the king would put in execution the threats thrown out againſt him when Calliſthenes was in priſon, Caſſander was furniſhed with ſome Arcadian water of a deadly nature, put up in a veſſel made of a mule's hoof, in which alone it could be contained. This water, it is ſaid, Caſſander, when he thought it neceſſary, gave to his brother Jollas, who was the king's cup-bearer, by whom it was mixed with the wine which the king drank at the banquet given by Medius. The whole tale was, in all probability, a contrivance of Olympias, who, to give it the greater colour, would not ſuffer the body of Jollas, who died not long after, to remain interred, but caſt out his remains, as if ſhe was ſatisfied that he had a hand in the death of his ſovereign. The hatred which Caſſander expreſſed towards the family of Alexander, hath been alſo uſed as an argument in ſupport of the probability of this ſtory; but it has little in it, for as the reader will demiſe, is it not ſtrange none of the contending parties ſhould mention it then (7)? Seneca, ſpeaking of the dreadful effects of drunkenneſs, expatiates on the death of Alexander. "He who "in ſo many marches (ſays this elegant writer) ſo many battles, "and ſo many harſh ſeaſons, had vanquiſhed all the difficul-"ties of time and place; after ſo many rivers and ſeas traced "in ſafety, by intemperance in drinking was deſtroyed, and by "the fatal Herculean cup was ſent to his grave (8)." Juſtin writes more clearly than all the reſt as to the poiſoning which he takes for an indubitable fact. In other circumſtances he agrees with Diodorus and Curtius. He is clear alſo as to the king's ſpeaking after the ſoldiers had quitted the room; and yet Arrian and Ptolemy, from the king's diary, ſeem to agree he was ſpeechleſs before they ſaw him. Perhaps he gave his ring to Perdiccas, and expreſſed his ſentiments to his friends juſt before he loſt his ſpeech (9).

Other relations of the king's death. Year after the flood 2676. Before Chriſt 323.

(5) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. prop. fin. (6) Plut. in vit. Alex. prop. fin.

(7) Curt. l. x: Juſtin. l. xii.

(8) Senec. Epiſt. lxxxiii.

(9)

will ſee hereafter, this antipathy of Caſſander may be accounted for as well, if not much better, from later cauſes. There is another ſtory relating to Alexander's death, which, for its oddity, deſerves to be recorded. It is ſaid, that when he found himſelf paſt recovery, he deſired to be carried to the Euphrates, that throwing himſelf therein into, poſterity might believe, as he came from, ſo he was returned to, the gods; but in this he was hindered by his wife Roxana, to whom upon that occaſion he ſaid, That ſhe envied him the honour of his divine origin. Arrian, from whom we have this, tells us, that he inſerted it in his hiſtory, only that it might appear that he was acquainted with ſuch reports, but that however he gave no credit to them [a].

Remarks on his character.

We are now come to the end of that famous reign which makes ſo great a figure in all hiſtory; but we ſhall not take upon us to conclude it with any character of Alexander, becauſe in the beſt authors of antiquity, there are many characters of him already. To theſe we cannot altogether aſſent, and it would be perhaps ſetting our own authority too high, ſhould we attempt to cenſure them. We ſhall therefore obſerve, that in reading theſe characters, juſt regard ought to be had to the rank and credit of the ſeveral authors who have wrote them. Hiſtorians have conſidered him either as an enterprizing and ſucceſsful prince, the glory of whoſe great actions ſcarce ſuffer the blemiſhes in his perſonal conduct to be ſeen: which is the light Arrian has placed him in; or they make his virtues and vices alike conſpicuous, which ſeems to be the view of Curtius. Philoſophers and moral writers have dealt more ſtrictly with him, and have therefore ſeldom run into high panegyrics, Plutarch only excepted, who, in his orations on the fortune and virtue of Alexander, ſpeaks as a rhetorician. The ſatyriſt Lucian hath depicted him with great ſpirit, and with conſummate judgment; but he ſeems to have kept his eye too cloſely on the later ſcenes of his life, when his fortune, not his merit, was at its greateſt height. However it is conſidered, his character is always ſhining, as his actions were in themſelves very extraordinary. He died according to the

[a] Arrian. l. vii. c. 27.

the account of Ariſtobulus, in the hundred and fourteenth olympiad, when he had lived thirty-two years and eight months, and had reigned twelve years and eight months [b]. Plutarch agrees pretty well with this [c]; but Juſtin aſſerts, that he was thirty-three years old and one month, for which queſtionleſs he had ſome, tho' we think, not ſufficient, authority (P).

As

[b] Ap. Arrian. l. vii. c. 28. [c] Plut. in vit. Alex. Juſtin. l. xii. c. ult.

(P) We propoſe, in this note, to ſay ſomewhat of the hiſtorians who have written of Alexander's hiſtory, and of thoſe eſpecially from whom we have collected it. We will begin with Ariſtobulus. He was an eminent officer in Alexander's army, and much in his favour, as is evident from his being intruſted with the care of ſeeing the tomb of Cyrus reſtored to its firſt condition (10). He wrote memoirs of what he ſaw, which are much commended, and in a great meaſure copied by Arrian, Plutarch and Strabo; yet they had not the good luck to pleaſe Alexander, who reading in them the ſtory of his engagement with Porus, threw the book into the river Hydaſpes. Anaximenes of Lampſacus, who had once been Alexander's tutor, wrote of his actions; but his work, which was not much approved, hath been long loſt. Bæton, who acted as engineer in Alexander's army, publiſhed an account of Alexander's encampments during his expedition (11) Calliſthenes the philoſopher, the hiſtory he wrote of Alexander is ſaid to have been excellent ſo far as it went; yet it is queſtionable whether he wrote any hiſtory at all (12). Clitarchus, another of his followers, wrote a very fabulous hiſtory of his atchievements (13). Marſyas, the brother of Antigonus, and who commanded the fleet under his nephew Demetrius, wrote a complete hiſtory of Macedon, including the reign of Alexander, which was much eſteemed; and another treatiſe of the education of Alexander, for which he was exceedingly well qualified, becauſe he was educated with him (14). Nearchus, Alexander's admiral, left the journal of his Indian voyage, which Arrian made uſe of in his Indian hiſtory, not without

(10) Arrian l. vii. (11) Joſeph. cont. Apion. (12) Arrian. l. iv. c. 15. (13) Curt. l. ix. (14) Athen. Deipnoſoph. l. xiv. Diodor. Sicul. l. xx.

As to the iſſue he left behind him, we ſpeak generally here, and more particularly in the ſubſequent chapter. By Barſina the daughter of Artabazus, and the widow of Memnon, a lady of great beauty and merit, he had a ſon named Hercules, who was afterwards murdered. By Roxana the daughter of Oxyartes the Bactrian, he had a poſthumous ſon named Alexander, who had for a time the title of king. By Cleophes queen of part of India, he had a ſon named Alexander, who ſucceeded his mother in her without a gentle cenſure of the author's veracity (15). Oneſicritus, the captain of Alexander's galley, writ a hiſtory, or rather a romance, in relation to his maſter's atchievements. This man had genius, was a great philoſopher, and had a good ſtile. It is ſaid, that Alexander having read this performance, ſaid, He ſhould be glad to come to life again after ſome time, to ſee what reception that book met with. Its author, it ſeems, read part of it once, which contained Alexander's war againſt the Amazons, to Lyſimachus; And where, I pray, was I, ſaid the king, when all theſe ſtrange things happened (16)? There is ſtill a manuſcript hiſtory in Latin, which goes under the name of Valerius, ſtuffed with theſe romantic accounts, and for that reaſon never printed. As to authors in better repute, Craterus is ſaid to have written memoirs of his maſter's victories, which were alſo recorded in the commentaries of Eumenes, and in the hiſtory of Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus, whom, of all others, Arrian commends and follows moſt. On this account it is, that we prefer his hiſtory to all that are now extant; and, amongſt other reaſons, it is valuable for this, that we have it entire, excepting only a paſſage of no great length in the ſeventh book. Strabo, as he has occaſion to mention the provinces conquered by Alexander, mentions alſo abundance of paſſages of his life, and furniſhes us with various particulars, which are not to be found elſewhere. Diodorus Siculus hath afforded us much aſſiſtance, and would have afforded more, if there had not been ſo large a chaſm in his ſeventeenth book. Curtius we have all along examined, and, where it was neceſſary, made uſe of him, as alſo of Juſtin; Ælian, Polyænus, and Frontinus have been conſulted as to particular facts, together with Lucian, Seneca, and with many others, whoſe names it is unneceſſary to retail to the reader.

The wives and deſcendents of Alexander.

(15) Arrian. Hiſt. Indic. Strabon. Geog. lxi. (16) Plut. in vit. Alex.

her kingdom. By Statira the daughter of Darius, he had no children; nor by Parisatis the daughter of Ochus. As to the former, the very judicious dean Prideaux seems to think, that Arrian mistook her name when he called her Barsine, and that he confounded her with the widow of Memnon [d]; but, upon looking farther into this matter, we find, that Arrian did not confound them, tho' there is a mistake in the name in the present copies; for it appears from the excerpts in Photius, that she was called by Arrian, not Barsine, but Arsinoe, which, for aught we know, might be her true name [e]. Of these ladies we have reason to suppose, that Roxana was the best beloved, since it appears, that he married her from the dictates of his passion, the rest for reasons of state.

The extent of the Macedonian empire.

We have now perfected the history of a reign, which bestowed the epithet of Great on him of whom we have been speaking, and extended his empire, in name at least, over the world. This indeed was rather a flight of Grecian flattery than any adequate description of his dominions. He was far from being master of the world then known, for he possessed but part of Asia, a small part of Afric, and a still smaller of Europe; yet he was the lord of a multitude of fair provinces, the sovereign of many large and powerful kingdoms, and held an empire more extensive than the world had till that time seen. Macedon was his hereditary kingdom; a great part of Thrace and Illyrium he had subdued; all Greece was under his protection, and the protection of so great a prince always did, and always will include sovereignty. His Asiatic conquests reached from the Hellespont to the Indian ocean, including all that the "great king" possessed, and more. Egypt and Libya were his; and all the Greek islands owned his authority. All these were the acquisition of a few years, and many of them obtained in as little time as he could pass through them. We have, in the course of our history, endeavoured to place all these conquests according to the order of time in which they were made, as also according to their vicinity to each other. For the better understanding of the whole, we have subjoined a map of his dominions, wherein is marked the rout of his army, from his first march out of Macedonia, to his last coming to Babylon; and that this might be still more intelligible, telligible, we have, in a note, ſhewn the value of that map in point of accuracy, and likewiſe explained its uſes (Q). Here then let us quit this ſubject, with this remark, that the foregoing hiſtory is not collected from any one author, or with a partial regard to any of thoſe it is collected from. We

[d] Connection of the Old and New Testament. p. i. b. viii. A. A. C. 325. [e] Ap. Phot. p. 214.

(Q) The map which we have given our readers, was drawn by the famous M. De Liſle, in the year 1729, for the uſe of the French king. There is therefore all the reaſon in the world to believe from the known ability of the author, and from the deſign of his work, that it is excellent in its kind, and was performed with all imaginable accuracy. In this map there is a double deſcription of the countries laid down therein. One by M. de Liſle, founded upon aſtronomical obſervations; the other according to our modern geographers in general. The reader will have the ſatisfaction of comparing both, and of ſeeing all Alexander's marches and conqueſts, as they are delineated in one and in the other. The ſituation of places in M. de Liſle's map were, as we have ſaid, determined by obſervations, where they were to be had, and where they were not, from the geographical tables of the eaſtern aſtronomers, who, by compariſon of the ſituations aſſigned of places where obſervations had been made, were judged to come very near the truth. Where both of theſe were wanting, the diſtances ſet down in the relations of travellers in the higheſt credit were made uſe of. The inquiſitive reader may be further ſatisfied of the care and nicety with which this map was done, if he will take the trouble of peruſing a ſhort, but very full memoir on that ſubject, written by the author's ſon-in-law (17). We ourſelves have taken ſome pains in the ſame way, and have compared the ſituation of the Caſpian ſea in M. de Liſle's map, by the chart of the ſame ſea drawn by order of the Czar, and publiſhed in the year 1731, and find them to correſpond very well. We have alſo found, that M. de Liſle's map reconciles the deſcriptions given by antient authors, with thoſe which have been delivered to us by the moſt judicious modern travellers. On the whole therefore we are well ſatisfied, that what we have juſt now ſaid, and alſo what we have advanced in the text, is agreeable to truth, and no more than what every judicious reader will readily diſcern; to add more on this head therefore would be tedious.

(17) Recherches Geographiques ſur l' etendue de l' empire D' Alexandre, &c. Par M. Bauche. Memoires de l' Academie Royale des Sciences, 1731.

We have compared the beſt writers of antiquity on this ſubject, and have from them laid down a regular ſeries of events, diſtinguiſhing, as far as we were able, the probable from the improbable, the certain from the doubtful; and where we were not able thus to diſtinguiſh, we have cited the authorities which hindred us from diſtinguiſhing, and have placed the evidence before our readers, that they may decide for themſelves. Such is this hiſtory of the riſe, progreſs and eſtabliſhment of the Macedonian empire, which, we hope, will be found conſiſtent with the plan laid down of this work, and very different from any other yet extant in our language.

SECT. VII.

The diviſion of the Macedonian empire.

State of things at the death of Alexander.

THE death of Alexander had well nigh proved the diſſolution of his empire; for at firſt the extreme grief of every body hindered them from paying a proper reſpect to public affairs; and when theſe high tranſports of affection were over, their feuds and jealouſies had almoſt occaſioned the ſhedding a deluge of Macedonian blood round the dead body of their king. The want of an hiſtorian who might be depended on, and the having many on whoſe works we cannot ſo well rely, have concurred in throwing a dark veil of obſcurity over this part of our hiſtory; which, from the beſt materials we have, and in the beſt manner we can, we will endeavour to remove. A day or two after the death of the king, his friends aſſembled in the council-room, and ſummoned thither all the principal commanders of the army; but the ſoldiers and people who were not ſummoned, and who neither ought, nor with any propriety could, have any ſhare in ſuch conſultations, came in vaſt crowds, and ſo blocked up the paſſages, that many of the great officers could not get in. Proclamation was then made by a herald, that none ſhould preſume to approach the aſſembly, or to remain there, but ſuch as were called by by name ; which proclamation however was very little regarded ; and we mention this as a remarkable inſtance of the difference between authority and power. Thoſe who had commanded this proclamation to be made, had aſſumed the adminiſtration ; but the people preſuming on their own power, and knowing that theſe governors had none but what they ſhould think fit to lend them, gave little heed to their commands ; but, on the contrary, made them give way to their own curioſity, ſo that numbers of mean rank and little conſideration remained at preſent in the council. Perdiccas, as ſoon as ſilence could be obtained, ordered the chair of Alexander to be brought forth, and having placed the robes and regalia upon it, laid upon them the royal ring, declaring that he moſt willingly reſigned any authority that might be intended him by the king when this ring was delivered to him. However, he propoſed it as a thing not only expedient, but neceſſary, that the empire ſhould have a head ; and when he had demonſtrated this by proper arguments, he told them, that Roxana was with child, and that, if ſhe brought forth a ſon, he ought to be acknowledged his father's ſucceſſor. Nearchus applauded the deſign of preſerving the regal dignity in the family of Alexander ; but ſaid, it would be too long to wait for Roxana's delivery, eſpecially as it would be attended with uncertainty. He therefore put them in mind of Hercules the ſon of Alexander by Barſina. The ſoldiers ſignified their diſlike of this by the clangour of their arms. Ptolemy then propounded, that the chair of Alexander ſhould retain the ſhadow of ſovereignty, and that the ſtate ſhould be governed by a council of officers ; but this being diſliked, a motion was made in favour of Perdiccas ; but he, out of modeſty, refuſed it. At laſt ſomebody mentioned Aridæus the brother of Alexander, who had always accompanied the king, and was wont to ſacrifice with him. The Macedonian phalanx full of affection, as all brave and honeſt nations are to the hereditary line of their antient kings, cloſed immediately with this propoſition, and called for Aridæus. Perdiccas, Ptolemy, and moſt of the horſe officers, were extremely averſe to this meaſure ; and they carried their obſtinacy ſo far, as to retire from the aſſembly, and even to quit the city. However, Meleager, at the head of the phalanx, ſupported vigorouſly their firſt reſolution, and threaten-threatened loudly to shed the blood of those who affected to rule over their equals, and to assume a kingdom which no way belonged to them. Aridæus they arrayed in royal robes, put on him the arms of Alexander, and saluted him by the name of Philip, that he might be rendered more popular [a]. While things remained in this situation, Meleager managed affairs about the new created king, and Perdiccas transacted all things for the other party. Both pretended vast concern for the public, yet at the bottom, intended nothing so much as their own private advantage, each having formed a scheme of ingrossing the administration, under colour of serving the interests of those they had drawn, not to favour them personally, but their specious pretences. In order to apprehend these things clearly, let us view all these great ones in their proper lights.

The characters of Perdiccas, Meleager, &c.

Perdiccas was a man of high birth, had a supreme command in the army, was much in favour with Alexander, and strongly confided in by the nobility. Meleager had rendered himself formidable by uniting the Macedonians who composed the phalanx in one opinion, and by raising one to the kingdom who was wholly under his direction [b]. Aridæus was, as we have heretofore shewn, the son of Philip by a dancer named Phillina; he was of small parts, not by nature, but by the practices of Olympias, who by poisonous draughts had taken care to weaken both his constitution and his mind. He had however for his wife Eurydice his cousin, as we shall see hereafter, by whose assistance he was able to manage pretty well. At present alone, and without counsellors, he acted as the times required; he did what Meleager would have him, but he declared, that whatever he did, he did with the advice of Meleager, so that he made his minister accountable for his own schemes, and no way indangered himself. The Macedonians, besides their affection for the royal house, began to entertain a personal love for Aridæus, now called Philip, on account of his mildness and moderation [c]. Besides these who were the principal characters on the stage at his time, there was another who through modesty declined public notice, and was notwithstanding a prime instrument

in

[a] Curt. lib. x. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii. Justin. lib. xiii. Oros. lib. iii. Plut. in vit. Alex. & Eumen. [b] Plut. in vit. Eumen. Diodor. Curt. ubi supra. [c] Arrian. apud. Phot. Biblioth. Cod. xcii, Justin. Curt. ubi supra.

in adjuſting the differences which were now on foot, and made a moſt ſhining figure in public affairs afterwards. This was Eumenes the Cardian, the late king's ſecretary. He was, as far as we find, little diſtinguiſhed by birth, though his father could not have been a waggoner, as ſome report, becauſe he was Philip of Macedon's hoſt, who taking a fancy to his ſon, retained him about his perſon, and having tried his fidelity, at length made him his ſecretary, in which poſt Alexander found and continued him. This poſt alone would have rendered him very conſiderable, but the king had raiſed him beſide to the higheſt military commands, he being one of ſo rare a genius as to be alike ſuited to a camp or court, and no leſs capable of commanding in the field, than of giving adviſe in the cloſet. When the marriages were made by the king's directions at Suſa, Eumenes was in ſome meaſure allied to him, for he had then given him Artonis, whom ſome call Barſine the daughter of Artabazus, and ſiſter to Barſina, who was the mother of Hercules by Alexander. Theſe were the buſy actors at this period, Perdiccas full of ambition, Meleager ſelfiſh and revengeful, Aridæus or Philip weak and timorous, Eumenes brave, wiſe, and inviolably attached to the royal houſe [d].

THE foot under Meleager held Babylon, had the king's perſon in their hands, and were cloathed with his authority; which however Meleager overſtretched when he ſent ſome to ſeize Perdiccas, for that great officer ſo frighted them with his frowns, and words, that they returned re infecta, and ſo made the breach the wider. The cavalry under Perdiccas, Ptolemy, Lagus, and other generals, inveſted the city, or rather ſhut up the paſſages thereto, ſo that preſently famine began to appear, and even to be felt. The inhabitants of the adjacent villages fled for ſafety to Babylon, and multitudes, pinched by hunger, iſſued from the city to ſeek ſubſiſtence in the country. This confuſion compelled the phalanx to think of treating, and Eumenes, who, as a ſtranger by birth, had hitherto affected a neutrality, eaſily brought about an accommodation by blending both ſchemes together, allowing Aridæus or Philip the regal title, and veſting the authority in the great officers, of whom Meleager was to be held the third. In conſequence of this accommodation, all the great officers of the army came to court, eſpecially Perdiccas and Ptolemy, the former eagerly deſiring to aſſume the ſovereignty under the ſpecious title of protector, and the latter ſecretly aiming at the diviſion of the empire, that under the name of a government he might ſecure a kingdom to himſelf. Perdiccas ſoon gained an aſcendency over Philip, inſomuch that he conducted all things according to his own will, though in the name of that prince. The firſt deſign of conſequence he aimed at putting in execution was the taking of Meleager, in order to which he framed a plot equally ſubtile and ſucceſsful; he put ſome of his own adherents on complaining openly of Meleager's being made equal to Perdiccas; this naturally led Meleager to expoſtulate with him; upon which Perdiccas with an air of frankneſs told him, that ſuch incendiaries ought immediately to be puniſhed, and propoſed a general luſtration of the army, as the only probable method of taking off ſuch diſturbers of the public peace. Meleager readily came into this, looking upon it as an indubitable teſtimony of Perdiccas's friendſhip. But when the horſe and foot were drawn into the field, and the king quitting the phalanx, rode along the firſt line of the right wing with Perdiccas; the foot began to be in ſome terror, and in that terror all their courage forſook them; ſometimes they thought of retiring into the city, at others of oppoſing force by force. Meleager of all others was leaſt preſent to himſelf, ſo that after deliberating long, and propoſing many things, they reſolved on nothing, till Perdiccas formed the horſe over-againſt them with the elephants in front. Then taking the king with him, he rode along the firſt line of the phalanx, and demanded the authors of the late ſedition. Meleager and his ſoldiers anſwered nothing, yet by the dejection of their countenances, they plainly ſhewed how low their ſpirits were ſunk; this encouraged Perdiccas to draw out by force three hundred, who in the late affair had been moſt active for Meleager, whom without more ado he caſt to the elephants, and ſuffered to be trampled to death in the ſight of the army; the king looking on rather as a ſurprized ſpectator, than as the author of ſo cruel a deed. As no body pretended to lay hands on Meleager himſelf, he neither ſpoke nor ſtirred to ſave thoſe who had acted by his authority, which anſwered the end of Perdiccas, for on his return to Babylon every body ſhunned and was afraid of him,

The ſedition appeaſed.

[d] Plut. in vit. Eumen. & Corn. Nepos. in vit. ejuſd.

him, which had ſuch an effect on his mind, already diſordered, that he took ſanctuary in a temple, vainly hoping that his enemies would not purſue him to the altar; whereas ambitious men ſhew no reſpect to religion, but when it is their tool, and therefore Perdiccas, who thought himſelf not ſafe while this man lived, ordered him without ceremony there to be ſlain, which was accordingly performed; and thus the authority of Perdiccas was for the preſent eſtabliſhed [c] (A).

To

[c] Diodor. Curt. Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

(A) In this note we intend to acquaint the reader with the authors on whoſe authority we build what is delivered in this ſection. The firſt of theſe is Arrian, the ſame whom we chiefly followed in our hiſtory of Alexander the Great. He wrote upon this ſubject a treatiſe conſiſting of ten books, which are all unfortunately loſt, and what we quote in their ſtead is no more than a very brief account of their contents preſerved by the famous Photius, who at the end of his extract hath added a character of this author worthy of the ſervice which he has done to the commonwealth of letters. He tells us, that as an hiſtorian he knows none who ought to be preferred before him; his ſtile, continues he, is ſtrong and uniform, his narration ſeldom interrupted by digreſſions; thoſe there are, alike pertinent and ſhort. His eloquence never miſleads him into any thing forced, or hard to be underſtood, and while he preſerves all the dignity of hiſtory, he introduces nothing of that unintelligibe ſublime, which is the bane of writers of warm imaginations, and who have judgments as warm. Yet in point of elegance his work is no leſs valuable than in point of veracity; his periods are ſweet and perfectly well turned; his language ſo accurately proper, that it is impoſſible to ſay he ever riſes above, or ſinks below his ſubject. In a word, there is ſuch a harmony, perſpicuity, and noble ſimplicity in the works of this writer, that to add or take away from them, would be doing viſible injury both to the author and reader (1). Diodorus Siculus hath written as well and more copiouſly than any on the matters of which we treat in this ſection (2). Curtius at the cloſe of his work treats very fully of what happened at, and immediately after, the death of Alexander, in which he the rather deſerves credit,

(1) Phot. Bibliothec. Cod. xcii.

(2) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii.

The empire delivered.

To ſatisfy the ambition of the principal commanders in the army, to provide for the ſafety of the empire, and to free himſelf from competitors, Perdiccas quickly called a general council, wherein the following diſtribution of honours and goverments was made. Aridæus, and the ſon of Roxana now born, and named Alexander, were to enjoy the regal authority. Antipater had the government of the European provinces as general of the army there. Craterus had the title of protector. Perdiccas had in reality the office, with the ſtile of general, of the houſhold troops, in the room of Hephæſtion. Ptolemy, the ſon of Lagus had Egypt, Lybia, and that part of Arabia which borders upon Egypt. Cleomenes, a man of infamous character, whom Alexander had made receiver-general in Egypt, was made Ptolemy's deputy. Laomedon had Syria, Philotas Cilicia, Pithon Media, Eumenes Cappadocia, credit, becauſe what he relates agrees very well with Arrian, particularly in the diviſion of the provinces (3). Plutarch in the cloſe of his life of Alexander, in his lives of Eumenes and Demetrius, and in many other treatiſes of his, hath afforded us frequently materials. To theſe we may add Juſtin (4). We have collated them all; and where they differ have ſelected what was moſt probable, and moſt conſiſtent with other parts of the narration. In moſt of our collections of general hiſtory, this period is remarkably diſtracted and confuſed, not ſo much for want of authorities as for want of uſing them; as alſo from a prejudice againſt the matter itſelf, as if the wars of Alexander's ſucceſſors, till ſuch time as the four capital empires into which his was broken, aroſe, were of little importance. Whereas the giving a full, diſtinct, and perſpicuous account of ſuch perplexed parts of hiſtory, is one of the greateſt ſervices a writer can render to poſterity; and in ſupport to this obſervation, we beg leave to remark, that though Arrian wrote but ſeven books of the life of Alexander, yet he wrote ten of the diviſion of his empire, notwithſtanding he carries his hiſtory no lower than Antipater's return to Europe; ſo neceſſary it appeared to him that the tranſactions in this period ſhould be well underſtood. Add to this, that the latter extract in Photius is four times as long as the former (5).

(3) Curt. lib. x. (4) Juſtin. l. xiii. (5) Vide Phot. Bibl. Cod. xci. xcii.

docia, Paphlagonia, and all the country bordering on the Euxine ſea, as far as Trapezus; but theſe were not yet conquered, ſo that he was a governor without a province. Antigonus had Pamphilia, Lycia, and Phrygia Major, Caſſander Caria, Menander Lydia, Leonatus Phrygia, on the Helleſpont. In Europe, Thrace, the Cherſoneſe, and the countries adjoining as far as Salmydeſſus on the Euxine Sea were given to Lyſimachus; the reſt of the countries ſubject to the Macedonians, as far as the Ceraunian mountains, with all Greece, were left to Craterus and Antipater. As to the reſt of the provinces not mentioned in this diviſion, they remained under the governors appointed them by Alexander. We have in this account followed our old guide Arrian; what other authors have delivered on this ſubject, the readers will perceive by a note; for to have inſerted in the text, the different accounts we have of this matter would have taken up much time, and room, at the ſame time that it would have perplexed the reader, and interrupted the thread of our narration [f] (B).

THIS

[f] Arrian. apud. Phot. ubi ſupra. Curt ubi ſupra.

(B) The diviſion of Alexander's empire, according to other authors, ran thus: Diodorus Siculus affirms, that Perdiccas confirmed the kingdom to Aridæus; gave to Ptolemy Egypt; to Python Media; to Eumenes Paphlagonia, with Cappadocia, and the neighburing countries; to Caſſander Caria; to Meleager Lydia; to Leonnatus Phrygia upon the Helleſpont; to Lyſimachus Thrace, with the adjacent nations as far as the ſea; to Antipater Macedonia, with the neighbouring countries; to the reſt of the officers he diſtributed the other provinces in Aſia; to Oxyartes Caucaſus, and the Paropamiſis; to Sybirtius Arachoſia and Gedroſia; to Staſanor the Solian, Aria and Drangiana; to Philip the Prætor Bactria and Sogdia; to Phrataphernes Parthia and Hyrcania, to Peuceſtes Perſis; to Tlepolemus Carmania; to Atropas Media; to Archon Babylonia; to Arceſilaus Meſopotamia; to Seleucus the command of the royal cavalry, which Hephæſtion had firſt, and Perdiccas afterwards; to Taxiles and Porus each their own kingdoms, as reſtored and augmented by Alexander. The king kept Perdiccas with him, and conſtituted him captain of the guards, and the forces which attended him (6). According to Juſtin, the provinces and chief

(6) Diodor Sicul. lib. xviii.

Perdiccas assumes regal power.

This division of the empire, as well as all other things, had the sanction of the royal name, and seemed to be done by authority of king Philip; but in truth it was the mere commands were thus divided; Ptolemy had Egypt, Africa, and part of Arabia; Laomedon Syria; Philotas and his son Cilicia and Illyricum; Atropatos, it should be Atropates, Media the greater; Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas Media the less; Scynus Susiana; Antigonus the son of Philip Phrygia the greater; to Nearchus Lycia and Pamphilia; to Cassander Caria; Menander Lydia; Leonatus Phrygia the less; Lysimachus Thrace, and the countries adjacent to the Pontic sea; Eumenes Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia; to Seleucus the son of Antiochus the chief command of the forces; to Cassander the son of Antipater the command of the kings guards; Taxiles the countries between the rivers Indus and Hydaspes: Pithon the son of Agenor the colonies settled in India; Parapomenus the borderers on mount Caucasus; Extarches the——Argæans; Amyntas the Bactrians; Scythæus the Sog'dians; Nicanor the Parthians; Philip the Hyrcanians; Phrataphernes the Armenians; Tlepolemus the Persæ; Peucestes the Babylonians; Archos the Pelasgæ; Archesilaus Mesopotamia. There are other accounts of this division which agree not either with these or with that of Arrian in the text; but in producing those of Diodorus and Justin, we have done enough to put it in the readers power plainly to perceive the sources of these discordances (7). For, first, here are some names mis-spelt, or changed through the ignorance of transcribers, which creates a seeming, without a real, difference. As for instance, Scynus is undoubtedly put for Antigonus, though there is not the least conformity between them. Extarches is for Oxyartes, and Scythæus, is put for Sibirtius, and in Diodorus the same person is called Ibirtius. Secondly, Justin does not distinguish between the first and second division, neither do Dexippus, Orosius, or other authors; whence their differences with Arrian. Diodorus indeed mentions both the divisions by Perdiccas, and by Antipater, and is in all respects more correct as well as more copious than the rest.

The author of the first book of Maccabees hath a very short and very expressive account of this matter in the beginning of his work. So Alexander reigned twelve years, and then died, and his servants bare rule every one in his place, and after his death

(7) Justin. lib. xiii.

mere act of Perdiccas and his aſſociates, who ſhared at their pleaſure the empire of their deceaſed maſter, treating his lawful heirs as pageants and cyphers; but we need not wonder at this when we find that Alexander himſelf was no leſs ſlighted, for while theſe diſputes were on foot, his body was altogether neglected, and ſeven days elapſed before any orders were given for its embalment. It is ſaid that the Egyptians and Chaldeans who were ordered to perform this office, found the royal corſe not only perfectly ſound, and free from corruption, but with ſo lively a countenance, that they were afraid to touch it. Some have conceived that this ſtory took riſe from flattery, and that thoſe who made it their buſineſs to magnify the actions of Alexander, as if they were incompatible with mortality, had a mind to carry their ſervile panegyrics ſtill farther, by repreſenting his very dead body as incorruptible. But as thoſe who are beſt verſed in theſe things agree, that without any miracle dead bodies remain ſometimes a conſiderable ſpace without corrupting, the fact may be believed, and the inferences rejected. However it was, Alexander was at length embalmed, and Aridæus, not the king, but a commander ſo called, was charged with the care of the royal funeral. As they had taken ſo little notice of his body, they made no ſcruple of vacating his will, becauſe it contained in it nothing beneficial for them. What we call his will, was a ſhort memorandum of things he would have done; thoſe were reduced to five points: The firſt concerned the building of a fleet of a thouſand ſtout gallies, to be made uſe of againſt the Carthaginians, and other nations, who ſhould oppoſe the reduction of the ſea-coaſts of Africa and Spain, with all the adjacent iſlands, as far as Sicily. The ſecond directed a large and regular high-way along the ſea-coaſts of Africa, as far as Ceuta or Tangier. The third ordered the erecting ſix temples of extraordinary magnificence at the expence of fifteen hundred talents each. The fourth appointed forts, arſenals, havens, docks and yards for building ſhips to be ſettled in proper places throughout his empire. By the fifth he propoſed the building in proper ſituations ſeveral new cities in Europe and death they all put crowns upon themſelves, ſo did their ſons after them many years and evils were multiplied in the earth (8).

(8, Maccab. i. 7. 8. 9.

and Aſia; thoſe in Aſia to be inhabited by colonies from Europe; and thoſe in Europe to be filled with Aſiatics, that by blending their people and their manners, that hereditary antipathy might be eradicated, which had hitherto ſubſiſted between ſuch as dwelt in different continents. Laſtly, he had projected the erecting a pyramid equal in bulk and beauty to the biggeſt in Egypt, in honour to his father Philip. All theſe deſigns, under pretence of their being exceſſively expenſive, were referred to a council of Macedonians to be held no body knew when or where. The proceedings of the new government, which was entirely in the hands of Perdiccas and Roxana, grew quickly very cruel, and of conſequence generally diſtaſteful. Before Alexander was well dead, Roxana diſpatched letters under his ſeal to Statira and Drypetis, the daughters of Darius, directing them in his name to come to Babylon, where when they arrived, ſhe got them into her power, and by the aſſiſtance of Perdiccas, murdered them, that no ſon either of Alexander or Hephæſtion might give any trouble to her or her ſon Alexander. As for Syſigambis, the mother of Darius, as ſoon as the news of Alexander's death reached her ears, ſhe reſolved to take away her own life, which accordingly ſhe did, ſinking under this, though ſhe had born up againſt many other misfortunes. For her father and a multitude of her brethren had been put to death by Ochus; and her ſon Darius had loſt both the empire and his life through force and fraud. The mercenary Greeks who were diſpoſed up and down the inland provinces of Aſia, deſpairing now of ever ſeeing their own countries by fair means, reſolved to attempt ſomething by force. With this view they choſe one Philo to be their general, and aſſembled an army of twenty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, marching directly towards the ſea. As ſoon as Perdiccas received advice of this, he made choice of Pithon to command the forces deſtined to march againſt theſe rebels, as he called them. Theſe forces conſiſted of three thouſand foot, and eight hundred horſe, all Macedonians; but Pithon carried with him orders to the governors to furniſh him with ten thouſand foot, and eight thouſand horſe, out of the provinces through which he paſſed, which accordingly they performed. From the moment he was appointed to this command, Pithon had formed a ſcheme of ſetting up for himſelf, by offering the rebels any terms, if they would join with him. Perdiccas diccas was aware of this, and therefore he publickly gave him orders to put the rebels without mercy to the ſword, and to diſtribute all their effects among his ſoldiers, whereby every man he commanded was made a check upon him. Pithon when he drew near Philo and his troops, found means to corrupt one Lipodorus, who commanded a body of three thouſand men. This traitor in the midſt of a general engagement, when the victory was doubtful, retired with his troops to the top of a hill, which ſo diſordered Philo's army, that a general defeat enſued. After this Pithon ſent to Lipodorus to come down with his troops and join him, aſſuring him that he and his ſhould be treated as well as his own ſoldiers. Lipodorus coming accordingly into his camp, the Grecians were mingled with the Macedonians, and Pithon began to reſume his former ideas, when of a ſudden the Macedonians conceiving that their new oath was incompatible with their old oath to Perdiccas, cut the throats of the Greek mercenaries, and ſeized all they had; after which bloody action, Pithon wholly diſappointed, returned with his forces to Perdiccas [g].

A war in Thrace. Year after the flood 2677. Year before Chriſt 322.

ACCORDING to the chronological order of events, we ought now to ſpeak of the Lamian war in Greece; but inaſmuch as we ſhall in the next chapter treat expreſly of the affairs of Macedon, we will refer that account thither as to its proper place, and confine ourſelves here to the diſputes which happened in Aſia, and elſewhere, till the governors of provinces aſſumed the regal dignity. Lyſimachus who was in Thrace, the province aſſigned him, found himſelf on a ſudden in danger of being entirely ſtript thereof. For Seuthes deſcended of the antient race of the Odryſſian kings, had ſet up a claim to the dominions of his anceſtors, and had raiſed an army of twenty thouſand foot and eight thouſand horſe. Lyſimachus had no more than four thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, yet he was forced to come to an engagement, wherein, as he was not defeated, he may be ſaid to have gained a victory; for he kept the field of battle, and preſerved that part of the province which he held [h].

Eumenes put in poſſeſſion of Cappadocia.

As for Perdiccas, he was full of great projects, and very induſtrious in procuring means and inſtruments to execute them, though as yet he did not think fit to produce them to light. Firſt of all he choſe Eumenes for his confident, confident, and prime miniſter, whoſe character we have given before. He knew that this man was thoroughly loyal to the kings, and therefore doubted not his friendſhip to himſelf, wherein he was by no means deceived; for Eumenes was as careful of his intereſts, as if they had been his own; and, notwithſtanding Perdiccas was a man of great parts, underſtood and would have conducted them better than he himſelf did. In the firſt place it was held requiſite to put this man in poſſeſſion of his government, which, though ſtiled a province, was in truth an unconquered kingdom; Alexander when he firſt invaded Aſia, paſſing by Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and never had time afterwards to reduce him. This prince knowing well that it would one time or other fall to his lot to fight for the kingdom of his anceſtors, made uſe of that repoſe, which in the midſt of general confuſion his territories enjoyed, to lay up great ſums of money, and to hire mercenary troops for the defence of them. Perdiccas knowing as well how the matter ſtood, directed Antigonus and Leonnatus by letters in the names of the kings to march againſt the Cappadocian prince, and to put Eumenes in poſſeſſion of his province. As to Antigonus, he was now become too haughty to think of paying any reſpect to the commands of another. Leonnatus indeed, marched with an army, as if he intended to perform what Perdiccas had directed, and therefore Eumenes was ſent to join him. This friend of Perdiccas had not been long in the army before Hecatæus the tyrant of Cardia, his native country, arrived, and began to treat with Leonnatus to come to the aſſiſtance of Antipater; to which the latter agreed. Yet he confeſſed to Eumenes, that his true deſign was to marry Cleopatra the ſiſter of Alexander the Great, and in her right to ſeize the kingdom. Eumenes thereupon laying hold of his treaſure, which conſiſted of five thouſand talents, quitted the camp in the night with his attendants, and retired to Perdiccas. This was a new proof of his fidelity, and Perdiccas was ſo pleaſed with it, that he determined to march in perſon with an army to execute what Leonnatus ought to have performed; which accordingly he did, carrying the kings with him. Ariarathes with an army of thirty thouſand foot, and fifteen thouſand horſe, met him on the frontiers of his dominions, where a very obſtinate battle was fought, in which the Cappadocian was entirely defeated, with the loſs

[g] Diodor. lib. xviii. Olymp. cxiv. 2. [h] Idem ibid.

of

of one thouſand men upon the ſpot, himſelf with ſix thouſand more being taken priſoners. Upon which to prevent any further diſturbance, and to ſecure Eumenes in the peaceable poſſeſſion of his province, Perdiccas ordered Ariarathes to be crucified, which was certainly a very arbitrary and cruel act [i].

Lauranda and Iſaurus taken.

THIS expedition over, Perdiccas determined to reduce Lauranda and Iſaurus, two cities of Piſidia, becauſe they had ſlain Balacrus the ſon of Nicanor, whom Alexander had appointed their governor. Lauranda was not very ſtrong, Perdiccas therefore took it by aſſault, and dealt with the inhabitants very ſeverely. All who were able to bear arms, he put to the ſword; for the youths, women and children, he ſold them for ſlaves. He next inveſted Iſaurus, which being a ſtrong and populous place, held out gallantly for a time, till the number of the defendents being greatly reduced, thoſe who remained reſolved not to ſhare the ſame fate with the Laurandians; but having appointed a ſufficient number to defend the walls, they ſet the city on fire in all quarters, conſuming their parents, wives, and children, in their houſes, while themſelves repelled the Macedonians, who ſought to break in and extinguiſh the flames; and when Perdiccas had drawn off his troops, jumped into the fire. The Macedonian army having collected what gold and ſilver they could find in the aſhes, Perdiccas led them into winter quarters, and left the conquered countries under the care of Eumenes [k].

The projects of Perdiccas.

AT the firſt diviſion of the provinces, Perdiccas, to ſtrengthen himſelf, had propoſed to marry Nicæa the daughter of Antipater, and this was ſo well reliſhed, that her brethren Jollas and Archias now conducted her to him, in order to be preſent at the celebration of the nuptials. But Perdiccas had other things in his head. Olympias, who had always hated Antipater, had privately ſolicited him to marry her daughter Cleopatra; this lady was the widow of Alexander, king of Epirus, at whoſe marriage Philip was ſlain, and ſhe now reſided at Sardis in Lydia. Eumenes ſtrongly perſuaded this match without without doubt, because he believed it would prove beneficial to the royal family, and his reasons had such weight with Perdiccas, that he was dispatched to Sardis to compliment Cleopatra, and to carry her presents in the name of her new lover. In the absence of Eumenes, Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas persuaded him to marry Nicæa, which he accordingly did to sooth Antipater and his family, and that he might carry on his own designs more safely. These designs tended all to gratify his ambition; for first he resolved to repudiate the wife he had just married: next he intended to marry Cleopatra; this he conceived would give him a pretence for altering the government in Macedon; and as a necessary measure preparative to these, he entered into contrivances for taking off Antigonus. With this view he caused numberless accusations to be set on foot against the last-mentioned person, who was a man not easy to be dealt with; for he had a spirit not to be tamed, and an understanding too penetrating ever to be imposed on. He therefore put on an appearance of submmitting to Perdiccas, and pretended to busy himself in collecting proofs of his innocence against the day of trial; while he secretly intended nothing less. An accident happened which compelled him to disclose his purpose sooner than he designed. Cynane the daughter of Philip of Macedon by his second wife, who by Amyntas, the true heir of the Macedonian crown had a child, brought her daughter Ada, who was afterwards called Eurydice to court, in hopes that Aridæus or Philip might marry her. Against this lady Cynane, Perdiccas on some political motives conceived such a grudge, that he caused her to be murdered, which made a great noise, the soldiers retaining not only a great love for Alexander her brother, but a high veneration for Philip her father; this so frightened Perdiccas, that to still the storm he had raised, he promoted the match between king Philip and Eurydice, to prevent which he had taken off her mother. Antigonus liked this short method of proceeding so little, that as soon as he was informed of it, he put himself, his son Demetrius, and all his domestics in whom he could confide, on board of some Athenian vessels, and sailed over to Greece, there to take shelter under the protection of Antipater and Craterus, whom he informed of the designs of Perdiccas; above all, setting forth the murder of Cynane in the blackest colours [1].

[i] Plut. in vit. Eumen. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. [k] Arrian ap. Phot. ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Eumen.

Ptolemy

[1] Arrian. Diodor. Plut. ubi supra.

PTOLEMY in the mean time remained in peaceable poſ- The ſucceſs of Ptolemy in Egypt. Year after the flood 2643. Year before Chriſt 356.
ſeſſion of Egypt, which he governed with ſo much wiſdom, clemency, and juſtice, that all who were willing to enjoy peace, and ſecure protection, reſorted out of Europe and Aſia thither, and thought themſelves happy under his government. Thimbro, who, as we have ſeen, had ſlain Harpalus, and poſſeſſed himſelf both of his army and his treaſure, landed in Cyrene, where at firſt he had great ſucceſs; but at laſt, after a long war, one Ophellas, who had fled into Egypt, and requeſted ſuccours againſt this robber, returning into Cyrene, fought and routed him, himſelf being taken priſoner in the battle. He was immediately crucified, as his crimes juſtly deſerved; and thus the Cyrenians loſt their freedom, and became ſubjects to Ptolemy. He, thus ſtrengthened by ſo conſiderable an acceſſion, gave a willing ear to the embaſſadors from Antipater and Craterus, who propoſed to him a league againſt Perdiccas to ſet bounds to his power at leaſt, who plainly ſet none to his ambition[m].

ARIDÆUS, to whoſe care the funeral of Alexander had The corſe of Alexander conveyed to Ptolemy.
been committed, having now ſpent two years in making preparations for it, much againſt the will of Perdiccas, ſet out from Babylon for Damaſcus, with intent to carry the king's body into Egypt. There was, it ſeems, a ſuperſtitious report, that where-ever his body was laid, that country ſhould flouriſh moſt. Perdiccas therefore, out of love to his native ſoil, would have ſent it to the royal ſepulchres in Macedon; but Aridæus pleading the king's expreſs direction, would carry it into Egypt, which Perdiccas could not hinder. That commander therefore executed his intention with all imaginable magnificence. Ptolemy, as ſoon as he knew of his coming, marched in perſon to meet the corſe as far as Syria; he did not, however, convey it to the temple of Hammon, but contented himſelf with repoſing it in a noble temple, which for this purpoſe he built in the city of Alexandria, and by this reſpect ſhewn to his dead maſter, drew numbers of his veteran ſoldiers to his ſervice, which proved of mighty conſequence to him in his affairs, as we ſhall quickly ſee[n].

PERDICCAS having full intelligence of his enemy's deſigns, Perdiccas and perceiving that he ſhould have to deal with a veteran army makes war out on him.

[m] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. lib. xiii. c. 6. [n] Diodor. & Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

out of Greece, and with the numerous forces of Ptolemy at once, he called a council of his friends, in order to resolve on the measures proper to be taken in so nice a conjuncture. In this council it was unanimously determined, that it would be best for Perdiccas to march with the kings, and the gallant army attending on their persons, into Egypt against Ptolemy, while some commander of approved abilities should make head against Antipater and Craterus, who, it was foreseen, would transport an army from Macedonia to make war upon Perdiccas. This captain was immediately found in Eumenes; him Perdiccas ordered to his government, creating him at the same time captain general of the countries as far as the Hellespont. Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus the governor of Armenia, had directions to obey the orders of Eumenes, which not a little displeased them. These things settled, Perdiccas began his march towards Egypt °.

Eumenes defeats Neoptolemus and Craterus.

Eumenes, when he came to his province, found things in a very uncouth situation; he had indeed an excellent body of foot, but they were much inclined to mutiny. Neoptolemus, who should have assisted him, began already to betray an inclination to desert him, and Alcetas, as soon as Antipater and Craterus approached, was prevailed on to be neuter in a war made against his brother. Larger offers than had corrupted these two were made to Eumenes, if he would concur with Antipater and Craterus. He answered, That he believed it would be some time before he could reconcile himself to Antipater his old enemy, the rather, because he had a way of treating his friends like enemies. As for Craterus his old friend, he will be glad to be an instrument of reconciling him to Perdiccas, whom he was determined not to desert. During these negotiations, Eumenes had raised a body of three thousand six hundred horse, partly by bestowing horses on the soldiers he could confide in, and partly by encouraging the Cappadocians to addict themselves to military affairs. By this contrivance he gained not only a great body of cavalry on which he might depend, but also struck the phalanx with such awe, that they in some measure left off their old turbulent humour. Neoptolemus earnestly desiring to gain the friendship of Craterus by subduing his old friend Eumenes, contrived trived to attack him ſuddenly ; but Eumenes was too quick for him, and falling in the beginning of the engagement on his horſe, routed them entirely, compelling Neoptolemus to make his eſcape with only three hundred men to Antipater and Craterus ; then he fell upon the phalanx of Neoptolemus's army, and having diſordered them, offered to receive them into his own troops, if they would take an oath of fidelity to the kings, which they readily did. This ſucceſs was far from making Eumenes ſecure ; he knew very well, that though he had beaten Neoptolemus, and increaſed his own army, yet he had ſtill to deal with very odd people ; for he was conſcious to himſelf, that if his own army knew they were to fight againſt Craterus, they would be ſo far from executing his commands, that they would infallibly deſert him. When therefore he had intelligence that Antipater was marched into Cilicia, and that Craterus and Neoptolemus were in full march againſt him, he told his own army, that Neoptolemus and Pigris, with ſome Cappadocian and Paphlagonian horſe, were marching to ſurpriſe them ; wherefore he intended to decamp, and meet them in the night. When they came to engage, he placed a body of foreign horſe over-againſt Craterus, commanded by Pharnabazus and Phœnix, ordering them to charge home, and not to give the enemy any time to ſend heralds or meſſengers. They performed their commiſſion ſo well, that Craterus, who fought bravely at the head of his troops, was mortally wounded before he was known. Eumenes in the mean time engaged Neoptolemus perſonally, but both of them falling together from their horſes, fought it out afterwards on foot, till Eumenes gave Neoptolemus a mortal wound in the neck, and proceeded to ſtrip him of his arms, inveighing bitterly againſt him for his vanity and perfidy, whereby ſo much miſchief had been wrought ; then returning to the center of his army, he found Craterus yet living, over whom he wept and lamented, permitting the Macedonian phalanx, after they had taken an oath of fidelity, to retire to their quarters ; yet in breach of that oath, they privately ſtole away to Antipater in Cilicia, leaving Eumenes the reputation of having gained two ſignal victories in ten days, which, however, was more than ballanced by the envy which other commanders conceived againſt him, and by the hatred his own army bore him, for making them the inſtruments of ſlaying their favourite favourite Craterus. But it is now time to follow Perdiccas [p].

° Arrian. Diodor. Plut. Justin ubi supra.

Perdiccas slain.

The royal army marched as far as Damascus with all imaginable tranquillity; but when they came there, and heard every-where as they passed the character of Ptolemy, they began to grow diffident and uneasy; and when they entered Egypt, they grew more and more turbulent. Perdiccas, being a man of high spirit, treated them with a good deal of haughtiness, and threatened to punish them as rebels. This was so far from mending the matter, that it made it much worse, his soldiers beginning to mutter, that he, who was but tutor to their princes, should never become a tyrant over them who had been allowed all liberty even by Alexander himself; neither was it the private men only who were offended with his conduct, some of the chief officers were no less discontented, insomuch, that they took the first opportunity of deserting him. This brought Perdiccas to a true sense of his error; he therefore altered his whole conduct, caressed the soldiers, treated the officers familiarly, and encouraged all by fair words and fine promises. Then he brought them to pass the river Nile, and to attack Ptolemy in his retrenchments. The army on this occasion behaved with all the bravery imaginable, and, as they had the advantage in numbers, attacked several times. But Ptolemy, on the other hand, fighting in a fortification, being himself a great captain, exposing his person freely, and having scarce a man in his troops who was not desirous of losing his life in his cause, maintained his post so well, that Perdiccas was forced to retire; and having marched a great part of the night, attempted to repass the river. Part of his forces actually got over by wading up to the chin; but on a sudden the river grew deeper, and the stream so much stronger, that no more could pass. This accident occasioned a great deal of speculation; but the true cause was this; so great a body as at first passed having stirred, and, as it were, digged the loose sand at the bottom of the river, the stream had carried it away. Perdiccas, like an indefatigable officer, had recourse to various expedients; but they all proved ineffectual; at last he ordered the forces which had passed to return, which they accordingly did, but with the loss of two thousand men, half drowned, and half eaten by the crocodiles. Upon this misfortune the phalanx mutinied, and

[p] Arrian. Diodor. Plut. ubi supra.

and a hundred principal officers, among whom was Pithon, immediately went over to Ptolemy. A troop of horſe following the example, mutinied alſo, and having ſurrounded the general's tent, ſome of them entered and murdered him. The next day they held a conſultation, but before they reſolved upon any thing, Ptolemy came to them, and brought with him a vaſt quantity of proviſions, which he freely beſtowed upon them, kindly ſaluting every battalion of Macedonians, embracing their officers, and offering them all that was in his power. In this aſſembly Aridæus and Pithon were choſen protectors of the kings [q].

Two days after the death of Perdiccas, news arrived in the camp of the victory gained by Eumenes, which, had it arrived ſooner, would certainly have ſaved that general's life. As it was, it ſerved only to heighten the misfortunes of his friends; for the ſoldiers in a rage put all of them to death on whom they could lay hands; amongſt the reſt Atalanta, the ſiſter of Perdiccas and wife to Attalus the admiral; they likewiſe proſcribed Eumenes, and fifty perſons of quality with him; amongſt whom was Alcetas, Perdiccas's brother, who had ſo ſcandalouſly ſat ſtill at the beginning of the war. Having thus glutted their reſentment, they quitted Egypt, and, under the command of Aridæus and Pithon, marched back again into Cœle-Syria. In this march, Eurydice the wife of king Philip began to take pretty much upon her, which Aridæus and Pithon were very much diſpleaſed at; yet finding the army more inclined to favour her than themſelves, they were forced to temporize till they came to Triparadiſus, where Antipater joined them. There a grand council was held, in which the new elected tutors of the kings reſigned their offices, and Antipater was choſen ſole protector with ſovereign power. He was no leſs diſſatisfied with Eurydice's behaviour than his predeceſſors had been, and therefore began to check her, which irritated her ſo much, that in a ſet oration ſhe accuſed him to the army; and though he made a long and laboured anſwer, yet ſuch a ſedition enſued, that Antigonus and Seleucus were forced to reſcue him at the peril of their lives, as well as his. However, after ſome days the matter was adjuſted, and the adminiſtration again put into the hands of Antipater. When things were a little quiet, and the army pacified with promises as to their pay, Antipater proceeded to make a new division of the provinces [r].

Pithon and Aridæus ſucceed Perdiccas.

[q] Arrian. ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

Antipater divides the provinces anew.

Egypt Libya, and the parts adjacent, were given to Ptolemy, which could not be avoided; for he would not have parted with them, if Antipater had given them to any body else. Syria was confirmed to Leomedon. Philoxenus had Cilicia. Mesopotamia and Arbelites were given to Amphimachus. Babylon was bestowed on Seleucus. Susiana fell to Antigenes, who commanded the Macedonian silver-shields, because he was the first who opposed Perdiccas. Peucestas held Persia. Tlepolemus had Caramania given him. Pithon held Media, as far as the Caspian streights. Stasander had Aria and Drangia. Philip Parthia. Stasanor Bactria and Sogdia. Sybirtius Aracosia. Oxyartes, the father of Roxana, Paraponisis. Python the country between this province and India. Porus and Taxiles held what Alexander had given them, because they would not part with any of their dominions. Cappadocia was assigned to Nicanor. Phrygia Major, Lycaonia, Pamphylia and Lycia were given to Antigonus. Caria to Cassander. Lydia to Clytus. Phrygia the less to Aridæus. Cassander was appointed general of the horse. The command of the houshold troops was given to Antigonus, with orders to prosecute the war against Eumenes, who was now reputed a public enemy. Antipater, when he had thus settled all things, returned home to his own province with the kings, much commended, and highly admired by all the Macedonians [s].

Eumenes prepares to defend himself
Year of the flood 2679.
Before Christ 320.

As for Eumenes, he began to provide for the war, which he foresaw was breaking upon him, with all imaginable prudence. Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas joined him; so did Attalus with the fleet. This officer, on the first news of the death of his brother and his wife, sailed with the navy under his command to Tyre, where Archelaus was governor, by the appointment of Perdiccas, who had also intrusted him with eight hundred talents. This governor retained so grateful a sense of the favours done him by his deceased patron, that he willingly received Attalus, and readily paid him the money which had been left in his hands. Here also Attalus collected such of the friends and soldiers of Perdiccas, as repaired to him, with whom he afterwards sailed ſailed to Eumenes. Among the principal officers in the camp of the laſt-mentioned general, there was one Perdiccas, whom he truſted much. This man prevailed on a body of three thouſand five hundred horſe to deſert with him, and with them marched a conſiderable diſtance from the camp. Eumenes did not purſue him the firſt night; but as the ſecond drew on, he ſent one Phœnix, with four hundred choice foot and a thouſand horſe, through certain by-ways. Theſe ſurpriſed the traitor and his ſoldiers, and brought them all priſoners to the camp of Eumenes, who hanged Perdiccas, and a few of thoſe who were principally concerned, receiving the reſt into favour. It was not long before a general engagement happened, wherein Eumenes, through the treachery of Apollonides, general of his horſe, was totally routed, with the loſs of eight thouſand men. However, he performed on this occaſion one of the moſt extraordinary actions that we can find recorded in hiſtory; for, with the ſcattered remains of his army, ſtriking off into a road parallel to that by which the enemy purſued him, he paſſed by them unperceived, and returned to the field of battle, where gathering all the wood that could be found in the adjacent villages, he burned all the dead bodies of his ſoldiers in one heap, and thoſe of his officers in another; covering the aſhes of each with a large mount of earth. Then, diſmiſſing ſuch of his ſoldiers as were ſick, wounded, or were unable to bear fatigue, he, with ſix hundred men, retired into the caſtle of Nora, a place exceedingly ſtrong, by its ſituation on the top of an inacceſſible rock, well fortified, and ſtored with all ſorts of proviſions, where he reſolved to abide a ſiege, hoping that Alcetas and Attalus would be able to raiſe ſuch a body of troops, as might enable them to deliver him before the caſtle could be reduced. Antigonus immediately cauſed the place to be inveſted; but when he was informed how well it was provided, and how reſolute thoſe men were who had choſen to be ſhut up therein, for Eumenes had none with him but ſuch as requeſted it as a favour, he began to deſpair of taking it by force. In order therefore to get over this matter as ſoon as poſſible, he ſent to deſire a conference with Eumenes. Eumenes anſwered, that he had many eminent commanders in his army; but, if himſelf ſhould be taken off, thoſe in the fort would be deſtitute of any commander. Antigonus returned, that, as he was the greater man, he expected that he ſhould wave ſuch excuſes, and come to him. To which Eumenes replied, that while he had his ſword in his hand, he held no man greater than himſelf. Antigonus thereupon ſent him hoſtages; and Eumenes coming to the foot of the rock, Antigonus went thither to meet him. As ſoon as they met together, they embraced, having been formerly intimate friends. Then Eumenes demanded to have the provinces reſtored to him, exhorted Antigonus to act dutifully towards the kings, and behaved in all things as if they had treated upon equal terms. The Macedonians who were near, admired the courage and ſpirit of the man. Thoſe who could only ſee him, were charmed with the ſweetneſs of his aſpect, and the beauty of his perſon; for he was one of the handſomeſt men of his age, the moſt perfect in his exerciſes, and abſolutely free either from paſſion or pride. At laſt the throng of the ſpectators grew ſo great, that Antigonus was in pain for his perſon; finding therefore that no accommodation could be made, he took Eumenes in his arms, and ſo brought him to the paſſage of the rock, where they parted. Antigonus perceiving that the ſiege would much incommode his affairs, ordered the place to be ſurrounded with a ſtrong wall, and leaving a ſufficient body of troops to guard it, he marched againſt Alcetas and Attalus.

[r] Arrian. ubi supra. Diodor. ubi supra. Justin. ubi supra.
[s] Arrian. & Diodor. ubi supra.

Alcetas defeated and killed.

The celerity with which Antigonus marched into Piſidia, where Alcetas and Attalus with their army lay, was ſuch, that he ſurpriſed them; and tho' their troops behaved very well, yet evercome with numbers, with elephants and the ſuperior ſkill of the old Macedonian ſoldiers, they were totally beaten. Attalus, Docimus, and Polemon were taken; but Alcetas, with about ſix thouſand men, eſcaped to Termiſſus. Antigonus followed him and inveſted the city, demanding Alcetas. The magiſtrates were all for delivering him up; but the people of the city, to whom Alcetas had done innumerable favours, ſwore ſolemnly they would live and die with him. In this the magiſtrates acquieſced; but while the citizens were at their poſts, they ſent ſome of their ſervants to murder Alcetas, who perceiving their intention, killed himſelf. His body being delivered to Antigonus, he firſt uſed it deſpitefully, and after two days, when it began to corrupt, cauſed it to be thrown into the road, whence it was retaken by the Termiſſians, Termiſſians, and honourably buried, who were very hardly deterred from burning their magiſtrates in their houſes [t].

ANTIGONUS receiving the news of the death of Antipater, and that he had, by his will appointed Polyſperchon tutor to the kings, he immediately conceived a great contempt of them all, reſolving to make himſelf lord of Aſia. He had now an army of ſixty-thouſand foot and nineteen thouſand horſe, many elephants, and treaſure in abundance. He began therefore to make no ſecret of his deſigns; but to remove all the governors of provinces who were not in his intereſts. In this however, he had not great ſucceſs; for Aridæus governor of Phrygia immediately began to arm, and when Antigonus threatened to deprive him of his province, as one who affected regal authority, he ſent him word his own intentions were honeſt, and that he armed, becauſe he looked upon him, Antigonus, to be a traitor. The next ſtep Antigonus took, was to bring over Eumenes; in order to which he ſent a truſty perſon to confer with that great captain in his caſtle of Nora, to deſire him to forget the battle in Cappadocia, and to aſſure him, that if he would become his friend, he ſhould be the ſecond perſon in his court. Eumenes gave a proper reception to theſe overtures; whereupon Antigonus framed an oath, which he ſent to the commanders of the troops forming the blockade of the caſtle of Nora, with inſtructions that on Eumenes's ſwearing thereto, they ſhould raiſe the ſiege. The purport of this oath was, that he ſhould be faithful to Antigonus, and have the ſame friends and enemies with him. When this oath was rendered to Eumenes, he obſerved that it was not properly drawn; wherefore inſtead of Antigonus he inſerted Olympias, the kings, and the royal family. This change the Macedonians immediately approved, and on Eumenes's ſwearing, they inſtantly ſet him and his friends at liberty. He no ſooner regained his freedom than he began to collect forces for the defence of the kings, whoſe authority, he ſaw clearly, was on the very point of being extinguiſhed in Aſia. But when Antigonus was informed of what had happened, he was extremely angry, and ſent to his generals to make war on Eumenes, and, if poſſible, to ſecure his perſon; but theſe orders came too late, for Eumenes having collected about two thouſand foot and five hundred horſe, quitted Cappadocia and marched towards mount Taurus [u].

Antigonus reſolves to ſeize Aſia.

[t] Diodor. ubi ſupra.

[u] Diodor ubi ſupra.

The kings create Eumenes general in Aſia.

POLYSPERCHON finding himſelf exceedingly diſtreſſed, through the wickedneſs of many and the extraordinary power of Antigonus, ſought out all poſſible methods to ſecure himſelf and the kings from deſtruction. To this end he invited Olympias, who, for fear of Antipater and his contrivances had fled from Macedon to Epirus, to return, and take upon her the education of Alexander's young ſon. He likewiſe diſpatched letters in his own name and hers, to Eumenes, whereby he conſtituted him general for the kings in Aſia, ordering the governors to pay him five hundred talents to indemnify him for his loſſes, and aſſigning him a thouſand ſilver-ſhields for his guard. Olympias alſo wrote to him herſelf to deſire his advice, whether ſhe ſhould remain ſtill in Epirus, or return into Macedonia. She likewiſe exhorted him to remain firm to the intereſts of the royal family, for that ſhe and her children put their whole confidence in him. Eumenes in anſwer wrote her word, that to him it appeared moſt adviſable for her to remain in Epirus, where ſhe was, till the war was over. As for himſelf he promiſed to be ever obſervant of the intereſt of the royal family, and to hazard all things in order to check the torrent of Antigonus's ambition. He ſaid he was the rather inclined to this, becauſe the tenderneſs of the young Alexander's age, and the all-graſping diſpoſition of his father's captains, left an honeſt man no part to act, but that of ſacrificing his own concerns to the publick ſafety. To ſhew that his loyalty did not conſiſt in words, when his enemies were retired into Cappadocia, he made a quick turn into Cilicia, where he joined Antigenes and Teutamus who had three thouſand of the Argyraſpidæ or ſilver-ſhields under their command. They received him with all the marks of deference and reſpect which they could poſſibly deviſe, but he very quickly perceived, that neither they, nor the reſt of the commanders who reſorted to him, eſteemed him in their hearts; but on the contrary, envied him. He therefore applied himſelf to two things; firſt the leſſening of their malice; and ſecondly, provided for his own ſafety. With reſpect to this he refuſed the five hundred talents and the title of general, ſaying, That great wealth and high titles was of no uſe to a man who ſought to ſerve his ſovereign, and not to be a prince himſelf. As to that, he borrowed large ſums of thoſe who hated him moſt, and thereby made them careful of his ſafety, leſt they ſhould

loſe

loſe their money. With this money he furniſhed ſuch friends as he could truſt, ordering them to raiſe ſoldiers, and to give them more pay than was abſolutely neceſſary, rightly conceiving, that numbers would reſort to him, in hopes of extraordinary pay, who might afterwards be induced to ſerve on moderate terms. By theſe arts, before Antigonus was aware, he had aſſembled an army of fifteen thouſand men. Theſe proceedings raiſed the admiration of all his cotemporaries; but, however, they were ſo far from raiſing him in his own mind, that he contrived therein a ſcheme for leſſening his own authority, and putting himſelf upon the ſame rank with all the reſt of the captains. He told the officers of the army, that he had in a dream ſeen Alexander, adorned in his royal robes, ſitting on his throne, and giving orders, as he was wont, to all his commanders. He gave it therefore as his advice, that a tent of ſtate ſhould be erected, wherein there ſhould be placed a throne of gold, with all the enſigns of royalty thereon, before it an altar of the ſame metal, whereon each of the captains ſhould offer incenſe, after which they ſhould take their ſeats indiſcriminately, and conſult for the publick ſafety. By this means he appeaſed the diſſenſions among the great, and inſpired the common ſoldiers with enthuſiaſtic bravery. Antigonus in the mean time, ſent Philotas with letters to the army, promiſing the ſilver-ſhields mighty rewards, if they would deliver up Eumenes. They read the letters, and debated upon them; of which Eumenes having ſome notice, he went into the aſſembly, and told them, that the Macedonians were not wont to conſult, whether they ſhould obey their prince, or deliver up his officers to traitors; and that it leſs became them ſo to do, whom not Antigonus but Alexander, had ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed. This determined the ſoldiers at that time to reject the offers of Antigonus. Eumenes then marched into Phænicia, that he might be near the ſea. This province Ptolemy had ſeized; wherefore Eumenes made no ſcruple of conquering it, ſaying, That all were his enemies who knew not their duty. But when Antigonus had defeated the royal navy, and then marched againſt him in perſon, Eumenes thought it more expedient to retire into the higher provinces, which he did ſafely, notwithſtanding that he paſſed over the rivers Tigris and Euphrates in ſight of the enemy [w].

EUMENES

[w] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Eumen.

The governors of the upper provinces join him.

Eumenes wintered with his army on the frontiers of the province of Babylon. Pithon and Seleucus, who were governors, one of Media, the other of the territory of Babylon, fought by all means to debauch his ſoldiers. Theſe attempts were, however, ſtill ineffectual, and Eumenes having paſſed the river Tigris in ſpight of them, advanced into Suſiana, where he was immediately joined by Peuceſtas, Polemon, Sybirtius, Staſander, Androbazus, and Eudames, with upwards of twenty thouſand men and twenty elephants. The firſt thing that happened after this junction, was a diſpute about the command, to which every one of the governors laid claim, and Eumenes was never thought of. At laſt they were forced to come into his expedient of meeting in a tent. This was done for the preſent; for every one of them hoped by careſſing the ſoldiers, to carry his point in time; and indeed they all carried it in their turns, for the army ſaluted every one of them general when they were eating at his coſt. But when Antigonus drew near, they called out for Eumenes, ſaying openly, that, when fighting was the buſineſs, they would have no general but him. This, however, occaſioned no diſturbance, for the generals were as ready to ſubmit to him as the ſoldiers, none caring to charge themſelves with the weight of a command, where the leaſt wrong ſtep would forfeit all their power and their lives in the bargain. Eumenes then led the army to the Tygris, drawing them up in excellent order on the banks, where he waited for Antigonus. That ambitious captain marched firſt to Suſa, and finding that caſtle held by Xenophilus, he left Seleucus with a corps of troops to beſiege it, and then marched on to fight Eumenes. The climate was exceſſively hot, the ſoil dry and ſandy, ſo that his troops were prodigiouſly fatigued. At laſt he arrived on the banks of the Copares, a very rapid river running into the Tygris about eight miles from the camp of Eumenes. Here, with a few flat-bottomed boats, he paſſed over ſix thouſand horſe and two thouſand foot, giving ſtrict orders to the latter to intrench themſelves as ſoon as they were over. As for the horſe, they diſperſed themſelves for the conveniency of forage. The foot had ſcarce formed themſelves, and conſidered the ſituation of the place, before they found themſelves in danger of being puſhed into the river by their own horſe, whom Eumenes had ſurpriſed, and entirely defeated. They covered them as well as they could, and received bravely the charge of Eumenes

at

at the head of five thouſand men, with whom he had paſſed the Tigris; but finding themſelves unable to bear up againſt theſe freſh troops, they threw themſelves in heaps into the boats, till they ſunk, affording Antigonus, and the reſt of his army, the melancholy ſpectacle of four thouſand of their companions killed and drowned, and as many taken priſoners, themſelves looking on. Antigonus was ſo effectually checked by this ſudden blow, that he immediately retired, and left the army of the kings in poſſeſſion of the field [x].

Antigonus marches into Media.

THE deſign of Antigonus in retiring, was not to quit the war, but remove the ſcene of it to ſome part of Aſia, where he might act with more advantage; with this view he determined to march into Media, to which there were two roads, the one ſafe and pleaſant, the other through the country of the Coſſeans, the ſame baſe and barbarous people, againſt whom Alexander made an expedition immediately after the death of Hephæſtion. Pithon knowing well the temper of theſe mountaineers, very prudently adviſed Antigonus rather to quiet them with a ſum of money, than to attempt to paſs through their territories by force; but that little ſuited the haughty diſpoſition of him to whom the counſel was given. Antigonus thought it unworthy of himſelf and of the great army he commanded, to pay theſe highlanders for a paſſage. He therefore ſent Nearchus with the light-armed troops before in order to drive the Coſſeans from their poſts, and directed him, when he had ſo done, to line the roads with his men. Antigonus led the phalanx himſelf, Pithon, and a choice body of horſe bringing up the rear. The army, however, paid dearly in their march for their rejecting Pithon's advice; the Coſſeans attacking them on all ſides with equal bravery and reſolution, ſo that for nine days together they ſuſtained the greateſt hardſhips; but at laſt coming down into Media, they were ſo plentifully provided for, and, through the care of Pithon, the cavalry ſo well remounted, and the ſoldiers ſo effectually indemnified for their loſſes, that the army reſumed its wonted alacrity; whereupon Antigonus determined to penetrate into the higher countries, in order to diſplace thoſe governors who had ſided with Eumenes [y].

THE

[x] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. & Corn. Nepos. in vit. Eumen. [y] Diodor ubi ſupra.

Eumenes marches into the upper provinces.

THE confederate lords, understanding that Antigonus again drew near them, were much divided in their councils; some of them were for retiring to the sea-coasts, where, in case of any misfortune, they might receive aid from Polysperchon. The governors of the upper provinces, mindful of their private concerns, were for marching back with the army, that they might secure their friends. Eumenes agreed in opinion with the former, yet sided against his own opinion with the latter, foreseeing, that if he had declared for marching into the maritime provinces, the army would necessarily have been divided, and thereby become too weak to effect any thing any where. His assent therefore having determined the question, they immediately marched into Persis, and in twenty-four days march reached Persepolis. Here Peucestas made a grand feast for the army, and having them now in his own province, he loaded them with such extravagant favours, that Eumenes began to suspect he aimed at somewhat more than he ought. As soon as he entertained these suspicions, he struck out an expedient for bringing the army back to their former temper without hurting Peucestas. He caused a letter to be writ in Syrian characters, in the name of Orontes, governor of Armenia, importing, that the party of Olympias had killed Cassander, and that the power of the kings being thoroughly settled in Macedon, Polysperchon was about to pass with a great army into Asia. This letter being directed to Peucestas, he readily gave credit to it, and published it in the army; whereupon all the officers paid their court to Eumenes, and those were the forwardest who hated him most. Eumenes took all in good part, and according to custom borrowed money of those he feared, and thereby became master of their councils. The news which Peucestas had received, occasioned more feasting, and Eumenes, contrary to his nature, was forced to drink hard, which threw him into a fever, out of which as he recovered, the generals received advice, that Antigonus drew near them. Immediately the army marched under the command of Peucestas, and Antigenes, Eumenes being carried in the rear in a litter. But when they were in the midst of their march, the van of Antigonus's army appeared. Peucestas instantly gave directions for forming a line of battle, but the soldiers absolutely refused to move any way till Eumenes should appear. Hereupon he was brought in his litter with the curtains drawn back, and after he had thanked

the

the ſoldiers for their confidence in him, he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions. When Antigonus drew near enough to perceive in what manner the confederate army was drawn up, he was exceedingly ſurprized, for he depended on the ſickneſs of Eumenes. At laſt perceiving the litter paſſing through the lines, he burſt out a laughing; and turning to the officers who were near him, ſaid, It is not that army but yon litter that bids us battle. However, he ordered a retreat to be ſounded, and contented himſelf with encamping in a very advantageous poſt [z] (C).

A battle enſues.

WHILE the armies lay over-againſt each other, Eumenes received intelligence that Antigonus intended to decamp in the night; he thereupon preſently gueſſed that his deſign was to put his army into quarters of refreſhment in the rich diſtrict of Gabene. To prevent this, and at the ſame time to gain a paſſage into that country, he inſtructed ſome ſoldiers to pretend they were deſeterrs, whom he ſent into the camp of Antigonus, where they reported that Eumenes intended to attack them in their trenches that very night. But while Antigonus's troops were under arms, Eumenes marched for Gabene, which at length Antigonus

[z] Id. ibid.

(C) Antigonus a ſhort time after this finding the country where he lay exceſſively waſted, and that it would be very difficult for him to ſubſiſt, ſent deputies to the confederate army to ſolicit them, eſpecially the governors of provinces and the old Macedonian corps to deſert Eumenes, and to join him, which at this time they rejected with the higheſt indignation. After the deputies were diſmiſſed, Eumenes came into the aſſembly, and delivered himſelf in theſe words: "Once upon a time a lion fall-"ing in love with a young damſel, demanded her in marriage "of her father. The father made anſwer, that he looked on "ſuch an alliance as a great honour to his family, but ſtood "in fear of his paws and teeth, leſt upon any trifling diſpute "that might happen to them after they were married, he might "exerciſe them a little too haſtily upon his daughter. To "remove this objection, the amorous lion cauſed both his "nails and teeth to be drawn immediately, whereupon the "father took a cudgel, and ſoon got rid of his enemy.". This continued he, is the very thing aimed at by Antigonus, who makes you large promiſes, till he has made himſelf maſter of your forces, and then beware of his teeth and paws (9).

(9) Plut. in vit. Eumen. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii.

Antigonus ſuſpected, and having given proper orders to his foot, marched immediately after him with his horſe, ſending all his baggage to an adjacent city, that it might not incommode him. Freed from all incumbrances, pretty early in the morning, he from the top of a hill diſcerned Eumenes with his army marching below; whereupon he immediately diſpoſed his horſe, as if his infantry had been behind the hill, whereby he deceived Eumenes who would otherwiſe have marched on. Whereas believing the whole army of Antigonus to be at hand, he faced about, and diſpoſed his troops in order of battle. By degrees the infantry of Antigonus came up, and as they came up, formed behind the horſe. The whole of Eumenes's forces conſiſted of thirty-five thouſand foot, ſix thouſand horſe, and one hundred and fourteen elephants. In the army of Antigonus was twenty-eight thouſand foot, eight thouſand five hundred horſe, and ſixty-five elephants. Antigonus charged the troops under Eumenes with great bravery. The battle was moſt obſtinately fought, and the victory won and loſt ſeveral times by each party. At laſt after a whole days engagement, the ſtars began to appear, when Antigonus had viſibly the worſt, yet his officers could not prevail upon him to retire from the field of battle; on the contrary he encamped there with the troops yet unbroken, and ſent ſeveral perſons well mounted to give notice to thoſe who fled, that it would be their ſafeſt way to repair to his camp, which accordingly they did. He then buried his dead, which done, by forced marches he withdrew into Media, where he took up his winter quarters. If Eumenes had been as abſolute in the command of his army as Antigonus was, the latter would not have eſcaped ſo well, for Eumenes without doubt would have attacked him again, and in all probability would have totally routed him; for whereas Antigonus had almoſt eight thouſand men killed and wounded, Eumenes did not loſe in the whole quite fifteen hundred; but the diviſions which reigned in the confederate army, and the inſolence of the ſoldiers, hindered any thing more from being done, and even permitted Antigonus to inter the ſlain, whereby their victory was called in queſtion. However, according to the modern rules of war, Eumenes was the conqueror, inaſmuch as he carried his point, and actually brought his forces to winter in the rich country of Gabene, bene, where they were five and twenty days march from the enemy [a].

As ſoon as their army was in winter quarters, and began to taſte thoſe advantages which the wiſdom of their general had procured for them, they very gratefully began to deſpiſe him, and to pay all their court to the generals who treated beſt, and for the greater conveniency of receiving entertainments, ſpread themſelves all over the country. Antigonus had his ſpies amongſt them, and from them he quickly received intelligence of the bad ſituation of their affairs. As ſoon as Antigonus received theſe accounts, he reſolved, notwithſtanding it was the very depth of winter, to attempt ſurprizing them; of which deſign he conceived the greater hopes, becauſe he was informed that there lay a paſſage through the deſarts, which in nine or ten days time would bring him to Gabene; though by the ordinary rout it was twenty-five days march from his quarters. Full of this mighty project he gave out his orders for the ſoldiers to provide themſelves with ſuch proviſion for ten days, as required no dreſſing, hoping by this contrivance to avoid lighting fires. But this proved ineffectual, for after five days march he and his forces found the cold ſo intenſe, that, to preſerve themſelves from periſhing, they were forced to make fires in the nights. Some ſhepherds, who were upon the hills ſurrounding theſe deſarts, perceiving theſe fires, diſpatched away meſſengers on dromedaries to carry advice to the confederate generals, who inſtantly called a council, wherein they ſhewed all the marks of terror and confuſion, and acknowledging the miſerable ſituation of their affairs, by the troops being quartered at many days march diſtance, they neither propoſed nor reſolved on any method for defence. Eumenes obſerving their diſtreſs, told them, that he would undertake to retard the march of the enemy for four or five days, if in the interim they would aſſemble the troops. This promiſe, which to them appeared impoſſible to be fulfilled, they readily laid hold of, and immediately transferred to Eumenes, the command of the troops which lay in the neighbourhood of the place where they were. As ſoon as Eumenes could draw them together, he marched directly towards the enemy, and when he was near enough for them to ſee the fires in his camp, he extended his troops troops as much in front, as if the whole confederate army had been there, and caused as many and more fires to be lighted than would have been necessary. When Antigonus perceived this, he concluded that Eumenes, having intelligence of his march, had led all his troops out of fresh quarters to meet him; he therefore quitted the road through the desart, and turned through the ordinary one through towns and villages, that his soldiers might receive some refreshment, and not be exposed, after sustaining so great fatigues, to an unequal engagement with troops just come out of quarters. This was exactly what Eumenes foresaw, and consequently by that time Antigonus by the ordinary road arrived on the frontiers, the whole confederate army was assembled, and ready to give him battle, which Antigonus did not decline. In the private councils held by the generals and governors of provinces, it was unanimously determined to make use of Eumenes in the approaching battle, and then to rid themselves of him; for they saw clearly in matters of moment, they neither considered each other, nor were considered by the army; but his advice and his conduct only were relied on. Eudamus and Phadimus, two principal persons in the army, immediately gave Eumenes notice, not out of any good will to him, for they hated him as much or more than any of the rest, but because he was very deeply in their debt. As soon as he was acquainted with this treacherous conspiracy, Eumenes retired to his tent, and in the first place put all his papers out of the way, that in case of the worst none of his friends might be prejudiced; he then considered with himself whether it might not be possible for him to escape into Cappadocia; but then reflecting that his escape would be abdicating his command, and giving up the cause of Alexander's family, he generously resolved to die, as he had lived, with the glory of never having done a base or unbecoming action. This resolution once taken, he came out and encouraged the soldiers, the major part of whom were well-affected to him, and saluted him with loud acclamations. Eumenes thanked them for those marks of their favour, and disposed all things for a battle, never divulging any part of the information he had received, though he could not help saying sometimes to his intimate friends, that he lived among wild beasts, by whom he expected some time or other to be torn to pieces. The battle was fought on the ſea-ſhore, and Eumenes having the advantage in infantry, effectually routed the phalanx of Antigonus; but his cavalry having the advantage, through the baſe treachery of Peuceſtas, Antigonus, who was alike preſent to himſelf in all circumſtances, perceiving that the engagement had raiſed a miſt of ſmall white duſt by the violent toſſing of the ſand, he made uſe of the obſcurity of the air to wheel round the army of Eumenes, and to poſſeſs himſelf of their baggage, a contrivance which availed him more than a victory would have done. As ſoon as the forces of Eumenes were returned into their camp, and were acquainted with the loſs of their baggage with the women and children, they were ready to mutiny. Teutamus, who commanded a battalion of the ſilver-ſhields, and who had long inclined to Antigonus, took this opportunity of ſending to him, and demanding of him the booty he had lately taken. Antigonus returned him for anſwer, that he would willingly reſtore the ſilver-ſhields, the baggage, and all elſe that belonged to them, and would be ready to do them what farther favours they ſhould requeſt, provided they would do him one, which was to deliver up Eumenes, a ſtranger, a perſon once condemned by the Macedonians, and who had ſince attained power enough to do them conſiderable miſchiefs. The ſilver-ſhields immediately cloſed with this propoſition, ſcandalous as it was, and gathering about their unſuſpecting general, ſeized his ſword, pinioned his arms behind him, and in this plight prepared to deliver him up, who had ſo long protected them from their enemies. As ſoon as that illuſtrious perſon perceived what they were about, he moſt earneſtly deſired that he might have leave to ſpeak to them, which when he had obtained, he in a very pathetic oration ſhewed them the folly and ill conſequences of ſuch a procedure, beſides the diſgrace that it would bring upon them; concluding with this petition, that ſince they were determined to part with their general to regain their lumber, they would have the goodneſs to put him to death with their own hands, and not deliver him up to his and their old enemy Antigonus, whom under his command they had ſo often beaten. The reſt of the army wept and lamented, but the ſilver-ſhields cried out, Away with him! Let us hear none of his fine ſpeeches, carry him to Antigonus, and bring us again our wives and children. This being ac-accordingly performed, Antigonus in purſuance of his promiſe, delivered up the baggage with all the women and children. As to Eumenes, when thoſe who had him in cuſtody demanded how he ſhould be kept? As you would keep an elephant or a lion, anſwered their general. The fate of Aſia was now decided, for Eumenes being given up, the governors ſubmitted and made the beſt terms they could, ſuffering their troops to be incorporated into thoſe of Antigonus. The only point which remained to be ſettled was the fate of the captive general. At firſt he was not only very ſtrictly confined, but loaded with heavy irons; but after ſome time, Antigonus was prevailed on to command part of the irons to be taken off; to allow him a ſervant to wait on him, and to permit his friends to viſit him. While things continued in this ſtate, Eumenes would often ſay to thoſe who came to him, I wonder Antigonus protracts my affair thus, and that he has not courage enough to put me to death as an enemy, or by ſetting me free to make me his friend. There was indeed a party in the army of Antigonus, at the head of whom was Demetrius his ſon, who would have had him ſet Eumenes free, ſuppoſing that this would have bound him to his intereſts; but the reſt of his friends, and the bulk of the army, earneſtly entreated him to put him to death, which, when the army was about to march, he accordingly did. However, he and all his troops aſſiſted with great ſolemnity at his funeral, and after the body was burnt, he cauſed the aſhes to be put up in a ſilver urn, and ordered them to be tranſmitted to his wife and children in Cappadocia. Hieronymus the Cardian, his moſt intimate friend, was taken by Antigonus into his favour and councils. Antigenes, commander in chief of the ſilver-ſhields, was by his order put into a coffin, and burnt alive. Eudamus, Celbanus, and many others of the enemies of Eumenes, experienced a like fate [b].

Eumenes's laſt campaign. Year after the flood 2684. Before Chriſt 315.

[a] Diodor. Sicul. Plut. & Corn. Nepos. ibid.

the

He reſolves to change the governors in all the provinces:

Antigonus had now nothing in his head but the executing of his old ſcheme of making himſelf lord of Aſia; in order to which he reſolved to ſacrifice all ſuch as he ſuſpected, all who had obſtinately oppoſed him, and all who by the fickleneſs of their conduct had ſhewn they were not to be depended on by any party. In the firſt place he reſolved ſolved to take of Pithon, who had done him ſuch eminent ſervice; but who while they were in winter quarters in Media, had been tampering with the ſoldiers. Antigonus, to carry on his deſign, brow-beat all ſuch as found fault with Pithon's conduct, gave out to his friends that he intended to make him governor of all the upper provinces, and under this pretence drew him out of his own province of Media; but as ſoon as he got him into his hands, he called a council of war, wherein charging him with treaſon, thoſe who had been formerly concerned with him were now out of fear moſt ready to give him up, ſo that he was preſently convicted, and thereon inſtantly executed. He then appointed Orontobates a Mede governor of Media, but made Hippoſtratus general of the forces, which he left for the preſervation of the province. Such of the governors as he found could not be diſpoſſeſſed, he confirmed in their provinces. Laſt of all, he ſent for Sibyrtius, governor of Aracoſia, in whom he confided. To this man he transferred the ſilver-ſhields, openly affirming, that they would ſerve him to awe the barbarous nations; but giving him privately to underſtand that it was his deſire that they ſhould be put out of the way as expeditiouſly as poſſible, as a race of ſeditious villains unworthy of returning to Greece. Theſe things performed, he ſtript Peuceſtas of the government of Perſia, where he was prodigiouſly beloved, and appointed Aſclepiodorus in his ſtead. All the money and rich curioſities which were in the treaſury of Suſa, he ſeized to the value of fifteen thouſand talents, and out of the ſpoils and the treaſure he found in other places, he collected ten thouſand talents more, with which prodigious maſs of wealth, he doubted not to carry all his deſigns into execution; being not a little encouraged alſo from this conſideration, that by this time not only the famous captains, but many of the inferior officers who had ſerved under Alexander, were deſtroyed, and put out of his way [c].

[b] Diodor. Sicul, Plut. & Corn. Nepos, ubi ſupra. Juſtin. lib. xii. cap. 2.

Antigonus marches to Babylon.

As ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year permitted, Antigonus marched with all his army, and with the mighty treaſures he had collected, to Babylon, where Seleucus was governor. This man had done the higheſt ſervices to Antigonus, tigonus, and among these some very late ones; for through him the citadel of Susa, and all the wealth therein, had been delivered up to Antigonus. Upon this occasion too, he did all, or rather more, than could be expected; for he feasted the whole army at his own expence, and seemed to be no less pleased with the success of Antigonus than he himself was. All this, however, could not secure him. The ambitious have no friends: all who pretend to serve them must be absolutely their creatures. When therefore Seleucus had done all that was in his power, Antigonus demanded of him an account of the revenues of the province, which plainly discovered that he looked on him as a mere dependent. Seleucus, however, was very far from making any servile submissions, or even seeking to temporize any longer with a man whom he esteemed no more than his equal. He told him the province of Babylon was conferred upon himself by the Macedonians as the reward of his services, and that therefore he did not conceive he was any more bound to give an account than he had a right to demand one. But when he had considered attentively the great power of Antigonus, and the small capacity he had of resisting him, he began to conceive that he was in no small danger, especially when he called to mind what had befallen Eumenes, Pithon, and Peucestas. To secure himself therefore from such treatment as they met with, and to escape being either murdered or deposed, he with fifty horse instantly made his escape, in order to fly to Ptolemy. When this was first known to Antigonus, he rejoiced at it exceedingly, being extremely pleased, that by this means he had got the province to himself, without proceeding harshly with his old friend, and a man in high credit with the army, supposing that now he should dispose of every thing according to his pleasure. But when the Chaldæan priests informed him that they by their astrological rules were certain, that if Seleucus escaped at present, he would be in process of time not only a formidable, but successful enemy, and that himself would fall in battle against him; Antigonus took it much to heart, remembering how these people had before foretold the death of Hephæstion, as well as that of Alexander. Terrified therefore with gloomy apprehensions, he dispatched away some chosen squadrons of horse to seize on Seleucus; but this method was taken too late, he had already reached the territories of Ptolemy, where he remained in perfect ſafety. The chagrin this accident gave Antigonus made him redouble his diligence in diſpoſing of the reſt of the provinces to his own advantage. He quickly found how neceſſary all his care was; for before he had well taken theſe precautions, Seleucus had raiſed him ſuch a number of enemies, that, with all his mighty power, he had enough to do to defend himſelf. Ptolemy, Lyſimachus, Caſſander, all leagued with Seleucus, in order to reduce the power of Antigonus, that they might themſelves be ſecure in their poſſeſſions. For though Alexander the ſon of Roxana was ſtill living, yet Caſſander impriſoned both him and his mother, and treated them only as private perſons; of which though Antigonus might be ſecretly glad, yet conceiving rightly that the putting on a contrary character would be of ſervice to his affairs, he openly inveighed againſt Caſſander's conduct, and alledged, that he took up arms to vindicate the rights of the royal houſe; whereas in truth he was the firſt who openly invaded them by aſſuming ſoverign power, though he did not indeed as yet take upon him the title of king [d].

[c] Diodor. Sicul. Plut. & Corn. Nepos. ubi ſupra.

reached

Antigonus ſeizes Syria and Phœnicia Year after the flood 2685. Before Chriſt 314.

As Antigonus immediately after the eſcape of Seleucus had marched into Cilicia, in order to refreſh and to recruit his army, ſo as ſoon as he was thoroughly informed of the confederacy ſet on foot againſt him, he determined to proceed firſt to hoſtilities, and to ſecure the provinces of Syria and Phœnicia, at preſent in the hands of Ptolemy. He perfectly well diſcerned, that, in caſe of a war againſt ſo many princes, his being maſter at ſea would be of the laſt importance; and he hoped by conquering theſe countries, not only to have the Syrian and Phœnician ports, but alſo their ſhipping, at his devotion. In the former deſign he ſucceeded, yet with great difficulty; but in the latter he was totally diſappointed. Joppa and Gaza he reduced by force; as for Tyre it ſuſtained a ſiege of many months; with reſpect to the ſhipping, Ptolemy foreſeeing what would come to paſs, had withdrawn them to Egypt. However, Antigonus perſiſted in his former reſolution of being maſter of the ſea; in order to which, he ordered vaſt quantities of timber to be cut down in mount Libanus and other places in his dominions, minions, which being ſent to the ports reſpectively neareſt to the places where they were cut, he had a vaſt fleet immediately upon the ſtocks. The wiſdom of his proceeding appeared evidently from an accident which happened to him at the ſiege of Tyre, where while he lay with his army on the ſea-coaſt, Seleucus with part of Ptolemy's fleet paſſed by in ſpite of him, which exceedingly diſpirited his forces; but Antigonus reſtored their courage by aſſuring them that before the end of that ſummer he would have five hundred ſhips of war at ſea, which would be more than ſufficient to drive the enemy out of it; and this promiſe, by his great care and regular payment of all demands, he effectually performed. But as all human abilities are circumſcribed, whence it becomes impoſſible for one man to attend to all things, while Antigonus was intent upon theſe important affairs, the army of Caſſander made a great progreſs in the Leſſer Aſia [e].

[d] Diodor. Plut. ubi ſupra

Antigonus repels Caſſander.

To remedy this evil, Antigonus marched thither with a great part of his army, leaving his ſon Demetrius with the reſt to preſerve the conqueſts he had made in Syria and Phœnice. That prince was not above twenty-two years old, but of abilities far beyond his years; he was brave and generous in the higheſt degree, well verſed in war, and a great deſpiſer of thoſe arts and ſhifts by which cunning men paſs for wiſe ones; he was kind to his friends, gentle to his enemies, and had an innate clemency, untinctured with private deſigns or future proſpects; if with all this his greatneſs had not ſupplied him with flatterers, who led him not to pollute, but to plunge himſelf into the groſſeſt vices, he would have been the worthieſt, as well as one of the moſt remarkable, princes of the age in which he lived. His amiable qualities gained him the love of the army committed by his father to his charge, and he became very agreeable to the inhabitants of the provinces over which he preſided for the ſpace of a year, while his father made war upon Caſſander, and ſo effectually humbled him, that he was content to make a peace on very indifferent terms, which, however, when he had better conſidered of it, he preſently broke and joined joined again with Ptolemy and Seleucus, to give Antigonus all the trouble he could [f].

[e] Diodor. Sicul, ubi ſupra. Plut. in Demetrio. Juſtin. lib. xiv.

Ptolemy recovers Syria

THE diverſions given by Caſſander to the arms of Antigonus afforded Ptolemy an opportunity of making a deſcent in Cœlo-Syria, and afterwards in Cilicia, out of which province he carried great ſpoils into Egypt. On his return thither, Seleucus inſtigated him to invade Syria and Phœnicia, ſhewing how detrimental a thing it was to his affairs for theſe provinces to remain in the hands of his enemies. Ptolemy entering readily into the reaſon of the thing, began inſtantly to ſet on foot all the neceſſary preparations for a war in thoſe parts. At laſt, when all things were in readineſs, he entered Syria with a gallant army; but he had advanced no farther than Gaza, when Demetrius put a ſtop to his progreſs by offering him battle; a general engagement enſued, which was very obſtinate and bloody; it ended, however, in the total overthrow of Demetrius, who had five thouſand men ſlain, and eight thouſand taken priſoners. Among the former was Python, whom his father had aſſigned him for his collegue; he had been a principal officer in the army of Alexander, was a man of great abilities, and after the death of Eumenes had been received by Antigonus into the firſt place of his confidence and eſteem. After this rout, Demetrius retired with the remains of his army to Azotus, from whence he ſent deputies to Ptolemy to beg leave to bury his dead; which favour was not only granted him, but Ptolemy and Seleucus ſent him back his royal pavilion, his whole equipage, and all the priſoners who had any dependence on his family. The reſt of the priſoners were ſent into Egypt. Demetrius finding it impoſſible for him to make head againſt the victorious army, abandoned Phænicia, Paleſtine, and Syria to the victor. Tyre indeed made ſome reſiſtance. Andronicus commanded therein, who not long before had taken it for Antigonus. He was a man of ſpirit, and therefore abſolutely refuſed to part with a place of ſuch importance tamely. The city therefore was inveſted, but in a little time the garriſon mutinied, and Andronicus was forced to give it up to Ptolemy, who therewith recovered all that Antigonus had taken from him. Seleucus took this opportunity of requeſting his friend to comply with the promiſe he had made him, of furniſhing him with a body of troops for the recovery of the province of Babylon. Ptolemy very readily agreed to it, and aſſigned him a thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, with which inconſiderable aſſiſtance, Seleucus not only poſſeſſed himſelf of Babylon, but alſo of Media and Suſiana, after having defeated Nicanor, who was governor of the former province for Antigonus. While Seleucus went on thus triumphantly, Ptolemy had a very unlucky accident; he had ſent Cilles his general with a conſiderable army to drive Demetrius out of Upper Syria, where he with the remains of his army ſtill continued. This Cilles, being a bold improvident man, highly contemned in himſelf an enemy ſo often beaten; for Demetrius had been driven from poſt to poſt after the battle of Gaza, without being able to make any conſiderable ſtand, which was the reaſon that Cilles doubted not but he would now retire as faſt as he ſhould preſs upon him; Demetrius having intelligence of this, reſolved to repair the falſe ſtep he had made at Gaza, by a quick proceeding here; he therefore ſent a ſmall party of horſe to view the camp of Cilles, and being informed that all things there were in a very careleſs condition, he inſtantly determined with himſelf to fall upon them; which reſolution he executed with ſuch celerity, that he totally defeated the enemy, and took Cilles himſelf with ſeven thouſand men priſoners. This action, as it contributed much to the glory of Demetrius, and to the intereſt of his father Antigonus, ſo it gave the former an opportunity of returning that civility which Ptolemy had done him after the battle of Gaza, in reſtoring the principal priſoners then taken. Demetrius therefore immediately ſent back Cilles and all his friends to the camp of Ptolemy, with the ſame compliment which had formerly been made to himſelf; that he fought not ſo much for intereſt as for glory. As ſoon as Antigonus, who was at that time in Phrygia, received advice of this victory, he inſtantly paſſed mount Taurus, and marched with all imaginable ſpeed to join his ſon, which having once performed, they marched with all their forces againſt Ptolemy, who clearly perceiving that he ſhould not be able to reſiſt ſo numerous an army, fluſhed with victory, demoliſhed moſt of the cities which were fortified in the provinces he had conquered, and then retired into Egypt with an immenſe load of ſpoil, and a vaſt number of people, not carricarried priſoners againſt their will, but who voluntarily followed his fortunes. Thus the provinces of Syria, Phœnicia, and Judea, returned again to their old maſter [g].

[f] Diodor. & Plut. ubi ſupra.

ANTIGONUS, elated with this high run of fortune, conceived in his mind a deſire of ſubduing the Nabathæans or Arabs, inhabiting the deſarts bordering on Judæa. Againſt theſe he diſpatched his general Athenæus, who at firſt proceeded very warily in his expedition; for having with him but four thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe, he knew that in attacking ſo numerous a people, conduct would be of greater uſe than courage. He had intelligence that moſt of the Arabs were gone to a mart or fair, where the Syrians and they bartered their commodities, and that on this account their chief city Petra, where they left their wives and children, and their wealth, was but ſlenderly guarded. Upon this he marched with his forces three days and three nights at an incredible rate; for, if the numbers are right in Diodorus, they muſt have gone ſixty miles in twenty-four hours. This expedition effectually anſwered their end, for they inveſted the place before the Arabs had the leaſt intelligence; and having cut the guards to pieces, plundered the city, carried away a prodigious booty, beſides five hundred talents in ready money; they then marched back again about twenty miles, when, through exceſſive fatigue, they were conſtrained to halt; and lying in a careleſs manner, the Arabs, who had by this time intelligence of what had happened, followed them with ſuch expedition, that ſurrounding their camp, they put all therein to the ſword, ſixty horſe excepted, who made their eſcape at the beginning of the attack. The Arabs were not ſatisfied with this; they ſent immediately deputies to Antigonus to complain of the injury offered them by Athenæus, and to ſhew the neceſſity they were under of treating him and his troops as they did. Antigonus, knowing that it was not in his power to revenge what had happened at preſent, ſent them for anſwer, that Athenæus had made this expedition of his own head, and that he was very well pleaſed at what had befallen him. The Arabs, who knew how to diſſemble as well as he, feigned to be perfectly well ſatisfied of the Antigonus makes war on the Arabs. Year after the flood 2688. Year before Chriſt 314.

[g] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in Demetrio.

the truth of what he said; but, in the mean-time, they posted advanced guards at all the avenues into their country, and placed men in all their watch-towers to prevent their being surprized again in the same manner. Their suspicions and precautions were perfectly just; for Antigonus, as soon as he had recruited his army, sent his son Demetrius, with four thousand light-armed foot and as many horse, to revenge the death of Athenæus. The young prince at the head of his forces passed in three days time through the desart; but when he arrived at the city of Petra, he found it well garrisoned, and that the country being thoroughly alarmed, all the cattle, and whatever else was worth taking away, had been long since secured. However, he caused it to be invested, and afterwards formally besieged the place; the garrison, however, made a glorious defence, and refused to hear of any terms, declaring, that if they could have borne slavery, they needed not have retired, as it were, out of the world, and placed all hopes of safety in the strength of a fortress and their own valour. Demetrius therefore finding that this would be a work of time, and knowing that his retreat would be attended with great hazard, gave the besieged to understand, that provided they sent deputies to appease his father Antigonus, made himself certain presents, and sent refreshments to his army, he would be content to leave them. With these propositions they immediately complied, and Demetrius thereupon marched back to the lake of Asphaltes, of which he caused an exact description to be made, as also some computation to be framed of the profit of the bitumen taken thence, and of the quantity of balm gathered from the famous plantation not far from that place, so much admired, and prized under the name of balm of Gilead. These things performed, he returned to his father, and gave him an account of his proceedings. Antigonus was very little pleased with the peace he had concluded with the Nabathæans; but he highly applauded his son's discoveries, especially on account of the profit he hoped to make of the bitumen and balm. He appointed therefore Hieronymus the Cardian one of the friends of Eumenes, and now his own, to superintend those he sent to the lake to collect all the bitumen they could find, and to carry it to a place assigned, in order to be sold for the use of Antigonus. Hieronymus, who was now a man in years, executed this commission with all the prudence and fidelity imaginable, neither did

he

he meet with any interruption from the Arabs, till such time as they had collected the bitumen and were carrying it away. Then with six thousand men they came down, and surrounded those who were employed in the wo k, and having cut most of them to pieces, carried the bitumen clear off. Hieronymus himself escaped, and thus ended all attempts upon the Arabians [h].

Demetrius sent against Seleucus.

As soon as Antigonus had received advice of the mighty progress made by Seleucus in the east, he determined to send away his son Demetrius with an army to oppose him, which accordingly he did; this army consisted of five thousand Macedonian foot, ten thousand mercenaries, and four thousand horse, with whom the prince immediately marched towards Babylon. Seleucus was at this time in Media, intent on settling his affairs in the upper provinces, and Patrocles, whom he had left president of Babylon, perceiving that his forces would not be able to resist the army of Demetrius, he first of all compelled the citizens of Babylon to abandon the place, and to retire, some into the deserts, some into Susiana, and some to fly much farther; he then withdrew himself and his troops into such fastnesses as he thought would effectually enable them to defend themselves. When therefore Demetrius entered Babylon, he to his great amazement found it deserted, except the castles in which there were good garrisons, both of which he besieged; one he quickly reduced, and gave the spoil thereof to his soldiers; but the other holding out till the time was expired, which his father had allotted him for this expedition, Demetrius left five thousand foot, and a thousand horse under the command of Archelaus to carry on the siege, and with the rest of his forces marched away, suffering his soldiers to live, as he retired, at discretion; whereby the hearts of the people were so estranged from himself and his father, that the Babylonians were ever after as firmly attached to Seleucus, as if he had been their natural prince (D). Demetrius, marching with his army into [h] Diodor. ubi supra. Plut. in Demetrio.

(D) In this part of our work we make use of two authors, viz. Diodorus and Plutarch, who differ from each other very often; it is therefore but reasonable that we should acquaint our readers.

into the Leſſer Aſia, found the city of Halicarnaſſus beſieged by Ptolemy; whereupon he took ſuch meaſures as obliged that prince to raiſe the ſiege, whereby he acquired great reputation, and did his father eminent ſervice; for immediately upon this, the confederate princes entered into a treaty readers where, and upon what reaſons we prefer one to the other, and this we ſhall do in few words. Diodorus had in view the writing a complete body of hiſtory, and therefore he is very exact in his chronology, and very nice in his deſcriptions; with reſpect to both, uſing the beſt authorities that were to be had in his days. Plutarch intended his lives chiefly as a moral performance, and therefore he is more careful in marking out of characters, than in accurately digeſting facts. On this account, in the order of time, and in the deſcription of ſieges and battles, we moſtly follow Diodorus; but as to perſonal circumſtances, and what was either ſaid or done by the kings themſelves, we take Plutarch for our guide. On this occaſion it may not be amiſs to mention a particular fact, wherein theſe hiſtorians do not agree, and wherein we ourſelves have taken the liberty to differ from a very judicious writer of our own nation. Diodorus informs us, that when Demetrius quitted Babylon, he left behind him Archelaus, with five thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, to beſiege one of the caſtles, the other of which he told us Demetrius had taken and ſpoiled (10). Plutarch in his account of this tranſaction affirms, that Demetrius put a garriſon of ſeven thouſand men into the caſtle which he had reduced, but he ſays nothing of his leaving an army behind him (11). Dean Prideaux joins theſe facts together, and makes Demetrius leave a garriſon of ſeven thouſand men, and an army of ſix (12). It is expreſly ſaid by Diodorus, that his whole army conſiſted but of nineteen thouſand men; it ſeems to us therefore improbable, that he ſhould leave thirteen thouſand behind him, and eſpecially when we conſider, that Plutarch ſays in ſo many words, he led back the groſs of his army. If we might have leave to offer a conjecture, we think it not impoſſible, that Archelaus, when he found he could not take the other caſtle, repaired and garriſoned that which had been taken, with his corps of between ſix and ſeven thouſand men. This reconciles both the ſtories, offers violence to neither, and is perfectly conſiſtent with the rules of good ſenſe, and of war.

(10) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xix. (11) Plutarch in Demetrio, & in Apophthegm. Reg. (12) Connection of the Old with the New Teſtament. P. 1. Book viii.

a treaty with Antigonus, whereby it was agreed that Caſſander ſhould hold Macedonia, Lyſimachus Thrace, Ptolemy Egypt and its dependencies, and Antigonus all Aſia; with a proviſo, that the Grecian cities ſhould every-where be free. In this treaty it was alſo mentioned, that theſe provinces were held in truſt only for Alexander Ægus, the ſon of Alexander the Great by Roxana, who had now held the regal title ſeven years alone, that is, from the time his colleague Aridæus or Philip was murdered by Olympias. But very ſoon after this peace was made, Caſſander, who had before put to death the mother of Alexander, cauſed his wife and ſon, now about fourteen years of age, to be privately ſlain alſo by the keeper of the caſtle, wherein they were confined. From this time therefore thoſe who had been before governors of provinces were now ſovereigns, and we might here very well commence the reign of Antigonus and his ſon Demetrius in Aſia; but inaſmuch as they did not aſſume the title of kings till ſome time afterwards, we are inclined to follow the example of Ptolemy, who, notwithſtanding the death of Alexander Ægus, reckons ſtill by the years of his reign, till Ptolemy Soter aſſumed the regal title as well as authority. But to proceed; this peace was broke almoſt as ſoon as it was made, under pretence that Antigonus had put garriſons into ſome of the Greek cities. Ptolemy then invaded Cilicia, and took ſeveral cities, while the reſt of his confederates attacked Antigonus elſewhere, all with very indifferent ſucceſs. Demetrius was ſent by his father into Cilicia to recover the cities there loſt, which he effectually performed; but in the mean time, Ptolemy reduced the greateſt part of the iſland of Cyprus, which was of great advantage to him. Soon after he made a deſcent into the Leſſer Aſia, where he made various conqueſts, as alſo in the Archipelago; he likewiſe entered into a treaty with Cleopatra, ſiſter to Alexander the Great, who reſided at Sardis, and who in her return had been ſolicited by Caſſander, Antigonus, and Lyſimachus, to marriage, but in vain. Yet now either out of regard to Ptolemy, who was every-where applauded for an excellent prince, or out of pique to Antigonus, on account of her being very ſtrictly looked after, ſhe began to liſten to the propoſitions made her, and actually attempted to make her eſcape to Ptolemy's camp. The governor of Sardis, having intelligence of this, cauſed her and the ladies who were with her to be arreſted, as alſo the women attending on her perſon;

and

and to thoſe, in purſuance of the orders of Antigonus, he gave directions that they ſhould put her to death, which accordingly they did. When Antigonus received advice of this, he abſolutely diſclaimed all knowledge of the fact; and to make his innocence appear the clearer, he ordered the heads of the women concerned to be ſtruck off, and buried Cleopatra with great ſolemnity. Happy for him, if with her he could have buried the odium, which, in ſpite of all his artful contrivances, her death brought upon him [i]!

Demetrius defeats Ptolemy in a ſea-fight. Year after the flood 2693. Before Chriſt 306.

An eager thirſt of glory put Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus on an expedition into Greece: his pretence was the ſetting the Grecian cities free; his real intent to aggrandize his father and himſelf by leſſening the power of Caſſander, who had garriſoned many of thoſe cities. We ſhall not here meddle with that war, becauſe we have elſewhere given a very full account of it; we ſhall content ourſelves with ſaying, that he performed very well all he promiſed, and as he diſpoſſeſſed Caſſander of the cities, ſo he put no garriſons into them himſelf, but left them entirely at liberty, and, according to his father's commands, prepared to carry on the war againſt Ptolemy. In the firſt place he landed in Caria; then he ſailed into Cicilia, and having there recruited his army to fifteen thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, and got together a fleet of upwards of one hundred and fifty ſail of long ſhips, beſides tranſports, he made a deſcent on Cyprus. As ſoon as he had landed his troops, he, like a wiſe commander, drew his veſſels on ſhore, and took ſuch precautions for their ſafety as were neceſſary, and then beſieged the cities of Urania and Carpaſia, and took them. After this ſucceſs he advanced towards Salamis, the capital city, wherein Menelaus the brother of Ptolemy commanded. This man was not only a bold and vigilant, but alſo a very enterprizing officer. He reſolved to fight before he was ſhut up, that he might have ſome trial of the invader's forces, and alſo diminiſh them a little before they undertook a ſiege. With this view having collected twelve thouſand foot and eight hundred horſe, he preſented himſelf to Demetrius, as he was marching to Salamis in order of battle. This young captain, no leſs fond of fighting than he, immediately engaged and routed his forces, forces, killing a thouſand on the ſpot, and taking three thouſand priſoners, whereupon Menalus fled with the reſt into Salamis, and prepared to make an obſtinate defence. Demetrius inſtantly inveſted the city, and, as he piqued himſelf particularly on being a great engineer, carried on his attacks with much ſkill and wonderful vigour, inſomuch, that Salamis was on the point of falling into his hands, when Ptolemy being informed of its condition, came in perſon to ſave it. He arrived with his fleet at Citium about twenty miles from Salamis, and immediately ſent to deſire his brother to ſend ſixty ſhips which lay in the harbour to join his fleet; but that was found impracticable, for Demetrius on the firſt intelligence had equipped his fleet, and blocked up the mouth of the haven therewith. Ptolemy, notwithſtanding this diſappointment, weighed anchor and ſtood for Salamis, having with him one hundred and forty ſhips of war, and ten thouſand men on board two hundred tranſports. Demetrius had but a hundred and eighty ſhips of war, beſides ten which were left to guard the mouth of the haven; however, he reſolved not to ſhun an engagement. By way of precaution, he drew his cavalry down to the ſtrand, that they might cover any veſſels compelled to run aſhore, and receive ſuch as might be driven to ſwim for ſafety. The battle was very obſtinate and bloody: Ptolemy broke that wing againſt which he fought in perſon; but Demetrius, chiefly through his own courage and ſkill in naval affairs, broke through the centre, and entirely defeated his enemies fleet. Juſt as the fight was over, and Demetrius returning in triumph, the ſixty ſail of ſhips broke out of the haven of Salamis, but were conſtrained to ſail back again for fear of Demetrius. This was reputed the moſt glorious action of his life; here he took forty ſhips of war, and ſunk fourſcore; he alſo took a hundred tranſports, with eight thouſand ſoldiers on board, which proved of the laſt conſequence to him, for he incorporated moſt of them into his army. The largeſt ſhip in the fleet he cauſed to be fitted up after the beſt manner poſſible, in order to ſend in it certain lords to carry the news of his victory to Antigonus, which, however, he delayed, till Salamis ſurrendered, whereby his priſoners were encreaſed to ſeventeen thouſand; among whom were Menclaus the brother, and Leontiſcus the ſon of Ptolemy, both of whom he immediately diſcharged, and ſent home to Egypt, with all their friends and dependents, deſiring them to acquaint Ptolemy lemy that he had not forgot the kindneſs done him in Cilicia. While Demetrius was ſettling his affairs in Cyprus, the meſſengers on board the galleon ſailed to the coaſts of Syria; and Ariſtodemus, who was the chief of them, went on ſhore, and with great parade informed Antigonus of the complete victory gained by his ſon. It was upon this occaſion, that the old man conceiving it of no longer uſe, laid aſide his modeſty, and took the title of king, putting a crown upon his head, and ſending another to his ſon with a letter of congratulation, thus addreſſed, To the excellent majeſty of king Demetrius. As ſoon as this was known in Egypt, the people, to ſhew their love for Ptolemy, compelled him to accept the ſame title; upon which Lyſimachus alſo aſſumed it, as did likewiſe Seleucus; and Caſſander ſuffered it to be given him, though he did not make uſe of it in any of his writings [k].

[i] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plutarch in Demetrio. Juſtin. lib. xiv.

State of Antigonus's court.

It may ſeem ſtrange that ſo politic, as well as ſo ambitious, a prince as Antigonus was, ſhould thus aſſociate his ſon in the empire, and permit him not only to wear the title of king, but to ſhare alſo in the adminiſtration; but if we conſider attentively this tranſaction, we ſhall agree, that in this he was more happy, than either in his titles, or in his kingdoms. For Demetrius was not only dutiful and loyal to his father, but had ſo warm an affection for his perſon, that he was, in the ſtricteſt ſenſe of the word, Antigonus's beſt friend. As all degrees of bliſs are either heightened or leſſened by compariſon, ſo the happineſs of Antigonus in this reſpect appeared with the brighter luſtre on account of the family diſſenſions in the courts of his ſeveral rivals; of which he was ſo ſenſible, that having given audience one day to the embaſſadors of Caſſander, Ptolemy, and Lyſimachus, and they being withdrawn, he ordered them to be called back, becauſe his ſon Demetrius coming in warm from hunting, went into his father's apartment, kiſſed him, and then ſat down with his javelins in his hand. When the embaſſadors demanded what his pleaſure was, 'Tell your maſters, ſaid Antigonus, beſides what I before mentioned to you, upon what terms my ſon and I live.' The ſenſe the father had of the ſon's inviolable attachment to him, made him ſo readily compliment him with the regal dignity; we we ſhall ſee this old politician miſtaken in many inſtances, but never in this, in which ſo many fathers have erred. But theſe events we reſerve for the following ſection [1].

[k] Diodor. Plut. Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

[1] Diodor. Plut. Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

SECT. VII.

The Hiſtory of the reign of Antigonus, and his ſon Demetrius, in Aſia.

AS we are for the future to ſpeak of Antigonus and Demetrius as kings, it is fit that we ſhould open this ſection with ſome account of their family. Antigonus was the ſon of Philip a nobleman; he eſpouſed Stratonice the daughter of Correus, a lady of remarkable beauty; by her he had two ſons, Demetrius and Philip, the former named after his uncle, the latter after his father. We have ſeen after what manner he roſe from being an officer in Alexander's army, to be lord of many of the faireſt provinces of which his empire was compoſed; but hitherto we have ſpoke but ſlightly of the manner in which he ruled them. Ambition was his capital vice, and indeed it led him into a multitude of very bad actions; he had however, ſeveral great qualities, and ſome good ones. In the midſt of his proſperity, he was wiſer than his maſter; for when Hermodotus a Greek poet, not contented with making him a god, ſtiled him alſo the offſpring of the ſun, I can't tell how that is, ſaid Antigonus; but he that empties my cloſe-ſtool, never ſaid any thing of my celeſtial origin. At another time when he was complimented upon his recovery from ſickneſs, This diſeaſe, ſaid he, was ſent to put me in mind, that being a mortal, I ſhould not graſp at any thing above a mortal. In his diſpoſition he was rough and boiſterous, and as he was a great ſoldier, ſo he truſted too much to arms; for though by them he acquired large territories, yet he could not keep them ſo eaſily as Ptolemy and Seleucus did did their dominions, who made use of beneficence and clemency as the main pillars of their government. Of this Antigonus, when he grew old, became sensible; and therefore when he was told that men wondered his government grew milder, as he grew in years, It is, said he, because I would keep through good-will what I got by force. When his necessities required it, he would sometimes fleece his subjects severely, and when he was put in mind that Alexander did not so, True, said he, for Alexander reaped Asia, and I do but glean. In private matters he was strictly just: Marsyas his brother would have had him heard a cause, in which he was party, in his chamber. No, my dear brother, answered Antigonus, I will hear it in the open court of justice, because I must do justice. After all, his chief felicity was the manner in which he lived in his family; where, as he loved his wife and children, his wife and children really loved him: as for his second son, he died young, but not till he had performed things worthy of his descent; and there is a saying of his father's with respect to him mentioned by Plutarch, which shews at once the good sense and good humour of Antigonus. It happened on a march, that Philip was lodged at the house of a widow, who had three fair daughters; his father being informed of it, called for the quarter-master; Hark ye, friend, said he, pray deliver my son out of these streights. Thus much, as to the character of Antigonus; with regard to that of Demetrius, we have already spoken copiously in the foregoing section, and in the Athenian history. The father was now in the zenith of his glory, and the son in the very prime of his age; we need not wonder therefore at their so readily accepting the alluring honours of the kingly state [a].

The character of Antigonus. Year after the flood 2695. Before Chriſt 304.

The Egyptian expedition.

To adorn the crown they had put on, an expedition into Egypt was immediately resolved on, not with a design of carrying war into the enemy's country, or of streightening Ptolemy so much as to oblige him to accept of peace, but with a view to drive him entirely out of his dominions, that they might be annexed to those possessed by Antigonus already. The mighty land-army raised for this purpose was commanded by Antigonus himself; the fleet which was to accompany it had Demetrius

[a] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xx, Plut. Apophthegm. Reg.

us for its admiral; both fleet and army were ſuitable to the deſign itſelf, and thoſe by whom it was conducted; the former conſiſted of an hundred and fifty ſtout gallies, and an hundred ſmall veſſels; the latter of eighteen thouſand foot, eight thouſand horſe, and fourſcore and three elephants. The general rendezvous of the land-forces was at Antigonia, a new city built by Antigonus in Syria; the fleet anchored on the coaſt; the kings expreſſed an earneſt deſire to be gone, but the ableſt ſeamen in the fleet were very deſirous of remaining where they were till the ſetting of the Pleiades, dreading the ill weather, which till then is frequent on the coaſt of Egypt; but Antigonus would not be detained; he therefore cauſed proviſions of all ſorts for ten days to be provided for his army, and having got together camels and other beaſts of burthen ſufficient, as he thought, to tranſport theſe neceſſaries and their baggage, he began his march through the deſarts, which lie between Gaza and Egypt; in his paſſage his army was miſerably fatigued, and the ſpirits of the people exceſſively broke. At laſt, having coaſted mount Caſſius, he peceived his fleet lying at anchor; but in a very indifferent ſtate, many ſhips loſt, more driven back to Gaza, and all the reſt ſorely ſhattered by the ſtorm they had ſuſtained. Demetrius intended to have ſailed up one of the mouths of the Nile; but Ptolemy had ſo effectually ſecured theſe, and had diſpoſed his troops on the coaſts ſo judiciouſly, that no impreſſion could be made; and if Antigonus had not ſupplied thoſe on board with water and proviſions, they muſt have periſhed in ſight of the ſhore. This was a melancholy beginning; however, Antigonus marched on, hoping to rectify all things by his ſucceſs in battle; but Ptolemy was in no ſuch haſte; he had fortified all the fords of the Nile, and had conſiderable bodies of troops in theſe poſts. He had beſides an army of obſervation, with which he held Antigonus at bay, while in the interim he offered by proclamation every common ſoldier two minæ, (about ſix pounds five ſhillings Engliſh) and to every officer a talent, or one hundred and eighty-eight pounds, if they would come over to him. He had practiſed the ſame thing when Perdiccas invaded Egypt, and he had the ſame ſucceſs now as then; for numbers deſerted to him; and if Antigonus had not poſted ſome choice troops on the road, the greateſt part of his army would have gone over; the rather, becauſe they were terrified with the dreadful punishments inflicted on those who were seized as they were going off. At last tumults arising, Antigonus saw plainly that it would be far from his intereſt to remain any longer there; wherefore, to avoid farther miſchiefs, he retired with the army, and Demetrius ſailed back with the fleet towards Syria. To repair the credit of their arms, the kings immediately reſolved on a new expedition, which was the reduction of the iſland of Rhodes. For this ſome pretence was wanting; it was therefore demanded of the Rhodians, that they ſhould enter into a cloſe alliance with Antigonus and Demetrius againſt all their enemies; this, as it was foreſeen, they refuſed, becauſe, carrying on a great trade with Egypt, it was impoſſible for them to break with Ptolemy; however, fear engaged them to offer all that was in their power, which, however, Demetrius refuſed; and making a deſcent, beſieged the capital of the iſland, which coſt him a great deal of trouble to no purpoſe, except that he gained here the reputation of the greateſt engineer of his time, in conſequence of his contriving ſuch machines as had never been ſeen before, and that he likewiſe gave a new inſtance of his generoſity and clemency. For, whereas the Rhodians, having taken a veſſel, on board of which were ſome rich hangings for his tent, as alſo certain letters from his wife Philla, ſent all to Ptolemy, yet, when they afterwards entreated Demetrius to ſpare the celebrated picture of their patron Jalyſus, which had coſt Protogenes ſeven years, and was eſteemed his maſter-piece; that prince anſwered, I would ſooner deſtroy the ſtatues of my father, than offer the leaſt injury to ſo exquiſite a piece. As for Protogenes himſelf, he worked as uſual in his houſe in the ſuburbs, and when Demetrius ſent for him, and aſked him, How he came to be ſo fearleſs? I know, Sir, ſaid the painter, that you make war againſt the Rhodians, but not againſt the ſciences: Whereupon the king ſmiling, aſſigned him a guard. The ſiege of Rhodes had laſted long, and the ſpirits of Demetrius's ſoldiers were almoſt exhauſted, when, happily for him, embaſſadors from Athens arrived to implore his aſſiſtance againſt Caſſander; this gave him a pretence to make peace with the Rhodians on theſe terms, that they ſhould ſerve Antigonus againſt all his enemies, except Ptolemy king of Egypt. Then Demetrius, ſailing with three hundred and thirty gallies, and a great army on board, ſteered for Attica, where he landed, having conſtrained Caſſander to retire towards Macedon; but when when he came near Thermopylæ, Demetrius fell upon his rear, and gave him ſo rude a ſhock, that his troops ſeemed rather to fly than march through Theſſaly afterwards. Upon this a corps of ſix thouſand Macedonians left in Greece revolted to the victor, and Demetrius returned in triumph to the ſea-coaſt of Peloponneſus. This extraordinary flow of ſucceſs bore down before it almoſt all the virtues of Demetrius; for he began now to exceed Alexander in vanity, ſtyling himſelf king of kings, drinking the healths of Seleucus, Caſſander, Lyſimachus and Ptolemy, as great officers of his ſtate and houſhold. In debauchery he ſunk far below the dignity of human nature, indulging himſelf not only in ſenſual pleaſures, but in a vice which ought to want a name; he likewiſe deviated into groſs impiety, that never-failing road to ruin; and forgetting his father's former moderation, would needs be ſtiled a god, and the younger brother of Minerva. It may indeed be ſaid in his excuſe, that he had kept his ſenſes, if the wits of Athens had not ſeduced him; however it was, from this time forwards his affairs declined, and though ſometimes the proſpect cleared, yet the ſtorm which now began to riſe did not blow over, till it had wrought his as well as his father's ruin [b].

A new confederacy againſt Antigonus. Year after the flood 2697. Year before Chriſt 302

CASSANDER, fearing that Demetrius would purſue the blow he had already given him, and, after compelling him to leave Greece, follow him into Macedonia, ſent deputies to Antigonus in Syria, in order to treat of a peace; but Antigonus would hear of no other terms than his ſubmitting himſelf and his dominions to his pleaſure, ſo that theſe negotiations came to nothing, and Caſſander was forced to ſend to his old confederates, in order to engage them in a new alliance againſt this formidable conqueror; they readily liſtened to his propoſal, for they perfectly well diſcerned, that when once Macedonia was ſubdued, Antigonus would fall upon them next. To prevent this, they entered into a treaty with Caſſander; and Lyſimachus, having obtained from him a part of his army, reſolved to paſs over into Aſia, and fall upon Phrygia, Lydia, and other provinces; which accordingly he did, and proceeded with ſuch ſucceſs, that Antigonus was not a little alarmed when acquainted therewith, as he was celebrating ſhews and gymnic ſports at his new city of Antigona. He did not, however, loſe his courage when he was made acquainted with this formidable confederacy; on the contrary, he behaved himself with more alacrity and spirit than could have been expected from a man of his years and in his condition; for he was now upwards of eighty and excessively corpulent. His ambition, however, was still so strong, that he could not help saying publickly, That he would scatter the confederates, as easily as boys do birds among the corn, by throwing a stone amongst them. In order to make good his words, he began to draw together his forces immediately; and as soon as he had assembled a sufficient army, he crossed mount Taurus, and came down into Cilicia, where, having taken a considerable sum out of the treasury of Quinda, he made use of it to recruit his troops, which were soon in a condition not only to recover the places that had been lost, but even to offer Lysimachus battle. That crafty old captain did not, however, press on an engagement, but on the contrary kept on the defensive, knowing well, that if he lost a battle, he lost all; but that Antigonus in such a case had many provinces to retire to. Lysimachus therefore proposed an accommodation, but Antigonus would hearken to nothing; so the winter was spun out in preparations on both sides, and early in the spring Seleucus with his own and Ptolemy's forces began his march, in order to join Lysimachus; of which when Antigonus had notice, he instantly sent to recal Demetrius out of Greece, beginning now to foresee that he should have enough to do to defend himself against so many and so potent adversaries. Demetrius, as soon as he had received his father's commands, entered into a provisional treaty with Cassander for preserving the peace and freedom of Greece. We call this treaty provisional, because it was not to remain in force, if Antigonus refused to ratify it; the design of both parties being to gain time, and an opportunity of attending their other affairs, by acceding to this treaty which gave liberty to Greece. On the conclusion of it, Demetrius found not only himself at liberty to return, but his forces also, there being now no necessity of leaving an army, as he had first designed, in Peloponnesus.

[b] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut in Demetrio.

The fatal battle of Ipsus. Year after the flood, 2698. Before Christ 301.

When the season of the year permitted, Demetrius transported his forces into Asia; and having recovered Ephesus from Lysimachus, marched strait to join his father. By [c] Diodor. Sicul. ubi. supra. Plut. in Demetrio. Justin, lib. xv. c. 4.

By this time Seleucus was at hand, and the news of his approach did not come ſooner than that of Ptolemy's irruption into Phœnicia, Judæa, and Cæle-Syria, where he carried all before him, and in a ſhort time reduced all thoſe provinces, excepting only the cities of Tyre and Sidon, which, being ſtrongly garriſoned, held out for Antigonus; but after theſe rapid conqueſts, Ptolemy, who had ſet down before the laſt mentioned city, on a flying report, that Antigonus had beaten Seleucus and Lyſimachus, raiſed his ſiege, and retired haſtily into Egypt. By this time the two grand armies in Phrygia were ready to engage; that of Antigonus conſiſted of ſeventy thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, and ſeventy-five elephants. The forces of Seleucus and Lyſimachus conſiſted of ſixty-four thouſand foot, ten thouſand five hundred horſe, four hundred elephants, and one hundred and twenty chariots of war. Now it was, that Antigonus varied a little from his uſual manner of behaviour; for, inſtead of appearing as he was wont to do with a frank and open countenance, he ſhewed himſelf very thoughtful and melancholy, was frequently ſilent, and, whereas he formerly never conſulted with any body, but gave out his orders with extraordinary vivacity, he was now very ſlow in his reſolutions, conſulted much with Demetrius, and once, as he was reviewing his troops, recommended him to the officers as his ſucceſſor. Theſe things were thought to ſhew that his uſual confidence had forſaken him. The morning of the battle, as he was coming out of his tent, he fell down and bruiſed himſelf; upon which riſing up as well as he could, Immortal gods, ſaid he, grant me victory, if it be your will; but if not, let me fall in battle, and not ſurvive my fading glory. When the armies were diſpoſed in order of battle, Demetrius, having the command of the beſt part of his father's horſe, charged ſo fiercely on the cavalry of Seleucus commanded by his ſon Antiochus, that he quickly broke and put them to flight; but purſuing them too far, he thereby loſt all; for Seleucus immediately interpoſed his elephants in ſuch a manner, that Demetrius could never rejoin his infantry; and having done this, Seleucus marched with his foot to attack Antigonus, where he fought in perſon. The brave old man on this occaſion behaved with great wiſdom; but Seleucus, making a ſhew of charging him in flank, Antigonus was forced to alter his diſpoſition; which gave opportunity to many traitors in his army to go over to the enemy; which they did, thereby creating such a confusion, that his forces were quickly broke, and himself, at the head of a very few, left to sustain the shock. When the enemy were about to charge him, one who was near him cried out, Sir, consider what you do; they are coming down upon you. Let them come, said Antigonus; Demetrius will come to our assistance. But, while he cast his eyes about in vain for his son, a shower of arrows deprived him of life, and he fell from his horse upon the ground, having only one servant that staid by his body. This was the fatal battle of Ipsus, so called from a town and river of Phrygia, near which it was fought. And thus fell the empire of Antigonus with himself, when he had borne the regal title about four years, and was as many above fourscore [d].

Demetrius Poliorcetes succeeds.

Demetrius, with the poor remains of his army, which were no more than five thousand foot and four thousand horse, retired to Ephesus; and even doubting whether he should be safe there, he shortly quitted that place, and retired towards the sea. Many were of opinion, when he first entered that city, that he would have plundered the famous temple of Diana, in order to raise money to restore his affairs; but he did nothing of this sort, placing his chief hope in the loyalty of the Athenians, and therefore made all the haste he could thither, where he had left the best part of his plate, with his queen Deidamia and her retinue. But here his hopes miserably failed him, for the Athenians sent away his queen, and forbad him to enter their city. He, dissembling his resentment, very gladly received from them his ships, and, after visiting Peloponnesus, sailed away for the Chersonese, where landing, he committed great devastations in the territories of Lysimachus; at which the confederate princes were not at all displeased, for they liked this ally of theirs no better than Demetrius, and feared him much more. In the midst of his distresses a strange accident happened in favour of Demetrius. Seleucus having heard wonderful things of the beauty of Stratonice the daughter of Demetrius and Philla, the widow of Craterus and sister of Cassander, he sent to Demetrius to demand her in marriage. This extraordinary turn of fortune did not a little amaze Demetrius himself, who who joyfully tranſported his daughter in his royal fleet to meet Seleucus. As he ſailed along he was frequently conſtrained to put on ſhore for refreſhment, which, amongſt other places, he did in Cilicia, a province aſſigned by the princes to Pliſtarchus the brother of Caſſander, who conceiving this in no other light than that of an invaſion, immediately poſted away to Caſſander, to complain of the injury done him; of which when Demetrius was informed, he thought Pliſtarchus could do no more, if he carried matters a little farther; wherefore he ventured to ſeize the treaſury at Quinda, and took from thence two hundred talents, which had been left by his father. Arriving on the coaſt of Syria, he was firſt met by his wife Philla, and then coming to the city of Roſſus, he there found Seleucus, who immediately eſpouſed Stratonice; and, in honour of the nuptials, nobly entertained Demetrius on ſhore; accepting alſo in his turn an invitation from his father-in-law, he was nobly feaſted on board the royal galley, after which they parted. Demetrius ſailing back again, made a new deſcent on Cilicia, and got entire poſſeſſion of it; whereupon he ſent his wife Philla to excuſe him to her brother Caſſander; and his other wife Deidamia dying of a cold ſhe had caught at ſea, he, by the interpoſition of Seleucus, eſpouſed Ptolemaida the daughter of Ptolemy, which gave his affairs a new aſpect. This fair weather, however, did not laſt long; for Seleucus, unſatisfied with the many provinces he poſſeſſed, would needs have Cilicia, for which he offered Demetrius a ſum of money. This he refuſed; upon which Seleucus demanded Tyre and Sidon, threatening, if they were not given up, he would take them by force. To which Demetrius anſwered, that if he had loſt ever ſo many battles, every one of them as fatal as that of Ipſus, he would never part with cities in ſo tame a manner; and immediately gave orders for augmenting the garriſons, and filling the magazines in the cities demanded. In the mean time he reſolved himſelf to paſs over into Attica, to be revenged for the affront which the Athenians had offered him immediately after the battle of Ipſus. In this expedition he was ſo roughly handled by a ſtorm, that when he landed his troops in Europe, they were able to undertake nothing. He, however, ſoon after beſieged the city of Meſſene, where he received an arrow in his jaw, which not only diſfigured his face, but by the accidents attending the cure, threatened his life; yet he continued his ſiege, and afterwards wards his army increasing, he formed the blockade of Athens, which he reduced, and strongly garrisoned. After this he made war against Sparta; whereupon Archidamus marched at the head of all the forces of Lacedæmon, as far as the city of Mantinæa, that, as long as was possible, the war might be kept out of his own country; but his success was not answerable to his prudence and courage; for he was here defeated by Demetrius, and afterwards beaten by him again within sight of Sparta; yet such was the inconstancy of this prince's fortune, that he either was beaten, or reaped no benefit from his victories; for, immediately after this battle, came news, that Lysimachus had conquered all he possessed in Asia; and that Ptolemy, after reducing the greatest part of the isle of Cyprus, had besieged the city of Salamis, in which were the mother and children of Demetrius; so that he had now no leisure to prosecute the war against Sparta. Before the sense of these mischiefs had long tormented the king's breast, a new and strange scene opened, which turned all his thoughts another way [e].

[d] Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. Plut. ubi supra. Arrian. in Syriacis.

Demetrius becomes king of Macedonia. Year of the flood 2705. Before Christ 294.

Cassander king of Macedon left behind him two sons, Antipater and Alexander, both pretending title to the kingdom; but the former, having married the daughter of Lysimachus, absolutely refused to grant any thing to the latter, who thereupon called in Pyrrhus and Demetrius to his assistance. Pyrrhus came first, and made such an impression, that Antipater gladly compounded the matter with his brother, and allotted him half the kingdom, from which Pyrrhus, however, lopped a piece for his share; which proceeding giving Alexander to believe, that, when Demetrius arrived, he would take another portion of his kingdom, he made all the haste he could to meet him, and at the interview thanked him for the assistance he brought, but assured him he had no need of it; whereupon Demetrius prepared to return, which, however, Alexander meant not that he should do, having formed a scheme to murder him at supper. This Demetrius prevented by going away suddenly; yet, when they came to Larissa in Thessaly, Alexander began to practise again; for Demetrius having invited him to an entertainment, he went thither without guards, that Demetrius might have no pretence for bringing

[e] Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. Plut. in Demet. Justin. l. xv. c. 1.

ing any with him; but his deſign being gueſſed at, Demetrius ordered him, and thoſe who were with him, to be killed after ſupper; which command when his guards began to execute, one of Alexander's friends cried out, you have been too quick for us by a day. The Macedonian army, when they received the news of the death of their king, were not a little ſurpriſed, ſuppoſing that Demetrius would take this opportunity of attacking and cutting them to pieces; which, however, he was ſo far from doing, that he ſent to deſire leave to juſtify himſelf as to the death of Alexander, which he did in a formal harangue. This had ſuch an effect on the Macedonians, that they immediately ſaluted Demetrius king; and thus, when his affairs were moſt deſperate, he acquired that kingdom, for which ſo many princes had ſtruggled, not only by the free conſent of the people, but alſo with ſome colour of right; for tho' Antipater the ſon of Caſſander was living, yet the Macedonians might well hold him unworthy of a crown, who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his own mother, the daughter of Philip of Macedon and ſiſter of Alexander. Setting him aſide, Demetrius, in right of his wife, was the next heir; and the ſight of his ſon Antigonus, who was the grandſon of old Antipater, influenced the Macedonians not a little, for they remembered how happily they had lived under his adminiſtration, and in what continual broils they had been ever ſince. The reſt of the princes did not ſeem much diſpleaſed with an event which had fixed a crown on the head of the ſon of Antigonus at none of their expence. As for Lyſimachus, while Demetrius and Pyrrhus were agreed, he thought it his intereſt to be well with both. Ptolemy having recovered Cyprus, diſmiſſed the family of Demetrius, not only without injury, but with much reſpect, and with many magnificent preſents. In the court of Seleucus a ſurpriſing change had happened, which yet was beneficial to Demetrius; for Stratonice was married to Antiochus her ſon-in-law. Thus all things at preſent contributed to leave Demetrius at his eaſe, excepting his own temper only, which, now he had no enemy left, inclined him to pick quarrels with his friends. But of theſe things in another place. In this chapter we are to conſider him as a king in Aſia, and therefore we ſhall proceed to the laſt attempt made by him for the recovery of his father's kingdom. [f]

WHEN

[f] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. l. xv. c. 2.

He endeavours the recovery of his father's kingdom.

When he had reigned about six years in Macedon, partly to gratify his own ambition, and partly to employ the restless Macedonians, he began to make preparations for the conquests of Asia. In order to this, he set an army on foot of ninety-eight thousand foot and twelve thousand horse. He likewise put a fleet of five hundred gallies upon the stocks, at Pella, Chalcis, Corinth, and Athens. Several of these gallies had fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen benches of oars; and they were all built by the particular contrivance of Demetrius himself, whose skill in this respect was not only admired by such as knew nothing more of ships than what their bulk and beauty dictated to their sight, but by the ablest artizans, who without his directions, were incapable of constructing such vessels, as, with all the pomp of royal ships, had also all the strength, and all the contrivances of ordinary ships of war. The noise of these preparations awakened Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy; they therefore entered into a strict league against him, and, according to their old maxim in the days of Antigonus, determined to begin the war first. With this view they invited Pyrrhus king of Epirus to enter into the confederacy, which he readily did, tho' he had learned the trade of war under Demetrius, who had taught him ingratitude too, for Demetrius had practised upon him first. This point once settled, Ptolemy sailed with a puissant fleet to invade Greece, at the same time that Lysimachus with a mighty army invaded Macedon. Demetrius, surprized with these quick proceedings, which came a little too soon for the state his affairs were in, levied, in as short a time as he was able, a considerable army, and marched therewith to oppose Lysimachus, dispatching at the same time his son Antigonus with another army to provide for the safety of Greece. When Demetrius was arrived within a short march of the enemy, he received advice, that Pyrrhus had entered Macedon on the other side, and had penetrated as far as Beræa; upon which the Macedonians began to mutiny, and Demetrius saw plainly, that they had an inclination to desert to Lysimachus. This made him apprehend that he had slipped in his politics, when he ventured to lead a Macedonian army against their old commander. To amend this therefore he made a short turn, and marched away directly to fight Pyrrhus, against whom, as a foreigner, he doubted not his troops would behave well; but in this he made a greater mistake than before: for no sooner he came near the enemy than his army began to desert in ſmall parties. By degrees the Macedonians grew bolder, and went ſo far as to ſay openly in the camp, that the crown ought to belong to him, who moſt reſembled Alexander; that in Demetrius indeed they ſaw his vanity, luxury, and pride, but that in Pyrrhus, againſt whom they were to fight, all the virtues of Alexander were conſpicuous. When theſe notions had circulated among them a little while, the whole camp was in a tumult, and things at laſt iſſued in this, that ſome of the modeſteſt and beſt meaning of the ſoldiers adviſed Demetrius to withdraw in time, and ſecure his perſon. Upon this he retired to his tent, laid aſide his royal robes, and, in the habit of a private ſoldier, fled away without attendance to Caſſandria [g].

He is expelled from Macedon.

In this city he found his wife Philla, who, when ſhe was informed of what had happened, overcome with grief, and aſhamed to behold a daughter of Antipater at the loweſt ebb of diſtreſs in Macedon, took poiſon, and ſo ended her days. Demetrius, in his worſt fortunes, had always hopes; wherefore quitting Macedon, he withdrew into Greece, where having drawn together ſome of his friends, he began to form an army, which increaſing by degrees, he marched to Thebes, and there aſſumed again the regal habit, and, as the firſt eſſay of his authority, reſtored the democratic authority in the city where he lived. As for the Athenians, as ſoon as they heard of his diſtreſs, without any other motive than mere ingratitude, they contrived to inſult him, which provoked him ſo far, as to engage him to lead his new-raiſed army immediately to beſiege their city. In this ſiege he had ſuch ſucceſs, that the Athenians were conſtrained to deprecate his vengeance by a ſolemn deputation, at the head of which was an eminent philoſopher. Demetrius, who had always a tenderneſs for Athens, ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded to pardon even this new outrage; ſo that this expedition being at an end, he, of a ſudden took it into his head to hazard another, which was for the recovery of Caria and Lydia from Lyſimachus. All his forces amounted to but eleven thouſand men, and nothing could be more romantic than to hope, with ſo inconſiderable an army, to conquer a great part of Aſia; however, he had neceſſity on his ſide, and a conſiderable body body of desperate men to inforce whatever measure he thought fit to take. When he arrived at Miletus, he was met by Eurydice the sister of his wife Philla. She brought with her a new wife for him, Ptolemaida, to whom he had been long ago contracted. The marriage was consummated at Sardis, which he presently took. Part of the forces of Lysimachus revolting to him, and bringing with them a great sum of money, enabled him to recruit his army effectually. All this, however, signified nothing; for Agathocles the son of Lysimachus, coming against him with a very great army, and managing his command with great prudence, brought Demetrius into deep distress; for tho' the troops of the latter had the advantage in all the skirmishes which happened between them and the forces of Agathocles, yet, by avoiding an engagement, and making a proper use of his advantage in numbers, this young prince compelled Demetrius to retire into Phrygia, whither he followed him, and reduced his army to a starving condition. Demetrius, shifting quarters often, at length passed the river Lycus, which being very rapid, many of his soldiers were drowned. This, with the other misfortunes they had endured, exasperated the army to such a degree, that they openly complained; and one day when Demetrius came out of his tent, he found these lines which are a parody on the beginning of the Oedipus of Sophocles, fixed over his door,

[g] Plut. in Demet. Juſtin. l. xvi. c. 2.

Thou son of blind Antigonus,
Where are we?—

To add to these distresses, the plague broke out in his army, by which, in a very short time, he lost eight thousand men. With the poor remainder he retired to Tarsus a city belonging to Seleucus, where he ordered his soldiers to observe exact discipline, till at last want forced them to dispense with all orders. Then it was that he wrote to Seleucus in terms the most moving. He represented the grandeur from which he was fallen, the misery to which he was reduced, and the small hopes he had left. Seleucus taking this matter into consideration, sent orders to the governors of provinces, to furnish Demetrius with whatever was requisite for him, not as a private man, but as a king; as also with provisions for his army. This was done through the inclinations, and with a beneficence worthy worthy of the king himſelf. But Patrocles, the prime miniſter of Seleucus was of quite another ſentiment; he continually whiſpered in his maſter's ear, that of all the princes of his time, Demetrius was the moſt enterprizing; that the more he was diſtreſſed, the more ready he muſt be to make any new attempt hope or deſpair might ſuggeſt to him; and that to afford ſupport to ſuch a perſon, was to nurſe a wild beaſt in his boſom. By degrees the miniſter's art overcame his maſter's clemency, ſo that, when Demetrius leaſt expected it, Seleucus, advanced with a powerful army towards Cilicia; whereupon that unhappy prince was forced to take ſhelter in mount Taurus, from whence he ſent deputies to Seleucus, requeſting him, that he would permit him the liberty to attempt, by force of arms, to repair his broken fortunes againſt the barbarous nations, there to eſtabliſh a kingdom, where he might paſs the remainder of his life in quiet and repoſe, and not in that rigorous ſeaſon of the year, for it was now the middle of the winter, expoſe him to the fury of his implacable enemies in this diſtreſs, but to allow him a competent time and maintenance for his ſmall army, till the weather ſhould permit him to depart. But Seleucus, who, by this time, was become exceſſively jealous of him, ſent him word, that he would allow him to remain where he was but two months; and that even in conſideration of this favour, he expected that he ſhould deliver as hoſtages his principal commanders. Demetrius perceiving himſelf taken like a beaſt in a toil, flew with vindictive rage on his cruel perſecutors, and had the good luck to get the better of them in many encounters; particularly when he was beſet with armed chariots, by his perſonal valour, he engaged his ſoldiers to break through them, and thereby opened a paſſage into Syria; ſo that things taking a new turn, Lyſimachus thought it would be favourably received, if he made Seleucus an offer of his aſſiſtance; but that cautious prince liked no aſſiſtance; he therefore thanked Lyſimachus, and declined his favour; however, he ſpun out the war with Demetrius, not caring to truſt the fortune of that prince, which often, from a very miſerable ſtate, had ſuddenly raiſed him to great proſperity. Even at this time Demetrius was in a better condition than could have been expected; and his forces, as they had been always victorious under his conduct, ſo they were very tractable and obedient in hopes that his good fortune would put it in his power to reward them.

But

But while his mind was big with a thousand projects, Demetrius was seized with a malignant fever, which, in a short time, took from him his senses, so that for forty days he was able to give no orders. At the end of this space he recovered his senses, and in some measure his strength; but to his great affliction, he found his army miserably mouldered away, and those he had left very desirous of getting into fresh quarters; a thing they had small reason to hope, and which yet he promised them, and, by dint of his great skill in military affairs, performed; for making a sudden and swift march towards Cilicia, he turned short in the night, and passing mount Amanus, left Seleucus and his army far behind him. Thus his wearied army had once more some time given them for refreshment. Seleucus, fearing he might recruit where he was, marched towards him, and encamped at no great distance. Of this, when Demetrius was informed, he resolved to attack him that very night; and if his measures had not been betrayed, would have taken him in his bed; as it was, he had but just time to mount, yet Demetrius perceiving that his design was discovered, would not hazard his forces, but retired. Seleucus resolving to make use of this opportunity, pressed him close, and at last compelled him to fight in a very disadvantageous situation. However, Demetrius having divided his forces into two bodies, he, at the head of one, charged the troops of Seleucus so briskly, that they were in great confusion, till Seleucus himself dismounting, led up his infantry, which obliging Demetrius to form his forces afresh, Seleucus, as soon as they made a line, advanced to their front, and putting up the vizor of his helmet that he might be known, he exhorted them to lay down their arms, telling them, that it was for their sakes he avoided coming to extremities so long; whereupon those perfidious men shouted aloud, Long live king Seleucus, deserting in a moment their old master, and the victory he had almost obtained. Demetrius, in this distress, retired, with a few who were about him, into a thick wood. At first he had thoughts of retiring to the sea, and going on board his fleet; but when he considered how few people he had about him, he laid aside this design as impracticable. The next day his bosom-friend, Sosigenes, arriving, and having with him four hundred pieces of gold, Demetrius resumed his former design, and as soon as it grew dark, sallied from the wood, in order to push forward; ward; but it appearing by the fires lighted on every ſide, that the avenues were all ſecured by the enemy, the king was forced to retire back to his wood. In this retreat ſome of the inconſiderable band of horſe who were with him deſerted; whereby the reſt were ſo intimidated, that they began to talk of delivering up Demetrius to Seleucus, in order to preſerve themſelves; which when that unhappy prince overheard, he drew out his ſword and would have run himſelf through the body, had not ſome who were near him interpoſed and prevented him. Then thoſe who had moſt intereſt with him took an opportunity of ſhewing the impoſſibility of his getting out of the province; and that therefore it would be prudence in him for once to ſubmit to fortune, and ſurrender to Seleucus. Demetrius, having weighed this propoſition duly, conceived it would be better to make that an act of choice, which was moſt likely would at length be brought about by neceſſity, and thereupon diſpatched away deputies, to inform Seleucus, that he was ready to yield himſelf into his hands. Until theſe deputies returned, he remained ſtill in his dark retreat in the wood [h].

Demetrius yields himſelf to Seleucus.

When Seleucus was informed of the reſolution which Demetrius had taken, he was exceedingly pleaſed, and having given the neceſſary directions for the reception of a perſon, who, beſides the high dignity he had held, ſtood in ſo near a relation to himſelf, could not help, even in the preſence of his whole court, breaking out into theſe words: It is not the fortune of Demetrius which hath thus provided for his ſafety, but mine, which hath been watchful for my glory. I thank her more for this, than for all the favours ſhe has done me, becauſe I eſteem an act of clemency more honourable than any victory. The many noble and generous things ſaid by Seleucus in this high flow of fortune, inclined many of his courtiers to believe, that Demetrius from being himſelf a king, would become the chief favourite of a king. In order therefore to ſecure their own intereſts, they immediately determined to go and pay their court to him, as ſoon as he ſhould come into the quarters of Seleucus. Apollonides, who had been formerly a courtier in the palace of Antigonus, was ſent to receive Demetrius, and when he had brought him to the village aſſigned, almoſt the whole court of Seleucus went to pay their compliment to his father-in-law. When the miniſters about Seleucus, who who hated Demetrius, perceived this, they instantly put him in mind of the dangerous consequences which might attend his nobles and commanders entering into familiarity with a person of such a dextrous address, and such surprising intrepidity. These insinuations had the effect desired by those who made them, insomuch, that while Demetrius was entertaining his old acquaintance and new friends, Pausanias with a guard of a thousand horse, came to conduct him, not as he hoped, to the presence of Seleucus, but a castle in a demy-island, where he remained a prisoner. Seleucus, when he had provided for his own security, did all that could be thought of to make confinement easy to Demetrius. He ordered him royal entertainment within doors, a fine stable of horses, and the use of a noble park without. To give him a relish of these pleasures, hopes were cherished, and promises of liberty intermixed, which were all made to depend on the coming of Antiochus and Stratonice, to whom the conditions, on which this freedom was to be obtained, were referred. All other arts were practised to amuse Demetrius, and to divert his cares. At first he suffered himself to be deluded, and hoped, that after a time Seleucus would see him; but when he found this protracted, and that excuse succeeded excuse, he penetrated the design of his politic son-in-law, and without giving in to vain expectations, sought by all methods to make his time as little tedious to him as might be. Hunting was for a while his chief diversion; but, by degrees, he quitted it to give himself up to feasting and carousing, that, in wine and pleasant conversation, the memory of past greatness and present sorrows might be drowned; so hard a thing it is for those who pretend to fight for repose to enjoy it, when they acquire it either in consequence of their victories, or thro' the mere bounty of providence; and so much wiser is it to moderate our desires, than to place all hopes in their gratification.

[h] Plut. in Demet.

The firmness of Demetrius in his misfortunes.

It is the sentiment of some historians, that Demetrius acted meanly, first in yielding himself up prisoner; and secondly, in surviving so long the loss of his glory; but if we examine this matter to the bottom, we shall find, that these censures are very rash, and that there is no part of Demetrius's life less liable to reproach than the first part of his imprisonment. He had shewn in his former actions, that he was not afraid of death, and, in the first

transport

tranſport of his deſpair, he ſought to have fallen by his own ſword. That he ſupported life afterwards, was the effect of reaſon, and a very laudable reſignation to the conduct of providence, as appears from the laſt public act he did, which, without compariſon, was the nobleſt of his whole life. As ſoon as he was impriſoned, he wrote a letter to his ſon Antigonus, commending to him the care of his concerns in Greece, exhorting him to govern his ſubjects juſtly, to act always with moderation, and to look upon himſelf as dead; conjuring him never to part with any of the cities, or to give up any thing to Seleucus to procure his liberty, and never to give credit to any letter written with his hand, or ſealed with his ſeal, after this. We may ſurely look upon this as a moſt authentic proof of true courage; and, after this, we may ſafely alledge his bearing with life as another proof of it; for having acquitted himſelf to his family and his people, he might certainly indulge hopes to himſelf. As to his giving way to luxury at the laſt, and ſpending his time in banquets and drinking-matches, we ought to pity him, and profit by his example. He found by fatal experience, that mirth and wine were no cures for grief; for while by them he ſought to ſtifle his concern, the ſtruggle between reſentment and a deſire of concealing it, added to his high living, induced a diſtemper, which, when he had been a priſoner three years, carried him off in the fifty-fourth year of his age. Thus died this active prince, who had ſo often been at the top, and ſo frequently at the bottom of fortune's wheel. His death delivered Seleucus from all apprehenſions, and not only him, but others; for his accompliſhments, his ſingular addreſs, his taking preſence, and above all, his extraordinary military ſkill, made him always formidable, tho' his forces were ever ſo weak, and the places in his poſſeſſion ever ſo few [1].

His pompous funeral. Year after the flood 2716. Before Chriſt 283.

WHILE Demetrius lay in priſon, many princes and ſtates, moved with the diſtreſs of ſo great a prince, ſued to Seleucus, for his liberty. Lyſimachus only was baſe enough to offer him a vaſt ſum of money to put him to death; which, with the higheſt indignation, Seleucus refuſed, affirming, that neither envy, nor any antient antipathy inclined him to confine Demetrius, but only a regard to his own safety, and a just attention to reasons of state. As Demetrius had rendered himself very remarkable for his filial piety towards his father, so his son Antigonus manifested as laudable an affection towards him; for notwithstanding the letter his father had wrote him might, in the opinion of the world, have freed him from all censure, yet did he offer Seleucus, not only all that he held in Greece, but his own person in hostage, for his father's liberty; but this was refused. However, Antigonus continued earnestly to solicit it by the most earnest and passionate letters, as long as Demetrius lived, going in deep mourning during that space, and never once partaking of any feasts or diversions while his father was in prison. As soon as he understood that his father's ashes were coming from Syria, he sailed with a noble fleet to the Archipelago to meet them. He then deposited them in an urn of gold, which, when he entered the harbour of Corinth, he placed in the poop of the royal galley, set his crown upon it, and covered it with a canopy of purple, himself standing by clad in deep mourning, and his eyes red with tears. Most of the cities of Greece sent chaplets to crown the urn, and deputations of their prime citizens to assist at the funeral. All the trophies of honour were left at Corinth, where the ceremony was performed; but the urn itself was transported to Demetria, a city to which the late king had given his name, which had been built under his direction, and peopled, by his command, out of the villages in the neighbourhood of Iolchos. Thus, in his death, he was more happy than in his life; for all concurred in honouring the memory of those virtues which were no longer dreadful to them, and which had heretofore filled them with apprehensions, on account of the restless ambition, which, while he was living, accompanied them in the breast of the possessor, and which was held unextinguishable but by death [k].

[1] Plut. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. l. xvi.

Account of his marriages and posterity.

By the demise of Demetrius, the empire which his father erected in Asia determined, and therefore we have nothing more to add to this section, excepting a short account of the posterity which Demetrius left behind him. He was a prince much addicted to women, and as, like other princes, he indulged this vice by keeping many concubines, so, like the Macedonian kings, he scrupled not marrying several ſeveral wives. The firſt was Philla the daughter of Antipater. She was the widow of Craterus, and ſomewhat older than agreed with the age of her husband; however, Antigonus having ſhewed him what benefits would accrue to his family by the match, Demetrius was eaſily prevailed on to eſpouſe her. By this lady he had Antigonus and Stratonice; the former his ſucceſſor in his European dominions, the latter queen of Aſia, being the wife firſt of Seleucus, and after of his ſon Antiochus. Demetrius married for his ſecond wife Eurydice, an Athenian lady, ſaid to be deſcended from Miltiades. She too was a widow, having been firſt married to Ophillas, tyrant of Cyrene. She was extraordinary handſome, and her being an Athenian made her the more agreeable to Demetrius, who mightily affected that city. By this lady, ſome writers affirm, he had a ſon, named Coriabus; but of this there is great doubt. About the time he was choſen captain-general of Greece at Corinth, he married Deidamia, the daughter of Æacides king of Epirus and ſiſter of Pyrrhus. She too was a lady celebrated for her beauty, and who very affectionately accompanied him in all his expeditions, till, through the fatigue of travelling, which ſuited ill with the delicacy of her conſtitution, ſhe died. By this third wife he had a ſon named Alexander, who died in Egypt. His fourth wife was Ptolemaida the daughter of Ptolemy king of Egypt. Her he married from motives of intereſt, and had by her a ſon named Demetrius, who afterwards reigned in Cyrene. All theſe wives were alive at once; and it is ſaid, that Demetrius carried himſelf very obligingly to them all; but he was paſſionately fond of a ſtrumpet, named Lamia, a woman of great art, and who touched the lute to the greateſt perfection. She was, however, much older than any of his wives, even than Philla; ſo that the ſatyriſts of thoſe times pretended ſhe had enchanted the king. It is ſaid, he once deſigned to have married Crateſipolis the widow of Alexander the ſon of Polyſperchon, a woman more famous for her charms than her virtue; but going to make her a viſit while he beſieged Mægara, he very narrowly miſſed being taken priſoner by one of Caſſander's parties, being forced to change coats with a ſoldier in order to make his eſcape, which effectually took away his regard for that lady. By a Sclavonian concubine he had a ſon, whom he called Demetrius: and theſe are all his deſcendants of which we have any account in hiſtory. As to his dominions, they remained mained to Antigonus, of whose life and actions we shall give an exact account in the succeeding section, having already communicated to the reader all that, with propriety, could be brought within the compass of this [1].

[k] Plut. in Demet. Corn. Nep. de regib. c. 3.

[1] Plut. in vit. Demet. & Pyrrh. Diodor. l. xix. xx. Justin. l.

SECT. VIII.

The history of the kingdom of Macedon, from the death of Alexander the Great, to the conquest thereof by the Romans.

The state of Macedon at the king's decease.

THE kingdom of Macedon, at the time of the decease of Alexander, was governed by Antipater, yet Craterus was appointed him for a successor; and the general opinion is, that Antipater, who was directed to come with a fresh Macedonian army to Babylon, would have been disgraced, if not put to death, on account of the many complaints made against him. If this were so, the death of Alexander prevented that of Antipater, and left him possessed of his government [a]. In writing therefore the history of Macedon from the demise of Alexander, we must begin with Antipater and his administration. He was a person noble by birth, of great natural abilities, heightened by an excellent education. He was the friend as well as the disciple of Aristotle, learned, and a lover of learning; magnificent in his actions, but plain in his dress and behaviour, never varying his habit in all the time of his government, but appearing like a private person when he gave laws to kings. In few words, he had either the greatest virtues of any man of his age, or was the greatest hypocrite in it. The former, however, seems to us to be his true character, the lustre of his good qualities being too strong to be eclipsed by the vapours of Athenian envy, which affected the heads of many historians,

[a] Arrian. .vii. Curt. l. x. Justin. l. xiii. c. 5.

hiſtorians, ſome of whoſe writings have laſted to our times [b]. Philip of Macedon, whoſe great talent was judging well of men and things, made choice of Antipater as his miniſter, and relied on him as his friend. I have ſlept ſoundly, ſaid he, for Antipater was waking. This ſentence affords us a ſtronger deſcription of his abilities and fidelity, than an orator could convey in twenty pages. Alexander entruſted him, not only with the care of his hereditary kingdoms, and the command of a great army therein, but alſo with the cuſtody of Greece. If in this charge he had been either negligent or careleſs, Alexander's victories would have ſignified nothing; for the Macedonians would have been for returning home, as ſoon as ever they had heard any ill news from thence. He had, it is true, many quarrels with Olympias, who was a high-ſpirited woman, and very deſirous of meddling in ſtate affairs. Alexander himſelf approved his conduct ſo far, as to ſay on account of his mother's letters, That he had paid dearly for the months he lay in her womb [c]. It is certain, that ſhe was no leſs angry with Hephæſtion, the moſt faithful friend, as well as the chief favourite, of his maſter. What he thought of her character, appears from a fragment of one of his letters to her, wherein he wrote thus; Forbear your unjuſt reproaches; but, if you will not forbear, I care not, ſince Alexander muſt judge all [d]. When the news of Parmenio's death arrived in Macedonia, Antipater is recorded to have ſaid, If Parmenio conſpired againſt Alexander, who can we truſt? If he did not conſpire, what ſhall we do [e]? If it were not for the only chaſm in Arrian's hiſtory, we ſhould be able to ſpeak more fully as to the credit Antipater ſtood in with his maſter at the time of his deceaſe. As it is, we know, that it was Arrian's opinion, that the beſt hiſtorians had recorded nothing which teſtified the king's having any diſlike to his old miniſter [f]. What remains of the letters of Alexander ſhew, that he kept a regular correſpondence with Antipater, and that he gave him public marks of his eſteem. There is a fragment of a letter from Antipater to his maſter, which is the nobleſt teſtimony of his extraordinary firmneſs and ſtrict regard to truth. Ariſtotle had fallen under Alexander's diſpleaſure, and he had written in ſevere terms of him to Antipater himself; yet when Antipater acquainted him with the death of Aristotle, he gave a noble character of that philosopher, which he closed with these words: Besides the marvellous talents wherewith the mind of that truly great man was adorned, this was peculiar to him, that he acquired the good will of every man who knew him [g]. Having now sufficiently shewn who, and what Antipater was, let us proceed to the history of his administration after the death of Alexander.

[b] Diodor. l. xviii. Plut. in vit. Alex. [c] Arrian. l. vii. [d] Plut. in vit. Alex. [e] Id. in Apophthegm. regum. [f] Arrian. l. vii.

The Greeks begin the Samian war. Year after the flood 2679. Before Christ 320.

The Grecians, even in the life-time of Alexander, endured very unwillingly that superiority which he exercised over them; and tho' nothing could be more gentle than the government of Antipater with respect to Greece, yet he was exceedingly hated, because he obliged them to be quiet. One of the last actions of Alexander's life blew the embers of sedition into a flame. He had, by an edict, directed all the cities of Greece to recal their exiles; which edict, when it was published at the olympic games, occasioned great confusion. Many of the cities were afraid, that when the exiles returned, they would change the government; most of them doubted their own safety, in case the edict took effect, and all of them held this peremptory decree to be a total abolition of their liberty. Immediately therefore they began to levy soldiers, and to prepare for war. In these transactions the Athenians were extremely busy, yet they did not publickly declare themselves, till they were assured that Alexander was dead. Then they kept no measures; they laid out the money, which Harpalus had stolen from Alexander, and left in their city to hire forces [h]. They exclaimed against the Macedonians, as a barbarous and tyrannical nation, and appointed Leosthenes general of their forces raised for delivering Greece. This man was the disciple of Demosthenes, and seems to have meant his country better than he was able to serve it. He was full of an enthusiastic passion for democracy, and this prompted him to talk in a very high strain in the assembly. Phocion, who judged better of the state of Athens, could not help saying to him on this occasion, Young man, your speeches are like the cypress-tree, lofty, and well spread, but but they bear no fruit [i]. This gentleman, however, drew together a noble army, with which he advanced towards Theſſaly, which was the moſt judicious ſtep taken in the war.

[g] Plut. in paral. Coriolan. cum Alcibiad. [h] Diodor. Sicul. l. xviii.

ANTIPATER, as ſoon as he was thoroughly informed of the march of the Athenian forces, ſent over into Aſia, to deſire the aſſiſtance of the governors there. In the interim he marched with thirteen thouſand foot and ſix thouſand horſe, in order to ſecure Theſſaly. He appointed Cillas to preſide in Macedon during his abſence, and directed him to raiſe forces with all imaginable diligence; for the large draughts which Alexander had made rendered this a work not eaſily performed. A fleet of a hundred and ten gallies was likewiſe fitted out, under the command of Clytus, who as a ſea-man, had ſerved with great reputation under the late king. When Antipater came down into Theſſaly, he found the inhabitants of that country ſtill in the Macedonian intereſt, and received from them a very conſiderable reinforcement of horſe; yet, according to the practice of their anceſtors, they acted deceitfully, and, when he wanted them moſt, went over to the enemy. Leoſthenes was in poſſeſſion of the Pylæ, or ſtreights leading into Greece, where he waited for Antipater, who, with the ſmall army he had, did not fail to give him battle, wherein numbers, and the ſkill of the mercenaries ſerving under Leoſthenes, gained him the victory. Antipater, with the remains of his army, retired to Lamia, a city of ſome ſtrength, and not far diſtant from the field of battle. This he ſeized and fortified in ſuch a manner, that tho' the victorious army attempted to ſtorm it, yet they were unſucceſsful; ſo that Leoſthenes was conſtrained to undertake a regular ſiege, whereby, when he had reduced Antipater to great ſtreights, himſelf, advancing too near the wall, was ſlain by a ſtone; whereupon Antiphilus was created general in his ſtead. While things were in this condition, Leonatus arrived from Aſia, with a great army, and advanced to ſuccour Antipater. Antiphilus, as ſoon as he was appriſed of this, raiſed the ſiege, burnt his tents, and marched to fight the new-comers, tho' they were no leſs than twenty two thouſand foot and two thouſand five hundred horſe, moſt of them veterans. The battle was hard fought, and continued long; but, through Antipater marches againſt them.

[i] Plut. in vit. Phocion.

through the valour of the Theſſalian horſe and the death of Leonatus, the Greeks carried the victory, and the Macedonian phalanx was compelled to retire into the rocky hills, where the horſe could not follow them. Theſe victories excedingly raiſed the ſpirits of the confederates, and made them deſpiſe their enemies ſo much, that many of them returned home, which afterwards proved fatal to the common cauſe [k].

The concluſion of this war.

Antipater, while he was ſhut up in Lamia, ſent deputies to Athens, to negotiate peace; but the Athenians refuſed him any other terms than the ſurrendering at diſcretion, and leaving all things to their diſpoſal. The ſiege being now raiſed, Antipater with incredible diligence, marched to the place where the remains of Leonatus's army was encamped, and having joined them, held the enemy in play, tho' he was not able to offer them battle. When he found the confederates preſſed hard upon him, and that their chief ſtrength conſiſted in their ſuperiority of horſe, he choſe ſuch a rout, as, for the moſt part, hindered the horſe from acting; and when they might have acted with effect, he deviſed this method for avoiding an engagement; he directed the light-armed foot to mount, not only all the carriage-horſes, but likewiſe all the mules and aſſes belonging to the army, and placing theſe behind the ſquadrons of horſe which he had, the Theſſalians concluded, that he had been reinforced with a great body of cavalry, and therefore contented themſelves with obſerving them at a diſtance. At length Craterus arrived with a great body of forces under his command; however he yielded the command to Antipater on their junction at the river Peneus, where there were now aſſembled forty thouſand foot, three thouſand archers, and five thouſand horſe. The Greeks had twenty five thouſand foot and three thouſand five hundred horſe, with which they ventured a battle. In this the Theſſalian cavalry were at firſt victorious; which Antipater obſerving, he would not ſuſtain his horſe, but ſuffered the Theſſalians to break them entirely. While theſe continued the purſuit, he, with the phalanx bore down upon the Grecian foot, and defeated them with great ſlaughter. The Macedonian horſe formed behind their victorious battalions, and the Theſſalians fearing they ſhould be ſurrounded, rounded, retired haſtily, in order to join their foot. After this defeat, Antiphilus held a council of war, wherein it was put to the vote, whether they ſhould continue in the field, or think of treating. It was carried for the latter, and deputies were inſtantly ſent to Antipater; but the Grecian generals were exceedingly ſurpriſed to hear on their return, that the Macedonian would treat ſeparately with the cities, or not at all; which propoſition they rejected [1].

[k] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Phocion & Demoſth. Juſtin. l. xiii. c. 5.

Peace granted to the Athenians

ANTIPATER and Craterus, perceiving that the confederate army was too weak to give them battle, began to beſiege the cities in the neighbourhood, and having reduced many of them, treated the inhabitants with much ſeverity. This ſo affrighted the ſtates confederated with the Athenians, that they immediately made peace on the beſt terms they could. The Athenians and Ætolians alone ſtood out; upon which Antipater and Craterus advanced towards Athens. The citizens of that famous place found themſelves now in no condition to reſiſt him, their fleet which they had fitted out at a vaſt expence, under the command of Eetion, having been twice defeated by Clytus. In this diſtreſs the Peloponneſians might have ſuccoured and preſerved them; but, either through jealouſy or a panic fear, they remained motionleſs, and left the Athenians to their fate. In this diſtreſs they turned their eyes on Phocion, and demanded his advice. To what end, ſaid he, Athenians, ſhould I adviſe you? If you had not rejected my counſels, you had not been this day in this diſtreſs. They then called upon Demades, who had always been in the Macedonian intereſt. He propoſed a decree, by which Demoſthenes was condemned to death; but he was already fled. He then deſired, that deputies might be ſent to Antipater, himſelf and Phocion being of the number. When they arrived, Antipater would hear of no other terms than thoſe offered to him at Lamia, viz. that they ſhould yield themſelves entirely to his mercy, and ſuffer their affairs to be ſettled at his pleaſure. With theſe hard terms they were conſtrained to comply. Phocion beſought Antipater that peace might be concluded where he then was, i. e. in Bœotia, which Craterus ſaid was unreaſonable, ſince their army muſt ſubſiſt all that that time in the country of their friends, whereas nothing hindred their living at diſcretion in Attica (A). To this Antipater replied, that he was in the right; yet, ſaid he, let

[1] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Demoſthen.

(A) Xenocrates was a very eminent philoſopher, the diſciple and ſucceſſor of Plato, alike remarkable for his wiſdom in words, and for the probity of his actions. Many years before this he had been ſent embaſſador to Antipater in Macedonia, to entreat him to ſet at liberty ſome Athenian priſoners. On his arrival, before he had his audience, Antipater invited him to an entertainment. Xenocrates anſwered him in theſe verſes of Homer, ſpoken by Ulyſſes to Circe, when ſhe preſſed him to eat of the dainties ſet before him:

Ill fits me, whoſe friends are ſunk to beaſts,
To quaff thy bowls, or riot in thy feaſts.
Me wouldſt thou pleaſe, for them thy cares employ,
And them to me reſtore, and me to joy (1).

Antipater was ſo well pleaſed with his preſence of mind, and happy application of theſe verſes, that, without more ado, he ſet the Athenians free. On this occaſion he did not behave ſo obligingly, for knowing that Xenocrates was warmly affected to the democracy, he paſſed him by, when he kindly ſaluted all the reſt of the deputies; which when the philoſopher obſerved, he could not help ſaying, Antipater does well thus to diſtinguiſh me from the reſt, as if before Xenocrates only he was aſhamed of the injuſtice he is about to do the Athenians. When the government was afterwards ſettled, Phocion would willingly have had Xenocrates accept the freedom of the city, which he refuſed. I will not, ſaid he, ſubmit myſelf to any adminiſtration which I do not like, and the eſtabliſhment which I oppoſe (2). Afterwards growing ſo poor that he could not pay his tribute, the Athenians, with ſhameleſs ingratitude, condemned him to be ſold for a ſlave, which was accordingly done. Demetrius the Phalerean bought him, reſtoring him to his liberty, and paying his price into the public treaſury. He was a great writer, for we have the titles of above ſixty treatiſes which he compoſed. He died at fourſcore and two, falling in the night with his head into a baſon of water, whereby he was ſuffocated (3).

(1) Odyſſ. l. x. (2) Plut. in vit. Phocion. (3) Diogen. Laert. in vit. Xenocrat.

let us grant this, becauſe it is aſked by Phocion. When the Athenians had conſented to ſubmit themſelves to his pleaſure, Antipater granted them the following terms; that the antient way of raiſing taxes in the city ſhould be reſtored; that they ſhould receive a garriſon into the fort Munichia, and maintain it at their own charge; that they ſhould pay the expence of the war; and that they ſhould deliver up the orators Hyperides and Demoſthenes. Phocion earneſtly begged the city might be excuſed from the garriſon. I would willingly grant this alſo to your friendſhip, ſaid Antipater, but I know it is not either convenient for you or me. By which he meant, that, without a garriſon, the Athenians would never be kept either in dependence on the Macedonians, or at quiet among themſelves. In conſequence of this treaty, the popular government in Athens was abrogated, and ſuch only permitted a ſhare therein as had competent eſtates; upon which twenty-two thouſand of the inhabitants retired from the city, and had eſtates aſſigned them in the territories of Macedon, where they ſettled, and lived very happily. As for the reſt of the Athenians, they were conſtrained to return to Solon's model of government, and, in ſhort, were compelled by Antipater, much againſt their will, to be rich and quiet. With the ſame equity and moderation he ſettled the reſt of the Grecian ſtates, who, at firſt, grudged his power, and complained heavily of the infringements made on their liberty; but, by degrees, they became better ſatisfied, and at laſt honoured him as the father and protector of Greece. On his return to Macedon, he and his ſon-in-law Craterus, who had juſt married his daughter Philla, turned their arms againſt the Ætolians, who alone refuſed to be comprehended in the peace, and kept a conſiderable army in the field. Theſe, with much trouble, they reduced in the winter to great ſtreights; but while they were preparing for the ſieges of their principal cities, Antigonus arrived from Aſia, with an account of Perdiccas's deſigns, inſiſting particularly on his ſlighting Nicæa, the daughter of Antipater, and on his ordering Cynane the ſiſter of Alexander to be put to death. Antipater and Craterus inſtantly made peace with the Ætolians, that they might be at leiſure to attend to their own concerns, and prevent Perdiccas from becoming their ſovereign, under colour of being protector of the kings. With this view they entered into a league with

Ptolemy,

Ptolemy, and began to aſſemble an army in order to paſs into Aſia [m].

Antipater and Craterus paſs over into Aſia.

When all things were ready, and the ſeaſon of the year permitted, Antipater and Craterus tranſported their forces into Aſia, leaving the care of Macedon and Greece to Polyſperchon. On their arrival in Aſia, Antipater reſolved to march with part of the forces into Cilicia, that he might be able to aſſiſt Ptolemy, in caſe Perdiccas was too hard for him; and Craterus with the other moiety marched againſt Eumenes. Antipater, not long after this diviſion of their forces, received the melancholy news of the defeat and death of his ſon-in-law, whereby his favourite daughter Philla was left a widow [n]. It is ſaid this lady was endowed by nature with ſuch extraordinary qualities, that her father, who was otherwiſe a very cloſe man, yet was wont to conſult her even while ſhe was a girl. Her conduct in the time of both her huſbands was extremely remarkable, for ſhe ſpent her whole time in acts of beneficence; ſhe had the wives and daughters of the officers of the army continually about her. As her own behaviour was very exact, ſhe kept a ſtrict eye upon theirs, at the ſame time ſhe relieved their wants, gave portions to their daughters, and was their patroneſs in all their affairs. The death of her huſband Craterus did not greatly affect Antipater's intereſt; for Perdiccas being ſhortly after ſlain in Egypt, he was ſent for to the army in Syria, where Aridæus and Pithon abdicating their offices as protectors to the kings, Antipater ſucceeded by common conſent. At firſt Eurydice the wife of Philip created him a great deal of trouble, and even endangered his life; but, by degrees he got over this, andnot only conciliated the affection of the ſoldiers, but acquired alſo the eſteem of Eurydice her ſelf. In fine, after he had ſettled all things in Aſia in the beſt method poſſible, and had left his ſon Caſſander to be a check upon Antigonus, he ſet out with the kings to return to Macedonia, the army being perfectly well ſatisfied with his conduct, and the friends of the royal family hoping all things from his protection [o].

The Ætolians invade Theſſaly.

While he and Craterus were in Aſia, the Ætolians, who had ſecretly entered into a league with Perdiccas, broke broke into the territories of Macedon with a great army, and committed exceſſive depredations, in revenge for what they had ſuffered the winter before. Polycles commanded in thoſe parts for Antipater, and had with him a conſiderable body of troops. He, in attempting to repel the Ætolians, was drawn by them to an engagement, wherein his army was routed, and himſelf ſlain. The Ætolians, while they were conſulting how to proſecute this victory, received advice, that the Acarnanians had entered their country, and had begun to commit horrible devaſtations therein. To expel theſe invaders the Ætolians marched home; but they left the forces of their confederates in Theſſaly, under the command of Menon, an officer of great ſkill and courage. Polyſperchon, who, as we obſerved, commanded in Macedon in the abſence of Antipater, immediately took advantage of this diviſion, and, while the Ætolians were buſy in expelling their domeſtic enemies, he, by forced marches, came down into Theſſaly, and, before Menon could be properly ſupported, fell upon him and his troops, and cut them to pieces. By this blow the power of the Ætolians was entirely broken, and the peace of Macedon reſtored [p].

[m] Arrian, apud Phot. cod. xcii. Diodor. Sicul. l. xviii. Juſtin. l. xiii. Plut. in Demoſthen. & Phocion. [n] Plut. in vit. Eumen. Diodor. ubi ſupra. [o] Arrian. ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi ſupra.

The Athenians ſeek to be eaſed of their garriſon.

ANTIPATER, on his return, brought with him the kings into Macedon, and treated them there with all imaginable reſpect. The Athenians were very earneſt with Phocion, whoſe intereſt with Antipater they knew to be great, to obtain of him the diſmiſſion of their garriſon; but Phocion, who ſaw clearly that this garriſon was more uſeful to the public than to Antipater, declined the commiſſion; yet the recalling many of the exiles, and other good things he both aſked and obtained of Antipater, with whom he had indeed a very great intereſt. Menillus, who commanded in the fort, and was both a generous and a good-natured man, offered Phocion, who had but a ſmall eſtate, a ſum of money. My circumſtances, anſwered the patriot, are neither worſe than they were, nor are you greater than Alexander the ſon of Philip, from whom I refuſed to accept the ſame favour. And when he was once requeſted to do ſomewhat that was wrong in his opinion, for the ſervice of the Macedonians, Antipater, ſaid he, cannot have me for his friend and his flatterer.

[p] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

terer. This the Macedonian chief knew as well as he; for it was a common saying with him, That he had two friends at Athens, one who would take nothing, and another who never thought he had enough [q]. The former was Phocion, the latter Demades, an orator of some reputation, and who had been all his life in the interest of Macedon. It was this man on whom the Athenians cast their eyes, when Phocion absolutely refused to have any thing to do with the affair of the garrison; and in an ill hour for himself and his family Demades undertook it, having, for the greater honour, his son Demias joined with him in commission [r].

The death of Antipater.

NOT long after his return to Macedon, Antipater was attacked by a dangerous disease, which, added to his years, for he was now fourscore, left him little hopes of life. He behaved himself in the last moments of his life with the same firmness, and the same regard to his reputation, which he had shewed in all the actions of his life. His great offices of protector and governor of Macedon he bequeathed to Polysperchon, the eldest of Alexander's captains at hand, and of whom Antipater had a much better opinion than he deserved. His eldest son Cassander Antipater appointed to be a chiliarch or colonel of a thousand men, a command in those times infinitely more considerable than now [s]. A little before his death, Demades had audience of Antipater, and was kindly received; however, as to the garrison, nothing was determined; but at the request of Phocion, signified by letter, the Athenians had a further day given them for the payment of their subsidies. Thus, full of years and glory in a time of full peace and serenity, procured chiefly by his own wisdom and prudence, Antipater expired; of whom, had we nothing else to say, what Tacitus observed of Galba might properly be applied to him, and sufficiently distinguish his character to posterity; Non in domo successorem quæsivit, sed in republica. In the choice of a successor he regarded not his family, but the commonweal (B).

BEFORE

[q] Plut. in. vit. Phocion.
[r] Diodor. Sicul, ubi supra.
[s] Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra.
[t] Tacit. Hist. lib. i. c. 15.

(B) We have no where the reasons assigned us, why Antipater excluded his son Cassander from the administration, but they are not

BEFORE Antipater was well dead, Caſſander in his name ſent for Demades the Athenian embaſſador, who with his ſon Demias readily came, and began to expoſtulate on the buſineſs of the garriſon. Caſſander, giving little heed to what he ſaid, ordered his ſon to be put to death in his preſence, and when he had given him a little time to feel the affliction of a father, he firſt loaded him with bitter reproaches, and not hard to be gueſſed. Firſt, he was his ſon, and in all probability the father thought it unworthy of him to aggrandize his own family at the expence of his maſter's. Secondly, Polyſperchon's age, experience, and his late exploit againſt the Ætolians might induce Antipater to think he would prove a worthy guardian of the kings. There might be a third reaſon, which was Caſſander's ambition, and his having a private intrigue with Eurydice the wife of king Philip, who had as good or a better right to the crown than her huſband, which might make the good old man leſs careful of his ſon's intereſt than otherwiſe he would have been. However it was, he ſhewed his love for his country, not only in his impartiality, but alſo in the advice he gave to him whom he deſigned his ſucceſſor. On no account, ſaid he, ſuffer a woman to have any concerns in the affairs of ſtate; their abilities are by no means ſuited to ſuch arduous concerns; for being ſlaves to their paſſions, to indulge them they throw all things into confuſion (4). This was underſtood to point at Olympias, who during his adminiſtration had dwelt in Epirus. It is true, he had great reaſon to diſlike her, as well on account of the trouble ſhe had given him, as out of regard to his beloved maſter Philip, whoſe ſecond wife ſhe had murdered, and whoſe child by her ſhe broiled between two copper plates; even in Epirus, ſhe affected to govern all things, and therefore her ſon Alexander commended her for going thither, becauſe, ſaid he, the Macedonians would never bear the government of a woman. Yet it may be, Antipater's counſel was general, which was more becoming him, and no leſs founded on fact; for beſides the trouble he had through Olympias, Cleopatra the ſiſter of Alexander had afforded him no ſmall diſquiet, and Eurydice had once put him in the utmoſt danger of his life (5); he might well therefore have no great opinion of women's intermeddling with ſtate affairs. We ſhall ſhortly ſee how deeply the Macedonians ſuffered from the neglect of Antipater's maxim.

(4) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii. (5) Arrian. ap. Phot. Juſtin. &c.

and then cauſed him alſo to be ſlain. The reaſon of this extraordinary proceeding was, that among the papers of Perdiccas there had been found a letter written to him by Demades, preſſing Perdiccas to make haſte into Greece; the affairs of which hung at preſent, he ſaid, on an old rotten thread; ſo he was pleaſed to characterize Antipater, from whom he had begged, and from whom he had received ſo much. It is but juſt we ſhould inform the reader that authors vary about this fact; Diodorus ſays, that Demades was put to death by Antipater: Plutarch and other authors aſcribe his puniſhment to Caſſander: ſome alſo ſay the letter was written to Antigonus, and not to Perdiccas; but this is improbable, and therefore, having well conſidered its circumſtances, we have ſtated the fact as it appears to us. Cruel without doubt it was, yet it cannot be denied, that Demades, who was a venal orator, and who ſcrupled not to employ his eloquence againſt the intereſt of his country, met with no worſe fate than he deſerved [u].

Projects of the new adminiſtration in Macedon.

Polysperchon was now at the head of affairs, governor general of Macedon, and protector of the kings, which high offices he derived from the good opinion which Antipater had conceived of him. He was a man of indifferent parts, more capable of following directions, than of giving them, one extremely formal in his manner of tranſacting buſineſs, being converſant in nothing but forms. In a word, he was far from being honeſt, ſteady, or wiſe, and yet a great pretender to probity, fortitude, and policy. He had a ſon named Alexander, more active, and of better abilities, though not a grain more virtuous than himſelf. The firſt ſtep he took in his government was to call a general council; as the firſt ſtep taken in that council was to ſet aſide Antipater's dying counſel, by recalling Olympias, which they not only did, but put Alexander the ſon of Roxana under her care; at leaſt they promiſed ſo to do, hoping that the majeſty of the mother of Alexander would add a luſtre to their adminiſtration. A meaſure, which, conſidered in one light, ſeems juſt and honourable; but in another ſhews, that Polyſperchon and his council were ſenſible of ſome imbecillity in themſelves. The queen, however, who knew ſhe was ſafe in Epirus, and knew not what might befal her in Macedon, made no great haſte, but took took time to conſider the matter herſelf, and to conſult with her friends. However, ſhe communicated her thoughts upon all occaſions to Polyſperchon, and ſo held immediately a conſiderable ſhare in the adminiſtration. Caſſander was little thought of in theſe proceedings; and it appeared plainly, that the new government had very little regard for the friends of the old one, which of conſequence created a multitude of malecontents, and afforded colour for certain ſubſequent tranſactions, which otherwiſe would have been of too dark a hue to have borne the light. For as great politicians have a faculty of making all events contribute to their ends, ſo there are a tribe of wrong-headed ſtateſmen, who obſtinately purſue thoſe tracks which lead directly from the ends at which they aim; ſuch were Polyſperchon and his council [w].

[u] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Phocion.

The views of Caſſander.

As ſoon as Caſſander conſidered the ſtate in which he ſtood, he ſaw, or at leaſt he thought he ſaw, reaſon to be diſpleaſed with his father's diſpoſition of affairs. He formed a juſt idea of Polyſperchon's character, and drew from thence very diſmal apprehenſions of what might befal himſelf, his family, and their dependents. Beſides, his ambition prompted him to attempt the recovery of that command, of which his father's will had deprived him, and at the ſame time it opened his eyes to methods by which it might be obtained. Theſe things having a while revolved in his own breaſt, he engaged ſome of his friends to accompany him into the country under colour of diverting themſelves with hunting; but in truth to confer with them on his deſign. When they were at diſtance from court, he opened to them his project, having firſt ſtrongly poſſeſſed them with the common danger they were all in from the propenſity of Polyſperchon to Olympias, the antient and implacable enemy of Antipater and all his friends. He then ſhewed them, that Antigonus, Ptolemy, and Lyſimachus, would from their reſpective intereſts become the enemies of Polyſperchon, becauſe, as protector of the kings, he would claim a ſuperiority over them; from whence he inferred, they would be friends to themſelves, if they declared againſt Polyſperchon. It is uncertain, whether at firſt he communicated his intention of abſolutely ſupplanting the protector, or whether he pretended only to aſpire to ſuch a degree gree of power as might enable him to protect himself, his family, and their friends; however it was, his discourses procured him a multitude of creatures, who readily obeyed his dictates, and took such steps as he directed them; and if things began to go well at home, they went still better abroad, for Antigonus and the rest of the princes promised him their utmost assistance as soon as it was asked, in consequence, as they pretended, of their extraordinary love for his father; but in truth, because they hated Polysperchon, and were desirous to prevent his looking abroad, by finding him troublesome scenes enow at home [x].

[w] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Demet. Juſtin. lib. xiv.

Polysperchon's edict.

While Cassander was busied in carrying his schemes into execution, Polysperchon held another grand council, wherein it was resolved to displace all the governors appointed by Antipater in Greece, and to set up the democracy where-ever it had been abolished. In order to carry this scheme into execution, a very gracious proclamation was drawn, and sent to Athens and to the rest of the cities. It remains entire in Diodorus, and will be an everlasting monument of the genius of Polysperchon and his ministers. The body of the edict is full of royal authority, and extraordinary stretches of power, yet the preamble and conclusion declare its intention to be the restoring liberty to the Greeks, and at the same time the old regency is loaded with grievous accusations. This edict produced, what in all probability it was intended to produce, confusions everywhere; for the people, under colour of its authority, would no longer obey their magistrates, and the magistrates were no where well inclined to trust themselves to the government of the people. But the point of dismissing governors, which was the main thing the edict was calculated for, it could not produce, for the governors were least of all willing to submit to the execution of a decree by which they were to be cashiered; they therefore demurred at first, and at last applied to Cassander. In this nice conjuncture all eyes were upon Athens, for as it was the most considerable garrison, so if Nicanor who commanded there had immediately evacuated the fort, it would have gone a great way towards the carrying the edict into execution elsewhere. But he at first expressed a sort of diffidence as to the authority of Polysperchon, and afterwards, when he received letters letters from Olympias, he ſpun out negotiations with the Athenians, till he had thoroughly recruited his garriſon; and then, inſtead of quitting Munichia, he unexpectedly ſeized on Pyræus. The Athenians, provoked by this uſage, which they were not able to revenge upon Nicanor, turned their fury on their own citizens, and inſtantly proſcribed Phocion with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction who had conferred with Nicanor, though they were not culpable in the leaſt. Theſe unhappy perſons retired for ſhelter to Alexander the ſon of Polyſperchon, who had then entered Attica with an army. As he drew near Athens, the citizens alſo ſent deputies to preſs him immediately to beſiege Nicanor, in order to reſtore them their forts. But Alexander had by this time other notions in his head; he knew the Athenians too well to think of truſting them, and therefore he began to enter into a treaty with Nicanor, not for his evacuating the forts, but for his coming over to his father Polyſperchon, in keeping them for him, in which, however he ſucceeded not. By this time Polyſperchon himſelf was at hand with a great army, having with him king Aridæus or Philip. To him his ſon Alexander ſent Phocion and his friends with letters of recommendation, Dinarchus the Corinthian, Polyſperchon's old and intimate friend, going with them. At their heels came deputies from Athens, charging them with treaſon againſt the ſtate. Polyſperchon was at firſt extremely perplexed how he ſhould behave himſelf on this occaſion. His ſon had engaged his faith to the exiles, but himſelf conceived that his intereſt would be beſt promoted by his ſiding with the Athenians; fickle in his ſentiments, and ſanguine in all his meaſures, he no ſooner conceived this, than he ordered his old acquaintance Dinarchus to be firſt tortured, and then put to death, and after affording Phocion and his friends a pretended hearing, at which the fooliſh king attempted to ſtrike Phocion through with his launce, the exiles were condemned, and then tranſmitted to Athens, where the people were giddy enough to miſtake for a mark of liberty their being made the executioners of a ſentence pronounced in another court. In ſhort, Phocion was murdered, and Polyſperchon highly cried up; but in the mean time Nicanor maintained himſelf in Munichia and in the Pyræus, and advice came, that Caſſander, who was fled to Antigonus, had been furniſhed by him with conſide-

[x] Diodor. ubi supra. Justin. ubi supra. Plut. in Demet. & Phocion.

rable assistance, and was on the very point of embarking for Athens [y].

Cassander prevails in Greece. Year after the flood, 2681. Before Christ 318.

It was among the number of the great slips in policy made by the new administration in Macedon, that after so openly attacking the dependents of Antipater, and taking Olympias into a share of the administration, they yet suffered Cassander to withdraw, which he did as soon as he had settled matters at home, and went immediately to the court of Antigonus; there he was received with high honours, and had mighty promises made to him, part of which were fulfilled, not for his sake, but that a war might be kindled in Greece while Antigonus totally subdued Asia. The forces lent Cassander were not great, but to a man of his spirit any assistance was considerable. As soon therefore as he had received them, he sailed for Athens, and entering the Pyræus with his small fleet, was received by Nicanor. Polysperchon instantly resolved to shut up his competitor in that city, and to put a short end to the war by its reduction. For this purpose he assembled a great army, with which he marched to Athens; but forgetting that Attica was never over-fruitful, he found himself in a short time so distressed for provisions, that he was constrained to abandon his design, and therefore leaving his son Alexander with a competent army to observe the motions of Cassander, he with the major part of his forces marched into Peloponnesus where he knew Cassander had many friends. When he entered Peloponnesus he had recourse once more to his edicts, whereby such as had borne offices in the cities under the administration of Antipater were roundly condemned to banishment or death, merely for having borne offices. This decree the people in most places put in execution, so that discord, slaughter, and confusion, was effectually spread all about. The Megalopolitans only had wit enough to avoid these dissensions, and the magistrates and people agreeing, they retained their old government, and dwelt in peace. This was high treason in the sight of Polysperchon; he said they had contravened his edict, that they were associates with Cassander, and that for these reasons they ought to be made a public example of as common enemies to the Greeks. When the Megalopolitans heard this, they withdrew all their their effects out of the country, fortified their city, and having muſtered their fighting men, found their number to be fifteen thouſand; and confiding in their own ſtrength, determined to abide a ſiege. Polyſperchon, to make good his threats, came with the king and all his army before the city, having with him alſo a great number of elephants. The firſt thing he did was to cauſe the wall to be undermined, which his engineers performed ſo effectually, that when the beſieged leaſt expected it, three towers with all the wall between them fell down. Polyſperchon then led his army to the aſſault, which proved very obſtinate and bloody; but in the end the Megalopolitans repulſed the beſiegers, and while their men were fighting, the women and children threw up an intrenchment of earth and rubbiſh within the breach. Polyſperchon determined to attack the place a ſecond time, and to make uſe of his elephants, the news of which terrified the citizens exceedingly. It happened there was amongſt them one Damides, who had ſerved under Alexander; this man undertook for the elephants, which put his countrymen again in heart. The method he uſed was this; he took broad pieces of ſtrong plank, into each of which he ſtruck ſeveral iron ſpikes, theſe he fixed in the ground within the breach, and covered them lightly with rubbiſh; then he drew up the citizens, not in front, but in flank on each ſide of the breach, and ſo attended the enemy. Polyſperchon's troops advanced in excellent order, having the elephants before them; theſe being forced by their riders upon the breach, ſtuck their feet upon the ſpikes, and were unable to proceed further. The citizens galling them and their riders with ſtones and darts, many of the beaſts fell down, and the reſt growing unruly, turned upon their own men, and trod them under foot. The army ſeeing this refuſed to ſtorm the place, ſo that Polyſperchon, leaving a corps ſo horſe and foot to block up the city, marched away with much diſgrace. In the interim, Clytus the admiral had beat Nicanor, whom Caſſander had ſent from Athens with his fleet; but after this, lying careleſsly at Byzantium, Antigonus privately ſent over light-armed troops in barks, and then having refitted Nicanor's fleet commanded him to attack Clytus again, and be aſſured of victory. This he accordingly did, and, to his great ſurprize, found him already attacked from the ſhore, ſo that he eaſily and entirely defeated them, Clytus himself being killed, not in the fight indeed, but afterwards by the soldiers of Lysimachus. When this news came to Polysperchon he resolved to march into Macedonia, for he saw clearly that Cassander would be too many for him in Greece [z].

[y] Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. & Plut. in Phocion.

Nicanor slain by Cassander.

Nicanor, after the great victory he had obtained, returned to Athens in triumph, and resumed his government. Soon after the Athenians were reconciled to Cassander, who greatly esteemed Nicanor for the service he had done him. But when he was privately informed that he intended to set up for himself, and saw that he made a difficulty of admitting him into the forts, he posted some soldiers in an empty house in the night, and having invited Nicanor thither to confer with him, surprized and put him to death. Cassander then treated the Athenians with much candor and generosity: he appointed Demetrius the Phalerean, a person of the highest quality, the greatest abilities, and the utmost moderation, their governor; under whom the city and citizens received greater advantages than under any former government before, or even in the days of their greatest freedom. This important place secured, Cassander applied himself to the settling the rest of Greece [a].

Olympias returns to Macedon, and acts with the utmost cruelty.

About this time Olympias prepared for her return into Macedonia, concerning which, as we have elsewhere observed, she wrote to Eumenes. He in his answer advised her in the first place not to be too hasty in her resolution, and in the next to forget all the injuries she had received, and to behave herself mildly to every body, in case she thought fit to return. Both these cautions she neglected; for, without waiting till the war was ended, she with some Epirots, whom her brother sent to escort her, went to join Polysperchon, when she knew he was returning into Macedon; and as soon as she came there, she discovered such a haughty and over-bearing spirit, as struck even those who wished her well with amazement. As for Eurydice the wife of Philip, she rightly conceived that Olympias would never be at peace, as long as her husband lived and enjoyed the regal title. She therefore wrote to Cassander beseeching him with all diligence to come to her assistance, and likewise sent letters to Polysperchon, requiring [z] Diodor. Sicul. & Plut. ubi supra.

[a] Universal History vi. p. 371. Diodor. Sicul. ubi supar

quiring him in the king's name to deliver up the army to Caſſander. At the ſame time ſhe neglected not taking more effectual methods for the ſecurity of her own and king Philip's perſon. She had obſerved, that the Macedonians loved him, and that they had a great reſpect for her. She likewiſe depended on the intereſt of Antipater's family, and therefore ſhe had recourſe to all the arts of perſuaſion, in order to raiſe a force ſufficient to defend herſelf and her friends, till Caſſander ſhould arrive. This point, as ſhe imagined, ſhe accompliſhed with great eaſe. The Macedonians readily armed at her requeſt, and in very ſmall ſpace ſhe drew together more than ſeemed ſufficient to guard her. When therefore Olympias advanced with Polyſperchon and his army, ſhe, like a courageous lady, led out her's. Thus a civil war was kindled in Macedon by two heroines, each willing to put her own and the kingdom's fate on the hazard of a battle. But when the armies drew near each other, the ſoldiers, who ſhould have fought for Eurydice, ſtruck with the awful majeſty of Olympias, the widow of Philip and the mother of Alexander, went over to her immediately, and thereby put an end to the diſpute. Olympias had it now in her power to have ſettled all things, if ſhe had remembered the advice of Eumenes. Her paſſions, which were not of the mildeſt ſort, had always governed her, and governed her now. King Philip and his wife Eurydice ſhe impriſoned in a room ſo ſmall, that they could ſcarce turn themſelves in, and cauſed them to be fed with very ordinary proviſions through a hole. Nicanor the ſon of Antipater ſhe put to death, and with him no leſs than an hundred perſons, his relations and friends; ſhe then cauſed the tomb of his bother Iolas to be broken open, and his remains to be thrown into the public ſtreet. Perceiving that the people were not over pleaſed with theſe proceedings, and that they began to commiſerate the condition of king Philip and his wife, ſhe reſolved to have them both diſpatched. In order to this, certain Thracians armed with poignards entered the place of their confinement, and with numberleſs wounds laid the king dead upon the floor. Then a meſſenger preſented Eurydice with a dagger, a rope, and a cup of poiſon, telling her, that Olympias left it to her choice by which ſhe would die; I pray the gods, ſaid ſhe, that Olympias may have the like preſent made her; ſhe then tore tore her linen, bound up the bleeding wounds of her huſband, and covered his body; after which, without any womaniſh complaining, ſhe ſtrangled herſelf with her own garter. Thus, when he had reigned about ſeven years, Aridæus loſt his life through her who in his childhood had deprived him of his wits; and Eurydice, the hereditary heireſs of the Macedonian crown, was murdered by her who was mother to the murderer of her father. In the days of Philip this ſort of policy was not underſtood: he married his own daughter to Amyntas his elder brother's ſon, and from this match ſprung Eurydice. Alexander, to leave all ſafe behind him when he went into Aſia, cauſed Amyntas to be murdered, and Perdiccas began his regency with the murder of Cynane the wife of Amyntas. However, Roxana and her young ſon Alexander found a protectreſs in Olympias, who took upon herſelf the adminiſtration as guardian to her grandchild [b].

Caſſander returns into Macedon.

Caſſander, as ſoon as he received the letters of Eurydice, and immediately after them the ill news of what had happened in Macedon, prepared inſtantly for his return into his own country, leaving the Greeks for a time to take care of themſelves. When he came to the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, he found the Theſſalians all in arms to oppoſe his paſſage. Revenge being more powerful with him than glory, he contrived not how to fight the enemy, but how to eſcape them; wherefore collecting all the ſhips, barks, and boats, which were to be found in the neighbouring cities, he embarqued his forces on board them, and ſafely tranſported them into Theſſaly. Thence marching into Macedonia, he determined to leave half his forces under the command of Callas, to hold Polyſperchon in play, while himſelf purſued and ſhut up Olympias. His deſign ſucceeded perfectly well, for Callas effectually baffled Polyſperchon, and Olympias with ſtrange imprudence ſhut up herſelf. For ſhe, after all her cruelties, relied entirely on the love of the Macedonians, and, having once prevailed by the majeſty of her appearance, was more ſolicitious about forming a court than an army, of which, however, ſhe had ſome appearance, and alſo the elephants with her. Going in progreſs to the principal

[b] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. lib. xiv. c. 5.

cipal cities, ſhe carried with her her daughter Roxana, her grandſon Alexander, her niece Deidamia, Theſſalonica the ſiſter of Alexander, and many other perſons of great quality, with whom, on the news of Caſſander's approach, ſhe ſhut herſelf up in the city of Pydna, a ſea-port ſtrongly fortified. Caſſander quickly appeared before the place, and inveſted it by land, at the ſame time that he ſhut up the port by ſea. The beſieged were very ſoon in want of proviſions, yet, encouraged by the preſence of ſo many great perſonages, they held out obſtinately; Olympias aſſuring them, that her brother Æacidas was coming out of Epirus with a great army to her aſſiſtance, which was true. Caſſander had advice thereof as early as ſhe, and he provided very effectually againſt it. He ſent troops to block up the paſſages from Epirus, which when the troops of king Æacidas found, they began to doubt the ſucceſs of the war, and, which was more, their own ſafety. They therefore reſolved on a courſe, which to them appeared ſhort and ſalutary; they mutinied, depoſed their king, and ſubmitted themſelves to Caſſander. Olympias had now none to depend on but Polyſperchon; out of whoſe power Callas had put it to render her much aſſiſtance; for, by throwing about manifeſtos, reflecting on the cruelty of her adminiſtration, he had debauched the greateſt part of Polyſperchon's ſoldiers; ſo that, inſtead of being able to ſecure his miſtreſs, he had much ado to defend himſelf. In the city of Pydna the court fed on horſe-fleſh, the ſoldiers on their dead companions, and the elephants on ſaw-duſt. In this miſerable ſituation numbers deſerted to Caſſander, who treated all with lenity who were not concerned in the late murders. Olympias at laſt wrote to Polyſperchon, requeſting him to ſend her a bark of fifty oars to convey her away in the night. The bearer of this letter fell into the hands of Caſſander, who commanded him to proceed on his journey, and not to mention his being taken. At the time appointed Polyſperchon ſent the galley, and gave notice of it to Olympias; but Caſſander, knowing alſo when it would arrive, ſeized it. Olympias not finding the veſſel as ſhe expected, gave up all hopes, and, without waiting any longer, ſurrendered the place and her perſon to Caſſander. This determined the fate of Macedonia; for Pella the capital preſently ſurrendered; and Ariſtonus, who with a body of troops lay in Amphipolis, at the command of Olympias pias yielded the city to Caſſander, and was immediately afterwards killed by ſome whom he had injured while he commanded there. Now it was that the laſt ſcene of the old queen's life came on. She was accuſed before the aſſembly of the Macedonians by the relations of the perſons ſhe had ſlain, and, without being heard in her defence, was condemned to die. Caſſander upon this ſent to adviſe her to make her eſcape to Athens, offering her a ſhip and equipage ſafely to tranſport her thither; but ſhe refuſed to fly, and ſaid, ſhe was ready to anſwer before the Macedonians for all ſhe had done. Caſſander did not care to truſt this, ſo he ſent a band of two hundred ſoldiers to put her to death. Theſe, when they came into her preſence, drew back, and were afraid to execute their orders; but the kindred of thoſe ſhe had murdered being with them, fell upon her, and cut her throat. She died with great reſolution; but it is ſaid, that Caſſander ſuffered her body to lie ſome time above-ground, probably to revenge the injury ſhe had offered to the aſhes of his brother. It is likewiſe alledged, that he did not adviſe her to fly out of pity, but that he might have an opportunity of putting her to death as a perſon ſelf-condemned, who fled from juſtice. Immediately after her deceaſe, he ſent Roxana and her ſon Alexander to Amphipolis, where they were made priſoners; he likewiſe deprived the boy of his companions who had been bred up with him, and ordered that for the future he ſhould be treated as a private perſon. Thus the line of Alexander was ſet aſide in Macedon, and his ſon and his ſucceſſor impriſoned in the very city where his army rendezvouſed, when he marched to conquer Aſia [c].

Caſſander aſſumes the government in Macedon.

Cassander having now provided for his ſafety, turned all his thoughts to the ſettlement of the kingdom. In the firſt place, he married Theſſalonica the daughter of Philip of Macedon, who had fallen into his hands at the ſurrender of Pydna. He next cauſed the bodies of Philip and Eurydice, together with that of Cynane her mother, to be taken up; and, having conveyed them with mighty pomp to Ægis, he cauſed them there to be interred in the royal ſepulchres, inſtituting funeral games in honour honour of the dead. He then built a new city in Pallene, which he called by his own name, Caſſandria, and peopled it from the Cherſoneſe; inviting alſo the remnant of the Olynthians to ſettle therein, adding to this place ſo large and fair a territory, that it quickly grew to be the greateſt city in Macedonia; he alſo re-edified many cities, and ſhewed evidently a diſpoſition to reſtore peace and plenty to his native country. Epirus he governed by Lyciſcus his lieutenant, which was the more extraordinary, becauſe from the days of Pyrrhus to this time the government had been hereditary, and the Epirots had never preſumed to treat their kings with contempt. As to Æacidas, he fled to Polyſperchon, and with him, when things were grown deſperate in Macedon, retired into Greece; and at length to the Ætolians, the implacable enemies of all Antipater's family [d].

[c] Diodor Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Demet. Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

Returns into Greece.

CASSANDER, when he had tolerably ſettled the peace of Macedon, reſolved to return into Greece, in order to drive thence Polyſperchon, his ſon Alexander, and the reſt of his enemies. This reſolution once taken, he raiſed a fine army, and therewith marched down into Theſſaly, where he found the Pylæ ſhut up by the Ætolians. However, he forced the paſs, and came down with his forces into Bœotia, and proceeded to the ruins of Thebes. The ſight of them put him in mind of the power and ſplendor of that antient city, and theſe thoughts eaſily led him to the project of reſtoring it. With this view he recalled all the Thebans who were ſcattered throughout Greece: he requeſted alſo the reſt of the Bæotians to aſſiſt him in ſo good a work, which not only they, but all the cities of Greece, readily did, ſo that in a ſhort ſpace the walls were finiſhed, and the principal ſtreets rebuilt. The ſight of this inſpired the Thebans with ſuch zeal, that they ſent into all countries to recall their friends and relations. Thus, after more than twenty years, Thebes, which had been with great cruelty razed by the Macedonians, was now rebuilt by them. This deſign executed, Caſſander paſſed on to Peloponneſus, out of which Alexander vainly thought to have ſhut him by a wall built croſs the iſthmus. But Caſſander tranſported his army in flat-bottomed boats, and partly by force, partly by treaty, reduced moſt of the cities, and having left a body of troops under under the command of Molychus to guard the iſthmus, he returned back into Macedon.

[d] Diodor. Plut. & Juſt, ubi ſupra.

Where Antigonus ſtirs up a war againſt him.

THE power of Antigonus was about this time become formidable to all the ſucceſſors of Alexander, wherefore they, as in their own defence, united, in order to reduce his power; but as all of them in their turns had been under great obligations to him, they ſent their embaſſadors to compliment him on his ſubduing of Eumenes, and to expoſtulate with him on their grievances. Antigonus heard the reſt with ſome patience; but when the miniſter of Caſſander came to make his demands, he thundered out an anſwer, As for Lyſimachus and Ptolemy, ſaid he, they were always perſons eminently diſtinguiſhed; but who is Caſſander? it cannot ſurely be that vagabond, who was here t'other day imploring my aſſiſtance, on account of the love I bore his father? He then aſſembled his army, and approaching the Macedonian phalanx, entered into a detail of Caſſander's late proceedings: He has, ſays he, countrymen, murdered the mother of our late ſovereign, and at this time holds in priſon his wife and ſon; let him therefore be decreed a publick enemy, unleſs he reſtores them to liberty, and leave it to me to proſecute this traitor as he deſerves. The army to be ſure decreed as Antigonus directed, and, in conſequence of their decree, he immediately ſolicited the Greek cities to drive out Caſſander's garriſons; to perform which, they did not want ſo much the will as the power. However, ſuch troubles were now ſtirred up in Peloponneſus as made Caſſander's preſence abſolutely neceſſary; whereupon leaving Macedonia, after another bruſh with the Ætolians, Caſſander came firſt into Bæotia, and afterwards to the iſthmus, then entering Peloponneſus, he reſettled his affairs as well as he could. Alexander the ſon of Polyſperchon had for ſome time taken ſhelter in the court of Antigonus, where he had fair words and a tolerable ſubſiſtence given him and that was all. But now Antigonus found out that his caſe was the hardeſt, and at the ſame time the moſt equitable, in the world; and therefore, out of mere regard to juſtice, he furniſhed him with five hundred talents, and ſent him with ſome ſhips and men into Peloponneſus, where he quickly raiſed forces, and began to make a figure. Caſſander knowing well the capacity of the man, and verily believing he had enemies enow already, ſent Perpilaus to tell him, him, that Antigonus had an excellent faculty of setting people together by the ears, without caring what became of them afterwards; that five hundred talents was a considerable sum, which he would do well to keep in his pocket; and that as to the command of Peloponnesus, he need not seek it by force, for Cassander was willing to put it into his hands, provided he would renounce his league with Antigonus, who never intended him half so much good. Alexander having considered this proposition, found it too good to be rejected; wherefore he accepted from Cassander the office of captain general of Peloponnesus, quitted the party of Antigonus, and began to settle his province; which, however, he did not live to effect, for while he was endeavouring to suppress Aristodemus, whom Antigonus had made general in his stead, one Alexion, a Sicyonian, treacherously murdered him. His wife Cratesipolis took upon her the command of his army, and having beaten the Sicyonians in a field battle, besieged and took their city, crucified thirty of the most turbulent upon their own walls, and then assumed the sovereignty, which she managed with great prudence, clemency, and justice, being alike courted and feared by all the contending parties. Thus something like a settlement was established in Peloponnesus [c].

Cassander makes war on the Ætolians.

Cassander, observing that the Ætolians were always inclined to take advantage of his affairs, by attacking him at such time as he had other enemies on his hands, resolved to make use of the leisure he now had, to put it out of the power of these people to treat him in this manner for the future. With this view he marched with an army to the confines of Ætolia, yet with no great success, for the Ætolians were so well aware of his intention, that they provided effectually for their own security, so as to prevent his making any impression upon them; yet Cassander, who was a person of great capacity, resolved not to lose all the pains he had taken; when therefore he discovered that the Ætolians could not be reduced by force, he contrived to leave a bridle in their mouths, which should hinder their performing any great exploits for the future. With this view he entered into a negotiation with their old enemies the Acarnanians, whom he took pains to convince, that the disadvantages vantages they were under arose from their living in so many scattered towns, whereby the Ætolians had constant opportunities of despoiling them; by which argument he persuaded them to enlarge the three cities of Stratopolis, Saurion, and Agrinium, and to quit their villages. Then leaving his general Lyciscus in those parts, he marched away to reduce other places [f].

[c] Diodor. Sicul ubi supra.

Afterwards on the Illyrians.

Glaucias was at this time king of the Illyrians, in whom were united two very different qualities, ambition and the love of justice. When his neighbour Æacidas king of Epirus was banished by his subjects, this prince took upon him to preserve his infant son Pyrrhus, without any other view than that of performing a generous action. This immediately embroiled him with Cassander, and in consequence of these broils, Glaucias drew the cities of Apollonia and Epidamnum into alliance with him. Against these cities at this time Cassander moved, and in a short space reduced them; after which he passed the river Hebrus, and fought the Illyrian army under the command of Glaucias, which had been raised for the relief of the before-mentioned cities. After this engagement peace was made between these princes upon these terms, that Cassander should not invade any part of Illyria, and that Glaucias should neither attack him nor any of his confederates. But while the Macedonians were victorious here, his allies the Acarnanians suffered deeply for taking his advice, for the Ætolians, before it was thoroughly fortified, invested the city of Agrinium, and then proceeded to a formal siege. The besieged, finding that they were not able to hold out, capitulated on these terms; that they should be at liberty to retire where-ever they thought fit. But, in breach of this capitulation, the Ætolians most perfidiously attacked them upon their march, and put almost every man of them to the sword. A cruel and unjustifiable act, for which they afterwards paid very dear [g].

Cassander invades Asia.

On his return into Macedonia, Cassander projected a descent in Asia, in order to prevent Antigonus from making any attempts in Greece. These forces marched into Caria, where one Ptolemy commanded for Antigonus. It so happened, that while the troops were in winter quarters, the father of this Ptolemy died, at which his his ſon ſeemed to be under deep concern; and, in order to expreſs it effectually, prepared for his funeral, that it might be celebrated with the utmoſt magnificence. Caſſander's generals being informed of this, immediately detached Eupolemus, one of their number, with eight thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, to lie in ambuſcade, in order to cut off Ptolemy when he ſhould return to his quarters; but he receiving early intelligence of this deſign, not only prevented it, but alſo turned it upon the contrivers: for returning when they leaſt expected it, he in the middle of the night ſurprized the forces of Eupolemus, defeated them entirely, and made that general himſelf priſoner [h]

[f] Id. ibid. [g] Justin. lib. xv. c. 1. Diodor, ubi supra.

Falls alſo on the Ætolians.

THE next year Caſſander ſent a puiſſant army under the command of Philip to fall upon the Ætolians. This general entered Acarnania, and, having effectually ſuccoured his allies, began to haraſs the frontiers of Ætolia, when on a ſudden he received advice, that Æacidas had not only entered Epirus, but by the conſent of the people had reaſcended the throne. Philip upon this immediately entered Epirus, and finding Æacidas there at the head of an army, he attacked and defeated him, taking priſoners fifty of the principal perſons who had been concerned in the reſtoration of the king, whom he ſent away to Caſſander, and then turned again to proſecute the war againſt the Ætolians, who were by this time ready to meet him in the field; for Æacidas himſelf with the remains of his broken troops had joined their army, and had thereby made it more numerous than that of Philip. A battle ſhortly enſued, wherein the Macedonians were victors, Æacidas king of Epirus being ſlain. Afterwards Philip ſo proſecuted the Ætolians, that they were forced to forſake their cities, and fly for refuge to the mountains, whither alſo he purſued them, till he was ſtopped by the ſeverity of the ſeaſon. In Aſia things went not ſo well; whereupon Caſſander reſolved to put an end to the war on that ſide, and by a treaty with Antigonus undertook to reſtore the Greek cities their liberty, and for the future to be his faſt friend; for his ſincere performance of which, he gave up his brother Agathonas for a hoſtage; however, he quickly repented of this treaty, treaty, and having taken care to get his brother rescued from those who should have kept him, he began the war afresh; which exceedingly provoked Antigonus, who sent an army into Greece to restore freedom unto the cities. This compelled Cassander to march thither also, whereupon Antigonus made a quick march into Propontis, with a design to have invaded Macedon. This effectually recalled Cassander, who marched back with all imaginable expedition. This retreat of his out of Greece hurt his affairs there, and at the same time did him no good in Macedon. For Antigonus, finding it impossible for him to persuade the Byzantines to concur with him in his designs, he was constrained to abandon all thoughts of entering the territories of Cassander. He received, however, little pleasure from this news; for upon the heels of it he received advice, that the country about Apollonia and Epidamnus had submitted again to Glaucias, and that the Epirots were inclined to revolt; to which were added advices of a like nature from Athens, where, though the people had never been so well governed as by Demetrius Phalereus, yet they hated him for the sake of his authority, and were inclined to deliver up the city to Antigonus. To these evils Cassander applied the best remedies the situation of his affairs would allow [i].

[h] Id. ibid.

Cassander orders Roxana and her son to be slain.

It was not long before Epirus was all in confusion. Alcetas, who had been banished by his father, was recalled by the people, and made king. Against him Lysiscus, Cassander's general, marched with his army, and engaged his forces several times with different success. At length Cassander himself came in to make an end of the war, which finding more difficult than he had imagined, he clapped up a peace with Alcetas, and left him in quiet possession of his kingdom, which, however, he enjoyed not long; for the Epirots, conceiving him to rule tyrannically, murdered him and his children. All this time Cassander was engaged in a war with Glaucias, in which, however, he had very indifferent success; and at last, finding that he could not reduce Apollonia and Epidamnus, he returned into Macedon, where he did abundance of popular acts, and took all imaginable pains to conciliate the minds of the people. By this time all the commanders of Alexander were grown weary of the wars wars in which they had engaged with each other, and therefore unanimouſly deſiring peace, it was eaſily concluded. The terms of it were, that they ſhould hold all the provinces, of which at the time of its concluſion each of them was poſſeſſed in propriety; that the Greek cities ſhould be left abſolutely free, and that they ſhould be friends and allies of each other. Immediately upon this peace Caſſander reſolved with himſelf to diſpatch out of his way Alexander the ſon of Roxana and his mother; for though he enjoyed the kingdom of Macedon at that time, as much as he could expect to do after the young man was dead, yet he was in continual fear, leſt the Macedonians, who were a reſtleſs unruly people, ſhould on a ſudden grow diſſatisfied with his government, and ſet at liberty the ſon of his maſter. While theſe doubts and fears diſtracted his mind, the Macedonians diſcovered an inclination to do what he ſuſpected; diſcourſing openly of Caſſander's uſurpation, and alledging, that it was now high time for Alexander to take upon himſelf the adminiſtration of his father's kingdom. This was enough to hurry on the ambitious Caſſander to the fatal expedient he had projected. He therefore ſent for Glaucias, whom he had made governor of the caſtle, where he kept Roxana and her ſon, and directed him to put them both to death, commanding alſo, that they ſhould be interred privately, and their deaths for ſome time concealed. This he did to try the temper of the Macedonians; and that uncertain reports might keep them from taking any ſettled reſolution. His policy met with all the ſucceſs he could deſire, and much more than he could reaſonably hope. The Macedonians murmured a little, but, not knowing who they ſhould have recourſe to for a chief, durſt not rebel [k].

[i] Id. ibid.

Caſſander gains Peloponneſus.

CASSANDER, that he might find the ſubjects ſome other topics than his government to diſcourſe of, engaged in a war againſt the Autariates, in favour of the king of Pæonia. Having ſubdued the firſt-mentioned people, he tranſplanted them to the number of twenty thouſand from their native country into the neighbourhood of mount Orbelus, where he aſſigned them lands. About this time Ptolemy, one of the generals of Antigonus, who commanded in Peloponneſus, went over with his whole army to Caſſander, and received from him the ſame commiſſion which he had from his former master. This was a most extraordinary piece of treachery, for Ptolemy was not only the officer of Antigonus, but his nephew, so that he violated at once the ties of gratitude and nature. However, his treason did not remain long unpunished: Ptolemy king of Egypt coming with a fleet upon the coast, sent for this other Ptolemy to come and visit him. On his arrival the king treated him not only with civility, but with kindness and respect. This he repaid with endeavouring to corrupt the soldiers Ptolemy had with him; his head being full of mighty projects for his own interest, to accomplish which he resolved to stick at nothing. When the king found this out, he first caused him to be imprisoned, and afterwards ordered him to be dispatched by a dose of hemlock; of which, whatever he might pretend, Cassander was glad; for he could never trust a man who had betrayed his uncle, and had endeavoured to seduce the troops of a prince who had received him like a friend. But without question, he was sorry that king Ptolemy had incorporated the army, which the other Ptolemy had commanded, into his own, because this was a loss, which fell heavy upon himself, and not easily to be repaired. His thoughts, however, were quickly diverted by the appearance of another storm [l].

[k] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xix. Juſtin. ubi ſupra. Plut. in Demetrio.

Hercules declared king, and afterwards slain.

Polysperchon, who had hitherto lived in Ætolia, rather as a banished man, than as one who pretended to the government of Macedon, of a sudden appeared more formidable than ever. He had engaged Barsina and her son Hercules to leave Asia and come over to Greece; where he received them with great honours, proclaimed Hercules king, and by the help of the Ætolians raised money and an army of twenty thousand men. Cassander assembled an army as soon as he received the news, and marched away to meet the enemy. When the armies were near each other on the frontiers of Ætolia, Cassander sent one of his private agents to Polysperchon to put him in mind, that if the king was restored, himself would be but a servant, though to him he owed his restoration: whereas, if he put him out of the way, he should be declared generalissimo of Peloponnesus, and be acknowledged by Cassander for his coadjutor. These promises had the same effect upon Polysperchon, as they had formerly on his son; he therefore accepted them, and at an enter-entertainment, to which he invited, and afterwards forced the king to come, moſt barbarouſly murdered him. This being performed, Caſſander, according to his promiſe, delivered him four thouſand Macedonian foot and five hundred horſe; owned him for his coadjutor, and left him to take poſſeſſion of Peloponneſus, which, however, was not ſo eaſily effected as he imagined; for the Bœotians, joining with the Peloponneſians, raiſed a formidable army, ſo that he was after all forced to winter in Phocis; from this time forward, knowing nothing but trouble and diſquiet, the juſt reward of his flagitious actions [m].

[l] Diodor. ubi supra.

Caſſander, after much ill-fortune, recovers Greece.

CASSANDER, having now removed out of his way all obſtacles, well hoped that he ſhould enjoy the kingdom, he had bought at ſo dear a price, in peace; but in this he was exceedingly miſtaken, for the Grecians immediately began to plot againſt him, and knowing that it was Antigonus's intereſt rather to have them free than the ſubjects of Caſſander, they applied to him for aſſiſtance. This occaſioned the famous expedition of Demetrius, which we have often mentioned, wherein he expelled Demetrius the Phalerean; in ſhew reſtored the Grecians to liberty, but in truth reduced them under the ſubjection of his father. Extravagant were the honours paid by the Athenians to the victor, and as extravagant the rage they expreſſed againſt Caſſander and his party; that great captain and politician withdrew from a country were he was ſo generally hated, and choſe rather to truſt time, than fortune and his enemies; and when he found diſaſters ſtill crowding upon him, he contented himſelf with leaving garriſons in the cities he ſtill poſſeſſed, and withdrew the groſs of his army into Macedon. After the check which Demetrius received before Rhodes, the Athenians deſerted him, and affected to reſume their antient grandeur, pretending for the future to preſcribe laws, inſtead of receiving them. Not long after Demetrius came again into Greece, and having taken Sicyon from Ptolemy, and the ſtrong caſtle of Corinth from Caſſander, the reſt of the cities ſurrendered without reſiſtance, and their garriſons were immediately incorporated into the army of Antigonus. In this diſtreſs Caſſander, conceiving himſelf to be in the utmoſt danger of ruin, reſolved, if it were poſſible, to make peace with Antigonus, and to that end diſpatched embaſſadors to Demetrius, as alſo his father, but in vain. Theſe princes were ſo elate on account of the victories they had lately obtained, that they would not liſten to any terms of accommodation, but proudly inſiſted on Caſſander's ſubmitting himſelf and his dominions entirely to their pleaſure. He, when he found peace was not to be had, determined to make his laſt effort in war. To this end he ſent miniſters to Ptolemy and Lyſimachus, inſtructing them to ſhew thoſe princes, that if once Macedonia fell into the hands of Antigonus, they might be ſure Thrace and Egypt would quickly follow. For he would be then able to act againſt them on all ſides; and to the force of all Aſia would add the weight of Greece. This had its deſired effect, they came immediately into the war, and reſolved to act offenſively againſt Antigonus [n].

[m] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. lib. xv. Plut. de Verecund.

The war ended. Year after the flood 2698. Before Chriſt 301.

WHEN the operations of this war came to be conſidered, Caſſander, who knew his ſtake would be the firſt drawn, laid down ſuch a ſcheme as all the reſt came readily into. He ſent a conſiderable part of his forces to join Lyſimachus, under whoſe command they were to paſs into Aſia, whither Caſſander had tranſported another corps under the command of Perpelaus. With the reſt of his army Caſſander marched in perſon towards Theſſaly, in order, if poſſible, to ſettle his affairs in Greece. Demetrius immediately marched to meet him, and the armies encamped in ſight of each other; that of Demetrius conſiſted of fifteen hundred horſe, eight thouſand Macedonian foot, five and twenty thouſand auxiliary foot, fifteen thouſand mercenaries, and about eight thouſand retainers to the camp who were, however, diſpoſed into battalions; in all fifty-ſix thouſand men. Caſſander had but two thouſand horſe, and twenty-nine thouſand foot: With theſe he kept the field, protected moſt of his garriſons, and held the war in ſuſpenſe, till ſuch time as Antigonus ſent orders to his ſon to come ſpeedily over into Aſia; whereupon a proviſional treaty was made by Demetrius with Caſſander, which was to ſubſiſt, or to be made void, according as it was approved or diſapproved by Antigonus. However, it anſwered the ends of both; for Demetrius had had thereby an opportunity given him of withdrawing all his forces out of Greece, and after he was gone, Caſſander, notwithſtanding the treaty, by force, by perſuaſion, and by bribes, got poſſeſſion of many of the cities. Yet he did not ſo cloſely attend his own buſineſs, but that he kept his eye alſo on the concerns of his confederates. To their aſſiſtance Caſſander ſent his brother Pliſtarchus with twelve thouſand men, in order to balance in ſome meaſure the forces carried over by Demetrius to his father. His policy was good, as in moſt caſes it was; but Pliſtarchus had very ill ſucceſs, for his army being waſted by famine, ſickneſs, hardſhips, ſhipwrecks, and deſertions, he at laſt, with a handful of men, joined Lyſimachus, who, with the mighty forces brought by Seleucus, was grown ſtrong enough to offer Antigonus and Demetrius battle; which ſhortly after enſued, and was the famous battle of Ipſus, where Antigonus loſt his life and empire.

[n] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xx. Plut. in Demetrio.

The death of Caſſander. Year after the flood 2781. Before Chriſt 218.

On the death of Antigonus, the princes confederated againſt him divided his dominions amongſt them, whereby Caſſander recovered all that he had lately loſt; however, he was not entirely freed from all apprehenſions; for on the one hand, Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus had ſtill ſome territories in Greece, and was a prince who never conceived his title at all affected by the impreſſions made by force on his poſſeſſions. The hopes of Demetrius therefore filled Caſſander with fears: on the other hand, Caſſander had a nearer enemy, of whoſe power he was very juſtly jealous; this was Pyrrhus king of Epirus, whom he had hated, and perſecuted from his very cradle. This prince, then a little helpleſs infant, was at the time the Epirots revolted from his father, who would have led them into Macedonia to the relief of Olympias, conveyed with much difficulty into the dominions of Glaucias king of Illyria. That king was not a little confounded at this accident; pity moved him for the child, but he was afraid of incurring the hate of Caſſander. Thoſe who had the care of little Pyrrhus, perceiving the confuſion the king was in, laid the boy at his feet. The child getting hold of the king's robes, raiſed himſelf up upon his feet, and with his hands graſped the king's knees. Upon which, Glaucias taking him in his arms, profeſſed that he would defend him at the hazard of his life and his dominions; and then delivered him to his queen to be educated with his own children. This was the ſource of Caſſander's quarrel with Glaucias, againſt whom, as often as his affairs permitted, he employed force; and when he was conſtrained to turn his arms another way, he practiſed on him by negotiation, offering him two hundred talents beſides other great advantages, if he would deliver the young Pyrrhus into his hands. But Glaucias could neither be beaten nor flattered into ſo baſe a deſign; but when he was twelve years old, reſtored Pyrrhus by an army to the poſſeſſion of the throne of his anceſtors. From thence, about five years afterwards, he was driven by his rebellious ſubjects. He then fled to Demetrius, who had married his ſiſter Deidamia, and was in point of intereſt the irreconcileable enemy of Caſſander. After the battle of Ipſus, he came over into Greece, and performed many great exploits in favour of his brother-in-law; when his ſubjects growing weary of a ſudden of Neoptolemus, a king of their own ſetting up, recalled and reſtored him, then to prevent further diſputes, he aſſociated Neoptolemus with him in the kingdom; but afterwards ſlew him for having framed a conſpiracy to poiſon him °. This Pyrrhus, though ill at eaſe in his own kingdom, Caſſander was mightily afraid of; however, he ſtrengthened the frontiers of his own dominions, re-edified ſuch cities as were run to decay, and built new ones, where the ſituation of the places invited. Thus near Therma he raiſed the noble city of Theſſalonica, which he ſo called in honour of his wife, and which after became the moſt conſiderable place in Macedon. He likewiſe endeavoured by all other means to fix the love of his ſubjects to his family, being with very juſt reaſon afraid of the inconſtancy of the Macedonians. But while he was thus employed, he was ſeized with a dropſy, which brought him by ſlow degrees to his end; and ſome ſay, that at laſt his body, as it corrupted, breeding lice, he became alike offenſive to himſelf, and to all who were obliged to approach him. His death happened after he had held the government of Macedon nineteen years: and had ruled it three years with the title of king, which he received readily from others, but took not himſelf; he was a man of conſummate prudence in peace and in war, but of deteſtable deteſtable ambition. He is ſaid to have hated Alexander perſonally ; to have remembered him with fear and ſpight, and to have ſuffered his malice againſt him to inſtigate the utter extirpation of his family (C). By Theſſalonica, the daughter of Philip of Macedon, he had three ſons, Philip, Antipater, and Alexander ; the eldeſt of theſe, viz. Philip, ſucceeded him, but died ſhortly after of a conſumption, whereby a way was opened to a long and fatal controverſy about the kingdom [P].

° Plut. in Demet. & in Pyrrho.

ANTIPATER

[P] Juſtin. lib. xvi. Plut in Demet.

(C) We learn from Plutarch the following circumſtances as to the hatred which Caſſander bore Alexander, and the cauſes thereof. It happened, when Caſſander was juſt arrived from Greece, and was full of that freedom in which he bad been educated, the firſt time he ſaw the Barbarians adore the king, he was ſurpriſed at the novelty of the thing, and could not forbear laughing out aloud at it ; which ſo incenſed Alexander, that he took him by the hair with both hands, and violently knocked his head againſt the wall. Another time Caſſander would have ſaid ſomething in defence of Antipater to thoſe who accuſed him ; but Alexander interrupting him, What is it you ſay ? Do you think people, if they have received no injury, would come ſuch a journey only to calumniate your father ? To which when Caſſander replied, that this very thing was a great evidence of their calumny, for the farther they are come, the farther they are got from thoſe proofs that could confute them, and clear the innocent ; Alexander ſmiled at this, and ſaid, Thoſe are ſome of Ariſtotle's ſophiſms which will ſerve equally on both ſides ; but, added he, both you and your father ſhall be ſeverely puniſhed, if it appears that the complainants have received the leaſt injuſtice at your hands. This menace made ſuch a deep impreſſion of fear on Caſſander's mind, that long after, when he was king of Macedonia and maſter of all Greece, as he was walking one day at Delphi, and looking on the ſtatues, at the ſight of that of Alexander, he was ſuddenly ſtruck with horror, and ſhook all over, his eyes rolled, his head grew dizzy, and he had much ado to recover himſelf (6).

(6) Plutarch in vit. Alexand.

Antipater and Alexander kings of Macedon.

Antipater, on the demiſe of his brother Philip, cauſed himſelf to be declared king; but herein he found himſelf oppoſed by his brother Alexander, who was ſupported in his pretenſions by ſome of the Macedonian lords, and ſecretly, as Antipater conceived, by the queen his mother. The firſt ſtep therefore that he took, to ſecure himſelf againſt Alexander was, to take away the life of Theſſalonica, which, if he did not with his own hands, he permitted to be done in his preſence, though ſhe beſought him by the breaſts that had given him ſuck to ſpare her. A fact beyond all example cruel. After this, by the aſſiſtance of Lyſimachus his father-in-law, he for ſome time maintained himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the kingdom. But Alexander, perſiſting in the competition, and vehemently deſiring to revenge his mother's death, invited Pyrrhus king of Epirus, and alſo Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus, to his aſſiſtance. Pyrrhus came firſt with a potent army, and did him ſuch ſervice, that for it he demanded and received all the maritime coaſts of Macedonia, together with Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. He then applied himſelf to conquer the reſt of the kingdom, that Alexander might have no occaſion to repent of his bargain; upon which Antipater and his wife Eurydice ſtrongly ſolicited Lyſimachus to aſſiſt them. His affairs were at that time in ſuch diſorder, that he could not in prudence ſpare any part of his forces; however, knowing that Ptolemy had a mighty influence over Pyrrhus, and that his requeſts had the force of laws, he forged a letter from him to Pyrrhus deſiring him on the payment of three hundred talents to leave Antipater half the kingdom. This deceit Pyrrhus eaſily detected; for whereas Ptolemy was wont to addreſs his letters thus: The father to the ſon greeting, this letter ran, king Ptolemy to king Pyrrhus health; however, it did the buſineſs as well as if it had been a true letter, for he, perceiving that money might be had, ſtruck up an agreement between the two brothers, to which, however, he would not ſwear, becauſe one of the three victims died as it was led to the altar at the time of the performance of this ſolemnity; whence the ſoothſayer predicted, that one of the kings would ſhortly die. Immediately after this agreement, whereby two kings ſeemed to be eſtabliſhed in Macedon, Demetrius arrived on its frontiers, in order to have aſſiſted Alexander. The young prince, know-knowing how largely he had paid Pyrrhus, was afraid of having more protectors upon his hands; wherefore he poſted away to meet Demetrius, in order to inform him of what had happened, and to decline his aid, which he no longer wanted. In the former chapter we have ſhewn the iſſue of this buſineſs, how Alexander was ſlain, and how Demetrius gained the kingdom. Here, however, it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that it is in a manner impoſſible to know the truth as to Alexander's death; that is, whether Demetrius ſlew him on account of his having conſpired againſt himſelf, or whether he invented that ſtory to colour the murder of the young king. The authority of Plutarch is on all ſides of the queſtion in the life of Demetrius; he affirms, that Alexander intended to have ſlain him, and that he prevented it by a day; in another place he in general terms relates this accident as an act of treachery in Demetrius [q]; yet elſewhere he particularly aſcribes the death of Alexander to his modeſty, in not refuſing to viſit Demetrius when he invited him, for fear he ſhould ſeem to diſtruſt him [r]. However it was, Alexander was ſlain, and Demetrius with his forces and his own compelled Antipater to leave him ſole maſter of the kingdom, who thereupon fled to the court of his father-in-law Lyſimachus, hoping by his aſſiſtance to be reſtored. But there were two reaſons why Lyſimachus, if he had been better inclined to him than he was, could not have yielded him any great help. The firſt, that he was engaged in foreign wars: The ſecond, that there were great diſſenſions in his family. To this we may add, that he was afraid of uniting Demetrius and Pyrrhus; whereas he well hoped, that if they were left to themſelves, they would quickly fall out, which he intimated to his ſon-in-law, and exhorted him to be patient. Antipater and Eurydice, however could not comprehend the force of that reaſoning, and therefore they clamoured loudly againſt that what they called his neglect of his children. Lyſimachus, who was a fierce and arbitrary prince, thought fit thereupon to impriſon them both, and a-while after directed Antipater to be put to death in priſon. Thus the whole race of Caſſander was exterminated almoſt as ſoon as he was dead [s].

DEMEM-

[q] Plutarch in vit. Pyrrh. [r] De Verecund. [s] Juſtin. lib. xvi. c. 1. Plut. in Demet. & Pyrrh.

Demetrius becomes king of Macedonia. Year after the flood 2705. Year before Christ 294.

DEMETRIUS, from being in very low and desperate circumstances, was now become more potent than Cassander had been; for with the kingdom of Macedon he held Thessaly, the best part of Peloponnesus, and the two great cities of Megara and Athens. He thereupon resolved to make himself master of all Greece; in order to which he turned his arms first against the Bæotians, who on his coming were inclined to submit to him; but Cleonymus the Spartan engaged them to stand out, which occasioned the siege ot Thebes, of which Pithis a Thespian was governor. When Cleonymus saw the prodigious engines which Demetrius made use of, he was so frightened, that he would have had the Thebans immediately to surrender, which Pisis refused, and made a very gallant defence, till Cleonymus withdrew himself, which so intimidated the people, that he was forced to give up the city. Demetrius dealt very gently with the Thebans, appointed Hieronymus, the good old friend of Eumenes, governor of Bæotia; and sending for his prisoner Pisis, he highly commended his valour, and then sent him to govern his countrymen the Thespians. The king then returned into Macedon, where he was guilty of a very mean act; for hearing that Lysimachus was taken prisoner by the king of the Getæ, he immediately advanced with a great army to the frontiers of Thrace, hoping to subdue his dominions in his absence. But before he was able to make any impression, Lysimachus was restored to liberty, and Demetrius recalled by the defection of the Bæotians whom he had so lately subdued. Antigonus his son had, on the first advice of the revolt, led the forces left with him against them, and having routed them in battle, shut up the remains of their army in Thebes to which he laid siege. Thither Demetrius came with the gross of his army out of Macedon; but he had not been there long before he received news of an irruption made by Pyrrhus into Thessaly, upon which he marched to oppose him, and left his son Antigonus to carry on the siege. Before Demetrius arrived in that country, Pyrrhus was withdrawn; he therefore contented himself with the leaving ten thousand foot and a thousand horse to the guard of Thessaly, and then returned with the rest of his army for Thebes. Antigonus, who had continued the siege all this while, perceiving that through the obstinate defence which was made by the besieged, ſieged, numbers of his men were ſlain, could not help one day ſpeaking to his father in this manner; I beſeech you, Sir, to conſider what reaſon there is you ſhould expoſe ſo many of your valiant ſoldiers to continual danger, when—Ay, ſweet Sir, interrupted Demetrius, what reaſon have you to afflict yourſelf? Don't you know that the more there are killed here, the fewer you will have to provide for? This he ſaid in his paſſion; but when he was in a cooler temper, he alledged the ingratitude of the Thebans as the true cauſe of his perſiſting in the ſiege, in which he expoſed his perſon as much as the meaneſt ſoldier, till in one of the attacks he received a ſtroke of a javelin quite through his neck, whereby his life was extremely endangered. However he refuſed to ſtir, till at length the Thebans, quite tired out, were conſtrained to ſurrender at diſcretion. Then it was, that they expected a deſolation as general as that which happened thirty years before, when Alexander deſtroyed their city. But it proved quite otherwiſe; Demetrius ordered thirteen perſons who were principally concerned in the revolt to be put to death, and received all the reſt of the citizens into his favour. He afterwards celebrated the feſtival of the Pythian Apollo at Athens, becauſe the Ætolians had ſhut up the paſſages to Delphi, ſo that he could not go thither [t].

The ill conduct of Demetrius loſes him the affections of his people.

When Demetrius returned into Macedonia, he diſcovered ſuch a reſtleſs uneaſy temper in his ſubjects, that he was conſtrained to think of employing them in ſome war, to prevent their making an ill uſe of peace. With this view he marched againſt the Ætolians, but before he could come to an engagement he had advice, that Pyrrhus was about to invade Macedon. To oppoſe him he marched in perſon, and left Pantauchus to command the forces he thought ſufficient to bridle the Ætolians. Demetrius and Pyrrhus both miſſed their intentions: the former, paſſing by the latter without knowing of it, entered Epirus without oppoſition, waſting and plundering the country where-ever he came, till he had ſatiated the avarice of his ſoldiers, and, as he conceived, had fully revenged himſelf for what Pyrrhus had done in Theſſaly. In the mean time Pyrrhus engaged Pantauchus the general of Demetrius, whom on a challenge

[t] Plut. in vit. Demet Pauſan. in Bœoticis.

lenge given he encountered hand to hand, and, after an obſtinate combat, wounded and diſmounted him. The battle alſo ended in his favour, wherein after cutting to pieces a multitude of Macedonians, he took five thouſand priſoners. This loſs was in itſelf a great mortification to Demetrius, but in its conſequences was far more detrimental than he either foreſaw, or than the thing itſelf ſeemed to indicate. Upon the return of Demetrius, Pyrrhus retired haſtily into his own dominions: but from the time that the Macedonians had beheld this prince fighting hand to hand with their general, they continually, talked of him as a prodigy of valour, and amongſt other praiſes, this was perpetually in their mouths; that the other kings reſembled Alexander in his robes, his quick tone of voice, and the turn of his neck; but that in Pyrrhus they ſaw his vivacity in fight, and his courteous behaviour towards his ſoldiers. At firſt perhaps Demetrius did not mind this, or, it may be, was never made acquainted with it. Certain it is, that his conduct tended ſtrongly to alienate the minds of his ſubjects: in his garb he was vain to exceſs; his robes ſeemed fitter for a ſtage than a court; his head was enriched with the novelty of a double diadem; and his very ſhoes ſhone not only with gold, but with precious ſtones. In ſhort the garment of his, which was left unfiniſhed, and wherein he intended to have had the whole univerſe diſplayed, remained for ages after a monument of his pride, and of the modeſty of his ſucceſſors, who neither wore it, or ſo much as ſuffered it to be finiſhed. His conduct was abſurd and extravagant; he ſpent his time in revelling with women and paraſites, waſted away immenſe ſums of money, and ſet the nobility of Macedon a moſt ſcandalous example. His behaviour alſo was remarkably altered; for, inſtead of that kind and obliging deportment, by which he had formerly attached the minds of all men to his perſon, he grew humourſome at leaſt, if not moroſe, affecting to treat every body with diſdain, and to put on ſuch airs of inſolence as were inſupportable. He ſuffered the Athenian embaſſadors to wait two years before he gave them audience, and one day when he had graciouſly condeſcended to receive all the petitions that were offered him, at his return to his palace he opened his robe, and ſuffered them all to fall into the river Axius. This effectually loſt him the hearts of the Macedonians, who from that day forward wiſhed for another maſter. Some ſmall time after he fell ſick of a fever at

Pella,

Pella, induced by hard drinking, and while he ſtruggled with the violence of the diſtemper, Pyrrhus entered his dominions with an army, and penetrated as far as Edeſſa. He might have poſſeſſed himſelf of the whole kingdom, if he had known how much the Macedonians were diſpleaſed with their king, and how far they were prejudiced in favour of himſelf; but plunder was all he ſought; and when his ſoldiers had loaded themſelves, he had thoughts of retiring. Demetrius, ſick as he was, quitted his bed, and mounted on horſeback: ſome of his friends drew together immediately ſome troops; and at the head of theſe he marched againſt Pyrrhus, who avoided a battle by a quick retreat. As ſoon as the king returned into Macedon, he determined to put an end to the difference between himſelf and his brother-in-law. To this end he ſent embaſſadors who were kindly received, and the treaty they were ſent to negotiate quickly concluded. This point once got over, Demetrius raiſed a powerful army, and led it againſt Lyſimachus; but before he reached his confines, Pyrrhus, at the perſuaſion of Ptolemy, invaded Macedon, and marched ſtrait to Bercœa. This brought Demetrius and his army back to oppoſe him, but when they were encamped over-againſt each other, Pyrrhus was adviſed by deſerters that his ſoldiers were inclined to deſert Demetrius, and to revolt to himſelf. To try their temper therefore, he rode out of the city near the camp with his head bare, but finding none came over to him, he expreſſed his ſurprize to the deſerters, who adviſed him to put on his helmet; which when he had done, and the Macedonians perceived by the plume that it was Pyrrhus, they came out to him in throngs and ſaluted him king. Demetrius, finding himſelf deſerted, retired privately to Caſſandria, having loſt a kingdom as unaccountably as he found it [u].

Demetrius loſes Macedon.

PYRRHUS doubted not his holding the crown he had acquired, without diſpute at leaſt with any one but Demetrius, but he had ſcarce time to flatter himſelf with theſe expectations before another competitor appeared; for Lyſimachus, having raiſed an army to oppoſe Demetrius, as ſoon as he had heard what had befallen him, marched ſtrait into Macedon, and advanced towards Pyrrhus, from whom he demanded half the kingdom for his ſhare, alledging, that Demetrius [u] Plut. in Demetrio.

Demetrius had been compelled to fly by his approach. Pyrrhus, who was very ſenſible that his claim had not the leaſt foundation, yielded, however, to his requeſt, deſiring rather to have him his friend and collegue upon any terms, than to have to deal with him as an enemy, knowing the ficklenefs of the Macedonians, and remembering that Lyſimachus was their countryman. Each then took a part of the kingdom of Macedon, not to content himſelf but his partner, for each privately deſigned to make himſelf maſter of the whole [w].

Pyrrhus becomes king of Macedon. Year after the flood 2712. Before Chriſt 287.

Pyrrhus, now king of Macedon, thought the ſmall remains of empire which his brother Demetrius retained in Greece, were juſt appendices to his kingdom, and therefore could not enjoy in peace what with ſo much pains he acquired, till he had conſidered of ſome method for outing that unfortunate prince and his ſon of what their ill fortune had left them. In order to this he commenced a war, in which he gained the quiet poſſeſſion of Athens, whither he went to ſacrifice, and being received with all the teſtimonies of kindneſs and reſpect by the citizens, he gave them thanks with great civility; but at the ſame time told them, that he believed it would be for their ſafety, if for the future they made it a rule with them not to admit ſovereign princes into their city upon any terms. This he ſaid to furniſh them with a pretence for excluding Demetrius; a mean and ſcandalous contrivance to deprive him of a retreat, when he had deprived him of a kingdom. But he was quickly puniſhed for his own ambition by the ambition of his neighbour; for when Lyſimachus was at leiſure from other wars, he immediately came pouring into Macedon with a very numerous army. In the firſt place he carried off ſome convoys, whereby he diſtreſſed the army of Pyrrhus: in the next he cauſed manifeſtos to be ſcattered through the kingdom, complaining of the injury they did to the Macedonian name, by accepting a foreigner for their king to the excluſion of him who was a native, and who had been a principal commander in their armies, when under the auſpice of Alexander they acquired the command of the world. Theſe arguments were plauſible enough to furniſh with a pretence for rebellion a people who were prone to it. In ſhort Pyrrhus ſaw himſelf reduced to the ſame neceſſity to which he had reduced Demetrius, and was was conſtrained to leave Lyſimachus by flight a kingdom which himſelf had ſtolen. One would have conceived, that, having this leiſure, he would have fallen upon Antigonus the ſon of Demetrius, who reſided at Corinth, and had many cities under his juriſdiction in Peloponneſus and the reſt of Greece. But either Pyrrhus was afraid of acquiring the ſovereignty of ſo fickle a people, or elſe he willingly left Antigonus behind him, in hopes that he might create Lyſimachus ſome trouble. However it was, he choſe to ſail into Italy to acquire new kingdoms, and laid aſide all thoughts of Grecian conqueſts, till a more convenient ſeaſon, which we ſhall hereafter ſee dawn upon him when he leaſt expected it [x].

[w] Plut. in Pyrrho. Juſtin. lib. xvi. c. 3.

Lyſimachus acquires the kingdom. Year after the flood 2714. Year before Chriſt 285.

Lysimachus, who had now Macedonia to himſelf, as well as the provinces he had held ſince the diviſion of Alexander's empire, might, if he had pleaſed, ſat down ſatisfied and contented, having alſo fifteen children living to be the comforts of his old age. But ſo it was, that, like the fair city Lyſimachia, which he had built and called by his own name, and which was ſwallowed up by an earthquake, he ſuddenly ſaw himſelf and his fortunes, his foreign and domeſtic hopes, not only turned upſide down, but deſtroyed for ever. His eldeſt ſon Agathocles, a prince of great hopes, becauſe of great prudence and greater humanity, he had married to Lyſandra the daughter of Ptolemy by Eurydice the daughter of Antipater, and ſome time after himſelf married Arſinoe the daughter alſo of Ptolemy by Berenice, a widow lady, who had accompanied his wife Eurydice into Egypt as her friend. Theſe ladies, Eurydice, Berenice, Lyſandra, and Arſinoe, introduced ſcenes of blood and confuſion into both courts. In that of Ptolemy firſt, Berenice procured a preference to be given to her children, to the prejudice of thoſe of her miſtreſs; whereupon Ptolemy Ceraunus, the king's eldeſt ſon, fled to the court of Lyſimachus, where he was kindly received by his brother-in-law Agathocles and his ſiſter Lyſandra. But in this court he found Arſinoe the daughter of his implacable mother-in-law, as powerful and more cruel than ſhe. This lady infuſed it into her huſband's head, that his ſon, his eldeſt ſon Agathocles, who had conquered for him half his empire, and in whom the army and people had their hopes bound up, was ſecretly his his enemy; upon which the hapleſs young prince was firſt impriſoned, and then poiſoned. A fact which ſtruck not only the family, but all the ſubjects of Lyſimachus with horror, and the fright of which induced Lyſandra to fly, with her children and her brother Ptolemy Ceraunus, to Seleucus, where they found not only a civil, but a kind reception. Many of the officers in Lyſimachus's army, and ſome of the principal lords of his court followed them, and all concurred in beſeeching him to make war upon this unnatural parent, who, vexed with the reflections made on what he had already done, became every day more and more cruel. Seleucus, though he was ſeventy-ſeven years old, had ſtill all the vigour and activity of a young man: He therefore lent a willing ear to theſe inſinuations, the rather, becauſe he had no rival left, but Lyſimachus, and him once ſubdued, he ſaw no cauſe to doubt that his own empire might be extended as far as that of Alexander his maſter. Inſtantly therefore he fell upon the dominions of Lyſimachus in Aſia, and ſtript him of them almoſt as ſoon as he attacked them; but before he could tranſport an army into Europe, Lyſimachus paſſing the Helleſpont, met him at Corupedion in Phrygia with a gallant army, where, in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age, Lyſimachus, having firſt loſt all his children except two, fell in the field, and left the victory with his kingdoms to Seleucus, juſtly ſirnamed Nicator, or the conqueror [y].

[x] Juſtin. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra.

Seleucus aſſumes the title of king.

Led by a warm deſire of taking poſſeſſion of Macedonia, as ſoon as the ſeaſon permitted, Seleucus paſſed the Helleſpont, and with his army advanced as far as Lyſimachia in Thrace. In the neighbourhood of this city, he obſerved as he marched an old altar, concerning which he aſked certain queſtions, whence he learned that it was called Argos, at which he was exceedingly ſurprized; for he had been warned by an oracle to have a care of Argos, which hitherto he thought had referred to Argos in Peloponneſus. But while by farther queſtions he ſought to ſift into this matter, Ptolemy Ceraunus, whom he had ſo generouſly relieved, for whoſe ſake he had commenced this war, and whom, after ſettling his own affairs in Macedonia, cedonia, he intended by force to have restored to his father's kingdom, came behind him, and basely thrust him through, so that in seven months space, and by a violent death also, he followed Lysimachus, having so long worn the title of king of Macedon [z].

[y] Appian in Syriacis. Memnon. ap. Phot. Cod. ccxxiv. c. 9. Juſtin. lib. xvii. c. 1—2.

Ptolemy Ceraunus having performed this execrable deed, escaped away to Lysimachia, where having got about him a band of his companions, he put on a diadem, and boldly declared himself king of Macedon. We do not find it very clearly laid down, by what title he desired to hold his crown; however, he made use of many pretences to gain him friends. To those whom he discerned to be lovers of the house of Antipater, he observed, that he was his grandson. To such as were to the last loyal to Lysimachus, I am, said he, his avenger. To all he made vast promises, and, which must appear most singular, he was believed by all; so that the army and people accepted him as lawful king; the city of Cassandria only standing out. Three enemies he had to deal with, who all threatened him at the same time; Antiochus the son of Seleucus, on account of the murder of his father; Antigonus the son of Demetrius, who claimed the kingdom of Macedon as his hereditary right; and Pyrrhus king of Epirus, who, though fully bent on his Italian expedition, would needs have before he went some satisfaction for the kingdom of Macedonia. Antigonus, being nearest at hand, came with a fleet and army to dispute with Ptolemy the possession of his new acquired dominions; the latter, superior both in naval and land-forces, engaged, and routed him. Thus delivered from one rival, he had art enough to rid himself without fighting from the other two. Antiochus he pacified by fair words. To Pyrrhus he lent five thousand foot, four thousand horse, and fifty elephants for two years, whereupon Pyrrhus married his daughter, and appointed him protector of his dominions in his absence. All this so well brought about, the new king of Macedon wrote to his brother Ptolemy Philadelphus, telling him, that he acquiesced in his father's disposition of his paternal kingdom, being satisfied with that which he had honourably obtained by the death of his father's enemy. Next he applied himself to his sister Arsinoe the widow of Lysimachus, who had obliged him to fly from the court of her husband. She was possessed of the strong castle and rich city of Cassandria, where she resided with her two sons. Ptolemy's suit to her was, that, forgetting all former quarrels, she would remember her near relation to him, and consent to share the kingdom with him, promising to marry her, and to adopt her children. She, credulous as she was, readily embraced the offer, and in consequence thereof put Ptolemy in possession of the city of Cassandria; where on the very day of the nuptials, Ptolemy caused her two sons to he slain, and turned herself out attended only by two maid-servants, to lead a solitary life in Samo-Thrace, from whence she afterwards passed into Egypt, where she married her other brother Ptolemy Philadelphus, who for her sake divorced and banished Arsinoe daughter of Lysimachus. Ptolemy now looked upon himself as thoroughly fixed in the Macedonian throne; but he had not sat on it above a year before a people he had scarce heard of sent to demand of him a tribute. These were the Gauls, who with three different armies broke into Pannonia, Thracia, and Macedon. This last corps was commanded by Belgius, who sent deputies to Ptolemy Ceraunus, to enquire of him in few words, how much money he would give for peace. Ptolemy, proud of his own performances, and not at all doubting the fidelity of the Macedonians against these barbarous invaders, slighted the message, and returned for answer, that unless the principal officers of their army were given up to him for hostages, he would not allow it to them. The Gauls in their turn, derided the haughtiness of this rash monarch, and marched immediately against him with a mighty army of horse and foot. Ptolemy failed not to meet them with the whole force of Macedon, and a battle was fought with obstinacy on both sides. At last Ptolemy being much wounded, was thrown by his elephant, and taken prisoner. The Barbarians shewed him as little pity as he had shewn others; for those who took him tore him to pieces, and then exalting his head on the top of a pike, his army were so intimidated that they immediately began to break, and were soon after surrounded and cut to pieces. This misfortune was wholly owing to the confidence of Ptolemy, whose army was overthrown, not so much by the valour as by the multitude of their enemies; enemies; for whom they would have been at leaſt a more equal match, if he had not refuſed twenty thouſand men offered him by the king of the Dardanians with this proud boaſt, that he had an army compoſed of the children of thoſe with whom Alexander, had ſubdued the eaſt. This miſerable end had Ptolemy himſelf, after he had been a king no more than eighteen months [a].

Ptolemy becomes king of Macedon. Year after the flood 2681. Before Christ 218.

[z] Justin ubi supra. Memnon. ubi supra. Pausan. in Atticis.

Meleager, Antipater, and Softhenes.

THE Macedonians in this diſtreſs knew not well what to do, either in reſpect to the preſervation of their country, or the choice of a king. Meleager the brother of Ptolemy was at hand; him therefore they ſaluted king, but finding with the name they were not able to beſtow on him the qualities requiſite to a monarch, after two months they deprived him, and in his ſtead exalted Antipater the ſon of Philip, the brother of Caſſander. Upon him they beſtowed the ſirname of Eteſian, becauſe he governed but forty-five days, during which time the Eteſian winds blew. Then an interregnum followed; the Gauls making havock of every thing, till Softhenes, a young nobleman of great merit, collected as well as he could a body of able youths, and having diſciplined them, and brought them by degrees to a tolerable knowledge in military diſcipline, he with them, taking proper ſeaſons and all the advantages reſulting from the thorough knowledge of the country, greatly haraſſed and at length totally deſtroyed the Gauls, and, as is generally believed, ſlew Belgius their commander. Theſe noble exploits might well have intitled him to the kingdom, if his modeſty had not induced him to refuſe regal honours. He cauſed the ſoldiers to ſwear to him as their general, and with that title ruled happily in Macedon for two years. About the end of that time came a new inundation of Gauls under the command of Brennus, and broke into this country. His army conſiſted of one hundred and forty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe, beſides an innumerable train of retainers. Softhenes bore up againſt him with great courage, till himſelf and his army were overwhelmed with numbers; then they ruined and pillaged all the country, till being quite ſated with booty, or rather finding there was nothing more to be had, and having received vaſt recruits from Gaul and

[a] Juſtin. lib. xxiv. 3—5. Memnon. ap. Phot. ubi ſupra.

Illyria, they left Macedonia, and poured down into Greece [b].

Antigonus Gonatus restored.

Sosthenes being dead and the kingdom of Macedon deserted by the Gauls, Antigonus Gonatus, so called from the place of his birth, revived his claim to the kingdom, as son to Demetrius Poliorcetes; but he was opposed by Antiochus Soter the son of Seleucus Nicator, who also pretended title to the kingdom, in right of his father who had conquered it, though he never possessed it. Antigonus, who had already reigned ten years in Peloponnesus, came with a great fleet and army and took possession of the kingdom, before his rival was in any condition to contest it with him; yet this did not at all discourage Antiochus from prosecuting his claim; for he immediately raised a great army, and threatened to transport it from Asia into Europe. It so happened, that during this dispute Nicomedes king of Bithynia entered into a treaty with Antigonus for their mutual defence; whereupon Antiochus carried the war on into his kingdom, which he invaded with a powerful army; yet there happened no decisive action, but after the armies had for some time observed each other, a treaty was made, whereby all these differences were adjusted. Antigonus married Phila the daughter of Seleucus by Stratonice the sister of Antigonus himself, and as his lady was half-sister and daughter-in-law to Antiochus, he resigned his right to the kingdom of Macedon to Antigonus on account of the marriage. Being now peaceable possessor of the kingdom of Macedon, he applied himself with all imaginable industry to the restoring of the towns and villages which had been ruined by the Gauls. But while he was intent upon such matters, the Gauls threatened another invasion; but before they entered his country, they sent to him as they had to Ptolemy Ceraunus, to know if he was inclined to purchase peace, for they were well informed that he had brought a great treasure out of Peloponnesus. Antigonus entertained the embassadors splendidly, and having shewn them his camp, his army, and his treasures, told them, these were not designed to be given away, but to be employed for the just defence of his subjects. When these deputies returned

[b] Justin. ubi supra. Diodor. Sicul. excerpt. lib. xxii.

ed home, and had reported not only the king's anſwer, but alſo what ſplendid things they had ſeen in his camp, the Gauls were impatient to go and take poſſeſſion of all the fine things they talked of; for though they were but fifteen thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, yet they made no queſtion of ſubduing Antigonus, as they had done ſome of his predeceſſors. That they might perform this the more eaſily, they made forced marches in order to ſurprize him; but Antigonus, being aware of their intent, withdrew his forces into a wood, and ſo avoided an engagement: however, the Gauls rifled his camp, and then proceeded to plunder his ſhips; but the ſeamen and ſoldiers on board, perceiving that they obſerved no order, and that they were quite intoxicated with ſucceſs, fell upon them and cut off numbers of them. In the mean time Antigonus and his ſoldiers being appriſed of what had happened, they alſo attacked the Gauls in the rear, and gained over them ſo complete a victory, as for the preſent eſtabliſhed Antigonus firmly on the throne. But before he had time to perform what he endeavoured, the reſtoring of the kingdom to its antient luſtre, he had another enemy upon his hands, more formidable than the Gauls, viz. Pyrrhus king of Epirus, who, returning with the ſhattered remains of an army from Italy, after he had continued a little time in his own country, invaded the frontiers of Macedonia, in hopes of plunder; but finding little reſiſtance, he advanced into the very heart of Macedon, where two thouſand men who had been poſted in the adjacent towns for their defence by Antigonus, deſerted to him; whereupon he reſolved to venture a battle, notwithſtanding the Macedonian army was more numerous, and compoſed of better troops than his own. This once reſolved on, he proſecuted his march againſt Antigonus with the utmoſt diligence, and coming up with hm in a defile, he charged his forces briſkly. The rear of the army was compoſed of Gauls, whom Antigonus had taken into his ſervice; they made a very gallant defence, and continued fighting till moſt of them were cut to pieces. When theſe were deſtroyed, Pyrrhus made himſelf maſter of the elephants, and, elated with his ſucceſs, advanced towards the phalanx which Antigonus commanded in perſon, and which alone was capable of defeating his army: yet Pyrrhus vanquiſhed it without a ſtroke. For when he drew near enough to be heard, he called not only ſome of the principal, but alſo many of the inferior, officers by their names, and thereby drew them and the troops under their command over to his party, ſo that of a ſudden Antigonus ſaw himſelf without troops; whereupon with a few of his friends he retired from the field, and had much ado to reach the coaſt of Macedon, where by means of his fleet ſome of the maritime cities were held in his obedience [c].

Pyrrhus expells him, and ſeizes the kingdom.

Pyrrhus was once again owned king of Macedon, for the royal city of Ægis, and all the places of any importance in the neighbourhood, ſubmitted without farther diſpute. Yet as ſoon as he got poſſeſſion of the kingdom, he by an unaccountable act of folly, or rather of wickedneſs, loſt the hearts of the people; for after plundering the city of Ægis, and uſing its inhabitants with very great ſeverity, he placed a garriſon of mercenary Gauls therein. They, as ſoon as he was departed, took it into their heads that there muſt be vaſt riches buried in the ſepulchres of the antient kings; wherefore they, without more ado, entered the ſilent repoſitories of the dead, and having impiouſly ſcattered the aſhes of the deceaſed princes, tore away whatever they found of any value in their monuments. Pyrrhus, when informed of this, ſhewed very little concern at it, and never ſo much as pretended to revenge it: all his care was to keep the kingdom, and make the moſt of it. When he was obliged to quit it for ſome time, he left his ſon Ptolemy as his vicegerent. This opportunity Antigonus took to return with what troops he could get together from the ſea-coaſts, in hopes of reconquering the kingdom. But Ptolemy advancing againſt him with the army left him by his father, an engagement enſued, wherein Antigonus was routed, and with much ado eſcaped with no more than ſeven attendants. Of this, when Pyrrhus received advice, he was ſo intoxicated with his good fortune, that he ſaid, by way of raillery, That Antigonus was a very impudent fellow, ſtill to wear a purple robe: A moſt unmannerly and ill-grounded ſarcaſm, ſince that prince, diſtreſſed as he was, held ſtill very conſiderable territories in Greece, and had both ſpirit and ability to maintain a longer conteſt for the kingdom of Macedon. When Pyrrhus had held held the kingdom two years, he raſhly, and almoſt without any ground, involved himſelf in a war with the Lacedæmonians, and, in order thereto, marched down into Greece with the flower of his army; there he miſſed taking Sparta by delay, and while he endeavoured to retrieve his miſtake, he had news that Antigonus, having recovered a great part of Macedon, had followed him to Greece, and was in the neighbourhood of Argos; whither himſelf being invited by the oppoſite faction, he, according to his wonted cuſtom, laid hold of that opportunity to deſert an unlucky enterprize, in hopes of entering on one more fortunate. But when he drew near the city, he was met by a deputation from thence, who were ſent to inform him, that Antigonus was encamped on the neighbouring hills, and that it was the humble requeſt of the city, that neither of them would enter it. Pyrrhus promiſed that he would do as they deſired; but in the mean time, he ſent to defy Antigonus, and to challenge him to fight hand to hand before both armies for the kingdom. To which Antigonus returned him for anſwer, That himſelf in making war, uſed not only arms, but time; and that if Pyrrhus was weary of life, there were ways enow to death, which lay directly before him. To the deputies from Argos who made him the ſame propoſition they had Pyrrhus, he anſwered, That he came to do them good, but if his retiring would be more for their intereſt, he was content to retire, and, as a proof of his ſincerity, to give them his ſon for a hoſtage. They thankfully received the young prince, and then ſent to demand hoſtages of Pyrrhus, which he refuſed, but promiſed to keep his word, though he never intended it. For in the night he entered the city, and Antigonus, at the requeſt of the citizens, having ſent forces to aſſiſt them, a battle enſued in the ſtreets, where, in the morning, Pyrrhus was ſlain. Alcyoneus the ſon of Antigonus taking the head by the hair, rid with it full ſpeed to his father, and, finding him talking with ſome of his favourites, threw it at his feet. Antigonus looking upon it, and knowing it, not only thruſt his ſon from him with diſdain, but ſtruck him with his battoon; Barbarous wretch, ſaid he, why didſt thou think, that he whoſe grandfather was thus ſlain, and whoſe father died a captive, ſhould rejoice at ſuch a ſight? Then taking the robe from his ſhoulders, he covered the head, and at the ſame time let fall a ſhower

[c] Plutarch. in Pyrrho. Juſtin. lib. xxv. 3

of

of tears, giving orders that the body ſhould be carefully looked for, and that they ſhould be burnt together, with all the funeral honours due to a king. While he was ſpeaking, Alcyoneus having diſcovered Helenus the ſon of Pyrrhus in a thread-bare coat, he ſpoke to him kindly, and with great reſpect preſented him to his father; Well, my ſon, ſaid Antigonus, this is better than you did before; however, you have done leſs than your duty ſtill, in that you have ſuffered a perſon of his quality to approach me in that thread-bare coat, which is not a diſgrace to him, but to our victory. Having then comforted Helenus for the loſs of his father, he entertained him kindly, and afterwards ſet him at liberty, and ſent him home to Epirus. The principal officers in Pyrrhus's army he ſent for, aſſured them of his favour, and incorporated the troops they commanded into his own [d].

Antigonus reſtored, and again expelled.

Antigonus now held not only the kingdom of Macedon, but alſo very large poſſeſſions in Greece; yet was he as far as ever from being freed from enemics, new ones ariſing up as the old ones were deſtroyed. The Gauls, breeding him new diſturbances, threatened no leſs miſchief than they had heretofore done himſelf and his predeceſſors; but Antigonus, having made all the neceſſary preparations for ſubduing them, firſt cut off numbers in ſkirmiſhes, whereby they were ſo provoked that in rage they maſſacred their wives and children, and then put all to the hazard of a battle, in which they were defeated, and in a manner exterminated. After this victory Antigonus led his army againſt Athens, and, notwithſtanding it was powerfully ſupported, compelled it to receive a garriſon; but in the midſt of his ſucceſs he was recalled into Macedon, by the news that Alexander the ſon of Pyrrhus, being become king of Epirus, had entered Macedon, and committed great depredations. Antigonus on his return marched directly with a great army to repel the invader. Then, when he leaſt expected it, the Macedonians again deſerted him, and went over to Alexander, who thus acquired the kingdom without a ſtroke. Antigonus was ſo much ſurprized and confounded at the ingratitude and infidelity of a people, whom he had uſed ſo well, that he even deſerted them and retired into Greece. His ſon Demetrius, a very

[d] Plut. in vit. Pyrrhi. Juſtin. lib. xxv. c. 5.

a very boy, remained in Macedon, where having with much difficulty collected a body of troops, he daily did ſome exploit or other, which ſo charmed the Macedonians, who were always fond of active princes, that they liſted willingly under his banners, and thereby enabled him not only to regain the whole kingdom, but alſo to proſecute his father's quarrel in Epirus, the hereditary kingdom of his father's enemy, which he did with ſuch effect, that in his turn he expelled Alexander, who fled for ſhelter to the Ætolians, amongſt whom he collected a freſh army with an intent to make a briſk inroad into his own kingdom, once more to try the affections of his ſubjects. In this attempt he had all the ſucceſs he could wiſh, for the Epirots joined him in ſuch numbers, that Demetrius found it convenient to leave that kingdom, in order the more effectually to ſecure Macedonia, which he had recovered for his father [e].

Antigonus Gonatus his reign and death.

ANTIGONUS, returning to his kingdom, governed his ſubjects for many years in peace, making uſe of every advantage afforded him by the fluctuating ſtate of things in Greece, to ſtrengthen and enlarge his authority there. In his declining years he conceived a ſtrange ungovernable deſire of getting the citadel of Corinth into his hands, which he purſued with incredible vehemence and aſſiduity. It had been formerly held, together with Sicyon, by Crateſipolis, the wife of Alexander the ſon of Polyſperchon; from her it was taken by Ptolemy, and, having often afterwards changed its maſters, it was now in the hands of one Alexander, who eſteemed himſelf a prince, but was deemed by the Greeks a tyrant. The famous Aratus had contrived a ſcheme for ſurprizing it, but, before he was ready to put it in execution, Alexander entered into the Achæan league. Then it was, that Antigonus conceived an opinion that he ſhould never be able to ſupport his authority over the Greeks, unleſs he had this important place in his hands, which he compaſſed thus. Alexander being taken off by poiſon, Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus was ſent by his father to court the widow, whoſe name was Nicæa, an old woman full of vanity, but ſuſpicious and very cunning; a ſtrong garriſon ſhe kept in the citadel, but ſhe could not keep her own underſtanding from being impoſed upon by the pretences pretences of Demetrius; in short she was weak enough to believe, that one of the handsomest princes of his time, and in full vigour of his years, might be passionately in love with a woman of advanced age. A marriage was therefore speedily concluded, and Antigonus himself came to grace the solemnity. Nicæa, however, kept the citadel, nay, and was more cautious of it than ordinary, of which Antigonus took no notice; but spent all his time in feasts, shews, and theatrical entertainments. One day, when Amæbeus, a famous musician, was to perform on the theatre for the amusement of Nicæa, Antigonus would needs accompany her as she was carried thither in a splendid chair; but when they came to a passage which led up to the citadel, Antigonus bid the bearers of the chair go on; then with more speed than could be expected from a man of his years, he ascended to the gate of the citadel, which finding shut, he knocked at it with his staff, and in a quick tone bid the soldiers open it; they, surprized to behold the king in person, did as he commanded; and Antigonus being once within the place, easily transacted things there according to his pleasure. The joy he conceived on the happy success of his project, led him into great acts of indecorum, for he not only drank to excess at the feasts he gave his friends, but when he was full of wine went and danced in the streets, embraced every one he met, and in short acted as if the taking of Corinth had taken away his senses. From this time forward he employed all his care and thoughts in the prosecution of his views in Greece, where he supported all the petty tyrants against the free states, appointing new ones on the demise of the old, or swallowing them up as occasion offered, thereby enlarging his own dominions; though not so much to the reputation either of his arms, or of his honour. But the Achæans, and especially Aratus, their glorious general, gave him not a little disquiet: they openly professed a desire of restoring Greece to freedom, which was the same thing, as if they had declared they would extirpate the Macedonian power in Greece. Yet Antigonus did not make war on them, for he had in his life-time experienced such variety of fortune, that he was fearful of staking any thing in the open field; and therefore fought by promises to bring over Aratus, and by smooth language to amuse the Achæans. His policy without doubt was right; yet it did not very well answer his end, for Aratus and the

[e] Juſtin. lib. xxvi.

Achæans

Achæans acted juſt as he did, they laid hold of every opportunity to augment their own power, and pretended to ſurprize cities, and to take under their protection countries dependent on Antigonus without breaking the peace. At length Aratus ventured upon Corinth, and actually ſurprized it in the night, about eight years after it had been taken by Antigonus. Archelaus, who commanded the king's garriſon, he diſmiſſed; but as for the treaſure in the citadel and the ſhips in the haven, thoſe he retained. It does not appear, that even this engaged Antigonus in an open war againſt the Achæans; on the contrary, we find he proſecuted his old method of countenancing and ſupporting their enemies, whereby he impeded their power at leaſt, though ſomewhat at the expence of his own. Other acts of his we find none, except that he thoroughly ſettled the realm of Macedon, and ſo effectually conciliated the minds of the people to him and his family, that they were ever after very loyal ſubjects to his deſcendents. In fine, after a reign of upwards of thirty years, he died, being ſomewhat above fourſcore, with the character of a mild and generous prince, one whoſe wiſdom ſurpaſſed his valour, and yet one who, in caſes of neceſſity and when all was at ſtake, had ſhewn himſelf perſonally brave [f].

DEMETRIUS ſucceeded his father, and, on account of the great things he had performed while a youth, much was expected from him. Yet after he obtained the crown, he ſeemed to have altered his conduct, and to have acted with greater caution than vigour. He had married the daughter of Antiochus Hierax, and ſo long as he kept to this wife, his affairs went peaceably enough at home. Abroad he had ſome trouble with the Ætolians, a reſtleſs uneaſy people, who were impatient of any wrong done to themſelves, and yet were continually robbing and ſpoiling their neighbours. Demetrius, to blunt the edge of their courage, ſtirred up againſt them Agrion king of Illyria, who came down againſt them with a great army, engaged, and routed them; for joy of which he made vaſt feaſts, and at that time he drank ſo heartily, that he was ſeized with a fever, and died in a few days time. He was ſucceeded by his wife Tuta, who was as ſucceſsful, and made as bad uſe of her ſucceſs, as her huſband; for having Demetrius II. Year after the flood 2756. Before Chriſt 243.

[f] Juſtin. lib. xxviii. Plut. in vit. Arat.

ing experienced the valour of her ſubjects, ſhe not only permitted, but encouraged, them to commit all ſorts of robberies and piracies on the neighbouring nations, which ended at laſt in their deſtruction. Demetrius in the mean time found himſelf engaged in a war againſt the Achæans, who under the command of Aratus had invaded Attica. Bythis, who was general for the king in thoſe parts, inſtantly took the field, and at Phylacia it came to a battle, wherein the Achæans were beaten, and it was reported, that Aratus was either ſlain, or made priſoner. At Athens the former was ſo firmly believed, that the citizens, to ſhew their affection to the Macedonians, put on garlands, as if ſome mighty good luck had befallen them; whereas in truth, Aratus intended to reſtore them to their liberty; their behaviour therefore was at once chargaeble with groſs flattery and rank ingratitude. What confirmed them in all probability in their notion of the death of Aratus was a meſſage ſent by Diogenes, who was governor of the Pyræus for the king, to Corinth, commanding the Achæans immediately to quit that city; but this order was very indifferently obeyed, becauſe Aratus himſelf was then in the city, where receiving information of the joy ſhewn by the Athenians for his death, he, with ſuch troops as he could firſt draw together, invaded their territories, to let them ſee that he was alive, and penetrated as far as the academy, where being met by certain deputies, to excuſe the conduct of their countrymen from the viſible force they were under, he ſuffered himſelf to be appeaſed, and withdrew his forces without doing any conſiderable miſchief. In Macedon the latter report, of his being a priſoner, was ſo well received, that Demetrius ſent a ſhip directly to Athens to bring him from thence in chains. The Ætolians, having been relieved from their late diſtreſs by the Achæans, recovered their old diſpoſition with their proſperity, and, in conſequence thereof endeavoured to tear away that part of Acarnania which was ſubject to the crown of Epirus. This kingdom was at that time governed by Olympias the ſiſter and widow of Alexander, as guardian to her ſons Pyrrhus and Ptolemy. She therefore, to rid herſelf of theſe barbarous enemies, applied to Demetrius king of Macedon, and prevailed on him to marry her daughter Phthia. This produced the queen and her children dren very little good, though it proved the cauſe of no ſmall miſchief to Demetrius; for his firſt wife was ſo enraged thereat, that ſhe left him, and retired to her brother, whom ſhe earneſtly excited to make war upon her huſband; which though the unſettled ſtate of his own affairs would not permit, yet the inclination he ſhewed to revenge his ſiſter's quarrel obliged Demetrius to take all the precautions neceſſary to repel an invader. All that he knew farther of this king of Macedon is, that he added Cyrene and all Libya to his dominions; but at what time, or by what means, we are not able to ſay. During his whole reign the Achæans ſtruggled with him in Greece, and the barbarous nations on his frontiers gave him no ſmall trouble. In defending himſelf from their attacks, he ſpent the ten years in which he enjoyed the regal authority, and then died, leaving behind him a young ſon named Philip.

Antigonus Doſon. Year after the Flood, 2762. Before Chriſt 237.

MACEDONIA could not be without a king, and as their lawful prince was little more than two years old, there was a neceſſity of appointing a regent. Some hiſtorians ſay, that Demetrius aſſigned his brother Antigonus to be the tutor of young Philip, which is probable enough; but he did not long continue to exerciſe his office, for having by his gentle and obliging conduct gained the good-will of the Macedonians, as alſo of the widow of the deceaſed king, he took her to wife, and was by them ſaluted king. Yet, imitating the policy of his predeceſſor, Philip the ſon of Amyntas, he did not offer the leaſt violence to his nephew, but, on the contrary, cauſed him to be brought up with great care, and, as we ſhall ſee, made him his ſucceſſor. He was indeed a prince of great abilities, equally capable of maintaining peace at home, and of carrying on war abroad. He had a great reputation for his juſtice, was renowned for his clemency towards his enemies, and for his kindneſs and affability towards his friends. With all theſe great qualities he had very high ideas of the regal dignity, and of the honour of the Macedonian name: he is ſaid to have been ſlower in performing than promiſing, and therefore the Greeks, who in this age were more remarkable for ſaying quick things, than for doing

[g] Juſtin. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra. Polyb. lib. ii. Porphyr. in Græcis. Euſeb. Scalig. p. 229.

ing wise ones, sirnamed him Doson, i. e. Will-give. He had scarce begun to meddle with the administration, when Diogenes, whom the late king had made governor of his several forts in the city of Athens, most basely sold them, together with the island of Salamis, for a hundred and fifty talents. In the transacting of this treaty, the Athenians made use of Aratus, whom they had so lately treated as an enemy, and he not only lent them his advice, but furnished twenty talents out of his own pocket. So true a friend was he to the liberty of Greece, and so strongly was he at this time persuaded, that nothing cramped it so much as the Macedonian power. But in process of time, when the Ætolians, by lending assistance to Cleomenes king of Sparta, had enabled him to give check to the Achæans, and even to defeat Aratus in battle; this great man began to change his sentiments, and to have another opinion of the Macedonians. Yet, not caring to be himself the author of a motion for calling in Antigonus once more into Peloponnesus, whom himself had so earnestly laboured to expel, he found means to engage the Megalopolitans, who were in immediate danger of being destroyed by Cleomenes, to demand succours of Antigonus, who very politicly answered, that he would readily send them assistance when the Achæans should desire it. When this answer was reported in the assembly of the Achæans, and generally applauded, Aratus alone opposed it, and advised the Achæans to try what they could do with their own forces, before they called in so powerful an ally; yet this he did only to colour the business, foreseeing, what quickly after fell out, that they would be under a necessity of applying to Antigonus; and when this happened, he readily agreed to the motion, and sent his own son to the king, not only to negotiate the affair, but to be an hostage. Antigonus received the young man with great civility, and the request made by his father and the Achæans with the highest satisfaction; for he of all things desired to retrieve his interest in Greece, and to assert that authority which the kings of Macedon from the time of Philip had maintained therein. One thing, however, from the beginning he insisted on, which was, that the citadel of Corinth should be put into his hands. For, as Plutarch observes, he looked on the Greeks, as a high-mettled horse, too dangerous to be rid without a bridle. To this condition,

to

to avoid falling under the power of the Lacedæmonians, the Achæans ſubmitted, and for the performance of this, the ſon of Aratus became hoſtage. The king therefore ſoon after his coming prepared to perform his part of the treaty, and, in order thereto, aſſembled an army of twenty thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, with which he intended to have deſcended into Theſſaly; but his march that way was hindered by a meſſage ſent him by the Ætolians, that they would oppoſe his paſſage at Thermopylæ with their utmoſt force. He then tranſported his forces into Eubœa, but when he was come thither, he was informed that Cleomenes lay with a gallant army juſt within the iſthmus, and that he had fortified it with lines which were not to be forced, but at the expence of a great number of men. All this made him very uneaſy, eſpecially as it happened in the very beginning of a war, when all croſs adventures are moſt apt to diſcourage an army. Aratus came by ſea to Pegæ with ſome of his friends, where Antigonus metand complimented them, treating all with great civility; but receiving Aratus with particular marks of friendſhip. This was the effect of policy, for he had been his old enemy, and was but lately become his friend; yet when they had converſed a little together, and Antigonus, who was an excellent judge of men, had thereby an opportunity given him of diſcourſing freely with this great politician, he grew into a ſincere friendſhip with him, treating him ever after with the utmoſt familiarity and confidence. The firſt ſtep of the war was the attacking the lines of Corinth, which were better defended than any other lines mentioned in the Greek hiſtory; but the city of Argos in Peloponneſus revolting, Cleomenes was forced to abandon his lines, leſt he ſhould have an enemy on both ſides. Antigonus purſued the war to the ſatisfaction of the Achæans for ſome time, and then having the citadel of Corinth put into his hands, he made a pompous feaſt there for all the generals in the army. At this entertainment Aratus was placed next the king, who feeling himſelf on a ſudden very cold, called for his cloak, and when the ſervant brought it, turning to Aratus, My friend, ſaid he, don't you think the weather very ſharp? Yes, replied Aratus, I never felt it ſharper. The king thereupon pulled him cloſer to him, and bid the ſervant throw the cloak over them both; upon which Aratus fell a laughing; of which when the king demanded the reaſon, I will tell you, Sir, ſaid Aratus; a little before our treaty with you, when I had offered a ſolemn ſacrifice, the ſoothſayer finding in the liver two gall-bags in one cell, he pronounced it his opinion, that two perſons, then thought irreconcileable enemies, ſhould very ſoon become moſt intimate friends; I ſmiled at the prediction then, and laughed at its accompliſhment juſt now, for I believe your cloak covers thoſe gall-bladders at preſent. The hiſtory of this war the reader has already had in a former volume; we ſhall therefore only touch on ſuch points as relate immediately to the conduct of Antigonus, and are not mentioned there. As the advantages obtained by the Achæans were entirely due to the aſſiſtance he had brought them, the king thought it but reaſonable that Orchomenus, and ſome other places that were taken, ſhould be garriſoned by Macedonians. He alſo cauſed the ſtatues of thoſe who had ſurprized the citadel at Corinth to be thrown down, excepting only that of Aratus. In Argos he reſtored the ſtatues of thoſe whom the Achæans ſtiled tyrants, but who had been protected in the authority they exerciſed by his anceſtors. Theſe things created a great deal of trouble to Aratus, who was made accountable by his countrymen for every thing that happened, as if, after they had admitted Antigonus into their country, had choſen him their captain-general, and had veſted him with ſupreme power, he would not conduct things a little according to his own will, and not entirely in conſequence of the advice given him by others. Yet it ſeems, that to gratify the Achæans, he ſent the greateſt part of his forces to take up their winter quarters in Macedonia, which gave Cleomenes an opportunity of deſtroying all the country about Argos, under the noſe of the king, who with a few mercenary troops lay in the neighbourhood of the city. It was upon this occaſion that he performed the greateſt action of his life, which was abſolutely refuſing to fight, when he could not do it without manifeſt advantage, notwithſtanding he was inſulted by the enemy, and railed at by his confederates. His prudence preſerved them from that diſgrace, which would have attended a defeat; and when his forces were returned, he made himſelf ample amends for the injury his reputation had received by the glorious victory at Selaſia, where he totally defeated Cleomenes, and, in conſequence of his victory, took the virgin city of Sparta. If any thing could add to his glory after this, or rather if any thing could eclipſe the luſtre of his victory by its ſuperior ſplendor, it was his behaviour on this occaſion; for he not only prevented the plunder of the city, but declared to the magiſtrates, that he did not carry on the war againſt the Spartans, but againſt Cleomenes; with reſpect to whom, as he was fled, he had no farther rancour. He left the city in three days, and left it as free as he found it, being obliged to make a precipitate march back into Macedonia, on account of his having received information, that the Illyrians had invaded that kingdom with a great army. In his return he came to Tegea, where he reſtored that little republic. Thence he proceeded to Argos, and arriving there at the time the Nemæan games were celebrated, had the ſatisfaction of receiving the higheſt compliments, and ſtrongeſt teſtimonies of reſpect from the Greeks in general, and from every little ſtate in particular. When he arrived in Macedon, he found all things in confuſion; his own people dejected, the enemy flushed with ſucceſs. He did not, however, deſpair, but, having recruited his army, advanced to meet the Illyrians, who had brought with them a mixt rabble of Barbarians, and had hitherto bore down before them all things like a deluge. A battle quickly enſued, which proved deciſive, the Macedonians obtaining a victory equally glorious and complete; but they gained it at a very great expence, the king dying a few days afterwards of a ſpitting of blood, induced by ſtraining his voice at the time of the engagement. Thus Antigonus died, as he had lived, in the ſervice of his country, having adjured the army to remain faithful to his nephew and pupil Philip; who, though a very youth, was now to take the government into his own hands. The people were in general very much grieved on the death of ſo good a prince; however, he left them in a better condition than they had ever been in ſince the days of Antipater; for they were well united, and began to reſume their antient liberty [h].

any

PHILIP began his adminiſtration very happily, and, which is not a little ſingular, had both better reputation, and better ſucceſs, while he was ſo young as to be governed by others, than after he managed all things according to his Philip. Year after the flood, 2778. Before Chriſt 221.

[h] Polyb. lib. ii. Plut. in vit. Arat. Juſtin. lib. xxviii. c. 3, 4.

his own will. His natural abilities were very great; for he was brave in his perſon, very eloquent, ſkilled in all the learning worthy of a king, and one who knew how to make himſelf acceptable to all degrees of people. In the beginning of his reign, he was engaged in the ſocial war in Greece, which drew after it a train of other military expeditions againſt the Illyrians, Ætolians, and other nations, who either made war upon the Achæans, or invaded Macedon, in order to divert Philip from ſuccouring the laſt-mentioned people. All of theſe we have conſidered at large in a former volume: here therefore it would be ſuperfluous to repeat them, and for that reaſon we ſhall only glance on ſuch points, as are neceſſary to introduce the hiſtory of the remaining part of Philip's life, unaccounted for in that part of our work. The courſe of his affairs diſcovered to him before he was a very old man, that he had ſome true friends, and ſome very falſe ones; but which were his true friends, and which only pretended to be his friends, he could not diſcover; at leaſt not certainly; which was the reaſon that he often treated his falſe friends with confidence, and his true ones with diſdain. In the end, however, he fell to deſtroying them all. Apelles and Ptolemy, who had been in his councils from his acceſſion to the throne, he put to death, the latter with, the former without, the ordinary forms of juſtice; neither without cauſe. But for Aratus the elder and his ſon Aratus the younger, men of the greateſt worth and honour, men who had been the ſupport of his family, his guides in his beſt actions; thoſe who procured to him, and thoſe who preſerved to him, the affections of the Greeks, theſe he treated moſt deteſtably. The former he poiſoned, the wife of the latter he debauched, while he was his gueſt; and then practiſed upon himſelf by giving him drugs, which by degrees diſturbed his ſenſes, and induced him to perpetrate ſuch actions, as made his death appear rather ſeaſonable to his friends, than untimely, as it really was. Philip, however, from ſuch practiſes as theſe, grew odious at home and abroad, yet he maintained his authority by dint of his ſkill in government, and his experience as a general; for though he was ſeldom fortunate either in conducting his projects, or in the field, yet he had happy talents in negotiation, could put on an appearance of firmneſs in the worſt circumſtances, and could improve

every

every opportunity that offered of retrieving his affairs, though, when he had retrieved them, his ambition would never ſuffer him to be quiet. Wars, loſſes, treaties, repeated over and over again, employed thirty years and upwards of his reign; till the Romans had reduced him to ſuch a miſerable ſtate, that he was forced to ſubmit to the orders they had ſent him; to ſend his younger ſon Demetrius to Rome as a hoſtage, and to undertake to live in peace with all his neighbours, in conſideration of their leaving him in the kingdom of Macedon, circumſcribed within its antient bounds, with other hard conditions, ſuch as delivering up his ſhips of war, and paying by way of fine a thouſand talents at ſeveral times [i].

Philip ſtruggles with the Romans.

THE ſubſequent war between the Romans and Antiochus ſeemed to offer Philip an opportunity of reſtoring in ſome meaſure his power; but he paſſed it by, not through negligence or want of diſcernment, for no prince in the age in which he lived was either quicker in executing, or could penetrate farther than he: but the cauſe of his not ſtirring was this; he ſaw clearly that the ſtrength of his kingdom was much exhauſted, and that his revenues were in no condition to ſupport the charges of a war. When this ſtruggle was over, and the war againſt the Ætolians commenced, he attempted to take part therein for his own advantage, coming down with an army to the ſiege of Lamia, at the ſame time that the conſul Acilius lay before Heraclea. But when Philip had brought the town almoſt to extremity, the conſul ſent to command him to raiſe the ſiege, not with any deſign to ſave the city, but that he might take it himſelf. However, the king was allowed to turn his arms for the preſent into Athamania and towards Thrace; but no ſooner had he made ſome conqueſts of importance, than complaints were made againſt him at Rome, and the Romans immediately appointed commiſſioners, who were to go over to Greece, with full power to hear and determine; in conſequence of which, they did accordingly ſummon all parties before them, pronounce judgment againſt Philip, and order him to content himſelf with Macedonia in its antient ſtate. Philip, ſtung with ſo ſevere a ſentence, could not help ſaying, that he had not ſeen his laſt ſun ſet, of which many conſtructions were made, moſt of them little to his advantage. In the mean time there ſprung up diviſions in his family, and a ſpirit of diſcord began to appear among his ſubjects. His eldeſt ſon Perſeus he had begotten on a concubine, whence he was not ſo much reſpected as his younger brother Demetrius. This Demetrius was not only happy in the people's affections, but was really a prince of extraordinary merit. He had a ſincere affection for his father, a moſt tender love for his country, and had conceived a high reſpect for the Romans; among whom he had remained ſome time an hoſtage, and was afterwards diſmiſſed with great reſpect. His brother Perſeus, obſerving what regard Philip paid him, how fond the Macedonians were of him, and what an intereſt he had at Rome, began to hate him very heartily, and to do him privately all the miſchief he could. The hatred of Philip towards the Romans began firſt by degrees to appear, not only by words eſcaping him at unawares, but by his endeavouring to increaſe his revenues, by augmenting the cuſtoms upon merchandize, and cauſing the mines to be every-where put under a new regulation, at the ſame time that he granted large privileges to certain cities, and endeavoured all that in him lay to encourage foreigners to come and ſettle in his kingdom. Demetrius ſaw plainly the drift of this, and therefore adviſed his father to deſiſt from all projects againſt the Romans, who, as he affirmed, would be ever too powerful for him; wherefore it was better that he ſhould uſe their friendſhip for the ſupporting at leaſt, if not for the augmenting, his dominions, than that, out of a vain hope of recovering part of what he had loſt, he ſhould hazard all that remained, and which he might be ſaid to hold from their courteſy. Philip was too great a politician not to diſcern the ſtrength of his ſon's arguments, yet he could not prevail with himſelf to follow them. He remembered the great reputation of his anceſtors, and was aſhamed to ſee himſelf, with greater abilities than moſt of the kings of Macedon, cramped up in narrower bounds than their enemies had ever preſcribed them. He took this the worſe, becauſe, as he conceived he had deſerved well of the Romans; he alone had aſſiſted them in the Ætolian war; he had given a paſſage to their army through his country, and had yielded obedience to their decrees when they touched him to the quick.

[i] Plut. in vit. Arat. & Philopœm. Polyb. Hiſt. lib. iv. Juſtin. lib. xxx, xxxi, xxxii.

He

He could not therefore endure, that Eumenes king of Pergamus ſhould be gratified by them in every thing he aſked, and himſelf at the ſame time as ſteadily refuſed things which in his opinion were his right. His diſcontent was augmented by a decree of the Romans, which peremptorily required him to withdraw his garriſons from Ænus and Maronea, maritime towns of Thrace. Philip pleaded, that if theſe cities were at liberty, they would become weak and defenceleſs places, and fall eaſily into the hands of the Thracians and Dardanians, wild and barbarous nations, whom, by retaining theſe cities in his hands, he kept from doing what they had often practiſed in former times, viz. making inroads into Macedon. The Romans looked on all theſe pretences as ſo many frivolous excuſes; which when Philip underſtood, he determined with himſelf to comply with their demands, but at the ſame time to revenge himſelf on the Maronites, whoſe clamours had obtained the decree. With this view he ſent orders for his garriſons to leave thoſe cities, yet at the ſame time ſent inſtructions to Onomaſtus, who was his governor of the maritime coaſt of Macedonia, to ſtrike ſuch a blow, as that the Maronites might not be too much tranſported with their liberty. Onomaſtus, tranſmitted his orders to Caſſander, one of the king's officers in Maronea, adviſing him privately to let in the Thracians, which he did; and they plundered the city with all the circumſtances of cruelty and avarice which could poſſibly be imagined. Without all doubt, a contrivance of this ſort was executed with as much ſecrecy as poſſible; yet it ſo fell out, that the Roman deputies gained ſuch poſitive intelligence, that they charged it home upon the king; and the Romans thereupon directed that he ſhould juſtify himſelf before the ſenate. This was a new mortification, the rather, becauſe he was commanded to ſend Onomaſtus and Caſſander thither; which he conceived to be an high indignity offered to him, who was an independent prince, and expected to have been believed on his word. Yet, to preſerve himſelf from being deſtroyed, before he was ſtrong enough to make reſiſtance, he yielded, though with ſome conſtraint, to the conditions impoſed upon him. Onomaſtus he proteſted he could not ſend, becauſe he was a perſon whoſe ſervice he needed, and whoſe innocence, he affirmed, ſufficiently appeared in that he was not near the city at the time it was taken and ſacked.

Caſſander he ſent, but took care to have him poiſoned by the way; and then, well-knowing that the Romans would not paſs by ſuch a ſcene of extraordinary actions, he ordered his ſon Demetrius to repair to Rome, with notes of the anſwers he had to make to the objections raiſed againſt his conduct, and alſo a ſchedule of grievances which might ſerve to juſtify his conduct, if it ſhould appear as extraordinary as it was repreſented. Demetrius, furniſhed with theſe credentials, came to Rome; but when he was admitted to defend his father's cauſe before the ſenate, he was ſo much amazed at the weight of the ſeveral charges brought againſt him, that he was not able to return any anſwer at all. Yet, in regard to his youth, his inexperience, and the great perſonal regard they had for him, he was permitted to make uſe of his father's notes, out of which he read what he thought would have greateſt weight. The cauſe over, he had liberty given him to return home, and by him was ſent the ratification of the treaty formerly made, and his excuſes accepted; but with this expreſs clauſe, that all was done out of regard to his ſon, which was alſo ſignified to him by the embaſſador reſident in Macedon. A circumſtance which did not pleaſe Philip, and did very little good to Demetrius, whom his father begun to believe more attached to the Romans than himſelf; though in truth the young man only ſtood in more fear of them than his father did, becauſe he was better acquainted with their power and arts than he. Philip failed not to uſe the leiſure he had acquired by his ſon's negotiation, in providing effectually for war, when all negotiation ſhould fail. In purſuit of this deſign, he took ſuch ſteps as proved him to be a man of deep foreſight, and one who was as well able to ſtruggle with fortune as any king that ever lived. In the firſt place perceiving his ſubjects on the ſea-coaſt were not only greatly addicted to peace, but likewiſe ſtrongly inclined to the Romans, he immediately tranſplanted theſe into Æmathia, and brought multitudes of Thracians to inhabit the ſea-coaſt, who were in themſelves a hardy warlike people, and who, he was ſure, would depend upon him as the author of their ſettlements, and him from whom they were to expect all things. Finding the Dardanians, a barbarous nation, who were the implacable enemies of the Macedonians, not to be wrought upon by fair means, and that it was no way

way in his power, either to bridle or ſubdue them by force, he bethought himſelf of a very extraordinary expedient for the ridding himſelf and his people of theſe bad neighbours, and of getting better in their room. He ſent certain deputies whom he could truſt to the Baſtarnæ, a very numerous people, inhabiting the banks of the river Iſter, now the Danube, to perſuade them to leave their old ſeats, and to come and poſſeſs themſelves of Dardania, which was a country far preferable to their own, and in the conqueſt of which he promiſed to aſſiſt them. There was one difficulty, however, to be adjuſted, which was their getting to Dardania, becauſe in their march thither, they were firſt of all to lead with them their wives and children, and ſecondly, they were to croſs the dominions of ſeveral Thracian princes. The firſt ſeemed to require a great deal of time, the latter to render the ſcheme abſolutely impracticable. Philip, however, deviſed means for removing both difficulties; he offered to remit them money to furniſh them with neceſſaries for their journey, and by preſents made by the petty princes of Thrace, he procured for them a ſafe paſſage through their dominions. But while his mind was big with theſe vaſt projects, he found things of importance enough to diſquiet him near home. His ſubjects, whom he had tranſported from the coaſts of Macedonia, teſtified their diſcontents aloud, and complained vehemently of the king's want of affection towards his countrymen, that could conſent to tranſport them hither and thither, merely to make way for ſtrangers and Barbarians. If Philip had taken little notice of theſe paſſionate ſpeeches, it is very probable they would in a ſhort time have paſſed over; for except that they had loſt their old habitations, theſe people had ſmall cauſe to repine, being rather gainers than loſers by the exchange they had been forced to make. But the king, who was naturally cruel, and grew more and more jealous as he grew in years, conſtrueing thoſe ſharp ſpeeches into rebellion, began with acts of ſeverity to exaſperate the people, and to make ſuch diſloyal who were before but impatient. Theſe ſteps, inſtead of ſupporting, embarraſſed all his other projects, and induced by degrees ſuch miſchiefs, as with all his policy he knew neither how to remedy, nor how to endure. The quarrels in his family grew daily wider and wider; Perſeus encouraged all who either ridiculed or declaimed ſeriouſly againſt the Romans, mans, and Demetrius openly vindicated the Romans againſt all ſuch. An accident at laſt happened, which encreaſed thoſe diſſenſions which were already but too fierce, and was attended with ſuch conſequences as could hardly have been foreſeen. Philip at a certain ſtated ſeaſon gave directions for luſtrating the army, a ceremony heretofore deſcribed, and of which we ſhall ſay nothing more here, than that it was concluded by the repreſentation of a fight, the army dividing for that purpoſe, and one half combating the other. The two young princes were commanders in this mock engagement, and their companions raſhly inſtigating them to ſhew their ſkill and bravery therein, a great deal of miſchief enſued. In the end, Demetrius prevailed. Perſeus at the firſt was very much diſcontented, but when his counſellors ſhewed him that this intemperate heat in his brother might furniſh him with a very plauſible complaint to his father, he grew better ſatisfied, and conſulted on this ſubject with his confidents. In the evening, both princes entertaining their friends, ſome of Perſeus's ſpies were diſcovered at Demetrius's table, and, on account of their inſolent behaviour, were firſt well beaten, and then expelled. But when the company had drank more freely, Demetrius who was naturally good-humoured, would needs go to ſee his brother, that he might ſhew he was no ways diſaffected to him; thoſe young men, who had lately beaten his ſpies, deſired Demetrius to excuſe them, to which he would by no means conſent, believing that he ſhould be able ſo to compoſe matters, as to give Perſeus ſatisfaction. Thoſe young men, having quite another opinion of his brother's temper, took care privately to arm themſelves for fear of the worſt, which when others, who were Perſeus's diſcreeter ſpies, obſerved, they inſtantly went and acquainted him with; he and the counſellors about him immediately determined, that this was the grand opportunity they ſought, wherefore they cauſed the doors to be immediately barricadoed, at which on his arrival Demetrius expreſſing great ſurprize, his brother from within called to him to be gone, told him, he muſt take ſome other time, for that at preſent he was too well guarded to be aſſaſſinated. Preſently after Demetrius was accuſed by his brother to their father of an attempt to murder him; and it was ſuggeſted, that he did this in confidence that the Romans would

would ſupport him; and to give colour to this ſuggeſtion, Perſeus took notice of a letter from T. Quintius, wherein it was recommended to him to ſend Demetrius once again to Rome, better attended than formerly, as the beſt means to procure favour for himſelf. Demetrius on the other hand defended himſelf boldly, and without ſhewing any apprehenſion for the conſequences; he recapitulated all the paſſages of the day; he bitterly inveighed againſt his brother for turning the exerciſe of the army into a ſtruggle for the crown, and for repreſenting actions of merriment and play as the effects of ſome gloomy conſpiracy; he avowed his purpoſe to viſit his brother, but diſclaimed any ſiniſter view, or any thought in himſelf, to practiſe againſt his brother's life. As for any dependence on the Romans, he ſaid, that thoſe only who were unacquainted with that people, could ſuggeſt, they would ſupport ſo baſe and black a conſpiracy; that the affection they had for himſelf proceeded, if not from his own virtue, at leaſt from their opinion of it, which would have been effectually forfeited by ſo nefarious an enterprize; he concluded with a ſolemn aſſeveration, that, notwithſtanding what was paſſed, he ſtill loved Perſeus as his brother; that he revered the king as his parent and his ſovereign, and that he had ever ſought to promote the peace of Macedon, as that which was moſt conducive to its power and grandeur. Philip, having calmly heard all that was ſaid on both ſides, decided prudently, and with a great ſhew of juſtice. He blamed Demetrius for acting in ſuch a manner, as to give the leaſt colour to his brother's charge; he reprehended Perſeus for putting the worſt conſtruction on dubious actions; riſing at length from his ſeat, he declared, that he would paſs no judgment on the paſſages of a day, and the diſcourſes at a dinner, but would believe of his ſons whatever their future actions ſhould ſpeak them, exhorting them to take what had now happened for warning, and to be extremely circumſpect in their conduct for the future. Notwithſtanding this grave and diſintereſted ſpeech, the king leaned for the time to come wholly to his eldeſt ſon; with him he conſulted on all his affairs; and him only he made privy to the projects he had formed, for regaining a part at leaſt of what the Romans had taken from him. As for Demetrius, he countenanced him publicly, but kept him a ſtranger to his councils. In the mean time he formed in his own breaſt a ſcheme, which, as he thought, would put him out of doubt, as to th intentions of his younger ſon, either by demonſtrating hi innocence, or making his guilt apparent. With this view h choſe Philocles and Apelles, Macedonian noblemen, who as far as his intelligence reached, had never ſided with ei- ther of the brethren, to go embaſſadors to Rome; thei public inſtructions ran to aſſure the ſtate of his maintaining the preſent good correſpondence between himſelf and them; but they were privately directed to enquire into his ſon's conduct there, who were his intimates, and what ſchemes he had been forming. Theſe worthy embaſſadors, perceiv- ing on which ſide the king's affections leaned, addreſſed themſelves immediately to Perſeus, and with him concert- ed what report they ſhould make on their return, before they ſet out for Rome. The reſult of their contrivances was, that when Philocles and Apelles came back, they ſpoke very tenderly of Demetrius, and preſented the king a letter from Titus Quintius, whoſe ſeal, before he opened it, the king, who was well acquainted with it, obſerved; wherein the Roman interceded earneſtly for his younger ſon, excuſing his wrong practices from his youth, and beſeeching the king to paſs by the meaſures he had taken to ſupplant his brother, the rather, becauſe all Demetrius's hopes from the Romans were vain and ill founded, ſince himſelf, who loved him ſo well, would never have countenanced ſo baſe an action. Philip made no queſtion that he had now diſcover- ed the truth, and therefore marched his army towards mount Hæmus, on a frivolous pretext of viewing the coun- try, but in truth, that he might have the better opportuni- ty of putting Demetrius under an arreſt, which he ac- cordingly did, giving one Didas the command of the guard placed upon him. This commander too was one of Per- ſeus's creatures, and by his directions found a way to com- plete the ruin of the young prince. He inſinuated to him, that though his father had placed him as a kind of keeper, yet he was ſo much moved with a ſenſe of his misfortunes, that to deliver him out of them, he would be content to run any riſque whatever. The hapleſs Demetrius, ſwallow- ing the bait, confeſſed that he deſired to fly to Rome, there to paſs his days in ſafety out of the reach of his vin- dictive brother. Didas having communicated this to the king, received from him a command to take off his priſo- ner by poiſon; but withal, he was cautioned to do it pri- vately, on account of the love born by the Macedonians to the young prince, as well as for fear of the Romans. Didas, according to his maſter's orders, poiſoned Demetrius; but the drug working ſlowly, and the young man complaining bitterly, the buſineſs began to take air; upon which Didas picked out two ſtout ruffians, who ſmothered that hopeful prince in the twenty-fifth year of his age. This was the firſt fact of its kind, which had fallen out in the houſe of Antigonus the Great, which till now had been remarkable for nothing ſo much as the piety of children towards parents, and the affection of parents towards children; a doctrine which Philip himſelf had formerly inculcated to his ſons, and which he now diſpenſed with merely from reaſon of ſtate [i].

Philip falls into a deep melancholy.

THE unfortunate Demetrius was hardly in his grave, before his brother and his father altered their conduct. Perſeus, having obtained all he ſought for, began to be leſs aſſiduous about his father, and to act more independently than he was wont; he did not diſguiſe the ſatisfaction which the death of his competitor gave him, or endeavour to conceal the number of his dependents and the ſtrength of his faction. Philip was too quick-ſighted not to diſcern this alteration in his ſon's conduct; he began from that moment to doubt whether all that had been told him was true, or whether a baſe and cruel ſon had not contrived to deprive him of a worthy and deſerving child. Theſe thoughts having once entered his head, he ſaw daily more and more circumſtances tending to heighten the ſuſpicion. At length he communicated his apprehenſions to his couſin Antigonus, a man of great honour and integrity, whoſe frank behaviour and honeſt counſels had long before rendered him obnoxious to Perſeus. This man readily agreed with the king, that his jealouſy of Perſeus was better grounded than that which he had conceived of his brother; he farther informed him, that there was one Xychus about the court who, he had good grounds to believe, was privy to the whole contrivance; whereupon, by the king's expreſs command, this traitor was ſeized, and brought into his preſence; where, for fear of the torture, he confeſſed that the letter of T. Quintius Flaminius was a forgery, and that he had been employed to frame it. Philip, diſtracted with the thoughts of having deſtroyed his own child, and tortured Herodorus a Macedonian nian nobleman to death, merely for being his favourite, gave himself up to a melancholy, which differed very little from madness. However, by fits and starts he acted as a king; for laying suddenly hold of Philocles, he first extorted from him a confession, and then put him to death; Apelles would have shared his fate, if he had not secured himself by flight, withdrawing into Italy, in hopes of receiving there the news of his master's death, whom age and grief had now brought into a very declining condition. As for Perseus, though he did not retire out of Macedon, yet he kept upon the borders, quite deserting his father's court, expecting with impatience the happy minute which should make it his own. Philip, having now a true sense of his misery, plainly perceived that his arts served only to render him suspected; that his cruelty had made him odious; that the Romans spared him only out of respect to his ancestors; and that his death, as it was expected, so it was also generally wished for at home and abroad. In this untoward situation he formed a design of altering the succession of the crown, and having exposed the whole contrivance of his son Perseus against his brother Demetrius to the Macedonians, he earnestly recommended it to them to set Antigonus on the throne, which a little after he left vacant, dying of grief, when he had reigned forty-two years, and began to draw towards threescore. This end had Philip, who with great natural parts had an excellent education, and, in process of time, all that experience could add to perfect his wisdom. He was the author of his own misfortunes, for his tutor Antigonus left him in far happier circumstances than he could ever arrive at, after he presumed by his own judgment to change the face of affairs. In him it is pretended the prophesy of a certain Sibyl was fulfilled, who foretold, that as the Macedonians owed the extension of their power to Philip, so a Philip should bring on its extinction. It is indeed observable, that these Philips had a likeness in their characters, though not in the success of their designs; they were both generals, both orators, both politicians; but they differed in this, that the first Philip was debonaire, open, and full of clemency, affecting empire, but affecting also so mild a government, as to leave men in doubt whether they should not prefer it to liberty; whereas the other Philip was suspicious, implacable, ready to shed blood, and alike covetous of power, and of making himself terrible ble by his power. The first was prosperous in all things, the latter prospered not in any [k].

[i] Liv. Hiſt. lib. xxxix. xl. Polyb. excerpt. Hiſt. lib. vii. & ix. Diodor. Sicul. excerpt. lib. xxvi. Juſtin. lib. xxxii.

If Philip had entered upon this scheme of his ever so little earlier, he had in all probability succeeded; for we do not find that the Macedonians were much addicted to Perseus, or, that they at all disliked Antigonus; but inasmuch as the king thought not of it till his life grew near a close, Perseus found means to bribe his physician Caligines, who gave him from time to time notice of his father's state of health, and who advised him of his death a considerable time before he suffered it to be known to the public. Perseus, laying hold of this opportunity, came unexpectedly to the city of Demetrias, where his father died, with a body of troops, and seated himself on the throne by force. His first care was to settle himself firmly, which he conceived could not be done, till Antigonus was taken off; he began his reign therefore with shedding blood, and little regarding either the virtues of the man, or his near relation to his own family, he caused him to be put to death. Then he began to take gentler measures, and to put on the appearance of clemency and generosity; virtues with which in truth he was wholly unacquainted. We have before mentioned Philip's inviting the Bastarnæ to change their cold barren seats for the fruitful country of Dardania. This project with much difficulty he had brought to bear in the very last year of his life, and these people were then actually on their march through Thrace to the country he had offered them. But when the news of Philip's death came to be published, this business began to go backwards. The Bastarnæ themselves doubted, whether it were better for them to proceed, and the Thracians were irresolute as to the permission of their further progress. Hereupon quarrels ensued, under pretence that the Thracians exacted on the Bastarnæ in their markets, whence a war took rise, in which at first the Thracians were grievously handled, losing all the plain country to their new guests, who not contented therewith, began to follow them to the mountains. In this expedition their fortune failed them, and either the despair of the Thracians, or, as some authors have reported, a miraculous tempest of hail, rain, and lightning, compelled the far greatest part of these barbarous barbarous invaders to return with their wives and children to their antient dwellings. Only thirty thousand penetrated into Dardania, and began there to carve out for themselves new settlements, wherein they were privately assisted by Perseus, who well knew both the nature and importance of his father's scheme. His circumstances did not allow him to act according to his inclination; his pride and avarice swelled his bosom with almost all the vices capable of deforming the human will; his fear, however, taught him to counterfeit some of the virtues which give the highest lustre to a crown. Moved by the terror of their greatness, he sent an embassy to the Romans, entreating them to renew the league made with his father, and to acknowledge him for king of Macedon, promising in return to act as their faithful ally, to leave his neighbours in peace, and to undertake no war without their permission. At home he affected all things that might reconcile him to the minds of the people; he not only curbed his innate thirst of wealth, and had a shew of generosity, but his administration was also wonderfully mild, and, above all, he affected a rigid regard to justice. He sat daily to hear causes, and, having a clear head, decided upon them with some applause. Towards the Greeks he behaved with the utmost moderation; he gratified them in all things they desired of him; he relinquished all the pretences of his ancestors upon any of their cities; in short he behaved so very graciously, that his very favours rendered him suspected. The Romans, when they had heard his ministers, sent over embassadors of their own into Macedon, who were kindly entertained by Perseus, till they began to act like tutors. First, they interrogated him about the Bastarnæ, and began to intimate, that the Romans would not see the Dardanians subjected by these barbarians. Perseus affirmed, that he did not invite them; but that would not serve his turn, they were for forcing him to drive them back again. Shortly after the Dolopians, who were the subjects of Perseus, rebelled, and slew Euphanor his governor under pretence that he had behaved tyrannically; Perseus marched against them with an army, and by force reduced them again under his dominion, not without chastising them pretty severely for their revolt; this furnished the Roman embassadors with new cause of complaint; they said, he was tied up by his treaty from making war without the consent of their state; they intimated as much to Perseus, while he was in the field; but he would not not hear of being tied up from puniſhing rebels, which to him appeared little leſs than taking from him his kingdom. Henceforward therefore the Romans and he were never upon good terms, though they were not immediately engaged in war, which, however, the uneaſineſs only of their reſpective circumſtances hindered, and not any inclination in either to enter into an amicable diſquiſition of the cauſes whence the diſcord between them ſprung. After ſubduing the Dolopians, Perſeus went to make a viſit to the temple of Apollo at Delphi, marching, however, at the head of his army; this ſeemed to be at once a dangerous and unneceſſary expedition, on account of his paſſing through the territories of ſtates little affected to him, and to whom indeed the conduct of his father might have juſtly rendered him obnoxious; yet Perſeus managed it, as not only to avoid giving farther offence, but alſo to make this very march a means of reſtoring friendſhip and confidence between himſelf and theſe ſtates. He took ſuch care in quartering his army, that none were oppreſſed, and paid ſo exactly for whatever they had, that many thought his paſſage a benefit to them. The deputies which were ſent to compliment him, he received kindly and with reſpect; and when he had performed his journey to Delphi, he returned without leaving any mark either of reſentment or ambition behind him. This was a new cauſe of complaint at Rome, where, if the king lived upon ill terms with his neighbours, it was reſented as a mark of his thirſt of power; and if he was deſirous of being upon good terms with them, that too was reſented as an indication of his ſeeking allies, in caſe he made war with the Romans. To ſay the truth, ſuſpicion reigned at preſent in Italy and in Greece, the Romans holding none for friends who ſcrupled obedience in any thing; and the Greeks began to diſtruſt the Roman friendſhip, when they found it as fatal to their liberty as the enmity of others [k]. Hence two factions ſprung up in Greece, the one wholly dependent on Rome, the other deſirous of reſtoring the antient glory of their country, and therefore favouring the king of Macedon, who on all occaſions affected to ſpeak warmly on this topic, and to repreſent the independency of Greece as the main point he

Perseus. Year after the flood 2820. Before Christ 179.

[k] Tit. Liv. lib. xli. Justin. lib. xxxii.

[k] Liv. Hiſt. lib. xli. Juſtin. lib xxxiii. c. 4.

he had in view. As a war was generally expected, and as the king himself meant at last to recur to force, he took great pains to be well provided for it; he cultivated the friendship of the Rhodians, who had been his father's open enemies, and this with such success, that in a most sumptuous manner they conveyed to him Laodice the daughter of Seleucus, son of Antiochus the Great [1]. About the same time he married his sister to Prusias king of Bithynia, whom he had engaged in alliance with him. With the Thracians he not only struck up a peace, but drew them to consent to furnish him with soldiers, when and in what proportion he pleased. In his own kingdom of Macedon, he not only laid up vast sums of money, but provided magazines of provisions for a great army for ten years, keeping up at the same time thirty thousand foot and five thousand horse. These steps appeared so prudent to the Greeks, that, forgetting Eumenes king king of Pergamus, their old favourite, upon which they had heaped extravagant honours, they began to incline to Perseus, who gave himself out for the patron of the Greek liberty against the pride of the Romans. Eumenes, provoked at this, and being also an hereditary enemy to Perseus whom he greatly hated, determined to make a special journey to Rome on purpose to incite the senate to pull down his competitor, whom he now looked on as the idol of Greece. Perseus had also his embassadors, the chief of whom was one Harpalus, at Rome, who, when Eumenes had been heard, requested to speak in the king's defence. This was granted them, and Harpalus, who was at the head of the commission, either of his own head, or by direction from the king, spoke in very high terms. He said, that Perseus had hitherto and would always give every reasonable satisfaction to the Romans, but that he would still remember he was a sovereign prince; and if reasonable satisfaction would not content them, he would not be afraid of betaking himself to arms. The senate acted with its usual caution, concealed the substance of Eumenes's speech, that it might be thought to contain more than it really did, and gave the embassadors of Perseus a cold, general answer. Eumenes, when he went from Rome, resolved to imitate the conduct of his rival, and, in order to regain the favour of the Greeks, to visit the temple at Delphi. Perseus having having intelligence of this, took ſpecial care for his reception, by cauſing four aſſaſſins to hide themſelves behind a wall making one ſide of a narrow paſſage from the ſea to the temple, whence with ſtones they might deſtroy Eumenes without being diſcovered themſelves. This ſcheme was carried into execution, and very narrowly miſſed meeting with ſucceſs. Theſe bravos took the king at the propoſed diſadvantage, and ſo effectually ſtoned him, that they had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of his eſcaping death. They then endeavoured to provide for their own ſafety, and one of them being ſlower of foot than the reſt, they killed him to prevent his making any diſcovery. However, the king came afterwards a little to himſelf, and was conveyed to the iſland of Ægina, where he lay concealed, till ſuch time as he was perfectly recovered. In all probability, Perſeus would have been well contented, notwithſtanding the miſcarriage of his deſign, if it had remained a ſecret; but it was his misfortune to have the whole break out with ſuch evidence as could ſcarce be denied. One Praxo, a lady of quality at Delphi, with whom king Perſeus had lodged, had entertained the aſſaſſins, and one of them was known to be Evander, a Cretan, who was general of the auxiliary troops in the ſervice of the king of Macedon. Valerius, a Roman embaſſador in Greece, cauſed Praxo to be ſeized and ſent into Italy, where they had ſcarce made diſcovery of the plot againſt Eumenes, when the news of another, which more nearly concerned them, came from the diligence of the ſame perſon. Valerius brought with him one Rammius, a citizen of Brunduſium, who opened the following ſcene: he ſaid, that having a large houſe in his native city, he had often entertained the Macedonian embaſſadors, when paſſing to Rome and returning thence home. That king Perſeus, having given him to underſtand that he took very kindly his civility to his miniſters, invited him into Macedon, and when he was come thither, cauſed to be propoſed to him the giving of a certain poiſonous drug to the principal ſenators who were eſteemed enemies to the Macedonian intereſt, which poiſon Rammius was informed would work imperceptibly. That for fear of his own life he had accepted this commiſſion, but had immediately diſcloſed it to Valerius, and with him came home. The Romans upon this diſpatched orders to their embaſſadors in Macedon to acquaint Perſeus with the crimes laid to his charge, and to demand direct anſwers; of which the king being informed, he put off their audience ſeveral times, and having at length tired out their patience, they reſolved to return home. When they were about to put this deſign in execution, he ſent for them, and heard all they had to ſay. In anſwer to their harangue, he fell rudely upon their maſters: he ſaid the Romans were grown ſo intolerably proud, ſo exceſſively infolent, and ſo unreaſonably greedy of authority, that they would not be content to have princes for their allies, unleſs they were alſo their ſlaves. That under colour of ſending embaſſadors, they ſent ſpies, and ſometimes tutors; that as to the league made with his father, he had nothing to do with it. That he had indeed ſubmitted to it on his firſt coming to the crown, becauſe his affairs were unſettled; but that for the future he would not look upon himſelf to be bound by it, though he was content to make a new treaty upon equitable terms. The embaſſadors having according to their inſtructions defied him; he commanded them to depart his dominions in three days. It was the misfortune of this king to have at ſome times too much, and at other times too little, ſpirit. If he had begun the war with the ſame vigour that on this occaſion he ſeemed to declare it, in all probability he had ſucceeded therein; but ſuffering fear to get the better of him, and entertaining falſe hopes of peace, he once more fell into a train of negotiation, than which nothing could be more prejudicial to his affairs. Before we proceed farther, it will be neceſſary to take notice of the conduct of the princes, whoſe dominions bordered on thoſe of Macedon in this nice conjuncture. Gentius king of Illyria, and the Rhodians, inclined to the Macedonia ſide, for which reaſon the Romans dealt haughtily with them for the preſent, and very ſeverely afterwards. Eumenes king of Pergamus did not only diſcover his uſual complaiſance for the Romans, but alſo the moſt fierce and implacable hatred againſt Perſeus. Pruſias king of Bithynia deſired to ſtand neuter. He had obligations to the Romans, and he had married the ſiſter of the king of Macedonian. Antiochus king of Syria declared for the Romans; ſo did the regency in Egypt, where the king was a child. Coyts king of the Odryſians declared for the Macedonians. As for the Greek cities, thoſe in the government were, generally ſpeaking, ſpeaking, in the intereſt of Rome, and the people in moſt of them as generally favourers of Perſeus [m].

[1] Polyb. Legat. lx.

THE freſh applications of the king for peace produced no other anſwer than this, That if he was ſincerely inclined to treat with the Romans, he might have an opportunity of doing it ſhortly in his dominions, into which they were about to ſend their conſul with an army. They were not at all worſe than their words. P. Licinius Craſſus was immediately after diſpatched with an army; but, before he could arrive in Greece, Perſeus had attempted another method of treating; for having been informed, that Martius, a Roman legate, was in Theſſaly, he came himſelf down to Lariſſa, and there deſired to have an interview with him, with which Martius complied. At this conference the artful Roman, though he talked in the high ſtrain of his country, yet he mingled ſo many obliging expreſſions, and teſtified ſuch perſonal reſpect for the king, as put him upon ſending embaſſadors once more to Rome, when his affairs required leading down a good army into Greece, which would have enabled his friends there to have acknowledged their attachment to him, and have prevented the Bœotians and others from declaring as they did for the Romans, merely out of fear. When Martius the Roman embaſſador returned home, he valued himſelf very much for having over-reached the king, and drawn him into a truce; for he had agreed to one for a certain time, whereby himſelf, who was in a condition of acting, was bound up, and the Romans had time given them, till they could be in a condition to act. The embaſſadors of Perſeus, who came in conſequence of this truce to Rome, had audience given them, but notwithſtanding they ſignified the king's readineſs to give full and ample ſatisfaction on every head, they received a very ſhort anſwer, and were commanded to quit Italy in thirty days. When theſe embaſſadors returned, Perſeus with much ado perceived that peace was upon no terms to be had, and therefore, as if it had been againſt his will, though his counſels had hitherto always led that way, he began to prepare for opening the war. He appointed the general rendezvous of his army at Citium, whither when he himself came, he offered a hecatomb to Pallas, and then proceeded to a general review. He mustered on this occasion thirty-nine thousand foot and four thousand horse; the most numerous and by far the finest army, that, since Alexander's expedition into Asia, any Macedonian king had brought into the field. The king having viewed them, mounted his tribunal, from whence he made a long and laboured harangue, entering into a detail of all that had passed between himself and the Romans, from his accession to the crown to that time, which the soldiers heard with some attention and moderate signs of satisfaction; but when at the close he represented the antient glory of the Macedonians, and the misery to which the Romans sought to reduce them in pathetic terms, the army shouted aloud, and promised him that they would die in the field to a man, rather than not equal their ancestors, and redeem their country from any apprehensions of being subjected by this new and arrogant state. The king after this gave audience to the deputies from the several cities of Macedon, each of which offered men, money, and provisions for carrying on the war. Perseus testified the pleasure he received from these tokens of their loyalty, but told them in answer, that as the war he made was for their defence, so he would endeavour, that it should be carried on without any burthen or expence to them, and therefore except carriages for his baggage, he would expect nothing at present from them. These were quickly furnished, and the king took his rout into Thessaly, whither soon after came the Roman consul with two legions, in hopes of finding a confederate army, ready to receive him, strong enough to have faced Perseus; but herein he was mistaken, and, as soon as he found his mistake, was compelled to act slowly and cautiously. The Macedonian king in the mean time had abundance of cities opened to him, and several of those that did not yield, he took by force. At length he began to waste the country about Pherea, notwithstanding the consul lay with his army within two miles of it; and though he had in his army several kings and princes, who came on purpose to shew their fidelity to the Romans and their hatred to Perseus. The consul, however, durst not adventure to offer the enemy battle; which when the Macedonian perceived, he advanced within twelve miles of him, and with his horse and light-armed troops came and insulted him him in his camp. This he repeated ſeveral days together, though he was obliged to ſend every day carriages laden with caſks of water to refreſh his troops, there being none in the road. At length he took a nearer ſtation by ſeven miles, from whence he could with greater facility march to and diſturb the Roman camp. Accordingly inſtead of coming as he was wont to do a little before noon, he appeared next morning before the Roman camp by break of day. The whole camp was in confuſion, and the ſoldiers began to have but an indifferent opinion of a conſul, whoſe firſt intelligence of the enemy came from the noiſe of their arms. Licinius drew up the foot within the camp, the horſe and light-armed troops he ſent to fight the Macedonians. When Perſeus perceived them iſſuing from their camp, he drew his own forces into a line within five hundred paces of their retrenchments. Coyts king of the Odryſians took poſt with his own troops on the left. The Macedonian and Cretan horſe on the right. The king with his houſhold troops in the centre, having before them a forlorn of four hundred ſlingers and archers. On the other ſide all the Roman and Italian horſe were in the right, under the command of Caius Licinius Craſſus. The troops of the allies in the left. Quintus Mucius with a choice corps of horſe was in the centre, having before him a troop of an hundred Gauls, and three hundred of the horſe brought by Eumenes. Four hundred Theſſalian horſe were placed as a corps of reſerve on the left of the left wing, and the reſt of the forces of Eumenes, under the command of himſelf and his brother Attalus, drew up behind the laſt line of horſe between them and the retrenchment. The action was lively, and quickly over, ending every-where to the advantage of the Macedonians. Cotys with his Thracians beat the flower of the Roman cavalry. King Perſeus in the centre broke the auxiliaries, and greater ſlaughter had been made, if the Theſſalian horſe with the light-armed troops had not covered the retreat of the reſt into the camp. The troops on each ſide were about four thouſand. The Romans loſt two hundred horſe killed on the ſpot, as many taken priſoners; and of the foot there were no leſs ſlain than two thouſand. Of the Macedonians there fell twenty horſe and forty foot only. While Perſeus remained in the field, his generals, Hippias and Leonatus, without ſtaying for his command, brought up the phalanx, and preſſed him to ſtorm the enemy's retrenchments. If he had followed their advice, in all probability he had put an end to the war; for by this time the very Greeks, who were in the ſervice of the Romans, began to perceive they were rivetting their own chains, and would gladly have laid hold of any opportunity of declaring againſt their maſters with ſafety. But the cowardly counſel of Evander the Cretan, who had managed the aſſaſſination of Eumenes, prevailed with Perſeus to let things remain as they were till next day; but the conſul prevented his taking ſuch an advantage a ſecond time, by paſſing the river Peneus in the night, and betaking himſelf to an advantageous poſt. The next day Perſeus came with his horſe and foot to take a view of what they might have done the day before; afterwards he advanced to Mopſelus, under colour of ſtreightening the Romans in their new quarters, but in truth, that he might have an opportunity of treating with the conſul. Accordingly he ſent deputies to acquaint him, that, notwithſtanding his late victory, he was contented to accept of the terms which had been granted to his father Philip after he was vanquiſhed. The conſul anſwered, that he would grant him no terms, but thoſe of ſubmitting himſelf and his kingdom to the diſcretion of the Roman people. The king, not yet to be diſcouraged, ſent again to offer tribute, and when he found this application alſo vain, he retired to his old camp. This puſillanimous conduct ruined him in the opinion of both friends and foes; the Romans would grant him nothing, and the Greeks were afraid to expreſs any inclination towards him, having no reaſon to expect that he would defend them, who had ſo little heart to defend himſelf. When Perſeus found that he had no choice but war, he began to renew it, and as he had once been very near ſurprizing the Roman camp, he thought to be quicker the next time; but the Roman conſul was become more careful, and ſo his forced marches had no other conſequences than fatiguing his troops. He then fell upon their foragers with ſome ſucceſs, but this drawing on another horſe battle, he was routed with conſiderable loſs; whereupon he retired into Macedon[n]. On his retreat the conſul recovered ſeveral places in Theſſaly, and Lucretius the Roman

War breaks out with the Romans.

[m] Liv. lib. xlii. Polyb. Legat. lxi. lxii. lxiii. Diodor. Sicul. excerpt. lib. xxvi.

[n] Lib. xliii.

Roman admiral levied heavy contributions on the Greek coaſt. Afterwards Appius Claudius was ſent to penetrate Macedon on the ſide of Illyria; but he had very ill entertainment, for the inhabitants of a frontier town pretending to betray it, the Roman general entered it ſo careleſly, that they had an opportunity of falling upon his troops, which they uſed ſo well, that he was glad to make a very precipitate retreat. However, not long after he took it, while Perſeus with great trouble made an expedition into Ætolia; the principal city in which it was promiſed ſhould be yielded up to him. In this the king miſcarried; but in his return he took ſeveral places, and having ſtrengthened one of his lieutenant generals with ſome recruits, that general fell upon Claudius, routed him, and retook Uſcana. The next ſpring the conſul Martius was ſent to command againſt Perſeus. As ſoon as he came to the army he began to make war in earneſt; his intent was to penetrate into the very heart of Macedonia, which, however, he found a very difficult matter. Perſeus had diſtributed his forces in ſuch a manner as to guard all the paſſes, not knowing where the enemy would break through; encamping himſelf at Dium with a conſiderable corps of troops, that he might be ready to aſſiſt any of his guards that ſhould be attacked. This was wiſely enough contrived, if he had executed his ſcheme with tolerable courage. The Roman conſul attempted to paſs over a very high mountain at a ſmall diſtance from his camp; the road through which he was to paſs was extremely narrow, and very much encumbered, ſo that if there had been no enemy at hand to oppoſe him, the paſſage had been difficult enough. Hippias, however, with a body of Macedonian foot appeared in the way, and ſuch trouble they gave him, that he neither knew how to proceed nor how to retire. If Perſeus had ſupported his own ſoldiers, the conſul had been undone; but he ſpent his time in making courſes with his cavalry, ſo that Hippias was left to fight it out, and Martius with much ado got into the famous vale of Tempe, contrary to all expectation, and when he might have been repelled with eaſe, or, which was worſe, might have been ſtarved with all his army. As ſoon as the timorous Perſeus received the news of the Roman conſul's being in full march towards him, he inſtantly ſtantly ſlighted Dium, a place ſtrong by ſituation, and well fortified, crying out that he was vanquiſhed without a battle, and that all was loſt; he alſo diſpatched orders to Andronicus, governor of Theſſalonica, to burn the arſenal there with all the naval ſtores he had with ſo much pains laid up; and to Nicias, governor of Pella, he ſent poſitive directions to throw all his treaſures into the ſea. The former of theſe orders, Andronicus, who received them, had too much wiſdom to execute; the latter Nicias conceived delivered in terms too preciſe to be diſobeyed, ſo the treaſures were inſtantly thrown into the ſea. When the king recovered his fright a little, and perceived that the conſul now he was come into Macedon could effect no great matter, he ſent to have his treaſures recovered by divers, which was alſo done, and then to reward the wiſdom of Andronicus, the loyalty of Nicias, and the labour of thoſe poor men who had plunged to the bottom of the ſea to ſerve him, he ordered them all to be put to death, hoping by this means to conceal from the world his ſcandalous meanneſs of ſpirit, in throwing up all hopes the very moment he was attacked. With the ſame view he ſent for Hippias and Aſclepiodotus, who had ſo bravely defended the paſſages, and after having with great heat reproved them at the head of the army, he with much ſeeming reluctance left them in their proper commands: had they attempted to defend their conduct, which in itſelf was above cenſure, they had without doubt ſhared in the fate of Andronicus, and the divers. In the mean time the conſul Martius took poſſeſſion of Dium, and advanced farther into Macedonia, having ſent orders for the prætor Lucretius at Lariſſa to tranſport with all diligence proviſions for his army into Macedon. Whether the prætor executed the commands ſent him with all the care he was able, or whether the badneſs of the roads permitted not the waggons to proceed farther than Phila, certain it is, that there they ſtopped. The conſul the farther he marched found his diſtreſs ſtill increaſe, ſo that, terrified with the fear of loſing his whole army, he ſuddenly did what the king had done before, abandoned all that was already in his power, and marched precipitately back to Phila. Perſeus ſeized this opportunity, and, after having given directions for repairing Dium, encamped on the river Eunipus, where he fortified himſelf ſo well, that the conſul durſt not attack him, and which was ſtill worſe, could not advance farther into the country, ſo that except taking the city of Heraclea, he did nothing throughout the whole campaign. To ſhew his good-will, however, he ſent orders to the Roman admiral to make deſcents on the ſea-coaſt, and to make himſelf maſter of all, or at leaſt of moſt of, the conſiderable ports [n]. In obedience to theſe directions, the admiral firſt attempted Theſſalonica, but with very indifferent ſucceſs; the country about it he ravaged, but for the city itſelf he found his forces were not either able to inveſt, or to attack it, ſo he ſailed ſtill along the coaſt, landing and attacking the little cities of Ænia and Antigonia, without being able to take either. Then proceeding to Caſſandria he was there joined by king Eumenes with twenty ſhips of war; they both agreed to beſiege the citadel of Caſſandria in form, which accordingly they did, and for ſome time proceeded ſucceſsfully by ſap; but while they ſounded an alarm in their camp, and made other diſpoſitions for a falſe attack to amuſe the garriſon, the beſieged ſuddenly ſallied and ſurpriſed them, cutting off the miners, and the troops who were ſent to ſupport them. A little after they received relief by ſea; whereupon king Eumenes and the Roman admiral reembarqued their troops, and ſtood away for Demetrias. When they arrived before that city, they again landed; but there they found Euphranor, a Macedonian general, who, having a fine corps of troops under his command, not ſatisfied with preſerving the city, encamped before it, and would not ſo much as ſuffer the Romans to pillage the country without calling them to a ſevere account; whereupon the admiral once more embarqued his forces, being obliged to put an end to the campaign on his ſide, having done juſt nothing at all. The prætor Appius Claudius lay all this while in Illyria with a body of troops; but whether he was never ſtrong enough to invade Macedon, or whether king Perſeus by himſelf or his lieutenants defeated him in any expedition for that purpoſe, we know not, having none but Roman guides to inſtruct us; this is certain, that by the end of the campaign he was in a very miſerable condition, inſomuch, that he earneſtly demanded of

[n] Tit. liv. Hiſt. lib. xliv.

of the Achæans a reinforcement of five thousand men, which he had certainly received, if the envy of Martius the consul had not induced him to send a contrary order under pretence of sparing the Roman allies [o]. These successless proceedings, joined with some apprehensions that the Romans were not very well affected to any kings, induced Eumenes to think of changing sides, and of coming to some agreement with his old enemy Perseus. He thought, however, that his friendship, being of great value, ought to be well paid for, and knowing that the Macedonian had heaped up large treasures, he set his amity at a very high price, no less than fifteen hundred talents. This also he required to be paid down, promising to give hostages for his observing an exact neutrality; and if a farther sum was paid him, to make peace for him with the Romans. Perseus liked every thing but parting with the money, and to this even the giving of hostages would not persuade him, though nothing could be clearer, than that the single detaching of Eumenes from the Roman interest was of much greater value than that sum. The policy of Perseus ran quite a contrary way, he fancied, that his very negotiations would produce the desired effect without parting with a talent; and herein he was right, for they did produce an inveterate hatred between the Romans and their old friend Eumenes; but that hatred did not produce him any good, and we shall see that the same conduct had the like event in other places. Illyria was the only side of the Macedonian kingdom which afforded a plain and open passage. This had hitherto been well secured, partly by force, and partly by artfully keeping up dissensions and disputes between Gentius king of Illyria and the Romans. Perseus was very desirous of pushing this matter still farther; he knew well, that if he could kindle a war against Rome on this side, it would at least protect his territories, and at the same time divide the forces of the republic. He therefore commissioned his embassadors to make Gentius large offers, in case he would break with the Romans and carry on the war with vigour. This young Illyrian prince hearkened willingly to the offers made him, for he comprehended easily enough, that the Romans would extend their dominions on all sides, and that to be their ally would be only in

[o] Polyb. legat. lxxviii.

in other terms to become ſubject to them. He therefore plainly anſwered Perſeus, that he was content to take a ſhare in the war, but that he could by no means ſtir till he had a conſiderable ſum of money. This mention of money ſtopped Perſeus's mouth for a time; however, when the conſul broke into Tempe, Perſeus thought he might as well give Gentius his wealth, as throw it into the ſea; wherefore he ſent him ten talents by way of earneſt, and ſealed up three hundred more, which was the ſum agreed on in the preſence of the Illyrian embaſſadors, and ordered them alſo to be conveyed to his ally; yet here again covetouſneſs getting the better of his fear, he directed they ſhould make very ſlow marches, and ſtop upon the frontiers, till they had further orders. When Gentius had received from Pantauchus the Macedonian miniſter ten talents, and letters from his own embaſſadors, importing, that three hundred more were actually upon the road, he was perſuaded to take what was called the firſt neceſſary ſtep on his ſide, which was to ſeize the Roman embaſſadors, in open violation of the law of nations. Of this when Perſeus had advice, he ſent immediately to put a ſtop to the progreſs of the treaſure waggons; for he knew that Gentius would be forced for his own ſake to engage in a war, on account of his having impriſoned the legates of the republic. This low policy iſſued in the ruin of the Illyrian, his kingdom, and family, at the ſame time that it produced Perſeus no good in the world. Theſe miſtakes one would have thought might have induced the king to have thought better for the future; but he was everlaſtingly ſteady in wrong meaſures, and would never be brought to act otherwiſe, than as a moſt careful treaſurer for his enemies. It happened, that Clondicus, who, from the beſt intelligence we have, ſeems to have been king of the Baſtarnæ, that is, of ſuch of them as had ſettled themſelves on the frontiers of Macedon, had agreed to bring a very conſiderable reinforcement to the king's army, provided, that they might enter into preſent pay upon reaſonable terms. Perſeus promiſed all things, and Clondicus, not dreaming that a king would break his word, ſet out with ten thouſand foot and as many horſe, all choice troops and well diſciplined. As ſoon as king Perſeus had intelligence, of their approach, he ſent one Antigonus, a lord of his court, to congratulate Clondicus, and to deſire him to haſten his march to the camp; when Antigonus had delivered his meſſage, Clondicus anſwered ſwered him, that the Gauls could not march a ſtep farther without money, and that if he had not brought it with him, he muſt return to his maſter and demand it inſtantly. Antigonus, having received this ſhort anſwer, returned with all imaginable ſpeed to his maſter. Perſeus hereupon called a council of war, in which he made a long ſpeech, tending only to ſave his money. He ſaid, that the coming of ſuch a number of Gauls might have a very bad tendency, and that it might be as difficult to get them out of the kingdom, as the Romans; though it was evident enough, he might have employed them immediately in Theſſaly, where, whether they had acted according to his inſtructions or not, they muſt have made a very powerful diverſion, and compelled the Romans to have quitted Macedon. When Perſeus had declaimed upon this head ſufficiently, he proceeded to ſhew, that five thouſand horſe would be as many as he ſhould have occaſion for; and when he had delivered himſelf ſo fully on this ſubject, how could it be expected that any in his council ſhould oppoſe it? Antigonus therefore was ſent back to Clondicus to inform him, that king Perſeus would accept no more than five thouſand horſe; intelligence which might have ſtirred a man of baſe principles to act in ſuch a manner as Perſeus moſt feared. Clondicus, however, made no other anſwer than this: That it was very extraordinary, the king ſhould not have conſidered how many he wanted before they had marched ſo far, and at the ſame time recurred to his old demand, viz. whether he had brought pay for thoſe five thouſand men? Antigonus being forced to own that he had not, Clondicus and his Gauls would have no longer patience; but immediately began their march home again, ſpoiling ſome part of Thrace in their way, which created Perſeus new enemies, at the ſame time that he was juſtly deprived of the aſſiſtance that he hoped from his friends. Beſides the attempts already mentioned, this prince made ſome others, as well for the ſupport of himſelf, as for the withdrawing ſome of their allies from their attachment to the republic. With this view he ſent embaſſadors to Antiochus king of Syria, with orders to repreſent to him, that the Romans were alike enemies to all kings, and that his turn would be next, if once Macedonia was ſubdued; wherefore he prayed him to interpoſe ſo far, as either to oblige the Romans to leave himſelf in quiet poſſeſſion of the kingdom of his anceſtors, or, by joining with him, bring about about ſuch a reduction of the power of the commonwealth, as to compel her to allow peace to all princes, without pretending to preſcribe them laws in their own dominions. Perſeus alſo ſolicited the Rhodians, who at this time were very powerful at ſea, and, by flattering them, induced a favourable regard to be ſhewn to his intereſts. The conſul Martius had alſo ſome points to carry with theſe people, he therefore inſinuated to them, that if they ſent deputies to Rome, they might be a means of reſtoring peace to this part of the world, through their mediation: but in this he moſt egregouſly deluded them, as they found to their coſt; for when their miniſters had audience of the ſenate, and in their harangue propoſed their mediation, they received an anſwer not only harſh and ſevere, but contemptuous alſo in the higheſt degree. The embaſſadors of the king of Bithynia, who likewiſe laboured the ſame point, had a cold return made them; but Oneſimus, a Macedonian nobleman, whoſe attachment to the Romans had obliged him to leave his country, was not only favourably heard by the ſenate, but had a very large penſion aſſigned him, and in all public places was treated with the higheſt reſpect. But it is now time to return to the war, which ended the next campaign in the ruin of Perſeus and the total reduction of his kingdom, though that campaign was over in a fortnight [P].

THE Romans had no reaſon to be ſatisfied with thoſe who had hitherto commanded in Macedon; for though it did not appear, and perhaps it was never ſuſpected, that they were biaſſed from their duty, yet they had very clearly ſhewn, that they wanted courage and conduct to finiſh the war. Theſe commanders therefore were all removed, and new ones appointed. The conſul Paulus Emilius had the command aſſigned him of the army already in Macedonia; Octavius was appointed admiral, and Anicius ſent into Illyria. Theſe changes were all ſo much for the better, that it is not eaſy to ſay, which of the three executed his charge the beſt. Emilius, when he arrived in the Roman camp, found about thirty thouſand men therein, of whom upwards of twelve thouſand were Roman foot. The ſoldiers thought to have treated him as they had done his predeceſſors, deceſſors, ſo they began to queſtion all his commands, to reaſon upon his orders, and to diſcuſs in their own minds the worth of thoſe motives upon which he acted. The conſul would bear nothing of this; he adviſed them to whet their ſwords; as for the duty of a general, he would not lay ſo heavy a burden upon any of his ſoldiers, but was content to take it entirely upon himſelf. To ſhew them, however, that he really knew more than either they or thoſe who had hitherto commanded them, he decamped, and drew nearer the enemy, a motion hitherto thought impracticable on account of the want of water. Emilius rightly conceived, that though there were not either ſprings or rivulets viſible, yet it could not be, that ſo great a mountain as Olympus, ſo covered with fine graſs and beautiful trees, ſhould want water; he therefore ordered wells to be ſunk, which perfectly anſwered his purpoſe, by their becoming preſently full of water; this alſo raiſed the courage of his ſoldiers, and made them perfectly tractable. Emilius next directed enquiries to be privately made, whether there were not ſome roads, however difficult or round about, that led to the top, and ſo over the mount Olympus; for the conſul ſaw plainly, that to attack Perſeus in his retrenched camp, where with extreme diligence he had fortified himſelf, would be to expoſe his troops to a moſt bloody and at the ſame time a moſt hazardous, encounter. His enquiries were not fruitleſs; he was in a ſhort time informed, that there was ſuch a way as he apprehended there was, and that, as it was extremely ſteep and craggy, ſo the guard poſted there was but ſlender. This news rejoiced him, and he thereupon detached five thouſand light-armed troops, under the command of Scipio Emilianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his own ſons, but adopted into other families. When this detachment marched from the camp, it took the road to the ſea, the conſul giving out, that they were to go on board the fleet, which under the command of Octavius lay upon the coaſt, in order to waſte the maritime parts of Macedonia. But when Scipio and Q. Fabius had received the neceſſary proviſions, and night began to fall, they faced about, and marched with all imaginable diligence up the mountain. Three days they employed in paſſing it, and during thoſe three days Emilius drew out his forces, and attacked the Macedonian camp, notwithſtanding that Perſeus by the ſituation and fortifications of his camp, with the engines placed upon them, eaſily and conſtantly ſtantly repulſed the Romans. At length the detachment reached and defeated the Macedonian guards, whom they ſurprized aſleep, though they afterwards ſtood to their arms, and made ſome defence. This obſtacle removed, Scipio and Fabius with their men deſcended by the channel of a brook, now dry, into the country below, and appeared ſuddenly on the other ſide of the Macedonian camp. Perſeus apprized of this, and frighted with the report of his guards, immediately decamped, and retired precipitately to Pydna. There he held a council of war, in which ſome of his beſt friends adviſed him to garriſon his ſtrongeſt cities with his beſt troops, and to lengthen out the war, experience having ſhewn that the Macedonians were better able to keep cities, than the Romans were to take them; but this opinion the king rejected from this cowardly principle, that perhaps the town he choſe for his reſidence might be firſt beſieged. Thoſe who with him diſliked this ſentiment, were for putting all upon a battle. The reaſons they aſſigned in ſupport of their judgment were theſe: firſt, that the army of Perſeus, which conſiſted of ſomewhat more than forty thouſand men, exceeded the conſul's in number: ſecondly, that his troops were the flower of the Macedonian infantry and horſe: thirdly, that they were to fight now for their cities, wives, and children, and would therefore not only behave valiantly, but like deſperate men: fourthly, that the king and moſt of the nobility being preſent would greatly encourage them: fifthly, they had now leiſure to chuſe their ground, ſo as to bring the phalanx, hitherto invincible, to act with the greateſt advantage. It muſt be confeſſed, theſe poſitions were very plauſible, and therefore we need not wonder, that they prevailed on Perſeus, who was a prince of a very deſultory genius, ſometimes violent in one opinion, and preſently recurring with the ſame violence to a contrary ſentiment. When once it was reſolved to fight, the ground was next conſidered, and a line of battle marked out perfectly advantageous to the phalanx, and whereby the wings of the Macedonian army were flanked by the city on one ſide, and by the mountains on the other; theſe diſpoſitions gave the ſoldiers ſuch ſpirits, that, inſtead of being apprehenſive, they rather wiſhed for an engagement, as, on the other hand, Emilius marched with all imaginable ſpeed, that he might overtake the Macedonians, and decide the war at once, being afraid of nothing ſo much as being obliged to take city after city, whereby the war would have been exceedingly protracted. When the troops under the command of the consul had joined those commanded by Scipio and Fabius, they perceived the enemy drawn up in battalia before them. It was growing late, but the ardor of Scipio engaged him to press Emilius not to lose the present opportunity, but to engage immediately. The fact is certain, but the discordance between what is said by Livy [q] and by Plutarch [r], as to the speeches of these captains on this occasion, shew, that under their names we have sentiments only of those authors. In this they agree, that Emilius over-ruled the proposition, and would not hear of attacking with soldiers wearied by a long march men just come out of quarters, and who had provisions and refreshments at hand. The consul, however, directed, that the army should form in order of battle; but while the first line remained under arms, the second was employed in disposing and retrenching a camp, into which, after they had amused and harassed the enemy, the whole Roman army retired, the Macedonians being exceedingly surprized to see them safely and regularly encamped, without their having the least notice of their breaking ground. The same evening there happened an eclipse of the moon, which, as Livy tells us, Sulpitius Gallus, one of the Roman tribunes, foretold, first to the consul, and then with his leave to the army, whereby that terror, which eclipses were wont to breed in ignorant minds, was entirely taken off, and the soldiers more and more disposed to confide in officers of so great wisdom and of such general knowledge. In the Macedonian camp, however, things went not so well, the army were terribly amazed at the eclipse, and began to affright themselves with the apprehension of its portending the extinction of their glory. Early the next morning Perseus made all the necessary dispositions for battle, and did every thing in his power to encourage the soldiers to behave themselves bravely. On the other hand, the consul also made the proper dispositions, and when he had so done, offered a solemn sacrifice to Hercules, who it seems was not easily pleased, for twenty victims were offered without any signs of success. Upon the offering of the twenty-first, the soothsayer pronounced his judgment, that the victory would be to the Romans, if the enemy attacked them. It is not improbable, that Emilius himself gave gave into this delay, for all the morning the ſun was full in the eyes of his ſoldiers. About three o' clock in the afternoon, he ordered a horſe to be turned looſe, as ſome ſay, or, as others affirm, ſent out a party to forage, that the Macedonians might be tempted to attack them, and ſo bring on a battle. However it was, by deſign or chance, a horſe running into the water, and two or three Roman ſoldiers following to catch him, ſome Thracians adventured to take him from them; whereupon a great fray enſued, and ſoon after a general engagement. The Macedonian army was extremely well drawn up; the Thracians, mercenaries, and auxiliaries making a very martial appearance; but the phalanx, ſtruck a peculiar terror from the excellency of its order, and the condition of thoſe who compoſed it; all picked men, all habited in ſcarlet, their ſhields bright and ſhining, and thoſe of the veterans of poliſhed braſs, with their long ſpears, diſpoſed with the utmoſt exactneſs, as if they were drawn up for a review, and not for a battle. The Romans were in their uſual line of battle, and ſhewed the greateſt alacrity in doing their duty, to which Emilius encouraged them by ſhewing himſelf everywhere. Polybius and Livy agree in relating, that Perſeus, after the field oration, retired into the city of Pydna, and there ſpent his time in ſacrificing to Hercules[s]. But one Poſidonius, a Greek writer, who affirmed he was preſent in the battle, tells us quite another thing: he ſays the king had the day before received a kick of a horſe on his thigh, which diſabled him from fighting; but that, againſt the advice of his friends, when the engagement was begun, he ordered a pad to be brought, and being ſet on the horſe unarmed, he rode into the midſt of the battle, encouraging his ſoldiers by his voice and preſence, till he was wounded by one of the Roman darts; then indeed he withdrew[t]. But where-ever king Perſeus was, the engagement ſeemed at the beginning to go in his favour. The light-armed Macedonians charged with ſuch vigour, that, after the battle was over, the bodies of ſome of them were found within two furlongs of the Roman camp. When the phalanx came to charge, the points of their ſpears ſtriking into the Roman ſhields, kept their heavy-armed troops from making any motion, while, on the other hand, Perſeus's light-armed men did terrible execution. On this occaſion, it is ſaid, Emilius tore his cloaths, and alalmoſt gave up all hopes. However, perceiving, as the phalanax gained ground, that it loſt its order in ſeveral places, he cauſed his own light-armed troops to charge in thoſe ſpaces, whereby the Macedonians were ſoon put into confuſion. If Perſeus with his horſe had on the firſt appearance of this charged the Romans briſkly, his infantry would have had time to recover themſelves; but inſtead of this, they baſely provided for their own ſafety by a precipitate flight. The foot finding themſelves deſerted, at laſt fled too, but not till twenty thouſand of them were ſlain. Perſeus with the horſe had taken the road to Pella; the foot took the ſame road, and when it was almoſt night, overtook them in a wood, where they halted; there they fell to upbraiding them with their ſcandalous behaviour; and at laſt, grudging ſuch cowards ſhould have horſes to carry them out of the reach of their enemies, fell to plucking them off, and mounted themſelves. At which Perſeus was ſo frighted, that with a few of his friends he ſtruck into a by-road, pulled off his purple cloak, and tied it before him, and carried his diadem in his hand. About midnight he arrived at Pella, very ſlenderly accompanied; his noblemen being more afraid of him than of the Romans, knowing that he ever loved to ſhift his ill conduct upon others. In his capital he found Euctus and Eudeus, two of his chamberlains, and ſome other officers of his houſhold, who came to wait upon him as they were wont; but Euctus and Eudeus laying hold of this opportunity to demonſtrate to the king the folly of his former conduct, and to exhort him to act more ſteadily for the future, Perſeus in rage drew his dagger, and ſtabbed them both, of which wounds they died in his preſence. After this his court conſiſted but of three perſons, viz. Evander the Cretan, Archidemus the Ætolian, and Neo the Bœotian, with about five hundred Cretan ſoldiers, who remained with him, not out of fidelity, but becauſe they could not depart from the treaſure which he carried along with him. As Pella was the chief city of Macedon, ſo it was alſo one of the ſtrongeſt. It was ſeated on a hill in the midſt of impaſſable marſhes, and was commanded by a citadel much ſtronger, and more inacceſſible than itſelf. Perſeus, however, who could not think himſelf any-where ſafe, fled from thence as precipitately as from the battle, marching with incredible expedition to Amphipolis. When he came thither, he found that

P. Emilius ſent into Macedonia.

[P] Polyb. legat. lxxx. lxxxvi. lxxxvii. &c. Liv. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Æmil.

[q] Hist. lib. xliv. [r] Plut. in vit. Æmil.

[s] Liv. ubi ſupra. Polyb. ap. Plut. [t] Poſidon. ap. Plut.

that Diodorus the governor had by a ſtratagem expelled his Thracian garriſon, leſt they ſhould plunder the city. This, however, did not hinder the king from ſtirring up the Biſaltæ to take arms and come to his aſſiſtance. But when he found all this was in vain, he grew very diſconſolate, and began to fear, that, to preſerve themſelves, the Amphipolitans would deliver him up to the Romans. He therefore came out with Philip, the only child he had with him; and having mounted the tribunal, began to ſpeak; but his tears flowed ſo faſt, after ſeveral trials, he found it impracticable for him to make an oration. Deſcending again from the tribunal, he ſpoke to Evander, who then went up to ſupply his place, and actually began an harangue; but the people hating him, refuſed to hear him, crying out, Be gone, be gone; we are reſolved not to expoſe ourſelves, our wives, and our childern, for your ſakes. Fly therefore, and leave us to make the beſt terms we can with the conquerors. The king, now at his wits end, ſhipped his money, which he ever carried with him, on board ſome barks, ſuffering his Cretans to plunder him of fifty talents, which he left upon the ſhore for them, fearing to give it them, leſt the Macedonians in ſpight ſhould take all the reſt. Attended by theſe guards, he came firſt to Galipſus, and the next day after landed in the iſland of Samo-Thrace, where he brought on ſhore two thouſand talents, intending there to take up his reſidence. Let us now return to the conſul, and obſerve the ſteps he took in ſubduing the kingdom [t].

Macedonia ſubmits. Year after the flood, 2832. Before Chriſt 167.

PAULUS EMILIUS, being a man of ſtrict juſtice, gave, according to the rules of war, the plunder of the camp to the infantry, and of the adjacent territory to the horſe. As for the cities, he would not ſuffer them to be touched; and as for the royal treaſures, he carried the laſt farthing of them to Rome, though it procured him the ill-will of the army. Hippias with other officers who were in Berea, with a conſiderable body of forces, ſurrendered, and immediately after Theſſalonica, Pella, and the reſt of the principal places in Macedon, ſo that the whole kingdom was given up in two days, excepting only Pydna, under the walls of which the battle was fought; the reaſon of which was, that ſeveral thouſand ſoldiers taking ſhelter there, were aſhamed to deliver up ſo conſiderable a place without a capitulation. This was readily granted them; and, as ſoon as the place was evacuated, the conſul marched away to Amphipolis. There he received letters brought by three very mean perſons, who yet were ſtyled the embaſſadors of Perſeus. The conſul no ſooner ſaw them, but turning to thoſe who were about him, he ſaid, Mark the inconſtancy of fortune; this man, who but t'other day thought the ample kingdom of Macedon nothing, if he was hindered from ſubduing the Dardanians and Illyrians, now confined in a narrow iſland, and an exile from his native land, ſends theſe poor men to aſk favours from me. Then reaching out his hand to receive the letters, as ſoon as he had read the ſuperſcription, which ran thus; King Perſeus to the conſul Paulus health; he refuſed to open it, or to give any anſwer. As ſoon as Perſeus had notice of this, he readily perceived that he was now no more than a private perſon, or at leaſt ſo conſidered by the Romans; whereupon he wrote letters a ſecond time, and addreſſed them to the conſul, without aſſuming to himſelf any title at all. In theſe he bewailed his own miſery, implored mercy from the Romans, and begged that commiſſioners might be ſent to treat with him. This laſt, which was all the conſul had in his power to grant, he readily complied with. With theſe commiſſioners let us tranſport ourſelves to Samo-Thrace, in order to obſerve the laſt ſcene of royalty performed by this unfortunate king, and which, if poſſible, we ſhall ſee worſe performed than any of the reſt [u].

[t] Plut. in vit. Æmil. Tit. Liv. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. lib. xxxiii. c. 2.

King Perſeus flies to a ſanctuary.

The temple of Caſtor and Pollux in Samo-Thracia, was at this time an inviolable aſylum, and in truth the whole iſland was looked upon as holy, and conſecrated to thoſe deities. This was the cauſe which induced king Perſeus to fly thither, as ſuppoſing he ſhould there remain in ſafety. On the arrival of Lentulus, Albinus, and Antonius, who were the commiſſioners ſent by the conſul to treat with him, Perſeus inſtantly entered into a negotiation, which, however, he managed ſlowly and improvidently, inſiſting, that he ſhould ſtill retain the title of king, which the commiſſioners told him the conſul would not grant; grant; but that, if he would ſubmit himſelf and his affairs to the direction of the Roman people, the conſul would undertake for his ſafety. While theſe things were debating, Octavius the Roman admiral arrived with a great fleet, which exceedingly awed the Samo-Thracians. Theſe people, conſidering the inſecurity of their own condition, called frequent councils to deliberate what was moſt fit for them to do. In one of theſe aſſemblies, Attilius, a young Roman, appeared, and deſired leave to ſpeak; which once given him, he made a long harangue, wherein having premiſed many things concerning ſanctuaries in general, he came at laſt to put this queſtion, whether the whole iſle of Samo-Thrace was not holy? Which the aſſembly having preſently determined in the affirmative, he proceeded next to demand, Whether it would not be polluted by a notorious murderer's taking ſhelter therein? This being alſo admitted, he ſaid, he would prove that Evander the Cretan, who was with king Perſeus in the temple, had been the principal actor in the aſſaſſination of king Eumenes. The Samo-Thracians upon this ſent to inform Perſeus, that they expected Evander ſhould either ſubmit himſelf to a fair trial, or that he ſhould quit the iſland. Perſeus affrighted at this meſſage, and grievouſly apprehenſive of the conſequence, if Evander ſhould fall into the hands of the Romans, and, to obtain favour for himſelf, ſhould charge that aſſaſſination on its original author; ſent for him, and told him, that the neceſſity of affairs required that he ſhould voluntarily put himſelf to death to ſtop all further enquiries. Evander deſired that he might die by poiſon, rather than by the ſword, hoping that if he could get a little time he might eſcape. But Perſeus, ever vehement in thoſe ſort of enterprizes, ſuſpecting ſomething from this delay, ordered him to be immediately diſpatched; and then, fearing that the Samo-Thracians would look upon this as a pollution of their ſanctuary, bribed one Theondas with a very large ſum of money to aver, that Evander was his own executioner. This ſalved the matter well enough with the Samo-Thracians; but it effectually loſt Perſeus the hearts of all his friends. Evander was doubtleſs a bad man, otherwiſe he would not have been concerned in the attempt on Eumenes; but, as he did this at the command of Perſeus, as he had conſtantly followed the fortunes of that prince, and had never betrayed him in any thing, it was held an act of the greateſt ingratitude and meanneſs of ſpirit in the king to forget all his ſervices in an inſtant, and at the firſt ſight of danger to give him up to a violent death, not by the hands of ſtrangers, but his own ſervants. Perſeus having now a proſpect of his miſery in a true light, beholding himſelf without forces, without friends, and without hopes, reſolved, if poſſible, to eſcape into Crete, and to that end bargained with one Oroandes a Cretan, who had a ſmall ſhip in the haven of Samo-Thrace, to carry himſelf, his wife, his ſon, his treaſure, and three attendants to the iſland before-mentioned. The crafty maſter of the veſſel took the money on board firſt, and then aſſigned an hour in the night for the king and his company to come on board. But as ſoon as it began to grow dark, he hoiſted ſail, and left the hapleſs Perſeus to deplore at leiſure his credulity and the loſs of his money. At midnight the king, his wife, his ſon Philip, and three attendants, ſlipped by a back gate into a garden behind his apartment; then clambering with much difficulty over a wall, they made the beſt of their way to the port, and, after wandering till it was almoſt light on the ſea ſhore, were informed by a ſtranger, that Oroandes ſailed for Crete the evening before. The king, his conſort, and the young prince, with thoſe who attended them, were forced to make all imaginable ſpeed back, that they might regain the temple before they were diſcovered by the Romans. But finding the day broke before they reached the wall of the garden, they were conſtrained to hide themſelves there behind a corner, till by degrees they could get in unperceived. It was not long after this, that the king ſurrendered himſelf to the admiral Octavius, moved thereto by new misfortunes, eſpecially the two following accidents: Firſt, the deſertion of all his pages, which happened on the Romans publiſhing a manifeſto or proclamation, whereby they declared, that all ſuch as quitted the ſervice of king Perſeus, ſhould not only be ſafe in their perſons, but have their eſtates reſtored them alſo in Macedon, and remain at full liberty. The other, the news that Ion of Theſſalonica, one of the king's principal favourites, had given up all the reſt of the royal family entruſted to his care to Octavius. He it was who had the honour of receiving priſoner alſo the king of Macedon, his eldeſt ſon Philip, and the few that were yet about him. Octavius, as ſoon as he had him in his power, ordered the king to be put on board the admiral, and having embarked alſo all his treaſure that was left, the Roman fleet weighed, and ſtood over to Amphipolis. Thence the admiral diſpatched an expreſs to acquaint the conſul with what had happened; to aſſure him, that Perſeus was in his cuſtody, and that he ſhould be ſpeedily ſent to attend his pleaſure [w].

[u] Liv. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra.

and

The reception of Perſeus in the Roman camp.

As ſoon as Paulus Emilius received the letter of Octavius, he ſent Tubero his ſon-in-law with ſeveral perſons of diſtinction to receive the king. He ordered ſacrifices to be immediately offered, and made the ſame rejoicings, as if a new victory had been obtained. When he was informed the king drew near, he aſſembled a council of war in his own pavilion, where he reſolved to wait for him. The whole camp ran out to ſee the royal priſoner, and the crowd was ſo very great, that the lictors were conſtrained to make a way for him to the conſul's tent. Perſeus walked alone, covered with a mourning cloak; and when he entered the tent, would have thrown himſelf at the feet of the conſul; but Emilius riſing haſtily, ſtepped forward a little, gave him his hand, and would not ſuffer him to kneel. He then placed him in a ſeat over againſt thoſe who aſſiſted at the council. When ſilence had been obſerved ſome time, the conſul demanded of the king what wrong the Roman people had done him, which had conſtrained him to take up arms, and with ſuch obſtinacy to perſiſt in hazarding his perſon, ſubjects, and kingdom, as he did. The king, looking on the ground and ſhedding tears, ſpake not a word. Whereupon the conſul continued his diſcourſe: "If, ſaid he, you had been very "young when you came to the throne, I ſhould have "imputed your raſhneſs to your not knowing the world. "But inaſmuch as you ſerved in that war which your fa-"ther waged againſt us, knew its ſucceſs, and knew "alſo how faithfully we obſerved the treaty we made "with him; what ſtrange policy was it for you to chuſe "war rather than peace, with a people, whoſe force, and "whoſe fidelity, you had already tried; and therefore "might well apprehend, what might be feared from the "one, or hoped from the other?" The king ſtill remaining ſilent, the conſul after ſome pauſe concluded thus: "However theſe things have come to paſs, whether "by [w] Liv. lib. xlv Plut. in vit. Æmil.

" by human error, by chance, or through neceſſity, do " not deſpair; the clemency of the Roman people, ſo " well known and ſo often experienced, may afford you " not only hope, but aſſurance, of ſafety." All this the conſul ſpoke in Greek; then turning to his council, he ſaid in Latin. " You ſee here a notable inſtance of the incer- " tainty of human grandeur and of the mutability of for- " tune; let it make a proper impreſſion on you all; but " eſpecially on ſuch of you as are in the vigor of your " age. Let not preſent proſperity ſo far puff up any man, " as to make him behave with arrogance towards another; " neither let any man confide in his good fortune, for he " cannot tell how ſoon it may forſake him. His courage " only ſhall be admired by me, which neither the flow of " fortune ſwells, or its ebb decreaſes; but who preſerves " a ſteady temper of mind, in all times and on all oc- " caſions." Then he committed Perſeus to the cuſtody of Tubero, directing, that he ſhould ſup with him that night, and then and ever after treated him with all imaginable civility and reſpect. Emilius, having thus ſettled all things in Macedon, proceeded to a progreſs through Greece, where he ordered all matters as might beſt ſuit the intereſt of the Romans; and though he was naturally a merciful man, uſed ſeverity enough. At length hearing that ten legates, all men of conſular dignity, were coming from Rome to aſſiſt him in ſettling a new form of government in Macedonia, he ſpeedily returned thither, directing his courſe to Apollonia, where he was informed they were to land; there he was met by king Perſeus, whom Sulpitius, to whoſe cuſtody, on the conſul's going into Greece, he had been committed, ſuffered to go at large. Emilius received the king kindly; but when he came to Amphipolis, he checked Sulpitius very ſeverely for ſuffering the king to go where he pleaſed. Poſthumius therefore had the charge of him for the future, who kept him and his ſon Philip very ſtreightly; as for his younger ſon Alexander and his daughter, Emilius ſent for them from Samo-Thrace to Amphipolis, where he treated them with much kindneſs. As to the eſtabliſhing of the new government, Emilius iſſued his precepts, directing, that ten deputies from each of the Macedonian cities ſhould appear before him at a day certain, and bring with them ſuch papers of ſtate, and all ſuch ſums of money and plate as they had any knowledge of belonging to the king. At the day aſſigned, they appeared: then it was, that Emilius with with his ten collegues mounted the tribunal, together with the prætor Octavius, the lictors attending. The Macedonians, though they had been uſed to ſee their princes do juſtice, and were no ſtrangers to courts eſtabliſhed by authority, yet were ſurprized at this; the auſterity of the Romans, the uſing of the Latin language in all their proceedings, and their cuſtoms ſo different from thoſe of the Greeks, ſtruck terror and amazement into the deputies, and all who were preſent. However, they were not left long in the dark, as to what the ſenate and people of Rome expected from them. Emilius had the decree ready drawn in his hand, which he pronounced with a ſlow and audible voice, but in the Latin tongue. Then the prætor Octavius acquainted the aſſembly, that it was to the following purpoſe. Firſt, that the ſenate ordained the Macedonians ſhould be free, and that they ſhould enjoy all the cities and territories they were now poſſeſſed of, living for the preſent under their own laws, and electing annually their magiſtrates, as they were wont to do, paying to the people of Rome half the tribute which they uſually paid to their kings. Secondly, their will was, that Macedonia ſhould be divided into four regions; the firſt to contain all the countries between the rivers Strymon and Neſſus, together with ſuch boroughs, cities, and caſtles, as Perſeus held beyond the river Neſſus; the cities of Ænus, Maronea, aud Abdera excepted. On the weſt of Strymon the territory of the Biſaltæ and Heraclea Syntica were added to this region. The ſecond included the country between Strymon and Axius, together with Pœonia. The third had the river Axius for its eaſt, and the river Peneus for its weſt, boundary. Towards the north it was bounded by the mountain Bora, the cities of Edeſſus and Berea being annexed thereto. The fourth contained the remainder of Macedonia beyond the mountain Bora, having Illyria on the one ſide, and Epirus on the other. The capital of the firſt region was to be Amphipolis; of the ſecond Theſſalonica; of the third Pella; of the fourth Pelagonia. To theſe cities they were once a quarter to be ſummoned to hold general aſſemblies to raiſe money, and to elect magiſtrates. Thirdly, it was declared unlawful for any perſon to intermarry, or carry on any trade, or buy or ſell any lands to any who was not an inhabitant of his own region. Fourthly, they were prohibited to work any mines of gold or ſilver; thoſe of iron and braſs they were allowed to work, paying half the rent to the Romans, which they were wont to pay to their kings. Fifthly, they were prohibited from importing any foreign ſalt. Sixthly, they were forbid to ſell any timber fit for building ſhips to the barbarous nations. But they were allowed for their neceſſary defence to keep garriſons on their frontiers. Seventhly, the Macedonians were directed to enrol their names, Emilius ſignifying to them that he intended to give them laws. When this decree was publiſhed, it greatly affected the minds of the people. Glad they were to be reſtored to their liberty: but at the ſame time they were ſorry, that they could not well comprehend what that liberty was they were reſtored to. They ſaw evident contradictions in the decree, which, though it ſpake of leaving them under their own laws, impoſed many new ones, and threatened more. What moſt diſturbed them was the diviſion of the kingdom, whereby, as a nation, they were torn and mangled, ſeparated and disjointed from each other. One thing, however, was generally applauded, viz. the prohibition to work the gold and ſilver mines, which was founded upon this caution. The ſenate ſaw, that to collect a revenue from them, tax-gatherers, ſurveyors, and receivers, muſt of neceſſity be employed; they therefore choſe to forego all the advantages theſe mines could produce, rather than plague their new ſubjects with officers of the revenue; as Livy expreſly informs us. Emilius proceeded next to regulate the reſt of the Grecian affairs at Amphipolis; where at the cloſe of the proceedings, Andronichus the Ætolian and Neo the Bœotian, becauſe they had been always friends to Perſeus, and had not deſerted him even now, were condemned, and loſt their heads. Then came out a proclamation, whereby the ſupreme power in Macedon was veſted in certain ſenators. All the nobility, as alſo all their children exceeding the age of fifteen, were commanded immediately to tranſport themſelves over into Italy; as were likewiſe all ſuch as ever had any commiſſion even of the ſmalleſt importance from the king or his predeceſſors; and it was declared, that whoever preſumed to contravene that edict ſhould be puniſhed with death. Laſt of all, Emilius publiſhed the laws he had promiſed, which, whether they were or were not to the liking of the Macedonians, they were ever after bound to obey. Theſe ſerious matters once out of the way, Emilius celebrated games at Amphipolis, with a magnificence unknown to former times. The brazen ſhields belonging to the Macedonian phalanx he ſent on board the ſhips. All the reſt of the arms belonging to the Macedonians he cauſed to be brought to Amphipolis, and, as it was intended they ſhould never raiſe armies, nor be troubled with military expeditions more, theſe weapons were framed into a prodigious pile, after ſolemn prayers offered to Mars, Minerva, and other deities, the conſul firſt ſet fire to them with a torch he had in his hand, and then the principal officers in the army threw in thoſe lighted torches with which they had aſſiſted at the ſolemnity. All the rich furniture, plate, ſtatues, and other valuable things found in the royal palaces, were firſt expoſed to public view, and then put on board the fleet (D).

the

Emilius

(D) It is a great misfortune to ſuch as are engaged in writing the hiſtories of nations conquered by the Romans, that they have no materials, but the writings of Romans, or of the Greeks, who flattered the power of the Romans more than the ſpirit of their own writers would allow them to do. Livy, whoſe hiſtory may be juſtly ſaid to vie with its ſubject, repreſents his countrymen as acting upon the nobleſt and moſt philoſophical principles upon all occaſions. He ſays, that with reſpect to the Macedonians, the conſul Emilius treated them in ſuch a manner as tended to convince the world, that the Romans did not make war with a view to enſlave free men, but on the contrary, that they might be able to ſet free ſuch nations as were already enſlaved (7). Plutarch ſpeaks much the ſame language, and highly commends his hero, the ſenate and people of Rome, for ſo generouſly treating thoſe whom they had totally ſubdued (8). To adventure, without authority, to contradict authors ſo much and ſo juſtly in eſteem, may ſeem a high preſumption. Yet this preſumption we muſt be guilty of, in order to ſet this part of our hiſtory in its proper light; it will, however, be ſomewhat alleviated by our grounding all the obſervations we make on facts recorded by the authors from whoſe ſentiments we beg leave to differ. In the firſt place, let us remark, that Perſeus, from the very beginning of the war, was for ſubmitting almoſt to any thing, provided the

(7) Tit. Liv. Hiſt. lib. xliv. xlv.

(8) Plut. in vit. P. Æmil.

Emilius afterwards marched away for Oricum, having firſt given inſtructions, that all that part of Epirus, which had revolted the Romans would grant him peace, which was refuſed him, except he would put himſelf in that condition into which the moſt unſucceſsful war could ſcarce reduce him. This the conſul Licinius Craſſus told him in few words, when as yet the Romans had not entered Macedonia, but were, on the contrary, in danger of being beat out of Theſſaly. This conduct may be ſanctified with the epithets firm, magnanimous, heroic; but whoever conſiders who the Macedonians were, muſt allow, that it was at leaſt haughty, if not tyrannical. If ſubjection was ſo hateful to the Romans, that they thought all things lawful to ſhake it off; why ſhould it not appear in the ſame dreadful light to the Macedonians; and if ſo, what magnanimity, was there in preſſing it upon them, and how was Perſeus or his ſubjects to blame for endeavouring to avoid ſo ſervile a ſubmiſſion? ſecondly, what ſort of liberty was it theſe people received from Emilius after his victory? To anſwer this queſtion in few words, we may juſtly alledge, that they received none at all; for which we aſſign this reaſon, that the conſul left them not ſo free as they had been under their kings. It is clear from the foregoing hiſtory, that the moſt eminent cities in Macedonia were like the free cities of the German empire; a ſort of little republics aſſociated among themſelves, and owing certain homage to their prince. The liberty they enjoyed made them populous and rich, the government they were under provided effectually for their ſafety, nor did Perſeus himſelf, for aught we ſee, violate the rights of theſe cities; on the contrary, when their deputies offered him levies and ſubſidies, he declined both, and deſired only that they would furniſh his army with waggons. Paulus Emilius inſtantly divided the whole realm into tetrarchies, with a ſevere prohibition to the inhabitants of each tetrarchy to interfere with the inhabitants of another tetrachy, in any amicable way whatſoever. He alſo took upon him the office of legiſlator, and gave them not only new laws, but a new conſtitution. Where then was their liberty? Thirdly, great ſtreſs is laid on the great abatement of tribute made by the victor; for inſtead of two hundred talents yearly exacted by the Macedonian kings from their ſubjects, the Romans were contented with one hundred. Yet what intelligent perſon can deny that a hundred talents annually paid to a foreign people, is a heavier load than two, nay, than four hundred, raiſed, and afterwards ſpent, at home? But, beſides, one may juſtly wonder how it could be thought equitable to charge thoſe people with any taxes,

revolted to Perseus, should be plundered; and that this might be done with more effect, centurions were sent to the several cities, who gave out, that all garrisons were to be withdrawn, and the Epirots restored to their liberty; yet on a day assigned, when the people thought themselves all safe, the troops in every city sacked and plundered it, carrying off an immense sum of money: after which joining Emilius, the whole army together, with the captive kings Perseus and Gentius, who was taken by the prætor Anicius, were transported to Italy [x] (E).

Emilius

[x] Plut. in vit. Æmil. Liv. ubi supra.

taxes, when such an immense sum of ready-money was taken from them, as released the Romans from all taxes for one hundred and twenty-five years. If we sum up therefore all these regulations, viz. the quartering the kingdom, the settling new laws, the carrying away of the wealth, the prohibition to bring the bullion from the mines, the leaving them still burthened with a tax of an hundred talents, and add to these the carrying away of all their nobility above the age of fifteen, we shall have a right comprehension of the matter, and be well able to account for two things, viz. how the Romans came to stand less in fear of the Macedonians, when a free people, as they called them, than while they were under the dominion of their kings. And, secondly, how these Macedonians came to be so strangely ungrateful, as eagerly to lay hold of every opportunity of taking arms against these Romans, and of endeavouring to change their new constitution for their old one (9).

(E) The fate of Gentius king of Illyria hath such a necessary dependence on the Macedonian history, that there was a necessity of taking notice of it somewhere, and therefore to avoid prolixity, we thought proper to digest it into a note. The reader has been already informed, that the prætor Appius Claudius had been able to do little or nothing on this side, except giving umbrage to the king of Illyria, which made him the more ready to hearken to the propositions made him by Perseus. Anicius, who was named successor to Claudius, at the same time that Emilius was sent to command in Macedon, made very quick dispatch in the Illyrian war. He took care to have his army well recruited, and acting, as he did, in strict conjunction with the consul and

(9) Vide infra.

The miserable end of Perseus.

Emilius sailed up the Tiber in king Perseus's royal galley, richly adorned with the arms of his prisoners, and and the admiral Octavius, all things went on well. Gentius had assembled an army of fifteen thousand men at Lissus, where he waited for the coming of the three hundred talents, intending on the receipt of them to have marched away into Macedonia, there to have joined the king. Anicius saved him this trouble, by meeting him with the Roman army; whereupon a smart engagement happened, in which at last Gentius was overcome. However, he had the strong city of Scodra behind him, and to which with much ado he retreated. If he had been content to have defended that city, he had gained time at least, and in the end perhaps might have made some sort of treaty; but the Illyrians, vexed at their late defeat, flattered themselves with better success in another engagement, and therefore on the first appearance of the Roman army, would needs march out to fight them. Anicius looked upon this to be an event more fortunate than he could have expected; wherefore he immediately gave them battle, and with great slaughter defeated them. However, the king got a second time into Scodra, which was a city strong by situation, and extremely well fortified. It had also in it a very numerous garrison, the flower of the Illyrian nobility, and the king himself; yet it scarce made any defence. Gentius was terrified; for, to say the truth, he derived all his courage from the bottle, and having now time to be sober, grew quite out of heart. He therefore sent to the prætor, desiring leave to treat, and that a truce of three days might be granted him, which, with much ado, he obtained. This delay he procured in expectation of succours; but either his people were not over loyal, or their force was quite exhausted, so that within the space of these three days, the king had certain intelligence that his expectations were vain, which determined him to yield on the prætor's terms, that is, at discretion. In consequence of this, himself, his mother, his wife, children, brother, and friends, were yielded prisoners, and were afterwards led in triumph at Rome; and his whole kingdom delivered up. This conquest cost a campaign only of a month, so that Perpenna one of the Roman embassadors, whom Gentius had imprisoned, carried the news to Rome of the ending of the war before they had any notion there of its being begun (10). The Illyrians were not the only people, as the reader hath seen and with the king's purple robes. Though nothing could be more glorious than the ſhort and ſudden conqueſt which this great general had made of ſo large a kingdom, yet, on account of ſome diſcontent his ſoldiers had taken, there aroſe great diſputes about his triumph. Until ſuch time as this could be decided, and afterwards, while the neceſſary preparations were making for the triumph, king Perſeus was confined in a common gaol. When he knew that a triumph was decreed Emilius, he ſent to beſeech him, that he might not be made a ſpectacle therein; to which the general made anſwer, This is entirely in his own power, he need not aſk this favour of me; intimating, that the king might kill himſelf, and thereby avoid that ſhame of which he ſtood in fear. But if he had inclined to this, he might as well have done it in Macedon or Samo-Thrace, unleſs that we ſuppoſe he relied upon the general's promiſe at Amphipolis, which was indeed very indifferently kept. On the day of the triſeen in the text, whom Perſeus brought into a moſt diſtreſſed condition: part of Epirus had revolted to him, and paid dearly for that revolt. The occaſion of it is ſo much to our purpoſe, that we cannot omit it. In the war againſt Philip the father of Perſeus, one Charopus, an Epirot by birth, had conducted Titus Flaminius with the Roman army over the mountains; for this eminent ſervice he and his ſon of the ſame name were highly careſſed at Rome, and after a time the young one returned into his own country, where he affected to govern all things at his pleaſure, ſending private information to the ſenate againſt ſuch of the nobility as oppoſed him, and thereby working ſuch quick deſtruction to them and their families, as compelled them to have recourſe to Perſeus (11). The Achæans too, being ſuſpected of having wiſhed the king no evil, were for that reaſon conſtrained to ſend a thouſand perſons of diſtinction to Rome, who were immediately impriſoned as malefactors convict, and in ſpight of repeated embaſſies in their favour, remained ſeventeen years in that cuſtody, and at length thirty, being all that remained alive, were allowed to return home; among whom was Polybius the famous hiſtorian. Such were the fatal conſequences of this Macedonian war (12).

(10) Tit. Liv. Hist. ubi supra.

(11) Excerpt. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xxvi. (12) Liv. ubi ſupra.

triumph, immediately after the arms, treaſures, and gold plate belonging to king Perſeus's table, followed his ſons, Philip and Alexander, and his little daughter, with their nurſes, preceptors, and attendants; all brought to them on this occaſion, not to render them any ſervice, but to heighten the pomp of the proceſſion. Theſe poor people wept, and wrung their hands, and made the children alſo extend their arms to move the compaſſion of the people. Next them came Perſeus alone, clad in deep mourning. Behind, at ſome diſtance, his friends and the chief nobility of Macedon. They moved along with their hands folded, and their eyes fixed upon the king, as if their concern for him had ſwallowed up all concern for their own condition. After the triumph, Perſeus was ſent back to the gaol, and put amongſt the meaneſt criminals, no care being taken that he ſhould have ſo much as a ſubſiſtance. In this miſerable ſtate, he remained four days faſting. At laſt he beſought ſome of the poor people there to give him part of their proviſion, which they very readily did, and at the ſame time procured for him a rope and a ſword, ſuppoſing that he would be glad to end his misfortunes by one of them; which, however, he did not, but continued to live on. Some time afterwards, at the requeſt of Emilius, he was taken out of this priſon, and put into a milder cuſtody. Some ſay, that he was ſent with his ſon Alexander, his eldeſt ſon being dead, to Alba, where, though he had a guard placed upon him, he had a houſe, a table, and neceſſary attendants aſſigned him. Yet, after all, he ended his days moſt miſerably; for ſome ſay, that having diſobliged his keeper, he killed him. Others that the ſoldiers appointed for his guard, taking a diſlike to him, would never ſuffer him to ſleep, and ſo by continual watching brought him to his end. It is but juſt we ſhould obſerve, that ſome ſay he died a natural death, which, however, can hardly be credited, if we conſider the authority on which the former opinion is built, and which we have therefore ſet down at large in a note (F). Here

(F) We are indebted to Diodorus Siculus for a diſtinct account of the death of the unfortunate Perſeus, as we are indebted to the judicious patriarch Photius for preſerving us this account; which is to the following effect: Perſeus, after he had been led in triumph, fell into ſuch extreme miſery, and experienced ſuch

Here the antient and famous kingdom of Macedon ended after having ſubſiſted from the time of Caranus upwards of ſix hundred years, and from the death of Alexander the Great not quite a hundred and threeſcore. It is certain, ſuch incredible misfortunes, that hardly any thing related by writers of romances can be compared with what is truly recorded of his ill fate. Yet ſtill he was fond of life. " Before the ſe-

" nate had determined any thing as to his puniſhment, one of " the city prætors threw him and his children into the gaol
" Albinus. This priſon is a deep dungeon of the bigneſs of " a chamber, capable of holding nine beds at the moſt; dark and " full of all ſorts of filth and naſtineſs, by reaſon of the multitude " of men condemned for capital offences, that from time to " time were thruſt down there; and generally moſt of ſuch
" malefactors were put into this place. So that many be" ing ſhut up together, in ſo ſtreight a place, thoſe miſerable " creatures were even turned into beaſts. And in regard the " meat, drink, and other neceſſaries which were brought them,
" were jumbled together in one chäos or heap of confuſion,
" there aroſe thence ſuch a ſtench, that none that came near
" were able to endure. In a moſt miſerable condition
" Perſeus continued here for the ſpace of ſeven days, inſomuch,
" that he begged relief, and ſome ſhare of the food of thoſe
" ſtrangers in priſon who had only a ſtinted allowance. They,
" out of compaſſion to this miſerable man, with great humanity
" and tears in their eyes, gave him part of that ſmall pittance
" they had, and withal offered him a rope and a ſword, to " uſe which of them he would at his pleaſure, for the put" ting an end to his life. Yet nothing ſeems ſo ſweet as life, " even to the miſerable; though they ſuffer what is equivalent " to death itſelf in the mean time. To conclude, he had cer" tainly ended his days in this extreme miſery, if Marcus
" Emilius, preſident of the court, out of reſpect to the dignity " of his perſon, moved by the natural and innate humanity of " the Romans, had not, with ſome indignation, moved the ſe-
" nate in his behalf, putting them in mind that though they " feared not man, yet they ſhould bear ſome awe and reverence " to Nemeſis, who will take vengeance on them that uſe their " power with pride and inſolency. Upon this he was com" mitted to a more moderate confinement; and while he was " feeding himſelf with freſh hopes, he ended his days agreeable " to the former misfortunes of his life. For after he lived two " years in this fond love of life, having diſpleaſed his barba" rous keepers, they would not ſuffer him to ſleep, and ſo he " died" (13).

(13) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xxxi. apud Phot. Bibliothec. p. 1157.

tain, that nothing contributed so much to the destruction of the Macedonian empire, as the unhappy disposition of its last prince. Perseus laid the foundation of all his subsequent misfortunes in his father's life-time, by destroying his brother Demetrius, whereby he lost the affections of a great part of his countrymen, and at the same time drew upon himself the implacable hatred of the Romans. His capital vices were covetousness and cruelty. He discovered the last first by murdering Apelles, whom his father had sent embassador to Rome, and whom himself had suborned to deliver the forged letter, which took away his brother's life. Thenceforward he addicted himself to all sorts of sinister methods for filling his treasures, and taking off his enemies. Poisons, assassinations, murders with his own hand; actions which might have shaken the fidelity of any people, did not render the Macedonians disloyal. Perhaps, both they and the allies of Perseus saw clearly, that, bad as he was, he was the only instrument they could make use of to ward off that slavery, which, notwithstanding all their fair pretences, the Romans were spreading over Europe, Asia, and Afric. Natural timidity, and the consciousness of a long scene of crimes, rendered Perseus unable to manage so great a controversy against so potent and so firm an enemy as the Romans. His own sense of his incapacity, which must have saved him, if he had made use of it in time, most effectually contributed to his ruin, by suggesting to him desires of peace out of all time. All writers agree, that Perseus was the very reverse of his father; for as Philip's prudence served him best in adversity, and taught him to restore to a flourishing condition a kingdom quite exhausted, so Perseus, after shewing great abilities in prosperity, seemed to lose them all with his fortune, and to suffer his spirits to sink as low as his condition. The treatment given him by the Romans, cannot, however, be excused, either from their greatness or his misery. The former left them little to fear, and the latter took away that little which they might pretend to fear. We must therefore attribute their conduct towards Perseus to that haughtiness which began to grow upon them, and made them forget, as well the meaness of their former state, as the grandeur of others [y].

PERSEUS,

[y] Plut. in vit. Æmil. Oros. lib. xi. Justin. lib. xxxii. Liv. ubi supra. Diodor. Sicul. excerpt. lib. xxxi. apud Phot.

His poſterity

PERSEUS, when he was led in triumph, had two ſons Philip and Alexander, and a daughter, whoſe name we find not. As to their ages, we can ſay nothing with certainty, except that they were all very young, and the two laſt infants. Philip is ſaid to have died before his father; but how or where cannot be collected, becauſe the books of Livy and of Diodorus Siculus, which treat of theſe times, are loſt. As for Alexander he was put out to a joyner, carpenter, or turner, and grew an ingenious man in his profeſſion, and addicted himſelf alſo to the Latin learning; he became afterwards clerk or ſecretary to the ſenate. This was another inſtance of the Roman pride; for at the ſame time Nicomedes the ſon of Pruſias, king of Bithynia, was educated with all imaginable pomp and ſplendor, becauſe his father had ſent him thither, and put him under the care of the republic. It may be wondered, that the allies and relations of Perſeus could do nothing either for him or his off-ſpring; but we need not be at much pains to account for this; they had much ado to bring off themſelves. After Emilius had viſited Greece, the Rhodians were called to an account for the kindneſs they had expreſſed to Perſeus. King Eumenes was treated with great coldneſs, not to ſay contempt, for not hating that prince to the laſt, as heartily as he had done at firſt. The ſon of Cotys king of Thrace, one of the wiſeſt and moſt generous princes of his time, was made priſoner at the battle of Pydna; and though the Romans did vouchſafe to ſend him back to his father, yet they ſent embaſſadors with him, who read Cotys a very round lecture, exaggerating his fault, the mercy ſhewn him by the Romans, and how dangerous it would be for him to offend a ſecond time. As we have conducted the Macedonian kingdom to its cloſe, it ſhould ſeem that we ought here to put an end to this ſection. But the reader muſt remember, that the Macedonians were ſtill free, and our buſineſs is to ſhew how they loſt their freedom, and how that once noble kingdom came to be reduced to the form of a province; and as theſe events were not brought about, but by new and fierce wars, it is neceſſary that we enter into a detail of them, and look upon the laſt ſtrugglings of this noble nation to preſerve themſelves from being ſwallowed up by the Roman power, after they had once held the empire of the world, and for a long time the supreme authority in Greece [z].

[h] Id. ibid.

Andriscus calls himself Philip the son of Perseus.

Year after the flood 2847. Before Christ 152.

The settlement, made by Paulus Emilius in Macedon, was extremely well adapted to the purpose of the senate and people of Rome; for in the first place, every city became a sort of republic. Once in three months the general assembly of the district met, and deputies were annually chosen in each of the regions, in whom the supreme power, so far as was consistent with their duty to Rome, was vested. All their antient nobility dwelt in Italy. Thither their wealth had been transferred, and consequently whatever boasting might be made of setting them free, they were now no better than a poor, divided, headless, and heartless people. Sixteen years they had remained in this state, when it began to be whispered about, that one of the sons of Perseus was living. All who speak of this matter being either Latin writers, or such as took their materials from them, we must be content to hear the story in the form they were pleased to place it, though very probable it is, that the Greek historians of those times might deliver it in another manner. The best accounts we have tell us, that one Andriscus, a native of the city of Adramyttium, in the country of Troas in Lesser Asia, by birth and manners of the very dregs of the people, took upon him to be Philip the son of Perseus. Not that Philip who was led with his father in triumph, but another begotten on a nameless concubine of his, and preserved from slaughter, as he pretended, thus: he was born, he said, while Perseus was engaged in the war against the Romans; and the king, being already apprehensive of its issue, ordered his birth to be concealed, and committed him to the care of one Cyrthesa to be privately brought up, that in case things should fall out amiss, one of the blood royal might be preserved and one day assert his right to the kingdom. He was bred up at Adramyttium, by a man in mean circumstances, till he was twelve years old, without having the least suspicion that he was any other than that man's son. But about that time his foster-father falling sick of a mortal disease, he disclosed to this Andriscus the secret of his birth, and that his true name was Philip. There was likewise

[z] Plut. Liv. Justin. ubi supra.

likewiſe a narrative to this purpoſe ſigned with the hand of Perſeus, in the cuſtody of his foſter-mother, whom the dying man charged to deliver to Philip, when he ſhould arrive at the age of fourteen. This was performed very exactly, and in that memorial there was mention made of two cheſts of treaſure privately depoſited for the uſe of his ſon by king Perſeus. The woman, when ſhe put this paper into the young man's hand, recommended it to him to make all imaginable haſte out of this part of the world, leſt Eumenes, the inveterate enemy of Perſeus and all his race, ſhould gain intelligence of his birth, and procure him to be murdered (G). Full of apprehenſions, Andriſcus or Philip retired into Syria, and went to the court of Demetrius Soter, who had married the ſiſter of king Perſeus, and from whom on that account he hoped for favour and protection. This Demetrius having heard Andriſcus's ſtory, conſidered it attentively, till by degrees either himſelf or his wife traced out ſuch imperfections in it, as gave them grounds to ſuſpect the whole was fallacy. The Romans were at this time ſo powerful, and Demetrius had ſo little inclination to have any diſputes with them, that, to prevent his being made accountable for any thing that this pretended Philip might attempt, though though without his countenance or assistance, he fairly seized him. Under the name of Andriscus an impostor, falsely pretending to be the son of Perseus, he was sent by Demetrius to Rome, who no doubt thought he should by this act win great credit with that state [a].

(G) It may ſeem a little odd, that ſince there were many princes who might have pretended ſome title to the throne of Macedon, in right of their deſcents from its antient kings, none offered at any ſuch thing; but, on the contrary, left all things quiet, and in the ſtate they were ſettled by Paulus Emilius. This is, however, eaſily accounted for, if we conſider the condition of the kings of Syria and Bithynia, who were nearly allied to Perſeus. The former was a prince of mean abilities, and terribly afraid of the Romans, whoſe wrath he ſought to avert by ſending the pretender to the throne of Macedon to them as ſoon as he came into his dominions. He was ſenſible enough, that he held his crown almoſt by their permiſſion, and therefore durſt not think of putting in any claim to another, while he was unable to act independently in the kingdom he poſſeſſed; as for Pruſias of Bithynia, he was alſo a mean-ſpirited prince, and beſides was ſo plagued by foreign enemies and diviſions in his own family, which were at laſt attended with fatal effects, that he had ſmall leiſure to look abroad; and this encouraged Andriſcus, if he was indeed an impoſtor, to act as he did.

Andriscus escapes from Rome.

The senate caused this matter to be enquired into upon the first arrival of Andriscus; but whether it was that the consequences of his pretences were not apprehended, or whether, as the Roman writers affirm, he looked, spoke, and acted so little like the son of a prince, that there seemed to be nothing dangerous in him; certain it is, that he was committed to a very gentle custody, and no sentence at all pronounced upon him. It is very possible, the senate might apprehend, that while Alexander the son of Perseus, who had been led in triumph, was a peaceable man, and their scribe, as all the world knew, this Andriscus with a lame story, and, as they thought, very mean parts, would gain no credit; but that the contrary might happen, if he was severely dealt with; no just cause appearing, for which he might be put to death. Andriscus did not let slip the favourable opportunity offered him by the carelessness of those who had the custody of him; but secretly stealing out of Italy, took shelter in Thrace [b].

Troubles in Macedonia, and their causes.

In the mean time the Macedonians were in a very bad situation; for as the genius of the people was wholly suited to a mixt government, or, in other words a well-regulated monarchy, so the new constitution which had been given them, sat very indifferently on their minds, some being too proud of their freedom, and others desiring to see themselves once more an independent nation, and as considerable as in former times. The Romans, sending embassadors into Asia, ordered them to pass over from thence into Macedonia to appease these troubles, and to engage the people to live peaceably under the new government. What effects the exhortations of these legates had, we know not; but in all probability, they did not operate very strongly, since in a few years the same disturbances broke out again with still greater vehemence, so ſo that it appeared plainly a popular government was little for the advantage of the inhabitants of this kingdom. The Macedonians dwelling at Rome had intereſt enough to prevent any harſh meaſures from being taken with their country-men; this intereſt they were at great pains to cultivate, attending the funerals of their conqueror Emilius with all imaginable marks of ſorrow and concern, applying themſelves afterwards to Scipio his ſon, ſurnamed Africanus. Him they owned for the protector of their nation, and publicly ſolicited the ſenate that he might be ſent into Macedonia to compromiſe the diſturbances there. But the affars of the republic in Spain being fallen into a dangerous condition, inſomuch, that many declined ſerving there, Scipio deſired to be ſent thither, as conceiving it would be more for his country's ſervice, though he was very ſenſible of the affection borne him by the Macedonians, and would moſt willingly, but for this accident, have gone thither to repair the breaches which had been made in his father's ſettlement of the affairs of that people. It is very poſſible, that while the Romans apprehended no ill conſequence to themſelves from the diſputes among the Macedonians, they were not very much diſturbed at their continuance, ſince it appears clearly from Polybius, that the Romans were by this time become great politicians, and extended their own power on every ſide by practiſing on others, and taking advantage of either their misfortunes, or of their errors in government. Be it as it will, Macedonia was in great confuſion, and little or no care was taken to redreſs the grievances the people complained of; indeed the redreſſing of them was the more difficult, becauſe there were no Roman officers amongſt them; but from themſelves thoſe were taken who were made uſe of to oppreſs them [c] (H).

[a] Epitom. Liv. lib. xlviii. xlix. Zonar. ex Dione. Flor. l. ii. [b] Epitom. Liv. lib xlix. Vel. Paterc. ul. lib. i. Zonar. ex Dion.

ANDRISCUS,

[c] Polyb. Legat, cvii.

(H) 'Twas an eſſential maxim of the Roman policy, to let the ſubjects of the republic enjoy much greater quiet than their allies and dependents; and it was built on this ſuppoſition, that either by art or force the countries of their allies might be reduced into provinces, either without reſiſtance, or under colour of juſtice. Hence it was, that while they acknowledged the Achæans to be free, and gloried themſelves in the title of protectors Andriſcus or Philip recovers Macedon.

Andriscus, when he firſt came into Thrace, depended rather on the charity of the inhabitants, and eſpecially of their petty princes, than on any pretenſions of being of uſe to them, which would have come with an ill grace from a perſon in his condition. However, by often repeating his ſtory, by ſhewing them the incroachments which were daily made on their neighbours, and by explaining the methods whereby one king was employed to ruin another, and thereby reduced into circumſtances which rendered him unfit to defend himſelf; he begat in the minds of the Thracians ſuch ſuſpicions, and kindled in their boſoms ſuch an ambition of being once more independent, that at firſt he had ſome attendants, which ſoon after grew into a little court, and at length he was permitted to raiſe an army; which when tectors of the liberties of Greece, they treated the former worſe and regarded the latter leſs, than the Macedonians had ever done, when they had the pre-eminence in that country. For whereas the king of Macedon permitted the Greek republics to chuſe their own magiſtrates, and to judge all criminals in their own courts, and according to their own laws, the Romans moſtly ſent legates of their own to hear and determine differences among ſtates they pretended to call free, and not ſeldom drew the cauſes to Rome, whither the parties were conſtrained to follow them. We have already ſhewn how Charopus, almoſt againſt their wills, drove the Epirots into rebellion; and yet this man was again inveſted, not only with almoſt regal authority, but his mother alſo, a moſt vindictive and covetous woman, plundered and haraſſed theſe unhappy people with equal malice and impunity. In Macedonia, thoſe who had the government of its ſeveral diſtricts in their hands, were either extremely neceſſitous, and from thence prone to oppreſſion, or were the relations and allies of the nobility who were priſoners at Rome, and were therefore much more addicted to the intereſt of the republic, than to that of their country. The rebellion of Andriſcus might eaſily have been prevented; for he was a long time in Thrace before he was in any condition to invade Macedon; or when it was begun, it might have been preſently quaſhed; but it is probable, the Romans deſired neither, but rather wiſhed for an opportunity of reducing the whole kingdom into a province, which at length they obtained, and did not fail to uſe (14).

(14) Liv. lib. xliv. 1. Polyb. legat. cvii. Diodor. Sicul. excerpt. lib. xxvi.

when it had ſwelled to a reaſonable bigneſs, he boldly led down into Macedon, and there began publicly to declare his title to the crown. Some places he reduced by force, others ſubmitted through fear; moſt were willing to lay hold of any pretext to rid themſelves of their new maſters, and to regain their antient conſtitution, the loſs of which had rendered it but ſo much the more deſirable. Such as were in poſſeſſion of power, and conſequently were ſtrictly dependent on the Romans, endeavoured to make what reſiſtance they could; but it proved even feebler than Andriſcus or Philip could have expected. Such as had been moſt forward to ſupport theſe men in their authority for the ſake of reaping rewards, which it was only in their power to give, were the firſt to deſert them, in order to rejoin authority again; and thus Macedonia was reduced by one who called himſelf the ſon of Perſeus, in almoſt as ſhort a time as Perſeus himſelf had loſt it. Nay, ſo full was he of that courage, which ſucceſs uſually inſpires, that, not content with Macedon, he began to meditate an invaſion on the adjoining provinces, as well to gratify his own ambition, as to keep up the hopes and ſpirits of his new ſubjects [d].

THE Romans, on the firſt news of this extraordinary event, were not a little at a loſs; they had no army in theſe parts; they had all the reaſon in the world to believe that the Greeks would by no means raiſe an army in favour of thoſe who had of late treated them but very indifferently. However, they ſent Scipio Naſica with other legates, rather to diſpoſe the minds of the people in Greece to remain ſteady to the Roman intereſt, than to perform any notable ſervice againſt the new king of Macedon, whom the Romans qualified with the name of Pſeudo-Philippus, i. e. the ſham Philip. Scipio and his collegues found things in quite another ſtate than they expected. For, in the firſt place, Andriſcus or Philip was much more powerful than he had been thought at Rome. And, ſecondly, the Achæans, contrary to all expectation, laying aſide all former jealouſies and ſuſpicions, appeared moſt ready to ſide with the Romans, and to do whatever they required. Scipio, as he was of great parts, ſo he was alſo naturally juſt, temperate and courteous, in the higheſt degree; gree; these good qualities supplied the place of an army, and rendered him more formidable to the enemies of the republic, than a person of another disposition would have been attended by legions. The first thing he did was, fully to inform the senate of what had happened in Greece: that the disturbance in Macedon was not a sudden tumultuary insurrection, but that the people for the most part had not only willingly, but joyfully, received this pretended Philip, not so much because he styled himself the son of Perseus, as on account of his declaring he would expel the Romans and give liberty to all Greece. When Scipio had dispatched these advices, he applied himself to the discharge of his commission; he visited all the principal cities of Greece, harangued the people in their general assemblies, heard all their remonstances patiently, excused some things, admitted others, promised the redress of all; by which arts he drew every city to furnish a certain quota of troops, and joining these with a considerable body of auxiliaries raised by the Achæans, he at last entered Thessaly, where he immediately stopped the progress of Andriscus, or Philip; retook such of the cities as he had garrisoned, and in the end compelled him with his army to retire back into Macedon; which was all or rather more than could have been expected from a person in his situation, whose commission extended no farther than to provide for the safety of Greece [e].

Scipio Naſica ſent into Greece.

[d] Epitom. Liv. lib. xlix. l. Paterc. lib. i. L. Flor. lib. ii.

The prætor Juventius defeated and slain.

At Rome, as soon as the dispatches from Scipio arrived, and it was perceived that the affair in Macedonia was become very serious, the prætor P. Juventius Thalna and Q. Cælius were sent with a great army to reduce the rebels. It quickly appeared, that an able general was capable of doing more without an army, than a rash officer with very numerous forces. Juventius was a man of fire and spirit, one who was desirous of performing very great things, but altogether void of that calmness and conduct which are so essential to the character of a hero. Hence it was, that he made all imaginable haste to enter Macedonia, and, as if his presence only would have finished the war, advanced as fast as the army was able to march towards Andriscus. This Pseudo-Philippus, as the Romans called him, was owned, attended, and obeyed as king of Macedon; he therefore having notice of the manner in which the prætor Juventius behaved, and that he regarded himhimſelf as a theatrical prince only, who, by putting on royal robes, had qualified himſelf to be led in triumph; Andriſcus was encouraged to attack him. When the Roman general was come within a day's march of his camp, the Macedonian prince began to move at the very break of day; and having refreſhed his army the next day, about noon, he in the evening ſhewed himſelf in ſight of the Roman camp, which, as he rightly judged it would, drew the prætor out of his intrenchments, and induced a general engagement, wherein the Roman army was totally defeated. The prætor Juventius and Q. Cælius being ſlain, if the night had not interpoſed and afforded the remains of the army time to retreat, there had not been a man left. Thoſe who eſcaped, made all the haſte they could out of Macedon; and Philip, purſuing the blow he had ſtruck, not only reduced the whole kingdom again to his obedience, but alſo opened a paſſage into Theſſaly, which he again united to his dominions, ſeeming now to be effectually ſeated on the throne, as having expelled his mortal enemies, and having about his perſon a numerous and victorious army, ready to undertake any thing at his command [f].

[e] Diodor. Sicul. excerpt. lib. xxvi. Florus, lib. ii. c. 14. Patercul. lib. i. c. 11.

Andriſcus or Philip proves a tyrant.

THE Carthaginians not long after this victory ſent embaſſadors to congratulate Philip, and to engage him into an alliance for reducing the exhorbitant power of the Romans, who were on the point of beginning the third Punic war. The Macedonian received theſe miniſters very graciouſly, and made them large promiſes of aſſiſtance, which he might have fulfilled at leaſt in ſome meaſure by an invaſion on Greece, and thereby making a diverſion, which would conſequently have weakened the Romans. But him whom adverſity could not, proſperity ruined; his fortune buried his abilities and his virtues, if he really had any, and did not put on the appearance of good qualities to draw in and cajole the people. The Romans he thought no more of, and, inſtead of endeavouring to cheriſh his ſubjects, to revive trade, and to make them happy, he began to play the tyrant, and to make them feel the weight of his ſceptre, almoſt as ſoon as he had handled it himſelf. If he had been hurried on by the impetuous rage of any one vice, the people might have hoped for quiet, when it was ſatiated; but he ſoon diſcovered, that he had almoſt almoſt all the ill qualities which are wont to render men odious, and that he purſued every one of theſe as eagerly as if it had been his only and darling vice. His pride was intolerable; coming late as he did to royalty, he thought he could never have enough ſubmiſſion paid him. He was ſuſpicious to ſuch a degree, that imprudence was a capital crime, and a circumſpect conduct an indication of treaſon. His cruelty was ſo great, that he ſpared none whom he either diſliked, or whom he conceived to diſlike him and his proceedings. With all this he was ſo rapaciouſly covetous, as having been till lately exceſſively indigent, that he ſearched all corners of the kingdom for money, and where-ever he found it, declared himſelf its owner, urging the care of the public ſafety as a pretext for public robbery; and in ſhort, from the moment he gained the ſovereign authority, acted as if he had deſigned nothing leſs than to retain it. Yet the Macedonians bore all with invincible patience, and ſhewed themſelves infinitely more loyal to this Philip than he was true to himſelf. The reaſon of this is eaſily found; they hoped for a ſucceſſor, whoſe government might be milder, and were willing to bear any thing, ſo they might once more become an independent people [g].

[f] Liv. ubi ſupra. Dion. Flor. Patercul. ubi ſupra.

Is twice defeated by Metellus.

When the news of the defeat of P. Juventius was known at Rome, Q Cæcilius Metellus was immediately named to ſupply his place, and troops were with all imaginable care tranſported into Macedon. Thither alſo the new prætor ſpeedily repaired, and the king found himſelf on a ſudden under a neceſſity of fighting once more for his life and crown. He ſhewed on this occaſion the only good quality he had, viz. unconquerable courage, a quality deſirable in all princes, and peculiarly reverenced by the Macedonians. He quickly aſſembled his forces, and to prevent the Romans from plundering the adjacent country, he encamped under the walls of Pydna, and there expected the prætor. Metellus, underſtanding Philip's reſolution, marched with the Roman army, and encamped over-againſt him. Thus far both generals ſeemed to act with prudence, and military ſkill. The king of Macedon however quickly betrayed an extraordinary confidence in his fortune, and his forces. Metellus, was ſtrongeſt in [g] Diodor. Sicul. excerpt. lib. xxvi. Liv. Flor. & Patercul. ubi ſupra.

in horſe, yet Philip ventured an engagement with cavalry only; and though the Macedonians were inferior in number, and not ſo well armed, yet after a long and obſtinate diſpute, they had the victory, and compelled the Romans to retire into their camp with ſome confuſion. This new ſucceſs completed the king's deſtruction; for underſtanding immediately after that the allies of the Romans were about to attack his conqueſts in Theſſaly, he ſent a great detachment from his army to cover them. Metellus, appriſed of this, attacked him now he had weakened his forces, and after an obſtinate and bloody battle, totally routed him, inſomuch that not being able to collect out of his broken army troops enough to keep the field, he was forced to fly to his old friends the Thracians. Theſe people whom we ſo often find branded by the Greek writers with the name of barbarians, were neither deterred by his preſent adverſity, nor by the ill uſage he had made of his former proſperity, from receiving him with open arms, and giving him all the aſſiſtance in their power, inſomuch that in a very ſhort ſpace he was enabled to enter Macedonia again with a numerous army, which encreaſed daily, and which, if he had managed prudently, would have enabled him to have protracted the war, a thing the Romans could leaſt of all bear. His conduct was the very reverſe of what it ought to have been, ſince, forgettinghis late misfortunes, and breathing nothing but a vehement ambition of becoming once again maſter of Macedonia, and all its dependencies, he marched directly to fight Metellus, and in a ſecond battle met the ſame ill fate which had attended him before. In theſe two engagements he had twenty-five thouſand men killed upon the ſpot, ſo that he found it abſolutely impoſſible to raiſe a third army in defence of his pretenſions. Conſulting therefore his own ſafety, he fled to Byzas, a petty prince of Thrace, who at firſt received him very kindly; but when he ſaw clearly that he ſhould draw upon himſelf the vengeance of the Romans, he delivered up Andriſcus to Metellus, who now hoped that he had put a full end to the troubles in this country; but it preſently appeared that the Macedonians were not ſo eaſily ſubdued, for immediately there ſtarted up a new pretender to the regal diginty, who called himſelf Alexander, and boaſted that he too was the ſon of Perſeus. He ſet up his ſtandard in the firſt region of Macedonia, that is, in the country bordering upon Thrace, and very quickly reduced under his obedience the whole territory between the rivers Strymon and Neſſus. But Attalus king of Pergamus, who had aſſiſted Metellus with a fleet, remaining ſtill upon the coaſt, and the prætor advancing towards the river Strymon, Alexander found himſelf too weak to engage the numerous and victorious army of the Romans, and quitting his conqueſts, and the enſigns of the regal dignity which he had aſſumed, he withdrew into Dardania, where he ſo effectually concealed himſelf, that the Romans could never get him into their power. Such was the end of this war, which afforded what had been ſo long deſired, an opportunity of reducing Macedonia into a Roman province, a thing immediately put into execution, as well as the chaſtiſing of the Thracians, and other borderers, for having ſhewn greater affection to the Macedonians, than duty towards the republic. Q. Cæcilius Metellus, on his return to Rome, triumphed, and led Pſeudo Philippus, as the Romans ſtiled him, in the cavalcade; after which the victor took the ſurname of Macedonicus; which ſhews of what conſequence his conqueſt was, and how arduous the war by which it was obtained [h].

reduced

Year after the flood 2851. Before Chriſt 148.

Two other pretenders defeated.

As the Macedonians were reduced to the ſame ſtate with the reſt of the nations conquered by the Romans, by Q. Metellus, ſo by him alſo they were deprived of what ſmall remains of their antient grandeur Emilius had left behind him; among the reſt of the brazen ſtatues ſet up at Dium, for ſuch of Alexander's guards as had fallen in the battle of Granicus. Metellus alſo appointed new magiſtrates, and changed in every reſpect the government under which they had lived before. As the reſt of Greece ſoon after fell under the like circumſtances, it was not doubted but the ſpirits of theſe people were effectually quelled, and that they would never think more of throwing off that yoke, which, after repeated victories they had ſeen impoſed upon the braveſt and moſt potent of their neighbours. Yet it happened otherwiſe; a new Pſeudo-Philippus ſhewed himſelf on the borders of Thrace, and having drawn together a ſmall band of deſperate men, began to haraſs the country, and particularly to deſtroy ſuch as he either knew or ſuſpected to be be attached to the Romans. The love of liberty amongſt the Macedonians increaſing with the loſs of it, they reſorted in crowds to this new pretender, and adviſed him to invade the kingdom, with full aſſurance that he would meet with little oppoſition. Accordingly he came down with his forces into the heart of Macedonia, where he was continually joined by new recruits, making in a ſhort time ſo quick a progreſs, that the greateſt part of the country ſubmitted to him; and thus with the regal title he gained the power and authority of a king. To reduce him, the Romans ſent a numerous army under the command of the quæſtor Lucius Tremellius, who no ſooner entered the province, than he began to retake the cities which Philip had ſubdued and fortified; and though he managed with much greater prudence than Andriſcus, who had aſſumed the ſame name, had uſed, yet in the end he was defeated and ſlain. He ſeems to have been the laſt who pretended to vindicate the liberty of the Macedonians, or to attempt the recovery of that kingdom, under colour of a right derived from Perſeus, or any of its antient princes [i] (I).

[h] Liv. Flor. Patercul. ubi ſupra. Strab. lib. xiii. p. 624. Jul. Obſeq. de prodigiis. Eutrop. lib. iv.

THE

[i] Liv. lib. liii. Varro. de re Ruſtic. lib. ii. c. 4.

(I) It muſt be eaſily diſcerned, that the hiſtory given in the text of the endeavours of the Macedonians to preſerve or rather to recover their freedom, is very imperfect; the cauſe of this is, that we collect from fragments; a line or two from Polybius furniſhes us with one circumſtance (15), an extract from Diodorus (16) with another; the contents of thoſe books of Livy which are loſt, and certain epitomes of Roman hiſtory, with the reſt. That it was requiſite to put all theſe circumſtances together appears from hence; the epitomizer of Livy tells us, that Metellus recovered Macedonia, which was before loſt (17). Florus intitles his detail of this buſineſs, Of the third Macedonian war. Q. Cæcilius Metellus triumphed, led Andriſcus in chains, and took the ſirname of Macedonicus. Florus adds, after reciting the fate of Andriſcus, De eo populus Romanus, quaſi de vero rege, triumpharet (18). As we are now writing the Macedonian hiſtory, there is no queſtion

(15) In legat. (16) ap Phot. (17) Tit. Liv. lib. lii. (18) Flor. lib. ii. c. 14.

The Macedonians complain of their governor Syllanus.

The trouble which the ſubduing this province had coſt, and the manifeſt diſaffection which the people had ſhewn towards the republic, encouraged ſuch as were intruſted with the government to exerciſe great ſeverities, and no leſs grievouſly to oppreſs, under colour of ſeverity, thoſe whom they were ſent to rule. D. Junius Syllanus a man of high quality, exceeded all his predeceſſors, as well in fleecing the Macedonians, as in treating them with exceſſive rigor. In ſhort, though few years had elapſed ſince their country had been reduced into a province, and they had all the reaſon in the world to believe that their ſtrenuous endeavours to avoid it were well remembered at Rome; yet ſo much of their antient ſpirit remained, that they could not bear the thoughts of enduring tamely ſo ſharp a ſubjection. They therefore ſent deputies to Rome to repreſent their grievances, and to pray that more juſtice might be done on their rapacious governor, than ever he had done in his province. When this matter came before the ſenate, the deputies were heard with great ſhew of kindneſs, and Junius Syllanus was commanded to appear at a certain day, and anſwer to the crimes objected againſt him. Before that time was expired, Titus Manlius Torquatus his father, a very eminent perſon, of the old Roman ſtamp, preferred a petition, that the cauſe might be referred to him, queſtion to be made that the "quaſi" does not belong to us, but that we ought to treat expreſly of the reign of Andriſcus, ſince the Romans triumphed over him as over a true king. Whether he was in truth what the Romans ſaid, an impoſtor, and ſo far from being the ſon of Perſeus, that he was in fact ſprung from the very dregs of the people, is what cannot be determined, any more than who they were who afterwards called themſelves Alexander and Philip, at the head of the Macedonian armies againſt the Romans (19). Moſt certain it is, that the Macedonian kings were wont to have ſeveral wives, and not ſeldom many concubines; this being ſo, admitting none of theſe men were in reality deſcended from the royal family, it muſt remain, however, a thing difficult to prove it; and the Macedonians in general being diſaffected, the colour of truth was ſufficient to lead them into rebellion. This then may ſuffice for excuſing thoſe imperfections neceſſity hath occaſioned in this part of our work.

(19) Eutrop. lib. iv.

him, and he be allowed to hear and determine it at his own houſe, which was granted. There the Macedonian deputies appeared, and boldly opened the particular cauſes of their complaints, exhibited their proofs, and fully replied to the defence made by Syllanus. At length Titus Manlius gave ſentence that his ſon was guilty, and ordered him to be taken out of his preſence. A little after Junius Syllanus hanged himſelf, and when the good old man was informed of it, he ſhewed no concern; but on the very day of his funeral kept his houſe open, and tranſacted all ſorts of buſineſs, as if his ſon's deviating from virtue had divorced him from his family, and made him a ſtranger to his blood. After this we meet with nothing relating to the Macedonians, which deſerves to be recorded in their hiſtory, to which therefore we ſhall now put an end [k] (K).

A ſummary view of this hiſtory.

THE intelligent reader, by comparing the contents of this with thoſe of former ſections, will acquire a perfect knowledge of the ſteps by which the ſtate of Macedon roſe, the arts uſed by its princes to render it formidable, the wars and conqueſts by which it became arbiter of Greece, [k] Tit. Liv. Epiſt. lib. liv.

(K) The puniſhment of Syllanus, with the very extraordinary circumſtances which attended it, plainly proves that the Romans were now very deſirous of making the Macedonians eaſy, by preventing thoſe acts of tyranny and oppreſſion, which for the ſake of aggrandizing themſelves and their families, governors were but too ready to commit. And theſe proceedings of theirs fully juſtify an obſervation which we heretofore made, that they were deſirous to give all poſſible eaſe to their proper ſubjects, though they encouraged troubles among their allies, and in ſuch ſtates as were tributary to them. Such a conduct naturally conciliated the minds of the people, who when they found themſelves protected and well uſed, were no longer inclined to take up arms againſt thoſe who had ſo often ſubdued them; whereas neceſſity and oppreſſion would have wrought their old effects, and the Macedonians would have roſe in arms time after time, till they had been either relieved or extirpated. But indulgence got the better of the love of liberty, and when they were allowed to be quiet, they forgot that quiet was only allowed them, and that they did not owe peace to themſelves, but to the will of their maſters.

and ſovereign of a great part of the known world; the accidents which contributed to its quick declenſion, and the cauſes which by ſlower degrees brought on its total ruin (L). For in a political ſenſe, a government is ſaid to be brought to deſtruction, when it no longer reſides in the hands of natives, and the conſtitution under which the people live owes its form, not to their choice, but to the will of their conquerors. From ſuch a compariſon as we have mentioned, it will appear, that all this ſeries of events did not take up a ſpace of above ſeven hundred years. That the firſt ſettlement of Caranus and his

(L) The principal intent of the recapitulation in the text was to demonſtrate the uſefulneſs of this work, in which, without any interruptions or digreſſions, the hiſtories of nations are to be found from their infancy to their decay. In the famous Sir Walter Raleigh's hiſtory of the world, we have a very imperfect account of the kingdom of Macedon before the reign of Philip the ſon of Amyntas (20), and no deſcription of the country at all. In Dr. Howell's hiſtory, there is no amendment of this matter; the kings preceding Philip are but juſt mentioned, and there are ſome miſtakes, and ſeveral omiſſions, in the little which is ſaid (21). Mr. Rollin is by much the faireſt writer, for he ſets out with acquainting us, that the hiſtory of Macedon before Philip is very obſcure and confuſed, and ſo he leaves it (22). Sir Walter Raleigh, in the conduct of his hiſtory, treats of the affairs of Alexander's ſucceſſors in a continued narration, which blends the tranſactions in ſeveral nations one with another. Dr. Howell avoided this, but his hiſtory of Macedon from the time of Alexander to the captivity of Perſeus is too conciſe, neither is the period well fixed, for it ought to have ended with the reduction of Macedonia into a province. Mr. Rollin takes the ſame method with Sir Walter Raleigh, and one may ſafely ſay, that dean Prideaux is a guide he ſeldom or never forſakes. On the whole the regular ſeries of events traced in the text is not to be met with in any other hiſtory or collection of hiſtory that has come to our hands. We alſo take the liberty to add, that what has been before laid down, may be as well applied to the hiſtories of other nations as this; for having purſued the ſame method in all, all have the ſame advantages.

(20) P. i. B. iv. c. 1. ſect. 1. (21) B. ii. ch. 2. ſect. 5.
(22) Hiſt. Ancien. Vol. VI.

his Argives in the centre of that country, which was afterwards called Macedonia, is very obſcurely related by antient hiſtorians; and yet that we have a better account of the tranſactions of his reign than of his immediate ſucceſſors, whoſe names are all that we have tranſmitted to us. That the homage yielded by the Macedonian princes to the Perſian emperors was one great cauſe of their ſubſequent power, inaſmuch as it preſerved them from being haraſſed by the wars made by the Perſians on the reſt of the Greek ſtates, brought great ſums of money into Macedonia, and afforded frequent opportunities of annexing cities and diſtricts to the kingdom by grants from the great king, in truſt, as it were, for the better ſecuring their ſubmiſſion to his empire. That the declenſion of the Perſian power, while there were but weak princes on the throne of Macedon, had well-nigh cauſed the deſtruction of their kingdom, endangered alike from the rapacious violence of its barbarous neighbours, the boundeſs ambition of the Greek republics, and thoſe civil diſſenſions which raged in its own bowels. But when a prince of great abilities aſſumed the regal dignity, he by dint of genius quieted domeſtic feuds, by force of arms repreſſed the barbarous nations, and then made a ſucceſsful war againſt thoſe republics which had held his immediate anceſtors in a kind of ſubjection, till from theſe acceſſions of power, directed by his own ſuperior wiſdom, he acquired the ſovereignty of Greece, wherein himſelf and his people at the beginning of his reign were ſcarce at all regarded, or rather contemned as Barbarians. That as his conduct founded, ſo the courage and military virtues of his ſucceſſors wonderfully extended, the Macedonian empire; which for want of his having an heir at age, was broke in pieces, and the kingdom of Macedon left in the ſame condition in which the victorious Alexander received it. That the ſucceſſors of theſe great monarchs, preſerving the ambition, without the abilities, of thoſe they imitated, inſtead of reſtoring, weakened, and loſt all the dependencies to the dominion of Macedon, and at laſt, by an ill-timed attempt to recover them, delivered up the kingdom itſelf into the hands of ſtrangers (M): againſt whom whom its inhabitants, with a ſpirit far ſuperior, though as ſucceſsleſs as that of their laſt princes, ſtruggled for a time, till at laſt, worn out, and breathleſs, they yielded to the power of the conqueror, and were content that Macedonia, which had been the miſtreſs of ſo many provinces, ſhould become a province herſelf. There remained ſtill, however, ſome unſubjected fragments of her antient empire, viz. the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, the hiſtory of which, to their reduction by the Romans, the next ſections will relate.

(M) We choſe to give a liſt of the princes who ruled in Macedon after the death of Alexander the Great rather in a note at the end of the hiſtory, than at the beginning of this ſection, becauſe

becauſe of their different titles and authorities which could not there, but will be here eaſily underſtood.

A Table of the Macedonian Princes.

Aridæus or Philip the ſon of Philip.
Alexander the ſon of Roxana.
Caſſander the ſon of Antipater.
Philip the ſon of Caſſander.
Antipater and Alexander his ſons alſo.
Demetrius Poliorcetes the ſon of Antigonus.
Pyrrhus.
Lyſimachus.
Ptolemy Ceraunus.
Meleager.
Antipater the ſon of Philip.
Soſthenes.
Antigonus Gonatus ſon of Demetrius.
Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus.
Antigonus Doſon, firſt protector, then king.
Philip the ſon of Demetrius.
Perſeus.
Andriſcus, or Pſeudo-Philippus.

They were all as to the power alike ſovereigns of Macedon, but they differed as to the authority they claimed, and as to the titles by which they claimed. Some were lawful princes, as Aridæus and Alexander; others downright uſurpers, as Caſſander and his ſons. The choice of the people beſtowed the crown on Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus. Conqueſt gave the ſmall right they had to the princes interfering between Demetrius and his ſon Antigonus Gonatus. After him the kingdom continued hereditary to its extinction.

SECT.

SYRIA, after y Death of ALEXANDER the GREAT.

Taurus Mons
Neronis
Lamotis
Lamus Flu.
Grabus Flu.
Pyramus Flu.
Aleii campi
Amanus Mons
CILICIA CAMPESTRIS
Antiochia
Tarsus
Solæ
Pompeiopolis
Mallos
Aegea
Sinus Issicus
MARE CILICIUM
Issus
Pinarus Flu.
Epiphanea
Aliaria
Germanica
Amani Portæ
Pagræ
Pinara
Alexandria
Myriandria
Pylæ Syriæ
Gindarus
Miniza
Gabe Berrhoea
Berœa
Litarbi
Pieria
Pierius Mons
Rabi
Seleucia
Gephyra
Posidonium
Heraclea
Daphne
Laodicea
Casius Mons
Gabala Paltos
Balanea
Marathus
Caranus nauale
Aradiorum
Aradus Insula
Antaradas
Simyra
Eleutherus Flu.
Orthosia
Arca
Tripolis
Dei Facies Prom.
Botrys
Byblus
Palæbyblus
Aphada
Lycus
Berytus
Leontum Oppid.
Leontis Flu.
Sidon
Sarepta
Tyrus
Palætyrus
MARIS MEDITERRANEI PARS
PHOENICIUM MARE
SYRIÆ PARS
SELEUCIS
Cassiotis
ANTI LIBANUS
Libanus Mons
Phœnicia
Commagene
COMMAGENE
Cyrrhus, quæ, et Cyrus Zeugma
Doliche
Bemaris
Samosata
Antiochia ad Taurum Batnæ
Edessa
Anthemusia quæ et Osroene
Masius Mons
Olibera
Ballatha
Seleucia
Cannaba
Apamea
Euphrates Flu.
MESOPOTAMIA
Europus
Cæcilla
Ariana
Carrea
Anthemusium
Acraba
Dauana
Belius Flu.
Gerræ
Nicephorium
Callinicum
Barbarissus
Maguda
Athis
Resapha
Alalis
Circesius s. Circesium
Gordiani sepulcrum
Chabora
Adadda Alamata
Thapsacus Amphipolis
Sura
Phatusa Vicus
Dura
Euphrates Fluvius
Palmyra Thadmor
Tolmidissa
Larissa
Epiphanea
Arethusa
Raphane
Emesa
Mariam
Coara
Solaramia
Danabe
Laodicea Cabiosa sive ad Libanum
Lubon
Helioplis
Paradisus
Iabryda
Gaana
Casama
Atera
Damascus
Abila
Abilene
Antilibanus
Chalcidene
Chalcis
Thema
Adrona
Acoraba
Oriza
Asaph
Chalybon
Jeriana
Apamene
Ptolemaïs Chalybonitis
Marsyas Flu.
Orontes Flu.
Lycus Flu.
Lycias
Casiotis
Belus Mons
Apamea
Seleucia ad Belum
Mariama
Chaucha beni
Solitudo Palmyrena
Sacuras Flu.
Pombedita
Fisenia
Berseborg
Nearda
Sithas
Dacira
Megia
Euphrates Flu.
Zaragarda
BABYLONIAE FINES
CHALDAEA
ARABIA DESERTA
Arabes Scenitæ
Beana
Occidens
Oriens
Meridies

J. Wheatley Sculp.

HALDAEA
Berſebora
Fiſsenia
Nearda
Zarac
BA Euphr
edita
Leg

SECT. IX.

The hiſtory of the Seleucidæ in Syria, to the reduction of their dominions by the Romans.

AFTER the battle of Ipſus, wherein Antigonus was ſlain, and Demetrius put to flight, the empire of Alexander was, as we have related above [a], by a new partition, divided into four kingdoms. Ptolemy had Egypt, Libya, Arabia, Cœle-Syria, and Paleſtine; Caſſander Macedon and Greece; Lyſimachus Thrace, Bithynia, and ſome other provinces beyond the Helleſpont and the Boſphorus; and Seleucus all the reſt. The two kingdoms of Syria and Egypt continued in the ſame families through a long ſeries of princes, without any conſiderable alteration. But Macedon often changed its maſters, and the provinces, which fell to the ſhare of Lyſimachus, were, upon his death, as they lay at a great diſtance from each other, ſeized by different princes, and ſo diſmembered, that his kingdom may be truly ſaid to have ended with his life. The hiſtory of the kingdom of Macedon, from its foundation to Alexander the Great, and from that period to its being reduced to a Roman province, we have already delivered, and ſhall therefore now proceed to the two other kingdoms, which the above-mentioned diviſion of provinces produced, viz. thoſe of Syria and Egypt. The kingdom of Syria, to which, as the moſt powerful and extenſive of the two, we ſhall give the precedency, was not confined to that country alone; but, beſides Syria, comprehended thoſe vaſt and fertile provinces of the upper Aſia, which formed the Perſian empire; being, in its full extent, bounded by the Mediterranean on one ſide and the river Indus on the other. Theſe vaſt ſpreading dominions were commonly called the kingdom of Syria, becauſe Seleucus, the firſt of the Syro-Macedonian kings, having built the city of Antioch in that province, choſe it, as did likewiſe his ſucceſſors, for the uſual place of his reſidence. Here his deſcendents, from him ſtiled Seleucidæ, reigned, according to Euſebius [b], for the ſpace of two hundred fifty-one years, that is, from the one hundred and ſeventeenth olympiad, when Seleucus recovered Babylon, to the third year of the hundred and eightieth, when Antiochus Aſiaticus, the laſt of the race of Seleucus, was driven out by Pompey, and Syria reduced to a Roman province. Before we proceed to the hiſtory of the Seleucidæ, we ſhall exhibit a ſeries of the kings of that race, with the years of their reſpective reigns.

[a] P. 409.

A table of the kings of Syria, from the foundation of that monarchy, to its being reduced by the Romans, with the years of their reſpective reigns.

Seleucus Nicator	32
Antiochus Soter	19
Antiochus Theus	15
Seleucus Callinicus	20
Seleucus Ceraunus	3
Antiochus the Great	36
Seleucus Philopator	11
Antiochus Epiphanes	11
Antiochus Eupator	2
Demetrius Soter	12
Alexander Balas	6
Demetrius Nicator	13
Alexander Zebina	5
Antiochus Theus	2
Antiochus Sidetes	9
Antiochus Grypus	19
Antiochus Cyzicenus	21
Seleucus	months 7
Antiochus Euſebes	1
Demetrius Euchærus	3
Philip	7
Antiochus Dionyſius	3
Tigranes	18
Antiochus Aſiaticus	4

[b] Euſeb. in Chron.

Seleucus Nicator

SELEUCUS the founder of the Syro-Macedonian empire, was the ſon of Antiochus, one of the chief captains of Philip the father of Alexander. We are told by Juſtin [c], that his mother Laodice, nine months before he was born, dreamt, that Apollo, being in bed with her, preſented her with a precious ſtone, on which was engraved the figure of an anchor, commanding her to deliver it to the ſon ſhe ſhould bring forth; and the next morning upon waking ſhe found in her bed a ring, with a ſtone like that which ſhe had ſeen in her dream. The ſame author adds, that not only the child ſhe was afterwards delivered of, but all Syrian kings of his race had the mark of an anchor on their thigh (A). The antients ſpeak of ſeveral other dreams, prodigies, reſponſes of oracles, &c. portending to Seleucus ſome extraordinary riſe and good fortune; but the eminent parts he brought with him into the world, joined to a ſweetneſs of temper, to an obliging behaviour, and a no leſs gallant than prudent conduct, were the ſureſt prognoſtics of [c] Juſtin. l. xv.

(A) To this Auſonius, ſpeaking of the cities of Alexandria and Antioch, alludes in the following verſes.

Et vos ite pares, Macedûmque attollite nomen.
Magnus Alexander te condidit, illa Seleucum
Nuncupat: ingenitus nævus fuit anchora ſignum:
Qualis juncta ſolet generis nota certa: per omnem
Nam ſobolis ſeriem nativa cucurrit imago (1).

But Appian, without taking any notice of this native mark, as Auſonius ſtiles it, tells us, that Laodice was warned in a dream to deliver to her ſon the firſt ring ſhe ſhould find, and aſſured that he ſhould reign in the country where the ring ſhould be loſt. In compliance with this admonition, Laodice, having ſome time after found an iron ring, with the figure of an anchor engraved on it, gave it to her ſon Seleucus, who loſt it near the Euphrates, where he afterwards reigned. The ſame author adds, that Seleucus, on his march to Babylon, having ſtumbled againſt a ſtone, and cauſed it immediately, out of a ſuperſtitious obſervance, to be dug up, found under it, deep in the ground, a ſmall anchor; and hence the cuſtom among the Seleucidæ of Syria to uſe an anchor on their ſeals (2).

(1) Auſon. de clar. urbib. (2) Appian in Syriac.

of his future greatneſs. He ſerved under Alexander from his tender years, attended him in his expedition into Aſia, and was by him honoured with the chief command of the elephants, a commiſſion of great truſt and reputation. After the death of that conqueror, Perdiccas, whom the officers had unanimouſly appointed regent of the empire, put him at the head of the cavalry of the allies; in which command he acquited himſelf with ſuch reputation, that Antipater, who ſucceeded Perdiccas in the regency, raiſed him to the government of Babylon and its territory. In this poſt he was tempted, by the example of the other captains of Alexander, who aſpired to the ſupreme power in their reſpective allotments, to betray his truſt, and entertain thoughts of ſetting up for himſelf; whence, when Eumenes, on his march into Suſiana, preſſed him to join the governors of the upper provinces againſt Antigonus, who had openly revolted, he not only refuſed to lend them any aſſiſtance, but even attempted to deſtroy both Eumenes and his army, by cutting the ſluices of the Euphrates, and laying the whole plain where they were encamped under water. Eumenes, however, tho' thus ſurprized, gained an eminence with his troops, before the waters roſe to any height, and the next day, by diverting their courſe, found means to eſcape the danger, without the loſs of a ſingle man. Seleucus, finding this ſtratagem prove unſucceſsful, ſent emiſſaries under-hand to Eumenes's camp, ſoliciting, with mighty promiſes, the Argyraſpides and Antigenes their leader to abandon Eumenes and come over to him; but not being able to prevail with them upon any terms whatſoever, he made a truce with Eumenes, granting him a free paſſage thro' his province. However, he ſent an expreſs at the ſame time to Antigonus in Meſopotamia, adviſing him to come with all poſſible expedition, and fall upon Eumenes, before he was joined by the governors of upper Aſia [c]; for as Eumenes was unalterably attached to the intereſt of the kings, and with all the beſt general and greateſt ſtateſman Alexander had left behind him, Seleucus, as well as other governors, who were prompted by their ambition to uſurp the ſovereign power in their governments, were under no ſmall apprehenſion of his ſuperior merit and genius. Antigonus followed the reaſonable advice of his friend Seleucus, and being attended in his expedition againſt Eumenes with the

Made governor of Babylon.

Aſpires to the ſovereign power in his government.

[c] Diodor. Sicul. l. xix. Plut. in Eumen. Corn. Nep. c. 7.

the great ſucceſs we have related above [d], he returned to Babylon, where Seleucus received him with rich preſents, and, at a vaſt charge, feaſted his whole army. But when Antigonus demanded an account of the revenues of his government, he told him in plain terms, That he was not accountable to any-body for the revenues of a province, which the Macedonians had beſtowed upon him, as a reward for his ſervices in Alexander's life-time. This blunt anſwer occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between him and Antigonus, who, as the breach grew daily wider and wider, waited only for an opportunity of cutting off this new rival, as he had already treated others, whoſe abilities gave him umbrage; but Seleucus, ſuſpecting his deſign, ſtole away with fifty horſe only, and put himſelf under the protection of Ptolemy governor of Egypt, whoſe kindneſs and courteous behaviour, towards all who fled to him for ſhelter, was every-where cried up. Antigonus, when informed of his flight, expreſſed great joy, being thereby put in poſſeſſion of a rich province without ſtriking a blow, or being obliged to imbrue his hands, as he had reſolved to do, in the blood of his old friend and confederate [e] (B).

Falls out with Antigonus, and flies to Egypt.

SELEUCUS being got ſafe into Egypt, and received there by Ptolemy with all poſſible demonſtrations of kindneſs and friendſhip, repreſented ſo effectually to that prince, as he did alſo to Lyſimachus and Caſſander, the formidable power and ambitious views of Antigonus, that he [d] P. 383. [e] Diodor. Sicul. Appian. & Juſtin. ibid.

(B) Diodorus tells us, that upon the firſt news of the flight of Seleucus, the Chaldeans foretold to Antigonus, that if Seleucus ſhould get ſafe into Egypt, he ſhould one day become lord of all Aſia, adding, that if Antigonus oppoſed him, he ſhould fall in a battle. Hereupon Antigonus immediately diſpatched ſome horſemen after him, enjoining them to bring him back with a deſign to but him to death; but Seleucus happily eſcaped the danger, which greatly diſturbed Antigonus, tho' he had ever before ſlighted and ridiculed ſuch predictions (3).

(3) Diodor. Sicul. l. xix.

he engaged them all three in a league againſt him. This Antigonus apprehended, and therefore, to prevent them from entering into any meaſures prejudicial to his intereſt, ſent an embaſſy to each of the three, with new aſſurances of his friendſhip; but finding, by their anſwers and the high demands they made, that they were entered into a confederacy againſt him, he began, without loſs of time, to make the neceſſary preparations againſt the impending ſtorm [f]. This war, which put an end both to the life and reign of Antigonus, we have already deſcribed at length [g], and therefore ſhall at preſent confine ourſelves to that part alone which Seleucus acted in it. After the victory which Ptolemy gained over Demetrius at Gaza, Seleucus, having obtained of the conqueror a thouſand foot, according to Appian, eight hundred according to Diodorus, and two hundred horſe, took his rout towards Babylon, in order to attempt the recovery of that city. This undertaking was looked upon as a deſperate enterprize, even by his friends, but, however, was attended with all the ſucceſs he could have wiſhed for (C). On his arrival at Carrhæ in Meſopotamia, he prevailed, partly by force, and partly by perſuaſion, on the Macedonians who garriſoned the place, to revolt from Antigonus and join him. Being thus reinforced, he entered the territories of Babylon, where great numbers of the inhabitants, his antient ſubjects, flocked to him from all parts, offering him their

[f] Diodor. Sicul. ibid. Plut. in Demet. Appian. in Syriac. Juſtin. l. xv. [g] P. 405. & ſeq.

(C) His friends ſeeing the inconſiderable number of his forces, and on the other hand the great ſtrength of the enemy, did all that lay in their power to divert him from ſuch an attempt; but he, in order to encourage them, and redeem himſelf from their importunities, told them in an harangue which he made to the ſoldiery, that he was ſure of ſucceſs, ſince Apollo Branchides, with whom he had adviſed about the iſſue of this undertaking, had given him the title of king, and Alexander, ſtanding by him in his ſleep, had ſhewn him the enſigns of royalty, aſſuring him, that he ſhould be honoured with them in due time (4).

(4) Diodor. Sicul. l. xix.

their ſervice, and declaring themſelves ready to ſtand by him, at the expence of their lives and fortunes. Among others one Polyarchus, who bore an office in the city, came over to him at the head of a thouſand men completely armed. Seleucus had governed that province, for the ſpace of four years, with great mildneſs and moderation, carrying himſelf in the moſt obliging manner to all, in order to gain the good-will of the people, and thereby ſecure an intereſt to himſelf, if at any time he ſhould have occaſion to contend for the ſovereign power. On the other hand, Antigonus, who was of a moroſe and ſurly temper, had, with his unſeaſonable ſeverity, ſo eſtranged the minds of all, that he was univerſally deteſted. No wonder then, that as Seleucus approached the city the inhabitants went out to meet him, welcoming him and his ſmall army with loud acclamations, and all poſſible demonſtrations of joy. Thoſe, who favoured Antigonus, perceiving the general and irreſiſtible inclination of the people to Seleucus, retired into the caſtle, which was defended by one Diphilus; but as Seleucus was maſter of the city and the affections of the people, he ſoon poſſeſſed himſelf of the fortreſs, and there found, to his inexpreſſible joy, his children, friends, and domeſtics, whom Antigonus had detained priſoners ever ſince his flight into Egypt [h].

Recovers Babylon. Year after the flood 2687. Before Chriſt 312.

SELEUCUS, being now maſter both of the city and caſtle, judged it neceſſary to raiſe what forces he could, not doubting but Antigonus would ſoon ſend an army to drive him from theſe acquiſitions. Accordingly, while he was buſy in recruiting his army, and diſciplining his new-raiſed troops, news was brought him, that Nicanor, governor of Media under Antigonus, was advancing full march againſt him, at the head of ten thouſand foot and ſeven thouſand horſe. Upon this intelligence Seleucus went out to meet him with three thouſand foot and four hundred horſe only, and paſſing the Tigris, concealed his men, as the enemy drew near, in the fens hard by the river, with a deſign to fall upon Nicanor at unawares, who, not having had any intelligence of Seleucus's march, encamped in a diſadvantageous poſt, where he was the following night ſurprized, and his army with great ſlaughter put to the rout. Nicanor had the good fortune to make his eſcape; but Evager, Defeats Nicanor, and recovers Media, Suſiana, &c.

[h] Diodor. Sicul. & Appian. ibid.

Evager, who commanded under him, and moſt of the chief officers, were killed on the ſpot. Such of the ſoldiers as outlived the ſlaughter, declared for Seleucus, which enabled him to purſue his conqueſts, and reduce in a ſhort time all Media and Suſiana, with many of the adjacent provinces. Having by this victory, eſtabliſhed his intereſt and power in Babylon, he daily improved them by the clemency of his government, and by his juſtice, equity, and humanity to all his ſubjects, to ſuch a degree, that from ſo low a beginning, he became, in a few years, the greateſt and moſt powerful of all Alexander's ſucceſſors [h].

Æra of the Seleucidæ.

From this retaking of Babylon by Seleucus, commences the famous æra of the Seleucidæ, made uſe of all over the eaſt by Jews, Chriſtians, and Mohammedans. The Jews ſtile it the æra of contracts, becauſe they were obliged, when ſubject to the Syro-Macedonian princes, to uſe it in all their contracts and other civil writings. This method of computing their years they followed till the tenth century of the Chriſtian æra, when, upon their being obliged to remove into the weſtern countries, they learned of the Chriſtian chronologers of thoſe parts to compute by the years of the creation. The ſame æra is called by the Arabians Taric dehilkarnain, that is, the æra of the two-horned; which appellation ſome derive from Alexander, who, in the Coran and other Arabic books, is frequently called the two-horned, probably becauſe he affected to be the ſon of Jupiter Hammon, whom the heathens repreſented with two ram's horns on his head. But this æra has no relation to Alexander, tho' by ſome ignorantly derived from him, and alſo called by his name; for Alexander was dead twelve year before Seleucus recovered Babylon, from which recovery the æra of the Seleucidæ commenced. Others therefore, with better grounds, derive the Arabic name Taric dehilkarnain from Seleucus, who as Appian informs us [i], was a perſon of ſuch extraordinary ſtrength, that ſeizing a bull by his horns, he could ſtop him ſhort in his full career; and therefore the ſtatuaries uſually repreſented him with two bull's horns on his head, which, without all doubt, gave riſe to the above-mentioned denomination, that that æra taking its origin from him, and not from Alexander. In the two books of the Maccabees it is called the æra of the kingdom of the Greeks [k]; and they both uſe it in their dates, with this difference, however, that the firſt book begins the years of this æra from the ſpring, and the other from the autumn following (D).

[h] Diodor. Sicul. l. xix. Appian. in Syriac. p. 121.

[i] Appian. in Syriac. p. 201.

ANTIGONUS, receiving an account from Nicanor of the ſucceſs of Seleucus in the eaſt, ſent his ſon Demetrius with an army to Babylon, to drive him from the city, and diſpoſſeſs him of the provinces which he had lately ſeized, while he himſelf advanced to the coaſts of Aſia Minor, to defeat the deſigns of the confederate princes, whoſe power began to be formidable in thoſe parts. Demetrius, purſuant to his father's directions, having with all poſſible expedition, aſſembled his forces at Damaſcus, marched from thence to Babylon, at the head of five thouſand Macedonian foot, ten thouſand mercenaries, and four thouſand horſe. His march was ſo expeditious, that [k] Maccab. l. i. c. 1. ver. 10.

(D) The Syrians, Arabians, Jews, and all others who anciently computed, or ſtill compute (for it is ſtill in uſe among the eaſtern nations) by this æra, began it from the autumn, excepting the author of the firſt book of the Maccabees, who begins it from the preceding ſpring, and Ptolemy of Alexandria, who, in his great ſyntaxis, places the beginning of this æra in the ſpring of the year following. Ptolemy did not reckon Seleucus thoroughly ſettled in the poſſeſſion of Babylon till Demetrius made his retreat from thence; and this retreat happening in the ſpring of the following year, from that ſeaſon he reckoned the years of the Seleucidæ. Some writers date the beginning of Seleucus's reign from his recovering of Babylon, when this æra began. Others from the partition which was made twelve years after, upon the death of Antigonus and defeat of Demetrius, in the battle of Ipſus; ſo that, according to ſome, he reigned twenty, according to others thitty-two years; for he died twenty years after that battle, and thirty-two after the recovery of Babylon. We have followed Euſebius, and the learned Uſher, who compute the years of his reign from his recovering of Babylon (5).

(5) Vide Euſeb. in Chron.

that paſſing the Euphrates, he inveſted Babylon before the enemy had notice of his departure from Damaſcus. Seleucus himſelf was then in Media, and Patrocles, whom he had intruſted with the government of the place, noways in a condition to make head againſt ſo powerful an enemy. The wiſe governor therefore, inſtead of ſacrificing the few troops he had under his command to no purpoſe, retired with them into the fens and marſhes, ordering the citizens to follow him with their moſt valuable effects, and abandon the city to the enemy. Demetrius finding the city deſerted, laid ſiege to the two caſtles which ſtood on the two oppoſite banks of the Euphrates, and had been well garriſoned by Patrocles before his retreat. However, one of theſe Demetrius took, and placed in it a garriſon of ſeven thouſand men; but not being able to maſter the other before the time was expired in which his father had appointed him to return with his troops into Aſia Minor, he left Archelaus, one of his principal officers, with a thouſand horſe and five thouſand foot, to purſue the ſiege, and, with the reſt of the troops, marched to the aſſiſtance of his father in Aſia Minor. Before his departure, he allowed his ſoldiers to plunder the city, which proved very detrimental to his father's affairs, and greatly attached the inhabitants to Seleucus, even thoſe who till that time had ſtood up for Antigonus; for they all looked upon this act of depredation as a tacit declaration of his having entirely abandoned them, ſince he would never have treated them as enemies, if he had looked upon them any longer as ſubjects; they therefore all unanimouſly declared for Seleucus, who, on his return to Babylon, after the retreat of Demetrius, without much ado, drove out the few troops he had left in the city, recovered the caſtle which he had garriſoned, and thenceforth ſettled his authority in thoſe parts upon ſo firm a foundation, that it could never after be ſhaken[1]. From this year the Babylonians, as appears from Ptolemy of Alexandria's ſyntaxis, date the æra of the kingdom of the Seleucidæ, tho' all other nations place its commencement in the autumn of the preceding year.

Demetrius regains Babylon.

But abandons it again.

The authority of Seleucus eſtabliſhed in Babylon.

And now Seleucus, ſeeing himſelf in quiet poſſeſſion of Babylon and its territory, advanced at the head of a a conſiderable army into Media, where he engaged, and ſlew with his own hand, Nicanor, or, as others call him, Nicator, whom Antigonus had ſent againſt him. Having reduced all Media, he purſued his march into Perſia, Bactria, Hyrcania, &c. ſubjecting to his new empire theſe, and all the other provinces on this ſide of the Indus, which had been formerly conquered by Alexander [m]. From theſe conqueſts, and not from Nicanor or Nicator, whom he ſlew, he took the ſurname of Nicator, as Appian and Amminianus Marcellinus inform us [n]. In the mean time Antigonus and Demetrius having aſſumed the title of kings, Seleucus, not to be behind-hand with them, took the ſame, ſtiling himſelf king of Babylon and Media.

[1] Diodor. Sicul. ibid. Plut. in Demet.

Extends his conqueſts into Media, Bactria, Hyrcania, &c.

Takes the title of king.

SELEUCUS was now maſter of all the countries between the Euphrates and the Indus, but not of thoſe large provinces which lay beyond the latter of theſe rivers, and had fallen to his ſhare in the general partition. He was at this time cloſely united in point of intereſt with Ptolemy, Caſſander, and Lyſimachus; the forces of Antigonus were divided into ſeveral diſtant bodies, and Demetrius was employed in the ſiege of Rhodes. Having therefore no enemy to fear on this ſide the Indus, he reſolved to croſs that river, and, by a ſudden irruption, make himſelf maſter of thoſe vaſt provinces which were known by the name of India. Theſe Alexander had formerly ſubdued; but, after his death, while his ſucceſſors were engaged in mutual wars with each other, one Sandrocottus, or, as others call him, Androcottus, an Indian of mean extraction, under the ſpecious pretence of delivering his country from the tyranny of foreigners, had raiſed a powerful army, and, having driven out the Macedonians, ſeized the Indian provinces for himſelf. To recover theſe provinces Seleucus marched over the Indus; but finding that Sandrocottus had made himſelf abſolute maſter of all India, and, from the ſeveral provinces of it, drawn into the field an army of ſix hundred thouſand men, with a prodigious number of elephants, he did not judge it adviſable to provoke ſo great a power, and therefore entering into a treaty with him, Invades India.

[m] Diodor. Sicul. l. xix. & xx. Appian. in Syriac. p. 124. Juſtin. l. xv. c. 4. Ammian Marcel. l. xxiii. Hiſtor. [n] Ammian. ibid.

him, he agreed to renounce all his pretenſions to that country, provided Sandrocottus furniſhed him with five hundred elephants, which propoſal the Indian prince willingly agreeing to, a peace was concluded between them [o]. Seleucus having thus ſettled matters in India, marched back into the weſt againſt Antigonus; and the abſolute neceſſity he was under of engaging in this war, was what haſtened the peace with Sandrocottus; for Caſſander finding himſelf reduced to great ſtreights by Demetrius, and not being able to obtain a peace but upon terms of ſurrendering himſelf, without reſerve, to the will and pleaſure of Antigonus, agreed with Lyſimachus, who was in no better condition than himſelf, to ſend embaſſadors to Seleucus and Ptolemy, and by repreſenting to them the ſituation of affairs, the ambitious views and exorbitant power of Antigonus, prevail upon them to enter into an alliance againſt him, as a common enemy. The alliance was ſoon concluded, for they were all under no ſmall apprehenſion of the over-grown power of Antigonus and his ſon Demetrius, who had already driven both Caſſander and Ptolemy out of all the places they poſſeſſed in Greece. This confederacy induced Seleucus to haſten a peace with the king of India, and march back into Aſſyria, to provide there for the war [p], which was carried on with great vigour the firſt year by Caſſander in Europe and Lyſimachus in Aſia, while Seleucus and Ptolemy were raiſing forces in their reſpective dominions, with a deſign to come againſt Antigonus with their whole ſtrength, and to put all to the iſſue of a general engagement. Accordingly in the beginning of the next ſummer, Seleucus having drawn together at Babylon twenty thouſand foot, twelve thouſand horſe, and four hundred and eighty elephants, with an hundred chariots armed with ſcythes, advanced into Cappadocia, and after joining the forces of the confederate princes, purſued his march into Phrygia, where he met Antigonus and Demetrius, near the city of Ipſus. The confederate army was commanded by Seleucus and Lyſimachus, and conſiſted of ſixty-four thouſand foot, ten thouſand five hundred horſe, four hundred and eighty elephants, with Concludes a peace with Sandrocottus, and yields to him all India.

[o] Juſtin. l. xv. c. 4. Appian. in Syriac. p. 122, 123. Strabo. l. v. p. 724. Plut. in Alexand.

[p] Diodor. Sicul. l. xx. Juſtin. l. xv. c. 4. Plut. in Demet.

with an hundred and twenty chariots armed with ſcythes. The enemies forces, amounting to ſeventy thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, and ſeventy-five elephants, were commanded by Antigonus and Demetrius, who, as we have already related, behaved on this occaſion with the utmoſt bravery; but their army being entirely defeated, and Antigonus killed, Demetrius was forced to ſave himſelf by flight, being attended only with five thouſand foot and four hundred horſe, the poor remains of ſeventy thouſand men he had under his command at the beginning of the engagement [q]. The battle of Ipſus.

AFTER this battle, the particulars whereof we have already related at length [r], the four confederate princes divided the dominions of Antigonus among themſelves, adding them to what they enjoyed before; but, before this diviſion, Seleucus marching into the upper Syria, made himſelf maſter of that rich province, and there built on the river Orontes the city of Antioch, which ſoon became, and continued to be for many ages, the metropolis of the eaſt; for not only the Syrian kings, but afterwards the Roman governors, who preſided over the affairs of the eaſtern provinces, choſe it for the uſual place of their reſidence; and, in the chriſtian times, it was the ſee of the great patriarch of Aſia. It ſtood on the Orontes, about twenty miles from the place where that river empties itſelf into the Mediterranean, being equally diſtant from Conſtantinople and Alexandria in Egypt, that is, ſeven hundred miles from each [s]. Seleucus called it Antioch, either from his father's name, as Mallea, Cedrenus, and the emperor Julian inform us, or from that of his ſon, as Strabo, Appian, and Trogus inſinuate [t], or perhaps from both. He built ſixteen other cities bearing the ſame name, whereof one, ſituate in Piſidia, is mentioned in ſcripture [u]; but Antioch on the Orontes eclipſed all the others, being by far the moſt famous of the many cities Seleucus built. Antigonus, not long before, had founded a city in that neighbourhood, which from his own name, he called Antigonia, and had deſigned for the capital of his empire. This city Seleucus razed to the ground, employing the materials to Antioch built by Seleucus. Year after the flood, 2699. Before Chriſt 300.

[q] Arrian. l. vii. Plut. in Pyrrho. Appian. in Syriac. p. 122.
[r] Vid. vol. viii. p. 406. [s] Johannes Antiochenus, Malela & Baudrond, Geogr. de Antioch. Mag. [t] Juſtin. ubi ſupra. Strabo. l. xvi. p. 750. Appian. ubi ſupra. [u] Acts xiii. 14.

build, and tranſplanting the inhabitants to people, his new metropolis (E). Beſides Antioch, Seleucus built in the ſame

(E) Johannes Malela, a native of Antioch, tells us in his chronicle, that Seleucus coming to Iopolis, a city in the hilly country of Siliphum, offered there, on the firſt of the month Artemiſium, a ſacrifice to Jupiter the Thunderer, in a chapel ſaid to have been antiently built by Perſeus the ſon of Danae. From Iopolis he advanced to Antigonia, and there offering a ſacrifice to Jupiter, on the altar newly built by Antigonus, he, together with Amphion the prieſt, begged Jupiter to ſhew him, by ſome ſign, whether he ſhould inhabit Antigonia, calling it by ſome other name, or build a new city in another place. They had ſcarce ended their prayer, when an eagle ſnatching up a piece of fleſh from the altar, dropt it near the hill of Siliphum. Hereupon Seleucus on that ſpot, where antiently ſtood a town called Botzia, laid the foundation of his new city, on the twenty-ſecond day of the month Artemiſium, that is, of our May. At a ſmall diſtance from the city he built a magnificent temple in honour of Jupiter Botzius. Theſe and many ſuch things we read in Johannes Malela concerning the origin of Antioch. This metropolis of Syria was afterwards known by the name of Tetrapolis, being divided, as it were, into four cities, each of them having its proper wall, beſides a common one, which incloſed them all. The firſt of theſe cities or quarters was built by Seleucus Nicator; the ſecond by thoſe who flocked thither on its being made the capital of the Syro-Macedonian empire; the third by Seleucus Callinicus, and the fourth by Antiochus Epiphanes (5). The place where it ſtood was very ſubject to earthquakes, by which it ſuffered greatly, and was often in danger of being entirely overwhelmed; however, it continued to be, as Pliny calls it, the queen of the eaſt, for the ſpace of ſixteen hundred years, till it was taken in 1262, and utterly deſtroyed by Bibaris ſultan of Egypt (6). The walls of each quarter, as well as thoſe which ſurrounded the whole, are ſtill remaining; but as the houſes are entirely deſtroyed, thoſe four quarters look like ſo many incloſed fields (7). It is now a ſmall and contemptible village, known by the name of Anthakia, and remarkable for nothing but its ruins. Aleppo is become, in its ſtead, the metropolis of thoſe eaſtern parts, the patriarchal ſee, which once adorned it, being tranſlated to Damaſcus.

Daphne,

(5) Strabo. l. xvi. p. 750. (6) Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 281. (7) Idem ibid. p. 281.

ſame country ſeveral other cities, whereof three were more remarkable than the reſt. One of theſe he called Seleucia (F) from his own name; another Apamea from his wife Apama, Seleucia, Apamea and Laodicea built.

Daphne, mentioned in the ſecond book of the Maccabees (8), was reckoned one of the ſuburbs of Antioch, tho' four or five miles diſtant from it. There Seleucus planted a grove ten miles in compaſs, and in the middle of the grove built a temple, which he conſecrated to Apollo and Diana, making the whole an aſylum. Thither the Antiochians reſorted for their pleaſures and diverſions, as the Romans did to Baiæ, and the Alexandrians to Canopus. As perſons of all ranks and conditions flocked to this delicious place, in proceſs of time Apollo and Diana gave room to Venus and Bacchus, whereby it became ſo infamous, that Daphnicis moribus vivere, to live after the manner of Daphne, was uſed as a proverb, to expreſs a moſt voluptuous and diſſolute way of living. Such as had any regard for their reputation, avoided Daphne as they did the public ſtews, it being frequented only by young debauchees and women of profeſſed incontinency; inſomuch, that when Caſſius the Roman general came to Antioch, the very next day after his arrival, he took care to forbid, by a public proclamation, and under the ſevereſt penalties, any of his ſoldiers to enter, or even go near, that place, leſt they ſhould be corrupted by the horrid abominations practiſed there by the natives (9). It was ſo remarkable a place, that to diſtinguiſh Antioch, near which it lay, from other cities elſewhere bearing the ſame name, the former was commonly called Antioch near Daphne (10).

(F) Johannes Malela tells us, that on the twenty-third day of our April, while Seleucus was ſacrificing to Jupiter on mount Caſius, and conſulting him concerning a proper place to build a city in, an eagle ſnatching from the altar part of the ſacrifice, flew towards the ſea, and dropt it in a ſea-town of Pieria, not far from Palæopolis, a ſmall city, built in former ages by Syrus the ſon of Agenor. Hereupon Seleucus laid immediately the foundations of a great city on that ſpot, and called it from his own name Seleucia. Others tell us, that he was induced to build a city in that place, not by an eagle, but by a flaſh of lightning; whence lightning was ever after adored there as a deity, and honoured with hymns and prayers by the inhabitants (11). Seleucus allowed the Jews the ſame privileges and immunities in each

(8) Maccab. l. ii. c. 4. ver. 33. (9) Vide Chryſoſt. ſermon. in Babylam martyrem. (10) Strabo. l. xv. p. 719. (11) Appian. in Syriac. p. 125.

Apama, the daughter of Artabazus the Perſian; and the third Laodicea from his mother Laodice. Apamea and Seleucia ſtood on the ſame river with Antioch, the former above it, and the latter fifteen miles below it, and five from the place where the river falls into the ſea. Laodicea ſtood in the ſouthern part of the ſame country. From theſe four cities, that quarter of Syria, in which they ſtood was called Tetrapolis, or the country of the four cities; which indeed was but an occaſional name, if we may ſo call it, the true name of that tract being Seleucis, a name given it by Seleucus himſelf; for Syria, under the kings of the Macedonian race, was divided into three parts, viz. Syria properly ſo called, Cæle-Syria, or the Hollow-Syria, and Syria Paleſtina. The firſt of theſe, called alſo Upper Syria, contained Commagena, Cyrrheſtica, Seleucis, and ſome other ſmall diſtricts, and extended from mount Amanus on the north, to mount Libanus on the ſouth. It was, in after-ages, called alſo Syria Antiochena. The ſecond reached from Libanus to Antilibanus, including the city of Damaſcus, and its large territory. As this tract conſiſted moſtly of deep vallies between high mountains, it was on this account called Cæle-Syria or the Hollow-Syria. Syria Paleſtina extended from Antilibanus to the confines of Egypt. The maritime parts of the two latter, lying between Aradus and Gaza, were known to the Greeks by the name of Phœnice.

Antigonus being killed in the battle of Ipſus, and the power of Demetrius brought, by that dreadful overthrow, to a very low ebb, the confederate princes, having now no other enemy to fear, began to grow jealous of each other. Lyſimachus, being under no ſmall apprehenſion of the over-grown power of Seleucus, entered into a ſeparate alliance with Ptolemy, taking to wife Arſinoe one of his daughters, and marrying his ſon Agathocles to another (G). This each of theſe new cities, as were enjoyed by the Greeks and Macedonians, eſpecially at Antioch in Syria, where that people ſettled in ſuch numbers, that they poſſeſſed as conſiderable a part of Antioch as their countrymen did of Alexandria.

Seleucus enters into an alliance with Demetrius.

(G) Lyſimachus married the daughter, not of Ptolemy Philadelphus, as we read in Memnon (12); but of Ptolemy the firſt

(12) Memnon. in excerpt. c. 5,

This alliance gave umbrage to Seleucus, who thereupon entered into a treaty with Demetrius, marrying Stratonice the daughter of that prince by Phila the ſiſter of Caſſander. As Demetrius was at that time in a very low condition, he readily laid hold of Seleucus's propoſal; and ſailing from Greece, where he ſtill held ſome cities, conveyed the new bride, with the few ſhips he had then remaining, into Syria. In his paſſage thither he made a deſcent on Cilicia, which then belonged to Pliſtarchus the brother of Caſſander, the four kings having, in the general partition, beſtowed it upon him. Hereupon Pliſtarchus, leaving Cilicia, went to complain to Seleucus of the wrong done him, and to expoſtulate with him for contracting an alliance with the common enemy, without the conſent of the other kings, which he apprehended to be an infraction of the treaty. Demetrius, receiving intelligence of this journey, advanced directly to the city of Quinda, where the treaſures of the province, amounting to twelve hundred talents, were kept. Theſe he ſeized, and haſtening back to his fleet with the booty, ſailed to Oraſſus, a maritime town of Syria, where he met Seleucus, and delivered to him his bride. After the two princes had ſpent ſeveral days there in nuptial rejoicings and mutual entertainments, without arms or guards, Seleucus returned in great pomp and magnificence to Antioch, and Demetrius with his fleet to Cilicia, which he entirely reduced, and thereby conſiderably encreaſed his power in thoſe parts, being, after this acquiſition, maſter of all Cilicia, of the whole iſland of Cyprus, and of the two rich and ſtrong cities of Tyre and Sidon in Phœnice [u].

It was highly impolitic in Seleucus, to permit a prince of an unbounded ambition, of extraordinary parts, and great ſkill in military affairs, to ſettle at ſo ſmall a diſtance from him, and uſurp from one of his allies a pro-firſt, the ſon of Lagus, and Eurydice, as Plutarch (13), Juſtin (14), Pauſanias (15), and even Memnon himſelf elſewhere, inform us (16).

[u] Plut. in Demet. Strabo. l. xv, p. 719. Memnon. in excerpt. c. 5. Juſtin. l. xvii. c. 2.

(13) Plut. in Demet. (14) Juſtin. l. xvii. c. 2. & l. xxiv. c. 2. (15) Pauſan. in Attic. p. 8. (16) Memnon. in excerpt. c. 9.

vince ſo near his own dominions as Cilicia. His eyes, however, were opened at laſt, and growing jealous of ſuch a neighbour, he would fain have purchaſed Cilicia of him; but Demetrius rejecting the propoſal, Seleucus, to pick a quarrel with him, inſiſted upon yielding up to him the cities of Tyre and Sidon, as belonging to Syria, of which he was king. Demetrius was fired at this demand, and in a great paſſion replied, That though he were to be vanquiſhed a thouſand times over, he would not purchaſe a ſon-in-law at ſo dear a rate; and immediately ſailed to both thoſe cities, reinforced the garriſons, and furniſhing them with all things neceſſary for a vigorous defence, defeated, for the preſent, the deſigns of Seleucus, whoſe proceeding on this occaſion was greatly blamed; for as his dominions were of a vaſt extent, reaching from the river Indus to the Mediterranean, every one judged it baſe and mean in him to diſturb his father-in-law, who was under a cloud of misfortunes, in the enjoyment of theſe poor remains of his broken fortune [w]. But Seleucus, notwithſtanding theſe public murmurs, falling upon Cilicia, made himſelf maſter of that whole country, while on the other hand, Lyſimachus reduced all the territories belonging to Demetrius in Aſia, and Ptolemy made himſelf maſter of the iſland of Cyprus, and of the cities of Tyre and Sidon in Phœnice. Thus was Demetrius, notwithſtanding his alliance with Seleucus, ſtripped by the confederate princes of the beſt part of his dominions [x].

Seleucia on the Tigris built.

Demetrius being, by theſe loſſes, reduced ſo low as to give Seleucus no further jealouſy, that prince undertook the building of a new city, which he called from his own name Seleucia, and made the metropolis of all the provinces beyond the Euphrates. It was placed on the weſtern ſide of the Tigris, about forty miles from Babylon, over-againſt the place where at preſent the city of Bagdad ſtands. This new city ſoon became one of the moſt populous and flouriſhing in thoſe parts; for the country near Babylon being laid under water, by the breaking down of the banks of the Euphrates, and the branch of that river which paſſed through the middle of the city, rendered innavigable, moſt of the inhabitants, forſaking their antient habitations, ſettled at Seleucia; which Seleucus had not only made made the place of his reſidence whenever he came into thoſe parts, but diſtinguiſhed it with many privileges above all the other cities of the eaſt. By theſe means Babylon, ſoon after the building of Seleucia, was quite abandoned, nothing remaining of that antient city but its walls. Pliny [y] tells us, that it was drained of its inhabitants, and brought to deſolation by the neighbourhood of Seleucia on the Tigris, which Seleucus Nicator, to uſe Pliny's words, built there for that purpoſe. Jerom, who flouriſhed in the fourth century of the Chriſtian æra, writes, that, in his time, Babylon was entirely ruined, the walls only being kept up by the Parthian kings, who had made the ſpace within a park for the keeping of wild beaſts [z] (H). On the other hand, Seleucia became ſo populous, that, in

[w] Plut. ibid. [x] Plut. in Demet.

[y] Plin. l. vi. c. 26.

[z] Hieronym. Comment. in Eſai. c. 14.

(H) The firſt after Jerom, who mentions Babylon, is one Benjamin, a Jew of Tudela in Navar. This traveller, in his Itinerary, which he wrote about the middle of the twelfth century, tells us, that he was upon the ſpot where the city of Babylon ſtood, and that he ſaw only ſome ruins of Nebuchadnezzar's palace ſtill remaining, which no body ventured to viſit, by reaſon of the many ſerpents and ſcorpions that infeſt the place (15). Texeira, in the account he gives us of his travels from India to Italy, tells us, that, in his time, there was ſcarce any thing remaining of this great and famous city, and that the place on which it ſtood was the leaſt frequented of any in all that country (16). Rauwolf, a German traveller, who viſited thoſe places in 1574, confirms what we read in the above-mentioned writers. We ſhall quote his words: "The village of Elugo, ſays he, ſtands on the place, where formerly Babylon, the metropolis of Chaldea ſtood. The harbour is a quarter of a league off, whither thoſe uſe to reſort, who intend to travel by land to the famous city of Bagdad, which lies about a day and a half's diſtance to the eaſt on the river Tigris. This country is ſo dry and barren, that it cannot be tilled, and ſo bare, that I ſhould have doubted very much, whether this powerful and potent city (which was the moſt ſtately and famous one of the world, ſituated in Pliny's time, it had six hundred thousand inhabitants, and far excelled the other cities of the east [a]. Besides Seleucia, Seleucus built several other cities, sixteen of which he

(15) Benjamin, Itiner. p. 76.

(16) Texeira c. 8.

And many other cities:

[a] Plin. ubi supra.

" situated in the pleasant and fruitful country of Sinar) stood in " that place, if I had not known it by its situation, and several antiquities still to be seen in that neighbourhood; first, " by the old bridge which was laid over the Euphrates, where- " of there are some arches still remaining, built of burnt " brick, and wonderfully strong. ——— Just before the village of Elugo is the hill, whereon the castle stood; and " you may still see the ruins of its fortifications. At a small " distance from the castle stood the tower of Babylon. This " we see still, and it is half a league in diameter, but so ruined " and full of venomous reptiles, that nobody dares come within " half a mile of it, except in two months of the winter, when the " insects keep within their holes. Among these reptiles there are " some called in the Persian tongue Eglo, bigger than our lizards, " very poisonous, &c. (17)." All this shews how fully the predictions of the prophet Isaiah relating to this place have been accomplished. His words are as follow; And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrha; it shall never be inhabited, neither shall be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there, neither shall the shepherds make their folds there: but wild beasts of the desert shall be there, and their house shall be full of doleful creatures, and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there, and the wild beasts of the island shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces, and her time is near to come, and her days shall not be prolonged (18). Thus far Isaiah; and, besides him, several other prophets have uttered prophecies to the same purpose, foretelling the utter destruction of Babylon. 'Tis true, that Lucan (19), Philostratus (20), and others, mention the city of Babylon as still standing and flourishing in their time; but those authors, and all others who speak of Babylon as a city still remaining after the time of Seleucus Nicator, are to be understood of Seleucia on the Tigris, and not of old Babylon on the Euphrates; for that city

(17) See Ray's edition of these travels in English, part ii. chap. 7. (18) Isa. c. xiii. ver. 19—22. (19) Lucan. l. i. ver. 10. (20) Philostrat. l. i. c. 17, 18, 19.

he called Antioch, from the name of his brother Antiochus; nine Seleucia, from his own name; ſix Laodicea, from his mother Leadice; three Apamea, from Apama his firſt wife; and one Stratonicea, from his laſt wife Stratonice [b]. In theſe, as well as in the other cities he built city becoming, ſoon after it was built, the metropolis of the eaſt, was called Babylon, as Pliny and Stephanus inform us (21). It was firſt called Seleucia Babylonia, or Seleucia in the province of Babylon, to diſtinguiſh it from ſeveral other cities in different provinces bearing the ſame name. Afterwards it was known by the name of Babylonia, and at length by that of Babylon (22). That Lucan by Babylon in the place abovementioned means Seleucia, is very plain; for the poet ſpeaks there of the metropolis of the Parthian kingdom, where the trophies of Craſſus were hung up after the defeat of the Romans at Carrhæ; which can be underſtood only of the Seleucian Babylon, that city, and not the old Babylon, being the ſeat of the Parthian kings. The ſame author, ſpeaking in another place of Babylon (23), deſcribes it as ſurrounded by the Tigris; which plainly ſhews, that by Babylon he meant Seleucia or the new Babylon; for that city, and not the old Babylon ſtood on the Tigris, as every one knows. As for Philoſtratus, he miſtook Seleucia, then called Babylon, for the old Babylon, and therefore gives us the ſame deſcription of it, which Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo and others give of old Babylon; but this is not the only blunder Philoſtratus is guilty of in his account, or rather romance, of Apollonius Thyanæus. As Babylon was drained of its inhabitants by Seleucia, ſo was Seleucia in proceſs of time by Cteſephon and Almadayan, and theſe two again by Bagdad. This laſt city was firſt built in the ſame place where Seleucia or new Babylon ſtood, which without all doubt, gave riſe to the common error, that Bagdad ſtands on the ruins of old Babylon. In the year of the Chriſtian æra 754, Seleucia was reduced to ſuch a ſtate of deſolation, as to have nothing on the ſpot where it ſtood, but the cell of a monk called Dad, and a garden adjoining to it, whence it was called Bagdad; that is built viz. Beroea, Edeſſa, Pella, &c. he planted the Jews, allowing them moſt ample privileges; and hence it was that they were diſperſed all over Syria and the Leſſer Aſia. They had been ſettled in the eaſtern countries beyond the Euphrates, and multiplied there in great numbers, ever ſince the Aſſyrian and Babylonian captivities; but Seleucus Nicator was the firſt, as Joſephus informs us [c], who granted them ſettlements in the provinces of Aſia on this ſide the Euphrates.

[b] Appian. in Syriac. p. 201.

(21) Plin. l. vi. c. 26. & Steph. in Babylon. (22) Vide Plin. & Steph. ibid. (23) Lucan. l. vi. ver. 50.

WHILE Seleucus was thus employed in building cities, Demetrius having, as he thought, ſettled his affairs in Greece, began to make great preparations for the recovering of his father's dominions in Aſia. With this view he raiſed an army of an hundred thouſand foot, and about twelve thouſand horſe, and fitted out a fleet of five hundred ſail, which was the greateſt force that had been ſince the time of Alexander. Theſe formidable preparations alarmed Ptolemy, Lyſimachus, and Seleucus, who renewing their antient alliance for their mutual defence againſt Demetrius as a common enemy, prevailed alſo upon Pyrrhus king of Epirus to join in the ſame confederacy. Demetrius, not being able to withſtand ſo many enemies, was, after many great loſſes, obliged to abandon the conqueſts is in the language of the country, the garden of Dad. In this place Abu Jaafar Almanſur, caliph of the Saracens, not liking Haſhemia, where his predeceſſor had reſided, built a new city, which has ever ſince been called from the place Bagdad. This he made the capital of his empire, raiſing it upon the very foundations of Seleucia or new Babylon, on the weſt ſide of the Tigris; but not long after it was tranſlated to the other ſide, where it ſtill ſtands, that part which was built on the weſt ſide, being at preſent no more than the ſuburbs of it. It was, for many years, the capital of the Saracen empire, and is ſtill a place of great note; but ſuch as take it for the antient Babylon, are greatly miſtaken, that city ſtanding on the Euphrates, and Bagdad on the Tigris, about forty miles from it (24).

[c] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 3. & contra Appian. l. ii. Euſeb. in Chron.

(24) Vide Bochar. Geog. Sacr. part i. l. i. c. 8, Gollii. notæ ad Alfragan. p. 121, 122. Sionitæ deſcript. Bagdad. in Geog. Nubienſi.

queſts he had made in Caria and Lydia, and march into the eaſt; but Agathocles the ſon of Lyſimachus following him cloſe in his march, reduced him to ſuch ſtreights for want of proviſions, that a ſickneſs ſpreading thro' his army, ſwept off great numbers of his men; and when he attempted, with the ſmall remains of his troops, to paſs mount Taurus, he found all the paſſes guarded by the enemy, which obliged him to return to Tarſus in Cilicia, a city belonging to Seleucus, to whom he tranſmitted an account of the melancholy ſituation of his affairs, entreating that prince, in a very moving manner, to afford him the neceſſary ſubſiſtance for himſelf and the remainder of his troops. Seleucus at firſt pitying his condition, ordered his lieutenants in thoſe parts, to ſupply him and his army with all things neceſſary; but afterwards, being put in mind of the valour and enterpriſing genius of this prince, inſtead of helping him, he reſolved upon his deſtruction; and accordingly marching againſt him, reduced him to ſuch difficulties, as we have already related, that he was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. Seleucus cauſed him to be conducted under a ſtrong guard to the Syrian Cherſoneſus, where he was detained priſoner till he died, but allowed the freedom of a park to hunt in, and plentifully ſupplied with all neceſſary things both for the ſupport and pleaſures of life [d]. Upon his death Seleucus took poſſeſſion of whatever he held in Syria and Aſia, and of both theſe kingdoms made, to uſe the expreſſion of Euſebius, one entire empire [e].

Death of Demetrius. Year after the flood 2715. Before Chriſt 284.

A FEW months after Demetrius died alſo Ptolemy Soter king of Egypt, ſo that now two only of all Alexander's captains ſurvived, viz. Lyſimachus and Seleucus. As they were now drawing near to the laſt period of their days, each of them being upwards of ſeventy, one would have thought they ſhould have cloſed the ſcene of their life in the union which had ſubſiſted ſo long between them, for they had ever been cloſely united, and for the utmoſt of their power, ſupported each other: but it happened quite otherwiſe, a war, which proved fatal to both, ſoon breaking out between them, on the following occaſion: Lyſimachus, after the marriage of his ſon Agathocles with Lyſandra, one of Ptolemy's daughters, married War between Seleucus and Lyſimachus.

[d] Plut. in Demet. Appian. in Syriac. Val. Max. l. v. c. 7.
[e] Euſeb. in Chron.

married another of them called Arſinoe himſelf, and had by her ſeveral children. Hereupon great emulation aroſe between the two ſiſters, each of them ſtriving to form a powerful party in their favour againſt the death of Lyſimachus. As they were ſiſters by different mothers, for Lyſandra was the daughter of Eurydice, and Arſinoe of Berenice, the diſagreement of their mothers greatly contributed to the heightening and fomenting of the contention between them. In the height of their emulation, Ptolemy Ceraunus, the brother of Ptolemy Philadelphus, arrived at the court of Lyſimachus, and his arrival, as he was brother to Lyſandra by both parents, made Arſinoe apprehenſive, that his intereſt would prove too effectual to the party of Lyſandra, and enable them to deſtroy her and her children at the death of Lyſimachus. To prevent this ſhe plotted the death of Agathocles, and effected it, by repreſenting him to her huſband as one who was forming conſpiracies againſt his life and crown, which induced the old king to confine him to a caſtle, and there put him to death. Hereupon Lyſandra with her children, and Ptolemy Ceraunus her brother, took ſanctuary in the court of Seleucus, and prevailed upon him to make war upon Lyſimachus. Many of Lyſimachus's chief officers, even thoſe who had been moſt attached to his intereſt, were ſo much affected with the death of Agathocles, under whoſe conduct they had gained many glorious victories, that they went over to Seleucus, and backed the remonſtrances of Lyſandra with their own complaints. Seleucus was eaſily perſuaded to engage in this war, being already ſufficiently inclined to it on other accounts; but before he embarqued in ſo great an undertaking, he not only reſigned to his ſon Antiochus a conſiderable part of his empire, but alſo, by an unparallelled example, his favourite queen Stratonice. The manner how this happened is thus related by Plutarch [f], Appian [g], and Valerius Maximus [h]. As Stratonice was the moſt beautiful woman of her age, Antiochus fell violently in love with her; but not daring to own his paſſion, he ſilently languiſhed under it, and at length fell fell dangerouſly ill. Eraſiſtratus, an eminent Greek phyſician, who attended him, ſoon perceived that love was his diſtemper; but the difficulty was to diſcover the object of his flame: he therefore paſſed whole days in the apartment of his patient, and carefully watching the countenance of the prince when viſited by the ladies of the court, he obſerved that when Stratonice came alone, or in company with Seleucus, to make him a viſit, great alterations happened in his pulſe, in his countenance, in his behaviour, &c. and that nothing of this was ſeen when any other lady entered his room. From theſe infallible ſymptoms Eraſiſtratus plainly perceived, that Stratonice was the object of his paſſion; and the firſt time he was alone with the ſick prince after that diſcovery, he, with great dexterity, drew the ſecret from his own mouth. The prince owned his paſſion for Stratonice his mother-in-law, and declared that he had done all that lay in his power to vanquiſh it; that he had a thouſand times had recourſe to every conſideration that could be repreſented to his thoughts in ſuch a conjuncture, particularly the reſpect which was due from him to a father and a ſovereign, by whom he was tenderly beloved; the ſhameful circumſtance of indulging a paſſion altogether unjuſtifiable, and contrary to every maxim of decency and honour; the folly of harbouring a deſire, which he never ought to gratify, &c. but that his reaſon, in its preſent ſtate of diſtraction, being incapable of attending to any motives that could be ſuggeſted, he had reſolved to put an end, both to his ſhameful paſſion and unhappy life, by abſtaining from all kind of food. Eraſiſtratus, plainly ſeeing that the prince neither could nor would live, unleſs ſome way were found out to apply the only remedy which was capable of curing him, for the bringing of this about thus managed the matter with great craft and dexterity. The firſt time Seleucus enquired of him after his ſon's health, he put on all the aſſurance he could, and told him, that the prince's diſeaſe was love, and that he was incurable, becauſe it was impoſſible for him to have the perſon he loved, and he could not live without her. Seleucus, ſurprized at this anſwer, aſked, why his ſon could not have the perſon he loved? becauſe ſhe is my wife, replied the phyſician, and I am not diſpoſed to yield her up to the embraces of another. How! ſaid Seleucus, will

Seleucus yields his queen Stratonice to his ſon Antiochus, with all the provinces of the upper Aſia.

[f] Plut. in Demet. [g] Appian. in Syriac. [h] Val. Max. l. v. c. 7.

will Eraſiſtratus, my dear Eraſiſtratus refuſe to part with his wife to preſerve the life of a ſon I ſo tenderly love? is this the friendſhip you profeſs for me? nay then, anſwered the phyſician, make it your own caſe; if Antiochus were thus deſperately in love with Stratonice, would you part with her for the ſake of Antiochus? would you take the counſel which you give me? no certainly; and if you, who are a father, and have all the tenderneſs imaginable for your ſon, would not part with your wife to ſave his life, how can you expect ſuch a ſacrifice from any other? ah! my dear friend, ſubjoined Seleucus, may the gods put the ſafety of the prince upon that iſſue; I would part, not only with Stratonice, but my empire, to preſerve the life of Antiochus, my deareſt Antiochus. In uttering theſe words he burſt out into a flood of tears, when Eraſiſtratus taking him by the hand, you have then no need, ſaid he, of any phyſician but yourſelf; for the love of Stratonice is the ſource of his diſtemper, and nothing can recover him but your yielding her up to him. Hereupon Seleucus having, without much ado, prevailed upon Stratonice to accept of a young prince for her huſband inſtead of an old king, the nuptials were ſolemnized with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence; after which Antiochus and Stratonice were crowned king and queen of Upper Aſia, Seleucus willingly reſigning to them all thoſe provinces g. From this inceſtuous marriage ſprung all the kings of Syria, who ſo tyrannically oppreſſed the Jewiſh nation in Judah and Jeruſalem, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory (I).

Seleucus

g Plut. & Appian. ibid. Lucian. de dea Syra.

(I) the emperor Julian, ſurnamed the Apoſtate, relates in a fragment of his writings, which is ſtill extant, that Antiochus could not, by any means, be prevailed upon to marry Stratonice till after the death of his father; but herein he contradicts Plutarch, Appian, Valerius Maximus, Lucian, and all other writers (25). Some authors tell us, that Leptinas a mathematician, and not Eraſiſtratus, diſcovered the ſecret paſſion of Antiochus.

(25) Julian. in Miſopogone.

Seleucus makes war againſt Lyſimachus.

SELEUCUS being now eaſed of this inquietude, thought of nothing but marching againſt Lyſimachus. Having therefore drawn together a powerful army, he advanced at the head of it into Aſia Minor, where he eaſily reduced all the places belonging to Lyſimachus, moſt of the governors coming over to him out of hatred to that prince, on account of the murder of his ſon Agathocles, who was the darling of the army (K). The city of Sardis was the only place that ſuſtained a ſiege, which was carried on by Seleucus with ſuch vigour, that the garriſon was ſoon obliged to capitulate, and ſurrender at diſcretion, putting Seleucus in poſſeſſion of that important city, and of all the treaſures which Lyſimachus had laid up there, as in a place of great ſafety. Lyſimachus, upon intelligence of this invaſion, marched with all poſſible expedition to the Helleſpont, in order to check the progreſs of Seleucus, and having croſſed over into Aſia, met the enemy at a place called Curopedion in Phrygia. Both armies prepared for the engagement, being commanded by two generals, ochus. Eraſiſtratus was the grandſon of Ariſtotle, by a daughter of that philoſopher, and, according to Pliny (26), a diſciple of Chryſippus, or, as Laertius will have it (27), of Theophraſtus. Againſt the followers of Eraſiſtratus, known by the name of Eraſiſtratæans, Galen wrote a book of phlebotomy, or opening the vein, which is ſtill extant. Plutarch places the marriage of Antiochus and Stratonice before the death of Demetrius; but moſt other writers relate this adventure as happening at the time Seleucus engaged in a war with Lyſimachus; and theſe, with the learned Uſher, we have followed.

(K) Amongſt theſe was the eunuch Philetærus, by birth a Paphlagonian, whom Lyſimachus had truſted with all his treaſures in Pergamus. Theſe Philetærus ſeized, and making himſelf maſter of the city, offered to put Seleucus in poſſeſſion of both. Seleucus, not doubting of the ſincerity of his offer, put off going to take poſſeſſion of the place, and Philetærus improving this delay, raiſed with the money troops, by which he maintained himſelf in the ſovereignty of Pergamus for the ſpace nerals, who, out of the thirty-ſix left by Alexander, were the only two captains now alive, and both ſeventy years old and upwards. The engagement was very bloody, and the victory long doubtful; but at laſt Lyſimachus, who had fought the whole time at the head of his troops with incredible bravery, being run through with a ſpear by one Malacon of Heraclea, and killed on the ſpot, his men betook themſelves to a precipitous flight, and left Seleucus maſter of the field, and all their baggage. Thus died Lyſimachus, after having ſeen the death of fifteen of his children; and as he was, to uſe the expreſſion of Memnon, the laſt ſtone of his houſe to be pulled down, Seleucus without oppoſition, made himſelf maſter of all his dominions; but what gave him moſt pleaſure on this occaſion was, that he was now the only ſurvivor of all the captains of Alexander; and that by the event of this battle, he was become, as he ſtiled himſelf, the conqueror of conquerors. This laſt victory, which he looked upon as the effect of a peculiar providence in his favour, gave him the beſt title to the name of Nicator or Conqueror, by which hiſtorians commonly diſtinguiſh him from other kings of the ſame name, who afterwards reigned in Syria [h].

(26) Plin. l. xxix. c. 1.

(27) Laertius in vita Theoph.

Lyſimachus killed, and his army defeated.

His triumph on this occaſion did not laſt long; for ſeven months after, as he was marching into Macedon, to take poſſeſſion of that kingdom, with a deſign to paſs the remainder of his life in his native country, he was treacherouſly ſlain by Ptolemy Ceraunus, on whom he had conferred innumerable favours; for he had received him in his court on his flight thither, and maintained him ſuitably to his rank: he had likewiſe taken him with him in this expedition, deſigning, upon his finiſhing it with ſucceſs, to employ the ſame forces in reſtoring him to ſpace of twenty years, and founded a new kingdom, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of that country. Appian calls him only prince or potentate of Pergamus (28); but in ſome antient medals we find him honoured with the title of king (29).

[h] Polyænus l. iv. c. 9. Juſtin. l. xvii. c. 1. Appian. in Syriac. p. 128, 131. Memn. Excerpt. c. 9. Pauſan. in Attic. p. 9. Oroſ. l. iii. c. 23. Lucian. in Macrob.

(28) Appian. in Syriac. p. 129. 29) Vide Huber. Golzii, Theſaur.

to his father's kingdom; but the baſe traitor, having no ſenſe of gratitude for theſe favours, conſpired againſt his benefactor, and villainouſly murdered him in the following manner: Seleucus having croſſed the Helleſpont, in his way to Macedon, as he was purſuing his journey from thence to Lyſimachia, a city built by Lyſimachus, near the Iſthmus of the Thracian Cherſoneſus, he ſpied an old altar ſtanding at a ſmall diſtance, on a very conſpicuous place; and being told that it was called Argos, he aſked many queſtions about it, whether it was ſo named from the Argonauts who paſſed that way in going with Jaſon to Colchos; or from the Argivi, who went to the ſiege of Troy; or from the ſhip Argos, which was caſt away in that neighbourhood; or finally, becauſe that was the country of the Atridæ, Agamemnon and Menelaus? What made him thus inquiſitive was, that he had been warned by an oracle to beware of Argos (L), which he had ever underſtood of the city of Argos in Peloponneſus; but while he was thus enquiring about the origin of that name, Ptolemy Ceraunus, who ſtood behind him, ran him through with his ſword, and before thoſe, who ſtood round the king, recovered from the ſurprize and conſternation they were in, got, by the help of a ſwift horſe, into Lyſimachia, whence he ſoon returned to the army with a crown on his head, and a ſtrong guard about him. The troops, being deſtitute of a general, and in the utmoſt confuſion, not only received the traitor, but ſaluted him king of Macedon, the ſoldiers, who had ſerved under Lyſimachus, looking upon him as the revenger of that prince's death [i]; but providence did not ſuffer this and many other barbarous murders he ſoon after committed, to go long unpuniſhed, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of the Ptolemies of Egypt. Such was the end of Seleucus, the greateſt general, in the opinion of Arrian, and the moſt powerful prince, after Alexander, of the age he lived in [k]. He died in the forty-third year after Seleucus murdered by Ptolemy Ceraunus. Year after the flood 2719. Before Chriſt 280.

[i] Juſtin. l. xxiv. c. 2. Memn. Excerpt. c. 15. [k] Arrian. de reb. Alex.

(L) We are told, that the oracle was uttered in the ambiguous words of the following diſtich:

Si fugias Argos, fatum ſuperabis iniquum;
Sin minus, ante diem tartara nigra petes.

after the death of Alexander, in the thirty-second of the Grecian or Seleucian æra, and seventy-third, or, as Justin will have, seventy-eighth of his age[l]. Philetærus, the prince of Pergamus, having with a great sum of money, purchased his body of Ceraunus, sent it to his son Antiochus, who with extraordinary pomp, burnt it in Seleucia on the sea-coast, erecting on the place a magnificent chapel, which, from his surname, he called Nicatorium[m]. Polybius observes, that Ptolemy the first, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy Ceraunus died all in the CXXIVth olympiad; and that Ptolemy the first died in the first year of it, and Lysimachus and Seleucus in the last; but Ceraunus did not die till the latter end of the first year of the following olympiad; whence Polybius being, it seems, well apprized of his mistake, in mentioning elsewhere the concurrence of their deaths, omits Ceraunus[n].

His character.

Seleucus was, without all doubt, a prince endowed with extraordinary qualities; for, without mentioning his military accomplishments, it may be justly said, that he distinguished himself above all the kings of his age by a very remarkable love for justice, a great sweetness of temper, and a peculiar regard for religion, which endeared him to his people. He had a taste for polite literature, and was a great encourager of learning, taking great pleasure in the conversation of Erasistratus and the famous Megasthenes. The latter he employed in his negotiations with Sandrocottus king of India. On this occasion it was, that Megasthenes, by residing some time in that country, and travelling over great part of it, gathered the materials for his history of India[o] (M). Seleucus

[l] Justin. ubi supra.
[m] Appian. in Syriac. p. 129.
[n] Polyb l. ii. p. 128. & ib. p. 155.
[o] Vide Voss. de Historicis Græcis.

(M) Megasthenes composed a history of the Indies, from the third book of which Clemens of Alexandria quotes a passage in the first book of his Stromata, where that author tells us, that whatever the antients have said concerning nature, was taught them, not by the Greeks, but by Indian Brachmans and the Jews of Syria. Pliny and Solinus inform us, that Megasthenes lived in India to gather materials for his history. Some cus having found in Perſia the famous library which Xerxes had taken from the Athenians, ſent them it back, together with the ſtatues of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, whom they honoured as their deliverers. He is highly commended by Polyænus, Seneca, Pliny, Valerius Maximus, Appian, Lucian, and Plutarch. This laſt writer tells us, that he uſed to ſay, If men knew what trouble attends only the reading and writing of letters, which in thoſe days was thought the indiſpenſable duty of a king, no one would accept of a crown, though thrown at his feet, or think it worth taking off the ground.

Some fragments of this hiſtory are preſerved by Joſephus (30), and Euſebius (31), wherein he makes mention of Nebuchadnezzar, and extols his great wealth and power. He is likewiſe quoted by Strabo (32), Athenæus, Arrian, Cicero, Pliny, and Solinus; but the book itſelf has not reached our times. Annius, a monk of Viterbo, who flouriſhed about the end of the fifteenth century, counterfeited ſeveral books under old names, of which number were Manetho, Beroſus, and Megaſthenes, whom he, by miſtake, calls Metaſthenes, being led into this error by Rufinus's Latin verſion of Joſephus, and this firſt gave occaſion to the diſcovery of the impoſture. Theſe books he publiſhed with a comment upon them; and they were for ſome time looked upon as the genuine works of the authors whoſe names they bore, but are now every where exploded as fictitious and fabulous, being framed on purpoſe to impoſe upon the world. Plutarch ſeems to have entertained but a very indifferent opinion of thoſe authors in general who have wrote of India (33); and Strabo (34) tells us, that all thoſe who have wrote hiſtories of India are great liars, but above all Diamarchus, and after him Megalthenes, Oneſicritus, and Nearchus. To the two former, continues Strabo, we ought to give no credit at all, for they would make us believe, that there are men in India, whoſe ears are ſo large as to cover their bodies, that ſome have no mouths, nor noſes, and but one eye; that their feet are of a monſtrous ſize, and their toes turned inwards; that there are whole nations of men only three ſpans high, ants that ſearch for gold, and birds with heads in the ſhape of a wedge, which ſwallow ſerpents, ſtags, and oxen.

(30) Joſeph. Antiquit. l. x. c. 11. & contra Appian l. i. (31) Euſeb. præp. Evang. (32) Strabo. l. xv. p. 687. (33) Plut. de flumin. (34) Strabo l. ii.

Antiochus Soter.

On the death of Seleucus, Antiochus ſurnamed Soter, his ſon by Apamea the daughter of Artabazus the Perſian, took poſſeſſion of the empire of Aſia, and held it for the ſpace of nineteen years. Having, upon the firſt news of his father's death, ſecured his dominions in the eaſt, where he then was, he ſent Patrocles, one of his generals, at the head of a powerful army, over mount Taurus, into Aſia Minor, to ſettle affairs there. Patrocles, on his firſt arrival, marched againſt Heraclea in Pontus, at that time a powerful ſtate, with a deſign to make himſelf maſter of its rich territory, the Heracleans having formerly entered into an alliance, with Mithridates king of Pontus and the cities of Byzantium and Chalcedon againſt Seleucus; but matters being made up between them by a treaty, Patrocles led his army againſt the Bithynians, and entering their territories, committed there, on what provocation we know not, great devaſtations; but the Bithynians having drawn him into an ambuſh, cut off him and his whole army, not one man eſcaping the general ſlaughter. Zipætes, who was then king of Bithynia, and in the ſeventy-ſixth year of his age and forty-eighth of his reign, was ſo overjoyed at the news of this victory, that he died ſoon after, leaving behind him four ſons, of which the eldeſt, by name Nicomedes, ſucceeding his father in the kingdom, cauſed, out of jealouſy, two of his brothers to be put to death; but the youngeſt, called alſo Zipætes, having ſaved himſelf by a timely flight, ſeized on part of his father's dominions, and there maintained a long war with his brother, who, hearing that Antiochus was making great preparations to attack him at the ſame time, and revenge the death of Patrocles and the loſs of his army, called in the Gauls to his aſſiſtance; and on this occaſion it was that the Gauls firſt paſſed into Aſia Minor [p]. With their aſſiſtance Nicomedes having overcome his brother Zipætes, and acquired the poſſeſſion of all his father's dominions, beſtowed upon them that part of Aſia Minor, which from their name, was called by ſome Gallo-Græci, and by others Galatia. In proceſs of time the latter name prevailed, whence the people people were no more called Gauls, but Galatians. To their deſcendents St. Paul wrote one of his canonical epiſtles; and St. Jerom witneſſes, that near ſeven hundred years after they had ſettled in Aſia, they continued to ſpeak the ſame language, which, in his time, was ſpoke at Treves.

His army cut off by the Bithynians.

[p] Appian in Syriac. Euſeb. Chron. Memnon. Excerpt. p. 16. & 21. Liv. l. xxxviii.

But to return to Antiochus; Soſthenes, who had defeated the Gauls, as we have related in the hiſtory of Macedon, and reigned ſome years in that country, being dead, Antiochus Soter and Antigonus Gonatus, the ſon of Demetrius, laid claim to that kingdom, their fathers having held it, one after the other; but Antigonus, who had already reigned ten years in Greece, being neareſt, firſt took poſſeſſion of thoſe dominions. Hereupon Antiochus being reſolved to diſpoſſeſs his rival, if poſſible, of his new conqueſts, and the other to ſupport himſelf in them, each raiſed great armies, and contracted powerful alliances. On this occaſion Nicomedes king of Bithynia having eſpouſed the cauſe of Antigonus, Antiochus not thinking it adviſeable to leave ſuch an enemy behind him in Aſia, inſtead of croſſing the Helleſpont to attack Antigonus, unexpectedly poured his troops into Bithynia, which then became the theatre of the war; but both armies having there lain ſome time in ſight of each other, and neither daring to attack the other, the two kings came to an agreement, in conſequence of which Antigonus having married Phila the daughter of Stratonice by Seleucus, Antiochus renounced his pretenſions to the crown of Macedon. In virtue of this renunciation Antigonus not only quietly enjoyed himſelf the kingdom of Macedon, but tranſmitted it to his poſterity, who reigned there for ſeveral generations, till at length Perſeus, the laſt of that race, was, by Paulus Æmilius, deveſted of his dominions, and Macedon reduced to a Roman province [q].

Antiochus refigns to Antigonus his pretenſions to Macedon.

Antiochus, being thus freed from a threatening war, marched againſt the Gauls, who having, by the favour of Nicomedes, got ſettlements in Aſia, haraſſed, with frequent incurſions, the neighbouring princes. Antiochus defeated them with great ſlaughter, and delivered thoſe provinces from their oppreſſions; and hence he acquired the title of Soter or Saviour [r].

Defeats the Gauls.

[q] Memnon. c. 19. Juſtin. l. xxv. c. 1. Plut. in Demet. Porphyr. in Græc. Euſeb. p. 229. [r] Appian. in Syriac. p. 130.

Defeated by Eumenes king of Pergamus.

Antiochus, not long after this ſucceſsful expedition againſt the Gauls, hearing of the death of Philetærus prince of Pergamus, laid hold of that opportunity to invade his territories, with a view to add them to his own dominions; but Eumenes, nephew and ſucceſſor to the deceaſed prince, having raiſed a conſiderable army, encountered him near Sardis, overthrew him in battle, and thereby not only ſecured himſelf in the poſſeſſion of what he had already enjoyed, but enlarged his dominions with ſeveral new acquiſitions[s]. After this defeat, Antiochus returning to Antioch, there put to death one of his ſons for raiſing diſturbances in his abſence, and at the ſame time proclaimed the other, called alſo Antiochus, king of Syria. He died ſoon after, leaving his ſon in the ſole poſſeſſion of all his dominions. This young prince was his ſon by Stratonice the daughter of Demetrius, who, from his mother-in-law, became his wife, as we have related above.

Antiochus Soter dies Year after the flood 2738. Before Chriſt 261.

Antiochus Theos.

Antiochus, on his coming to the throne, aſſumed the ſurname of Theos, that is, God; and by this he is diſtinguiſhed from the other kings of Syria who bore the name of Antiochus. The Mileſians were the firſt who beſtowed it upon him, for delivering them from the tyranny of Timarchus; for Timarchus, being governor of Caria for Ptolemy Philadelphus, rebelled againſt his ſovereign, and ſetting up for himſelf, choſe Miletus for the ſeat of his tyranny. The Mileſians, to deliver themſelves from his oppreſſions, had recourſe to Antiochus, who defeated and ſlew him; in acknowledgment of which favour, they rendered him divine honours, and by an impious flattery, conferred upon him the title of Theos or God. The Lemnians had not long before placed his father and grandfather in the number of their gods, and built temples to them, as the Smyrnians did to Stratonice his mother [t].

In the beginning of this king's reign lived Beroſus the famous Babylonian hiſtorian, and dedicated his hiſtory to him him (N). Pliny informs us, that it contained the astronomical observations of ~~four~~ hundred and eighty years. While the Macedonians were masters of Babylon, he learned of them the Greek language, and passing from Babylon into Greece, first settled at Cos, a place famous for the birth of Hippocrates, and there opened a school, in which he taught astronomy and astrology. From Cos he went to Athens, where he acquired such reputation by his astrological predictions, that the Athenians erected to him in their gymnasium a statue with a golden tongue [u]. Josephus and Eusebius have transmitted to us many noble fragments of this history, which illustrate several passages of the old testament, and without which, it would be impossible to trace out the series of the Babylonian kings.

[s] Memnon. c. 21. Strabo. l. xiii. p. 624. Lucian. in Zeux. [t] Trog. in prologo. l. xxvi. Polyæn. Stratagem. l. viii. c. 50. Appian. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. xxvii. c. 1. Theocrit. Idyll. 17. Athen. l. vi. c. 6.

War between Antiochus Soter and Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt.

In the third year of the reign of Antiochus Soter, a bloody war, which was carried on for a long time with great vigor, broke out between him and Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt, on the following occasion: Magas king of Cyrene and Libya, having waged war for many years with Ptolemy Philadelphus his half-brother, to support himself in the usurpation of those dominions, and being now grown very old and infirm, caused overtures of an accommodation to be tendered to Ptolemy, with the proposal of a marriage

[u] Plin. l. vii. c. 36 & 37. Vitruv. l. ix. c 7.

(N) The words of Tatian are as follow. Berosus the Babylonian, who was a priest of Belus at Babylon, and lived in the time of Alexander, dedicated to Antiochus, who was the third after him, his history, which he wrote in three books, of the affairs of the Chaldeans, and the actions of their kings (35). Now, the third after Alexander was, without all doubt, Antiochus Theus: for Seleucus Nicator was the first, Antiochus Soter the second, and consequently the prince we are speaking of the third; but as Berosus, according to Tatian, lived in the time of Alexander, who died sixty-four years before the beginning of the reign of Antiochus Theus, we must place this dedication as early as possible, that is, in the very first year of his reign; for if Berosus was but twenty at the death of Alexander, he must have been eighty-four in the first year of Antiochus Theus.

(35) Tatian. in Orat. adverf. Græcos.

riage between Berenice his only daughter, and the eldeſt ſon of the king of Egypt, promiſing to reſign all his dominions to her for her dowry. The propoſal was approved of by Ptolemy, and a peace concluded on theſe terms; but Magas died the year following, before the execution of the treaty, after he had reigned fifty years over Lydia and Cyrene, from the time that theſe provinces were firſt committed to his care. On his death his widow Apame, whom Juſtin calls Arſinoe, the ſiſter of Antiochus Theus, reſolved to put a ſtop to the marriage of her daughter with the ſon of Ptolemy, ſince it had been agreed on without her conſent. With this view ſhe ſent into Macedon for Demetrius, half-brother to Antigonus Gonatus, promiſing him her daughter in marriage, and with her the kingdoms of Libya and Cyrene. This invitation ſoon brought Demetrius thither; but, as he was a beautiful young man, Apame no ſooner ſaw him but ſhe fell in love with him, and reſolved to marry him herſelf. Demetrius finding himſelf highly favoured by the mother, entirely neglected the young princeſs, and imagining that her favour raiſed him above all controul, he began to treat the princeſs, as well as the miniſters and officers of the army in a moſt inſolent and imperious manner. Hereupon they all conſpired againſt him, and Berenice herſelf led the conſpirators to the door of her mother's apartment, where they ſlew him in her bed, though Apame did all ſhe could to ſave him, and even covered him from the ſwords of the conſpirators with her own body. Upon his death Berenice went into Egypt, where ſhe was married, according to the former agreement, to the ſon of Ptolemy, and Apame was ſent to her brother Antiochus Theus in Syria [w]. On her arrival at his court, ſhe ſo exaſperated him againſt Ptolemy, that he proclaimed war againſt him. This war was carried on for many years with great fury, and proved at laſt very fatal to Antiochus, as we ſhall ſee anon. Ptolemy did not head his army in perſon, his declining ſtate of health not permitting him to expoſe himſelf to the fatigues of a campaign, and the inconveniencies of a camp; for which reaſon he left the whole conduct of the war to his generals; but Antiochus, who was then in the flower of his age, took the field, at the head of a numerous army, having ing under his ſtandards all the forces of Babylon, and the eaſt. Hiſtory has not tranſmitted to us the ſucceſſes of this war on either ſide, probably becauſe they were not very conſiderable; for if any ſignal events had happened, they would, in all likelihood, have been recorded in an age, when ſo many learned men and able hiſtorians lived, who would not have failed to commit them to writing.

[w] Juſtin. lib. xxxi. c. 3. Athenæus ex Agarthacide l. xii. p 550. Plut. in Demet.

The Parthians and Bactrians revolt from Antiochus. Year of the flood, 2699. Before Chriſt 300.

WHILE Antiochus was thus engaged in a war with the king of Egypt, great commotions and revolts happened in the eaſtern provinces of his empire, which, as he was not at leiſure to ſuppreſs them immediately, grew to ſuch a head, that he could never afterwards maſter them. The lewdneſs of Agathocles, whom Arrian calls Pherecles, was the occaſion of this great event. Antiochus had committed to his care the adminiſtration of all the provinces beyond the Euphrates; ſo that Parthia and the adjacent countries were under his government. As Agathocles was moſt viciouſly given, he was charmed with the gracefulneſs and beauty of a youth called Tiridates to ſuch a degree, that he made an attempt on his modeſty. Hereupon Arſaces, the brother of the youth, enraged at the affront offered to his family, ran to arms, and being ſupported by ſome friends who engaged in his quarrel, fell upon the governor, and ſlew him. After his death, Arſaces prevailed upon ſeveral of his countrymen to ſtand by him, and by degrees his party grew ſo numerous, while neglected by Antiochus, that in the end he found himſelf ſtrong enough to drive out the Macedonians, and ſet up for himſelf, which he accordingly did, fixing his reſidence at Hecatompolis, and there giving riſe, to the Parthian empire, which roſe in proceſs of time to ſo great a pitch of power, as to become formidable, not only to all the princes of the eaſt, but to the Romans themſelves. Much about the ſame time Theodotus revolted in Bactria, and from governor, became king, of that province, which, if we believe Juſtin, contained no fewer than a thouſand cities, and ſtrengthened himſelf ſo effectually in his new kingdom, while Antiochus was taken up with the Egyptian war, that he could never afterwards be diſpoſſeſſed of his acquiſitions. His example, and that of Arſaces, were followed by all the nations in thoſe parts, each of them ſhaking off at the ſame time the Macedonian yoke, and ſetting up princes of their own; by which means Antiochus loſt all the provinces

provinces of his empire lying beyond the Euphrates [w]. The revolt of the Parthians happened, according to Juſtin, while L. Manlius Vulſo, and M. Attilius Regulus were conſuls at Rome; which period, as Polybius obſerves, coincides with the fourteenth year of the firſt Punic war. This Arſaces is called by the modern Perſian writers Aſki and Aſkam. Mircondus gives him the name of Chapur, and ſays, that he began his reign ſeventy-two years years after the death of Alexander the Great, which according to the learned Uſher, is one year before the conſulſhip of Manlius and Attilius, and three years before the CXXXIIId olympiad, when, according to the calculation of Euſebius, Arſaces and his Parthians revolted from Antiochus; but as they annually ſolemnized the day on which Arſaces engaged and defeated Seleucus Callinicus, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Antiochus, and looked upon it as the day that gave birth to their liberty, both Juſtin and Appian thought, that the Parthians firſt revolted under Seleucus, and not under Antiochus his father [x].

Anticchus concludes a peace with Ptolemy.

These troubles and commotions in the eaſt made Antiochus weary of his war with Ptolemy; a treaty of peace was therefore concluded on the following terms; That Antiochus ſhould divorce his former wife Laodice, who was his own ſiſter by the father, marry Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy, and ſettle the crown upon the male iſſue of that marriage. Antiochus purſuant to this treaty, put away Laodice, tho' ſhe had already brought him two ſons; and Ptolemy carrying his daughter to Peluſium, there put her on board his fleet, and ſailed with her to Seleucia, a maritime city near the mouth of the Orontes in Syria, where he met Antiochus, delivered his daughter to him, and ſolemnized the nuptials with extraordinary magnificence. Ptolemy as he had a tender affection for his daughter, gave of his own accord, an immenſe ſum with her by way of dowry; whence he was ſurnamed Phernopheros, or the Dowry-giver [y]. Beſides, he ordered regular ſupplies of water from the Nile to be tranſmitted to her, where-ever ſhe was, believing it to be more beneficial to her health than any other [z].

Two

[w] Arrian. in Parthicis apud Phot. cod. 58. Syncel. p. 284. Juſtin. l. xli. c. 4. Strabo. l. xi. p. 515. [x] Juſtin. l. xli. c. 4. Appian. in Syriac p. 130. [y] Vide Hieronym. in Daniel. c. 11. [z] Atheneus l. ii. c. 2.

Two years after this marriage Ptolemy Philadelphus died, which Antiochus Theus his ſon-in-law no ſooner heard, than he removed Berenice from his bed, and recalled Laodice, with her children Seleucus Callinicus and Antiochus Hierax; but Laodice being well acquainted with his fickle temper, and fearing leſt he might again alter his mind, and receive Berenice, reſolved to improve the preſent opportunity, and ſecure the ſucceſſion to her ſon; for by the late treaty with Ptolemy, her children were diſinherited, and the crown ſettled on the children which Berenice ſhould bear, and ſhe had then a ſon. For the effecting of this deſign, ſhe cauſed Antiochus to be poiſoned, and when ſhe ſaw him expiring, ſhe ordered him to be privately conveyed away, and one Artemon, who greatly reſembled him, as well in features as in the tone of his voice, to be placed in his bed. Artemon acted his part with great dexterity, and perſonating Antiochus, tenderly recommended his dear Laodice and her children to the lords that viſited him. In the name of Antiochus, whom the people believed ſtill alive, orders were iſſued, enjoining all his ſubjects to obey his beloved ſon Seleucus Callinicus, and acknowledge him for their lawful ſovereign. The crown being by this means ſecured to Callinicus, the death of the king was publickly declared, and Callinicus, without any oppoſition, aſcended the throne [a]. Antiochus Hierax, the other ſon of Laodice, had at this time the government of the provinces of Aſia Minor, where he commanded a conſiderable body of troops.

Antiochus Theus poiſoned by his wife Laodice.

Seleucus Callinicus aſcends the throne.

LAODICE not thinking herſelf ſafe ſo long as Berenice and her ſon were alive, concerted meaſures with Seleucus to deſtroy them likewiſe; but Berenice being informed of their deſign, eluded the danger for ſome time, by retiring with her ſon to Daphne, where ſhe ſhut herſelf up in the aſylum built by Seleucus Nicator. There ſhe was cloſely beſieged by the forces of Seleucus; which the cities of Aſia hearing, and pitying her condition, they formed a confederacy, and ſent a ſtrong body of troops to Antioch for her relief. Ptolemy Euergetes, her brother, haſtened thither likewiſe at the head of a formidable army; but both both Berenice and her son, with all the Egyptians who attended them, were barbarously cut off before either of the armies came to their rescue (O). When they saw

[a] Hieronym. ubi ſupra. Plin. l. vii. c. 12. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 14. Solinus. c. 1, Appian. in Syriac. p. 130. Juſtin. l. xxvii. c. 1. Polyb. l. ii. p. 155.

Berenice with her son murdered by Laodice.

(O) The particulars of the marriage of Antiochus with the daughter of Ptolemy, and the fatal consequences that attended it, with the greatest events in the history we are now writing, were evidently foretold by the prophet Daniel. The words of the prophecy are (36); And now I will shew thee the truth; Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia, viz. Cyrus who was then upon the throne; his son Cambyses, and Darius the son of Hystaspes; and the fourth shall be far richer than they all: and by his strength through his riches, he shall stir up all against the realm of Greece. The monarch here mentioned was Xerxes, who invaded Greece with a formidable army. And a mighty king shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will. And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided towards the four winds of heaven, and not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion which he ruled; for his kingdom shall be plucked up even for others besides those. This part of the prophecy evidently alludes to Alexander the Great, whose vast kingdom we have already seen broken by his death, and parcelled out into four great kingdoms, and, besides these, divided into a great many petty kingdoms, namely, Cappadocia, Armenia, Bithynia, &c. The prophet then proceeds to the treaty of peace, and the marriage which we have mentioned. And the king of the south shall be strong, and one of his princes, and he shall be strong above him, and have dominion; his dominion shall be a great dominion. And in the end of years they shall join themselves together; for the king's daughter of the south shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement: but he shall not retain the power of the arm, neither shall he stand, nor his arm; but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these times. We must observe, that Daniel, in this passage, and through all the remaining part of the chapter before us, confines himself to the kings of Egypt and Syria, these being the only princes who engaged in wars against the people of God. The king of the south shall be strong. This king of the south was Ptolemy the son of Lagus, the first who reigned in

(36) Dan. c. xi. ver. 2, 3, 4, &c.

ſaw all their endeavours for ſaving the queen and her child rendered ineffectual, they determined to revenge their death in a remarkable manner. The Aſian forces joined the Egyptian, and Ptolemy, at the head of both, carried in Egypt after Alexander; and that he was ſtrong all hiſtorians teſtify; for he was maſter of Egypt, Libya, Cyrene, Arabia, Paleſtine, Cœle-Syria, and moſt of the maritime provinces of Aſia Minor, together with the iſland of Cyprus, with ſeveral iſles in the Ægean ſea; and even poſſeſſed the cities of Sicyon and Corinth in Greece. The king of the north was Seleucus Nicator, of whom the prophet ſays, that he ſhall be more powerful than the king of the ſouth, and his dominion more extenſive; for ſuch is the import of the prophet's expreſſion, and he ſhall be ſtrong above him, and have dominion; and that he had a more extenſive dominion is plain from the large territories he poſſeſſed; for he had under him all the countries of the eaſt, from mount Taurus to the river Indus, ſeveral provinces of Aſia Minor between mount Taurus and the Ægean ſea, and a little before his death the kingdom of Thrace and Macedon. The prophet, in the next place, tells us of the coming of the daughter of the king of the ſouth, and the agreement or treaty of peace, which ſhould thereon be made between theſe two kings. This plainly points out the marriage of Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy king of Egypt, with Antiochus Theus king of Syria, and the peace which, in conſequence of that marriage, was made between them; every particular of which was exactly fulfilled, according to the holy prophet's prediction. Daniel afterwards informs us of the fatal conſequences attending this marriage; that is, that neither he, viz. Antiochus king of the north, nor ſhe, that is, Berenice daughter of Ptolemy, king of the ſouth, ſhould continue in their power, but that he, viz. king Antiochus, ſhould fall, and that ſhe, viz. Berenice being deprived of him that ſtrengthened her, that is, of her father, who died a little before, ſhould be given up with thoſe that brought her, that is, who came with her out of Egypt, to be cut off and deſtroyed; and ſo it happened to her and her attendants who came with her out of Egypt, as we have related. The king of Egypt is called by the prophet king of the ſouth, and the king of Syria ſtiled king of the north, which muſt be underſtood with reſpect to Judæa, that country having Syria to the north, and Egypt to the ſouth.

Her death revenged by Ptolemy Euergetes her brother.

ried all before him; for he not only slew Laodice, but made himself master of all Syria and Cilicia, and then passing the Euphrates, subdued all the country as far as Babylon and the river Tigris; and if the progress of his arms had not been interrupted by a sedition, which obliged him to return to Egypt, he would have brought under subjection all the provinces of the Syrian empire. On his return, he appointed Antiochus, one of his generals, to govern the provinces he had reduced on this side mount Taurus, and Xantippus to command in those he had possessed himself of beyond it [b]. He returned loaded with an immense booty; for he is said to have brought from Syria forty thousand talents of silver, with a prodigeous number of gold and silver vessels, and two thousand five hundred statues, among which were many of the Egyptian idols, which Cambyses, on his conquering Egypt, had carried from thence into Persia. These Ptolemy, on his return from his expedition, replaced in their antient temples, and thereby gained the hearts of his superstitious subjects, who, in acknowledgment of so great a favour, honoured him with the title of Euergetes, or Benefactor (P).

Seleucus

[b] Justin. Appian. Hieronym. ubi supra. Polyb. l. v. Polyæn. l. viii. c. 50.

(P) All this was likewise accomplished exactly, as the prophet Daniel had foretold it (37); for in that prophecy he tells us, That after the daughter of the king of the south should, with their attendants, be cut off, and he that strengthened her in those times, (that is, her father, who was her chief support) should be dead, there should one arise out of a branch of her roots in his estate, that is Ptolemy Euergetes, who springing from the same root with her as being her brother, did stand up in the room or estate of Ptolemy Philadelphus his father, whom he succeeded in his kingdom. And he shall come with an army, continues the Prophet, and shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north, (who was Seleucus Callinicus) and shall deal against them, and shall prevail; and shall also carry captives into Egypt their gods, with their princes, and with their precious

(37) Dan. c. xi. ver. 7—9.

SELEUCUS CALLINICUS, who had ſucceeded his father Antiochus Theus, after a reign of fifteen years, no ſooner heard that Ptolemy was returned to Egypt, but he ſet ſail with a mighty fleet, which he had fitted out at a vaſt charge, to reduce the revolted cities; but he had ſcarce advanced into the open ſea, when his whole navy was deſtroyed by a violent ſtorm, as if the gods, ſays Juſtin [c], had made the winds and waves the miniſters of their vengeance. Seleucus himſelf, with a ſmall number of his attendants, was, with the utmoſt difficulty, ſaved; but all the reſt periſhed in the wreck; but this dreadful ſtroke, which ſeemed intended to overwhelm him, by a ſtrange turn of fortune, contributed to the re-eſtabliſhment of his affairs; for the revolted cities of Aſia, which, out of the averſion and horror they had conceived againſt him on account of the murder of Berenice and her ſon, had declared for Ptolemy, no ſooner received intelligence of the great loſs he had ſuſtained, than they turned their hatred into compaſſion, and thinking that crime ſufficiently revenged, ſubmitted to him anew [d]. Being again reſtored, by this unexpected revolution, to the beſt part of his dominions, he raiſed a great army to recover the reſt; but this effort proved as unſucceſsful as the former; his army was defeated by Ptolemy, and he obliged to ſave himſelf by flight to Antioch, with as few of his followers as when he eſcaped from the ſhipwreck; as if he had recovered his former power, ſays Juſtin, only to loſe it a ſecond time by a fatal viciſſitude of fortune. In this condition he invited his brother Antiochus to join him with his forces, promiſing him all the provinces of the [c] Juſtin. l. xxvii. c. 2.

[d] Juſtin. l. xxvii. c. 2.

cious veſſels of ſilver and of gold; and he ſhall continue more years than the king of the north. So the king of the ſouth ſhall come into his kingdom, and ſhall return into his own land. How exactly all this was fulfilled, what we have related above ſufficiently ſhews. As to the laſt part, viz. that the king of the ſouht, on his return into his kingdom, ſhould continue more years than the king of the north, this likewiſe happened as foretold by the prophet; for Ptolemy Euergetes outlived Seleucus Callinicus four years.

the Leſſer Aſia that belonged to the Syrian empire, provided he found means to extricate him out of his preſent difficulties. Antiochus was then at the head of an army in thoſe provinces, and being of an aſpiring genius, and very ambitious, tho' then only fourteen years old, he readily accepted the propoſal, and accordingly, reinforced his army with great numbers of mercenary Gauls, not with a deſign to aſſiſt his brother in the recovery of his dominions, but to ſeize them for himſelf; for he was of a very greedy and rapacious temper, wreſting from others whatever came in his way, without the leaſt regard to juſtice or equity, and thinking every thing good prey which he could lay his hands on; whence he had the ſurname of Hierax, that is the Hawk. At the ſame time the cities of Smyrna and Magneſia in Aſia Minor, out of affection to Seleucus, formed a confederacy in his favour, by which they mutually ſtipulated to ſupport him to the utmoſt of their power. This treaty they cauſed to be engraved on a large column of marble, which is ſtill to be ſeen in Oxford, with the ſaid league in Greek capitals very legible (Q). When Ptolemy heard that Antiochus was preparing to join Seleucus againſt him, not caring to engage both theſe princes at the ſame time, he came to an agreement with Seleucus, and concluded a truce with him for ten years [e].

After having ſuſtained ſeveral great loſſes, makes a truce with Ptolemy.

But notwithſtanding this truce, Antiochus continued his military preparations, which Seleucus now plainly ſeeing to be made againſt himſelf, marched, without delay, over mount Taurus to ſuppreſs them. The pretence for the war on the ſide of Antiochus, was the promiſe which had been made him of the ſovereignty of the provinces in Aſia Minor, as a reward for aſſiſting his brother againſt Ptolemy; but Seleucus being delivered from the war without the aid of his brother, did not think himſelf obliged to [e] Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

(Q) This column was brought out of Aſia by Thomas earl of Arundel, at the beginning of the reign of Charles the firſt, and preſented, with other marbles, to the univerſity of Oxford, by his grandſon Henry duke of Norfolk, in the reign of Charles the ſecond.

to any thing by that promiſe; but Antiochus perſiſting in his demand, and Seleucus refuſing to comply with it, the controverſy was brought to the deciſion of a battle, which was fought near Ancyra in Aſia Minor. In this battle Seleucus was entirely defeated, and moſt of his troops cut in pieces, he having very narrowly eſcaped falling into he enemies hands. Antiochus likewiſe was expoſed to great dangers, even after his victory; for as the troops to whoſe valour the victory was chiefly owing, was a body of Gauls, which he had taken into his pay, theſe barbarians, on a falſe report that Seleucus was ſlain in the action, plotted the death of the other brother alſo, not doubting but in caſe both were cut off, they ſhould eaſily make themſelves maſters of all Aſia; Antiochus therefore was obliged to redeem his life with all the treaſures he poſſeſſed [f].

Defeated by his brother Antiochus.

Eumenes and Attalus ſeize great part of Aſia Minor.

EUMENES, king or prince of Pergamus, taking advantage of theſe diviſions, advanced with all his forces againſt Antiochus and the Gauls, in hopes of cruſhing them both at once. The imminent danger which Antiochus ſaw himſelf expoſed to on this occaſion, obliged him to make a new treaty with the Gauls, in which it was ſtipulated, that he ſhould renounce the title of their ſovereign, and content himſelf with that of their ally, entering into an offenſive and defenſive league with them. This treaty, however, did not prevent Eumenes from falling upon them; and as he attacked them before they had time to reinforce themſelves with new levies after the loſs they had ſuſtained in the battle of Ancyra, he gained a complete victory over them, which coſt him but little, and laid all Aſia Minor open to him. Attalus, who ſucceeded Eumenes in the ſovereignty of Pergamus, improving the advantages gained by him over the Gauls, entirely ſubdued that people, and being by that means firmly eſtabliſhed in his dominions, took upon him the title of king, which his predeceſſors had declined, tho' veſted with ſovereign power [g].

WHILE Eumenes, and after him Attalus, were thus curtailing the Syrian empire in the weſt, Theodotus and Arſaces were doing the ſame in the eaſt; for it being reported

[f] Trogus in prologo. 27. Strabo. l. xvi. p. 750. Polyæn. l. viii. c. 61. [g] Juſtin. l. xxvii. c. 3. Liv. l. xxxiii. Strabo. l. xiii. p. 624. Valeſii excerpt. ex Polyb. Polyæn. l. iv. c. 19.

ported that Seleucus had been ſlain in the battle of Ancyra, Arſaces laying hold of this opportunity, poſſeſſed himſelf of Hyrcania, and annexed it to Parthia, which he had already diſmembered from that empire, cauſing himſelf to be acknowledged king of both countries. Theodotus, who had poſſeſſed himſelf of Bactria, dying ſoon after, Arſaces entered into an alliance with his ſon bearing the ſame name for their mutual defence; by which means they ſupported each other in the poſſeſſion of the dominions they had uſurped. In the mean time the two brothers, Antiochus and Seleucus, purſued the war againſt each other with implacable hatred, not conſidering, that, while they were thus contending for their father's empire, it would be wreſted from them by their common enemy. This war was at length carried into Meſopotamia [h], at the time when, in all likelihood, happened the battle in Babylonia, or the province of Babylon, which was a part of Meſopotamia, mentioned by Judas Maccabæus in his ſpeech to his army [i]. In this battle eight thouſand Babyloniſh Jews joined with four thouſand Macedonians, defeated the Galatians, and put to the ſword an hundred and twenty thouſand of their men. The Galatians indeed were joined in confederacy with Antiochus Hierax, as we have related above, and at this time came into Aſia in ſuch ſwarms as to fill the whole country, ſerving under ſuch princes as thought fit to hire them. However, it is ſomewhat ſtrange, that ſuch a ſignal victory ſhould not be mentioned by any one of the eminent writers who flouriſhed under the kings of Syria, and tranſmitted their actions to poſterity; but be that as it will, Seleuchus at length prevailed over his brother Antiochus, who, after ſeveral overthrows, and loſſes, was obliged to ſhift from place to place with the ſhattered remains of his army, till he was at laſt driven quite out of Meſopotamia. As he found no place within the Syrian empire where he thought himſelf ſafe, he retired to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, whoſe daughter he had married; but that prince, notwithſtanding this alliance, growing ſoon weary of entertaining a gueſt who could bring him no advantage, and was very chargeable to him, ordered him to o be cut off; but Antiochus being informed of his deſign, eſcaped the danger by a ſpeedy retreat into Egypt, chuſing rather to put himſelf into the hands of Ptolemy, a profeſſed enemy to his family, than to truſt a brother whom he had ſo highly offended. He had ſoon reaſon to repent of this reſolution; for, immediately after his arrival, Ptolemy cauſed him to be ſeized, and kept him cloſely confined for ſeveral years, till at laſt, by the aſſiſtance of a courteſan, he made his eſcape; but, as he was retiring out of that kingdom, he had the misfortune to fall in with a band of robbers, by whom he was murdered [k].

Antiochus and Seleucus continue on the war.

[h] Trogus in prologo. 27. Polyæn. l. iv. Stratagem. c. 17.
[i] Maccab. xviii. 20.

Death of Antiochus.

SELEUCUS, being now extricated out of the troubles his brother had created him, applied himſelf firſt to the eſtabliſhing of good order and tranquillity at home; and having repaired the diſorders occaſioned by the war, he turned his thoughts to the reduction of the eaſtern provinces which had revolted from him; but in this attempt he was attended with bad ſucceſs. Arſaces, having been allowed too much time to ſtrengthen himſelf in the uſurpations, obliged him to return with ſhame and diſhonour. He might perhaps have ſucceeded better, if he had made a longer ſtay in thoſe parts; but new commotions ariſing at home in his abſence, he thought it adviſeable to make a ſpeedy return to ſuppreſs them. Arſaces did not fail to improve this farther reſpite to his advantage, eſtabliſhing his power ſo effectually, that all future efforts of the Syrian kings could never ſhake it [l].

Seleucus defeated, and taken priſoner by Arſaces.

HOWEVER, Seleucus, as ſoon as he was at leiſure from his other affairs, undertook a ſecond expedition againſt the uſurper, which proved more unſucceſsful than the former; for he was not only overthrown by Arſaces in a great battle, but taken priſoner. The day on which Arſaces gained this victory was, for many ſucceeding ages, obſerved annually by the Parthians with great ſolemnity, as being, in their opinion, the firſt day of their liberty; whereas it was in reality the firſt of their ſlavery; for the world never produced greater tyrants than the Parthian kings, under whoſe deſpotical government they thenceforth continued. From this time Arſaces took upon him the title of king, having founded, and by this victory firmly eſtabliſhed.

[k] Juſtin, l. xxv. c. 2. Polyæn. ibid.

[l] Juſtin. l. xli. c. 4.

bliſhed, an empire in the eaſt, which, in proceſs of time, counterbalanced the over-grown power of the Romans in the weſt [m]. Seleucus having, for the ſpace of four years, continued priſoner in Parthia, died in that country, by a fall from his horſe. Athenæus tells us that Arſaces treated him during his confinement as a king [n]; but that he reſtored him to his liberty and kingdom, as ſome will have it, does not appear from antient records. Juſtin ſays in expreſs words, that he died in the manner we have related, being then an exile, which cannot be otherwiſe underſtood than that he died out of his own dominions, being held in captivity by the Parthian king. He died, according to ſome, in the twentieth, according to others, in the twenty-firſt year of his reign, leaving behind him by his wife Laodice, the ſiſter of Andromachus one of his chief generals, two ſons and a daughter. The ſons were Seleucus and Antiochus. The daughter he married to Mithridates king of Pontus, yielding Phrygia to him for her dowry [o]. He was ſurnamed Pogon from his long beard, and ironically Callinicus, or the victorious, being very unfortunate, and generally conquered in the battles he fought; however, ſome writers tell us, that the ſurname of Callinicus was given him after the victory which he gained over his brother Antiochus.

Dies in captivity. Year after the flood, 2772. Year before Chriſt 227.

Seleucus, the eldeſt of the two ſons, ſucceeded to his father's throne, and aſſumed the ſurname of Ceraunus, or the Thunderer, a name which no-ways ſuited his character; for he was a very weak prince, both in body and mind, and never did any thing worthy of that name. He reigned but three years, and, during that time, had no great authority either in the army or the provinces; nay, he would have loſt it entirely, had not Achæus, the ſon of Andromachus his mother's brother, who was a man of great courage and abilities, managed his affairs as well as the bad ſtate which his father's ill conduct had brought them into would admit. As for Andromachus, he was taken priſoner by Ptolemy in his wars with Callinicus and kept in Alexandria all this reign, and ſome part of the next, till the Rhodians, to ingratiate themſelves with Achæus, obtained his liberty. Attalus king of Pergamus gamus having made himſelf maſter of all Aſia Minor, from mount Taurus to the Helleſpont, Seleucus marched againſt him, leaving Hermias a Carian regent of Syria in his abſence. Achæus attended him in this expedition, and ſerved him in it as well as the ſhatter'd ſtate of his affairs would allow; but money being wanting to pay the army, and the king, on account of his weakneſs, deſpiſed by the ſoldiery, Nicator and Apaturius, two of the chief officers, formed a conſpiracy againſt him, and, by poiſon, put an end to his life; but Achæus, who was then in the army, revenged his death by cutting off the two ringleaders, and all thoſe who were any ways concerned in the plot. After this he managed the army with ſuch prudence, addreſs, and reſolution, that he not only kept all in order, but alſo prevented Attalus from reaping any advantage from this accident, which, had it not been for his prudent conduct, would have been attended with the loſs of Syria. Seleucus dying without children, the army offered the crown to Achæus; and ſeveral of the provinces did the ſame: but he then generouſly refuſed it, tho' he afterwards judged it neceſſary, for his own ſafety, to act in a different manner. In the preſent conjuncture, inſtead of accepting the crown, he preſerved it with great integrity for the lawful heir, Antiochus the brother of the deceaſed king, who was but in the fifteenth year of his age. When Seleucus ſet out for Aſia Minor, he ſent him to Babylonia to be educated there; and in that city he was when his brother died. He now was ſent for to Antioch, where he aſcended the throne after his brother, and reigned thirty-ſix years. This prince was afterwards, for his illuſtrious actions, ſurnamed the Great. Achœus, the better to ſecure him in the poſſeſſion of the empire, ſent a detachment of the army to him in Syria, under the command of Epigenes, one of the late king's moſt experienced generals. The reſt of the army he kept with him in Aſia Minor, to ſupport the Syrian intereſt in thoſe parts [p].

[m] Juſtin. l. xli. c. 5. Athen. l. iv. c. 13. [n] Athen. iv. c. 13. [o] Juſtin. l. xxvii. c. 3.

Seleucus Ceraunus poiſoned.

Antiochus the Great aſcends the throne of Syria. Year of the flood 2775. Before Chriſt 224.

[p] Polyb. l. iv. p. 315. Appian. in Syriac. Hieron. in Daniel, c. 11. Juſtin. l. xxix. c. 1.

ANTIOCHUS, seeing himself seated on the throne, sent Moio and Alexander, two brothers, into the east, appointing the former governor of Media, and the latter of Persia. All the provinces of Asia Minor he committed to the charge of Achæus. Epigenes had the command of the troops which the king kept about him; and Hermias the Carian was declared prime minister, which station he had held under the deceased king. Achæus soon recovered all the countries that Attalus had wrested from the Syrian empire, and confined him within the limits of his own kingdom of Pergamus; but Alexander and Molo, despising the young king, were no sooner fixed in their governments, but they refused to acknowledge his authority, and set up for themselves in their respective districts. They hoped that Achæus would join them; but, above all things, apprehended the cruelty and malice of Hermias, who bore a great sway at court, and therefore chose rather to withdraw their obedience to the king than obey so wicked a minister, against whose malice no man was safe. This Hermias was of a most savage disposition, punished the least faults with the utmost rigour, and, being himself a man of little genius and no merit, could not endure either merit or abilities in others. He was haughty, envious, full of himself, and so tenacious of his own opinion, that he thought it highly dishonourable either to ask or follow the advice of another. He suspected all those who had any trust, or share in the king's esteem; but the chief object of his jealousy and suspicion was Epigenes, who had the reputation of being one of the ablest generals of his time and in whom the troops reposed an entire confidence. It was this reputation that gave the prime minister umbrage, and he could not conceal the ill-will he bore him. News being brought of the revolt of Molo and Alexander, Antiochus assembled his council to deliberate on proper measures in so delicate a conjuncture; for he had great reason to apprehend a general revolt of the provinces. Every one being desired to deliver his opinion freely, Epigenes spoke first, and declared, That they had no time to lose; that it was absolutely necessary the king should, without delay, march in person against the rebels; that his authority on the spot would be of great weight; and that Molo and his followers would not have the assurance to persist in their rebellion, seeing the king himself at the head of his army; or, ſhould they continue obſtinate, the ſoldiers themſelves would mutiny, return to their duty, and deliver up their leaders to the king. Epigenes had hardly delivered his opinion, when Hermias, in a violent paſſion, replied, That this was not the firſt treacherous advice he had given; that he had long harboured evil deſigns againſt the king; that, however, he was now pleaſed to hear him openly declaring his bad intentions in the pernicious counſel he had given, wherein he plainly ſhewed his deſign of betraying the king into the hands of the rebels. He ſaid no more then on that ſubject, being content to have thus ſown the ſeeds of ſuſpicion againſt him. The real motive of his oppoſing the opinion of Epigenes was, his being afraid to venture upon that expedition. As Ptolemy Philopator, who had ſucceeded his father Ptolemy Euergetes in the kingdom of Egypt, was a moſt vicious and effeminate prince, he thought him a much leſs formidable enemy, and therefore adviſed the king to march in perſon againſt him, and attempt the recovery of Syria. He thought there would be no danger in invading a prince, who was wholly immerſed in pleaſures of all kinds. The opinion of Hermias prevailing, Antiochus marched in perſon into Cæle-Syria with one part of his army, and ſent Zeno and Theodotus, two of his generals, with the other, to ſuppreſs the rebellion in the eaſt [q]. Being arrived, on his march towards Cæle-Syria, at Seleucia near Zeugma, he there found Laodice daughter to Mithridates king of Pontus, who had been ſome time betrothed to him. He made ſome ſtay there to ſolemnize the nuptials; but the joy of his marriage was ſoon interrupted with bad news from the eaſt; for his generals there, being overpowered by the joint forces of Molo and Alexander, had been forced to retire, and leave them maſters of the field. Antiochus then ſaw the error he had committed in not following the advice of Epigenes, and was for laying aſide his expedition into Cæle-Syria, in order to march directly with all his forces into the eaſt, and there cruſh the rebellion before it gathered greater ſtrength; but Hermias perſiſting in his former opinion, and telling the king, that it became kings to march in perſon againſt kings, and to ſend their lieutenants againſt rebels, Antiochus was ſo weak as to acquieſce again in the opinion of Hermias, mias, and ſending another army into the eaſt, to proceed in his intended expedition into Cæle-Syria. The general who commanded this army was one Xenætas an Achæan. His commiſſion was to join the forces which were there before under the two generals, and take upon him the command of the whole army. He had never before commanded in chief, and his only merit was his being the prime miniſter's friend and creature. Being thus raiſed to a poſt which he never expected, he behaved with great haughtineſs towards the other officers, and, by his inſolent behaviour, incurred the hatred of the ſoldiery. The ſucceſs was ſuch as might be expected from ſo bad a choice; in croſſing the Tigris he fell into an ambuſcade, and was cut off with his whole army. This victory opened to the rebels the province of Babylonia and all Meſopotamia, of which they made themſelves maſters without the leaſt oppoſition [r].

Alexander and Molo, two of his generals revolt.

of

The rebels defeat the troops ſent againſt them.

[q] Polyb. l. v. p. 387, 388, 389. Juſtin. l. xxx. c. 1.

Antiochus diſappointed in his attempt upon Cæle-Syria.

In the mean time Antiochus having advanced into Cæle-Syria as far as the valley which lies between the two ridges of mountains called Libanus and Antilibanus, found the paſſes there ſo well fortified and guarded by Theodotus the Ætolian, whom Ptolemy had intruſted with the government of this province, that he was obliged to march back, without attempting to make any further progreſs that way. The bad news, which he had by this time received, and the defeat of his troops alſo haſtened his retreat; being therefore now reſolved to lay aſide the Syrian enterprize, he turned his thoughts wholly on the war with the rebels; wherefore aſſembling his council once more to deliberate about it, and requiring every one to deliver their real opinion, Epigenes again ſpoke the firſt, ſaying, That it had been well for the king's ſervice if they had followed his firſt advice without any delay or loſs of time; for, in that caſe, the enemy would not have had time to ſtrengthen himſelf in provinces which he had uſurped; that he was ſtill of the ſame opinion, viz. that the king ſhould deſiſt from any other enterprize, and march without delay in perſon againſt the rebels. Hermias fancying himſelf affronted by the ſpeech of Epigenes, began to exclaim againſt him, and renew the antient charge, as if he deſigned to deliver up the king to the rebels. He conjured

[r] Polyb. ubi ſupra. p. 390, 391, 392, 393, &c.

jured the prince not to quit the enterprize of Cæle-Syria, ſince the abandoning of it would be aſcribed to fickleneſs and inconſtancy, a character which no-ways ſuited a prince of his wiſdom and knowledge; but notwithſtanding all he could ſay, the advice of Epigenes prevailing in the council, the king reſolved to put off his march into Syria, and head his army in perſon againſt his rebellious ſubjects. Hermias, finding that all oppoſition would be vain, became on a ſudden quite another man, ſeeming the moſt ſanguine of them all in haſtening the execution of what he had hitherto oppoſed with incredible warmth. Accordingly the troops were, with the utmoſt expedition, aſſembled at Apamea; but, before they began their march, a ſedition broke out in the army about the ſoldiers arrears. This unlucky accident threw the king into the utmoſt conſternation, and filled him with the deepeſt melancholy; which Hermias perceiving, offered to ſatisfy the army out of his own private fortune, provided he would not take Epigenes with him in this expedition, pretending, that the quarrel which had happened between them would be the occaſion of new diſputes, and greatly hinder him in the management of his affairs. His view in this was to leſſen, by abſence, the eſteem and affection which Antiochus had ſhewn on all occaſions for Epigenes, men being apt to forget, and eſpecially princes, the ſervices of ſuch as are removed out of their ſight. This propoſal gave the king great uneaſineſs, he being very ſenſible how much he wanted the preſence of ſuch a general as Epigenes, who was not only an experienced commander, but an able counſellor; but as Hermias had a great aſcendant over him, and had likewiſe gained thoſe about him, he was not maſter of his own reſolutions: wherefore yielding to the preſent neceſſity, he complied with the requeſt of Hermias, and ordered Epigenes to remain at Apamea. This incident alarmed the other officers, who were apprehenſive of meeting with the ſame fate; but the common ſoldiers having received all their arrears, expreſſed great obligations to Hermias, by whoſe means they had been ſatisfied.

Reſolves to march in perſon againſt the rebels

HERMIAS having thus gained the good-will of the ſoldiery, ſet out with Antiochus and the army, after having treacherouſly murdered Epigenes

[s] Polyb. ubi ſupra.

ing charged Alexis governor of the citadel of Apamea, a man entirely at his devotion, to deſtroy, under ſome plauſible pretence, Epigenes, during the king's abſence. Alexis, purſuant to his orders, having, by the promiſe of a great reward, bribed one of the domeſtics of Epigenes, gave him a letter, with orders to lay it among his maſter's papers. This was a forged letter from Molo, wherein he thanked Epigenes for forming a conſpiracy againſt the king, and pointed out to him by what methods he might ſafely put it in execution. Some days after Alexis went to Epigenes, and aſked him, whether he had not received a letter from Molo. Epigenes replied with the greateſt indignation, that he had no intercourſe with rebels; but Alexis acquainting him that he had orders to look into his papers, entered his lodgings by force, and a ſearch being made, the forged letter was found; whereupon Epigenes, without being tried, or even heard, was immediately put to death. The king, at the bare ſight of the letter, approved of his death, and greatly commended the zeal of Alexis; but the great men of the court underſtood the whole matter, tho' none of them dared to undeceive their maſter, being awed into ſilence by the great power of the miniſter [t].

In the mean time, Antiochus arriving with his army at the Euphrates, joined the troops he found there, and purſuing his march, came to Antioch in Mygdonia (R), where [t] Polyb. l. v. 393, 394.

(R) Antioch of Mygdonia ſtood in the north part of Meſopotamia. St. Jerom carries the antiquity of it as high as Nimrod. It was as conſiderable for the number of its inhabitants as its great extent. The Syro-Macedonians, when they became maſters of Meſopotamia, gave this city the name of Antioch in Mygdonia, to diſtinguiſh it from the capital of Syria. Before that time it was called Niſibis, or, as we find it wrote on ſome antient medals, Neſebe. It ſerved as a barrier againſt the incurſions of the Parthians and Perſians down to the time of the emperor Julian, who, by a ſhameful treaty, gave it up to the latter. Some modern writers, by miſtake, place it on the Tigris; but it is plain, both from Polybius and the emperor Julian's firſt oration, that it ſtood on the river Mygdonius, which ſprings from mount where, as the year was now far ſpent, he put his troops into winter quarters, propoſing to open the campaign very early next ſpring. As ſoon as the ſeaſon allowed him to take the field, having aſſembled his troops, he advanced to Liba (S), and there ſummoned a council to deliberate with his officers what courſe was beſt to take to find out Molo, and by what means they might ſupply the army with proviſions in their march, Molo being maſter of all the country about Babylonia. Hermias propoſed to keep along the Tigris, by which means, ſaid he, we ſhall have the benefit of that and two other rivers, the Lycus and the Capros (T), to cover our camp. Such danger there was in following this advice, that Zeuxes, though he had the fate of Epigenes before his eyes, could not help oppoſing it, and ſhewing the great difficulties they ſhould meet with in holding their march along the river. He urged ſeveral reaſons, chiefly, that after a long and tedious march through a continued deſart, they ſhould come to a place called the King's ditch, which, if it ſhould happen to be poſſeſſed by the enemy, would put a ſtop to their further progreſs, and oblige them to return by the ſame deſert, where they ſhould be in great want of all things. On the other hand, he made it appear, that in caſe they paſſed the Tigris, they ſhould be well ſupplied with proviſions;

mount Maſius between the Tigris and the Euphrates, and running from north to ſouth, diſcharges itſelf into the latter of theſe rivers. The Mygdonius divides Mygdonia, which is a ſmall province of Meſopotamia, into two unequal parts. Pliny is of opinion, that this country was originally peopled by a colony of the Mygdonians in Macedon. Antioch of Mygdonia ſtill retains its moſt antient name, being called by the people of the eaſt Naſſibin, which is plainly a corruption of Naſibis.

(S) Liba was a chief city of Carmania, a province lying beyond Perſia, and bounded by Parthia on the north, by Gedroſia on the eaſt, and by the Perſian and Indian ſeas on the ſouth. The city of Liba ſtood near the confines of Gedroſia.

(T) The Lycus and Capros were two rivers of Aſſyria, properly ſo called, running between the cities of Ninus and Seleucia, and diſcharging themſelves into the Tigris. They were ſo called by the Greeks, as Strabo (38) and Pliny (39) inform us, from two rivers of the ſame name in Phrygia.

(38) Strabo. l. xii. in fine.

(39) Plin. l. v. c. 29.

viſions; and beſides, that it was more than probable, that thoſe of the country of Apollonia would return to their duty, ſince it was very plain, that out of neceſſity, and not by inclination, they had declared for Molo. He added, that when Molo ſhould ſee his paſſage back into Media cut off, and find himſelf ſtreightened for want of proviſions, he would be conſtrained, either to venture a battle, or to ſee himſelf abandoned by his troops [u]. The advice of Zeuxes was approved of; and accordingly the army being divided into three bodies, paſſed the Tigris in three different places, and purſued their march to Dura (U), which was at the ſame time beſieged by one of Molo's officers, who, on their approach, raiſed the ſiege, and retired. From Dura they advanced to Oricum, and from thence to Apollonia. Molo being informed of the king's arrival, marched with all poſſible expedition to the mountains of Apollonia; but, before he reached them, was overtaken by the king, who encamped over-againſt him. Molo apprehending it dangerous for rebels to march againſt their prince in broad day, and give him battle, reſolved to fall on Antiochus in the night; and accordingly putting himſelf at the head of a body of choſen troops, he marched, by private ways, towards the neighbouring mountains, with a deſign to fall on the enemy's camp from thoſe eminencies; but his ſoldiers deſerting in troops to the king, he thought it adviſeable to return by break of day to his camp. In the mean time, the king being reſolved to venture an engagement, drew out his forces, and advanced in battalia to the enemy's trenches. Molo likewiſe, at the approach of the king, marched out in good order to meet him. Both armies engaged with the utmoſt fury; but a body of choſen men, which Molo had placed upon his left to make head againſt the king, going over to him, that wing was ſoon put in diſorder, and obliged to retire. Hereupon Molo, after having attempted ſeveral times, in vain, to lead them back to the charge, was obliged to retire with them; but being cloſely purſued by Molo being overcome, lays violent hands on himſelf.

[u] Idem ibid. p. 395.

(U) Dura was a city in the province of Aſſyria, called by Ptolemy, Appolloniatis, no doubt from the city of Apollonia its metropolis. Some writers place Dura in Meſopotamia.

by the king, and fearing to fall alive into his hands, out of deſpair killed himſelf, as did many of his accomplices; ſo that the king gained a complete victory without any conſiderable loſs. Neolaus or Nicolas, the brother of Molo, eſcaping from the battle, fled to Alexander, another of their brothers, who was in Perſia, and carried him the bad news of the death and defeat of their brother. Theſe two finding their affairs quite deſperate, firſt killed their mother, afterwards their wives and children, and laſtly diſpatched themſelves, to prevent their falling into the hands of the conqueror. After the king had pillaged the camp, he ordered Molo's body to be fixed on a croſs, and placed on one of the higheſt mountains of Media; which was done accordingly, the body being carried into the country of the Chalonitidi (W), and there placed on a croſs on the moſt conſpicuous part of mount Zagra. Such was the end of this rebellion, which proved the ruin of all who had engaged in it. After this victory, the remains of the conquered army ſubmitted to the king, who, after having ſeverely reproved them, granted them his pardon, ordering them into Media, under the command of thoſe he ſent to regulate the affairs of that province. He then returned to Seleucia on the Tigris, and having ſpent ſome time there in re-eſtabliſhing his authority in the provinces which had revolted, and ſettling all things on their former foot, he reſolved to attack the Barbarians bordering on his dominions, in order to deter them for the future from taking part with his rebellious ſubjects, for entering into an alliance with them. He propoſed to begin with Artabazanes king of the Atropatii (X) and other neighbouring

(W) Chalontidis was the moſt ſouthern province of Aſſyria, ſo called, according to Iſidorus Characenus (40), from the city of Chala its metropolis, and divided from Media by mount Zagrus or Zagra, the higheſt in the whole country.

(X) Atropatia was a part of Media; for Strabo (41) divides all Media into two parts; the one he calls Media Magna, and the other Media Atropatia and Atropatane (42). It borrowed this name from one Atropatus, who being governor of that province for the king of Perſia in Alexander's time, defended it againſt that bouring nations, and by far the moſt powerful of all thoſe princes. Hermias was at firſt very unwilling to engage in this war, in regard of the danger that attended it, and becauſe he was ſtill bent on the recovery of Cœle-Syria; but on the news of the queen's being brought to bed of a ſon, he changed his mind, and warmly promoted a war with the Barbarians, in hopes that the king might loſe his life in that dangerous expedition, in which caſe the regency and tuition of the infant prince would fall to his ſhare. All things therefore being got ready for this invaſion, the army marched over the mountain Zagra, and entered the country of the Atropatii. Artabazanes their king being then very old, and greatly terrified at the approach of the king at the head of a victorious army, made his ſubmiſſion, and concluded a peace on ſuch terms as Antiochus thought proper to impoſe [w].

(40) Iſidor. Charac. p. 5. (41) Strabo. l. xi. p. 360.
(42) Idem ibid. p. 363.

By this time Hermias, through his inſolent haughty behaviour, growing intolerable to his maſter, as well as to his fellow-ſubjects, Apollophanes the king's phyſician, in whom he repoſed great confidence, and who, by his employment, had free acceſs to him, took a proper time to repreſent to him the general diſcontent of his ſubjects, and the danger he himſelf was in from his ambititious and wicked miniſter; he therefore adviſed him to take care of himſelf, leſt the ſame fate ſhould attend him which his brother had met with in Phrygia, he having fallen a victim to the ambition of thoſe on whom he moſt relied. He added, that it was plain to every one, that Hermias was hatching ſome wicked deſign, and that no time was to be loſt in the preventing that conqueror, and upon the downfal of the Perſian empire, ſeized it for himſelf, and tranſmitted it to his poſterity. Artabazanes was one of his deſcendents, another of the ſame race reigned in Strabo's time, the kingdom being held even then by the ſame family. This country, according to Polybius (43), extended on one ſide as far as the Pontus Euxinus, and on the other to the Caſpian ſea, was plentifully ſtored with all ſorts of proviſion, and the inhabitants were deemed good ſoldiers.

[w] Idem, ibid. p, 398—400.

(43) Polyb. l. v. p. 402.

venting of it. Antiochus, as we have already obſerved, had begun to entertain ſome ſuſpicions of his chief miniſter, but had ſuppreſſed them, not knowing whom to truſt, though ſurrounded with courtiers whom he had loaded with favours. He was therefore extremely well pleaſed that his phyſician had given him this advice, and after having commended him for the care he ſhewed for his ſafety, and his reſolution in opening ſo frankly his thoughts, immediately entered on meaſures with him for the ridding himſelf of a miniſter who was ſo univerſally deteſted, and whoſe attempts were ſo much to be dreaded. Accordingly, the very next morning, the king, under pretence of taking the air, walked out of the camp, and Hermias not failing to attend him, as he uſually did, when they came to a ſolitary place where none of the miniſter's creatures could lend him any aſſiſtance, the king ſtepping aſide as on ſome neceſſary occaſion, thoſe who attended him falling upon Hermias, as it had been agreed on before-hand, put him to death, to the great ſatisfaction of all the provinces of the Syrian empire. He had governed, not only the kingdom, but the king himſelf, with great haughtineſs, treating him on ſeveral occaſions in a very inſolent manner; and whoever of the ſubjects dared to oppoſe his ſentiments or deſigns, was ſure to fall a ſacrifice to his reſentment, which drew on him an univerſal hatred; but no where was there a more ſignal inſtance of it than at Apamea in Syria, for there they no ſooner heard of his death, than the whole city roſe with the utmoſt fury, and the women falling upon his wife and children, ſtoned them to death [x].

Hermias put to death by the king's order.

Antiochus having now happily re-eſtabliſhed his affairs in the eaſt, and raiſed to the government of thoſe provinces perſons of merit, in whom he could repoſe the greateſt confidence, marched back into Syria, and putting his army into winter quarters, ſpent the remaining part of the year in conſulting with his miniſters and officers about the operations of the enſuing campaign; for he had two other very dangerous enterprizes to put in execution for the reſtoring of the Syrian empire to its former ſplendor; one was againſt Ptolemy, for the recovery of Cæle-Syria, and the other againſt Achæus, who had uſurped the ſovereignty of Aſia Minor; for Ptolemy Euergetes

[x] Idem ibid. p. 400, 401.

ergetes having seized on all Syria in the beginning of the reign of Seleucus Callinicus, as we have related above, a great part of it was still held by his successor Ptolemy Philopator. And as to Achæus, we have already observed how he refused the crown that was offered him on the death of Seleucus Callinicus, and with great fidelity put it on the head of Antiochus the lawful heir, who, to reward his zeal and services, appointed him governor of all the provinces of Asia Minor. In this station he wrested from Attalus king of Pergamus all the countries in Asia which he had seized, and annexed them again to the crown of Syria. The success that attended him on this occasion drew on him the envy of the prime minister, and others, who had the king's ear at court; and therefore, resolutions being taken to ruin him, forged letters were produced to prove, that he entertained treacherous designs against his prince, and held a correspondence with Ptolemy. Achæus having notice of what was plotting against him at court, thought that he had no other way to secure himself against the evil designs of his enemies than by doing what he was charged with, and accordingly, in his own defence, taking the crown, which he had before refused, he caused himself to be proclaimed king of Asia, and was crowned at Laodicea in Phrygia, assuming ever after the regal title in all his letters to the cities of Asia, and obliging them to give it him in all their addresses [y]. These were the two dangerous wars Antiochus had on his hands; and which of these he should first undertake was the matter under debate in the king's council. Upon mature deliberation it was resolved, first to reduce all the countries belonging to the Syrian empire on that side mount Taurus, before they marched over it against Achæus, to whom, for the present, they only sent menacing messages. Pursuant to this scheme all the forces were ordered to assemble at Apamea, and hold themselves in a readiness to march into Cœle-Syria. Before they set out, a council of all the chief officers was assembled, to consult about the first operations of the campaign, when Apollophanes, the king's physician, represented, that the design on Cœle-Syria

Achæus causes himself to be proclaimed king of Asia.

Antiochus resolves on a war with Ptolemy king of Egypt.

[y] Idem ibid.

Syria was vain, and would prove an unprofitable expedition, while they left Ptolemy in quiet poſſeſſion of Seleucia, a royal city, and in effect the metropolis of the kingdom; that, not to mention the diſhonour of leaving that city in the hands of an Egyptian king, the recovery thereof would redound greatly to the king's advantage; that, while it was held by the enemy, it would be a great hindrance to the progreſs of his arms in the enterprize he was upon; for which way ſoever he had a mind to carry his arms, he would find it neceſſary, over and above all other preparations, to ſtrengthen all his towns with numerous garriſons, merely on account of the danger which would threaten them from Seleucia: whereas if Antiochus made the recovery of that place his firſt buſineſs, it would not only ſerve as a bulwark and frontier againſt the enemy, but enable him to proſecute the enterprize both by ſea and land. This city ſtood on the ſame river as Antioch, at the diſtance only of fifteen miles below it, near the mouth of the Orontes. When Ptolemy Euergetes invaded Syria, as we have related above, to ſupport the rights of his ſiſter Berenice, he ſeized upon that important place, and having put a ſtrong Egyptian garriſon into it, kept it full twenty-ſeven years. As it was the port of Antioch, it not only was a conſtant annoyance to the Antiochians, but entirely cut off their communication with the ſea, and quite ruined their trade. All which things being ſet forth by Apollophanes, the king and council reſolved to follow his plan, and open the campaign with the ſiege of Seleucia [z]. Accordingly the whole army marched thither, inveſted the place, and carried it by a general aſſault, ſome of the officers, who commanded in the city, having been gained over by Antiochus. The king treated the inhabitants with the utmoſt humanity, and reſtored them to their antient privileges [a]. Seleucia taken.

ANTIOCHUS being now maſter of this important place, marched with all poſſible expedition into Cœle-Syria, being invited thither by Theodotus the Ætolian, whom Ptolemy had appointed governor of that province. We have ſeen above how vigorouſly he repulſed Antiochus the year before; nevertheleſs the court of Egypt had not been ſatisfied with his conduct on that occaſion, and there-

[z] Polyb. ubi ſupra. p. 405. [a] Idem, p. 406.

therefore called him to Alexandria to answer for it at the peril of his head. 'Tis true he was acquitted, and sent back to his government; but nevertheless he was so exasperated at the affront, that he resolved to revenge it. The luxury and effeminacy of the court, to which he had been an eye-witness while he attended his cause in Alexandria, heightened his resentment and indignation, it being intolerable to him to depend on so base and contemptible a set of men: and indeed the most abominable debaucheries of every kind were practised by Ptolemy Philopator during his reign; and the whole court followed his example. Theodotus therefore could not but abhor so vile a conduct, and being a gallant man, resolved to seek for a new master, who might better deserve his services. Accordingly he was no sooner returned to his government, but he seized on the cities of Tyre and Ptolemais, and declaring for Antiochus, dispatched a messenger to him, inviting him into those parts. Nicolaus, one of Ptolemy's generals, though of the same country with Theodotus, would not join with him in this defection; but still adhering to Ptolemy, according to his first engagement, marched against Theodotus, and closely besieged him in the city of Ptolemais, which he had lately taken. Antiochus hastened to his relief, but met with a vigorous resistance from Nicolaus, who, on the news of his march, had seized the passes of mount Libanus. However the Ætolian, after a most gallant defence, being borne down by the superior power of Antiochus, was at length obliged to retire; whereupon the cities of Tyre and Ptolemais were by Theodotus delivered into the king's hands, and with them the magazines which Ptolemy had prepared in those two places for the support of his army, and likewise a fleet of forty sail which lay in the two harbours. The ships he delivered to Diognetus his admiral, ordering him to sail to Pelusium, whither he himself intended to march by land, with a view to invade Egypt on that side; but being informed, that at that time of the year the inhabitants used to cut down the banks of the Nile, and lay the whole country under water, and consequently that the invading of Egypt was at that season impracticable, he abandoned this project, and employed all his forces in reducing the rest of Cœle-Syria. Some places

Ptolemais and Tyre betrayed to Antiochus.

places surrendered of their own accord, others were taken by force, and Damascus itself, the capital of that province, fell into his hands by a stratagem with which he overreached Dinon, who was governor of it for Ptolemy [b]. The last action of this campaign was the siege of Dura, a maritime city in the neighbourhood of mount Carmel, called Dor in scripture [c]; but the place being well fortified by Nicolaus, and defended by a numerous garrison, the king could not master it, and was therefore glad to accept of a proposal which was offered him, of making a truce for four months with Ptolemy. This served him as an honourable pretence to march back to Seleucia on the Orontes, where he put his army into winter-quarters, after having appointed Theodotus the Ætolian governor of all the places he had taken in this campaign [d].

During this truce a treaty was was set on foot between the contending princes, but with no other view on either side than to gain time, which Ptolemy wanted to make the necessary preparations for the carrying on of the war, and Antiochus to put a stop to the conquests of Achæus; for he, not satisfied with Asia Minor, of which he was already master, was making great preparations to invade Syria, and dispossess Antiochus, if possible, of all his dominions. To check these ambitious views, it was necessary for the king to give over all thoughts of distant conquests.

In this treaty the main point was, to whom Cœle-Syria, Phœnice, Samaria and Judæa did belong, in virtue of the partition of Alexander's empire between Ptolemy, Seleucus, Cassander and Lysimachus, after the death of Antigonus, and defeat of Demetrius in the battle of Ipsus. Ptolemy claimed these provinces, as having been, by that division, allotted to Ptolemy Soter his great-grandfather. On the other side, Antiochus pretended, that they had been given to Seleucus Nicator, and were therefore his right, he being heir and successor to that prince in the kingdom of Syria. The affair of Achæus was likewise a great clog to the negotiation; for Ptolemy insisted insisted upon his being comprized in the treaty, while Antiochus could not brook so much as to hear him named, thinking it a scandalous thing that Ptolemy should entertain the least thought of giving protection to one in rebellion against his prince [e].

[b] Polyæn. l. iv. c. 15. [c] Joshua. xi. 2, 17, 11. Jud. i. 27, &c. [d] Polyb. ibid. p. 408.

Both kings prepare for war.

While these pretensions and contests were carrying on by both parties, and neither would yield to the other, the time of the truce elapsed, and nothing being concluded by the treaty, they began again to provide for the war. Nicolaus the Ætolian had given such proofs of his valour and fidelity in the last campaign, that Ptolemy appointed him commander in chief of all his forces, and committed to his care the government of the contested provinces. The command of the fleet was given to Perigenes, who was ordered to carry on the war by sea, and supply Nicolaus with provisions, and such military stores as he should stand in need of. Nicolaus having assembled his forces at Gaza, whither all the necessary provisions had been sent from Egypt, marched them from thence to mount Libanus, and seized on all the passes between that chain of mountains and the sea, through which it was necessary for Antiochus to pass, firmly resolved to wait for them there, and, by the advantage of the place, obstruct his further progress that way [f].

In the mean time Antiochus was not inactive; but having made the necessary preparations for a vigorous invasion, both by sea and land. He gave the command of his fleet to Diognetus his admiral, and then marched himself with his army by land. On his arrival at Marathum, the Aradians met him with tenders of their friendship and alliance; and he not only received them with great kindness, but composed by his mediation, some differences of a long standing between them and the neighbouring cities. From Marathum he continued his march into Syria, by that pass which is called by Polybius Thoû-prosopon, arrived at Berytus, and advancing to Botris, possessed himself of that city, after having burnt Trieres and Calamus. From Botris he dispatched Theodotus and Nicarchus, with orders to seize on the streights which lead to the river Lycus, while he himself, pursuing

[e] Polyb. p. 409, 410, 411. [f] Idem ibid. p. 413.

ing his march, reached the river Damura, where he encamped, his fleet keeping always near him. From thence, taking with him Nicarchus and Theodotus, he advanced at the head of the light-armed troops to view the ſtreights where Nicolaus was poſted, and returned the ſame day to his camp. Early next morning, leaving Nicarchus with the command of the heavy-armed troops, he marched with the reſt to the ſtreights poſſeſſed by Nicolaus, and having, in ſight of the enemy, divided his army into three bodies, he ordered Theodotus, at the head of one, to attack the enemy's forces which were poſted on the eminences; the other he gave to Menedemus, enjoining him to diſlodge Nicolaus, who had fortified himſelf in a narrow paſs between mount Libanus and the ſea; the third he kept for a reſerve under the command of Diocles, who was to carry ſuccours where-ever they ſhould be wanted. Antiochus himſelf, attended only with his guards, poſted himſelf on an eminence, whence he had a fair view of all that paſſed either by ſea or land; for the two admirals, Diognetus and Perigenes, had drawn their fleet up in a line as near the ſhore as they could, that they might be ready at hand to aſſiſt their land-forces. By this means the battle by land and ſea became, as it were, one ſingle engagement. The ſignal being given, they advanced to the attack on all ſides. At ſea it was a drawn battle, their fleets being pretty equal; but at land the forces of Antiochus having diſlodged Nicolaus, that brave commander was obliged, after a moſt gallant defence, to retire to Sidon, whither Perigenes followed him with the Egyptian fleet. About two thouſand Egyptians were ſlain in the engagement, and the like number taken priſoners. The reſt, under the conduct of Nicolaus, who retired in good order, got ſafe into Sidon. Antiochus purſued them with a deſign to lay ſiege to that city; but finding it well ſtored with all ſorts of proviſions, and Nicolaus reſolved to hold out to the laſt extremity, he altered his mind, and ſending his fleet to Tyre, marched with his army into Galilee, where he reduced the cities of Phileteria, Scythopolis, and Attabyrium, which ſtruck ſuch terror into the inhabitants, that the whole country ſubmitted to the conqueror. From Galilee he croſſed the Jordan, and entering Gilead, poſſeſſed himſelf of all that country, which had been formerly the inheritance of the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh on that side of the river. He afterwards marched against Rabbah of the children of Ammon, which Polybius calls Rabbath-ben-Ammion or Rabatamana, which, as it was a very strong and populous place, made a vigorous defence against the victorious army, but was at length obliged to submit for want of water. As the season was now far advanced, Antiochus leaving the government of Samaria to Hippolochus and Kerææas, who had lately come over to him from Ptolemy, and five thousand men to keep the country in subjection, marched back to Ptolomais, where he put his troops into winter quarters [z].

The Egyptians defeated by Antiochus.

Early in the spring both armies again took the field. Ptolemy, having drawn together an army of seventy thousand foot, five thousand horse, and seventy-three elephants, advanced to Pelusium, whence he led them in person through the deserts which part Egypt from Palestine, and encamped at Raphia, a city lying between Rinocorura and Gaza. Here Antiochus met him with an army somewhat superior to his; for he had with him seventy-two thousand foot, six thousand horse, and an hundred and two elephants; he encamped first within ten furlongs, and afterwards within five of the enemy. While they lay thus near each other, many skirmishes happened between parties as they went out to forage; but without any considerable advantage on either side. Here Theodotus the Ætolian, who had served many years under Ptolemy, gave a signal instance of his intrepidity and resolution; for being well acquainted with the customs of the Egyptians, he took the advantage of a dark evening, when he could not be well known, and entering the enemy's camp with two companions, advanced as far as Ptolemy's tent, with a design to kill him, and by this bold attempt put an end to the war; but the king lying that night elsewhere, he killed his first physician, mistaking him for Ptolemy, wounded two other persons, and then amidst the alarm and confusion which this attempt occasioned, escaped to his own camp. At length both kings agreed to a decisive battle, and drew up their armies armies accordingly; both rode before their reſpective lines, encouraging their ſoldiers to behave manfully. Arſinoe, the ſiſter and wife of Ptolemy, not only exerted herſelf in animating the Egyptians before the engagement, but did not abandon her huſband in the heat of the battle, attending him in the midſt of the greateſt dangers. Antiochus at the head of the right wing defeated the enemy's left; but while he purſued them too far, Ptolemy who had been as ſucceſsful in the other wing, charged in flank the center of Antiochus, which was then uncovered, and broke that body before it was poſſible for the prince to ſuccour it. An old officer of Antiochus's army, obſerving which way the cloud of duſt flew, concluded from thence that the main body was routed, and ſhewed it to the king, who faced abour that inſtant; but came too late to retrieve his error, the reſt of his army being broke and put to flight before his arrival. Hereupon he was obliged to retreat, firſt to Raphia, and next to Gaza, after ten thouſand of his men had been cut to pieces, and four thouſand taken priſoners. After this defeat, Antiochus being no longer in a condition to make head againſt Ptolemy, abandoned all his conqueſts, and withdrew with the remains of his ſhattered army to Antioch. This battle was fought at the ſame time, according to Polybius, that Hannibal defeated Flaminius the Roman conſul at the lake of Thraſymenus in Hetruria [h]. Antiochus defeated.

The battle of Raphia. Year of the flood 2782. Before Christ 217.

[z] Idem, ibid. p. 414, 15.

Upon the retreat of Antiochus the cities of Cæle-Syria and Paleſtine ſtrove, as it were, which of them ſhould firſt ſubmit to Ptolemy, being more inclined to him, as they had been long ſubject to the Egyptians, than to Antiochus, whom they had received after the defeat of Nicolaus, only becauſe they were not in a condition to oppoſe him. Ptolemy's court, as ſoon as the news of this victory was ſpread abroad, was crowded with embaſſadors from all the cities of Cœle-Syria and Judæa, making their ſubmiſſion to him, and congratulating him on his late ſucceſs. The conqueror not only received them all with great kindneſs, but reſolved to make a progreſs through all the provinces which had ſubmitted to him; and accordingly viſited all the ſtates and cities of note, and amongſt the reſt Jeruſalem, where he took a view a view of the temple, and even offered sacrifices to the God of Israel, making at the same time oblations, and bestowing rich donatives on that holy place. But not being satisfied with viewing it only from the outer court, beyond which no gentile was allowed to pass, he shewed a great inclination to enter the sanctuary, and even the holy of holies itself, to which no one was allowed access but the high-priest, and he only once a year on the day of the great expiation. This occasioned a great uproar all over the city: the high-priest informed him of the holiness of the place, and the express law of God, by which he was forbid to enter it. The priests and levites drew together in a body to oppose his rash design, which the people also conjured him to lay aside. But this opposition serving only to inflame his curiosity, he forced in as far as the second court, where, while he was preparing to enter the temple itself, he was struck by God with such terror, that he was carried off half dead. On this he left the city, highly exasperated against the whole Jewish nation, on account of the accident which had befallen him, and loudly threatening to revenge it at a more proper season [i].

[h] Idem, p. 424, 425. & 1 Maccab. c. iii. v. 5, 6.

Concludes a peace with Ptolemy.

Antiochus no sooner returned to Antioch, but he sent embassadors to Ptolemy to sue for a peace. What prompted him to this was his suspecting the fidelity of his own people, finding on his return his authority and interest much lessened by his late defeat. Besides, it was high time for him to turn his arms against Achæus, and put a stop to his conquests. For he being already master of Asia, Antiochus foresaw, that if he gave him time to settle his authority in those provinces, it would not be long ere he must expect him in Syria, there to push for the whole empire. To prevent this he thought it adviseable to strike up a peace with Ptolemy upon any terms, lest having two such powerful enemies to contend with at the same time, he might be at last overpowered and stript of all his dominions. He therefore invested his embassadors with full powers to give up to Ptolemy all those provinces which were the subject of their contest, that is, all Cœle-Syria and Palestine. Cœle-Syria, as we have hinted before, comprehended that part of Syria, which lies between the mountains Libanus and Antilibanus; and Palestine all the country, which was antiently the inheritance of the children

[i] Idem, p. 426. 527. & 3: Maccab. c. 1, & 2.

dren of Iſrael; and the coaſt of theſe two provinces was what the Greeks called Phœnice. All this country Antiochus was willing to part with to purchaſe a peace in his preſent circumſtances, chuſing rather to give up his claim to one part of his dominions, than run the riſk of loſing the whole. Accordingly a truce was agreed on for a year, and before that expired a peace concluded on the ſame terms. Ptolemy, who might have taken advantage of this victory, and eaſily conquered all Syria, was no leſs deſirous than Antiochus of putting an end to the war, that he might be again at liberty to follow his pleaſures [k].

ANTIOCHUS having thus concluded a peace with Ptolemy, bent all his thoughts and attention on carrying the war into Aſia Minor againſt Achæus, and having made vaſt preparations for that expedition, he croſſed mount Taurus, and having concluded a league with Attalus king of Pergamus, by virtue of which they were both to act with all their forces againſt the common enemy, he ſo diſtreſſed Achæus, that he was obliged to quit the field, and ſhut himſelf up in Sardis, where he was cloſely beſieged by the confederate princes. However, he held out above a year in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the two victorious armies, during which time frequent battles were fought under the walls, and many brave men killed on both ſides. At length the city being taken by a ſtratagem of Ligoras, one of Antiochus's commander's (Y), Achæus retired Marches againſt Achæus.

Takes Sardis

[k] Idem, p. 428. Juſtin. l. xxx. c. 1.

(Y) The caſtle, and the adjoining wall of the city, were on the top of a rock deemed inacceſſible, both hanging over a deep valley, into which dead horſes and other beaſts were uſually thrown. Lagoras, who was ſtationed on that ſide, obſerved that ravens, and other rapacious birds, which haunted that valley for the food they found there, uſed to fly from thence up to the tops of the rocks, and pitch upon the walls, reſting there undiſturbed. From thence he concluded, that thoſe parts of the wall were left unguarded, as being thought inacceſſible, and acquainted Antiocus with what he had obſerved. Hereupon in a council of the chief officers it was reſolved that a general aſſault ſhould be made, during which Lagoras, with ſuch men as he thought proper for the enterprize, ſhould attempt to ſcale the rocks on that ſide, and enter the town. The ſucceſs was agreeable to what La-retired into the castle, where he defended himself, with incredible bravery, till he was by the treachery of two crafty Cretans delivered up to Antiochus in the following manner. Ptolemy Philopator, who had entered into a strict alliance with Achæus, was much concerned to hear he was so closely blocked up in the castle of Sardis, and therefore enjoined Sosibius his prime minister to deliver him at all events from the imminent danger he was in; he added, that if he could but rescue his person he cared for no more, knowing that if he only appeared in the countries about mount Taurus, he would soon have an army strong enough to keep Antiochus employed. There being at that time in Ptolemy's court a crafty Cretan called Bolis, well acquainted with the roads of that country and the by-paths among the rocks, on which the castle of Sardis stood, Sosibius consulted him about this matter, and asked him whether he could not think of some method to procure Achæus's escape. The Cretan desired time to consider of it, and at the next conference undertook the business, and communicated to Sosibius in what manner he designed to proceed in it. He told him that he had an intimate friend, who was also a near relation of his, Cambylus by name, a captain of the Cretan mercenaries in Antiochus's army, and at that time commanding a fort behind the castle of Sardis; and that he would prevail with him to let Achæus make his escape that way. Sosibius, approving of the project, sent Bolis with the utmost expedition to Sardis to put it in execution, and gave him ten talents to defray his expences. At the same time he wrote to Achæus by a trusty messenger called Arianus, whom Bolis found means to convey into the castle. As the letter

Achæus betrayed by two Cretans.

Lagoras had imagined; for having with great difficulty scaled the rocks, he entered the city on that side without resistance, and then advancing at the head of his men into the market-place, struck the inhabitants with such terror, that in many places they abandoned the walls, and gave an opportunity to the rest of Antiochus's army to enter the city and join their companions, by which means the place was reduced. In the same manner had Sardis been taken many ages before by the Persians under the conduct of Cyrus, when Crœsus thought himself secure on that side. But the citizens had forgot what had happened so many ages before (44).

(44) Polyb. l. xvii. p. 506, 507.

letter was wrote in characters, or rather cyphers, which none were acquainted with, ſave he and Soſibius, he was very well aſſured that this was no feigned device of his enemies in the name of his friends. As for the meſſenger, he was a truſty man, and one, whom Achæus found upon examination, heartily affected to his cauſe. But the contents of the letter, which were that he ſhould repoſe an entire confidence in Bolis, and one Cambylus, whom Bolis had won over from Antiochus, gave him no ſmall uneaſineſs. They were both quite ſtrangers to him, and the Cretans, he thought, were not blindly to be relied on. However, as he could not eſcape any other way, he reſolved to follow their directions; the meſſenger therefore having often paſſed to and fro, it was at length concluded that Bolis himſelf ſhould come and conduct Achæus out of the caſtle. This being agreed on, the two treacherous Cretans conſulting together how to make their moſt of it, reſolved in the firſt place to ſhare equally between them the ten talents, which they had already received in hand, and then to reveal the whole matter to Antiochus, and on his promiſing a ſuitable reward, to turn the plot, and put Achæus into his hands. Antiochus was over-joyed when they firſt made their propoſal, and promiſed them moſt ample rewards. At length when all things were ready on both ſides, Bolis, Cambylus, and Arianus, went privately up into the caſtle, in order to convey from thence Achæus that very night. As Achæus was not acquainted either with Bolis, or Cambylus, he had a long conference with them about the buſineſs in hand, and after having examined them on ſeveral heads, concluded that he had no reaſon to diſtruſt their fidelity or judgment. However, to proceed with all poſſible caution, he told them, that he deſigned to ſtay in the caſtle a little longer, and ſend in the mean time with them three or four of his friends, from whom when he ſhould receive an account of their being ſafely got out, he would then, and not till then, venture his own perſon. Accordingly he appointed three of his friends to go that night with Bolis and Cambylus, and diſguiſing himſelf ſo as not to be known by his guides, as he had agreed with his friends before hand, joined them when they were ready to depart. The other three were likewiſe diſguiſed, and one of them only took upon him to underſtand the Greek tongue, the others feigning to be Barbarians, leſt Achæus ſhould be known by his ſpeech.

At

And delivered up to Antiochus.

At length they ſet out, Bolis and Cambylus being very greatly perplexed, as not knowing whether Achæus was there or no. If they betrayed thoſe they were conducting into the hands of Antiochus, they well knew that Achæus, if he was not among them, would never truſt himſelf with them; if they conveyed them away, they might for aught they knew, by that means ſave Achæus, and loſe the reward promiſed them by Antiochus. While they were under this uncertainty, Bolis obſerved, that where the paths among the rocks were dangerous, three of them were very officious to the other, lending him their hands to help him up or down, and taking ſuch care of him as gave Bolis to underſtand that he was Achæus. Accordingly when they came to a certain place, where Cambylus had poſted ſome ſoldiers that ſerved under him, Bolis claſping Achæus about the middle, gave the ſignal agreed on, and the ſoldiers ſallying out of the ambuſcade, put him in irons, and carried him to Antiochus, who had watched all night expecting the iſſue of this affair. The king when he ſaw Achæus loaded with chains, burſt out into a flood of tears, and ſeemed to be touched with compaſſion at the misfortunes of a man to whom he was indebted for his crown. But motives of ſtate prevailing over his natural tenderneſs, he cauſed him to be beheaded that very morning, and thereby put an end to the war of Aſia. For as ſoon as thoſe who were in the caſtle heard of his death, they ſurrendered to Antiochus, and all the places in the Aſiatic provinces, which had declared for Achæus, did the the ſame. Thus the king recovered his dominions in Aſia, and having left perſons to govern them, whom he could confide in, returned with his army to Antioch [1].

Achæus put to death by Antiochus.

[1] Polyb. ibid. p. 445. 456. & l. vii. p. 506, 507. & l. viii. p. 522, 523.

AN

AN INDEX TO THE EIGHTH VOLUME.

The Figures direct to the Page, and the Letter n to the Notes.

A.

ABDALOMINUS made king of Sidon, by Alexander, 185, n. His anſwer to him, ib.

Abiſſares's ſubmiſſion to Alexander, 305.

Abreas killed by the Malli, 316.

Abulites put to death for oppreſſion, 332.

Aceſines's river paſt by Alexander, 305.

Achæans defeated by the Macedonians, 478.

Achæus regent of Syria's valour and fidelity, 598. Forced to take the government, 610. Beſieged in Sardis, 619. Betrayed to Antiochus, 622. Beheaded, ib.

Ada, the Carian queen's conduct towards Alexander, 168. Made by him governeſs general of all Caria, ib.

Admetus general of Alexander, killed at the ſiege of Tyre, 192.

Æacides, king of Epirus, driven out, 445. Slain by the Macedonians, 449.

Ægeates, whence ſo called, 44.

Ægis, metropolis of Macedonia, plundered by Pyrrhus, 472.

Ægyptians, why diſaffected to the Perſians, 201.

——aſtronomers flattery to Alexander, 210.

Æmathia, Macedonia why ſo called, 3. Deſcribed, 11.

Æropus, king of Macedon, 47. Guardian of Macedon, 70. His meſſage to Ageſilaus, ib.

Æſchines's character of king Philip, 93. Sent to the Amphictions court, 115. Betrays the intereſts of Greece to Philip, 116.

Æſtrians, where ſituate, 14.

Ætolians diſtreſſed by Antipater, 429. Make peace with him, ib. Invade Theſſaly, 430. Defeated, 431. Treacherous to the Arcanians, 447, & ſeq. Puniſhed by Philip, 449.

Agathocles the ſon of Lyſimachus, his ſucceſs againſt Demetrius, 414. Suſpected by his father of a deſign to uſurp the crown, and poiſoned, 465, 466.

Ageſilaus, meſſage to Aropos, 70.

Agis defeated by Antipater, 220.

Agnon ſent by the Athenians againſt the Macedonians, 61.

Agrion king of Illyria, his ſhort ſucceſs againſt the Macedonians, 477.

Alala, the Macedonian huzza, 40.

Alcetas, king of Macedonia, 48. Brother of Perdiccas betrays Eumenes, 368. Proſcribed, 371. Joins himſelf to him, 372. Defeated by Antigonus, 374. His death, ib.

Alcimalus ſent, by Alexander the Great, to ſettle Democracy in Greece, 163.

Alcyonius generouſly reproved by Pyrrhus, 473, 474.

Alexander prince of Macedon's ſtratagem againſt the Perſian embaſſadors, 51. His ſpeech to the Athenians, 56, 57. Warns them againſt Mardonius, 59. His generoſity to the Argives, 60.

——II. ſucceeds Amyntas II. 73. Outwits the Theſſalians, ib. His death, 74.

——the Great born, 84, & n. Made regent during Philip's abſence, 103. Saves his life, 115. Commands the left wing at Cheronea, 119. His recounter with Attalus, 125. Recalled to court, 127. Whether privy to his father's murder, 134, 135, n. His education and character, 129, 130, n & 140. Puniſhes his fathers murderers, 142. Declared general of Greece, 143. Invades the Triballi and Illyrians, 144. Makes a general peace with the barbarous nations, 146. His ſudden return into Greece, 147. Takes and ſacks Thebes, 149. Spares the houſe of Pindar, ib. Continued generaliſſimo at Corinth, 152. Viſits Diogenes, 153. Account of his troops, 154. His expedition into Aſia, 155. Spares Lampaſcus, thro' the art of Anaximenes, 157. Victory at the Granicus, 158, & ſeq. Conſequences of it, 161. Comes to Epheſus, 163. Diſmiſſes his fleet, why, 164. Invades Caria, 168. Sends his married ſoldiers to winter at home, 169. Diſcovers a conſpiracy, 171, & n. His paſſage through the ladders, whether miraculous, 172 n. March through Phrygia, 173. Cuts the Gordian knot, 175. Enters Cilicia, 176. Cured by Philip, 177, 178. Fights Darius at Iſſus, 180, & ſeq. His generoſity to his family, 181, 182 n. Invades Cæle-Syria, 184. His letter to Darius, 186. Moderation towards the Greek embaſſadors, 188. Beſieges Tyre, 189, & ſeq. Cruelty to the Tyrians, 194, 195. Anſwer to Darius, 196. Reſpectful behaviour to the Jewiſh high-prieſt, 197. Takes Gaza, 198. Cruelty to Betis, 200. Goes into Egypt, 201. Builds a new city there, 202. Conſults the Hammonic oracle, 205. Settles the Egyptian government, 207. Puniſhes the Samaritans, 208. Paſſes the Euphrates and Tigris, 209. Defeats Darius and Guagamela, 212, & ſeq. Goes to Babylon, 216. To Suſa, 220. Deſtroys Perſepolis, 224. Marches into Media, 227. Purſues Darius's traytors, 231. Reduces Hyrcania and the Mardi, 233. His vain attempt againſt luxury, 237, & ſeq. Conſpired againſt, 240. Puniſhes the conſpirators, 243. Purſues his deſigns, 246. His cruelty to the Branchidæ, 251, n. Ill ſucceſs againſt the Scythians, 255. Degenerates, and affects the Perſian cuſtoms, 262, & ſeq. Kills Clytus, 266, & ſeq. & 267, n. Challenges divine honours, 272. Conſpired againſt, 277. Re-enters Sogdia, 281. In love with Roxana, 286, Marches towards Indus, 289. His cruelty to the Indians, 293, 294. Paſſes the Indus, 298. The Hydaſpes, 300, & ſeq. His treatment of king Porus, 304. Penetrates further into India, 305, & ſeq. Stops at the river Hypaſis, 307, & ſeq. His ſtrange vanity, 309, 310 n. Embarques his army, 313. In imminent danger from the Malli, 316. Sails down the Indus into the ocean, 322. Goes by land to Babylon, 324, & ſeq. Takes two wives 332. Endeavours to unite the Macedonians and Perſians, ib. Generoſity to his army, 333. Quells a mutiny on the Tigris, 334, & ſeq. Goes into Media, 335. Babylon, 339, & 340 n. Threatened with ill omens, 341. ſeq. & n. His death, 344, ſeq. & n. Character, 347. His vaſt deſigns ſet aſide, 361. His corps buried in Egypt, 367.

——the ſon of Alexander the Great, 349. Impriſoned by Caſſander, 451. Murdered by him, ib.

——the ſon of Polyſperchon, his character, 434. Favoured by Antigonus, 446. Made general of Peloponneſus, 447. Murdered, ib.

——the ſon of Caſſander, drives his brother out of Macedon, 475. Put to death by Demetrius, 411, 459.

——the ſon of Eropus conſpires againſt Alexander the Great, 170, 171 & n.

——the ſon of Pyrrhus invades Macedon, 474. Driven out by Demetrius 475.

——the ſon of Perſeus ſent priſoner to Rome, 530. Forced to a private life, 533.

——a ſham ſon of Perſeus invades Macedon, 543.

——prince of Syria revolts againſt Antiochus, 600. His tragical end, 607.

——the Pherean wars againſt the king of Macedon, 73. Murdered by his wife and children, 87.

——the ſon of Æropus conſpires againſt Alexander the Great, 170, 171, & n.

Alexandria, when and by whom built, 202.

Aliacmon, a river in Macedonia, 22.

Almopians, where ſituate, 14.

Amaſtrine married to Craterus, 332.

Ambiruſus's ubmiſſion and preſents to Alexander, 298.

Ammon, Jupiter, the temple and oracle of, 204. Conſulted by Alexander, ib.

Amphaxis, the region of, deſcribed, 12.

Amphimachus's lot after Alexander's death, 372.

Amphipolis beſieged by Braſidas, 64. Taken by Philip, 82.

Amphyctions condemn the Locrians, 116. Chuſe Philip general, ibid.

Amyntas king of Macedon, 48. His reception of the Perſian embaſſadors, 50. Zeal for the Perſians, 54. & ſeq. Cuts off the uſurper, 71, & ſeq. Subdues the Olynthians, 72.

——— Alexander's governor murdered, 147.

——————— general ſuſpected of treaſon, 245. Makes his defence and is cleared, ib. & ſeq.

Anaxarchus the ſophiſt's flattering ſpeech to Alexander, 272.

Anaximenes ſaves Lampſacus, 157.

Anchor, why and how born by the Seleucidæ, 553 & n.

Andriſcus ſet up for Philip the ſon of Perſeus, 534. Sent priſoner to Rome, 536. Eſcapes into Thrace, ib. Invades Macedon, 538. Defeats the Prætor Juventius, 540. Turns tyrant, 541. Defeated twice by Metellus, 542. Sent priſoner to Rome, 543.

Andronicus forced to ſurrender Tyre, 391.

——Perſeus's governor in Theſſaly put to death, 506.

Anicius ſent to Illyria, 511. His ſucceſs there, 598, n & ſeq. Carries Gentius to Rome and triumphs, ib.

Antigene's lot after Alexander's death, 372. Treachery to Eumenes, 385. Cruel puniſhment, 386.

Antigonia razed by Seleucus, 563.

Antigonus, His lot after Alexander's death, 359, 372. Defeats Alcetas, 374, & ſeq. Out-witted by Eumenes, 375. Repulſed with loſs, 379. Defeated by Eumenes, 381. His treachery to him, 383, & ſeq. And to his own friends, 386. Marches into Babylon, 387. Calls Seleucus to an account. 388. Seizes Syria and Phænice, 389. Repels Caſſander, 390. The provinces recovered by Ptolemy, 392. Makes a new partition with the confederates, 397. Invaded by them, ib Takes the title of king, 400. His extraction and character, 401. Ill ſucceſs againſt Egypt, 402, & ſeq. Invaded by the confederates, 405, & ſeq. Slain at the battle of Iſſus, 408.

——Gonatus the ſon of Demetrius, his filial piety, 420. Gentleneſs, 460, & ſeq. Seizes the crown of Macedon, 470. Defeats the Gauls, 471. Invaded by Pyrrhus, ib. Expelled by him, 472. Defeats him at Argos, 473. Deſerted by his men, 474. Takes the citadel of Corinth, 476. His death, 477.

——Doſon choſen regent of Macedon, 479. Afterwards king, ib. His character, ib. Courted by the Achæans, 480. Friendſhip to Aratus, 481. Succeſs againſt Cleomenes, 482. Kindneſs to the Spartans, 483. Defeats the Illyrians, ib. Overſtrains his voice in the battle, and dies with a ſpitting of blood, ib.

Antioch, metropolis of Syria, 552. By whom built, 563, & 564 n. Deſcribed ib. & ſeq.

——metropolis of Mygdonia, where ſituate, 604 n.

Antiochus Soter's pretenſions to Macedon, 470. Defeats the Gauls, ib. Succeeds his father Seleucus in Syria, 582. Yields Greece to Antigonus, 583. Why ſirnamed Soter, ib. Defeats the Gauls, ib. His death, 584.

—— Theos, why ſo called, 584. Wars with Egypt, 585. Loſes ſeveral provinces, 587. Makes peace with Ptolemy, 588. Poiſoned by his wife, 589.

——Hierax, why ſo called, 594. Wars againſt his brother, ib. Expelled Syria, 596. His death, 597.

——the Great, invades Egypt, 601, Forced to retire, 602. Defeats his rebellious ſubjects, 607. Wars againſt Ptolemy, 610, & ſeq. Takes Ptolemais and Tyre, 612. Defeats him, 615. Marches into Judæa, ib. & ſeq. Defeated by Ptolemy, 617. Makes peace with him, 618. Marches againſt Achæus, ib. & ſeq.

Antipater's character, 123. Conduct in Greece, 219. Victory over Agis, 220. Whether guilty of Alexander's death, 345, & n. His poſt after that prince's death, 359. Choſen protector to his ſon, 371. Divides the provinces anew, 372. His deſcent and character, 422. Marches againſt the revolted Greeks, 425. Defeated by Leoſthenes, ib. By Antiphilus, ib. Makes peace with them, 426. Wars with the Ætolians, 429. Marches againſt Perdiccas 430. Choſen protector, ib. His death and ſucceſſor, 432, 433 & n.

—— the ſon of Caſſander, his bloody parricide, 458. Expelled by his brother, ib. Flies to Lyſimachus, 459. Put to death by him, ib.

—— the ſon of Philip, choſen king of Macedon, 469.

Antiphilus's ſucceſs againſt Antipater, 425.

Aornus, a city in India, deſcribed, 295. The rock of, taken by Alexander, 296.

Apamea, by whom built, 566.

Apollonia, a city in Macedon, 7, 8, & ſeq, & n. The country ſubmits to Glaucias, 450.

Appius Claud. ſent againſt Perſeus. 505. Sadly diſtreſſed, 507.

Apſus, river in Macedon, deſcribed, 21.

Arabs, invaded by Antigonus, 393.

Arachoſia, ſurrendered to Alexander, 247.

Aratus, his policy againſt the Macedonians, 477. Revenge on the treacherous Athenians, 478. Surprizes Corinth, 477. Joins with Antigonus Doſon, 481. Commerce with him, ib. Poiſoned by Philip, 484.

Arbela, the battle of, 212.

Archelaus, king of Macedon, 68. Raiſes the reputation of the Macedonians, 69. A lover of learning, ib. His death, 70.

Archidamus defeated by Demetrius, 410.

Argæus ſeizes the crown of Macedon, 47. Contemporary with Ancus Marcius, ib.

Argives conquer Macedonia, 25.

Argos, treacherouſly entered by Pyrrhus, 473. Relieved by Antigonus, ib.

Arians defeated by Alexander, 236. By Erigyus, 248.

Ariarathes II. king of Cappadocia crucified by Perdiccas, 365.

Arideus, Alexander's brother, appointed to ſucceed him, 353. Called Philip by the army, 354. Put to death by Olympias, 442.

—— the ſon of Alexander by Roxana, born, 358. Put to death by Caſſander, 451.

Ariſtotle, where born, 12. Converſant with Moſes's writings, 169 & 170 n.

Arſaces revolts from Antiochus, 587. Founds the kingdom of Bactria, ib. & ſeq. Invades Syria, 595, & ſeq.

—II. Invades Media, 596. Makes peace with Antiochus, ib. & ſeq.

Arſanes, brought bound to Alexander, 261.

Artabazanes, invaded by Antiochus, 608.

Artabazus's fidelity to Darius, 231. Rewarded by Alexander, 233.

Aſpendus, its ſtrong ſituation, 172. Surrenders to Alexander, 173.

Aſphaltes, the lake of, meaſured by Demetrius, 394. Computes the profit of its bitumen, ib.

Aſpii, invaded by Alexander, 291.

Aſſaceni invaded by Alexander, 292.

Aſter, a famed archer, the ſtory of 86 n.

Atalanta ſiſter of Perdiccas, put to death, 371.

Atheneas ſent againſt the Arabs, 393. Slain by them. ib.

Athenians fall out with the Perſians, 52, & ſeq. Their anſwer to Alexander, 58. Defeat the Perſians, 59. War with Perdiccas, 62. Outwitted by Philip, 83. Aſſiſt the Olynthians, 90. Send Phocion againſt Philip, 113. Beaten at Cheronea, 118, & ſeq. Their rank flattery to Philip, 130. To Alexander, 149, 150. Treachery to Demetrius, 408. Puniſhed, 410. Forced to ſubmit to Antipater, 427.

Athens taken by Demetrius, 410. Its government altered by Antipater, 429. Gariſoned by Gonatus, 474.

Atropatia, where ſituate, 607, n.

Attalus's ſpeech to Philip, 125. Abuſe of Pauſanias, 132. Treaſonable views, 143. Put to death, 144.

—— Alexander's admiral, 371. Joins with Eumenes, 372. Defeated and taken by Antigonus, 374.

Axius, a river in Macedonia, 22.

B.

BABYLON, the ruins of, deſcribed, 569, n & ſeq. n.

Babylonians, ſubmit so Alexander, 218. Forced to abandon their city, 395, & ſeq. Submit to Seleucus, 560.

Bactra, metropolis of Bactria, taken by Alexander, 252.

Bactria, when and by whom founded, 587, & ſeq. Invaded by Alexander, 251.

Bagdad, where ſituate, 569 n, & ſeq. n.

Bagoas's revenge on Orſines, 31 n.

Balm of Gilead, a plantation of near Aſphaltes, 394.

Barſina married to Alexander, 332. Her iſſue by him, 349. Murdered by Polyſperchon, 452, 453.

Baryazes put to death by Alexander, 332.

Barzaentes murders Darius, 232. Put to death by Alexander, 236.

Barſarnæ invited into Macedon by Philip, 489. Fall out with the Thracians, 495. Ill treated by Perſeus, 509, 510.

Bazira taken by Alexander, 295.

Berenice's intrigues at the Egyptian court. 465.

——princeſs of Lydia, aſſaſſinates Demetrius, 586.

——daughter of Ptolemy married to Antiochus, 588. murdered by Laodice, 590.

Beroſus, his character, writings, &c. 584. & ſeq.

Beſſus's treaſon to Darius, 231. Proclaims himſelf king, 235. His cowardly conduct, 253. Delivered up to Alexander, 254. His puniſhment and death, 261 & n. & ſeq. n.

Betis defends Gaza, 398. Alexander's cruelty to him, 200.

Biſaltæ, where ſituate, 13.

Brachmans put to death by Alexander, 320, & 321, n.

Branchidæ maſſacred by the ſame, 251, n.

Braſidas ſent to aſſiſt the Macedonians, 63. His ſucceſs and moderation, 64. Joins with the Macedonians, 65. Falls out with Perdiccas, 66. Killed before Amphipolis, 67

Bryges defeat the Perſians, 53.

Bubaris, how reconciled to the Macedonians, 52.

Bucephalus taken and reſtored by the Mardi, 334.

——a city built by Alexander, 304.

Bythis defeats the Achæans, 478.

C.

CALANUS burns himſelf alive, 332.

Caliſthenes's free ſpeech againſt adoring Alexander, 272. His character, 276, 277, n. Death, 280.

Callas's ſucceſs againſt Polyſperchon, 442, & ſeq.

Callines's ſpeech to Alexander, 335.

Camps, how formed among the Macedonians, 41.

Capros a river in Aſſyria, 605, n.

Caramanians complain to Alexander, 328. & ſeq.

Caranus deſcended from Hercules conquers Macedonia, 25. Firſt king of it, 43. Is directed by a herd of goats, 44.

Caſſander, whether he poiſoned Alexander, 344, 345, & n. His poſt after that prince's death, 372. Leagues againſt Antigonus, 389. Repelled by him, 390. Murders Roxana and her ſon, 397. 451. Invades Peloponneſus, 453. Corrupts Polyſperchon, 452. Raiſes a confederacy againſt Antigonus, 454. Hatred to Alexander, 457, n. Defeated by Demetrius, 404, 405. Makes a new alliance with Antigonus, ib. & ſeq. Why he did not ſucceed his father, as governor of Macedon, 432, 433, n. His ſeverity to Demades, 433. Attempt againſt Polyſperchon, 436. Goes to Nicanor, 438. Marches againſt Olympias, 442. Againſt Polyſperchon, 446. Outwits Antigonus, 447. Wars with the Ætolians, &c. ib. Ill ſucceſs in Aſia, 450. His death, 455.

Caſſandra, by whom built, 445.

Caſſandria, Potidea, why ſo called, 13.

Cathei confederate with the Oxydracæ and Malli againſt Alexander, 305. Defeated, ib. & ſeq.

Cebalinus diſcovers a conſpiracy againſt Alexander, 241.

Celtes ſue to Alexander, 146. Their anſwer to him, ib. Ranked in the number of his allies, ib.

Celydnus, a river in Macedon, boundary between that and Epirus, 22.

Chalcidia, where ſituate, 13.

Chalonitis, where ſituate, 607, n. Whence ſo called, ib.

Chares the Athenian ſent to relieve Perynthus, 104. The promiſe of Chares becomes proverbial, ib.

Charidemus put to death, 174.

Cherſobleptes invaded by Philip, 99, & 100, n. Gives up the Cherſoneſe to the Athenians, ib.

Cherſoneſus invaded by Demetrius, 408.

Choaſpians ſubdued by Alexander, 290.

Chorienes beſieged in his fortreſs, in the Paratacæ, 287. Surrenders himſelf, ib.

Cilicia invaded by Demetrius, 409.

Cilles defeated by Demetrius, 392.

Ciſſæus conquered by Caranus, 44.

Cleomenes king of Sparta's ſucceſs againſt the Achæans, 480. Defeated by Antigonus Doſon, 481, 482.

Cleopatra put to death by Antigonus, 398.

Cleophes, queen of India ſubdued by Alexander, 292, & ſeq. His treatment of her, 295.

Clitander put to death for oppreſſion, 328.

Clondicus, who, 509. Outwitted by Perſeus, ib. & ſeq. Spoils Thrace and raiſes enemies to Perſeus, 510.

Clytus, king of Illyria, revolts from Alexander, 146. Defeated, 147.

———General of Alexander joined in command with Hepheſtion, 247. Reproves Alexander, 266. Killed by him, 267, & n.

Cœle-Syria reduced by Alexander, 184.

Cœnus, king of Macedon, 45.

———General of Alexander, wounded at Gaugamela, 214. Made commander of Bactria, 282. Defeats the rebels, 283. His ſpeech in behalf of the ſoldiers, 308. His death, 313, n. Lamented by the ſoldiers, ibid.

Coin, of Macedon, 35.

Corinth, the citadel of, taken by Gonatus, 476. By Aratus, 477.

Corinthians war with the Corcyreans, 61.

Coſſeans, why ſubdued by Alexander, 338.

Cotys II. joins the Perſians againſt the Macedonians, 500.

Craterus appointed protector after Alexander's death, 358. Sent againſt Eumenes, 368. Defeated and killed, 369.

———aſſiſts Antipater, 426. His death, 430. treaſon againſt Archelaus, 70. Defeats the Maſſagetes, 282. And other rebels, 289. Made governor of Andaca, 281.

Crateſipolis, her conduct and bravery, 447.

Crenides taken by Philip, 84. Rebuilt by him and called Philippi, ib.

Crocodiles in the river Indus lead Alexander into a ſtrange notion about the Nile, 312, n. Changes his opinion, 313, n.

Cyname put to death by Perdiccas, 366.

Cypriots aſſiſt Alexander againſt Tyre, 390, & ſeq.

Cyprus, iſland, taken by Ptolemy, 397.

Cyropolis taken by Alexander, 257.

Cyrus's camp abandon'd to Alexander, 177.

———tomb deſcrib'd, 330.

D.

DAMIDES's ſtratagem againſt Polyſperchon, 459.

Daniel, ſeveral of his prophecies fulfilled, 590, n. 591, & 592, n.

Daphne, the infamous grove of, deſcribed, 565, n.

Darius Hyſtaſpis, when king of Perſia, his unfortunate attempt on Scythia, 48, & ſeq. Againſt Athens, 52, & ſeq.

———Marches againſt Alexander, 179. Defeated at Iſſus, 180. His firſt meſſ to Alexander, 186. Second meſſage rejected, 196. Defeated near Guagamela, 212. A great inſtance of his goodneſs, 218, 219, n. His treaſure at Suſa, 220, & n. & ſeq. Flies to Ecbatane, 227. Betrayed by Beſſus, 230, 231. Murdered, 232.

Daſſaretæ, where ſituate, 211.

Datis defeated by Miltiades, 53.

Delphic oracle corrupted by Philip, 118.

Demades's ſpeech to Philip, 150, & ſeq. Succeſsleſs embaſſy to Antipater, 427. His character, 432. Severe puniſhment, 434.

Demaratus's ſharp anſwer to Philip, 127.

Demetria, by whom built, 420.

Demetrius ſon of Antigonus, left with the government of Syria, 390. His character, ib. Defeated by Ptolemy, 391. Defeats Cilles, 392. His gallantry to Ptolemy, ib. Sent againſt Petra, 394. Meaſures the lake Aſphaltes, ib. Marches into Babylon, 395. Recovers Cilicia, 397. His conqueſts in Cyprus, 398, & ſeq. Saluted king by his father, 400. His ill ſucceſs againſt Rhodes, 404. His behaviour to Protogenes, ib. Degeneracy, 405, 462. Defeated at Iſſus, 407, & ſeq. Gives his daughter to Seleucus, 408. Becomes king of Macedon, 410, 460. Prepares for the conqueſt of Aſia, 412. Driven out of Macedonia, 413, & ſeq. Ill ſucceſs againſt Lyſimachus, &c. 414. Againſt Phyrrhus, 462, & ſeq. Retires to Caſſandria, 463. Surrenders himſelf to Seleucus, 417. His laſt letter to his ſon Antigonus, 419. Death ib. Funeral honours, ib. & ſeq. Wives and offſprings, 420, & ſeq. & n.

———the ſon of Demetrius, king of Cyrene, 420.

———the ſon of Gonatus, his early valour 475. Marries Nicæa, 476. His troubleſome reign, 477, & ſeq.

———the ſon of Philip, his character, 486. Pleads for his father before the Roman ſenate, 488. Envied by his natural brother, 490. Suſpected by his father, 492 Put to death, 493.

———prince of Macedon, marries Apame, 586. Murdered by her daughter, ibid.

———the ſon of Antiochus ſent to Rome, 536.

Demoſthenes the orator, his character of king king Philip, 86, n. Whether the pacific oration be really his, 95, 96, n. His speech in favour of Diopetes, 91. Outwrestles Philip, 101. Withdraws the Thebeans from him, 118. His cowardise at Chæronea, 119. Philip's character of him, 120, n. His excessive joy at the death of Philip, 143. Raises the Greeks against Alexander, 147.

Dinarchus put to death, 437.

Diodorus Siculus, how far preferable to Plutarch, 395, 396, n.

Diognenes's treachery to the Macedonians, 480.

——the philosopher's surliness to Alexander, 153.

Diopithes invades Philip's territories, 96, 97.

Dioscuri substituted to Bacchus, 266, 270, 271.

Doloaspis made president of Egypt, 207.

Dolopians reduced by Perseus, 496.

Doxareas's submission and presents to Alexander, 298.

Drypetis, daughter of Darius, married to Hephestion, 332. Murderered by Roxana, 362.

Dura, where situate, 606, n.

Dymnus conspires against Alexander, 240. Dies 242.

Dyrrachium, whether the same with Epidamnus, 7, 8, n.

E.

ECLYPSE of the moon, foretold by Sulpitius Gallus, 514. Throws the Macedonians into a panic, ib.

Edessa, the metropolis of Macedon, 11.

Edonia, where situate, 13.

Elatea taken by Philip, 116. Great advantage of seizing the place, 117, n.

Elyma, a city of Macedon, 8.

Emilianus Scipio passes mount Olympius, 512.

EmiliusPaulus,Roman consul, sent against Perseus, 511. Defeats him, 516. His speech to him, 521. Treatment of him, 522, & seq. New models the Macedonian government, ib. & seq. His triumph at Rome, 528, & seq. Behaviour to Perseus, ib.

Eordians, where situate, 11.

Epaminondas, guardian to Philip, 75, 76. His character, 79, n.—77, 78 n. Parallel with Philip, ib.

Ephesians, their pride, 163.

Ephesus visited by Alexander, 163.

——the temple of, spared by Demetrius, 408.

Epidamnus, a city in Macedonia, described, 6, n. Taken by the Corcyreans, 61.

Epigenes envied by Hermias, 600. Good advice to Antiochus, ib. Treacherously murdered by him, 604.

Epigoni, whence so called, 333.

Erasistratus's stratagem in favour of Antiochus, 575, & seq.

Erigon, a river in Macedon, 22.

Erigius defeats the Arians, 248.

Evander, a cowardly Cretan, 504. His unlucky advice to Perseus, ib.—hated by the Macedonians, 517. Takes refuge in Samothrace, 518, 519. Put to death by Perseus, ib. Invaded by Philip, ib.

Evenus, the Apollonian shepherd the story of, 9, n.

Euergetæ, whence so called, 247. Favoured by Alexander, ib.

Eumenes wounded by Perseus's assassins, 479. Allies with Rome against him, 498. Repulsed from Cassandria, 507. His death, 519, b.

——Alexander's secretary, his moderation towards Hephestion, 336, 337. Declares for Aridæus, 355. His character, ib. & seq. & 364. His fidelity, ibid. Sent against Ptolemy, 368. Defeats Neoptolemus, 369. Is proscribed, 371. His defeat, and singular valour, 373, & seq. Loyalty, 376, & seq. Repulses Antigonus, 379. Marches to Persepolis, 380. His speech to his officers, 381, n. Defeats Antigonus, 382. Betrayed to him, 385, 386. Put to death by him, ibid.

Eupolemus defeated by Ptolemy, 449.

Euripides intimate with Archilaus, 69, His memory honoured with a tomb by him, ibid.

Europus, a city in Macedonia, 11.

Eurydice, king Philip's wife, her precautions against Olympias, 440. Her couragious behaviour, 441. Put to death, 442.

——Her speech to the Athenian general, 74.

Euthycrates betrays Olynthus to Philip, 91.

G.

GAbene, seized by Eumenes, 382, By Antiochus, 383, & seq.

Gadrosi, subdued by Alexander, 325.

Galatia, whence so called, 582.

Gallogræcia, whence ſo called, 582.
Gangaridæ, where ſituate, 310, n & ſeq. n.
Gauls, firſt invaſion of Macedon, 468. Second, 469. Third, 470. Riffle the royal tombs, 472. Defeated by Gonatus, 474. Settled in Aſia Minor by Nicomedes, 582. Their treachery to Hierax, 595, 596.
Gaza taken by Alexander, 198, & ſeq. Its governor cruelly treated, 200. By Antigonus, 391.
Gaza in Bactria, taken by Alexander, 256.
Gentius, king of Illyria, ill treated by the Romans, 500. Outwitted by Perſeus, 509. Sent priſoner toRome, 527 & 528, n.
Getæ defeated by Alexander, 145, 146.
Glaucius king of the Taulantii, defeated by Alexander, 147.
—King of Illyrium Invaded by Caſſander, 448. Makes peace with him, ib.
——officer of Caſſander, murders Roxana and her ſon, 451.
Glauſæ invaded by Alexander, 304.
Goats, why painted on the Macedonian ſtandards, 44.
Gold mines ſeized by Philip, 83, & ſeq.
Gordian knot, the origin of, 175. Cut by Alexander, 176.
Granidus battle of, 158, & ſeq.
Greece invaded by Philip, 115, & ſeq.
——democracy of, reſtored, 149.
——alarmed at Alexander's ſucceſs, 219. Forced to ſubmit to Antipater, 229, 427.
Greek mercenaries, how uſed by Alexander, 233, 234. Revolt after his death, 362. Maſſacred, ibid.
Greeks, their war with the Perſians, 52. Arm againſt Philip, 116 & ſeq. Defeated at Chæronea, 118, & ſeq. Chuſe Alexander, their general, 143. Revolt from him, 147.
Guagamela, the battle of 212.
Gymnic games inſtituted by Alexander, 193.
Gyrlone, capital of the kingdom of Oreſtes, 10, 11.

H.

HAlicarnaſſus beſieged by Alexander, 166. Bravely defeated by Memnon, 167. Demoliſhed, 168.
Haloneſus, one of the Cyclades iſlands, Taken from the pyrates, by Philip, 108. & ſeq. By the Peparethians, ib.
Hammon, Jupiter the temple of, 205.
Harpalus, Alexander's treaſurer, His treachery 336. Puniſhed, ib.
Hepheſtion wounded at Guagamela, 214. Made general of the horſe with Clytus, 247. Sent towards Indus, 290. Rewarded by Alexander, 332. Reproved for his treatment of Eumenes, 336, 337. His death and obſequies, ibid. & ſeq.
Heraclea capital of the Lynceſti, 14.
Heracon accuſed by the Medes, is acquitted, 328. Charged by the Suſans, is put to death for oppreſſion, ib.
Hercules the ſon of Alexander murdered by Polyſperchon, 349, & 452.
Hermias, firſt miniſter of Syria, his bruiſh character, 600. Treacherous advice to Antiochus, 601. Treachery to Epigenes, 603, 604. Tragical end, 609.
Hermocrates the ſophiſt, his advice to Pauſanias, 133, & 134 n & ſeq. n.
Hermolaus, why he conſpired againſt Alexander, 278. His ſpeech to the army, 279. Death, ib.
Hipparchus, where born, 12.
Hippias, tyrant of Athens, expelled, 52. Refuſes a retreat offered by Amyntas of Macedon, ib.
—Perſeus's general oppoſes the Romans, 505. Surrenders to them, 517.
Hippoſtratus made general of Media, 387.
Hiſtæus's partiality for Darius, 49.
Hœmus mount in Macedon, deſcribed, 15.
Homer his poems, why ſo eſteemed by Alexander, 141.
Hydaſpes paſſed by Alexander, 298. Repaſſed, 314.
Hydraotes, river, paſſed by the ſame, 305. Repaſſed, 312.
Hyphaſis, river the boundary of Alexander's conqueſts, 310.
Hyrcania invaded by Alexander, 233.

I.

ILlyria invaded by the Romans, 505.
Illyrians go over to the Lynceſthi, 66. Subdued by Philip, 82, 84.
Indians, defeated by Alexander, 292. Treacherouſly treated by him, 294.
Indus paſſed by Alexander, 298.
Ion's treachery to Perſeus, 520.
Joppa taken by Antigonus, 389.
Ioria, the region of, where ſituate, 14.
Iougous mountain, its poiſonous weed, 24.
Iphicrates's behaviour to Perdiccas II. 74. Drives Pauſanias out of Macedon, ib.
Iſaurians, their deſperate end, 365.
Iſſus, the battle of, 180, & ſeq. & 406, & ſeq.
Judæa, Syria, &c. ſeized on by Antigonus, 389. By Ptolemy, 291. Recovered by the former, 392. By the latter 407, 407. By Antiochus, 615. By Philopator, 617.

Juventius ſent againſt Andriſcus, 540. His raſhneſs, ib. Defeated and ſlain, 541.

K.

KRim, al. Crim, the peninſula of, 619. Whence ſo called, ibid. & ſeq.

Kur, a river in Georgia, 612. Geographers diſagree about it, ibid.

L.

LAcedæmonians ſpeech to the Athenians, 58. Join with the Macedonians, 63. Aſſiſt Amyntas againſt the Olynthians, 71.

Lamia, concubine of Demetrius, 421.

——a city in Theſſaly, 425.

Lampſacus ſpared by Alexander by the addreſs of Anaximenes, 157.

Langarus's kindneſs of Alexander, 146, 147.

Laodice married to Perſeus, 498.

—wife of Antiochus, 588. Poiſons him, 589, & ſeq.

Laodicea, by whom built, and whence called, 566.

Laons, a river in Macedou, deſcribed, 21.

Laurandians ſeverely puniſhed by Perdiccas, 365.

Law-ſuits how carried on in Macedon, 28, & ſeq.

Leomedon's government after Alexander's death, 358.

Leonatus reſcues Alexander from the Malli, 316. His poſt after the king's death, 359. Succours Antipater, 425. Killed, 426.

Leonidas, tutor of Alexander, 140. appointed to command the turbulent battalion, 183.

Leoſthenes's zeal for democracy, 425. Succeſs and death, ibid.

Liba, where ſituate, 605, n.

Ligoras's ſtratagem at the ſiege of Sardis, 619, n.

Lychnides, a city in Macedon, 18.

——lake, 22.

Lycophron wars with Philip, 87.

Lynceſthi, where ſituate, 14. Invaded by the Macedonians, 66.

Lyſandra married to Agathocles ſon of Lyſimachus, 465. Perſecuted by Arſinoe, ibid. Flies to Seleucus, 466.

Lyſicles, defeated by Philip, 119. Put to death, ibid.

Lyſimachia, by whom built, 465. Overturned, ibid.

Lyſimachus, tutor to Alexander, 140. His poſt after the king's death, 359. Defends it againſt Scuthes, 363. Gets Thrace by the new treaty, 397. Marches againſt Antigonus, 405. His ſucceſs againſt Demetrius, 412. Seizes on Macedon, 465. Poiſons his eldeſt ſon, 466. Defeated and killed by Seleucus, ibid.

M.

MAcedo, who, 3, 4, & n.

Macedonia, whence ſo called, 3, 4 & n. Its limits, &c. 4, & 5, & n. Deſcribed 6. Uſe of the deſcription 14. Its extent, ibid. Its mountains and woods, 15. Its ſeas, lakes, &c. climate, &c. 21. Rich mines, 23. Antiquity, laws, and kings, 25. Invaded by the Athenians, 95. By the Illyrians, 522. Subdued by the Romans, 523. Its new diviſion, government, &c. 533. Various changes ſince, ibid. & ſeq.

Macedonians, originally Argives, 25. Their laws and cuſtoms, 26. Religion, 31. Ignorance of ſea affairs, 32. Months 33. Coin, 35. Language, military diſcipline, &c. 36. Manner of encamping and fighting, 39, & ſeq. Kings, 43, & ſeq. Become dependant on the Perſians, 52. Their faithfulneſs to them, 53. Defeated by the Lynceſtians, 66. Rewarded by Alexander, 333. Mutiny, ibid. Frighted at a lunar eclipſe, 514.

Macedonian empire, how divided after Alexander's death, 358, & ſeq. 372.

Magas, king of Libia's alliance, with Ptolemy, 585. Broken by his widow, 586.

Malli, confederate againſt Alexander, 305. Defeated, ibid. & ſeq. 315. & ſeq.

Maracanda, Beſieged by the Scythians 257. Relieved by Alexander, 260.

Mardi, ſubdued by Alexander, 233,

Mardonius's ſucceſsleſs expedition againſt Athens, 53. Againſt Greece, 54 & ſeq. Defeated and killed, 59.

Marmarians, their deſperate defence againſt Alexander, 169. Force the Macedonian guard, ibid.

Maronites plundered by Onomaſtus, 487.

Martius outwits Perſeus, 501. Sent againſt him, 505. Gets into the vale of Tempe, ibid. Ill ſucceſs in Macedon, 506.

Maſſaga beſieged and taken by Alexander, 292, &c.

Maſſagæte defeated by Cratæus, 282.

Mazeus,

Mazeus ſurrenders to Alexander, 209, 217.
Medius feaſts Alexander, 343.
Magabiſus's hapleſs meſſage to Amyntas, 510.
Megalopolitans beſieged by Polyſperchon, 439.
Megaſthenes's character and writings, 580, & n & ſeq.
Meleager declares for Aridæus, 353. His character 354. Supplanted by Perdiccas, 356.
——brother of Ceraunus, choſen king of Macedon, 469. Deprived by his ſubjects, ibid.
Memnon defeated by Alexander, 159. defends Milches, 164.——defends Halicarnaſſus, 166, & ſeq.
Menidas Nounded at Guagamela, 214.
Meroe perſuades Porus to ſubmit to Alexander, 303, 304.
Meſſene beſieged by Demetrius, 409.
Metellus, defeats the Pſeudo-Philip, in Macedon, 542, & ſeq. Reduced it into a Roman province, 544.
Mathone razed by Philip, 85, 86.
Miletum beſieged by Alexander, 163.
Mithridates I. third king of Pontus, 169. Goes over to Alexander, ibid.
Molo, prince of Syria, revolts from Antiochus, 600. Defeats his generals, 601. Is defeated, 606. Kills himſelf, 607. His body crucified, ibid.
Moſaic laws, whether copied by Ariſtotle, 170, n.
Muſicanus's ſubmiſſion and preſents to Alexander, 319, 320. Revolts, and is crucified, 320, 321, & n.
Mycaberna taken by Philip, 90.
Mygdonia, a province in Macedon, 4. Where ſituate, 12.
Myndians deceive with falſe promiſes, and repulſe Alexander, 166.

N.

NAbatean Arabs invaded by Antigonus, 393. Make peace with his ſon, 394. Fall foul on his collector of the bitumen, 395.
Nazianzum, a city in Cappadocia, 458.
Nearchus made admiral to Alexander, 314. Sails down the Indus, 323, 324, & n. Rejoins Alexander, 330.
Neoptolemus, a flattering poet to Philip, 126, n.
——the ſon of Amyntas, killed at Halicarnaſſus, 167.
——governor of Armenia, defeated by Eumenes, 368. Killed, 369.
Neſtus. a river in Macedon, 22.
Nicæa, built by Alexander, 304.
Nicanor's lot after Alexander's death, Defeated by Seleucus, 392. Refuſes to obey Polyſperchon's edict, 436. Defeated by Clytus, 439. Defeats him, ibid. Slain by Caſſander, 140.
Nicolaus, officer to Ptolemy, his fidelity to him, 615. Made his generaliſſimo, ibid. Defeated by Nearchus, 617.
Nicias Perſeus's general throws his treaſures into the ſea, 506. Put to death to conceal it, ibid.
Nyſa, taken by Alexander, 299, n.

O.

OCtavius Roman admiral, 511. Diſcharges his duty well, 512. Brings Perſeus priſoner to the conſul, 520.
Olympias, Philip's queen, her character, 84, 124, & ſeq. Divorce, 125. Meſſage to Alexander, 206, 207, & 229 Forced to retire into Epirus, 376. Inſtances of her pride and cruelty, 433, n. Recalled by Polyſperchon, 434. Her cruel behaviour at her return, 441. Shuts herſelf up in Pydna, 443. Beſieged by Caſſander, ibid. Put to death, 444.
—— queen of Acarnania, allies with Demetrius II. 478.
Olympics inſtituted by Philip, 91.
Olympus mount, deſcribed, 16, 17, & 20, n.
Olynthians invaded by the Macedonians, 72. Defeated by the Spartans, ibid. Subdued by Amyntas, ibid. Invaded by Philip, 89, & ſeq. Cauſe defended by Demoſthenes, 90.
Olynthus taken by the Perſians, 55. By Philip, 91.
Oneſicritus, his character as an author, 311, n. Made captain of a galley by Alexander, 314, Onomarchus, general of the Phocians, defeats Philip, 87. Killed by him, 88.
Ora a city in India, taken by Alexander, 295.
Orbelia, the country of, where ſituate, 14.
Orchemus rebuilt by Alexander, 149.
Oreos taken by Philip, 101.
Oreſtes kingdom of, 10.
—— King of Macedon, 69.
Oritæ ſubdued by Alexander, 325.

Oroandes's treachery to Perſeus, 520.
Orontobates made governor of Media, 387.
Orſines put to death for his cruelty, 330, & 331, n.
Oxathres ſaves Darius's life, 181, n. Put to death, 332.
Oxicanus ſubmits to Alexander, 320, & 321, n.
Oxus, river in Bactria, how paſſed by Alexander, 253.
Oxyartes king of Bactria, ſurrenders to Alexander. 286. Prevails on Chorienes to do the ſame, 287. Receives marks of the emperor's favour, ibid. & ſeq. His lot after that monarch's death, 319.
Oxydracæ confederate againſt Alexander, 305. Defeated, ibid. & ſeq.

P.

PAlæna, a city in Macedonia, 13. Famous for inhoſpitable Giants, ibid.
Pangeas mount in Macedonia, 15. The mines of, ibid. & 23.
Pantauchus wounded in a ſingle combat Defeated by Pyrrhus, 461, 462.
Panyaſus, a river in Macedon, deſcribed, 21.
Paphlagonia ſubmits to Alexander, 176.
Paraxis, the region of, whereof ſituate, 13.
Pariſatis, daughter of Ochus, married to Alexander, 332.
Parmenio's character, 123. Seizes on Darius's treaſure, 183, 187, & ſeq. Surrounded by Perſians at Guagamela, 214. Succoured by Alexander, ibid. & 215, & n. Accuſed by his ſon, 243. put to death, 245.
Paropamiſus, the country of, deſcribed, 249.
—— the mountain of, 249.
Parthia, the kingdom of, when and by whom founded, 587.
Patrocles forced to abandon Babylon, 395. Defeated and killed by the Bithynians, 582.
Pattala, the king of, ſubmits to Alexander, 322.
Pauſanias king of Macedon, 71. Killed by Amyntas, ibid.
—— murderer of Philip, his motive, 133.
Pelagonia where ſituate, 14.
Pelion, the mountain of, its heighth,
Pella, a city in Macedon, 11. Its vaſt ſtud of horſes, 24. Taken by the Romans 517.
Pelopidas's ſucceſs in Theſſaly, 73.
Peltaſtæ in Macedon, their office, 37.
Peluſium ſurrendered to Alexander, 201.
Peneus river deſcribed, 20, n.
Perdiccas I. fourth king of Macedon, 45.
— II. ſon of Alexander, his reign, 60, & ſeq. Wars with Athens, 61. Joins with Braſidas againſt the Lynceſthi, 66. His death and character, 67, & ſeq.
— III. ſet on the throne by Pelopidas, 75.
— Alexander's general, after his death, 353. Character, 354. Supplants and puts Meleager to death, 356, 357. His great power, ib. & ſeq. Cappadocia, 364. Marries Nicæa, 365. Wars with Ptolemy, 367. Murdered by his men, 371.
— a traitor to Eumenes hanged, 373.
Perinthus, or Perynthus, beſieged by Philip, 103, 113. Relieved by Phocion, 114.
Perſepolis deſtroyed by Alexander 226, & ſeq.
Perſeus, the natural ſon of Philip, cabals againſt his brother, 486, 492. Diſcovered, and diſinherited, 493. Mounts the throne, by main force, 495. His character, &c; ib. & ſeq. Falls out with the Romans, 496. Goes to Delphi, 497. Undermined by Eumenes, 498. Accuſed to the Romans, ib. & ſeq. Makes war with them, 501. Defeats them, 503 & ſeq. His puſillanimity, 504. Mad actions, 506. Covetouſneſs, 508. Defeated by the Romans, 516, & ſeq. His miſerable flight, ibid. Takes ſanctuary in Samothrace, 518. Surrenders to Octavius, 420. How treated by the Roman conſul, ibid. & ſeq. Vindicated againſt the Roman writers, 525, n. His miſerable end, 528, & ſeq. Character and progeny, 532.
Perſian embaſſadors rude behaviour at the court of Macedon, 50. How treated, ibid.
Perſians, the cauſes of their war with Greece, 52, & ſeq. Defeated by Mardonius, 53. Worſhip Alexander, 274, & n. & ſeq. n.
Petra plundered by Antigonus, 393.
Peuceſtas's lot after Alexander's death, 372. Outwitted by Eumenes, 380, & ſeq. His treachery to him, 385. Puniſhed, 387.

Phalanx, Macedonian, how disposed of, 39, 40. By whom invented, 79, & n. & seq.

Pharaimanes, king of Chorasmene, 280. His embassy to Alexander, ibid.

Phernophorus, Ptolem. Phil. why so called, 588.

Philip I. sixth king of Macedon, 47.

—— II. where brought up, 75. Comes into Macedonia, 76. His policy, 77, & n. & seq. Defeats Argeus, 80. Makes peace with Athens, 81. His conquests, 83, & seq. Loses an eye, 86, & n. His success in Thessaly, 87, & seq. Against the Olynthians 89, & seq. Makes peace with Athens, 92, & seq. Puts an end to the sacred war, 94, & seq. Invades part of Thrace, 96. Eubæa, 101. Propontis, 103. His letter to the Athenians, 104, & seq. Driven by Phocion, 114. Defeats the Triballi, 114, 115. Chosen general by the Amphictyons, 116. Beats the confederates, 118, & seq. Makes peace with Athens, 121. Arms against Xerxes, 122. Marries Cleopatra, 125. Murdered, 133. His character, 135, & seq.

— Cassander's general's success in Ætolia, 449.

— the son of Demetrius II. left an infant, 479. Prospers under his uncle Doson, ibid. & seq. Mounts the Macedonian throne, 483. His treachery to Aratus and his son, 484. Overpowered by the Romans, 485. Vain struggles against them, 488, & seq. Family broils, 489. Puts his son to death, 493. Runs mad, 494. His death, ibid.

— the pretended son of Perseus, vid. Andriscus, 534.

—the Acarnanian, his faithfulness to Alexander, 177, 178. — His lot after his death, 372.

Philippi, by whom built 14. Called formerly Crenides, ibid.

Philla, daughter of Antipater, married to Craterus, 429.

Philo chosen chief of the rebels, 362.

Philocles betrays young Demetrius, 492. Put to death 493.

Philotærus, first king of Pergamus 577, n. Buys the body of Seleucus 580.

Philotas suspected of treason, 241. Tortur'd, and put to death 243. His character 244.

Philoxenus's lot after Alexander's death, 372.

Phocians war with Philip, 88, & seq.

Phocis entered by Philip, 94, & seq.

Phrygians, why submit to Midas, 175.

Phylace, a city in Macedonia, famed for a vision of Alexander's, 11, 12.

Pieria, the region of, 11. Its mines, 23.

Pierian hills, described, 24.

Pimplia hill, described, 24. Its poisonous fountain, ibid.

Pithon sent to reduce Musicanus, 320. Plots against Perdiccas, 362. Chosen protector of Macedon, 371. Put to death by Antiochus, 387.

— attempt against Eumenes, 378.

Platæa rebuilt by Alexander, 149.

Polydamas sent to kill Parmenio, 245.

Polysperchon chosen governor of Alexander's sons, 375. Left with the care of Macedon, &c. 430. Appointed Antipater's successor, 434. His character, and wrong measures, ib. First edict confuses all Greece, 436. Cruelty to the Peloponnesians, 438, Defeated by Callas, 442. & seq. Forced to flee into Greece, 445. Murders Hercules and his mother, 451.

Porthmos in Eubœa, taken by Philip, 101.

Porus opposes Alexander, 300, & seq. Loses his son, 302. Is defeated, 303. How honoured by the conqueror, 304.

—— another of that name abandons his kingdom to Alexander, 305.

Potidea in Macedon, by whom founded, 13. Declares against the Persians, 55, Surrenders to the Athenians, 61, 62. Taken by Philip, 83.

Praxo, discovers Perseus's treachery, 499.

Propontis invaded by Philip, 103.

Ptolemy Soter sent to seize Bessus, 253, & seq. Defeats the Aspii, 291. His lot after Alexander's death, 358. Post and government, 279, 372. Flourishing kingdom, 367. Invaded by Perdiccas, 370. Allies with Seleucus, 389. Takes Syria from Antigonus, 391. Beaten out of it, ibid. & seq. Defeated by Demetrius, 398. Takes the title of king, 400. Allies with Antigonus, 405. Invades Judæa, &c. 407.

Ceraunus persecuted by Lysimachus, 465, 466. His treachery to Seleucus, 466, 467, and 579. Seizes the Macedonian crown, 579. Treachery to Arsinoe, 468. Slain by the Gauls, ibid.

Ptolemy Eugretes, whence so called, 592.

Ptolemy the son of Seleucus, killed at Issus, 180.

Ptolemy a natural ſon of Amyntas, 73. His treaſons, ibid. & 75.
— general of Antigonus, his treachery, 451. Poiſoned by the king of Egypt, 452.
Puniſhments among the Macedonians, 33.
Purple worn by the Macedonian nobles, 29.
Pydna, a city of Macedon, 11. Subdued by Archelaus, 69. By Philip, 83. Beſieged by Caſſander, 443 & ſeq.
Pyrrhus II. brought up by Glaucius, 455. Allies with Demetrius, 412. With Ptolemy, ibid. Drives Demetrius out of Macedon, 463. Made king of it, 464. Driven out by Lyſimachus, ibid. Recovers it from Gonatus, 472.

Q.

QUINDA, the treaſure of, plundered by Demetrius, 409.

R.

RABBATH Ammon ſubmits to Antiochus for want of water, 616.
Rammius diſcloſes Perſeus's treachery to the Romans, 499.
Raphia the battle of, 616, 617.
Rhodians, ally with Perſeus, 511.
Roxana taken priſoner by Alexander, 286. Captivates him, ibid. Her cruelty, 362. impriſoned by Caſſander, 451. Murdered by him, ibid.

S.

SALT of Jupiter Hammon, a royal preſent, 206.
Sammaritans apply to Alexander, 198. Diſguſted at his favour to the Jews, 208. Murder Andromachus, ibid. Severely puniſhed, ibid.
Sambus ſubmits to Alexander, 320 & 321, n.
Samian war, whence began, 424.
Sandrocotus, drives the Macedonians out of India, 561. Concludes a peace with Seleucus, 562.
Sangala razed by Alexander, 306, 307, & ſeq.
Sardis ſurrendered to Alexander, 162.
Satibarzanes murders Darius, 232. Revolts from Alexander, 234 & ſeq. Killed by Erygius, 248.
Satyrus his requeſt to Philip, 92.
Scardian mountains, in Macedon, 15.
Scipio Naſica ſent into Macedon, 539.
Scythians defeated by Alexander, 258. Reduced by him, ib. Make peace with him, 259.
Seal royal, ſacred among the Macedonians, 30.
Seleucia, by whom built, 565 & n. Recovered from the Egyptians, 611.
— on the Tigris, deſcribed, 566. & ſeq.
Seleucidæ, whence ſo called, 552. A liſt of them, ibid. Their reigns and hiſtory, ib. & ſeq.
— the æra of how and whence computed, 558 & ſeq.
Seleucus Nicator, founder of the Syro-Macedonian empire, 553. His ſeveral attempts againſt Eumenes, 378, 554. Attachment to Antigonus, 387, 488. Falls out with him, 389, 555, & ſeq. His reception at the Egyptian court, 555. Invades Babylon, 556. Defeats Nicanor 457. Gains Suſiana, Media, &c. 558. His great ſtrength, ib. Recovers Babylon from Demetrius, 560. Aſſumes the Royal title, 561. Goes into India, ib. & ſeq. Defeats and kills Antigonus, 408, 563. Builds Antioch, 563. Allies with Demetrius, 566. Strips him of Cilicia, 567. Impriſons him, 418 & ſeq. 573. (Yields his wife and part of his empire to his ſon, 576, & ſeq.) His kindneſs to Ptolemy Ceraunus, 578. Defeats and kills Lyſimachus, ib. Takes the name of Nicator, 579. Treacherouſly murdered by Ceraunus, 467, 569. His character, 580 & ſeq.
— Callinicus mounts the Syrian throne by parricide, 589 & ſeq. Invaded by Ptolemy, 592. Defeated by him, 593. By his own brother, 525. Drives him off, 597. Taken priſoner by Arſaces, ibid. His death, 598 Why called Callinicus, ibid.
— Ceraunus his character, 598. Death, 599.
Seuthes mediates a peace for Perdiccas, 63. Mounts the Odryſian throne, 64.
Sibyrtius promoted by Antiochus, 387.
Sidon, Abdalonimus made king there, 185, n.
Singitic bay in Macedon, now Golpho di monte ſanto, 21.
Siſygambis, how treated by Alexander, 183, & ſeq. 222. Her death, 362.
Sitalces put to death for oppreſſion, 328.
——— Invades Macedonia, 62. Makes peace with it, ibid. & ſeq.
Smyrna confederates with Seleucus, 594.

Socrates courted by Archelaus, 69.
Sogdia invaded by Alexander, 252, & ſeq.
Sogdian rock taken by him, 284 & ſeq. Deſcribed, 285, & 288, n.
Sogdians revolt againſt Alexander, 281, & ſeq.
Soſthenes choſen general of Macedon, 469. Totally deſtroys the Gauls, ib. Slain by a new inundation of them, ibid.
Soldiery, how regulated among the Macedonians, 37, & ſeq.
Spitamenes offers to deliver up Beſſus to Alexander, 253, & ſeq. Beſieges Maracanda, 257, & ſeq. Defeats Pharnaces, 259. Driven off by Alexander, 261. Heads the revolted Sogdians, 282. Defeated by Cœnus, 283. Murdered by the Scythians, ibid.
Stagira, a city in Macedon, 12. Famous for the birth of Hipparchus and Ariſtotle, ibid.
Statira's death and burial, 208, 209.
—— daughter of Darius, married to Alexander, 332. Murdered by Roxana, 362.
Steſanor's lot after Alexander's death, 372.
Strato, king of Arados, ſubmits to Alexander, 184.
Stratonice married to Seleucus, 409. Yielded by him to his ſon Antiochus 574, & ſeq.
Strymon, a river in Macedon, 22.
Strymonic bay, 22.
Suſa delivered up to Alexander, 220. The great treaſures there, ibid.
Syllanus Jun. accuſed by the Macedonians, 546. Condemned by his own father, 547. Hangs himſelf, ibid. Inference drawn from his puniſhment, ibid.
Syria, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 551, & ſeq. Its boundaries after Alexander's death, ibid. & 564 & ſeq. Kings, 552. Why called Tetrapolis, 566. Invaded by Eumenes and Attalus, 595. The reſt ſee under its reſpective kings.

T.

TAulantii, where ſituate, 6 & 7, n.
Taxila, a city in India, deſcribed, 299, n.
Taxiles's ſubmiſſion and preſents to Alexander, 289, 298. & ſeq. Speech to him, 299. Sent back to his dominions, 303.
Telleutias defeated by the Olynthians, 72.
Telmiſſians great ſoothſayers, 173.
Telmiſſus taken by Alexander, 173.
Temenus, the fabulous ſtory of, 46, 47, n.
Tents Macedonian, how made, 41.
Thebans join with Philip againſt the Spartans, 101. Join the Greeks againſt him, 118. Defeated, ibid. & ſeq. Revolt from Alexander, 147. Defeated by him, 149.
Thebes deſtroyed by Alexander, 149 By Caſſander, 445. Beſieged and taken by Demetrius 469.
Theodotus I. founder of the Bactrian kingdom, 587. Invades Syria, 596.
— II. allies with Arſaces againſt Seleucus, ibid.
— Ptolemy's general goes over to Antiochus, 612. Made governor under him, ib. Attempt on Ptolemy's life, and eſcape, 616.
Thermeus bay, deſcribed, 21.
Theſſalians over-reached by the king of Macedon, 73.
Theſſalonica, by whom founded, 12, & n. Its noble ruins and preſent grandeur, ibid. Taken by the Romans, 517.
Thimbro defeated and crucified, 367.
Thrace invaded by Philip, 99 & n.
Thaſians, where ſituate, 23.
Thraſydæus made king of Theſſaly for his flattery, 126 n.
Thurimas, third king of Macedon, 45.
Tlepolomus, Alexander's general, his lot after that prince's death, 372.
Torone a city in Macedon, 13. Its bay, 21. Taken by Braſidas, 65.
Torquatus, Tit. Man. an inſtance of his great juſtice, 547.
Tralles razed by Alexander, 168.
Triballi defeated by Philip, 114, & ſeq. Make peace with Alexander, 146.
Tuta ſucceeds her huſband in Illyria, 477. Her ill conduct, ibid.
Tyre beſieged by Alexander, 189, & ſeq. Taken and reſettled, 194, & ſeq. Taken by Antigonus, 390. By Ptolemy, 391. Betrayed to Antiochus, 615.
Tyrians refuſe to admit Alexander, 188. Their brave defence, 190. Cruelly butchered by him, 194, & ſeq.

V.

UXians defeated by Alexander, 222.

X.

XEnagoras measures the height of Olympus, 18.

Xenocrates's character, writings and death, 428, n.

Xenoetas, general of Antiochus, defeated and killed, 602.

Xerxes succeeds his father Darius, 53. Disjoins Athos from the land, 16, n. & 54.

Xeuxes's salutary advice to Antiochus 650.

Y.

YEar, how calculated among the Macedonians, 33.

Youth, how cultivated by the same nation, 31.

Z.

ZEira taken by Philip, 90.

Zeno, general of Antiochus, defeated, 601.

Zeuda Crata surrendered to Alexander, 235. Solemn games celebrated by him there, ibid.

Zipetes I. king of Bithynia, Dies for joy, 582.

—— II. defeated by his brother, 582.

FINIS.

AN

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

COMPILED FROM

ORIGINAL AUTHORS;

And ILLUSTRATED with

MAPS, CUTS, NOTES, Chronological,
And other TABLES.

VOL. IX.

Ἱσορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ καλανόει, ἐν ἀυταῖς γὰρ ἐυρήσεις ἀκόπως ἄ-ερ ἕτεροι συνῤῥαν ἐγκόπως. Baſil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

DUBLIN:

Printed for R. OWEN, S. HYDE, G. RISK, J. LEATHLEY, G, and A. EWING, W. SMITH, J. SMITH, P. CRAMPTON, G. FAULKNER, A. BRADLY, T. MOORE, E. EXSHAW, C. WYNNE, C. CONNOR, O. NELSON, P. WILSON, W. POWELL, I. KELLY, T. BUTLER, and W. BRIEN, Bookſellers.

M DCC XLV.

1937

CONTENTS

OF THE

NINTH VOLUME.

THE History of the Seleucidæ in Syria to their Reduction continued, Page 3

The History of Egypt, from the Foundation of that Monarchy by Ptolemy Soter, to its being made a Roman Province, 173

The History of the Armenians, 313

Description, Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Learning, Arts, and Trade of Armenia, ibid.

The History of the Kings of Armenia Major, 328

The History of the Kingdom of Pontus, 371

The History of the Kings of Pontus, 379

The History of the Cappadocians, 457

Description, Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Arts, and Trade of Cappadocia, ibid.

The History of the Kings of Cappadocia, 462

The

CONTENTS.

The History of the Kings of Pergamus; 472

The History of Thrace, 507

The History of the antient Kingdom of Epirus, 526

The History of Bithynia, 580

The History of the Kingdoms of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, Bosphorus, Media, Bactria, Edessa, Emessa, Adiabene, Characene, Elymais, Comagene, and Chalcidene, 602

AN

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

A Continuation of the Hiſtory of the Seleucidæ in Syria.

ANTIOCHUS, being now diſengaged from this troubleſome war, began to make the neceſſary preparations for the reducing of thoſe provinces in the eaſt, which had ſhaken off the Syrian yoke. As the Parthians had lately ſeized on Media, his firſt attempt was upon that province. Arſaces, the ſon of that Arſaces who firſt founded the Parthian empire, was at that time king of Parthia, and, taking advantage of Antiochus's being engaged in wars with Ptolemy and Achæus, had entered Media, and made himſelf maſter of that country. On the approach of the enemy he commanded all the fountains and wells in the deſart, through which they were to paſs, to be ſtopped and ſpoiled (Z); but Antiochus having ſent before ſeveral parties of horſe to ſecure them, marched ſafely through thoſe great deſarts with his whole

The expeditions of Antiochus into Media, Parthia Hyrcania, &c.

(Z) We are told by Polybius (45), that the Perſians, when they firſt conquered Aſia, finding many parts of it quite deſtitute of water, engaged to allow thoſe who ſhould either diſcover water whole army, and entering Media drove Arſaces from thence, and ſpent the remainder of the year in ſettling all things there in their former order, and providing for the further operations of the war. Early next ſpring he marched into Parthia, where he was as ſucceſsful as he had been the year before in Media. Arſaces was forced to retire into Hyrcania, where he thought to ſecure himſelf behind the mountains, which parted that country from Parthia, and accordingly poſted parties in all the paſſes, through which the Syrian army was to march, not doubting but by that means he ſhould obſtruct their further progreſs that way. But Antiochus, as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit, taking the field, advanced to the narrow paſſes, and dividing his army into as many bodies as there were attacks, he ſoon forced them all. He then aſſembled his army again in the plains, and with all his forces inveſted Syringis the capital of Hyrcania, which he ſoon obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. In the mean time Arſaces was not idle, but all the way as he retreated having gathered what forces he could, made up at length an army of an hundred thouſand foot and twenty thouſand horſe. With theſe thinking himſelf ſtrong enough to make head againſt the enemy, he took the field, and with great bravery put a ſtop to their further progreſs. His reſiſtance drew out the war into a great length, inſomuch, that no further advantage being gained by Antiochus, after many conflicts, he began to think it would be impoſſible for him to over-power ſo valiant an enemy, and drive him quite out of the provinces, in which he had by length of time ſo well eſtabliſhed himſelf. He therefore gave ear to the overtures which were made him for the putting an end to ſo troubleſome a war, and a treaty being ſet on foot, it was agreed, that Arſaces ſhould hold Parthia and Hyrcania, on condition of his aſſiſting Antiochus to recover the other provinces which had revolted [m].

(45) Polyb. l. x. p. 597.

ANTIOCHUS, having thus concluded a peace with Arſaces, turned his arms againſt Euthydemus king of Bactria. We have already ſhewn in what manner Theodotus firſt uſurped

[m] Juſtin. l. xli. c. 5.

ter in places where none was then known to be, or find means to convey it thither, the profits ariſing from thence to the fifth generation. Our author adds, that the inhabitants, animated by this promiſe, ſpared neither labour nor expence to convey water under ground from mount Taurus as far as the deſart here mentioned, there being no ſprings in that vaſt tract of country.

ſurped the province of Bactria, cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged king of that country, and left it to a ſon of the ſame name. This ſon had been vanquiſhed and driven out by Euthydemus, who, as he was a man of great courage and prudence, mantained a long war againſt Antiochus, who carried it on with great vigor, and on ſeveral occaſions gave proofs of an extraordinary courage. In one of the battles fought with this prince his horſe was killed under him, and in another he was dangerouſly wounded in the mouth, while he was encouraging his men in the firſt line. At length finding that he waſted his army without gaining any advantage by it, he grew weary of the war, and therefore admitted embaſſadors from Euthydemus to treat of an accommodation. Theſe repreſented to him, that the war he was carrying on againſt their ſovereign was not juſt, ſince he had never been ſubject to the kings of Syria; that Bactria had thrown off the yoke under other monarchs long before him; that he poſſeſſed the kingdom by right of conqueſt, having vanquiſhed and driven out the deſcendants of thoſe who firſt revolted, and held it as the reward of a juſt victory, &c. They likewiſe inſinuated, that the Scythians, taking advantage of the war, by which they were now weakening each other, were preparing to invade Bactria with a powerful army, and that therefore, if they perſiſted obſtinately in conteſting for it, a fair opportunity would be offered thoſe Barbarians to take it from both. This conſideration, added to the deſire which Antiochus had to get rid, under ſome honourable pretence, of this tedious and unprofitable war, induced him to agree to ſuch terms as ended in a peace; for the confirming and ratifying of which, Euthydemus ſent his ſon to Antiochus, who, being taken with his majeſtic mein and agreeable converſation, gave him one of his daughters in marriage, and granted his father the title of king. The other conditions were agreed on to the great ſatisfaction of both princes, and confirmed by the uſual oaths. After this, Antiochus, having received all the elephants of Euthydemus, which was one of the articles of the peace, croſſed mount Caucaſus, and entered India, where having renewed his alliance with Sophagaſenus king of that country, and received likewiſe his elephants, which, with thoſe he had from Euthydemus, amounted to an hundred and fifty, he marched from thence into Arachosia (A), afterwards into Drangiana, and lastly into Carmania, settling in all those countries due order and discipline. He passed the winter in Carmania, and thence returned by Persia, Babylonia, and Mesopotamia to Antioch, after having spent seven years in this expedition. The boldness of his attempts and the wisdom of his conduct, during the whole course of this long war, gained him the reputation of a wise and valiant prince; so that his name became formidable to all Europe, as well as Asia. And thus far by his whole conduct he well deserved the firname of Great, which was given him, and which he might have carried with great glory to his grave, had he not unfortunately engaged in a war with the Romans.

Antiochus enters into an alliance with Philip of Macedon against Ptolemy Epiphanes. Year of the flood 2797. Before Christ 202

NOT long after the return of Antiochus died Ptolemy Philopator king of Egypt, and was succeeded by Ptolemy Epiphanes his son, a child but five years old. Hereupon Antiochus, taking advantage of his minority and the domestic troubles which rent the kingdom into several factions, entered into an alliance with Philip king of Macedon, in virtue of which they were to strip the infant king of his dominions, and divide them between them: Philip was to have Caria, Lybia, Cyrene, and Egypt, and Antiochus all the rest. Pursuant to this agreement, Antiochus marched forthwith into Cœle-Syria, and Palestine, and in less than two campaigns made an entire conquest of these provinces with all their cities and dependencies. In the mean time, Scipio having put an end to the second Punic war in Africa, the name of the Romans began to be every where known, and their victories spoke of not only in Europe and Africa, but all over Asia. The guardians therefore of the young king, finding themselves reduced to great straits by the confederate princes, sent an embassy to Rome, imploring the protection of that republic, and offering them the guardianship of their king and the regency of their kingdom during his minority; and lest the senate should refuse the offer, they added, that the deceased king had recommended both to them at his death. The Romans, thinking this would redound greatly to their glory, complied with the request of the embassadors, and taking on them the tuition of the young king, immediately

(A) We shall have occasion to describe Arachosia, Drangiana, Paropamisus, Aria, Gedrosia, and other countries on this side of the river Indus, when we come to the history of Bactria, Hyrcania, Colchos, &c.

ately acquainted Antiochus and Philip therewith, requiring them to desist from invading the dominions of their pupil, otherwise they should be obliged to make war upon them for his protection. Marcus Æmilius Lepidus, who was one of the embassadors sent to both kings, after having delivered his embassy, repaired, agreeable to the instructions he had received from the senate, at his first setting out, to the court of Egypt, there to take upon him the office of guardian to the young king and regent of the kingdom (B). After he had regulated affairs there in the best manner he could, he appointed Aristomenes an Acarnanian to be chief minister to the king, and then returned to Rome. Aristomenes was an old experienced minister of that court, and being well acquainted with the affairs of Egypt, acquitted himself in this charge with great prudence and fidelity °.

° Polyb. l. iii. p. 159. & l. 15. p. 707. Liv. l. xxxi. Justin. l. xxx. c. 3. Val. Max. lvi. c. 6. Hieronym. in cap. 11. Daniel.

(B) Livy takes no notice of the guardianship of Lepidus, whence the authors of the Roman history, which is now publishing in France, call in question the truth of the fact, thinking Livy's silence a strong proof against the single testimony, say they, of Justin. But herein they are greatly mistaken; for Valerius Maximus (46) tells us in express words, that Lepidus was appointed by the senate guardian of the young king of Egypt, and sent into that kingdom to take upon him the regency. King Ptolemy, says he, having left the people of Rome guardian to his son during his minority, the senate sent M. Æmilius Lepidus high-pontiff, and one who had been twice consul, to Alexandria to take care of their pupil's kingdom, depriving themselves of a most upright man, who had been long conversant with their own affairs, &c. Besides, there are still extant several medals representing Lepidus putting a crown on a young man's head with this inscription, S. C. M. Lepidus Pont. Max. Tutor Reg. On the reverse of these medals is the city of Alexandria, where the kings of Egypt resided in those days. Our author here supposes, that M. Lepidus executed the office of guardian to the young king while he was high pontiff, and after he had been twice consul; whereas Ptolemy Epiphanes was dead before that time; perhaps he had seen some of the coins we have mentioned, and was by them led into this mistake (47).

(46) Valer. Max. l. vi. c. 6. (47) Vide Usher. Annal. ad Ann. Mundi. 3803.

THE firſt thing he did was to provide againſt the invaſion of the two confederate kings; and for this purpoſe he took care to recruit the army with the beſt ſoldiers he could raiſe; he ſent Scopas an Ætolian with vaſt ſums of money into Ætolia to levy there all the troops he could, the Ætolians being reputed the beſt ſoldiers of that age. Scopas had been formerly Prætor of Ætolia, and was famous all over Greece for his ſkill in military affairs; when the time of his Prætorſhip was expired, being diſguſted with his countrymen for not confirming him, as he expected, in that office, he left Ætolia and went into the ſervice of the king of Egypt, and being employed on this occaſion, he had ſuch ſucceſs in his levies, that he brought in a very ſhort time ſix thouſand choſen men from Ætolia, which was a conſiderable reinforcement, to the Egyptian army [P] (C).

IN the mean time Antiochus having paſſed into Aſia Minor, and there engaged in a war with Attalus king of Pergamus, Ariſtomenes, taking advantage of the king's abſence, ſent Scopas with an army into Paleſtine and Cœle-Syria to recover thoſe provinces. In this expedition the Ætolian was attended with ſuch ſucceſs, that he recovered ſeveral cities, reduced all Judæa, put a gariſon into the caſtle of Jeruſalem, and on the approach of winter returned to Alexandria, loaded with the ſpoils of the conquered provinces. But it ſoon appeared, that the ſucceſs of this campaign was chiefly owing to the abſence of Antiochus, and the ſmall reſiſtance the Egyptian army met with. For Antiochus no ſooner marched in perſon into Cœle-Syria, but the face of affairs was changed and victory declared in his favour. Scopas, who returned with a powerful army, was defeated at Paneas near the ſource of the Jordan, and great part of his army cut in pieces.

[P]. Liv. l. xxxi. Hieronym. ibid. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 3. Liv. l. xxxii.

(C) Livy tells us, that Scopas would not have left one man in the country able to bears arms, had not one Damocritus put his countrymen in mind of the war which Ætolia itſelf was ready to engage in, and repreſented to them the danger to which their own country would be expoſed, if left naked and deſtitute of ſo many brave men. Hereupon great numbers, who had determined to follow Scopas into Egypt, remained at home. Scopas had not bribed and courted Damocritus as he had done the other heads of the Ætolian ſtate.

ces. The general himſelf with much ado eſcaped to Sidon, where he ſhut himſelf up with ten thouſand of his men, all the reſt having been killed or taken priſoners. Antiochus laid ſiege to the city, and reduced the numerous gariſon to ſuch ſtraits, that they were forced by famine to ſurrender on terms of having only their lives ſpared. Accordingly they delivered the city up to Antiochus, who diſmiſſed them ſtript of their effects and quite naked. However, the regency of Alexandria was not wanting in uſing their utmoſt efforts for the relief of the place. They no ſooner heard that Scopas was beſieged, but three of their beſt generals at the head of the choiceſt troops of the ſtate were ſent to raiſe the ſiege. But Antiochus had diſpoſed things ſo that all their attempts proved unſucceſsful, and Scopas was obliged to ſubmit to the diſhonourable terms aboveme-ntioned [q]. From Sidon Antiochus marched to Gaza, and being provoked at the reſiſtance he met with there, he gave up the city, after he had taken it, to be plundered by his ſoldiers. From Gaza he ſent ſeveral detatchments to ſecure the paſſes through which troops might be ſent out of Egypt to diſturb him in the poſſeſſion of his conqueſts, and then marching back reduced Betanea, Samaria, Abila, Gadera, and the remaining parts of Paleſtine and Cœle-Syria [r].

THE Jews, who were at this time much alienated from the Egyptians, probably on acccount of the ravages committed the year before by Scopas, when he took Jeruſalem, no ſooner heard that Antiochus was advancing towards their country, but they went in crowds to meet him, delivering to him the keys of their cities; and when he approached Jeruſalem, the prieſts and elders received him with great demonſtrations of joy, paid him all kinds of honours, and entertained both him and his whole army in their city, ſupplying them plentifully with all ſorts of proviſions; nor was this all, they even took up arms and joined his forces in reducing the caſtle, which had been ſtrongly gariſoned by Scopas. In return for theſe ſervices, Antiochus, in a decree directed to Ptolemy one of his lieutenants, granted them many privileges and favours; and in another he particularly ordained, that no ſtranger ſhould be allowed acceſs to the inner part of the temple; a prohibition which ſeems to have been made on account of Philopator's tor's attempt which we have mentioned above. Antiochus had in his eastern expedition granted most ample privileges to the Jews, who were settled in Babylonia and Mesopotamia, and by that means gained the affection of the whole nation; no wonder therefore that, contrary to their former inclination, they were more desirous of having him to rule over them, than the Egyptian king who had used them ill. Antiochus depended so much on their fidelity, that, when a sedition broke out in Phrygia and Lydia, he sent two thousand Jewish families out of the provinces of Babylonia and Mesopotamia, to quell it and keep the country in peace. They were transported thither at the king's charges, and by his order placed in the strongest fortresses of the country, had lands and possessions divided among them for their subsistence, and maintained at the king's expence, till they received the fruits of the lands alotted them [t]. From these Jews were descended those whom we find scattered in great numbers all over Asia, when the gospel was first preached in those parts.

The jews ſubmit to Antiochus, who treats them kindly Year of the flood 2801. Before Chriſt 198.

[q] Valeſii Excerpt. in Polyb. p. 77, 78, &c. Hieron. in cap. 11. Daniel. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xi. c. 3. [r] Juſtin. l. xxxi. c. 1. Liv. l. xxxiii. Polyb. Legat. 72. p. 893.

Antiochus invades Asia Minor.

ANTIOCHUS having thus reduced all Cœle-Syria and Palestine, conceived hopes of doing the same in Asia Minor, his great aim being to restore the Syrian empire to the full extent, in which it had been held by any of his ancestors, especially by Seleucus Nicator its founder. But as he could not succeed in this design, unless he found some means to prevent the Egyptians from molesting him in his new conquests, while he was at a distance from them, he sent Eucles the Rhodian to Alexandria with proposals of a marriage between Cleopatra his daughter and king Ptolemy, to be consummated as soon as they were both of age, promising to give up those provinces on the day of the nuptials, by way of dowry with the young princess. This proposal being approved of at Alexandria, the treaty was concluded and ratified; and the Egyptians, relying on the promises of Antiochus, suffered him to carry on his conquests without molestation [u].

ANTIOCHUS, having thus settled all in peace behind him, early next spring sent his two sons, Arduas and Mithridates, before him to Sardis with his land-forces, ordering them to wait for him there; while he himself set out with a fleet large enough to strike terror into all the coasts of the Mediterranean; for it consisted of an hundred large ships of war and two hundred other vessels of all sizes. His design was first to conquer the cities of Cilicia and Caria, and then advance in person to the assistance of his old ally Philip, who was was engaged in a war with the Romans, as he ſailed along the coaſts of Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, and Caria, many of the maritime cities of thoſe provinces voluntarily ſubmitted to him. Among theſe were Zephyrium, Soli, Aphrodiſias, and Corica. From the latter he doubled the promontory Anemurium, and made himſelf maſter of the city of Selinus. Upon the bare report of his approach the cities ſent deputies to him from all parts, acknowledging his authority, and declaring themſelves ready to receive his troops within their walls. Coroceſium (D) was the only city in thoſe parts, which ſuſtained a ſiege, though inveſted with all the forces of that mighty monarch. While he was employed before this place, the Rhodians, not in the leaſt terrified at his formidable power, ſent an embaſſy to him, requiring him not to extend his conqueſts farther, and to withdraw his troops out of Cilicia, elſe they ſhould be obliged to take up arms againſt him, and put a ſtop to his further progreſs. The proud monarch, who was uſed to give law to others, was highly provoked at this bold meſſage from ſo ſmall a ſtate; but, however, had command enough over his paſſions not to expreſs any great reſentment; he only anſwered, that he deſired not to quarrel with the Rhodians, but to keep up always a good intelligence with them, and would therefore take care to order his embaſſadors to renew the antient treaties his anceſtors had made with Rhodes. He then ſent embaſſadors to Rhodes, but in the mean time continued the ſiege of Coroceſium, which was at length taken by aſſault; ſeveral other cities of Ionia and Æolis underwent the ſame fate; but Caunus, Myndus, Halicarnaſſus, and the iſland of Samos were preſerved by the good offices of the Rhodians, and the large ſupplies of men and proviſions, which they ſent them. Antiochus, having thus reduced moſt of the maritime cities of Aſia Minor, at length ſailed to Epheſus, and having likewiſe made himſelf maſter of that city, took up his winter quarters there, ſpending the remainder of the year in concerting with his officers ſuch meaſures as might be moſt proper for the purſuing and accompliſhing of his vaſt deſigns; for nothing leſs than the intire conqueſt of all thoſe kingdoms, which had formerly belonged to the Syrian empire, would ſatisfy his ambition [w].

[t] Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 3. [u] Hieron. in cap. 11. Daniel.

SMYRNA

[w] Liv. l. xxxiii. Hieron. in cap. xi. Daniel. Appian. in Syriac.

(D) Coroceſium was a ſtrong place ſituate near the ſea on the top of a ſteep rock, which according to Strabo, parted Cilicia from Pamphylia. This fort is now called Scandeloro.

The free cities of Asia implore the protection of the Romans.

SMYRNA, Lampsacus, and other Greek cities of Asia, which at that time enjoyed their liberty, finding that Antiochus designed to reduce them all to the condition they were in under his ancestors, resolved to stand out against him; but not being able to resist so powerful an enemy with their own strength, they implored the protection of the Romans, who willingly granted them it; for they plainly saw that it was their interest to check the progress of Antiochus towards the west, and that if they suffered him to settle on the coast of Asia, according to the plan he had laid down, he would have an easy passage from thence into Europe, and disturb them in the possession of the provinces they had already conquered, or might for the future conquer in Thrace and the adjacent countries. They therefore gladly laid hold of this opportunity, which the free cities offered them of opposing his further progress; and immediately dispatched embassadors to him; but before their arrival, Antiochus, having sent two detachments from his army to besiege Smyrna and Lampsacus, had with the rest left Ephesus, and, crossing the Hellespont, seized all the Thracian Chersonesus. His pretence for it was to take possession of the old inheritance of his ancestors. We have already observed, that Seleucus Nicator had vanquished in Phrygia Lysimachus king of Thrace; and this Antiochus thought a sufficient title to justify his claim upon Thrace as being his great-grand-father's conquest. The city of Lysimachia, which stood on the isthmus leading into the Thracian Chersonesus, had been founded by this Lysimachus, but then lay in ruins, having been taken and reduced to this condition a few years before by the Thracians. Antiochus therefore had a design to rebuild Lysimachia, and make it the capital of a great kingdom, which he intended as a portion for his second son Seleucus. He was bent upon these projects when he left Ephesus, and brought his troops by land into the Chersonesus, his fleet arriving before him at Lysimachia. Here he made it his first business to rebuild and repeople that great city. It was by its situation the most advantageous place he could have pitched upon in Europe; he therefore undertook to make it a convenient port for ships of all sizes, and a magazine of arms and provisions for the armies he intended to employ in the recovery of Thrace. With this view he assembled together its old inhabitants, who were dispersed and scattered in several places, rescued from slavery such as had been made captives, brought thither new citizens from the neighbouring countries, gave them most ample privileges, and furnished furniſhed them with cattle, with inſtruments of huſbandry, and whatever elſe was neceſſary for their encouragement [x].

Embaſſadors ſent from Rome to Antiochus. Year of the flood 2803. Year before Chriſt 196.

WHILE Antiochus was thus buſied in the reſtoring of Lyſimachia, the Roman embaſſadors, with ſome deputies from the Greek cities in Aſia, arrived in Thrace, and finding Antiochus then at Selymbria, a city of that country, did all that lay in their power to diſſuade him from ſettling in Europe. Antiochus received them very graciouſly, and entertained them in an hoſpitable and polite manner; but in the very firſt conference their minds were ſowered againſt each other, the Romans giving themſelves thoſe imperious airs, which they aſſumed where-ever they came. They told him, that their republic was diſſatisfied with his conduct ever ſince he came into Europe, demanded the reſtitution of all the cities and provinces, which he had taken from Ptolemy during his minority, and above all inſiſted upon his giving up thoſe places, which he had uſurped from Philip; ſince the Romans, who had conquered the Macedonian, had a right to diſpoſe of them. What! ſaid L. Cornelius, who ſpoke on this occaſion, ſhall Rome have been at all the expence of the war with Philip, and Antiochus reap the advantages of it? We ſhould perhaps have connived at your conqueſts in Aſia. But thoſe you are come to make in Europe we will not ſuffer. Is not this ſtep a declaration of war with the Roman ſenate and people? To this Antiochus, putting on an haughty air in his turn, replied, I have long obſerved that Rome is very watchful of my ſteps, but quite regardleſs of her own. Know then, proud Romans, that it no more concerns you to examine what I do in Aſia, than it concerns me to controul you in any of your undertakings in Italy. You complain of my proceeding with regard to the king of Egypt; he is my friend, and will ſoon become my ſon-in-law; and then we ſhall ſettle our differences between ourſelves. As to the Thracian cities, which I have lately taken from king Philip, I muſt let you know, that the Cherſoneſus was never a part of his dominions: Nicator, my great-grandfather, formerly conquered it, and took it from Lyſimachus, whom he overcame in Phrygia. Ptolemy, indeed, and Philip divided Thrace between them, while my predeceſſor was buſy elſewhere. But that does not alter the nature of their uſurpation; and I am come now juſtly to recover what they unjuſtly invaded. The Thracians have demoliſhed Lyſimachia, a city belonging to me; me; and I am come to rebuild it. I will make it the capital of a kingdom, which is my right, and which I design for my younger son. The Romans desired that the embassadors from Smyrna and Lampsacus might be called in; and they, being admitted accordingly, spoke with so much freedom, that Antiochus, not able to bear it, cried out in a violent passion, that the Romans were not to be his judges; upon which the assembly broke up in great disorder, no satisfaction being given on either side, but all things tending to an open rupture [y]. It must be owned, that according to the laws settled among the captains of Alexander, who survived that prince and divided his conquests, the claim of Antiochus to Thrace was not ill grounded. The strongest took from the weakest the share he had usurped upon the division of Alexander's dominions; and by this rule Thrace, which Lysimachus had seized, belonged to Nicator, who had conquered him, and consequently to Antiochus his great-grand-son. Nevertheless this dispute would have lasted a great while, if Antiochus had not been obliged to leave Lysimachia for another enterprize, which was of more consequence to him than even this [z]. A report was spread, that the king of Egypt was dead; whereupon Antiochus looking upon Egypt as his own, hastened on board his fleet to take possession of it, and having left his son Seleucus with the army at Lysimachia to carry on the work begun there, he first sailed to Ephesus, where he joined to his fleet all the ships he found in that harbour, and made all the sail he could for Egypt; but on his arrival at Pateræ in Lycia, certain advice being brought him, that the report which was spread of Ptolemy's death was false, he changed his course, and made for the island of Cyprus, with a design to seize it; but meeting in his way thither with a violent storm, his fleet suffered shipwreck near the mouth of the river Sarus, which discharges itself into the Cilician sea. After a considerable loss of ships and men, he was glad to put in at Seleucia (E), to repair his shattered vessels, and from thence return to Antioch, without attempting any thing else that year [a].

[x] Liv. & Appian. ubi ſupra.

What

[y] Polyb. Legat. 10. p. 800. & l. xvii. p. 769. Liv. & Appian. ibid. [z] Liv. & Appian. ubi supra. [a] Polyb. l. xvii. p. 771, 772. & Valesii Excerpt. p. 61.

(E) Several cities, as we have observed elsewhere, bore this name, being all built by Seleucus Nicator. The city here spoke of WHAT occaſioned the report of Ptolemy's death was, a conſpiracy, which had been formed againſt the life of that prince, and was firſt ſuppoſed, and afterwards reported, to have taken effect. Scopas the Ætolian was the author of this conſpiracy, who being commander in chief of all the foreign forces in the ſervice of the Egyptian king, moſt of which were Ætolians, imagined, that with ſo formidable a body of well-diſciplined troops, it would be eaſy for him to uſurp the crown, and make himſelf maſter of the whole kingdom during the king's minority. He had already formed his ſcheme for the attempt, and no doubt would have ſucceeded in it, had he executed his treaſon with the ſame boldneſs and reſolution with which he contrived it. But though he was a very bold and daring man, yet when he came to the execution, his heart failed him, and, inſtead of going reſolutely through with it, as ſuch a deſperate attempt required, he began to conſult at home, and debate with his friends and acccomplices, how he might beſt manage it, and by that means let ſlip the opportunity. For Ariſtomenes, the prime miniſter, having in the mean time got information of the plot, cauſed Scopas to be ſeized, and, having examined him before the council, and found him guilty, ordered him and all his accomplices to be executed. As for the reſt of the Ætolians, they having forfeited the good opinion which the Egyptians had entertained of them on account of their fidelity till that time, moſt of them were diſbanded, and ſent back into their own country. Scopas was found at his death poſſeſſed of vaſt riches, which he had amaſſed by plundering the countries where he commanded as general. As he had, during the courſe of his victories, reduced Judæa and Jeruſalem, the greateſt part of his treaſures aroſe, no doubt, from thence. One of his chief accomplices in this plot was Dicærchus, who had formerly been admiral in the ſervice of Philip king of Macedon. We are told by Polybius, that Philip having commanded him to make war on the Cyclades, contrary to the moſt ſacred and ſolemn treaties, to ſhew how little he regarded either piety or juſtice, before he ſailed out of the port on that expedition, he erected two altars, one to iniquity, and the other to impiety, of ſtood in Cilicia, about twelve miles from the ſea, on the banks of the Calicadnus. The antient geographers, to diſtinguiſh it from the other cities of the ſame name, call it Seleucia Trachiotis; an appellation which well agrees with the mountainous and rocky country in which it ſtood.

and

and ſacrificed on them both, to inſult, we may ſay, at the ſame time both gods and men. As this wretch had ſo ſignally diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his crimes, Ariſtomenes very juſtly diſtnguiſhed him from the reſt of the conſpirators in his puniſhment. For the others were diſpatched by poiſon; but Dicæarchus tormented to death [b].

Hannibal puts himſelf under the protection of Antiochus. Year of the flood 2804. Year before Chriſt 195.

EARLY next ſpring Antiochus ſet out from Antioch on his return to Epheſus, and was ſcarce gone, when Hannibal arrived there, claiming his protection. This great general had lived ſix years unmoleſted at Carthage, ever ſince the laſt peace with the Romans. But being now ſuſpected to hold a ſecret correſpondence with Antiochus, and in concert with him to form projects againſt Rome, his enemies ſent privately advice of this to the ſenate. Hereupon embaſſadors were immediately diſpatched to Carthage, under pretence of ſettling ſome ſmall difference between Maſiniſſa and the Carthaginians, but in reality to watch Hannibal's conduct. If they found that he had entered into any engagements with Antiochus, the embaſſadors were ordered to demand him to be delivered up to them, But Hannibal no ſooner heard of their arrival than he ſuſpected their buſineſs, and knowing that he was guilty of the practices which had been laid to his charge, reſolved to withdraw before the embaſſadors could make any inquiries. As he was Suffes, that is, the chief magiſtrate of the republic, he was obliged to appear continually in public; and this made his eſcape the more difficult. He therefore managed it with a great deal of addreſs; he ordered his gold and ſilver to be carried to Thapſus, a city near a country-ſeat, which he had on the ſea-ſhore at a ſmall diſtance from Carthage. There he equipped two ſmall veſſels, manned them with good rowers, and concealed them in a little gulf within reach of his houſe. When the day came on which he deſigned to ſet out, he appeared before the ſenate and people as uſual, and even had a conference with the Roman embaſſadors. In the evening he went out on horſeback, as it were, to take a turn to Thapſus, from whence he was to return immediately, and therefore he ordered his attendants as Suffes to wait for him at the gate of the city. Being arrived at his country-houſe, he immediately imbarqued with a few choſen ſervants, and ſet ſail for the iſland of Cercina; from Cercina he ſteered his courſe to Tyre where he was received with all the reſpect due due to ſo great a warrior, the Tyrians, who were originally the founders of Carthage, looking upon him as one of their own citizens. However, he did not ſtay long there, but purſued his journey to Antioch, hoping to find Antiochus there. But he being already gone for Epheſus, one of the king's ſons kept him ſome days at Antioch, being deſirous that this great man ſhould be preſent at the feſtival celebrated near Daphne in honour of Apollo and Diana. As ſoon as the ceremony was over, Hannibal ſet ſail for Epheſus, where he found Antiochus yet wavering between peace and war. But Hannibal's preſence, and the reaſons that great adverſary of the Romans offered him, with the high opinion Antiochus had of his conduct and valour, ſoon determined the king's reſolution for war. He did not doubt but with the counſel and aſſiſtance of a man, who had ſo often defeated the Romans, and thereby juſtly gained the reputation of being the greateſt general of the age, he ſhould be able to accompliſh all his deſigns. He now thought of nothing but victories and conqueſts; accordingly war being reſolved on, all that year and the following were employed in making the neceſſary preparations [c] (F).

[b] Idem ibid.

In the mean time, Antiochus being informed at Epheſus that Flaminius, who was then at the head of the Roman troops in Greece, was making great preparations for a new war, and apprehending that he might fall upon his ſon Seleucus, who was buſy in rebuilding Lyſimachia in Thrace, ſent deputies to Flaminius to propoſe an alliance with Rome. By this embaſſy Antiochus deſigned only to gain time, and diſcover what the Romans were doing. Flaminius anſwered the

[c] Liv. l. xxxiii. in fine. Juſtin. l. xxxi. c. 1. & 2. Æmil. Prob. in Hannib.

(F) Cicero tells us (48), that, while Hannibal was at Epheſus, a peripatetic philoſopher by name Phormio, having made an elegant, and, as he thought, wiſe ſpeech in his ſchool concerning the duty and office of a commander, how he ſhould draw up his men in battalia, advance againſt the enemy, retire, rally, &c. Hanibal, who was preſent, after having heard him ſome time with a great deal of patience, could not help crying out at laſt, I have heard in my days many an old fool, but never ſuch a fool as Phormio. Whence Tully concludes, that the military art is not to be learnt from books in the cloſet, but by actions in the field.

(48) Cic. de. Oratore. l. ii.

the envoys, that his power was expired ſince the departure of the ten commiſſioners, who had been ſent to ſettle the affairs of Greece and Macedon; wherefore, if their maſter deſired to treat with the republic, he might ſend an embaſſy to Rome, where the ſenate would examine his propoſals [d]. When the embaſſadors returned to Epheſus with this anſwer, Antiochus, not having yet made the neceſſary preparations for the war he deſigned, in order to gain more time, reſolved to ſend a new embaſſy to Rome, and accordingly ordered Menippus, Hegeſinax, and Lyſias to depart immediately, and deſire of the Roman ſenate in his name the friendſhip and alliance of the republic. On their arrival at Rome they were not received with that civility and regard, which the dignity and reputation of their maſter deſerved; the propoſal they made was not at all reliſhed by the major part of the ſenators; the ſenate pretended to compound with them, and ſet bounds to their maſter's pretenſions; nay, before they gave their anſwer, they took indirect means to affront the embaſſadors, they would not admit them into the ſenate, but referred them to the ten commiſſioners, who had been formerly ſent into Macedonia, to conclude a peace with Philip and ſettle the affairs of Greece. Flaminius, who was then at Rome, was at the head of the commiſſion, which did not a little diſpleaſe the embaſſadors; for they remembered how he had received the embaſſy ſent him by their maſter, while he commanded the Roman forces in Greece. However, the embaſſadors appeared before this new court, when Menippus expreſſed himſelf in the following manner: Why are all theſe delays made, and indirect methods taken to give us a plain anſwer? Our propoſal is very plain, and contains no manner of difficulty; we deſire the friendſhip and alliance of the Roman people. We do not come to treat with you as a conquered people with their conqueror, or as nations at war with one another, to ſettle their differences in an amicable manner. Antiochus and the Romans are neither upon the foot of enemies, or of conquerors. Why then do you pretend to give law to us? What right have you to diſpoſe of the cities of Aſia and Europe? What authority have you to direct us to withdraw our gariſons from ſome places, and not to ſeize others? You may indeed treat Philip in this manner; but do the laws of nations give you a right to aſſume ſuch an authority over Antiochus? Flaminius anſwered this diſcourſe of Menippus

[d] Liv. l. xxxiv. c. 24.

Menippus with an imperious air, in the following terms: Since you inſiſt upon a direct anſwer, I will give you one: Antiochus ſhall not be our friend and ally, but upon two conditions. The firſt is, that he keep within the bounds of Aſia. The ſecond, that if he comes into Europe, he ſhall not take it amiſs, that the Romans protect the Greek cities in Aſia, and enter into an alliance with them. At theſe words Hegeſianax could not help crying out, What injuſtice! your deſign plainly is to diſpoſſeſs Antiochus of the dominions of his anceſtors. The Cherſoneſus and all Thrace belonged to his great-grandfather, whoſe right has deſcended intire to him. The poſſeſſion which he has lately taken of his inheritance, was no more than reſcuing it out of the hands of the uſurpers. Has Rome ſo good a right as this to the Greek cities in Europe and Aſia? By what title do you pretend to juſtify your conquering them, or your depriving the king of Syria of them? He deſires indeed your friendſhip, but in an honourable way; he is not fond of purchaſing it at ſo dear a rate. To theſe ſolid reaſons Flaminius could give no other anſwer, but that Rome was determined to purſue the reſolution ſhe had taken of procuring all the Greeks their liberty. Æolis and Ionia, ſaid he, are inhabited by colonies from Greece; and we have formed a deſign of ſetting all the Greeks at liberty. Thoſe of Europe are already ſecured againſt the tyranny of Philip, and it is now our buſineſs to protect thoſe of Aſia againſt the power of Antiochus: what can be more humane or commendable? This ſpeech of Flaminius confounded, if Livy is to be credited, Hegeſianax, who, by his ſilence, ſays he, ſhewed his confuſion. But, with that great hiſtorian's leave, nothing can be weaker than the principle on which Flaminius argued; for if Thrace, Æolis, and Ionia belonged to Antiochus by an antient conqueſt, could the pretence of reſtoring them to their liberty be a juſt reaſon for withdrawing them from their obedience to their lawful ſovereign? the deſign of ſetting a prince's ſubjects at liberty, is not ſurely a ſufficient reaſon for others to make war upon him: it muſt therefore be owned, that the war, which Rome waged with Antiochus, was founded on ambition, and not on juſtice. The final anſwer of the ten commiſſioners was this: Take your choice, either let Antiochus forbear ever ſetting foot in Europe, or not be ſurprized if we ſend our troops over into Aſia. The embaſſadors declared, that their maſter would not enter enter into an alliance with Rome upon ſuch diſhonourable terms, but would prefer a war to the loſs of his antient right to vaſt countries in Europe and Aſia. [e]. It is not improbable, that Antiochus made theſe firſt advances in aſking the friendſhip of the Romans, purely to throw all the blame of a rupture upon them; for in effect he was already determined upon a war, and making great preparations for the carrying it on both by ſea and land.

Hannibal endeavours to draw Carthage into a confederacy with Antiochus.

HANNIBAL, who kept conſtantly with Antiochus, encouraging him to declare war with Rome, and inſpiring him with the hatred he himſelf bore to that imperious republic, made an attempt to engage his own nation in the party he had lately embraced. He had ſtill many friends at Carthage; however, he did not think it ſafe to treat with them by letters, but pitched upon a foreign merchant, who was come to trade at Epheſus, where Hannibal was then reſiding with Antiochus. His name was Ariſto, and he ſeemed to be mighty well qualified for any difficult negotiation. As he was by birth a Tyrian, he underſtood the Carthaginian language, the Tyrians and Carthaginians being, as it were, but one people. Beſides, he was a man of great addreſs, intrepidity and reſolution, and Hannibal had more than once experienced his ſkill in buſineſs, having employed him in the execution of ſeveral important commiſſions; he therefore gave him proper inſtructions, told him the names of thoſe he might confide in, and of ſuch as he ought to ſuſpect, and, without committing any thing to writing, taught him ſeveral ſigns, by which he might ſatisfy his friends that he acted in his name. Ariſto, with theſe inſtructions, ſet out for Carthage, and arriving there was taken for a Carthaginian. He did not therefore make himſelf known to any but Hannibal's friends, ſoliciting them, in his name, to take up arms once more againſt their old enemy, and join many other nations that were ready to fall upon Rome, and in all likelihood to overpower her. He diſcovered to them the deſign Antiochus had formed of ſending Hannibal to revive the war in Italy, &c. But tho' the Tyrian carried on his negotiations with all the ſecrecy and circumſpection he could, yet his frequent viſits to the leading men of Hannibal's faction betrayed him, and at length one of the oppoſite party declared in the public ſenate, that he had certain intelligence of dangerous intrigues, which were carrying on by one Ariſto in favour of

[e] Liv. ibid c. 59.

of Antiochus, and that a ſtorm was ready to break out, which would utterly deſtroy the Carthaginian republic. Hereupon the ſenators all with one voice cried out, that Ariſto ought to be ſeized, and embaſſadors ſent to Rome to deliver him up to the ſenate. Ariſto was therefore cited to appear, which he did without betraying the leaſt fear; nay, he defied them all to produce any proof of his being ſent by Hannibal, or carrying on intrigues of any ſort whatſoever; but as he could not give a good account of his buſineſs at Carthage, and had been obſerved to make frequent and private viſits to thoſe of Hannibal's faction, ſome were for ſeizing, and puniſhing him, as an emiſſary ſent by Hannibal to draw their republic into new troubles; but others pleaded in his behalf, remonſtrating, that if they arreſted him upon bare ſuſpicions, no foreign merchants would, for the future, venture to come into their ports, by which means they ſhould be deprived of the moſt valuable branch of their revenues; beſides, as the ſubjects of their republic were continually trading to all the ports of the Mediterranean, other nations, eſpecially the Tyrians, would not fail to make reprizals, which would put a ſtop to their trade, without which their republic could not ſubſiſt. Theſe conſiderations ſuſpended, for ſome days, the arreſt of the Tyrian, who took this opportunity to make his eſcape, having kept, the whole time he was at Carthage, his ſhip in a readineſs to ſet ſail; but, before he went off, he made uſe of a ſtratagem, which ſeemed calculated to make the Romans ſuſpect the whole ſenate. In the duſk of the evening he went privately into the hall where public audiences were given, and, over the preſident's ſeat, affixed the following words in capitals: Ariſto had no orders to treat with private perſons, but with the ſenate of Carthage. His deſign in this was to prevent Hannibal's friends from being ſuſpected, or brought into troubles, and to raiſe diſturbances in the city. Accordingly the ſight of this writing put the whole city in a ferment; ſome were for taking part with Antiochus in his wars with Rome, others for keeping to their late engagements with a republic, whoſe ſuperiority they had already experienced, and whoſe vengeance they dreaded. The latter party prevailed, and an embaſſy was ſent to Rome, to inform the ſenate of what had paſſed. As for Ariſto, he ſet ſail that very night, and got ſafe to Epheſus, where he was amply rewarded warded by Hannibal, tho' his negotiations had failed of the desired effect [f].

ANTIOCHUS in the mean-time, without declaring his intentions, continued his preparations for the war he was resolved to make upon the Romans; and, in order to strengthen himself by new alliances, went to Raphia (G), and there married his daughter Cleopatra to Ptolemy Epiphanes king of Egypt, to whom she had been some years before betrothed. The princess's portion was Cœle-Syria, Phœnice, Judæa and Samaria, but upon this condition, that the revenues of these four provinces should be equally divided between the father and son-in-law. Some writers tell us, that Antiochus had no other view at first in marrying his daughter to Ptolemy, but to have a fair opportunity, by her means, of dispatching him, and seizing the kingdom for himself; but that virtuous queen preferred the regard she owed to her husband to the ambitious designs of her father. On his return from Raphia to Antioch, he married Antiochis his second daughter to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia. The third was designed for Eumenes king of Pergamus, in order to draw off that brave prince from his antient alliance with Rome. With this view he caused the match to be proposed to the king of Pergamus and his two brothers, Attalus and Philetærus. His two brothers highly approved of it, thinking it a very honourable and advantageous match; but the young king himself judged otherwise of it, thinking it adviseable to prefer the alliance of the Romans to that of Antiochus. He told his brothers, that, if he married the daughter of Antiochus, he could not help engaging with him in his wars against the Romans, who, if they should get the better of Antiochus, as he had reason to believe they might, would certainly drive him out of his kingdom. On the other hand, if Antiochus should conquer, no advantage would accrue from thence to him, it being manifest, that Antiochus aimed at the sovereignty of all Asia; and if he accomplished his designs, he might perhaps leave him, as being his son-in-law, on the throne, but would, at the same time, require such subjection and [f] Liv. l. xxxiv. Justin. l. xxxi. c. 3, 4. Appian. in Syriac. p. 89. 90.

(G) Strabo and Livy place Raphia in Phænice; Ptolemy makes it a city of Samaria, and Pliny of Idumæa; but as it stood near Gaza, it is counted by other geographers among the cities of Palestine.

and dependance from him, as would ſowr all the pleaſure of reigning. Theſe reflections made Eumenes reject the offer made him by the king of Syria, and continue attached to the Romans. The event ſufficiently proved the wiſdom of his choice [g].

ANTIOCHUS had no ſooner ſolemnized theſe marriages, but he haſtened back into Aſia Minor, and arrived at Epheſus in the depth of winter. From thence, in the beginning of the ſpring, he marched againſt the Piſidians, who ſtill held out againſt him, and made himſelf maſter of all the country round Selga, a city on the banks of the river Ceſtrius (H). The Romans, hearing of the progreſs he made in Piſidia, and being informed by their friends in Aſia, that moſt of the eaſtern princes were ready to declare for Antiochus, in order to avert the evil conſequences of an alliance, into which all Aſia ſeemed to have entered, and at the ſame time to have a certain knowledge of the ſtate of affairs in thoſe diſtant regions, thought it neceſſary to ſend embaſſadors to the king of Syria, with orders to viſit the coaſts of Aſia and Greece, and there ſee what ſtates or republics ſeemed to waver between Antiochus and Rome. Three perſons of diſtinction, who had been already employed in negotiations with the princes of the eaſt, were pitched upon for this embaſſy, viz. P. Sulpicius, P. Villius, and P. Ælius, three of the ten commiſſioners who had ſettled affairs in Greece and Macedon. Livy, on the authority of ſome hiſtorians, tells us, that Scipio was in this embaſſy, and that, on this occaſion, Hannibal gave him that celebrated anſwer, when, ſpeaking of great commanders, he named Alexander in the firſt place, Pyrrhus in the ſecond, and himſelf in the third. Some authors are of opinion that Scipio was not in this commiſſion, and conſequently look upon the conference between him and Hannibal as a mere fiction; but this point we ſhall examine in a more [g] Liv. l. xxxv. & xxxvii. Appian. in Syriac. p. 88. Hieron. in Daniel. c. 11. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 3. Polyb. legat. 25.

(H) The name of Selga is corrupted in moſt copies of Livy. Gelenius is of opinion, that Livy means the city of Selga, which ſtood on a mountain near the borders of Pamphylia; and for this reaſon ſome modern geographers place it among the cities of that province. Niger calls it Philadelphia. Glarean, inſtead of Sica and Sita, which we find in the text, reads Sida, which was a city of Pamphylia near Piſidia, at a ſmall diſtance from the mouth of the river Eurymedon.

A new embaſſy ſent by the Romans to Antiochus more proper place. The embaſſadors ſet out from Rome, and, purſuant to their directions, landed at Elœa (I) in the kingdom of Pergamus, where they found king Eumenes ready to take up arms againſt Antiochus. As this prince was ſtill in Piſidia, and Hannibal waited for him at Epheſus, the Roman embaſſadors went thither to viſit Hannibal, being ordered by the ſenate to gain him over, if poſſible, or at leaſt by their civilities, to make Antiochus ſuſpect him as keeping a ſecret intelligence with his enemies. The laſt of theſe deſigns had the deſired effect, as we ſhall ſoon ſee, Villius, and, if Claudius Quadrigarius is to be credited, Scipio paying him frequent viſits, and ſhewing a particular regard for him. In one of theſe viſits they reproached him, in a friendly manner, with his flight from Carthage, aſſuring him, that Rome would have protected him againſt his domeſtic enemies; they adviſed him to return to his own country, where he ſhould, under the protection of Rome, be reinſtated in all his former honours; they told him, that Rome never ſpoke of him but with admiration, the terror which he had formerly ſtruck into her, being changed into eſteem, &c. Hannibal was greatly pleaſed with theſe fine ſpeeches; but nevertheleſs could not be prevailed upon either to return to Carthage, or abandon the cauſe of Antiochus, which he had eſpouſed. He often appeared in public with the Roman embaſſadors, frequently converſed with them in private, and laſtly, even ſuffered them to lodge with him in the ſame houſe, not being well appriſed, as ſagacious as he was, of the bad conſequences that might attend his converſing thus familiarly with the Roman envoys. In effect, Antiochus was informed of it in Piſidia, and, from that time, began to ſuſpect him, fancying that he had reconciled himſelf to Rome; he was therefore no more employed in making the neceſſary preparations for the war, Antiochus not thinking it ſafe to depend upon him in matters of ſuch importance [h].

FROM

[h] Liv. l. xxxiv, xxxv. Juſtin, l. xxxi. c. 4. Front. Stratag. l. i. c. 8. Appian. in Syriac. p. 90, 91.

(I) Elœa bordered upon Great Myſia, about twenty miles from Pergamus, and ſtood on the Ægean ſea, near the mouth of the Caicus, over-gainſt Metelina, and had a convenient harbour. It is at preſent a ſmall village, known by the name of Alea. The antient city of Elœa was divided from Leſbos by an arm of the ſea, called the gulph of Elœa.

FROM Epheſus the embaſſadors advanced to Apamea in Phrygia, with a deſign to wait there for Antiochus, who being informed of their arrival, went thither to hear their propoſals. As the Romans were too proud to abate any thing of their pretenſions, they ſtill inſiſted on Antiochus's confining himſelf to Aſia; or his giving up ſome cities which he actually poſſeſſed, and his renouncing all his rights in Europe, particularly to Thrace and the Cherſoneſus; ſo that the conference between the king and the embaſſadors was warm, but not long, a melancholy piece of news which the king received having ſoon put an end to it. He received advice, that his ſon Antiochus, a prince of great merit, and one who had ſignalized himſelf by a conduct worthy of an hero, was dead in Syria, whither he had been ſent to keep thoſe provinces in their duty. What heightned the king's grief on this occaſion was, a report ſpread abroad, that he, growing jealous of his riſing merit, had cauſed him to be poiſoned by the eunuchs of his court. Though this report had no good foundation, it was neceſſary for the king to deſtroy it, by the appearance of an extraordinary grief. The embaſſadors were therefore diſmiſſed without concluding any thing, and Antiochus purſued his rout to Epheſus, where Hannibal, who was ſtill in that city, ſoon found, that he was not the ſame favourite as formerly; for Antiochus, under pretence of ſolitude, ſhut himſelf up in his palace, and refuſed the Carthaginian admittance. The king ſpent his whole time there in private conferences with Minio his ſole confident. Minio was a courtier, who had no knowledge of foreign affairs, and judged of his maſter's war with the Romans only by the victories he had gained in the eaſt. He did not doubt in the leaſt, but Antiochus, who had defeated Achœus, Molo, Alexander, and often the king of Egypt, would, in like manner, humble the haughty Romans; being therefore big with this expectation, he deſired the king to ſend for the Roman embaſſadors, who were then at Pergamus, and undertook to anſwer them in his name. Antiochus, being tired with ſo many uſeleſs conferences, and his mourning ſerving him for a juſt pretence to treat with the Romans for the future only by his favourites, complied with his requeſt, and the embaſſadors were accordingly ſent for. When they arrived, the proud Minio received them with more haughtineſs than Antiochus himſelf would have done. What he chiefly urged in behalf of his maſter's pretenſions was, That he had as good a right to the countries poſſeſſed by the eaſtern Greeks, whom he or his anceſtors had conquered, as the Romans had to thoſe of the weſtern Greeks in Italy and Sicily. All the Greek colonies, ſaid Minio, have, according to you, a right to the general liberty of Greece; but does not Rome herſelf act in a direct oppoſition to this pretty ſpeculation? Are there not cities in Italy which are as much Grecian as thoſe in Aſia? Were not Rhegium, Naples, and Tarentum built by Greeks? and yet you exclude them from this general infranchiſement, and keep them in ſubjection to your republic. What! can you keep the eaſtern part of Italy, and Sicily, the fineſt iſland in the ſea, in ſlavery, and, at the ſame time, make war upon Antiochus, becauſe he keeps Ionia, Æolis, and Thrace under his juriſdiction? What is the difference between the ſlavery of Smyrna and Lampſacus on one ſide, and that of Tarentum and Siracuſe on the other? The right Antiochus has to Ionia, Æolis, and Thrace was derived to him from his anceſtors; whereas Rome owes her poſſeſſing of Great Greece in Italy, and all the whole iſland of Sicily, to conqueſt. He concluded his ſpeech by deſiring them not to uſe querks or impertinent words, but to give a direct anſwer to this queſtion, Why does not Rome maintain the liberty of the weſtern Greeks, ſince ſhe is ſo zealous for that of the eaſtern? Sulpitius endeavoured to anſwer this demand, by ſaying, That Rome, ever ſince ſhe conquered thoſe cities, had held them without any interruption, they never having paſſed into any other hands from the time they were firſt ſubdued by the republic; whereas the Greek countries poſſeſſed or claimed by Antiochus, tho' formerly conquered by his anceſtors, had undergone, ſince that time, many changes. Some, ſaid he, have been ſubject to Philip or Ptolemy; others have recovered their liberty; can therefore any thiag be more juſt and humane than to reſtore it to them[i]? The reaſoning of the Roman was, as every one ſees, more ſpecious than ſolid; ſo that all things conſidered, the war which the Romans made upon the king of Syria was unjuſt, and the effect only of their unbounded ambition. However, Minio, by his maſter's order, offered to give up his claim to ſome Greek cities in Aſia, and to maintain the liberty of Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus; nay, he even conſented, that theſe free ſtates ſhould enter into an alliance with Rome; but the embaſſadors were not ſatisfied, and ſtill inſiſted, that Ionia and Æolis ſhould partake of the common liberty liberty of Greece. This Antiochus oppoſed, and the embaſſadors returned to Italy, leaving matters in the ſame ſituation they had found them on their firſt arrival [k].

Hannibal over-reached by the Roman envoys

[i] Liv. ibid Appian. in Syriac. p. 92.

THEY were no ſooner gone but Antiochus called a council of war, compoſed of all the chief officers of his army, as well foreigners as Syrians. Hannibal alone was excluded from it, his too familiar conferences with the Roman envoys having made Antiochus jealous of him. The queſtion which the king put to the council was, Whether it was proper to make war with the Romans? The council knew the king's inclinations, and were therefore all zealous for a war, that being the ſureſt way to make their court, and gain his confidence. Alexander of Acarnania, who had formerly ſerved Philip and was now in great favour with Antiochus, aſſured the king, that the Macedonians would join him as ſoon as he landed in Greece; and that, as the Ætolians and Nabis tyrant of Sparta had taken up arms, and were ready to declare for him, he could not fail of ſucceſs; but at the ſame time he adviſed him to diſmiſs Hannibal, and ſend him back to his own country. His preſence there, ſaid he, will alone be ſufficient to keep the Romans in awe, and increaſe their diffidence. The hopes, in all likelihood, of commanding the army himſelf, was what induced the Acarnanian to give this advice; but, however that be, Antiochus from that time reſolved to declare war with the Romans.

Antiochus reſolved upon a war with the Romans.

IN the mean time Hannibal plainly ſeeing, by the king's behaviour to him, that he had taken umbrage at his conduct, thought it neceſſary to undeceive him; having therefore demanded, and, with much-ado, obtained a private audience, he told the king, that when he was ſcarce nine years old, he began to be an irreconcileable enemy to the Romans, his father Hamilcar having made him ſwear upon the altars, that he would never lay aſide his hatred to Rome but with his life; that he had ever acted ſuitable to that oath, having made war with thoſe republicans for thirty years together; that he had now left his native country for no other reaſon but to keep more ſtrictly to theſe engagements; that this animoſity brought him into Aſia, and the eager deſire he had of doing what miſchief he could to that proud and imperious republic, had led him into his dominions. If you, ſaid the Carthaginian, diſdain my aſſiſtance, guided by the ſame hatred, I will fly to every part of the world where there are ſoldiers and arms, to raiſe up new enemies againſt Rome. I hate them

Hanibal's ſpeech to Antiochus, who diſtruſted him.

[k] Idem ibid.

them, and am hated by them. So long as you are reſolved t make war upon them, you may conſider Hannibal as the firſ of your friends; but if there be any motives which inclin you to peace, take counſel of others, not of me. I ſeek for nothing but war, and if I cannot find it here, I will b gone, and leave the place, I ought to hold near you, t courtiers, who ſeek my ruin only to aggrandize themſelves Antiochus, ſtruck with theſe words, ſeemed to be reconcile to him. He then told the king, That he did not, by an means, approve of the advice which Alexander the Acar nanian had given him. No, ſaid he, it is not in Greece but in Italy that you can make yourſelf formidable. Th His opinion with relation to the war. Romans are invincible every-where but on their own conti nent. You muſt employ the forces of the Italians againſt the maſters of Italy. Indeed any other nation would find i difficult to tranſport troops into the eaſt; but the Romans wil tire you out even here by their conſtancy. Their troops wil over run theſe countries like a torrent in a few months
This I take the liberty to tell you now in private, and ſhall not be afraid to repeat the ſame things in public in the face of your court. Have I not ſome right to teach your general how to make war with the Romans? They were never able to conquer me ſo long as I kept footing in Italy; but Carthage recalled me, and I met with a conqueror in Africa who could not hurt me in Italy. Take therefore my advice, carry your troops over into Italy, and ſtop the inundation which threatens you at the ſpring head[1]. This diſcourſe would have made a laſting impreſſion in the mind o Antiochus, had not the many flatterers about him, who were jealous of Hannibal, effaced it; and lucky it was for Rome that Hannibal's ſcheme was thus oppoſed; for the Brutii, Sa-lentini, Lucani, Samnites, and the greateſt part of the eaſt of Italy were ready to follow his ſtandards, while the Gauls in the weſt would have obliged the Romans to divide their forces; ſo that Rome would have relapſed into the ſame dangers from which Scipio had delivered her.

THE Romans, not knowing yet for certain whether An-tiochus would accept or not the conditions offered him, made no preparations for war till the return of their embaſſadors but then they began to take proper meaſures to prevent the evils that threatened them, both in Greece, where the Ætoli-ans were ready to revolt, and in Aſia, where Antiochus was making vaſt preparations. Nothing now kept this prince in Aſia

[1] Liv. ibid.

Asia, but an expedition which he had undertaken against the cities of Smyrna, Lampsacus, and Alexandria in Troas, which Antiochus thought dangerous to leave behind him unreduced. The Ætolians being, from confederates of the Romans, now become their enemies, had sent embassadors to him, inviting him over into Greece. Thoas, the brother of Dicæarchus, then prætor of Ætolia, who was at the head of this embassy, assured Antiochus, that the Ætolians would join him as soon as he landed in Greece, with all their forces, and act in concert with him; that Philip king of Macedon, Nabis king of Lacedæmon, and several other Greek powers, who hated the Romans in their hearts, would declare against them. He observed in his speech to the king, that the Romans by drawing their forces out of Greece, had left it in a defenceless condition; that this was the best opportunity he could wish for to possess himself of that country; that the Greeks would all receive him with open arms the instant he came among them, &c. This soothing description of the state of Greece prevailed so far with Antiochus, that he resolved to drop the design of reducing the three above-mentioned cities, and hasten into Europe, without even waiting for the forces that were in full march from Syria to join him. Accordingly, having first gone to Ilium, and there offered a sacrifice to Minerva, he embarked for Greece, with no more than ten thousand foot, five hundred horse, and six elephants, which were scarce enough to take possession of the country, had it been wholly unguarded. With these forces he arrived in the island of Eubæa, about the end of the summer, and from thence passed to Demetrias in Thessaly, where he summoned all the chief officers of his army, to consult with them about the future operations of the war. On this occasion Hannibal, who was admitted to the council, and asked his opinion in the first place, insisted on what he had often declared, viz. That the Romans were not to be conquered but in Italy, and therefore it had been his constant advice to begin the war there; however, since other measures had been taken, and the king was then in Greece, it was his opinion, in the present state of affairs, that the king should send immediately for all his forces out of Asia, without depending upon the Ætolians or other Greek allies, who, he foresaw, would deceive him; and that the instant these forces arrived, he should march with them to those coasts of Greece which lie over-against Italy, and there likewise keep his fleet, one half of which should be employed to ravage and alarm the Antiochus crosses over into Greece. Year after the flood 2807. Before Christ 192.

the coaſts of Italy, and the other kept in ſome harbour near him, to make ſhew of paſſing over, and to be, in effect, ready to croſs over, in caſe a favourable opportunity ſhould offer. By this means, ſaid he, the Romans will be kept at home to guard their own coaſts; and this, at the ſame time, will be the beſt method of carrying the war into Italy, the only place where they can be conquered. This advice was undoubtedly the beſt that could then be given to Antiochus; but he complied with it only in that particular which related to the troops of Aſia, ſending immediately orders to Polyxenides his admiral to tranſport them into Greece. With regard to all the reſt of Hannibal's plan, the flatterers about the court diverted the king from putting it in execution, aſſuring him, that he could not fail of ſucceſs; that, ſhould he follow Hannibal's plan, all the glory would be aſcribed to the Carthaginian who had formed it; that it was proper the king ſhould have all the honour of this expedition, and therefore they adviſed him to follow his own counſels, without hearkening any more to Hannibal. After this the king went to Lamia, and there being inveſted with the chief command of the Ætolians, and declared their generaliſſimo, he returned to Eubœa, where he made himſelf maſter of Chalcis, and took up his winter-quarters in that city [m]. There he fell in love with the daughter of a Chalcidian called Cleoptolemus, in whoſe houſe he lodged; and notwithſtanding the diſproportion of her age, ſhe being under twenty, and he upwards of fifty, married her, and paſſed the remainder of the winter in nuptial rejoicings and revellings, with as much ſecurity as in the moſt peaceable times. The example of the king infected the whole army, both officers and ſoldiers abandoning themſelves to idleneſs and debauchery. He was not rouzed out of this lethargy, till news was brought him, that Acilius the Roman conſul was advancing full march againſt him at the head of twenty thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe. All he could do on this alarm, was to ſeize the famous ſtreights of Thermopylæ, and ſend to the Ætolians for more forces; for the inclemency of the weather, and contrary winds having prevented the arrival of the Aſiatic troops, which Polyxenidas was bringing over, the king had only thoſe forces with him which he had brought the year before; but before the Ætolians

[m] Liv. l. xxxvi. Juſtin. l. xxxi. c. 5 & 6. Appian. in Syriac. p. 93, 94.

Ætolians could come to his assistance, the Romans having forced, with incredible bravery, the passes of Thermopylæ, cut the king's army in pieces, Antiochus himself having narrowly escaped with only five hundred men to Chalcis [n]. But of this battle and the surrender of the cities and strong holds that followed it, we have already given a particular and distinct account in our history of Greece. Antiochus did not stay long at Chalcis, but from thence made all the haste he could to his fleet, and going on board with the poor remains of his shattered army, passed over to Ephesus, carrying with him his young wife; and thinking himself safe there from the Romans, he intirely neglected every thing that could secure him against so formidable an enemy. His flatterers had made him believe, that they would never venture over into Asia; but Hannibal, who had regained his confidence, rouzed him out of the idle and indolent life, into which he was relapsed, telling him, that as the Roman fleet was no less formidable than their land-forces, he was surprized that they had not yet crossed over into Asia; that they would without all doubt soon appear on the coasts, and oblige him to fight both by sea and land for the dominion of Asia; and that he must resolve either to renounce his pretensions to so wealthy a country, or to defend it sword in hand. The king was struck with this speech, and therefore sent to hasten the march of his troops from the eastern provinces, which were not yet arrived. He likewise caused his fleet to be equipped with all possible expedition, and going on board of it himself set sail for the Thracian Chersonesus, where he fortified Lysimachia, as also Sestos and Abydos, and the other cities in that neighbourhood, to prevent the Romans from crossing the Hellespont into Asia. In the mean time Polyxenidas, who was then at Ephesus, having received advice that the Roman fleet had appeared off Delos, dispatched a messenger to acquaint Antiochus therewith. Upon this intelligence the king hastened back to Ephesus, and having there summoned a council of war, it was unanimously resolved that Polyxenidas the Syrian admiral, should sail out in search of the Roman fleet, and venture an engagement. Accordingly the fleet, to the number of an hundred, or, as others will have it, two hundred sail, weighed anchor, steering their course towards Phocœa in Æolis. The Roman fleet, commanded by C. Livius, and con-consisting of fourscore ships, upon intelligence that the Syrians were in search of them, left the road of Delos, and having doubled the cape of Corycus in Ionia, met the enemy's fleet near Cyssus. Both fleets advanced in line of battle, and engaged with the utmost fury; victory was long doubtful, Livius having the advantage in the right wing, and Polyxenidas in the left. At length Eumenes king of Pergamus, who had been placed in the rear with fifteen ships, falling upon Polyxenidas, put the enemy's right wing in disorder, and thereby determined the fate of the day. The Syrians on all sides betook themselves to flight, and Livius, pursuing them, took thirty of their ships after having sunk ten in the engagement. The Romans lost but one ship, which was taken in the very beginning of the fight; but the whole crew leaped over-board, and escaped slavery by swimming to the other Roman vessels. Polyxenidas put in no-where till he got to Ephesus, whither Livius pursued him; but finding that he would not venture out, he sent Eumenes and the Rhodians home, and retired himself to Canæ a port in Mysia, where he drew his ships ashore for the ensuing winter, after having fortified the place with a ditch and rampart [p].

Antiochus defeated at Thermopylæ Year of the flood 2803. Before Christ 191.

Antiochus returns into Asia.

[n] Liv. ibid. Plut. in Catone. Appian. Front. l. 2. stratag.

The fleet of Antiochus defeated by the Romans.

In the mean time Antiochus was at Magnesia assembling there his land-forces. When news was brought him that his fleet had been defeated at Corycus, he hastened to the sea-coast, and applied himself with great care to the fitting out of a new fleet, being unwilling to part with the mastery of those seas. He refitted the ships which had escaped the late defeat, built new ones, and dispatched Hannibal into Syria to bring from thence the Syrian and Phœnician fleets for their reinforcement. He likewise ordered his son Seleucus with one part of the army into Æolis to watch the Roman fleet, and keep that country in awe; the rest of the troops he kept some time with himself, and then put them into winter-quarters in the neighbouring towns of Phrygia [q].

The next year the Romans appointed L. Cornelius Scipio consul to command the land-forces in room of Acilius, and L. Æmilius Rhegillus to carry on the war by sea in the place of C. Livius. The great Scipio Africanus served under Cornelius his brother in quality of his lieutenant, to the unspeakable joy of the Romans, who were highly delighted with the expectation of seeing Scipio and Hannibal once more enter enter the liſts. They were both now ſubalterns, one under a conſul, the other under a king; and this new ſcene drew the attention of all nations.

[p] Liv. l. xxxvi. Appian. in Syriac. p. 99. [q] Liv. l. xxxvi. & xxxvii. Appian. ibid. & p. 100.

THE two brothers embarqued at Brunduſium with thirteen thouſand men, including auxiliaries and voluntiers, and landed at Apollonia. From thence they marched through Epirus and Theſſaly to Amphiſſa, where Acilius, who was beſieging that place, reſigned the command of his two legions to the conſul. The two Scipios, who were in haſte to paſs over into Aſia, which was the chief object of their ambition, granted the Ætolians a ſix months truce, that they might have full time to ſend a new embaſſy to Rome, and purſued their march through Macedon and Thrace to the Helleſpont. Philip had prepared every thing that could render their paſſage through his dominions agreeable to them. He came in perſon to meet them on his frontiers, and ſeemed to make it his duty, as well as pleaſure, to attend them, diſcovering in the entertainments, which he gave the chief officers of the army, ſuch a politeneſs as was very pleaſing to Scipio Africanus. In return for the extraordinary kindneſs he had ſhewn them, the two brothers remitted him in the name of the republic the ſums which yet remained to be annually paid by him, according to the agreement between him and Flaminius. In the mean time Livius, the Roman admiral, being joined by the Rhodian fleet and that of Eumenes, ſailed with the latter from Canæ in Myſia, where he had wintered, to ſecure the ſtraits of the Helleſpont. With this view he made himſelf maſter of Seſtos on the ſide of Europe, and inveſted Abydos on the oppoſite ſhore; for theſe two cities ſtood oppoſite to one another in that part of the ſtrait where the paſſage into Aſia was the ſafeſt. While Livius was thus employed on the Helleſpont, Polyxenidas, having repaired the Syrian fleet, and being in a condition to put to ſea again, deſtroyed by a piece of treachery the greateſt part of the Rhodian fleet with Pauſiſtratus, who commanded it, as we have related at length in the hiſtory of Rhodes [r]. This diſaſter obliged Livius to raiſe the ſiege of Abydos, and haſten to the defence of the ſhips he had left in the harbour of Canæ in Myſia. Beſides Seleucus was making ſome progreſs on the coaſt of Aſia, and had already taken Phocœa, Cyme, and ſome other maritime places. It was therefore neceſſary to put a ſtop to the progreſs of the young prince, and retake Phocœa.

[r] Hiſt. Univerſ. Vol. VII. chap. i. ſect. 3.

Phocæa. But Livius, finding upon his arrival the garrison of Phocœa very numerous, he only made a descent, and ravaged the neighbouring territory. From thence he sailed to Samos, being attended thither by the fleet of the king of Pergamus. As for the Rhodians, the defeat of their fleet, and the loss of their admiral, sunk them almost into despair. However, they did not renounce their alliance with Rome, but fitting out twenty new gallies, they gave the command of them to Eudamus, who immediately joined the Roman fleet at Samos. Livius with this reinforcement left Samos, and sailing to Ephesus, insulted the Syrian fleet in that harbour. Some of the Romans landed and laid waste the neighbouring country; but the garrison of Ephesus, marching out against them, obliged them to quit their booty, and retire with precipitation on board their ships. The next day Livius challenged the Syrians to an engagement ashore, but they declining it, he returned to Samos, and there resigned the command of the fleet to Æmilius his successor (K), who immediately detatched him with some

(K) Livy tells us (49), that Æmilius no sooner took upon him the command of the fleet, but he summoned a council of war to advise with the chief officers about the first enterprize he should undertake. On this occasion Livius, whose command was just expired, being asked his opinion the first, gave it, says our historian, like an artful man, who was jealous before-hand of the success Æmilius might have. His pretence was very specious, but his real design was, to make Æmilius lose the whole campaign by engaging him in a trifling project; and it was therefore rejected. Had I continued in the command, said Livius, my design was to shut up the mouth of the port of Ephesus, and there keep the Syrian fleet confined. To this end I would have sunk some old barks filled with stones at the entrance into the harbour. Being by this means become sole master of the seas, I would have ravaged the coasts, and forced the maritime cities to surrender. Eumenes, who saw into Livius's design, replied thus: After we have stopped up the mouth of the port, shall the Roman fleet continue before it, or not? If it continues there, the enemy's fleet will be in better condition than ours. They will be covered and sheltered by a great city, which will be supplied by land from all parts of Asia. Whereas we shall be exposed to winds and tempests, and lose time in a road without gaining any advantage but that of continuing inactive, and giving the enemy leisure to make the necessary preparations against the ensuing campaign. If we do not continue before Ephesus, the Syrian fleet will ſome ſhips to attempt the reduction of Patara in Lycia, a place which was a great check upon the Rhodians, while in the enemy's hands. But Livius failed in his attempt, and ſoon after returned to Rome. As for Æmilius, he firſt appeared before Epheſus with the reſt of the Roman fleet, but was forced by a ſtorm to put out to ſea. Then calling to mind the affront the Romans had received before Patara, he flew thither with a deſign to beſiege the place; bůt the officers remonſtrating againſt the enterprize as dangerous to the allies, who in the abſence of the Roman fleet would be left to the mercy of the enemy, he returned to Samos, where he was near enough to watch the motions of the Syrians [s].

(49) Liv. l. xxxvii. c. 14.

Antiochus invades the kingdom of Pergamus.

WHILE theſe things were doing, Antiochus on one ſide, and his ſon Seleucus on the other, thinking that the Roman fleet was engaged in the ſiege of Patara, invaded the kingdom of Pergamus. Seleucus paſſing the Caicus from Æolis, where he had wintered, entered the dominions of Eumenes by the way of Æloea, while Antiochus advancing to Sardis, and from thence to the banks of the Caicus, encamped at a ſmall diſtance from his ſon. The king had in his army about four thouſand Gauls, whom he employed in plundering and laying waſte the country, while Seleucus at the head of his body appeared before Pergamus, the capital of the kingdom, threatening to beſiege it. But Eumenes, upon the firſt notice of the danger from his brother Attalus, whom he had left to take care of his dominions during his abſence, ſailed back to the port of Elœa, landed there, and reached his capital before the enemy had notice of his march. The Roman and Rhodian fleets followed him without delay; all the troops they had on board made a deſcent without oppoſition, and at the ſame time news came from all parts, that the Scipios were advancing by great marches through Macedon, would ſoon reach the Helleſpont, and be ready to enter Aſia, will without all doubt, clear the mouth of the port, and ſail out; ſo that we ſhall have loſt our time, labour, and expence to no purpoſe. Eudamus, the Rhodian admiral, diſapproved the project of Livius, without propoſing any other. But Epicrates, an inferior officer in the Rhodian fleet, was for ſending part of the fleet againſt Patara, and reducing that city. This propoſal was approved of, and Livius ordered to put it in execution.

[s] Liv. l. xxxvii.

Aſia. Upon this Antiochus, being ſtruck with as much terror as he had given Eumenes, retired to an Eminence near Elœa, and having intrenched himſelf there, ſent an embaſſy to Æmilius, deſiring to enter into a treaty with him. Æmilius, thinking it would greatly redound to his glory to conclude a peace before the Scipios arrived, readily hearkened to the propoſal, and deſired Eumenes and the Rhodians to come to his camp and aſſiſt at a council on the ſubject of Antiochus's propoſal. The Rhodians were not diſinclined to a peace; but Eumenes oppoſed it, and by his arguments prevailed upon the council to return this anſwer to the meſſengers of Antiochus, that they could not determine any thing before the arrival of the Scipios. Hereupon Antiochus, leaving his ſon to ravage the kingdom of Pergamus, marched into the country of Troas, which adhered to the Romans, and encamped near Adramyttium at the foot of mount Ida. Æmilius therefore accompanied by Eumenes haſtened to the aſſiſtance of thoſe faithful allies. But Attalus continued at Pergamus to make head againſt Seleucus, and was there reinforced by a thouſand foot and an hundred horſe ſent him from Achæa, under the command of one Diophanes, an officer of great courage and ſkill in military affairs; for with this ſmall body he ſallied out of the city, gained a conſiderable advantage over Seleucus, and obliged him to raiſe the ſiege of Pergamus, and quit the dominions of Eumenes [t] (L).

ANTIOCHUS

[t] Liv. ubi ſupra.

(L) The defence of Pergamus was chiefly owing to a reinforcement of the Achæans, who came thither very ſeaſonably, to the aſſiſtance of the yonng prince. Their commander, by name Diophanes, was an officer of diſtinction in his own country, had made his firſt campaign under the famous Philopœmen, and ſeemed to have imbibed all the excellencies of his great maſter. With his body of a thouſand foot and a hundred horſe, he harraſſed Seleucus to ſuch a degree, that he at length forced him to abandon the country, which he infeſted. Diophanes ſpent the two firſt days after his arrival in obſerving the Syrian intrenchments, and the ſteps they took to make themſelves maſters of the city, which they kept inveſted. He obſerved from the ramparts, that they poſted an advanced guard at the foot of an hill to keep the city in awe, and then diſperſing themſelves in the plains, pillaged the country. As no-body durſt venture out againſt the advanced guard, the Syrians pillaged the country without oppoſion. This inaction of the beſieged lulled the beſiegers into a ſecurity; inſomuch that they ſpent great part of their time in diverſions

ANTIOCHUS had no better ſucceſs in Troas; for Æmilius, ſupported by the confederate fleets, forced him to abandon Adramyttium; ſo that after he had taken by aſſault ſeveral defenceleſs cities in his way, he returned to Sardis. Hereupon the confederate fleets ſailed back to Samos, where they ſeparated; Æmilius continued there to watch the motions of Polyxenidas, Eumenes ſailed towards the Helleſpont, to get every thing ready for the paſſage of the Roman troops into Aſia, and Eudamus returned to Rhodes, there to receive

The Rodians defeat the Phœnician fleet commanded by Hannibal.

diverſions, and were often obſerved to fall a ſleep even upon guard. Diophanes therefore concluded that it would be no difficult matter to ſurprize them. He acquainted Attalus with his reſolution of attacking the advanced guard. That prince looking upon ſuch an expedition as a raſh attempt, was with muſt ado prevailed upon to conſent to it, However, ſubmitting his judgment to that of an old experienced officer, he at length gave him leave to march out at the head of his Achæans. All the citizens crowded to the ramparts to be ſpectators of the action, and there ſaw that the approach of ſo ſmall a body did not even draw the Syrians off from their ſports. At firſt Diophanes ſtood ſtill, as if he had marched out only to watch the enemy's motions. But when he obſerved that the enemy took no notice of him, he marched at the head of his hundred horſe directly up to a body of three hundred of the enemy, ordering his thouſand foot to attack four thouſand Syrians who were poſted near their three hundred horſe. The onſet was ſo ſudden, and the ſhout of the Achæans ſo formidable, that the enemy's horſe was immediately put in diſorder. Their infantry, having ſcarce had time to draw up, after a faint reſiſtance betook themſelves to flight, and were purſued with great ſlaughter by Diophanes. The next day the enemy poſted themſelves at a greater diſtance, and obſerved better diſcipline. However, Diophanes invited the citizens of Pergamus to march out with him, promiſing them a ſecond advantage. But the gariſon refuſing to follow him, he took with him his Achæans alone, who were glad to venture a ſecond action under his conduct. All the day was ſpent in watching one another, without any attack on either ſide. At ſun-ſet the Syrians withdrew to their camp; and this was the opportunity which Diophanes waited for. As the Syrian troops filed off in a line, the Achæans fell on their rear, and there made a moſt dreadful havock, the foremoſt haſtening their pace to reach the camp without daring to face about and relieve their companions. Theſe repeated advantages gained by Diophanes and his brave Achæans obliged Seleucus at laſt to raiſe the ſiege of Pergamus, and quit the dominions of Eumenes (50).

(50) Appian. in Syriac. & Liv. l. xxxvii. c. 20.

receive freſh reinforcements. The latter, receiving intelligence that a fleet was coming from Syria under the command of Hannibal, haſtened the equipment of his ſhips, ſailed out to meet the Carthaginian, who was now indeed out of his proper element, and with fewer ſhips intirely defeated him off Sida, a maritime city of Pamphylia, as we have related elſewhere.

ntiochus deavours gain over uſias king Bithynia.

UPON the news of this defeat, Antiochus, who was then at Sardis, being ſenſible of the imminent danger he was in, uſed all poſſible means to engage in the ſame war all the powers of Aſia. He began with Pruſias king of Bithynia, a potent prince, and then in a condition to bring into the field and maintain a numerous army. In order to draw him into his meaſures, Antiochus uſed the ſtrongeſt argument that can be made uſe of with ſovereign princes. He repreſented to him the ambitious views of the Romans, telling him that their main aim was to overturn monarchy in all places, and, under the ſpecious pretence of liberty, to ſolicit all nations to ſhake off the yoke of their kings; that after having ſubdued Philip and Nabis, they were now coming againſt him; and that if he ſhould be unfortunately overcome, the haughty conquerors would ſoon penetrate into the heart of Bithynia. The two Scipios, who were then on their march into Aſia, being informed of the endeavours Antiochus was uſing to engage Pruſias in the war, thought proper to put a ſtop to the intrigues of the king of Syria; and with that view diſpatched a meſſenger with a letter to Pruſias, wherein they obſerved, that it was the conſtant practice of the Romans to beſtow the greateſt honours on ſuch kings as ſought their alliance; Africanus mentioned ſeveral inſtances, which he himſelf had been concerned in; he ſaid, that in Spain ſeveral princes, who before they were favoured with the protection of the Romans, had made a very inconſiderable figure, were ſince become mighty kings; that Maſiniſſa had not only been reſtored to his kingdom, but that of Syphax had been given him, whereby he was become one of the moſt powerful potentates of the univerſe; that Philip and Nabis tho' vanquiſhed, had nevertheleſs been ſuffered to ſit peaceably on their thrones; that the tribute, which he had agreed to pay, had been lately remitted, and his ſon, who was an hoſtage at Rome, ſent back to him; that as for Nabis, they had left him in poſſeſſion of his crown, which he would have ſtill enjoyed, had he not loſt his life by the treachery of the Ætolians. This letter made a ſtrong impreſſion on the mind of Pruſias; but he was ſtill wavering between Antiochus and the Romans, till a new embaſſy quite fixed him. C. Livius, who had the laſt year commanded the fleet on the coaſt of Aſia, came from Rome to Bithynia, and made ſuch propoſals to the king in the name of his republic, as prevented him from entering into any engagements with the king of Syria [u].

ANTIOCHUS being thus diſappointed in the hopes he had entertained of winning over Pruſias to his intereſt, his whole dependence was on his fleet. He thought he could more effectually keep the Romans out of Aſia by recovering the maſtery of the ſea, than by guarding the ſhores of the Helleſpont with his land-forces. With this view he left Sardis and came to Epheſus, where Polyxenidas was waiting for him with a good number of ſhips, all well equipped, and ſtored with arms and proviſions. Hannibal had not yet joined him with the Phœnician fleet, being ſtill blocked up in the ports of Pamphilia. But, on the other hand, the Romans had not yet been reinforced by the gallies they expected from Rhodes, and the fleet of Eumenes was waiting for the Scipios on the coaſts of the Helleſpont. Antiochus therefore ordered Polyxenidas to engage the Romans once more at ſea. As for himſelf, he marched with his land-forces to Notium between Smyrna and Epheſus, and from thence to Colophon, which he inveſted. This was one of the moſt conſiderable cities of Ionia, and had been long troubleſome to Antiochus's fleet; for as it was ſituated on an eminence, the Colophonians diſcovered all that paſſed in the port of Epheſus, and gave the Romans notice of it. Antiochus expected that the Roman fleet would fly to the aſſiſtance of their allies, and his aim was to draw it out of the port of Samos, that his admiral might have an opportunity of attacking it. And indeed the Colophonians immediately diſpatched ſome of their citizens to Æmilius, deſiring his aſſiſtance againſt an enemy, which they had drawn upon themſelves only by their fidelity to Rome. This meſſage broke the admiral's meaſures, for he had determined to ſail to the Helleſpont with the firſt favourable wind, and aſſiſt the Scipios in their paſſage. However, he was prevailed upon by Eudamus, the Rhodian admiral, who had joined him with ſome gallies, to alter his ſcheme; and accordingly he ordered the fleet to be in a rea-

[u] Polyb. Legat. 22. Liv. l. xxxvii. Appian. in Syriac. 150, 151.

dineſs to ſet ſail. But before he attacked Antiochus, he reſolved to touch at Chios, and take in there ſome proviſions, the general magazine of the Romans both for their ſea and land-forces being there. From Chios he ſailed to the iſland of Teos, being informed that thoſe iſlanders had promiſed the king of Syria about five thouſand hogſheads of their beſt wine. He was reſolved either to force them to deliver up the wine to him, or take and demoliſh their city, the veſſels which were bringing wine to the Roman fleet being kept back by contrary winds. In the mean-time Polyxenidas, being informed that the Roman fleet was at Teos, left Epheſus, and ſailed to that iſland in hopes of being able to ſhut up the enemy's fleet in the harbour. For the city of Teos had two ports, whereof the ſafeſt and moſt capacious was formed by two promontories, which came ſo near each other, that two gallies could ſcarce ſail out of it a-breaſt; and in this Æmilius firſt anchored, but before the arrival of Polyxenidas, he had by the advice of Eudamus changed his poſt. Wherefore the Syrian admiral inſtead of blocking up the harbour was obliged to keep his fleet ſheltered under the iſland of Macris over-againſt Myonneſias, till the Roman fleet ſailed out. There he continued two days in hopes of ſurprizing the Romans as they ſailed by from Teos to Colophon. But in the mean-time Æmilius, being informed that the Syrian fleet waited for him at Macris, left Teos, and ſteered his courſe towards that iſland with his ſhips drawn up in line of battle. As Polyxenidas had poſitive orders to engage the Romans, he laid hold of this opportunity, and attacked them with great reſolution. The Roman fleet conſiſted of eighty ſhips, and the Syrian of eighty-nine, ſome of which were of an enormous ſize, two of them being heptaremes, and three hexaremes. The Rhodians had then invented a kind of fire-ſhips, which ſtruck great terror into the Syrian fleet; cauldrons full of combuſtible and burning materials were hung out at their prows, ſo that none of the enemy's ſhips durſt approach them. Theſe fell on the enemy's gallies, ſtruck their beaks into them, and at the ſame time ſet them on fire. The Syrian gallies left their ranks, and crouded round them, not with an intent to board them, but to diſcharge their arrows, darts, and javelins a-gainſt their crews; in the mean-time the Roman ſhips, ſailing into the ſpaces which the Syrians had left, put their whole fleet in confuſion, Polyxenidas did all that lay in his power to encourage his men, but in ſpight of all his efforts

The Syrian fleet defeated by the Romans.

the

the left wing being in great diſorder, clapped on all the ſails they could, and quitted the fight. Then Polyxenidas endeavoured to retire in good order, but the Rhodian fire-ſhips advancing againſt him, and ſetting ſome of his gallies on fire, the reſt betook themſelves to a precipitous flight. The hiſtorians, who moſt leſſen the advantage gained by Æmilius on this occaſion, agree, that he ſunk thirty-nine of the enemy's ſhips, and took thirteen; but others ſay, that the Syrians loſt forty-two ſhips and thirteen gallies, whereas the Romans loſt but two ſhips, which were ſunk in the very beginning of the engagement [w].

ANTIOCHUS was ſo ſtruck with the news of this defeat, that, as if he had been quite deprived of his ſenſes, he took ſuch meaſures as were quite oppoſite to his intereſt. For in this conſternation he ſent orders for drawing his forces out of Lyſimachia and the other cities of the Helleſpont, to prevent their falling into the enemy's hands, tho' Lyſimachia alone might have ſtopped the whole conſular army for a great while. Then he complained of his hard fate in theſe words: I know not what god has infatuated me! every thing happens contrary to my expectations. Heaven perſecutes me, and what can I infer from all this, but that my ruin approaches? Being greatly dejected by theſe reflections, he raiſed the ſiege of Colophon, and retired firſt to Sardis, and then to his ſon-in-law Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, where he made it his whole buſineſs to aſſemble all the land-forces he could with a deſign to make head againſt the Scipios, who were already arrived at the Cherſoneſus near the Helleſpont. Here Scipio Africanus received advice of his ſon's being taken priſoner by the Syrians, an accident which gave him great uneaſineſs. He had brought him with him into Greece to form him from his tender years to the military profeſſion, and had ſent him in a Chalcidian ſhip to Demetrias, being unwilling to expoſe him to any hazards in Aſia. But in his paſſage, the ſhip which carried him, being attacked and taken by a Syrian galley, the young Roman was brought to Antiochus, who treated him with all the marks of honour that were due to his birth, and the reputation of his father. But after all, the detention of a ſon ſo tenderly beloved ſenſibly affected the father. This accident, however, did not abate the ardor of Scipio, and the deſire he had of fighting Antiochus. The Roman troops purſued their march,

[w] Liv. & Appian. ibid.

not doubting but they ſhould meet with a vigorous reſiſtance at Lyſimachia. They approached the city in battle-array, but were never more ſurprized than when they found that the ſea was unguarded, and that Lyſimachia opened her gates to them. Antiochus had drawn the gariſon out of that important place, as we have related above, and the Syrians had evacuated it with ſuch precipitation, as to leave all the proviſions behind them; ſo that the Roman army, which was fatigued with a long march, found there all ſorts of refreſhments, and waited in that neighbourhood for the coming up of their ſtragglers and ſick. During their ſtay they received another piece of news no leſs ſurprizing than the abandoning of Lyſimachia. On the oppoſite ſhore ſtood the city of Abydos, the key of Aſia, which was to be taken before they could enter the Syrian dominions. This city likewiſe Antiochus had deſerted, and ordered the gariſon to evacuate the place and join him; ſo that the inhabitants ſent to acquaint the Roman generals, that they were ready to receive them as ſoon as they arrived. Hence the Scipios concluded, that Antiochus without Hannibal was no formidable enemy; for the reſolution of evacuating theſe cities, and waiting for the Romans in the heart of Aſia, had been taken in his abſence. As the Romans found no enemies at the Helleſpont to diſpute their paſſage, they croſſed over in good order by the care of Eumenes and the Rhodians, who had waited for them there [x] (M). The Romans being now in Aſia, went up to Troy, and ſtopt ſome time there, looking upon that city as their primitive country, and the place they originally ſprung

The Romans enter Aſia. Year of the flood, 2809. Before Chriſt 190.

[x] Liv. ibid. & Appian. p. 105.

(M) We are told by Livy, that Scipio Africanus did not croſs the Helleſpont with his brother, but remained ſome days on the European ſhore being detained there by religious duties. He was one of the Salii, that is, one of the prieſts of Mars, who every year after a ſolemn ſacrifice carried through the city of Rome thoſe ſacred ſhields, which Numa was ſuppoſed to have received from heaven. During this ſolemnity the Salii, though generals of armies, did not undertake any enterprize, or even ſtir from the place they were in. This was a troubleſome ſuperſtition, but Scipio complied with it, and continued ſome days in Europe, while his brother and the Roman troops were in Aſia (51). We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of this and other Roman feſtivals in the hiſtory of Rome.

(51) Liv. l. xxxvii. c. 33.

ſprung from. The conſul offered up ſacrifices to Minerva, who preſided over the citadel. Both parties were overjoyed much after the ſame manner as parents and children when they meet after a long ſeparation. The inhabitants ſeeing thoſe who were deſcended from the ſame anceſtors with themſelves conquerors of the weſt, and of Africa, laying claim to Aſia, imagined they ſaw Troy riſing from its aſhes in greater ſplendor than ever. On the other ſide, the Romans were highly pleaſed to ſee themſelves in the antient abode of their forefathers, who had given birth to Rome; and to view and contemplate the temples and deities which they had in common with that city [y] (N).

Antiochus ſends an embaſſy to the Scipios.

WHEN advice was brought to Antiochus that the Romans had croſſed the Helleſpont, and were encamped at Abydos, he was ſeized with freſh terror; and being fully convinced that ſome deity was contriving his ruin, he turned all his thoughts on peace. He ſeldom employed any but foreigners in the moſt important negotiations, and the perſon he now pitched upon was one Heraclides, by birth a Byzantine, and of Thracian extraction. His inſtructions wre to addreſs himſelf in the firſt place to Scipio Africanus, to make his court to him with great aſſiduity, and when he found him diſpoſed to hearken to his propoſals, to aſſure him, but in private, that Antiochus was ready to reſtore him his ſon, whom he ſo tenderly loved, without ranſom; that all the king of Syria's treaſures were at his ſervice, and that he was willing to ſhare his dominions with him, and whatever elſe he had. The propoſals which he was to make to the Roman council were, that Antiochus was ready to deliver up to them the cities of Lampſacus, Smyrna and Alexandria, and was not averſe from evacuating ſuch places in Ionia and Æolis as the Romans had demanded; and, laſtly, that he would conſent to pay half the expence which Rome had been at in bringing [y] Juſtin. l. xxxi. c.8. & Liv. ubi ſupra.

(N) Demetrius Scepſius, as quoted by Strabo (52) tells us, that, he, being then very young, happened to come to Ilium or Troy to viſit the curioſities of the place, while Scipio was there; and adds, that the inhabitants were at that time ſo wretchedly poor, that they had not even tiles wherewithal to cover their houſes, which were filled with filth and naſtineſs.

(52) Strabo. l. iii. p. 594.

bringing the war into Aſia. With theſe inſtructions Heraclides ſet out for the Roman camp on the banks of the Helleſpont; but was ſurpriſed not to find the eldeſt Scipio there, he having ſtaid on the European ſhore to perform ſome religious ceremonies. Heraclides therefore prolonged his ſtay at Abydos under various pretences, till the arrival of Publius, and then he demanded audience, and being admitted into the council of war, ſpoke agreeable to his inſtructions [z].

THE embaſſador thought his propoſals ſo advantageous that they could not be rejected; but the Romans judged otherwiſe, and gave him this final anſwer; that a peace would not be granted to Antiochus upon any but the following conditions: 1. That ſince he had drawn the war upon himſelf, he ſhould defray the whole expence of it: 2. That he ſhould reſtore liberty in general to all the Greek cities in Aſia: 3. That to prevent all future hoſtilities he ſhould relinquiſh all Aſia on this ſide of mount Taurus.

His propoſals rejected.

HERACLIDES finding that the council would not comply with any of his demands, endeavoured, purſuant to his private inſtructions, to win over Scipio Africanus ſingly. He was very aſſiduous at his tent, and being always well received by him in regard of the kindneſs his maſter had ſhewn to his ſon, he at laſt diſcloſed his inſtructions to him, telling him that Antiochus was not only ready to reſtore him his ſon without ranſom, but to ſhare all his treaſures with him, and even place him on the ſame throne. To theſe overtures Scipio returned the following anſwer; If the king of Syria reſtores me my ſon, it will be a perſonal obligation, which, as a father, I ſhall ever acknowledge with the deepeſt ſenſe of gratitude; but he is not to expect any gratification from me as a ſervant of the public. As a good citizen I can neither receive any thing from an enemy, nor promiſe any thing to him. But let me give him a piece of advice, ſince that is all I can do in the condition to which he has reduced himſelf. He ought to have kept poſſeſſion of Lyſimachia, which would have ſtopt us, or appeared on the banks of the Helleſpont, to diſpute our paſſage into Aſia; in that caſe he would have perhaps obtained more favourable terms. But now that we have entered Aſia, and are, as it were, maſters both of the horſe and his rider, all he has to do is to ſubmit mit to whatever conditions we ſhall think fit to preſcribe to him. As for the kindneſs he ſhews my ſon, all I can do is to pray the gods that he may never be in his ſituation, nor want that protection which he ſo generouſly gives the child. And if he would preſerve himſelf from ſo great a misfortune, let him avoid coming to a pitch'd battle with the Romans. This advice is the ſtrongeſt teſtimony I can give him, both of my eſteem and gratitude [a].

[z] Liv. ibid. Appian. in Syriac. p. 106. Polyb. legat. 23.

THE ill ſucceſs of this embaſſy ſunk Antiochus into a deep melancholy. He thought that the Romans could not have preſcribed him worſe terms had they conquered him, and ſuch a peace appeared to him as diſadvantageous as the moſt calamitous war. He therefore turned all his thoughts from projects of peace to the neceſſary preparations for oppoſing the enemy, and preventing his further progreſs. He encamped near Thyatira in Lydia, and there aſſembled all his forces. On the other hand, the Roman army leaving Troy, advanced in ſix days to Elœa near the mouth of the Caicus. As this city was ſubject to the kings of Pergamus, Eumenes went immediately to wait on the Scipios, and then returning to Pergamus, ſent from thence all manner of proviſions for the army, which he ſoon joined with all his force. While they were encamped in the neighbourhood of Elœa, Scipio Africanus falling ſick was ſent to that city, which Antiochus no ſooner heard than he ſent his ſon to him without ranſom. A moſt noble inſtance of generoſity in an enemy ſo lately provoked. Scipio received him with inexpreſſible joy, aud after having embraced him a thouſand times, he ſtrictly charged the Syrian, who brought him, to return his moſt hearty thanks to Antiochus, and to tell him that he could no otherwiſe ſhew his gratitude at preſent, than by giving him one piece of advice, which was, that the king ſhould by no means hazard a battle, till he was recovered, and returned to the camp [b]. Perhaps Scipio, thought that a delay for ſome days would give the king an opportunity of reflecting more ſeriouſly than he had hitherto done; aud incline him to conclude a ſolid peace. But however that be, the tranſports of joy, which Scipio felt on this occaſion, gave a turn to his diſtemper

[a] Liv. l. xxxvi. xxxvii. [b]. Polyb. legat. 23. Liv. l. xxxvii. Juſtin. l. iii. c. 7. Appian. p. 105, 106. Aurel. Vict. p. 609.

ſtemper, and quite cured him. But before he was in a condition to return to the camp, the conſul appointed Cn. Domitius to be his lieutenant in the room of his brother, and marched againſt Antiochus, who was encamped at Thyatira, without him, not doubting but he ſhould be able to conquer without ſharing the glory of the victory with his brother. Although the ſuperiority of Antiochus's forces, which were much more numerous than thoſe of the Romans, might naturally induce him to venture a battle, yet the wiſdom and authority of Scipio, whom he conſidered as his laſt refuge, in caſe any calamitous accident ſhould befal him, prevailed over all other conſiderations. He therefore would not wait for the conſul in the plains of Thyatira, but moved from thence, and leaving the river Hermus between him and the Romans, encamped near Magneſia, within reach of mount Sipylus. In order to prevent his being attacked in this new poſt, he dug a ditch round his camp ſix cubits deep, and twelve broad, which was guarded on the outſide by a double row of palliſades, the ſecond row being defended at proper diſtances by ſtrong walls and towers to keep off the enemy. In the mean time the conſul, leaving the banks of the Caicus, advanced by great marches towards Thyatira, where he ſuppoſed the king was ſtill encamped. But being informed of the new ſituation of the Syrian army, he turned towards the Hermus, and poſted himſelf at firſt within five miles of the enemy. While he was forming his camp, a party of Gauls mixed with ſome Scythians appeared in ſight of the Romans, and advanced in good order to attack them. The Romans repulſed them, and while they were endeavouring to repaſs the river, killed great numbers of them. After this ſkirmiſh both parties continued inactive for ſome days till the conſul paſſing the river poſted himſelf within two miles and an half of the enemy's camp. While he was fortifying his new camp, three thouſand Syrians attacked the workmen, but were ſoon obliged to retire with the loſs of two hundred men partly killed, and partly taken. Both armies marched out of their camps every morning, and drew up in order of battle, but ſo near their trenches, that it was plain they had no mind to come to an engagement. At length the Romans marched into the plain, and challenged the Syrians, but Antiochus notwithſtanding this challenge continued near his intrenchments. Theſe delays tired out the conſul's patience, who dreaded

the

the arrival of his brother, being unwilling to ſhare with him the glory of the victory. He therefore ſummoned a council of war in all haſte, and propoſed attacking the enemy's intrenchments. The winter, ſaid he, approaches, and the ſeaſon will ſoon force us either to diſcontinue the war till the next ſpring, or to ſpend the winter in our tents. Let us therefore march out immediately againſt theſe effeminate Aſiatics, and attack them in their trenches, ſince they have not the courage to meet us in the field. The Romans never ſhewed ſo much contempt for an enemy as on this occaſion; they were all to a man for forcing the Syrian camp, if they continued to decline a battle. Accordingly the next day the conſul after viewing the ſituation of the enemy's camp, advanced to it in order of battle. On the other hand the king thinking it would be ſhameful for him to decline an engagement, being at the head of an armyfar more numerous than that of the enemy, in a friend's country, and in the midſt of his allies, reſolved at all events to accept the challenge, and accordingly prepared for a deciſive battle [c]

The battle of Magneſia.

THE Roman army conſiſted of four legions partly Romans, and partly Latins, each legion at this time containing five thouſand five hundred men, and of ſeven thouſand auxiliaries ſent by the kings of Pergamus and Macedon; but of theſe, two thouſand were ordered to guard the camp during the action. The Romans were poſted in the centre, and the Latins in the two wings, the left of which extended to the river. On the ſide of the right wing to cover and ſupport it, the conſul poſted the auxiliary troops of Eumenes, a ſmall body of horſe, and ſome Trallians and Cretans lightly armed. He did not think it neceſſary to ſtrengthen in like manner the left wing, the river and banks, which were very ſteep, ſeeming a ſufficient defence on that ſide. The ſixteen elephants, which the Romans had, were placed behind the army by way of corps-de-reſerve, the conſul not thinking it proper to oppoſe them to thoſe of the enemy, which were far more numerous, being in all fifty-two; and beſides excelled the Roman elephants in ſtrength, height, and courage, the former being brought from India, and the latter from Africa. As for the Syrian army, all the nations

[c] Liv. & Appian. ibid.

tions of the east seemed to be assembled to support the cause of Antiochus. But the main strength of it consisted in sixteen thousand foot, armed after the Macedonian manner, who composed the phalanx. This body faced every way, was armed with long pikes, and taught to fight in close order as the soldiers of Alexander the Great had formerly been. Antiochus did not draw up his phalanx as usual; but divided it into ten companies separated from each other, placing in the spaces between each of the companies an elephant loaded with a tower full of armed men. On the right of the phalanx was drawn up in a line part of the cavalry, viz. fifteen hundred Asiatic Gauls, three thousand horse armed cap-a-pee, and a thousand horse more, the flower of the Median cavalry. At some distance from these followed the cavalry of the king's household, richly cloathed, and wearing bucklers plated over with silver. In the same line twelve hundred Scythians on horseback, armed with bows and arrows, made a great figure, being all chosen men, and of an extraordinary size. The light-armed troops, to the number of three-thousand, partly Trallians, and partly Cretans, with ten thousand Mysian archers, and four thousand men more, partly Cyrtœans armed with slings, partly Persians armed with bows, and partly Arabians mounted on dromedaries closed the right wing, which was led on by the king in person, surrounded by a body of Syrians and Lydians well mounted, but not heavily armed. The left wing was commanded by Seleucus and Antipater, the former the king's son, and the latter his nephew, and disposed thus. Close to the phalanx were posted fifteen hundred Galatians, and two thousand Cappadocians, which king Ariarathes had sent to the assistance of his father-in-law. Next to these were placed two thousand seven hundred auxiliaries sent from different countries. These were followed by three thousand cuirassiers well mounted. And lastly, in the flank of this wing marched two thousand horse lightly armed. At some distance were placed several small bodies of light-armed troops both foot and horse; among which were two thousand five hundred Galatian horse, some Tarentines, Cretans, Carians, Cilicians, &c. The phalanx, which was in the center, was commanded by three officers of distinction, viz. Minio, Zeuxis, and Philip. A vast number of chariots, armed with hooks and scythes, were drawn up before the first line, as were likewise wiſe a great many elephants carrying towers with ſeveral floors all filled with ſlingers and archers; and beſides many camels, animals then unknown to the Roman troops, mounted by Arabians, armed with ſwords ſix foot long, that the riders might from their backs reach the enemy. The Romans had never ſeen a more numerous army, nor one more finely adorned (O); and nevertheleſs they never ſhewed ſo great a contempt for an army as for this, which they were now going to attack.

* * *

On the day of the battle the weather proved very favourable to the Romans; for a thick fog riſing in the morning, the day was almoſt turned into night, ſo that the Syrian commanders could not have all the corps under their command in view, on account of their great extent, and ſend them proper orders in time; whereas the fog was not thick enough to prevent the Roman generals from ſeeing their ſeveral bodies at the greateſt diſtance, as they took up but little ground. Beſides the damp, which was occaſioned by the fog, ſlackened the ſtrings of the enemy's bows, ſo that the Aſiatics, who uſed them, could ſhoot their darts and arrows but faintly. The whole dependence of Antiochus in the firſt attack was on his armed chariots, which were to cut their way into the Roman army. For this purpoſe they had long halberts faſtened to their poles, and ſharp hooks to their axle-trees; the former were about the height of a man's head, and the latter almoſt ſwept the ground, and cut off the legs of all who ſtood in their way. But Eume-

nes

(O) Florus tells us (53), that Antiochus ſtrengthened his army with elephants of a monſtrous ſize, all covered with gold, ſilver, ſcarlet, and their own ivory. We read in the firſt book of the Maccabees (54), that he had an hundred and twenty elephants. And indeed when he fought with Ptolemy he had an hundred and two, and afterwards, as Polybius aſſures us, an hundred and fifty. But in this engagement Livy writes, that he had only fifty-four elephants, ſeventy thouſand foot, and upwards of twelve thouſand horſe. According to Appian he had in all but ſeventy thouſand men. Florus moſt hyperbolically raiſes the number of his forces to three hundred thouſand men; and adds, that he had as many horſes and iron chariots in the field that day. The Romans were between eight and twenty and thirty thouſand men, horſe and foot, whereof two thouſand were left to guard the camp.

(53) Flor. hiſt. Rom. l. ii. c. 8. (54) 1 Maccab. c. 8. v. 6.

nes undertook to render them uſeleſs, and even fatal to the enemy. This brave prince putting himſelf at the head of the bow-men and ſlingers, ordered them to charge not in a body, but divided in platoons, and to aim only at the horſes in the chariots. Accordingly, as ſoon as the chariots moved, Eumenes advanced at the head of his men, who pouring on them from every quarter darts, ſtones, and javelins, and at the ſame time ſhouting as loud as they could, ſo frightened the horſes, that they could no longer be kept in order, but ſcouring up and down, and turning againſt their own troops, fell on the Arabians, who ſupported them, which occaſioned a great confuſion in that quarter. Thoſe in the Syrian army, who were at a diſtance, hearing the noiſe and outcries, and not knowing the cauſe of them, were ſtruck with no ſmall terror. After this advantage, the Roman cavalry advanced, and fell on thoſe whom the charriots had put in diſorder. The Syrians, being already intimidated, after a faint reſiſtance gave way, and the Romans made a great ſlaughter of their men and horſes, both being born down with the weight of their heavy armour. Eumenes charged the left wing, in which Seleucus commanded, with ſuch vigor, that he put it to flight, and the fugatives flying to the phalanx for protection, put that body likewiſe in diſorder, which Domitius obſerving, advanced againſt it at the head of his legionaries, but could not break it till he ordered his men to attack the elephants, which, as we have obſerved above, were placed in the ſpaces between the companies. The Romans had learnt in their wars with Pyrrhus and Hannibal not to fear thoſe monſters, which were once ſo terrible to them. They attacked them therefore with great reſolution, and driving them againſt the phalangites, put that body in diſorder, by means of thoſe very animals which had been poſted there for its defence.

BUT in the mean time advice was brought that the left wing of the Romans was in great danger. Antiochus, who had obſerved that the flanks of the left wing were quite opened and uncovered, the four ſquadrons which covered it, having joined the reſt of the cavalry to fall upon the enemy's left wing, had charged it at the head of all his auxiliaries not only in front, but in flank. The Roman infantry, ſeeing themſelves in imminent danger of being ſurrounded and hemmed in on all ſides, fled in great diſorder to their camp, which was guarded by two thouſand men under the command of a legionary tribune called Æmilius. This man ſeeing the Romans flying towards him, marched out at the head of all his troops to meet them, and after having bitterly reproached them for their cowardice and ignominious flight, ordered his men to draw their ſwords, and cut in pieces ſuch as ſhould advance one ſtep farther, or refuſe to face about againſt the enemy. This order given ſo ſeaſonably, and put in execution without mercy againſt ſome, had the deſired effect; Thoſe who were flying firſt halted, and then, being both reinforced and encouraged by Æmilius, returned under his conduct to wipe off the diſhonour of their flight. At the ſame time Attalus the brother of Eumenes, having left the right wing on his receiving advice that the left was in danger, arrived very ſeaſonably with two hundred horſe. Antiochus obſerving that the troops, which had fled, were returning to the battle, and that the enemy's right wing was ready to fall upon him, turned his horſe about and fled. This ſerved in a manner as a ſignal for the reſt of the troops, for the whole Syrian army immediately turned their backs. Eumenes alone purſued them at the head of the cavalry, and made a moſt dreadful havock of the fugitives. The Romans walking over heaps of dead bodies, eſpecially where the phalanx ſtood, marched up to the Syrian camp, attacked, and plundered it. The riches they found in it are not to be deſcribed, but the taking of it coſt the Romans a new battle, which proved more fatal to the Syrians than that in the field, for the Romans, having in ſpite of a moſt deſperate reſiſtance forced the intrenchments, gave no quarter, but put all to the ſword without diſtinction. There fell this day in the battle, in the purſuit, and in the plunder of the camp fifty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, fifteen hundred were taken priſoners, and fifteen elephants. In the conſular army there were but three hundred foot killed, and twenty-five horſe. Eumenes had only fifteen of his men killed, ſo that this victory, as we are told by the antients, ſeemed a prodigy to all nations both of the eaſt and weſt [d].

Romans

Antiochus defeated.

ANTIOCHUS retired to Sardis with as many of his forces, that had eſcaped the ſlaughter, as he could draw together. From Sardis he ſoon marched to rejoin his ſon Seleucus, who had fled to Apamea. As for the conſul he took advantage of the king's defeat and flight, making himſelf maſter of all the neighbouring countries. Deputies haſtened to him from all parts; parts; the cities of Thyatira, Magneſia, Trallis, Magneſia in Caria, all Lydia, and Epheſus itſelf, though highly favoured by Antiochus, declared for the Romans. Polyxenidas, upon the news of the king's defeat, left the port of Epheſus, and ſailed to Patara, where he landed with a very ſmall guard, and returned by land into Syria. The conſul took the road to Sardis, which opened its gates to him. As he ſtopped there, his brother Africanus, as ſoon as his health allowed him, came and joined him in that city, and congratulated him on the glory he had ſo lately acquired. But after all, the conſul, we may ſay had but a ſmall part in the victory; for all the hiſtorians, who ſpeak of the battle of Magneſia, aſcribe the whole ſucceſs of it to Eumenes king of Pergamus and Attalus his brother, without mentioning any valiant action or prudent order, by which the conſul ſignalized himſelf on that occaſion. However, he took the ſirname of Aſiaticus as his brother had done that of Africanus.

[d] Liv. Appian. & Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

ANTIOCHUS finding his affairs in a bad ſituation both by ſea and land, and not daring to appear before the conſular army in the field, ſent Antipater, his brother's ſon, and Zeuxis, who had been governor of Lydia and Phrygia, to ſue for a peace. They were ordered to treat chiefly with the elder brother, of whoſe clemency and good nature Antiochus entertained a high opinion. Accordingly on their arrival at Sardis, where the conſul then was with his brother, they addreſſed the latter, and were by him preſented to the conſul. Their ſpeech was very ſubmiſſive, and ſuch as became a vanquiſhed people. To you, O Romans, ſaid they, we apply to know by what means we may appeaſe the wrath of your republic. All the kings you have hitherto conquered have experienced your clemency after their defeat. Shall Antiochus then be the only prince on whom you will wreak your vengeance? No victory has given you ſo much reaſon to favour the vanquiſhed as this. It aſſures you of the conqueſt of the univerſe. It even puts you upon a level with the immortal gods. Learn therefore to be like them, ſlow to puniſh, and ready to forgive [e].

HEREUPON a council was ſummoned, and after long debates the embaſſadors were called in, and Scipio Africanus, being deſired by the conſul to acquaint the deputies with the reſolutions of the aſſembly, is ſaid to have expreſſed himſelf in the following terms: We are ſenſible, that the victory victory, which we have lately gained, is owing to the gods; and therefore ſhall treat the vanquiſhed with moderation, demanding little more of them now than we did at our firſt entering into Aſia. Antiochus ſhall obtain a peace upon the following terms: That he gives up his pretenſions to Europe, confines his dominions to Aſia beyond mount Taurus, pays us fifteen thouſand Euboic talents for the expences of the war, five hundred down, two thouſand five hundred when the ſenate and people ſhall confirm the articles, and one thouſand more every year for twelve years together. We alſo inſiſt upon his ſatisfying king Eumenes, and his paying him the four hundred talents he owes him, and what remains due for the corn, which his father ſent to the king of Syria. It is likewiſe the pleaſure of the council, that you deliver up to us Hannibal the Carthaginian, Thoas the Ætolian, Mneſilochus the Acarnanian, and Philo and Eubulis two Chalcidians; for theſe have been the authors of our diviſions, the incendiaries who kindled the preſent war. Laſtly, the king of Syria for a further proof of his ſincerity ſhall give us twenty ſuch hoſtages as we ſhall chuſe, of whom Antiochus his youngeſt ſon ſhall be one [f].

[e] Appian. in Syriac. III. Polyb. legat. 4. Liv. l. xxxviii.

Articles of the peace between Antiochus and the Romans.

The embaſſadors of Antiochus had been ordered to refuſe no terms, and therefore theſe were accepted, and the whole affair concluded. So that the Syrian embaſſadors now prepared to ſet out for Rome to get the conditions of peace propoſed by Scipio ratified there. In the mean time the conſul dividing his army into three bodies, put it into winter quarters; one part continued at Magneſia, another was ſent to Trallis, and the third to Epheſus, where the Scipios took up their quarters. There they received a new embaſſy from Antiochus with the hoſtages he had promiſed, the Roman priſoners and deſerters, and the ſtrangers, which the conſul had demanded, except Hannibal, who, after the king's defeat, had fled out of his dominions, and Thoas the Ætolian, who, as ſoon as he had heard that a treaty was on foot between Antiochus and the Romans, had returned to Ætolia, where a war was likely to break out between that republic and Rome. L. Aurelius Cotta was ſent with the embaſſadors to Rome, to acquaint the ſenate with the particulars of the treaty. When they appeared before the conſcript fathers, they ſpoke with great ſubmiſſion, and only desired them to ratify the articles which the Scipios had offered to their master. The senate, after examining them, ordered that a treaty of peace should be concluded with Antiochus, and the articles of it engraved on brass, and fixed up in the capitol. They only added one clause, which was, That the Syrians should change every year all their hostages, except the son of king Antiochus, who should continue at Rome, as long as the republic thought fit. The peace being thus ratified, and all Asia, on this side of mount Taurus, delivered into the hands of the Romans, the Greek cities were by them restored to their liberty, the provinces of Caria and Lydia given to the Rhodians, and all the rest that had belonged to Antiochus bestowed upon Eumenes [g].

[f] Polyb. legat. 24. Diodor. Sicul. legat. 9. Liv. l. xxxvii. Juſtin. l. xxxi. xxvi. c. 8. Appian. ibib.

In the mean time the consulship of Scipio being expired Cn. Manlius Vulso was sent into Asia, to succeed him in the command of the army, and with him ten commissioners to regulate affairs there. Manlius hearing, on his arrival, that the city of Perga (P) was still under the dominion of Antiochus, contrary to the treaty of peace, advanced with his troops to that place, being desirous to pick a new quarrel with Antiochus; but the governor of the city shewing himself ready to deliver it up to the Romans, as soon as he received proper orders from his court, thirty days were allowed him for that purpose; and the city was given up at the time appointed. From Perga Manlius returned to Apamea, where the ten commissioners and king Eumenes then were; and they altogether put the last hand to the treaty, which was brought from Rome; with the additions and alterations, which the senate had, after the departure of the embassadors, thought fit to make in it (Q). Nothing now remained

[g] Appian. & Liv. ubi supra.

(P) The city of Perga, stood on the banks of the Cestrius, and still retains in some degree its antient name, being called by the inhabitants Pirgi. The river Cestrius or Cestrus had its spring on mount Taurus, towards the confines of Isauria. It washed Pisidia, and Pamphylia, and discharged itself into the Attalic gulf, or the gulf of Sattalia.

(Q) As this is a very material part of history, we shall set down the treaty at full length, with the alterations and additions which the senate thought fit to make in it, such as it has been transmitted to us by the Greek and Latin historians. It was couched in the following terms: "Peace and friendship shall "be remained but to ratify the treaty by religious ceremonies, and to begin to put it in execution. The proconſul took the uſual oath of the Romans, that is, ſtruck a ſow on the head with flint, ſaying, If I break my word, may Jupiter

 ſtrike

" be eſtabliſhed between the Roman people and Antiochus king
" of Syria, on the following conditions. I. The king ſhall " not ſuffer any army of any enemy to the Roman people, or " their allies, to paſs through his territories; neither ſhall Rome,
" or her allies, ſuffer any army to paſs through their territories
" to make war on Antiochus,. II. The king of Syria ſhall
" have no right to extend his conqueſts to the iſlands near Aſia;
" and he ſhall renounce all his pretenſions to Europe. III. An-" tiochus ſhall withdraw his troops from all the cities, towns,
" and caſtles on this ſide of mount Taurus, as far as to the river
" Halys, and out of all the plain which ſeparates Pamphylia
" from Lycia on one ſide, and from Lycaonia on the other. IV.
" When the Syrian troops evacuate any place, they ſhall not " carry the machines of war with them; and if they have done
" ſo in any caſe, they ſhall reſtore them. V. Antiochus ſhall " not receive or harbour in his dominions any fugitive of the " kingdom of Eumenes. VI. The inhabitants of the cities " given up by the king of Syria ſhall not continue in Syria, but " repair to Apamea, on a day appointed, to be ſent home to " their native countries. VII. But the Syrians, who have a " mind to continue in the cities ſubject to Rome, or to the allies
" of Rome, ſhall be ſuffered to do ſo without moleſtation.
" VIII. Antiochus ſhall, if it be in his power, deliver up into " the hands of the pro-conſul, Hannibal the Carthaginian and " ſon of Hamilcar, Mneſilochus the Acarnanian, Thoas the " Ætolian, Eubulis and Philo, two Chalcidians, and all the per-" ſons who have enjoyed any magiſtracy in Ætolia. IX. The " king of Syria ſhall deliver up all his elephants to the Romans,
" and train up no more for war. X. He ſhall put the Romans
" in poſſeſſion of all his armed gallies; ſhall have no more than " ten ſhips at ſea, which ſhall only be of thirty oars; and ſhall
" not ſail beyond the promontories of Calycadnus and Sarpedon, " unleſs it be to bring to Rome money, embaſſadors, or hoſtages.
" XI. Antiochus ſhall not raiſe mercenaries in the countries ſub-
" ject to Rome, or receive the volunteers who ſhall offer to " ſerve him. XII. The houſes and other edifices which were " built before this treaty by the Rhodians, and other allies of " Rome, in the Syrian territories, ſhall ſtill belong to the Rho-
" dians, or thoſe other allies who built them. XIII. Both parties
" ſhall be at liberty to demand the money that ſhall be reſpective-
" ly due, and to demand the reſtitution of any thing that has " been taken from them. XIV. Thoſe to whom Antiochus " has given the poſſeſſion of any cities, ſhall evacuate them, and " puts

ſtrike me as I ſtrike this victim. Then Q. Minucius Thermus, one of the ten commiſſioners, and L. Manlius, were diſpatched to the court of Syria, where they made Antiochus ſwear, that he would inviolably obſerve all the articles of the treaty. The Syrian fleet was then in the port of Patara, whither Fulvius Labeo repaired, on board the Roman gallies

" put them into the hands of their old poſſeſſors. XV. " Antiochus ſhall pay the Romans for twelve years the annual " ſum of a thouſant talents (that is, 258,333 l. 6s. 8d.) of the " pureſt ſilver, ſuch as that of Athens, and a hundred and forty " thouſand modii (35,000 Engliſh buſhels) of the beſt wheat, " XVI. He ſhall pay king Eumenes, in the ſpace of five years, " three hundred and fifty talents, and an hundred and twenty-ſe- " ven talents more, by way of ſatisfaction for the corn he recei- " ved from Attalus. XVII. Antiochus ſhall put into the hands " the Romans twenty hoſtages, of which his ſon Antiochus ſhall " be one; ſhall exchange them all, except his ſon Antiochus, " every three years; and theſe hoſtages ſhall all be between " eighteen and forty-five years of age. XVIII. If he is de- " fective in the ſums he is to pay annually, or brings any bad " money, he ſhall make ſatisfaction the next year. XIX. If " any of the allies make a war upon Antiochus, he ſhall have " a right to defend himſelf; but he ſhall not keep any of their " cities to himſelf, or take them into friendſhip, or draw them o- " ver to his party by corruption. The diſpute ſhall be determin- " ed by pitched battles. XX. If any party chuſes to add any " further articles to theſe, it may be done by mutual con- " ſent (55). "

Moſt of the copies of Livy, inſtead of the river Halys, mentioned in the third article, have the river Tanais; which muſt certainly be a miſtake, ſince the Tanais divides Aſia from Europe, and falls into the Palus Mœotis, and neither the Romans nor Antiochus had at that time any intercourſe with the nations in that neighbourhood, which lay at a great diſtance from the provinces of Aſia Minor; whereas the Halys divided Aſia Minor into two parts; and Antiochus was not only to retire beyond mount Taurus, but to withdraw his troops from all the places lying between that mountain and the river Halys, which was on this ſide of it. The promontory Calycadnus, ſpoke of in the tenth article, ſtood at the mouth of a river in Cilicia bearing the ſame name, and near it was the promontory of Sarpedon. The river is now known to the Italians by the name of Fiume del Ferro. The promontory of Calycadnus is the ſame with Strabo's cape Zephyrium.

(55) Appian. in Syriac. p. 112. Polyb. legat. 35. Liv. l. xxxviii. c. 38.

lies, and burnt, according to the conventions, all Antiochus's ſhips, chooſing rather to give this inſtance of ſeverity to all the maritime nations, than to apply the navy of the conquered king to their own uſe. They affected to ſhew the ſame diſintereſtedneſs with regard to the king of Syria's elephants; for they made a preſent of them to the king of Pergamus. Thus ended the war with Antiochus, which coſt the Romans but little blood, and yet contributed more than any other the to aggrandizing of their republic; but at the ſame time, this conqueſt proved, in a manner, fatal to Rome; for, from this period, the Roman writers date the depravity and corruption of manners, which ended at laſt in the total deſtruction of the republican ſtate. The Romans, who ſerved in Aſia, brought from thence great wealth, and introduced into Rome a taſte and love for luxury and effeminate pleaſures. Luxury, ſays a Roman poet, entered triumphant into Rome, with the pompous ſpoils of Aſia, and, dragging after it all manner of vices, made greater havoc in the city than the greateſt armies could have done; and thus revenged the conquered world [h].

As for the unhappy Antiochus, he did not long ſurvive his fall. Being greatly puzzled how to raiſe the ſum which he was to pay the Romans, he made a progeſs through the eaſtern provinces, in order to levy the tribute which they owed him, leaving the regency of Syria to his ſon Seleucus, whom he had declared his ſucceſſor. Being arrived in the province of Elemais, he was informed, that a very conſiderable treaſure was lodged in the temple of Jupiter Belus. This was a ſtrong temptation to a prince, who had not much regard for religion, and was in extreme want of money. Accordingly, upon a falſe pretence, that the inhabitants of that province had taken up arms againſt him, he entered the temple in the dead of the night, and ſeized on all the riches, which had been religiouſly kept there during a long ſeries of years. The populace, highly exaſperated at this ſacrilege, riſing up in arms, ſlew him, and all that were with him. This is the account of his death, which St. Jerom gives us, upon the teſtimony of Strabo [i]. But Aurelius Victor tells us, that this unfortunate prince, after his retreat beyond mount Taurus, gave himſelf up to all manner of debauchery, and was killed at an entertainment by one of his gueſts, whom he had ſtruck and abuſed. The difference of theſe accounts has made the moſt judicious among the Greek and Latin hiſtorians paſs over his death in ſilence. He died in the thirty-ſeventh year of his reign, and fifty-ſecond of his age, and is highly commended by moſt of the antient hiſtorians for his humanity, clemency, and liberality. A decree, which he is ſaid to have enacted, giving his ſubjects permiſſion, and even commanding them, not to obey his orders when they interfered with the laws, ſhows, that that he had an extraordinary regard for juſtice [k]. Till the fiftieth year of his age he behaved on all occaſions with ſuch courage and prudence, as crowned with ſucceſs all his enterprizes, and gained him the title of the Great; but, after that age, as he declined in the wiſdom of his conduct, as well as in his application to buſineſs, all his affairs were proportionably unſucceſsful. His conduct in the war with the Romans, the contempt in which he held the wiſe counſels of Hannibal, and the ignominious peace which he was forced to accept, drowned all the glory of his former expeditions. The prophet Daniel had foretold both his great exploits and misfortunes, and his prophecies were fully accompliſhed, as the reader will find in our notes (R).

Death of Antiochus.

[h] Juven. l. ii. ſatyr. 6.

[i] Hieron. in Daniel. c. 11

He

[k] Aurel. Victor. de viris illuſtr.

(R) The prophecies of Daniel, from the tenth verſe of the eleventh chapter to the nineteenth incluſive, relate to the actions of this prince, and were all fully accompliſhed. But his ſons, ſays the prophet, ſpeaking of the king of Syria, or the king of the north, ſhall be ſtirred up, and ſhall aſſemble a multitude of great forces; and one (Antiochus the Great) ſhall certainly come and overflow, and paſs through: then ſhall he return, and be ſtirred up, even to his fortreſs. This king of the north was Seleucus Callinicus who left behind him two ſons, Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus, afterwards ſirnamed the Great. The former reigned but three years, and was ſucceeded by Antiochus his brother. The latter, after having quelled the troubles of his kingdom, waged war with Ptolemy Philopator king of the ſouth, that is, of Egypt, diſpoſſeſſed him of Cœlo-Syria, which was delivered to him by Theodotus governor of that province, defeated Ptolemy's generals in the narrow paſſes near Berytus, and won part of Phœnice advancing as far as the fortreſs, or, as we read in the Hebrew, as far as the fortreſſes, that is, to the frontiers of Egypt. The victory gained by Ptolemy over Antiochus is plainly pointed out in the following lines. And the king of the ſouth ſhall be moved with choler, and ſhall come forth and fight with him, even with the king of the north; and he ſhall ſet forth

HE was ſucceeded by Seleucus ſirnamed Philopator, or, as Joſephus ſtiles him, Soter [1], which indeed was the ſirname of his ſon Demetrius. This prince reigned eleven years, and ſome months; but made a very poor figure, by reaſon of the low ſtate to which the Syrian empire had been reduced by the Romans, and the exorbitant ſum of a thouſand talents he was Seleucus Philopator. Year of the flood 2812. Year before Chriſt 187.

[1] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 4.

forth a great multitude, but the multitude ſhall be given into his hand. Ptolemy Philopator was an indolent effeminate prince; his ſubjects were forced to drag him, as it were, into the field, to repulſe the enemy who was marching into his country. At laſt he put himſelf at the head of the army, and, by the valour and conduct of his generals, gained a ſignal victory over Antiochus at Raphia. There a great multitude, that is, the great army which Antiochus led into the field, was given into his hands, and Ptolemy did caſt down, that is, ſlew many thouſands of them, and put the reſt to flight. And when he has taken away the multitude, his heart ſhall be lifted up, &c. but he ſhall not be ſtrengthened by it. Antiochus loſt upwards of ten thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, and four thouſand of his men were taken priſoners. Philopator, after this victory haſtened back into Egypt, and there gave himſelf up to ſloth and idleneſs, without taking the advantages which it gave him; and therefore was not ſtrengthened by it. For the king of the north ſhall return, and ſhall ſet forth a multitude greater than the former, and ſhall certainly come, after certain years, with a great army, and with much riches. Antiochus, having ended the war which he had waged with the nations beyond the Euphrates, raiſed a mighty army in thoſe provinces, and, fourteen years after the ending of the former war, returned againſt Egypt, during the minority of Ptolemy Epiphanes, defeated Scopas near Paneas, and regained the whole country which Philopator had reduced after the victory gained at Raphia. And in thoſe times there ſhall many ſtand up againſt the king of the ſouth. This prophecy was fulfilled by the league made by the kings of Syria and Macedon againſt the infant king of Egypt, by the conſpiracy of Agathocles and Agathoclea for the regency, and by that of Scopas, who wanted to diſpoſſeſs him of his dominions, and ſeize them for himſelf. Alſo the robbers of thy people ſhall exalt themſelves to eſtabliſh the viſion, but they ſhall fall. Several apoſtate Jews, to ingratiate themſelves with the kings of Egypt, complied with every thing he required of them, in oppoſition to the ſacred ordinances of the law. But they fell; for when Antiochus got again poſſeſſion of Judæa and Jeruſalem, he either cut off, or drove out of the country, all the partiſans of Ptolemy. So the king of the north will come and caſt up a mount, and take the moſt fenced cities; and the arms

of

was obliged to pay annually, by virtue of the treaty of peace between the king his father and that republic. It was under this prince that the famous accident happened concerning Heliodorus, which is mentioned in the second book of Maccabees [m]. The city of Jerusalem enjoyed, at that time, a profound of the south shall not withstand, neither his chosen people; neither shall there be any strength to withstand——But he that cometh against him, shall do according to his own will, and none shall stand before him; and he shall stand in the glorious land, which by his hand shall be consumed. Antiochus, after having defeated the Egyptain army at Paneas besieged and took, first Sidon, then Gaza, and afterwards all the cities of those provinces notwithstanding the opposition made by the chosen troops, which the king of Egypt sent against him, under the command of his best generals. He did according to his own will, in Cœlo-Syria, and Palestine, and pursuing his conquests, entered Judæa, that glorious land, and there established his authority, by driving out of the castle of Jerusalem the garrison which Scopas had left there; but that garrison having made such resistance, as obliged Antiochus to send for the rest of his army to reduce it, and the siege continuing some time, the country was destroyed and consumed by the stay the army was forced to make in it, and the city of Jerusalem suffered greatly, as appears from the decree which Antiochus afterwards enacted in favour of the Jews, granting them leave to repair their demolished city, and raise it, from the ruinous condition to which it was reduced. This decree was directed to one Ptolemy, who seems to have been governor of those provinces at that time, and is still extant in Josephus (56). He shall also set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom, and upright ones with him: thus shall he do, and he shall give him the daughter of woman corrupting her, but she shall not stand on his side, neither be for him. St. Jerom tell us (57), that Antiochus gave his daughter in marriage to Ptolemy, corrupting her with bad principles, and instructing her how she should betray her husband, and put him in possession of the kingdom; but he was not successful in his design, for she was no sooner married to Ptolemy, but she forsook her father's interest, and engaged in that of her husband; and hence it is that we find her joined with him in an embassy which was sent from Egypt to Rome, congratulating the Romans on the victory which Acilius had gained over her father at Thermopylæ (58). After this he shall turn his face to the isles, and shall take many; but a prince for profound tranquility. Onias the high-prieſt cauſing the laws of God to be obſerved, and prompting even kings and idolatrous princes, by his exemplary piety, to have the holy place in the higheſt veneration, and to honour it with rich donatives. Seleucus ſupplied, out of his private revenues, whatever was neceſſary for the pomp and magnificence of the ſolemn ſacrifices, notwithſtanding the difficulties he laboured under, by reaſon of the heavy tribute he was obliged to pay annually to Rome; but this ſcene was all on a ſudden changed, and great diſturbances raiſed in the city by one Simon of the tribe of Benjamin, and chief governor or protector of the temple. This man falling out with Onias, to be revenged on him for oppoſing his unjuſt enterprizes, fled from Jeruſalem, and went to Apollonius, who was governor of Cœle-Syria and Paleſtine for Seleucus, and told him, that there were immenſe treaſures laid up in the temple, which were not deſigned for the ſacrifices, but ſquandered away by the prieſts, and therefore might be better lodged in the king's coffers. Hereupon Apollonius immediately gave notice of what he had heard to the king, who ſent Heliodorus his treaſurer to Jeruſalem, with orders to ſeize on the treaſures, and bring them to Antioch. Heliodorus, on his arrival at Jeruſalem, acquainted the high-prieſt, who had received him with great demonſtrations of reſpect and eſteem, with the motive of his journey, and aſked him, Whether the information which

[m] 2 Maccab. iii. iv.

(56) Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 3. (57) Hieronym. in c. 11 Danielis. (58) Liv. l. xxxvii. c. 3.

Seleucus ſends Heliodorus to plunder the temple of Jeruſalem.

for his own behalf ſhall cauſe the reproach, which Antiochus had offered him, to ceaſe: without his own reproach he ſhall cauſe it to turn upon him; for after having put an end to the war in Cœlo-Syria and Paleſtine, he ſent his two ſons with his army, by land, to Sardis, while he himſelf, with a great fleet, ſailed to the Ægean ſea, where he reduced ſeveral iſlands, and extended his empire on that ſide; but the prince of the people to whom he had offered reproach by that invaſion, that is, Lucius Scipio the Roman conſul, made the reproach turn upon him, by defeating him in the battle of Magneſia, and driving him out of all Aſia Minor. Then he ſhall turn his face towards the fort of his own land; but he ſhall ſtumble and fall, and not be found. Antiochus, after his defeat, returned to the fort of his own land, that is, to Antioch, the capital of his kingdom, and ſtrongeſt place in it. From thence going into the eaſtern provinces to levy money wherewithal to pay the Romans, he was ſlain, ſo that he returned not into Syria, nor was afterwards found there. Theſe are, as it were, the out-lines of Antiochus's picture, and as they reſemble none but him, we cannot imagine that they were drawn undeſignedly, or at random.

which had been given to the king was true? Onias told him, That there was indeed ſome money lodged in the temple, but that it was only depoſited there in truſt, being allotted for the maintenance of widows and orphans; that he could not, by any means, diſpoſe of it in wrong of thoſe to whom it belonged; that the whole amounted to no more than four hundred talents of ſilver, and two hundred of gold, and was, in great part, the private property of Hyrcanus, a man of great honour and probity; and laſtly, that ſuch was the holineſs of the place, revered throughout the whole world, that no man ought to lay hands on what was depoſited there.* But Heliodorus alledging the poſitive orders he had received from his maſter, told the high-prieſt in plain terms, that he muſt ſeize the money, whatever might be the conſequences of ſuch a ſeizure, and carry it to the king at Antioch. When Heliodorus, on the day appointed, came to the temple, with a deſign to execute his commiſſion, the whole city was ſeized with dread. The prieſts, dreſſed in their ſacerdotal robes, fell proſtrate at the foot of the altar; and the people, covered with ſackcloth, flocked to the temple, and jointly with the prieſts, beſought the Almighty, not to ſuffer ſo holy a place to be violated and expoſed to contempt. But, in the mean time, Heliodorus, attended by his guards, was got to the gales of the treaſury, and preparing to break it open, when the Lord of ſpirits revealed his power by moſt ſenſible marks, ſtriking all thoſe, who dared to obey Heliodorus, with ſuch terror as deprived them of their ſenſes; for there appeared to them a horſe richly capariſoned, which ruſhing upon Heliodorus, ſtruck him ſeveral times with his forefeet. His rider had a terrible aſpect, and his weapons ſeemed to be of gold. At the ſame time appeared two young men, whoſe beauty dazled the eye. Theſe, ſtanding on each ſide of Heliodorus, ſcourged him inceſſantly with their whips in a moſt violent manner. Heliodorus fell to the ground ſpeechleſs, and without the leaſt ſymptoms of life, and being in this condition put into a litter, was by his guards carried off, while the temple, which before reſounded with lamentations, now echoed with the joyful ſhouts of all the people, who returned thanks to the Almighty for having thus diſplayed his power in defence of the ſanctuary. Some of Heliodorus's friends beſought the high-prieſt to invoke God in his favour; whereupon he offered a ſacrifice for his health, and while he was praying, the two young men above-mentioned appearing to Heliodorus, ſpoke to him thus:

Return

Return thanks to Onias the high-prieſt, ſince, for his ſake, the Lord has granted you life; and ſince you have been ſcourged from heaven, declare to all men the mighty power of God. Having ſpoke theſe words, they diſappeared. Heliodorus offered up ſacrifices, made ſolemn vows to him who had ſaved his life, and returning thanks to Onias, departed from Jeruſalem, declaring to every one the wonderful works of the Almighty, to which he himſelf had been an eye-witneſs. On his return to court, the king, perſiſting ſtill in his former reſolution of plundering the temple, aſked him, Who, in his opinion, was the moſt proper perſon for that attempt? Heliodorus replied, That if he had any enemy or traitor, he might ſend him, ſince that was the moſt expeditious way of getting rid of him, He, who dwells in heaven, being preſent in that place, and protecting it againſt ſuch as come to profane it. Joſephus, who alſo relates this event, inſtead of Heliodorus, names Apollonius, who, as we have hinted above, was governor of Cœle-Syria and Paleſtine; and with Joſephus agree the Faſti Siculi. Though the hand of God had appeared on this occaſion in a very miraculous manner, yet Simon did not lay aſide his animoſity againſt Onias, but carried it ſo far as to murder ſeveral of thoſe who had favoured the high-prieſt, being backed therein and encouraged by Apollonius. Hereupon Onias took a journey to Antioch, to complain to the king of theſe violences; but he had not been long there ere Seleucus died. The epitomizer of Jaſon of Cyrenia tells us, that Seleucus was dead before Onias reached Antioch; but Euſebius ſays, that he found him alive, and prevailed upon him to baniſh the perfidious Simon [n]. But, be that as it will, heaven did not long defer puniſhing Seleucus for his ſacrilegious attempt upon the temple, by that very hand which he had employed in it. We have obſerved above, that when Antiochus the Great, the father of Seleucus, made peace with the Romans, after the famous battle of Magneſia, among other hoſtages that were then given for the obſervance of the articles, one was Antiochus the king's ſon, and younger brother to Seleucus. This prince had been now thirteen years at Rome, was twenty-ſeven years of age, and Seleucus was deſirous of having him home, and ſending to Rome, by way of exchange, his own ſon Demetrius, who was but ten years old. Some authors are of opinion [o], that Seleucus in in this had no other view but to give his ſon a Roman education. Others conjecture, that he wanted Antiochus, to employ him in an expedition againſt Egypt during the minority of Philomator [p]; but what prompted him to ſend for Antiochus is not recorded by any anthentic hiſtory of thoſe times. The affair was warmly debated in the ſenate at Rome; but at length the exchange was accepted, and Antiochus ſet out for Aſia, about the ſame time that the young Demetrius ſet out for Rome. During the abſence of the two heirs to the crown, Heliodorus thinking this a fair opportunity of ſeizing the throne, by cutting off Seleucus, accordingly poiſoned him, and placed the crown on his own head. Thus was fulfilled the prophecy of Daniel, who, ſpeaking of the death of Antiochus the Great, Then ſhall ſtand up, ſays he, in his eſtate a raiſer of taxes in the glory of the kingdom; but within few years he ſhall be deſtroyed, neither in anger nor in battle, Theſe words evidently denote the ſhort and obſcure reign of Seleucus, and the kind of death which befel him; for he reigned only eleven years, and his death was neither in anger nor in battle; that is, neither in war abroad, nor in rebellion at home, but by the treachery of one of his own friends. The prophet calls him a raiſer of taxes, or as we read in the Hebrew text, a collector of taxes; and ſuch he was during the whole time of his reign, being obliged to pay the Romans, agreeable to the articles of peace between them and his father, a thouſand talents annually; and the laſt of theſe twelve years was the laſt of his life. He is ſaid to have once raiſed a conſiderable army with a deſign to aſſiſt Pharnaces king of Pontus, againſt Eumenes; but when he was ready to paſs mount Taurus, dreading the vengeance of the Roman people, he returned home, and diſbanded his troops [r]. Joſephus tells us [s], that he employed Hyrcanus the ſon of Joſeph, and nephew to Tobias, to gather the taxes on the eaſt ſide of the Jordan, where Hyrcanus on that occaſion built a ſtrong caſtle of white marble not far from the land of Heſhbon; the ſame author adds, that Seleucus appointed him governor of all that country, which he held the ſeven laſt years of that prince's reign, living all the time in war with the Arabians, and gained ſignal victories over them.

[n] 2 Maccab. iv. Euſeb. in Chron. [o] Salian. ad Ann. Mund. 3878.

Seleucus poiſoned. Year of the flood, 2823. Before Chriſt 176.

It

[p] Vailant. in hiſt. reg. Syr. [r] Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii. p. 302. [s] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 4, 5.

It is manifeſt from the ſecond book of the Maccabees, and alſo from Joſephus [t], that Seleucus had been in poſſeſſion of Cœle-Syria, Phœnice, and Judæa, ſome time before his death. For Apollonius was governor of thoſe provinces for Seleucus, Heliodorus was ſent by him to plunder the temple, and Onias, when oppreſſed by Simon, had recourſe to Seleucus king of Syria, and not to Ptolemy king of Egypt. But by what means, or on what occaſion thoſe provinces became ſubject to Seleucus, is what we find no where recorded. After the battle of Paneas, Antiochus, as we have related above, made himſelf maſter of all Cæle-Syria and Paleſtine; but when Ptolemy Epiphanes married his daughter, he agreed to reſtore them to him by way of dowry. And if they were reſtored, how came Seleucus to be poſſeſſed of them a new? Polybius [u] ſeems to inſinuate, that this agreement was never executed; for that author tells us, that the above-mentioned provinces continued ſubject to the king of Syria ever after the battle of Paneas; and adds, that Antiochus Epiphanes, who ſucceeded Seleucus, in the anſwer he gave to the embaſſadors, who came from Greece, to compoſe the differences that aroſe between him and Ptolemy Philometor, denied that Antiochus had ever agreed to deliver up Cæle-Syria to Ptolemy Epiphanes on the marriage of his daughter. The authority of Polybius would prompt us to believe that Cæle-Syria and Paleſtine, notwithſtanding the above-mentioned agreement, had been retained by the Syrian kings, if the contrary were not plain from the book of the Maccabees, and likewiſe from Joſephus [w], who tells us, that Hyrcanus and all the nobles of Cæle-Syria and Paleſtine, when news was brought them of the birth of Philometor, flocked to Alexandria to congratulate on that occaſion king Ptolemy Epiphanes, and Cleopatra his queen, which they certainly would not have done had thoſe provinces been ſubject to the king of Syria. Diodorus Siculus [x] tells us, that Ptolemy Epiphanes raiſed a powerful army with a deſign to make war upon Seleucus, but was prevented by death from putting his deſign in execution. Now it is not likely that Seleucus, being provoked thus by Epiphanes, taking advantage vantage of the minority of his son Philometor, pursued the war, which his father was ready to begin, and seized on those provinces. For it is certain from the book of the Maccabees, and likewise from Josephus, that Seleucus was in possession of those provinces, when he died. But to resume the thread of our history:

[t] 2 Maccab. c. 3, 4. [u] Polyb. legat. 72. p. 893. [w] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 4. [x] Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſie. p. 294, 297.

Antiochus Epiphanes.

ANTIOCHUS, brother of Seleucus, being arrived at Athens on his return from Rome, received there the news of his brother's death, and was at the same time told that Heliodorus had seized the crown, and was supported by a strong party; but that another was forming in favour of Ptolemy, who claimed the kingdom of Syria in right of his mother, the deceased king's sister. Hereupon Antiochus had recourse to Eumenes king of Pergamus, and to Attalus that king's brother, who conducted him into Syria at the head of a powerful army, drove out the usurper, and seated him on the throne [y]. As this king proved a cruel prosecutor of the Jews, the prophet Daniel [z] foretold every thing that was to befal him. He expresses himself with relation to his accession to the crown in the following words [a]: And in his (Seleucus's) estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom; but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries. It is said here, that to him they shall not give the honour of the kingdom; and truly he did not come to the crown either by right of birth, since his brother Seleucus had left behind him a son, who was his lawful heir; nor by the election of the people; but by the powerful assistance of Eumenes and Attalus, whom he gained by flattering speeches, and great promises. On his being settled on the throne he assumed the sirname of Epiphanes, that is, the illustrious, which title, as will soon appear, was never worse applied. The whole series of his life shews, that the epithet of vile, or, more agreeable to the original, despicable, given him by the holy prophet, suits better with his character. Polybius [b], Philarchus [c], Livy [d], and Diodorus Siculus [e], all heathen writers, and the two first his contemporaries, tell us that he frequently used to go out of his palace, attended only by two or three of his domestics, and ramble about the streets

His character.

[y] Appian. in Syriac. p. 116, 117. [z] Daniel. c. xi, & xii.
[a] Daniel. c. xi. v. 21. [b] Apud Athenæam. l. v. p. 193.
[c] Apud eundem. l. x. p. 438. [d] Liv. l. xii. [e] Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii. p. 304

ſtreets of Antioch ; that he ſpent whole days in the ſhops of goldſmiths and engravers, diſputing with them about the myſteries of their trades, which he ridiculouſly pretended to underſtand as well as they ; that he was not aſhamed to ſtoop ſo low as to converſe with the dregs of the people, and mix indiſcriminately with them in the places to which they reſorted, drinking and carouſing with them, though he had never ſeen them before ; that when he heard of any young rakes met together on a party of pleaſure, he never failed to intrude himſelf, and join in all their wanton frolics, without any regard to common decency, or his royal character ; that ſometimes diveſting himſelf of his royal robes, and putting on a Roman gown he run from ſtreet to ſtreet, as he had ſeen done in the elections of magiſtrates at Rome, taking ſome by the hand, embracing others, and begging all he met to favour him with their votes ; for ſometimes he ſet up for Ædile, at other times for Tribune, or ſome ſuch employment ; having thus got himſelf elected, he uſed to call for the curule chair, and ſitting down in it, decided petty ſuits relating to contracts, bargains and ſales made in the market, with as much gravity and attention, as if they had been matters of the higheſt concern. We are likewiſe told [f], that he was much given to drunkenneſs ; that he ſquandered away great part of his revenues in riotous exceſſes, and that when intoxicated with liquor, he ſcowered up and down the ſtreets, throwing money by handfuls among the populace, and crying out, Let him take it to whom fortune gives it. At other times he appeared in a Roman gown with a garland of roſes on his head, and in that garb walked about the ſtreets quite unaccompanied. If any one offered to follow him, they were ſure to be well pelted with ſtones, which he carried under his gown for that purpoſe. He took pleaſure in going into the public baths among the common people, where he expoſed himſelf by his indecent and ridiculous behaviour. This odd and extravagant conduct made his ſubjects look upon him as a madman ; whence inſtead of Epiphanes or the Illuſtrious, they uſed to ſtile him Epimanes, that is, the Madman [g]. S. Jerome tells us, that he was a moſt lewd prince, and did not even ſcruple

[f] Athen. l. x. p. 438. [g] Idem ibid.

ple to gratify his luſt publicly, and in the ſight of the people [h]. From what we have related, we leave our readers to judge, whether he beſt deſerved the title of Illuſtrious, which he aſſumed, or that of the Vile and Contemptible, which the prophet Daniel gave him.

SCARCE was Antiochus ſeated on the throne, when the brother of the high-prieſt Onias, whoſe name was Jeſus, which he afterwards changed into that of Jaſon, being ambitious of the high-prieſthood, to which was annexed in thoſe times, the regal power, applied to the king for it, and by an offer of three hundred and ſixty talents, beſides eighty more which he promiſed on another account, prevailed upon Antiochus to diſplace the righteous Onias, and advance him to that dignity. Nor was this all, as Onias was univerſally revered for his exemplary piety and ſtrict juſtice, Jaſon well knew that his authority would be of no weight ſo long as his brother continued at Jeruſalem; the intruder therefore procured from the king an order for his removal from Jeruſalem to Antioch, and his confinement to that place. As the public treaſury was quite empty, when Antiochus came to the crown by reaſon of the heavy tribute paid to the Romans the twelve foregoing years, Jaſon found the king diſpoſed to grant any thing for ready money; and therefore propoſed to advance an hundred and fifty talents more, on condition that the king would impower him to make as many of the inhabitants of Jeruſalem freemen of Antioch as he ſhould think fit, and give him leave to erect at Jeruſalem a Gymnaſium, or place of exerciſe, and an Ephebeum, or a place for the training up of youth after the Greek manner. The king complied as readily with theſe propoſals, as he had done with the former; and by this means Jaſon, on his return to Jeruſalem, drew over many of his countrymen from the party of Onias. For the Jews were at that time, generally ſpeaking, mighty fond of the Greek faſhions; whence they began to be reconciled to Jaſon, when they found him bent upon introducing the Greek cuſtoms among them. Beſides, the freedom of Antioch, which he could grant to whom he pleaſed, was attended with many valuable privileges under the Syro-Macedonian kings; whence many, in hopes of having it conferred upon them, eſpouſed the party of Jaſon with great animoſity; ſo that under his deteſtable reign the manners of the Jews were totally corrupted, and the cuſtoms of the Gentiles tiles introduced among them. They were ashamed of their circumcision, which was the distinguishing mark of the people of God. They built amphitheatres in Jerusalem for profane shews, and places for the most infamous debaucheries. The priests themselves were not ashamed to leave their sacred function, and run to the public sports, in which they often became actors [i].

[h] Hieron. in. Dan. c. 11. p. 37.

In Egypt ever since the death of Ptolemy Epiphanes, Cleopatra his widow, sister to Antiochus Epiphanes, had taken upon her the government of the kingdom and the tuiton of her infant son, and had conducted herself with great care and prudence. But she dying this year, the management of affairs fell into the hands of Leænnus, an Egyptian nobleman of great distinction, and Eulæus an eunuch, who was appointed to superintend the king's education. These no sooner entered on the administration, but they demanded Cæle-Syria and Palestine of Antiochus; a demand, which soon occasioned a war between the two crowns. As Cleopatra was mother to one, and sister to the other of these two kings, she had prevented them so long as she lived from coming to a rupture. But the new regents did not shew so much regard for Antiochus, nor scruple to demand what they took to be their sovereign's right. It must be owned, that the kings of Egypt had always possessed these provinces ever since the first Ptolemy, till the time that Antiochus the great wrested them out of the hands of Ptolemy Epiphanes, and left them to Seleucus his son, with no other right than that of conquest. The Egyptians, to make good their claim, argued, that in the last division of the empire between the four successors of Alexander, after the famous battle of Ipsus, these provinces had been assigned to Ptolemy; that he and his successors had held them ever since that partition, till Antiochus the great made himself master of them after the battle of Paneas, and that Antiochus had stipulated on the marrying of his daughter to Ptolemy Epiphanes, and made it the main article in the marriage-contract, to restore to him those provinces by way of dowry. Antiochus denied both these particulars, and pretended, that in the general division, which had been made of Alexander's empire, all Syria, including Cæle-Syria and Palestine, had been allotted to Seleucus Nicator, and therefore belonged to him as his lawful heir in the Syrian empire. As to the marriage-contract, by virtue of which the Egyptians demanded the reſtitution of thoſe provinces, he maintained, that there was no ſuch article in that agreement. Having thus laid down their reſpective claims without coming to any concluſion, the deciſion of the controverſy was at laſt referred to the ſword [k].

[i] 2 Maccab. 4, 10, 11, 12. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 6.

In the mean time the king of Egypt being declared of age, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the ſolemnity of his coronation, as was uſual among the Egyptians. On this occaſion Antiochus ſent Apollonius, one of the chief noblemen of his court, with the character of embaſſador to aſſiſt at the ſolemnity, and congratulate the young king in his name on his taking the adminiſtration into his own hands. This in outward appearance was done in honour of his nephew; but the real motive was to diſcover the deſigns of the court, and the meaſures they were taking with regard to the provinces of Cæle-Syria and Paleſtine. And accordingly being informed on the return of Apollonius, that war was intended againſt him, he immediately embarqued for Joppa to viſit the frontiers towards Egypt, and put them in a ſtate of defence againſt any attempts, which the Egyptians might make on that ſide. In this progreſs he took Jeruſalem in his way, and was received there by Jaſon with all the marks of honour which the baſeſt flattery could dictate, and that blind people were profuſe of their acclamations to an idolatrous prince, whoſe tyranny they were ſoon to experience. From Jeruſalem he went into Phœnice, and having ſettled all things in the places he paſſed through, he returned to Antioch [l]. The next year Jaſon ſent his brother Menelaus to Antioch to pay the tribute to the king, and negotiate ſome other affairs in his name. But Menelaus in the audience which he had, inſtead of purſuing his commiſſion, ſupplanted his brother, and obtained his office by offering three hundred talents more than Jaſon had given for it. Menelaus, on his return to Jeruſalem, was oppoſed by his brother, and even obliged to quit the city; but having recourſe to Antiochus, and promiſing to embrace his religion and the worſhip of the Greeks, he ſo far gained the king's favour, that he was ſent back with ſuch a power as Jaſon could not reſiſt; who thereupon left Jeruſalem, and retired into the country of the Ammonites. Upon his flight Menelaus

[k] Hieronymus in Dan. & Polyb. legat. 82. p. 308. legat. 72. p. 893. [l] 2 Maccab. IV. 21.

Menelaus took poſſeſſion of the high-prieſthood, and made good his promiſe to Antiochus, by apoſtatizing from the law of Moſes to the ſuperſtition of the Greeks, and ſeducing as many of his countrymen as he could. Having thus taken poſſeſſion of the high-prieſthood, he neglected paying the money he had promiſed, and was on that account ſummoned to appear before the king at Antioch. But before he reached that city, Antiochus was gone from thence to quell an inſurrection at Mallus and Tarſus, two cities of Cilicia. For the revenues of theſe two cities having been allotted to Antiochis, one of the king's concubines, for her maintenance, the inhabitants out of indignation, or perhaps becauſe Antiochis exacted upon them, roſe up in arms, and committed great diſorders. Antiochus therefore haſtened thither in perſon to appeaſe the ſedition, leaving the government of Antioch, during his abſence, to Andronicus, one of the chief men of his court. In the mean time Menelaus, by ſelling many of the gold veſſels of the temple, at Tyre and in the neighbouring cities, raiſed a ſufficient ſum, not only to pay the king, but to bribe Andronicus and the other courtiers to reinſtate him in the king's favour. Onias, who was then confined to Antioch, could not help reproving the apoſtate for the ſacrilege he had been guilty of in plundering the temple of the ſacred veſſels; which Menelaus not being able to brook, applied to Andronicus, and by promiſing a large ſum of money engaged him to diſpatch Onias, who, upon intelligence of what was plotting againſt him, took ſanctuary in the aſylum at Daphne. But Andronicus, having by fair promiſes prevailed upon him to quit the aſylum, treacherouſly ſlew him, and thereby earned the money which the impious Menelaus had promiſed him. His death was univerſally regretted by the Greeks, as well as the Jews of Antioch, who therefore joined in petitioning the king, to take cognizance of the murder which had been committed in his abſence. Antiochus, wicked as he was, had a great eſteem, and even veneration, for Onias; and therefore, to gratify his own reſentment, as well as that of the Antiochians, who had preſented him the petition, cauſed Andronicus, after he had been convicted of the crime laid to his charge, to be conducted with infamy to the place where the murder had been committed, and there put to death in ſuch manner as his crime deſerved [m]. Upon the authority of the ſecond book of the Mac-

[m] 2 Maccab. iv. 32, 33, 34, & ſeq.

Maccabees, we have rejected the teſtimony of Joſephus, who tells us [n], that Jaſon was not created high-prieſt till after the death of Onias. Nay in this Joſephus contradicts himſelf; for in his ſmall treatiſe of the Maccabees he relates this affair agreeable to the hiſtory we have followed. Antiochus, ſays he in that treatiſe, abrogating the high-prieſthood of Onias, put his brother Jaſon in his room, who promiſed to pay him a yearly tribute of three thouſand ſix hundred and ſixty talents; when he was in poſſeſſion of the high-prieſthood, he led the nation, eſtranged from their ancient manners and inſtitutions, into all ſorts of iniquity; and not only eſtabliſhed a Gymnaſium in the fortreſs of our country, but introduced a total neglect of the temple. Thus far Joſephus, agreeable to the hiſtory of the Maccabees in every particular, ſave the annual tribute, which he increaſes, if the copy is not corrupted, beyond all meaſure.

ANTIOCHUS having ever ſince the return of Apollonius from the Egyptian court been making the neceſſary preparations for the war, which he ſaw himſelf threatened with by Ptolemy on account of Cæle-Syria and Paleſtine, and finding himſelf in a condition to begin it; reſolved to defer it no longer, but to carry it into the enemy's country inſtead of waiting for it in his own. He imagined that as Ptolemy was then but ſixteen years of age, and governed entirely by weak miniſters, he ſhould be able to bring him to what terms he pleaſed. Beſides, the Romans, under whoſe protection the Egyptians had put themſelves, were not at leiſure to afford them any aſſiſtance, by reaſon of the war which they had on their hands with Perſes king of Macedon; thinking therefore that he could not have a more favourable conjuncture for putting an end to the quarrel, he reſolved forthwith to begin the war. However, to keep as fair with the Romans as the caſe would admit, he ſent an embaſſy to Rome to pay the arrears of the tribute that was due to the republic, and at the ſame to lay before the ſenate the right he had to the provinces of Cæle-Syria and Paleſtine then in his poſſeſſion, and to juſtify the war which he was obliged to engage in to maintain them [o]. Apollonius, who was at the head of the embaſſy, carried with him beſides the tribute, conſiderable preſents for the republic. When the Syrians arrived at Rome, and were introduced to the ſenate, their ſpeech Epiphanes ſends an embaſſy to Rome.

[n] Joſeph. Antiq. l. ii. c. 6. [o] Liv. l. xliii. c. 29. Polyb. legat. 71. p. 892. Juſtin. l. xxxiv. c. 2. Diodor. Sicul. legat. [illegible] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 6. Hieronym. in Dan. c. 11.

ſpeech conſiſted chiefly of apologies in the name of the king their maſter, for having ſo long delayed ſatisfying the Romans. For Seleucus had neglected to pay this debt, and Antiochus his ſucceſſor had not yet been in a condition to diſcharge it. After Apollonius had paid down the whole ſum, he offered, as a free gift, ſeveral vaſes of gold, which weighed five hundred pounds, returned the republic thanks for the excellent education their king had received at Rome, and the marks of honour that were paid him during his abode there, and concluded with laying before the ſenate his claim to Cæle-Syria and Paleſtine, and demanding that the alliance between Rome and Syria might be renewed. The ſenate received the envoys very graciouſly, defrayed their expences, and made them preſents of a conſiderable value. The prætor Attilus was ordered to draw up the act of confederacy upon the ſame foot on which it had been made with Antiochus the Great. The money which the embaſſadors delivered was put into the hands of the quæſtors, and the gold veſſels conſigned to the Cenſors, who offered them to ſuch of the gods as they thought fit. As for the king's claim to the provinces of Cæle-Syria and Paleſtine, the ſenate put off the diſcuſſing of that point to a more proper ſeaſon, returning no anſwer on that head [p].

Invades Egypt.

BEFORE the embaſſadors returned from Rome, Antiochus, putting himſelf at the head of his army, had marched towards the frontiers of Egypt. There he was met by the forces of Ptolemy between mount Caſius and Peluſium. Hereupon an engagement enſued, in which the Egyptians were routed at the very firſt onſet. Antiochus, taking advantage of this victory, fortified the frontiers of his dominions ſo well on that ſide, that they ſerved ever after as a barrier to check the utmoſt efforts of the Egyptians attempting to recover thoſe provinces. This was his firſt expedition into Egypt, after which, without engaging in any other enterprize that year, he returned to Tyre, and put his army into winter-quarters [q].

DURING his ſtay at Tyre, three deputies from the Sanhedrim of Jeruſalem waited upon him to complain of Menelaus, whom they convicted, in the king's preſence, of impiety, ſacrilege, and many violences and diſorders. Hereupon the king reſolved to put him to death; but Menelaus, having bribed Ptolemy Macron (S), one of the king's miniſters, with a large ſum of money, not only eſcaped the ſentence which was ready to be pronounced againſt him, but prevailed upon the king to put the three deputies to death, as if they had accuſed him unjuſtly, which was ſuch a bare-faced piece of oppreſſion and injuſtice, that the Tyrians, touched with compaſſion at their unhappy fate, cauſed them to be honourably interred [r].

[p] Liv. Polyb. Juſtin. ibid. [q] Hieronym. Liv. Polyb. ibid.

His ſecond expedition into Egypt.

ANTIOCHUS having ſpent the whole winter in making freſh preparations for a ſecond expedition into Egypt, as ſoon as the ſeaſon allowed him to take the field, marched to the frontiers of that country, where he gained a ſecond victory over the forces of Ptolemy, took Peluſium, and led his army into the very heart of the kingdom. In this laſt overthrow it was in his power to have cut off all the Egyptians to a man; but inſtead of purſuing this advantage, he took care to put a ſtop to the ſlaughter, riding about the field in perſon, and forbidding his men to put any more to death. This clemency gained him the hearts of the Egyptians ſo far, that

[r] 2 Maccab. xliv---l.

(S) This Ptolemy Macron having been formerly governor of the iſland of Cyprus under king Ptolemy Philometor, had during his minority kept in his own hands all the revenues of that iſland; and could never be prevailed upon to deliver them up to the miniſters, notwitſtanding their earneſt call for them. But as ſoon as the king was declared to be out of his minority, he brought the whole ſum to Alexandria, and paid it into the royal treaſury. As it was a ſupply very much wanted at that time to anſwer the exigences of the goverment, he was highly commended for his conduct. But afterwards exaſparated at ſome ill treatment he met with from the miniſters, or becauſe he was not rewarded for ſo important a ſervice according to his expectation, he revolted from Ptolemy, went over to Antiochus, and delivered up to him the iſland of Cyprus. The king received him with great favour, took him into the number of his principal friends, and appointed him governor of Cœle-Syria and Paleſtine, ſending Crates, who had commanded in the caſtle of Jeruſalem under Soſtratus, to be governor of Cyprus in his ſtead (59). Great mention is made of Ptolemy Macron in the books of the Maccabees.

(59) Valeſii excerpt. ex Polyb. p. 126.

that when he advanced up into the country, all the inhabitants voluntarily ſubmitted to him; by which means he made himſelf maſter of Memphis and all the reſt of Egypt, except Alexandria, which held out againſt him [s]. In this ſecond invaſion Philopator fell into the hands of the conqueror; but whether he was taken priſoner, or ſurrendered himſelf to him of his own accord, is uncertain. The latter ſeems to ſome moſt likely; for Antiochus entertained him very kindly, allowed him his liberty, kept him at his own table, and carrying him with him to Memphis, affected to be extremely careful of the intereſt of the young king, and to manage the affairs of the kingdom as tutor and guardian to him. But when he once ſaw himſelf in poſſeſſion of the country, he ſeized all that was valuable for himſelf, pillaged the cities, and cauſed ſuch deſolations as are not to be expreſſed, enriching himſelf and his army with the ſpoils of the plundered people. Philometor all this time made a pitiful figure; in the field he had always kept as far as poſſible from danger, and had not even ſhewn himſelf to thoſe that fought for him. Afterwards he ſubmitted to Antiochus in a moſt abject manner, ſuffering himſelf to be deprived of ſo large a kingdom, without making one ſingle effort to preſerve it. This, however, was not owing ſo much to his want of courage and natural capacity, for he afterwards gave many inſtances of both, as to the effeminate education he had received under Eulæus his governor. For that eunuch, who was alſo his prime miniſter, had taken care, by corrupting him with all manner of luxury, to make him as unfit for buſineſs as he was able, that when the young prince was grown up, he might be as neceſſary to him, and conſequently have the ſame power in the kingdom, as he had during his minority [t].

While Antiochus was thus employed in Egypt, a falſe report of his death prevailing all over Paleſtine, Jaſon thought this a proper opportunity to recover his ſtation at Jeruſalem, and therefore marched thither with above a thouſand men; and having by the aſſiſtance of the party he had in the city made himſelf maſter of it, and obliged Menelaus to retire into the citadel, practiſed all ſorts of cruelties on his fellow-citizens, unmercifully putting to death all thoſe who who fell into his hands, and whom he considered as enemies [u]. When advice of this was brought to Antiochus in Egypt, he concluded, that the Jews had made a general insurrection, and therefore marched with all haste out of Egypt into Judæa to quell it. What most provoked him was his being told that the inhabitants of Jerusalem upon a false report of his death had made great rejoicings. He therefore in a great rage laid siege to the city, took it by storm, and in three days time slew forty thousand of the inhabitants, and taking as many prisoners sold them for slaves to the neighbouring nations. Nor did he stop here, but entering forcibly into the temple and the most sacred places, polluted with his presence the holy of holies itself, whither the wicked Menelaus led him. And to offer the greater indignity to that sacred place, he sacrificed a sow on the altar of burnt-offerings, and having caused part of it to be boiled, he ordered the temple to be sprinkled all over with the water, in which it had been boiled, that he might thereby utterly defile it (T). After this, adding sacrilege to profanation, he carried away the altar of incense, the shew-bread table, the candlestick of seven branches belonging to the sanctuary, which were all of gold, and several other vessels, utensils and gifts of kings likewise of gold, to the value of eighteen hundred talents. To complete the calamity of the Jews,

[s] 1 Maccab. xvii, xviii. & 2 Maccab. v. 1. Hieronym. in Dan. xi. 24, 25. Diodor Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii. p. 311. [t] Maccab, i. 19. Juſtin. l. xxxv. c. 2.

Takes Jerusalem, and profanes the temple.

[u] 1 Maccab. i. 20---25. 2 Maccab. v. vi. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 8.

(T) This circumstance is mention by Diodorus Siculus in the following words: "Antiochus Epiphanes, having overcome the "Jews entered the holy oracle of God, to which the priests on- "ly had access. There he found the statue of a man with a long "beard, holding a book in his hand, and sitting upon an ass; "which he took to be Moses, who built Jerusalem, founded the "nation, and established those laws which are hated by all na- "tions. But he desiring to take away what all nations abhorred, "did his utmost to abrogate the laws. Therefore he sacrificed a "great sow to the founder, on the altar of God, which stood in "the open air, and poured blood both upon the statue and the "altar, and boiling the flesh commanded the holy books con- "taining their laws to be sprinkled with the water; the immortal "taper, as they term it, which always burnt in the temple, he "commanded to be put out, and compelled the chief-priest and "other Jews to eat hog's flesh". Thus far Diodorus Siculus (60) who Jews, Antiochus on his departure from Jeruſalem appointed governor of Judæa one Philip, a Phrygian, who was a man of a moſt cruel and inhuman temper, and Andronicus, another of the like diſpoſition, governor of Samaria, and left Menelaus, the moſt wicked of the three, in the office of high-prieſt.

In the mean time the Alexandrians, ſeeing Philometor in the hands of Antiochus, whom he ſuffered to govern his kingdom as he pleaſed, looked upon him as loſt to them; and therefore placed his younger brother on the throne, giving him the name of Euergetes, which was afterwards changed into that of Phyſcon or great-bellied, his luxury and gluttony having made him remarkably corpulent, and by this name he is moſt commonly mentioned in hiſtory. On his aſcending the throne, Cineas and Cumanus were appointed his chief miniſters, and to them was committed the care of reſtoring, if poſſible, the affairs of the kingdom to their former flouriſhing condition [w].

His third expedition into Egypt.

Antiochus being informed of what was tranſacting in Egypt, took occaſion from thence to return a third time into that country, upon the ſpecious pretence of reſtoring the depoſed

[w] Porphyrius in Græc. Euſeb. Scaliger. p. 60, & 68. Polyb. legat. 81. p. 907. Liv. l. xliv. c. 19.

(60), who in this particular agrees with Joſephus. This author telling us, that Antiochus, after he had made himſelf maſter of the city, ſacrificed a ſow upon the altar, and cauſed the temple to be ſprinkled with the water, in which it had been boiled (61). And here we cannot help obſerving, that Joſephus in his account of Antiochus's taking the city of Jeruſalem, not only contradicts all the antients, but even himſelf. For Polybius, Strabo, Timagenes, Apollodorus, Nicolaus Damaſcenus, &c. tell us, that Antiochus took Jeruſalem by ſtorm after he had lain a conſiderable time before it; and Joſephus in his hiſtory of the Jewiſh war (62) writes in expreſs terms, that Antiochus took the city by force, and repreſents him as enraged by what he had ſuffered in the ſiege; and in another place (63), he ſpeaks of thoſe who were ſlain in the ſiege fighting againſt Antiochus in defence of the place. But for all this, in his antiquities he tells us, that Antiochus entered the city without force, thoſe of his party within opening the gates to him. But this is not the only place where that writer is inconſiſtent with himſelf.

(60) Diodor. Sicul. l. xxxiv. apud Photium cod. 244. (61) Joſeph. Antiquit. l. xiii. c. 16. (62) Joſeph. de bell. Judaic. l. 1. c. 1. (63) Idem ibid. l. vi. c. 11.

depoſed king; but in reality to make himſelf maſter of the kingdom. Having therefore defeated the Alexandrians in a ſea-fight near Peluſium he again entered that unhappy country at the head of a powerful army, and advanced directly to Alexandria with a deſign to beſiege it. Whereupon the young king, conſulting with his two miniſters, agreed to ſummon a council compoſed of all the chief officers of the army, and to deliberate with them on the moſt proper means to extricate himſelf out of his preſent difficulties. After long debates in the council they came at laſt to this reſolution; that as their affairs were in a very bad ſituation, it was abſolutely neceſſary for them to make up matters with Antiochus, and that for this purpoſe the embaſſadors, who were then at Alexandria, from ſeveral of the Greek ſtates to the Egyptian court, ſhould be deſired to interpoſe their mediation. The embaſſadors readily complied with the king's requeſt, and being accompanied by two embaſſadors from Ptolemy forthwith ſailed up the Nile to wait on Antiochus with propoſals of peace. Antiochus received them in his camp very kindly, and having given them the firſt day a noble entertainment, appointed the next to hear their propoſals. The Achæans ſpoke the firſt, and afterwards the reſt in their turns. All agreed in aſcribing the calamities of the war to the ill conduct of Eulæus and the minority of Ptolemy Philometor, made artful apologies in favour of the young king, and did all that lay in their power to ſoften Antiochus, and bring him to terms of peace with his nephew, laying great ſtreſs on their affinity. Antiochus in his anſwer to them acknowledged all to be true, that they had ſaid, as to the origin and cauſe of the war, and then took the opportunity of laying before them his title to the provinces of Cœle-Syria, and Paleſtinae, exhibiting the various reaſons which we have already taken notice of, and producing ſome authentic inſtruments in proof of all that he alledged, which were judged ſo ſtrong, that all thoſe preſent were of opinion that he had the beſt right to thoſe provinces. As for the propoſals of peace, he referred them to a future treaty, which, he ſaid, he would readily enter into with them, when two perſons then abſent, whom he named, ſhould be with him, without whom, he told them, he would not take a ſingle ſtep in ſo important a negotiation. Having returned this anſwer, he raiſed his camp, went to Neucratis, and from thence marched to Alexandria, which city he cloſely beſieged. In this extremity Ptolemy Euergetes and Cleopatra his ſiſter, who were in the city, ſent embaſſadors to

Rome,

Rome, repreſenting their caſe, and imploring the aſſiſtance of that powerful republic. The embaſſadors being, ſoon after their arrival at Rome, introduced to the ſenate, appeared there dreſſed in the deepeſt mourning, and carrying olive-branches in their hands. After they had fallen proſtrate before the conſcript fathers, they expreſſed themſelves in the following terms. Egypt, ſaid they, which you have protected, and whoſe kings have been under your tuition, is now upon the very brink of ruin. Alexandria is beſieged; and to complete our misfortunes, the enemy, who threatens us, has found favour here. Antiochus, king of Syria, who has been brought up here as your hoſtage, is the ſcourge which the gods have brought upon us. If therefore Egypt has deſerved your compaſſion, as ſhe has always been faithful to you, ward off the blow that threatens her with deſtruction. Nothing is more eaſy to you than to fix on the head of our ſovereign, and your friend and ally, a crown which an ambitious uncle would bereave him of. Antiochus reveres your authority, and pays a deference to your orders; one word from you will put an end to his unjuſt conqueſts and our fears. How glorious will it be for Rome to reſtore, with one word, tranquillity to Egypt! On the contrary, what a reflection would it be on your republic, if our ſovereign ſhould be forced to fly hither for refuge againſt an invaſion, which you might with ſo much eaſe have prevented? The danger is imminent, and the leaſt dilatorineſs in your deliberations will make the diſeaſe incurable [x]. Both compaſſion and policy inclined the ſenate to favour the ſuppliants. They plainly ſaw, that it would be dangerous to ſuffer Antiochus to grow ſo powerful as the uniting the crown of Egypt to that of Syria would make him. The ſenate therefore reſolved to ſend without delay an embaſſy into Egypt to put an end to the war. The perſons appointed for this important negotiation were Caius Popilius Lœnas, Caius Decimius, and Caius Hoſtilius. Their inſtructions were, that they ſhould firſt wait on Antiochus, and afterwards on Ptolemy, ſhould order them in the name of the ſenate to ſuſpend all hoſtilities, and put an end to the war; which if either of them ſhould refuſe to do, they were to let him know, that the Romans would no longer look upon him as their friend and ally. As the danger was imminent, three days after the reſolution

The Egyptians apply to the Roman ſenate.

[x] Polyb. legat. 90. p. 915. & legat. 84. p. 909. Liv. l. xliv. c. 19. Juſtin. l. xxxiv. c. 2. reſolution was taken in the ſenate they ſet out together with the Egyptian embaſſadors from Rome[y] (U).

In the mean time embaſſadors arrived in Egppt from Rhodes, ſent by that republic on purpoſe to make up matters between the contending parties. Theſe landing at Alexandria went from thence, after having received the proper inſtructions from the miniſters of that court, to the camp of Antiochus before the town, and uſed their utmoſt endeavours to make a thorough reconciliation between him and his nephew, inſiſting on the long friendſhip and alliance which had ſubſiſted between them and both crowns, and the obligations which they thought themſelves under on this account to uſe their beſt offices, in order to ſettle a good underſtanding between them. But while they were making long harangues on theſe topics, Antiochus interrupting them, declared in few words, that there was no occaſion for long ſpeeches on that ſubject, that the kingdom belonged to Philometor the elder brother, with whom he had concluded a peace, and contracted a ſtrict friendſhip, and that if they would reſtore the crown to him, the war would be ended at once. Thus he ſpoke, but harboured very different deſigns in his heart. The reſiſtance he met with at Alexandria, which city he plainly ſaw he ſhould never be able to maſter, had made him change his plan, and conclude, that the ſureſt way to compaſs his deſign was to keep up an animoſity between the two brothers, and engage them in a war againſt each other, which as it would ſoon exhauſt the kingdom, would give him a fair opportunity of overpowering both, and ſeizing the whole for himſelf. With this view he raiſed the ſiege of Alexandria, marched towards Memphis, and there put Philometor in poſſeſſion of the whole kingdom, except Peluſium

[y] Liv. l. xliv. c. 9. Polyb. legat. 90. p. 915.

(U) The time of the departure of the embaſſadors from Rome is thus expreſſed in an antient diary, which Pighius has inſerted in the ſecond volume of his annals (64). The third day before the nones of April, C. Popilius Lœnas, C. Decimius, and C. Hoſtilius, are ſent embaſſadors to the kings of Syria and Egypt to put an end to the war between them. The embaſſadors early in the morning, attended by a troop of their clients and relations, ſacrificed in the temple of Caſtor to the houſhold gods of the Roman people a bull, and thus concluded their ſacrifices.

(64) Vide Pighii Annal. ad Annum urbis 585.

Peluſium, which he retained, that he might re-enter Egypt, having the key of that country in his hands, the inſtant matters were ripe for his purpoſe. Having thus ſettled things agreeable to his new ſcheme, he returned to Antioch [z].

PHILOMETOR being rouſed at length from the deep lethargy into which his indolence and effeminacy had plunged him, had penetration enough to ſee into Antiochus's deſign. His keeping of Peluſium was a ſufficient indication to him, that he held this gate of Egypt with no other view but to invade the country, when his brother and he ſhould have waſted their ſtrength by their domeſtic broils, and not be in a condition to make head againſt him; in which caſe they would both fall victims to his unbounded ambition. The inſtant therefore that Antiochus left Egypt he ſent to his brother intreating him to lay aſide all animoſity, and make a thorough reconciliation, leſt Antiochus, taking advantage of their domeſtic feuds, ſhould diſpoſſeſs them both of the kingdom. Ptolemy Phyſcon readily embraced the propoſal, and by the mediation of Cleopatra, who was ſiſter to both, an agreement was made upon terms, that the two brothers ſhould reign jointly. After this Philometor returned to Alexandria, and Egypt was reſtored to its former tranquillity, to the great joy of the inhabitants, particularly of the Alexandrians, who had greatly ſuffered by the war [a]. But the two brothers, not doubting but Antiochus would ſoon invade the kingdom anew, ſent embaſſadors into Greece to hire there ſome auxiliaries (W), which indeed was a very prudent ſtep;

[z] Liv. l. xlv. c. 11. [a] Liv. ibid. Juſtin. l. xxxiv. c. 2. Porphyr. in Græc. Euſeb. Scaliger. p. 60, & in Euſeb. Chron. p. 68. Polyb. legat. 89. p. 912.

(W) Theſe embaſſadors where ſent into Achaia, deſiring in the two kings names only a thouſand foot, under the command of Lycortas, and two hundred horſe under the conduct of his ſon Polybius the hiſtorian. The aſſembly of the Achæans was then ſitting at Corinth, and Callicrates, who preſided in it, oppoſed the requeſt of the embaſſadors, pretending that it was not for the intereſt of the Achæan confederacy to concern themſelves with foreign affairs; but that they ought to keep their troops at home, that they might be in a readineſs to aſſiſt the Romans againſt Perſes. Lycortas and Polybius anſwered Callicrates, and in their anſwer obſerved that Polybius having waited on the Roman conſul Marcius, who commanded the army in Macedon, and offered him the ſtep; for Antiochus hearing of the reconciliation of the two brothers, and finding his fine ſcheme thereby entirely defeated, fell iuto a great rage, and reſolved to pull off the maſk, and employ tbe whole force of his kingdom againſt both. Accordingly early in the ſpring he ſent his fleet to Cyprus to ſecure that iſland, and at the ſame time marched in perſon by land at the head of a powerful army to reduce the kingdom of Egypt, and ſeize it for himſelf, without pretending, as he had done before, to eſpouſe the cauſe, and ſupport the intereſt of one of his nephews. On his arrival at Rhinocorura he was met by embaſſadors from Philometor, who after having complimented him in their maſter's name and told him that their ſovereign owed his reſtoration to his good offices, conjured him not to deſtroy his own work, but to ſuffer him peaceably to enjoy the crown, which he wore by his favour. But Antiochus, now throwing off the maſk, and laying aſide thoſe tender and affectionate expreſ-

His fourth expedition into Egypt.

ſions

the ſuccours which the Achæans had agreed to ſend him, the conſul had thanked him, and at the ſame time told him, that ſince he had got footing in Macedon, he ſhould not want any foreign aid; and hence they concluded, that the Achæans ought not, on that pretence to refuſe the kings of Egypt the ſuccours they required. They added, that as the Achæan republic could, without the leaſt inconveniency, raiſe thirty or forty thouſand men, ſo ſmall a number, as was deſired by the princes, could not leſſen their ſtrength; that they ought to ſeize this opportunity of aſſiſting them; that it would be a monſtrous piece of ingratitude to requite in this manner the many favours which they had received from the kings of Egypt; and that their refuſal on this occaſion would even be an infringment of the treaties concluded between them and that crown. This ſpeech moved the members of the aſſembly, who were all for ſending immediately to the kings the ſuccours they required; which Callicrates obſerving, diſmiſſed the aſſembly, pretending, that it was not lawful to debate on an affair of this nature in a general meeting. It was therefore referred to a particular aſſembly, that was ſoon after, held at Sicyon. In this all the members were of the ſame opinion with Lycortas and Polybius, when Callicrates produced a forged letter from Marcius the Roman conſul, wherein he exhorted the Achæans to interpoſe their mediation, and uſe their good offices in order to put an end to the war between the Ptolemies and Antiochus. This letter which no one ſuſpected to be forged, determined the Achæan confederates to ſend an embaſſy only to the contending princes (65).

(65) Polyb. legat. 89---91.

ſions which he had hitherto made ſhow of, returned the embaſſadors this haughty anſwer; that he would not grant peace to either of the brothers, but upon condition that the iſland of Cyprus, the city of Peluſium with all the lands on that branch of the Nile on which it ſtood, and the provinces of Cœle-Syria and Paleſtine, were delivered up to him for ever. Having thus declared his real deſign, he fixed a day for their returning him an anſwer to his demand, which not being ſatisfactory, he entered Egypt in an hoſtile manner, and having reduced the whole country as far as Memphis, received there the ſubmiſſion of moſt of the other cities and provinces. From Memphis he marched to Alexandria with a deſign to beſiege that city, the reduction of which would have made him abſolute maſter of all Egypt. And this he would without all doubt have accompliſhed, had not the Roman embaſſadors put a ſtop to his further progreſs, and daſhed at once all the deſigns which he had been ſo long carrying on, in order to poſſeſs himſelf of that country [b].

The Roman embaſſadors oblige him to quit Egypt.

THE embaſſadors came up with him at Eleuſina, a village but four miles diſtant from Alexandria, and Popilius accoſted him with an air of gravity proper to gain himſelf reſpect. As the king was intimately acquainted with Popilius and had contracted great familiarity with him, while he was an hoſtage at Rome, as he drew near him, he offered him his hand, which was an uncommon mark of familiarity and diſtinction from ſo great a prince. But Popilius diſdaining this kind reception, told him, that the public intereſt of his country muſt take place of private friendſhip, and that he would not join hands with him till he had firſt read to him the decree of the ſenate, with which he was ſent. I ſhall judge, ſaid he, by your ſubmiſſion, or refuſal, whether you ought to be treated as a friend or an enemy. If you obey, I ſhall receive all marks of your friendſhip with joy. Theſe words were very ſhocking to a victorious and powerful king at the head of a numerous army. However Antiochus took the decree which Popilius offered him, and after having read it, told him that he would adviſe with his council about it, and return him an anſwer in a ſhort time. But the proud republican inſiſting on an immediate anſwer, drew a circle round him in the ſand with a

[b] Liv. & Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

a rod, which he held in his hand, and raiſing his voice, You ſhall not go out of this circle, ſaid he, till you either accept or reject the propoſal I have made to you. I expect you will pay me the reſpect that is due to the authority of the Roman people and ſenate. The king ſtruck with this ſtrange and peremptory way of proceeding, heſitated a moment, and then gave this anſwer, which would better have become a ſlave, than a great king. Then I muſt ſatisfy you, Popilius, I will do what your republic expects from me. He had no ſooner ſpoke than all the three embaſſadors *offered him their hands at once, and Popilius behaved thence*forth according to his former friendſhip with him. The Roman embaſſadors, after Antiochus had left Egypt, returned to Alexandria, and having there put the laſt hand to the treaty of peace and reconciliation between the two brothers, ſailed to Cyprus, which Antiochus had conquered, obliged him to withdraw his troops from that iſland, and then returned to Rome to acquaint the ſenate with the ſucceſs of their negotiation [c]. They were ſoon followed by embaſſadors from Antiochus, and the two Ptolemies. The former being introduced to the ſenate made the following ſpeech, which ſufficiently ſhewed what a mean-ſpirited prince Antiochus was: Though Popilius, ſaid they, communicated your pleaſure to the king our maſter at a time when all Egypt was ready to ſink under his arms; yet he preferred obedience to victory. He thought himſelf as indiſpenſably obliged to ſubmit to the deciſions of Rome, as to fulfil the will of the immortal gods. To this fulſome ſpeech the ſenate returned the following anſwer; Antiochus did wiſely in putting our orders in execution. The ſenate and people of Rome are ſatisfied with his conduct. After the Syrian ambaſſadors, thoſe from Egypt were introduced; they addreſſed the ſenate in the like extravagant ſtrain; To you, conſcript fathers, ſaid they, we owe the deliverance of Egypt, and the concord that now reigns among us. The departure of Antiochus, and the union between the two rival princes by you brought to a happy iſſue, have ſecured our liberty, and reſtored peace to the kingdom. A double benefit! for which the kings and people of Egypt are as much indebted to you, as children to their parents rents, or mortals to the immortal gods. The ſenate anſwered in a few words; Rome, ſaid they, ſhares your happineſs, and is pleaſed with your gratitude. Egypt may always depend on her protection. After theſe compliments were paid the Prætor was ordered to make the embaſſadors the uſual preſents [d].

[c] Polyb. legat. 92. p. 916. Liv. l. xlv. c. 11, 12. Juſtin. l. xxxiv. c. 3. Appian. in Syriac. Val. max. l. vi. c. iv. Velleius Patercul. l. i. c. 10. Plut. in Apophtheg. c. 32. Hieronym. in Dan. xi. 27.

Antiochus, on his return from Egypt, being highly provoked to ſee himſelf thus obliged to quit a kingdom, which he looked upon as his own, vented his rage upon the unhappy city of Jeruſalem, which had no ways offended him. On his march through Paleſtine he detached twenty-two thouſand men under the command of Apollonius with orders utterly to deſtroy the place. Apollonius arriving at Jeruſalem, carefully concealed his orders, and behaved in a friendly manner till the next ſabbath, when ſeing all the people aſſembled in their ſynagogues to perform the religious duties of the day, he thought that the moſt proper time for putting his bloody commiſſion in execution. Accordingly he let looſe all his troops upon the unarmed and defenceleſs multitude, ordering them to put all the men to the ſword, and ſeize the women and children, who by the king's orders were to be ſold for ſlaves. This barbarous command was executed with the utmoſt rigor and cruelty; the ſoldiers inhumanly butchered all the men they could meet with; inſomuch, that the very channels in the ſtreets flowed with blood. They afterwards plundered the city, and ſet it on fire in ſeveral places, pulled down the houſes, demoliſhed the walls, and built with the ruins, which the fire had ſpared, a fortreſs on the top of one of the hills of the city of David, over-againſt the temple, which it commanded. This fortreſs they made their place of arms to keep the whole nation in awe, ſtored it with all manner of proviſions, and laid up in it all the ſpoils which they had taken in the plunder of the city. From hence the garriſon uſed to ſally out upon thoſe who came to worſhip the true God in the temple, ſprinkling the ſanctuary with blood, and defiling it with all manner of pollutions, which their malice and hatred to the Jewiſh nation could ſuggeſt. The temple was therefore deſerted, and a ſtop put to the daily ſacrifices, none of the true ſervants of God daring to go thither to worſhip [e]. But the deſolations he cauſed in Judæa, Vents his rage upon Jeruſalem.

[d] Liv. l. xlv. Polyb. legat. 92. Val. Max. l. vi. c. 4.
[e] Polyb. ibid. 1. Maccab. i. 29, 40. 1 Maccab. v. 24, 25, 26. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 7. & in præfat. ad hiſtor. de Bell. Judaic. & l. i. c. 1. & l. vi. c. 11. ejuſdem hiſtor.

the cruel perſecution which he ſtirred up againſt the true believers, and the bloody war which he carried on againſt the people of God, with the generous reſiſtance made firſt by Mattathias, and afterwards by his ſon the brave Judas Maccabœus, we ſhall deſcribe at length in the hiſtory of the Jews, as in a more proper place.

After ſeveral of Antiochus's generals had been defeated, and the armies they commanded cut to pieces by Judas Maccabœus, the king of Syria ſent at length Lyſias, one of the greateſt lords of his court, to complete the abolition of the law of God, and the deſtruction of its few defenders. The Syrian army deſigned for this purpoſe conſiſted of ſixty thouſand men; and theſe preparations alarmed Tiberius Gracchus, whom the Roman Senate had ſent to viſit all the kings, republics, and free cities in the eaſt. He immediately flew to Antioch to watch the ſteps, and examine the deſigns of the king, whom he ſoon found to be no ways a formidable enemy. During the ſtay of Gracchus at Antioch, Antiochus hearing that Paulus Æmilius the Roman general, after having conquered Perſes king of Macedon, and ſubdued that kingdom, had celebrated games at Amphipolis on the river Strymon, cauſed the ſame to be exhibited at Daphne near Antioch, having firſt ſent emiſſaries into all parts to invite ſpectators, and to bring at an immenſe expence, the beſt actors and moſt ſkilful workmen in Europe and Aſia. The games were celebrated with incredible pomp and magnificence, and were by far the fineſt that had ever been in Syria (X). The part the king

(X) Polybius gives us the following account of the ſolemn proceſſion which preceded the ſports. In the firſt place marched five thouſand men, all in the flower of their age, and in the attire of Roman ſoldiers; theſe were followed by the like number of young men in the Myſian dreſs; next to them came three thouſand Cilicians in light armor, with crowns of gold on their heads; then came three thouſand Thracians, five thouſand Galatians, many of them having ſilver ſhields, two hundred and forty couple of gladiators, a thouſand young men mounted on Nicæan horſes, three thouſand riding other horſes, moſt of them with gold trappings, and gold crowns. Theſe were ſucceeded by a thouſand of the king's friends all on horſeback with moſt coſtly trappings; four thouſand choice horſemen, all in purple robes interwoven with gold; a hundred chariots drawn by ſix horſes abreaſt, and forty-two by four horſes; eight hundred youths with crowns of gold, walking before the ſtatues of the Syrian and Greek deities and heroes, which were carried by men in moſt rich king there acted during the whole time, answered in every respect the character which Daniel had given of him, calling him a vile and despicable person. He exposed himself by a thousand indecent actions to the scorn and ridicule of that numerous assembly, and caused more laughter than the best pantomimes; insomuch, that many of the spectators shocked at a conduct so unworthy of a prince, and so repugnant to all rules of modesty and decorum, fled from the shows and returned home. On this occasion he brought out before the people all the vases and valuable moveables in his treasury, which had never before been seen in public; and there is no doubt

rich and costly robes, and attended by a thousand pages, all belonging to Dionysius the king's secretary, and each of them carrying a silver vessel, weighing a thousand drachmas; the king's pages, to the number of six hundred, carrying vessels of gold, two hundred women on foot, with chalices of gold full of sweet-smelling waters to sprinkle the spectators. The procession was closed by fourscore women in a very rich and expensive attire, carried in litters with legs, according to the fashion of those days, of massy gold, and five hundred more in litters with legs of silver. Besides the procession, sports, shews, and diversions of all kinds were exhibited every day for the space of a month; during which time the king entertained all the spectators of any note or rank at fifteen hundred tables, which were daily served at an immense charge with the most expensive dishes of Europe and Asia. In the rooms were placed fifteen large jars of gold, filled with precious ointments for the use of the king's guests. In short, the whole was performed with such order, elegancy, and splendor, as can hardly be expressed. But most of the spectators were more offended at the mean and unbecoming behaviour of the king, than pleased with all the rest. At the procession he appeared on a little palfrey, riding full speed up and down, as if he had not been in his right senses. He waited in person sometimes at one table, and sometimes at another, walking in his royal robes, and with the diadem on his head, before those who brought in the dishes. Sometimes he took it in his head to lye down on the floor, and there with a thousand indecent actions put his guests quite out of countenance. He was once carried into the room, where his guests of most distinction were entertained, in the disguise of a pantomime, and laid down on the floor as if he had been dead; but being roused by a sudden flourish of instruments, he started up, and began to dance with so many ridiculous gestures, that the whole company, shocked to the highest degree at such a mean behaviour in a king, rose up at once, and left the room (66).

(66) Polyb. apud Athenæum, l. v. c. 4. & l. x. c. 12. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valesii, p. 321.

doubt but the ſpoils of the temple of Jeruſalem were the fineſt part of the ſhow. Towards the Roman deputy Antiochus behaved himſelf with the meaneſt flattery, attending him like a ſlave, and giving him his own palace to live in, while he himſelf lodged in a borrowed houſe the whole time Tiberius continued at Antioch; nay, he even offered to reſign his crown to him; which offer the wiſe Roman rejected with the utmoſt indignation, and judging of the king from what he himſelf had ſeen, he acquainted his republic, that they had no reaſon to be under the leaſt apprehenſion of any danger from the king of Syria [d].

SCARCE was the Roman envoy gone, when news was brought to Antiochus, that the armies, which he had ſent againſt the Jews, were entirely cut off. Hereupon the king in a great rage drew all his troops together, which formed a very numerous army, being fully determined to deſtroy the whole Jewiſh nation, and ſettle new colonies in their country. But when he came to pay his army, he found his treaſury ſo exhauſted that there was not money in it ſufficient for that purpoſe, he having expended vaſt ſums in his late ſhows, and beſides ſquandered away the greateſt part of his revenues in the preſents he beſtowed on his friends and followers. For he was naturally very generous, and in this particular excelled, as the author of the Book of the Maccabees tells us, all the kings before him; and the prophet Daniel ſpeaks of him as ſcattering among his followers, the prey, and the ſpoil, and riches. How he came by theſe riches, ſpoil, and prey, Athenæus tells us: All theſe expences, ſays he, ſpeaking of Antiochus, were made partly out of the prey, which contrary to the promiſe he had made to Philometor, he took in Egypt, partly out of the gifts of his friends, but chiefly out of the ſpoils of the many temples which he had ſacrilegiouſly robbed [e].

BESIDES the ſtraits and difficulties to which the want of money reduced him, he was greatly perplexed, according to the prophecy of Daniel, by tidings that came to him out of the eaſt, and out of the north. For in the north Artaxias king of Armenia had revolted from him, and Perſia, which was in the eaſt, paid no longer the uſual tribute, all things being there, as in the other parts of the empire, in the utmoſt moſt confuſion, by reaſon of a decree which the king had enacted, injoining all the nations ſubject to him to renounce the religion of their anceſtors, and conform to that of the Greeks. To put a ſpeedy end to theſe evils, and prevent their ſpreading, Antiochus reſolved to divide his army into two parts, leaving one of them with Lyſias to reduce the Jews, and marching in perſon with the other, firſt into Armenia, and afterwards into Perſia, to reſtore the affairs of thoſe provinces to their former condition. Accordingly having left Lyſias governor of all the provinces on this ſide of the Euphrates, and committed to his care the education of his ſon Antiochus Eupator, who was then but ſeven years old, he croſſed mount Taurus, and entering Armenia defeated (Y) Artaxias, and took him priſoner. From Armenia he marched into Perſia, in order to oblige the inhabitants of that rich province to pay him the arrears of their yearly tribute. He there was informed, that the city of Elymais was greatly renowned for its wealth, and that there was in the place a temple, dedicated, according to Polybius, to Diana, according to Appian, to Venus, in which immenſe ſums were lodged. Upon this notice he flew to Elymais, with a deſign to plunder both the city and the temple, as he had done at Jeruſalem. But his deſign having taken vent, the inhabitants of the city and the neighbouring villages, taking up arms in defence of their temple, repulſed him with the greateſt ignominy. Antiochus, greatly grieved at this diſgrace, withdrew to Ecbatan in Media. Soon after his arrival thither, news was brought him of the defeat of Nicanor and Timotheus, two of his generals, in Judæa; which enraged him to ſuch a degree, that he immediately ſet out from Media with all poſſible expedition, in order to make that nation feel the moſt dreadful effects of his wrath, breathing nothing on his march but total ruin and utter deſtruction. As he was thus haſtening towards Babylonia, through which he was to paſs on his return, he was met on the road by freſh meſſengers, bringing him an account that Lyſias had been defeated, that the Jews had retaken the temple, thrown down the images and altars which he had erected, and reſtored their former worſhip. At this news his fury and rage increaſed, and being impatient to reach Antioch, that he might from thence march in perſon againſt the Jews, and execute his vengeance upon the whole nation, he commanded his charioteer to drive with the utmoſt ſpeed, threatening to utterly extirpate the whole nation without leaving one ſingle perſon of the Jewiſh race alive. He had ſcarce uttered theſe words when he was ſeized with a great pain in his bowels, which no remedy could cure or abate. But notwithſtanding this violent ſhock, ſuffering himſelf to be hurried away by the wild tranſports of his fury, he gave orders for proceeding with the ſame precipitation in the journey. But while he was thus haſtening forwards, he fell from his chariot, and was by the fall ſo bruiſed, that his attendants were forced to put him into a litter. But not being able to bear even the motion of the litter, he was obliged to halt at a town called Tabæ (Z), ſituate among the mountains of Parætacene on the confines of Perſia and Babylonia, and there keep his bed, ſuffering inexpreſſible torments, occaſioned chiefly by the vermin which bred in his body, and the ſtench which made him inſupportable even to himſelf. But the torments of his mind, cauſed by

[d] Polyb. apud Athen. l. v. c. 4. p. 194, 195. & l. x. c. 12. p. 439. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii. p. 321. Daniel. xi. 21. Maccab. l. i. c. 3. v. 8. [e] Maccab. l. i. c. 3. v. 13. & ſeq. Athenæus Deipnoſoph. l. v. p. 195. 1 Maccab. l. i. c. 3. v. 27, 28.

(Y) Artaxias the firſt of that name, of whom mention is made here, had, according to Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, and Appian, commanded the troops of Antiochus the great in the provinces of Aſia, which were ſubject to the crown of Syria, and with the conſent of his maſter made himſelf ſovereign of a ſmall eſtate in Upper Armenia; while Thariades, another of the ſame king's generals, eſtabliſhed a new kingdom, likewiſe with the conſent of Antiochus, in Lower Armenia. After the defeat of Antiochus, they both put themſelves under the protection of the Romans. Nevertheleſs Epiphanes made war upon Artaxias, cut his army in pieces, and took the prince himſelf priſoner. But his captivity, in all likelihood, laſted no longer than the life of Epiphanes. For we find him ſoon after at war with Mythrobuzanes, the ſon of Thariades, whom he forced to abandon his dominions, and fly for refuge to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia. Artaxias did all that lay in his power to prevail upon Ariarathes to deſtroy the fugitive prince. But the king of Cappadocia was ſo far from being ſeduced with the flattering hopes Artaxias gave him of ſharing with him the provinces of Lower Armenia, that he even had the generoſity to re-eſtabliſh at the head of a powerful army Mythrobuzanes on his throne.

(Z) Polybius and Porphyrius agree with the author of the ſecond book of the Maccabees, as to the place where Antiochus ended his days; Caſtaldus is of opinion that Tabæ and Ecbatan are one and the ſame city. It is plain from the hiſtory of the Maccabees that Tabæ ſtood in a mountainous country, and ſuch was the province of Ecbatan in Media. But Niger thinks that the ſituation of Tabæ agrees better with that of the preſent city of Iſpahan. Q. Curtius places Tabæ in Parætacene, which is the moſt northern province of Perſia.

by his reflecting on the former actions of his life, ſurpaſſed by many degrees thoſe of his body. Polybius, who in his account of this wicked prince's death, agrees with Joſephus and with the authors of the firſt and ſecond book of the Maccabees, tells us, that the uneaſineſs of his mind grew at laſt to a conſtant delirium or ſtate of madneſs, by reaſon of ſeveral ſpectres and apparitions of evil genii or ſpirits, which, he imagined, were continually reproaching him with the many wicked actions he had been guilty of. Polybius indeed aſcribes all this to the ſacrilegious attempt which he made on the temple of Diana in Elymais, without taking any notice of the many ſacrilegious and profanations which he had not only attempted, but actually committed at Jeruſalem. But Joſephus, with much more reaſon and juſtice, imputes his cruel death to what he did at Jeruſalem; and of this Antiochus himſelf, as we read in the firſt book of the Maccabees, ſeems to have been well appriſed. To what a condition, ſaid he to his friends in the height of his torments, am I reduced! what a change of fortune have I undergone! Alas! I now remember with grief the calamities I brought on Jeruſalem. I am but too ſenſible of the vengeance of the God, whom I have provoked; and it ſhall be now my whole buſineſs to appeaſe him. I will reſtore to the Jews, whom I have perſecuted, their ancient privileges and liberties: I will make them as happy and independent as the city of Athens: I will reſtore the temple of the true God to its former luſtre, and return the ſacred veſſels, and even increaſe their number. Nay, I will embrace the law of the circumciſed myſelf, and zealouſly promote it in others. Thus ſpoke Antiochus, hoping he ſhould appeaſe the Almighty by theſe great promiſes; but as they were extorted from his mouth, and not from his heart, by the violence of his unrelenting torments, he did not obtain mercy, though he ſought it with tears; and therefore, after having languiſhed ſome time in this deplorable condition, he ended his unhappy life after having reigned eleven years and ſome months [f]. Porphyrius, Euſebius, Jerom, Sulpitius Severus, and others tells us, that he reigned only eleven years, but the author of the firſt book of the Maccabees ſays, that he began his reign in the 137th year of the kingdom of the Greeks, and died in the 149th, which lengthens his reign to twelve years. To reconcile the abovementioned writers with the author of the hiſtory hiſtory of the Maccabees, we muſt ſay with the learned Uſher, that Antiochus began his reign in the end of the 137th year, and died in the beginning of the 149th year of that æra, after having reigned, according to that computation, eleven years and ſome months (A). As Antiochus Epiphanes was a violent perſecutor of the Jewiſh church, and a type of the Antichriſt, who in after-ages is to afflict the chriſtian church, more is ſaid relating to him in the prophecies of Daniel, than to any other prince. But of this more at length in our notes (B).

The unhappy death of Antiochus Epiphanes. Year of the flood 2834. Year before Chriſt 165.

[f] Maccab. l. i. & ii. c. 6, 7, 8, 9, &c. Polyb. in Excerpt. Valeſii, p. 144. Appian. in Syriac. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 13. Hieronym. in Dan. xi, 36. Euſeb. in Chron.

ANTIOCHUS

(A) As Antiochus the Great attempted the ſame ſacrilege in the country of Elymais, which Antiochus his ſon is ſaid to have attempted in the city of Elymais, ſome have imagined that the identity of names may have led writers into a miſtake, and made them aſcribe to both the ſacrilege, which was attempted only by one. On this ſuppoſition Scaliger (67) finds fault with S. Jerom, for ſaying in his comment on the eleventh chapter of Daniel, that Antiochus the Great was cut off with his whole army by the Elymæans, which he pretends not to be true of Antiochus the Great, but only of his ſon Epiphanes. But what Jerom ſays is vouched by many other writers of no mean character, viz. that Antiochus the Great was thus cut off in attempting to plunder the temple of the Elymæans, and none ever ſaid that Epiphanes loſt his life in ſuch an attempt; for he eſcaped, with the loſs indeed of many of his men, and died ſome time after, as Appian (68), Polybius (69), Joſephus (70), and the authours of the firſt and ſecond book of the Maccabees witneſs. Beſides, though the attempt was made by both princes in the ſame country, yet it was not on the ſame temple; for that of Antiochus the Great was on the temple of Belus, and that of Epiphanes on the temple of Diana, which goddeſs is ſaid by Strabo to have had a very rich temple in the country of the Elymæans (71). The ſame author tells us, that this temple was plundered by one of the Parthian kings, who found in it ten thouſand talents. This temple, as the ſame Strabo informs us (72). was called Azara, or, as Caſaubon reads it (73), Zara; whence Diana was called by the Perſians Zaretis (74).

(B) The eleventh chaper of Daniel from the twentieth verſe to the end, is wholly concerning Antiochus Epiphanes. The whole may be divided into two parts, whereof the firſt relates to his war in Egypt, and the other to the perſecution carried on by him againſt the Jews. And firſt as to his wars with Egypt, the prophet

(67) Scaliger. in animadver. ad Euſeb. chron. p. 140. (68) Appian. in Syriac. (69) Polybius in excerpt. Valeſii. p. 144. (70) Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 13. (71) Strab. l. xvi. p. 744. (72) Idem ibid. (73) Caſaub. in notis ad pag. 744. (74) Heſych, in voce Ζαρῆτις.

ANTIOCHUS before he expired, having ſent for Philip, who was his chief favourite, and had been brought up with him from his infancy, appointed him regent of the Syrian empire during the minority of his ſon, and delivered into his hands the diadem, the ſeal of the empire, and the other enſigns Antiochus Eupator.

phet after having ſpoke of his acceſſion to the crown in the twenty-firſt verſe; And in his eſtate (Seleucus Philopator's) ſhall ſtand up a vile perſon, to whom they ſhall not give the honour of the kingdom; but he ſhall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries (75); after having thus, I ſay, pointed out his acceſſion to the throne, the prophet goes on thus: and with the arms of a flood ſhall they (the Syrians) be overflown before him, (Antiochus Epiphanes) and ſhall be broken; yea alſo the prince of the covenant. Heliodorus, who had murdered Seleucus, and his adherents, as alſo the partiſans of the king of Egypt, who had formed deſigns againſt Syria, were defeated by the forces of Attalus, and diſperſed by the arrival of Antiochus, whoſe preſence diſconcerted all their meaſures. By the prince of the covenant, ſome ſuppoſe to be meant Heliodorus, the ringleader of the conſpirators; others Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, who loſt his life by a plot laid by his own ſubjects, while he was bent upon a war with Syria. In the following verſes Daniel evidently ſpeaks of Antiochus's four different expeditions into Egypt; And after the league made with him (with Ptolemy Philometor his nephew, king of Egypt) he ſhall work deceitfully; for he ſhall come up, and ſhall become ſtrong with a ſmall people. Antiochus, though he was already determined in his own mind to wage war, aſſumed a ſpecious appearance of friendſhip for the king of Egypt; nay, he even ſent Apollonius to congratulate his nephew on occaſion of his coronation, and to aſſiſt in his name at that ceremony. Nevertheleſs ſoon after, on pretence of defending him, he marched into Egypt, defeated his forces, and returned to Tyre loaded with the ſpoils of the plundered people. What is ſaid in the twenty-fifth, fortieth, forty-ſecond and forty-third verſes, was accompliſhed in his ſecond expedition into Egypt, viz. And he ſhall ſtir up his power and his courage againſt the king of the ſouth with a great army, and the king of the ſouth ſhall be ſtirred up to battle with a very great and mighty army, but he ſhall not ſtand: for they ſhall forecaſt devices againſt him, and at the time of the end ſhall the king of the ſouth puſh at him, and the king of the north ſhall come againſt him like a whirlwind with chariots, and with horſemen and with many ſhips: and he ſhall enter into the countries, and ſhall overflow and paſs over. Antiochus, after having employed the whole winter in making preparations for a ſecond expedition into Egypt, invaded that country both by ſea and land as ſoon as

(75) Daniel. c. xi. v. 21. v. 22. v. 23. v. 25. v. 40.

ſigns of royalty, charging him above all things to give his ſon, then nine years old, ſuch an education as might qualify him to govern his ſubjects with juſtice and moderation. But Philip, on his arrival at Antioch, found the employment, which the king had conferred upon him, uſurped by another. For Lyſias, upon the firſt advice of the king's death, had placed his ſon Antiochus, who was then under his care, on the

as the ſeaſon allowed him, and entered into Egypt, as we read in the firſt book of the Maccabees (76), with a great multitude, with chariots, with elephants, and horſemen, and a great navy,--and made war againſt Ptolemy king of Egypt. If we compare the hiſtory of the Maccabees, and indeed the profane writers, with Daniel's prophecies, we ſhall find a perfect agreement among them, with this difference alone, that the prophet is more clear and particular than any of the hiſtorians, He ſhall ſtretch forth his hand continues the prophet, alſo upon the countries, and the land of Egypt ſhall not eſcape. But he ſhall have power over the treaſures of gold and ſilver, and over all the precious things of Egypt. Antiochus after the victory, which he gained over Ptolemy's forces in his ſecond expedition into Egypt, made himſelf maſter of all that country, Alexandria alone excepted, over-running it with an aſtoniſhing rapidity, which his forefathers had not done, nor his father's fathers, as the prophet expreſſes it. What we read in the twenty ſixth verſe, viz. Yea, they that feed of the portion of his (the kings of Egypt's) meat ſhall deſtroy him, and his army ſhall overflow; and many ſhall fall down ſlain; this I ſay was fulfilled by the revolt of Ptolemy Macron from Philometor, and the treachery and male-adminiſtration of Lennæus, Eulæus, and other miniſters employed under them. What is ſaid in the twenty-ſeventh verſe was fulfilled in the meeting of Antiochus and Philometor at Memphis; and both theſe kings hearts ſhall be to do miſchief, ſays the prophet, and they ſhall ſpeak lies at one table; but it ſhall not proſper; for yet the end ſhall be at the time appointed. The two princes, in the time of the ſecond and third expedition of Antiochus into Egypt, met at Memphis, eat frequently at the ſame table, and behaved towards one another with all the outward marks of a ſincere friendſhip. The uncle ſeemed to have the nephew's intereſt at heart, and the nephew to repoſe an intire confidence in his uncle. But all this was mere ſhew and outſide, they both ſpoke lyes; the deſign of Antiochus being to ſeize on the kingdom for himſelf, and Philometor's to lay hold of the firſt opportunity that offered, to diſappoint him; as he did accordingly by agreeing with his brother and the Alexandrians, as we have obſerved in the text, out of Livy and other

(76) Maccab. l. i. c. v. 17, 18, 19, v. 42, v. 43.

the throne, giving him the name of Antiochus Eupator, and assuming to himself the tuition of his person and the government of his kingdom. Philip, well knew that he was not at that time in a condition to contend with so powerful a rival, and therefore retired into Egypt, in hopes of finding at that court the assistance he wanted to drive out the intruder, and take other prophane historians (77). Hereupon followed what is foretold in the twenty-ninth and thirtieth verses; At the time appointed he shall return, and come towards the south, but it shall not be as the former or as the latter. For the ships of Chittim shall come against him; therefore he shall grieve and return, and have indignation against the holy covenant. For advice being brought to Antiochus, that the two brothers were reconciled, he pulled off the mask, and openly owned that he intended to take possession of Egypt himself, and with this view he returned, and came again towards the south, that is, into Egypt; but he did not prevail as in the former, and in the latter attempts upon that country, by reason of the ships that came from Chittim, or the country of the Greeks against him, having on board Popilius Lænas and the other Roman embassadors. For these, having embarqued on some Greek ships, which they found at Delos, sailed from thence to Egypt, and finding Antiochus before Alexandria, obliged him to leave the country, to his great grief, and return to his own dominions. However, what the prophet foretold in the forty-second and forty-third verses, of his stretching forth his hand upon the land of Egypt, and his having power over the treasures of gold and silver, and all the other precious things of that country, had its thorough completion; for in all his expeditions into Egypt, he miserably harassed that country, returning from thence loaded with spoils, and carrying treasures of gold and silver taken by him and his followers (78). And thus far the prophecies of Daniel relating to the wars between the kings of Syria and the kings of Egypt, or as the prophet stiles them, between the kings of the north, and the kings of the south. As to the other part of Daniel's prophecy, which, relates to the cruel persecution, he brought upon the Jews, we shall take notice of it in the history of that people. In the mean time we cannot help observing, that by the prince of the covenant, mentioned in the twenty-second verse, the prophet most likely pointed out Onias the high-priest of the Jews, who was deposed and banished by Epiphanes, and at last murdered by one of his lieutenants; and not Heliodorus, or the king of Egypt, as some interpreters would have it.

(77) Liv. l. xliv. c. 19. Athenæus, l. v. p. 195. (78) Athen. l. v. p. 195. Hieronym. in Dan. c. xi. v. 27.

take upon him the government which the king had entrusted him with [g].

Demetrius demands in vain leave to return to Syria.

In the mean time, Demetrius the son of Seleucus Philopator, who had been an hostage at Rome ever since his father's death, and was now in the twenty-third year of his age, hearing of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes and the accession of his son Eupator to the crown, which of right belonged to him as the son of the elder brother, applied to the senate, and strongly represented to them the indisputable title he had to the crown of Syria. The same destiny, said he, when he was introduced to the conscript fathers, which formerly deprived Syria of Seleucus my father, has just now taken from her my uncle Antiochus. They succeeded one another in the throne, and each of them left a son a minor. I was of the same age as young Antiochus is now, when upon the death of my father I was judged incapable of governing so great an empire. Afterwards I was brought from my native country to this place as an hostage, and have here had the happiness to grow up under your eyes, and form myself by your examples. All the senators of this great metropolis are fathers to me, and all their children brothers. I am by the education you have given me become entirely Roman, and if I fill by your favour the throne of my ancestors, I shall only sit there to dispense your laws. How glotious will it be for you, and how advantageous for Syria to see two of your pupils succeed one another! Can you in equity suffer a child to usurp my rights, and let my residence among you be prejudicial to me? I am informed that Antiochus is already proclaimed king, and has taken the name of Eupator. My absence alone could authorize his friends to give him a diadem, which, by right of birth and order of nature, can belong only to me. I am the son of a king, and of the eldest of the two brothers, who have successively reigned in Syria. There is the same objection against the promotion of young Antiochus to the throne after his father, as there formerly was against my succeeding mine. He is too young to sustain the weight of public affairs. He has no right to the crown, but what he derives from Epiphanes; and Epiphanes himself pretended at first to hold the crown only in trust. Upon his death therefore my right revives, and I am now able to bear the burden of the state; I am three-and-twenty years old, and have learnt the art of reigning ing from you. Let young Antiochus be brought to Rome for an hoſtage; his youth will make him ſuſceptible of your inſtructions; and give me leave, conſcript fathers, to go into Syria, and there take quietly poſſeſſion of my crown, or make good my right by dint of ſword [h].

[g] Appian. in Syriac. Euseb. in Chron. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 14. Maccab. l. i. c. 6. v. 17.

NOTWITHSTANDING the juſtice of this demand, the ſenators were divided in their opinions. The moſt equitable among them thought they could no longer detain Demetrius at Rome, ſince by that means they debarred him from the crown, to which he had an indiſputable right. But the leſs ſcrupulous, upon principles of policy and motives of intereſt, were for keeping the young prince ſtill at Rome. Theſe remonſtrated, that ſuch a king of Syria as Demetrius, who was in the flower of his age, of an aſpiring genius, and of extraordinary parts, might in the end prove a formidable enemy to the republic, and raiſe new troubles in the eaſt; whereas a child on the throne would court their friendſhip, and ſeek for protectors at Rome. Nay, theſe refined politicians went further, and without any regard to juſtice propoſed declaring Antiochus ward of the republic, and ſending guardians to govern his dominions in the name and under the direction of the Roman ſenate. This opinion, though repugnant, in a moſt flagrant manner, to all the laws of common juſtice and equity, prevailed in that venerable body; and accordingly three perſons of conſummate experience were immediately named to give law to Syria, under pretence of aſſiſting and adviſing the new king during his minority. Theſe were Cn. Octavius, who had diſcharged the conſulate with great reputation, Sp. Lucretius, and L. Aurelius. This iniquitous decree was enacted by the ſenate, and confirmed by the people without the conſent or even privity of the Syrians, who had no thoughts of deſiring any foreign guardians for their king. So deſpotic a power did the haughty Romans aſſume over kings, after the defeat of Perſes, and reduction of Macedon. Neither was the ſenate ſatisfied with oppoſing the juſt claim of Demetrius to the crown of his father, and ſetting it on the head of a child, to whom it did not belong; but moreover gave the guardians, who were to take care of the affairs of Syria, ſuch inſtructions as tended to the weakening of the kingdom of their ward. For they were ordered by the ſenate to burn all the ſhips with decks, which the king of Syria had, as ſoon as they ſhould ſhould be in poſſeſſion of the guardinſhip, to hamſtring all his elephants, and in ſhort to weaken by all means poſſible the ſtrength of that powerful kingdom. With theſe inſtructions Octavius, who was at the head of this commiſſion, ſet out with his collegues to govern, in quality of guardians, the moſt powerful ſtate in Aſia [i].

The Romans uſurp the guardianſhip of young Eupator.

[h] Juſtin. l. xxxiv. c. 3. Polyb. legat. 107. Appian. in Syriac. p. 117.

Celebrated victories of Judas Maccabæus.

In the mean time Lyſias, who, as we hinted above, had uſurped the tuition of the young king and the government of the kingdom, was purſuing with the utmoſt ardour the war againſt the Jews, which Antiochus Epiphanes had begun. He had entered Judæa with fourſcore thouſand men, with all the cavalry of the kingdom, and fourſcore elephants, propoſing to make Jeruſalem the inhabitation of Gentiles, and utterly aboliſh the worſhip of the true God. He had opened the campain with the ſiege of Bethſura, a ſtrong fortreſs between Jeruſalem and Idumæa; but being there defeated by the brave Judas Maccabœus, with the loſs of eleven thouſand foot and ſixteen hundred horſe, he had ſtruck up a peace with the conqueror, one of the articles of which was, that the decree of Antiochus Epiphanes, which obliged the Jews to conform to the religion of the Greeks, ſhould be revoked, and free liberty allowed them to live according to their own laws. But this peace was of no long duration; for the governors of the neighbouring provinces, not being ſatisfied with it, aſſembled all their forces to the number of an hundred and twenty thouſand foot and five and twenty thouſand horſe, and marching, under the command of Timotheus, into Judæa, put all to fire and ſword. But Judas Maccabœus, full of confidence in the God of armies, attacked and defeated them with a handful of Iſraelites. On this occaſion the Syrians loſt upwards of thirty thouſand men, and the victory was attended with many advantages on the ſide of Judas, who purſuing the remains of the ſhattered army, came up with them at the city of Carnion, and finding that many of them had there taken refuge in the temple of Atargatis (C), he cauſed fire to be

[i] Juſt. Polyb. Appian. & Liv. ubi ſupra.

(C) This deity is ſaid by Strabo (79) to be a Syrian goddeſs. Pliny (80) takes her to be the ſame with Derceto, and adds (81), that ſhe was worſhipped at Joppa in Phænice. Diodorus Siculus tells us (82), that the inhabitants of Aſcalon paid her a ſpecial worſhip, be ſet to it, which ſoon conſumed the temple, and all who were in it. After this ſevere execution he fell upon the Syrians in the town, and put them all without diſtinction to the ſword; and on this occaſion five and twenty thouſand more of Timotheus's forces were ſlain [k]. On his return to Jeruſalem the city of Ephron, which had been well garriſoned by Lyſias, refuſed him admittance, though he promiſed to abſtain from all hoſtilities, ſince he could not poſſibly march his army any other way but through the city itſelf, which lay directly in the road. This refuſal exaſperated the Jewiſh general, who thereupon aſſaulting the place, took it ſword in hand, and after having put all the males, to the number of twenty-five thouſand, to death, cauſed the city to be razed to the ground [l]. After this Judas made himſelf maſter of all the ſouthern parts of Idumæa and the country of the Philiſtines, with the important city of Azotus, or Aſtdod, demoliſhing every-where the heathen altars, burning their carved images, and enriching his army with the ſpoils of the plundered cities. But the Syrian garriſon, which ſtill kept poſſeſſion of the fortreſs of Jeruſalem, and frequently ſallied out upon the Jews, as they went up to worſhip in the temple, was a great thorn in their ſides. Wherefore Judas, to redeem himſelf from this annoyance, having firſt made the neceſſary preparations, laid cloſe ſiege to the place. But ſome of the apoſtate Jews, who ſerved among the Syrians in the fortreſs, knowing that they were to have no quarter, if the place were taken, found means to make their eſcape, and flying to Antioch acquainted the king and his council with the poſture of affairs at Jeruſalem, and repreſented the diſtreſs to which the garriſon was reduced ſo effectively, that forthwith an army was drawn together of an hundred thouſand foot, and twenty thouſand worſhip, and that ſhe was repreſented in that city by an image, having in the upper part the form of a woman, and that of a fiſh in the lower. Hence Seldon conjectures this deity to have been the ſame with Dagon worſhipped by the Philiſtines (83).

(79) Strab. l. xvi. p. 748. (80) Plin. l. v. c. 23. (81) Idem. ibid. c. 13. (82 Diodor. Sicul. l. ii.

[k] Maccab. l. i. c. 5. v. 37——43. & l. ii. c. 13. v. 24, 25, 26. [l] Maccab. l. i. c. 5. v. 46——51. & l. ii. c. 12. v. 27, 28, &c.

(83) Vide Selden de Diis Syris Syntag. 2. c. 3.

thouſand horſe, with thirty-two elephants, and three-hundred chariots of war. The king in perſon, with Lyſias the regent of the kingdom, put himſelf at the head of this formidable army, and entering Judæa, laid ſiege to Bethſura. Here Judas with a ſmall number of reſolute men fell on the king's army in the night, and having killed four thouſand of them, and thrown the whole camp in the utmoſt confuſion, retired by break of day without the loſs of one ſingle man in ſo hazardous an attempt [m].

THOUGH the Syrians were well appriſed of the extraordinary valour of the Jews, yet they did not doubt but they ſhould overpower them with the great number of their forces and elephants, and therefore leaving Bethſura, reſolved to venture a general engagement, which Judas did not decline; nay he at the head of his ſmall army began the onſet, and killed about ſix hundred Syrians. But finding that notwithſtanding all his efforts, he muſt at length be bore down, and perhaps hemmed in, by ſo numerous an army, he choſe to withdraw in time, and retire in good order to Jeruſalem. Upon his retreat the king returned to the ſiege of Bethſura, which after a long and vigorous defence was obliged to ſurrender for want of proviſions [n]. From thence Antiochus marched againſt Jeruſalem, and beſieged the temple, which the garriſon was ready to deliver up for want of proviſion, when providence relieved them by an unforeſeen accident [o].

WE have obſerved above, that Philip, whom Epiphanes, a little before his death, had entruſted with the education and guardianſhip of his ſon, had retired into Egypt, in hopes of finding aſſiſtance there againſt Lyſias. But being diſappointed in his expectation, by reaſon of the diviſions which had again broke out between the two brothers, who reigned jointly at that time, he left Egypt, and haſtening into the eaſt, drew together a conſiderable army of Medes and Perſians, and taking advantage of the king's abſence on his expedition into Judæa, ſeized Antioch the capital of the empire, and there took upon him the government of the kingdom. When news of this attempt was brought to Lyſias, he thought it neceſſary to make peace with the Jews, that he might be at liberty to turn his army againſt his his rival in Syria. A peace was accordingly granted to the Jews upon very advantageous and honourable terms and ſworn to by Antiochus. After this Antiochus was admitted within the fortifications of the temple, which ſeemed ſo ſtrong to him and his officers, as truly they were, that contrary to the articles which he had ſworc to, he cauſed them to be demoliſhed before he ſet out for Syria [p]. Lyſias on his return to Antioch defeated Philip in a pitched battle, retook the metropolis, and having got Phillip into his hands, by his death put an end to all the diſturbances he had raiſed [q].

[m] Ibid. v. 65, 68, &c. & l. ii. c. 13. v. 15——17. &c.
[n] Maccab. l. i. c. 6. v. 49, 50. & l. ii. c. 13. v. 18, 22.
[o] Maccab. l. i. c. 6. v. 48——54.

WHILE Lyſias was carrying on this war with the Jews and his rival Philip, the Roman embaſſadors, or rather guardians, arrived in the eaſt, and were there kindly entertained by Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, through whoſe dominions they paſſed in their way to Antioch. As this young prince had nothing more at heart than to gain the good-will of the Romans, he expreſſed great joy at the guardianſhip which they were going to take upon them over Antiochus his near relation. As he knew the temper of the Syrians, and ſuſpected the intrigues of Lyſias, he offered to conduct Octavius with an army into Syria, or to put the army under his command, in order to prevent diſturbances, and guard the envoys againſt any treacherous attempts. For he thought nothing could be more bold than the enterprize they had in hand. They were going of their own authority, without any invitation from the king, or the Syrian nation, to aſſume the government of a people, who was ſubject only to their own king. Ariarathes therefore preſſed Octavius to accept of a guard at leaſt; but the Roman, relying on the majeſty of Rome, which he thought a ſafer guard than a numerous army, with thoſe only who had attended him from Rome croſſed Cappadocia, and entered the kingdom of Syria. Their arrival raiſed no ſmall jealouſy in the heart of Lyſias, who, as he was himſelf of the blood royal, could not brook that foreigners ſhould come ſo far to deprive him of what he thought his right on many accounts. But Octavius, without even giving Lyſias notice of his arrival, or the commiſſion on which he was come, advanced towards Antioch with all the pride of his republic, fancying that every thing would give way before him at the bare name of a Roman. Lyſias was then maſter of the perſon of the young king, of all the wealth of the kingdom, and had the troops at his command. However, as he was too wise to oppose the designs of Rome sword in hand, he hired an African born at Leptis, and then residing in Syria, to dispatch Octavius, without appearing to have any hand in the murder himself. The assassin soon found a favourable opportunity for making good his engagements with Lysias. For Octavius, with an unheard-of presumption, arriving at Laodicea, a maritime city between Tripolis (D) and Antioch, began there to put in execution the unjust orders of his republic, and to act the sovereign before he had even taken possession of the regency. He caused all the Syrian ships, which he found there to be burnt, and the elephants to be disabled from serving in war, under pretence that, by the treaty made with the Scipios, Antiochus the Great had engaged to build no more ships of war, nor to tame more elephants. This bold step exasperated the populace to a great degree, and the African, in the height of the public indignation, falling upon Octavius, killed him in the Gymnasium at Laodicea [r]. This Octavius had been consul some years before, and was the first of his family who had attained to that honour [s]. Octavius, who afterwards became emperor, and is well known by the name of Augustus, was of the same family with this Octavius, but of another branch, which had not as yet been honoured with the consular dignity. Lysias, foreseeing the evil consequences of this attempt, did his utmost to clear himself from all suspicion of being any ways concerned in it. He caused Octavius to be buried with extraordinary pomp, and immediately dispatched embassadors to Rome to assure the senate, that neither he nor the king had any hand in the assassination. But Rome sent back the embassadors without any answer, reserving the whole to a future enquiry. But in the mean time to honour the memory of Octavius, Octavius embassador of the Romans in Syria, killed.

[p] Maccab. l. i. c. 6. v. 56. [q] Joſeph. l. xii. c. 15.

[r] Appian. Syriac. p. 117. Polyb. legat. 114. p. 944. & legat. 122. p. 954. [s] Cic. Philip. 6. n. 4.

(D) Tripolis stood at the foot of mount Libanus at a small distance from the sea, and was so called because it consisted of three great quarters, which were like so many cities, being about a stadium distant from each other, as Strabo informs us; but Diodorus Siculus tells us, that it was called Tripolis because inhabited by three different nations, viz. Arabians, Tyrians, and Sidonians. It still bears the same name.

vius, they commanded his ſtatue to be placed among thoſe of the great men, who had ſacrificed their lives for their country; and this ſtatue was ſtill ſtanding near the tribunal of harangues in the time of Auguſtus [t]. In the mean time the aſſaſſin did not leave Laodicea, but publicly owned the action, which he maintained to be very commendable, and done at the inſtigation of the gods. Nay, one Iſocrates, a Rhetorician, made a public panegyric on the aſſaſſin, and exhorted the people to diſpatch in like manner the other embaſſadors and all their attendants, that none might ſurvive to ſtir up the Roman ſenate againſt them, or give any information of what had happened [u].

DEMETRIUS, thinking that the murder of Octavius might have ſo far alienated the minds of the Romans from Eupator, that they would no longer detain him at Rome for his ſake, reſolved to addreſs the ſenate a ſecond time, and beg permiſſion to return into Syria. But as he had contracted an intimate acquaintance and friendſhip with Polybius the hiſtorian, who was then a priſoner at Rome and generally deemed one of the beſt politicians of his age, he firſt adviſed with him; and that great man and ſincere friend, when the young prince aſked his opinion, whether he thought it proper for him to apply to the ſenate once more for leave to return into Syria, and take poſſeſſion of a crown to which he had an indiſputable right, returned him the following anſwer: Take care not to ſtumble twice againſt the ſame ſtone. Have you but one way of getting into Syria? Should a man of your age depend on the capricious will of an unjuſt ſenate like a child? Only dare to ſet yourſelf at liberty, and you will reign of courſe. Theſe words ſtruck the prince, who had a great opinion both of the fidelity and wiſdom of Polybius, and had long governed himſelf entirely by his counſels. But the advice of a more timorous friend effaced the impreſſions they made. This was Apollonius, a young nobleman of Syria, who had been bred up with Demetrius, and was afraid his maſter might, by ſtealing privately away, diſguſt the ſenate, and thereby ruin his affairs. He therefore told him, that it was impoſſible Rome ſhould be ſo unjuſt as to detain him in the preſent circumſtances; and that ſhe would be glad to ſee an avenger of Octavius and an enemy to Lyſias ſet out for Syria, now that he ſtood in no need of her armies or fleets to recover his right at her expence. The advice of Apollonius prevailed, and Demetrius had again recourse to the senate, joining entreaties to all those motives of mutual interest, which might well induce him to desire leave to depart, and the senate to grant it. But Demetrius was not so well acquainted with the Romans as Polybius; for they having still the same reasons for keeping him in Rome, persisted in the same resolution. After all, said they, when the matter was debated in the senate, the powerful kingdom of Syria is governed by a child, and Rome has nothing to fear during a minority. Besides, are we sure that Demetrius, who is a young man of uncommon parts, will be as pliant on the throne, as he affects to be at Rome? Upon these considerations the second request of the prince met with a second refusal. When the decree of the senate, ordering him to continue in Italy till it pleased the conscript fathers to dismiss him, was read to him, he could not forbear exclaiming with great indignation against the unjust and undeserved usage he met with. He then remembred the advice of Polybius, and resolved to court the republic no longer, but to make his escape as soon as he could. He was greatly confirmed in this resolution by Diodorus his governor, who being just then returned from Syria, whither his master had sent him, told him that all Syria was in a flame, assuring him at the same time, that if he only shewed himself to his people they would all receive him with open arms as their deliverer. However, before he took any step in so nice a matter, he desired the advice of Polybius as to the manner in which he might best elude the vigilance of the Romans. The faithful Achæan took the whole management of the affair upon himself, and having communicated the design of Demetrius to an intimate friend of his, by name Menithyllus, who then resided at Rome in quality of agent from the eldest of the two Ptolemies, he found out by his means an expedient to facilitate the prince's flight. There was at that time a Carthaginian ship riding at anchor in the port of Ostia, and bound for Tyre with the first-fruits, which the Carthaginians annually sent to the gods of the city from whence they originally came. Menethyllus, pretending business in the east, desired the commander of the ship to transport him and his attendants thither, and agreed with him on a price for his passage. As no body entertained any suspicion of him, he was allowed to carry on board what baggage and provisions he pleased. When every thing was got ready, Demetrius, to conceal his design from the many domestics he had in his household, sent

[t] Cic. ibid. [u] Polyb. legat. 122. Juſtin. l. xxxiv. c. 5.

ſent moſt of his retinue with his hunting equipage to Anagnia, as if he deſigned to follow them thither the next day. Diodorus, who was a man well verſed in buſineſs, was ſent into Syria in another ſhip, that he might get there before him, and pave the way for his reception. Polybius, who was at the bottom of all this without ever appearing in it, being informed by Menithyllus that Demetrius the evening before his departure was to give a grand entertainment to his friends in a hired houſe, began to be very uneaſy, leſt he ſhould let ſlip the opportunity; for he knew that the young prince, when in company with his friends, uſed to indulge himſelf in mirth and jollity without bounds or reſerve. Being therefore at that time indiſpoſed and obliged to keep his houſe, he ſent him a letter, as night was already far ſpent, containing ſeveral ſentences out of the antients touching the courage, ſecreſy, and ſobriety, which were neceſſary for the executing of great deſigns (E). The bearer was deſired to give it to the maſter of the houſe, and he to deliver it into the prince's own hands. Demetrius having peruſed it, knew from what hand it came, and with what intention it was wrote, and therefore pretending to be out of order, he immediately roſe from table, took leave of his friends, and returned home. There he imparted his deſign of leaving Rome that very night to ſome Syrian noblemen of his retinue, inviting them to accompany him, which they readily conſenting to, Demetrius ſet out in the dead of the night for Oſtia.

Demetriu eſcapes fr Rome.

MENITHYLLUS had gone ſome days before to acquaint the commander of the Carthaginian veſſel, that he had received freſh orders from the king his maſter, which would keep him ſome time longer at Rome; but, however, he would put on board of him the ſame number of paſſengers, at the ſame price and on the ſame conditions. Theſe he earneſtly

(E) The ſentences, which Polybius made uſe of on this occaſion, were the following:

Ὁ δρῶν, τὰ τυ μέλλοντος, οἴχεται φέρων
Εἰς ὃ φέρει νὺξ, τῆς δε τολμῶ σί τί πλέον.

Τόλμα τὶ, κινδύνευε, πρὰτ', ἀποτύγχανε,
Ἐπί τυχε τάντα μᾶλλον ἢ σαυτὸν πρός.

To theſe he added the famous ſaying of Epicharmus: Νῆφε, καὶ μέμνησο ἀπιστεῖν. ἄρθρα ταῦτα των Φρενων.

neſtly recommended to him, telling him that they were officers of diſtinction, who were going to ſerve in the Egyptian army. The prince and his retinue to the number of ſixteen perſons arrived early in the morning, and by break of day the Carthaginian weighed anchor to the great joy of Demetrius, who already conſidered himſelf as ſitting on the throne of his anceſtors. Three days paſſed before he was miſſed at Rome, every one believing he was gone, according to his cuſtom, to divert himſelf with hunting in the neighbourhood of Anagnia. The ſecret was not diſcovered till the fourth day, when one of his ſervants, who had been ill uſed by his fellow-ſervant, went to Anagnia to complain to his maſter of the ill treatment he had met with; but not finding him there he returned to Rome, and diſcovered how long Demetrius had been abſent. Hereupon a ſtrict ſearch was made after him, but no one in the city, except Polybius and Menithyllus, being privy to his eſcape, the meſſengers, who were diſpatched into all parts, returned without having heard any tidings of him. The ſenate met the ſixth day, and being fully convinced that he had made his eſcape, thought it needleſs to ſend after him, ſince he had got the ſtart of them by ſix days. They therefore reſolved to take no further notice of it for the preſent; but only to ſend three embaſſadors into Syria to obſerve what effect the return of Demetrius would produce there, and to watch that prince's ſteps. Purſuant to this reſolution, Tiberius Gracchus, who had been two years before conſul, Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, and Servilius Glaucia were a few days after appointed to go firſt into Greece, to appeaſe the minds of the people there, who were diſſatisfied with the Roman government, and from Greece to croſs over into Syria [x].

In the mean time the fugitive prince landing in Lycia, wrote from thence a very polite letter to the ſenate: My deſign, ſaid he, in making my eſcape, was only to revenge the death of Octavius, who was inhumanly murdered contrary to the law of nations. Lyſias was the author of the aſſaſſination, and my aim is wholly at him. As to young Eupator, though he has uſurped my right, I reſpect him on account of his age and the protection with which you honour him. Theſe promiſes had no great weight with the ſenate, no one doubting but Demetrius, when he once ſaw himſelf

[x] Polyb. legat. 114.

himſelf ſeated on the throne, would ſacrifice to his own ſafety the life of his young rival. But they thought it did not become Rome to oppoſe by force of arms the ſettling of the lawful ſovereign on the throne of Syria; and therefore waited without much uneaſineſs to hear of the prince's arrival and adventures there. From Lycia Demetrius continued his voyage, and landed at Tripolis, a Syrian city on the confines of Phœnice. He no ſooner appeared there but he was acknowledged and proclaimed king by all the inhabitants. In order to gain a ſtrong party, he gave out in all the places he paſſed through, that he was ſent by the Roman ſenate to take poſſeſſion of his hereditary dominions, and that Rome was reſolved to ſupport him to the utmoſt of her power. This report was no ſooner ſpread abroad, but Eupator's cauſe was looked upon as loſt, both officers and ſoldiers abandoning him in troops to join the new king. His army increaſed daily, the cities and ſtrong-holds ſtrove which ſhould firſt ſubmit to him, and the whole kingdom with great joy acknowledged him for their lawful ſovereign. He no ſooner appeared before Antioch, the metropolis of the kingdom, but the citizens, throwing open their gates, crowded out to him, inviting him to take poſſeſſion of the palace of his anceſtors. At length Lyſias and his ward Eupator, being ſeized by their own ſoldiers, were delivered up to the new-comer, who ordered them to be put to death. Thus Joſephus, Juſtin, and Appian relate the unhappy end of young Eupator and his guardian[y]. But the author of the firſt book of the Maccabees tells us, that they were taken priſoners by the ſoldiers of Demetrius, and by them put to death after the prince had declared that he would not ſee them[z]. So that according to this writer they were ſlain by the ſoldiery, without any orders from Demetrius. Eupator reigned, according to Joſephus[a] and Euſebius[b], two years, according to Porphyrius[c] and Sulpitius Severus[d], one year and ſix months. The author of the ſecond book of the Maccabees tells us, that both he and his guardian Lyſias were killed in the Command Eupator to be put to death.

Year of tl flood 283 BeforeChr 163.

[y] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 13. Appian. in Syriac. p. 117. Juſtin. l. xxxiv. c. 3. [z] Maccab. l. i. c. 7. [a] Joſeph. ibid. c. 16. [b] Euſeb. in Chron. [c] In Græc. Euſeb. Scaliger. [d] Sulpitius Sever. hiſtor. Sacra. l. ii.

the third year of his reign, or, as others read it, after he had reigned three years [e].

Honoured by the Babylonians with the firname of Soter.

No sooner was Demetrius fixed on the throne, but he delivered the Babylonians from the tyranny of Timarchus and Heraclides, two brothers, whom Antiochus Epiphanes had raised to great honours, upon no other merit but that of a ready compliance with his unnatural lust. The first he had made governor, and the other treasurer, of the province of Babylon, and their administration was insupportable to the inhabitants. Demetrius therefore, giving ear to the just complaints of his subjects, caused Timarchus, who was the most guilty, to be put to death, and banished the other. This deliverance was so acceptable to the Babylonians, that they gave Demetrius the title of Soter or Saviour, which he bore ever afterwards [f]. After this Demetrius, at the instigation of Alcimus, who on the death of Menelaus had been by Eupator appointed high-priest of the Jews, renewed the war with that nation, which had been carried on for so many years by Epiphanes and Eupator his predecessors. In this war the famous Judas Maccabæus, after repeated victories over the numerous armies of the king of Syria, lost his life, as we shall relate at length in the history of the Jews. Upon his death his brother Jonathan took upon him the command of the army, but the Syrians soon after withdrew their forces from Judæa, which without all doubt, was owing to the letters sent by the Roman senate to Demetrius in behalf of the Jews. For that prince was at this time very cautious not to give the Romans any offence, and therefore ready to grant any thing they desired. His point in view was to get himself acknowledged king of Syria by the republic, knowing that this was the most effectual method to stifle all remaining factions at home, and keep up a good understanding with his neighbours abroad. Being therefore informed, that the Romans had three embassadors at the court of Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, he sent Menochares, one of the chief lords of his court, thither to treat with them on this subject; and finding on his return by the report he made, that the good offices of the embassadors were absolutely necessary for the gaining of his point, he sent again deputies to them, first into Pamphylia, and afterwards to the city of Rhodes, assuring them [e] Maccab. l. ii. c. 14. v. 12.

[f] Appian. in Syriac. p. 117.

them of his inviolable attachment to the intereſt of Rome. At length by thus continually preſſing and ſoliciting them, he obtained what he deſired. Firſt the embaſſadors, and afterwards their republic, acknowledged the ſovereignty of Demetrius, and gave him the title of king. To cultivate the amity of that powerful republic, he ſent the next year the ſame Menochares and others on an embaſſy to Rome, with a crown of gold of great value, in acknowledgment of the kind entertainment he had received while an hoſtage in that city. With the preſent he ſent the aſſaſſin, who had murdered Octavius, and Iſocrates, who in his public declamations had maintained the juſtice of that action, and exhorted the people to treat the other embaſſadors in like manner. The African was not under the leaſt concern, but appeared gay during the whole journey, and boaſted that he would make even the Roman ſenate approve of what he had done. But the Rhetorician ſunk into a deep melancholy from the moment he was ſeized, in order to be delivered up to the republic, which he had offended. He let his beard and nails grow, and could not be prevailed upon without force to take any nouriſhment; by which means he grew ſo thin before he reached Rome, that he looked like a ſkeleton. This was perhaps an artifice in the declaimer to raiſe compaſſion. But the ſenate would ſee neither of them, thinking that the puniſhment of theſe two men was too ſmall a ſatisfaction for the murder of their embaſſador. They therefore rejected the two unhappy victims that were offered them, and kept Syria in fear of a more ſevere vengeance. As to the embaſſadors, the ſenate received them with all the uſual honours, accepted of the king's preſent, and gave him proofs of a perfect reconciliation [g].

Demetrius is acknowledged king by the Romans.

DEMETRIUS, after the orders he had received from Rome, had given Judæa ſome reſpite, as we have hinted above; but as he was in the flower of his age, and had a martial genius, he could not live long in peace. He therefore turned his arms againſt Cappadocia, where young Ariarathes then reigned. He was a prince endowed with many excellent qualities, of a ſweet diſpoſition, very gracious to his ſubjects, and highly eſteemed and beloved by them. His king-

Sets up a pretender to the crown of Cappadocia.

dom

[g] Polyb. legat. 122. p. 954, 955. Appian. in Syriac. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. legat. 25.

dom under so mild a government would have soon become one of the most happy and flourishing states of Asia, had not great disturbances been raised by a pretender to his crown, supported in his unjust pretensions by the whole power of Syria. His rival's name was Holophernes, or, as others write it, Orofernes, and his claim was this: Antiochis the daughter of Antiochus the Great, was married very young to the king of Cappadocia named Ariarathes, as well as his son. The queen having lived some time without children, and on that account believing herself barren, to gain the affection of her husband and subjects, feigned herself twice to be with child, and pretending to be delivered first of one son, and afterwards of another, imposed two suppositious children on the king her husband; the first of whom was called Ariarathes, and the other Holophernes. They were both brought up at the court of their supposed father, as heirs to his crown. But afterwards the queen proving truly to be with child, and being delivered first of one daughter, and then of another, and at last of a son, of whom she became passionately fond, declared to the king, that the two children, he had brought up as his eldest sons, were neither his children nor heirs, and gave him strong proofs of the cheat she had put upon him. Hereupon the king immediately sent the two suppositious children out of the kingdom, with a sufficient sum of money to support them. The eldest, called Ariarathes, was sent to Rome, where he was carefully kept, and as he was a young man of a weak mind and slender parts, he was very little affected with his loss. But Holophernes, who was endowed with many great qualities, and had an enterprizing genius, was sent into Ionia, and commanded never more to set foot in the kingdom of Cappadocia. The true son, at first called Mithridates, taking thenceforth his father's name, was declared presumptive heir to the crown. Nay, the loving father, out of an excess of tenderness, as soon as the young prince was capable of governing, offered to resign the crown to him, and lead himself a private life. But young Ariarathes protested that he would rather die a thousand times than rob his father of his dignity; and by this generous behaviour he merited the name of Philopator, which the Greeks afterwards gave him [h].

Not

[h] Polyb. l. iii. p. 161. & legat. 126. Appian. in Syriac. Justin. l. xxxv. c. 1. Epitome Livii. l. xlvii. Diodor. Sicul. l. xxxi. apud Photium cod. 244. p. 1160. Zonar. l. ix.

NOT long after Ariarathes, upon the death of his father, had aſcended the throne, Demetrius, who juſt then taken poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Syria, offered him his ſiſter Laodice in marriage. But ſhe being the widow of Perſes king of Macedon, an avowed enemy to the Romans, and Demetrius himſelf not being yet acknowledged by them king of Syria, Ariarathes was afraid this match might give them offence, and therefore rejected the offer. This Demetrius reſented, and under pretence of ſettling Holophernes on the throne, as he ſaid, of his anceſtors, made war on the king of Cappadocia. Beſides, Holophernes tempted the Syrian with great promiſes, engaging to pay him a thouſand talents, if he placed him on the throne. Demetrius therefore made great preparations for carying back of Holophernes to his native country; and on the other hand Ariarathes, entering into an alliance with Eumenes king of Pergamus, raiſed a conſiderable army to maintain his right. But Demetrius carried all before him; and driving Ariarathes out of Cappadocia, placed Holophernes on the throne. The dethroned prince fled to Rome, where, after long debates, the affair was determined, rather according to the inclinations of the judges, than the rules of equity, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of Cappadocia [i].

DEMETRIUS, having now no wars to carry on, gave himſelf up entirely to pleaſures and eaſe, leading a ſtrange, or rather a fantaſtic kind of life. For he cauſed a caſtle to be built near Antioch flanked it with four ſtrong towers, and there ſhut himſelf up, caſt off all care of the public, being ſeldom ſober the whole time he lived in that retirement. As no petitions were admitted, no grievances redreſſed, nor juſtice adminiſtered, the whole government was at a ſtand; which giving juſt cauſe of offence to all his ſubjects, they formed a conſpiracy for the depoſing of him. Holophernes, who had been driven out of Cappadocia and at that time lived at Antioch, entered into this plot againſt his benefactor, flattering himſelf that, in caſe the conſpiracy took effect, the Syrians would place him on the throne in the room of the depoſed king. But the whole conſpiracy being ſoon diſcovered, Holophernes was ſeized, and kept under cloſe confinement at Seleucia, Demetrius not caring to put him to death, that he might again, when a proper Demetrius gives himſelf up to drunkenneſs and debauchery.

[i] Appian. in Syriac. p. 118. legat. 126.

proper occaſion ſhould offer, let him looſe upon Ariarathes [k]. Demetrius, on examining the conſpirators, found that Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, Attalus king of Pergamus, and Ptolemy Philometor king of Egypt, were at the bottom of the plot; and concluding from thence, that if any misfortune ſhould befal him, his ſon, named alſo Demetrius, might meet with oppoſition in his ſucceſſion to the throne, unleſs his title was approved by the Roman ſenate, reſolved to deprive himſelf of his child, and ſend him to Rome to be brought up there. Accordingly the young prince ſet out ſoon after for that metropolis with a retinue ſuitable to his quality. But the Romans reviving their former reſentment againſt his father for making his eſcape, and taking poſſeſſion of a ſceptre which they had not put into his hands, received the king's ſon very coldly, and ſcarce treated him as a nobleman. Theſe proceedings greatly provoked the young prince's governors, who thereupon carried him back to Syria, when they had ſcarce ſhewn him at Rome. This ſudden eſcape of the ſon was no leſs reſented by the ſenate than that of the father had been ſome years before. While the republic was thus full of reſentment both againſt the father and the ſon, Heraclides, who had been ſome time at Rome watching an opportunity to raiſe new diſturbances in Syria, thought this the moſt proper time to ſucceed in a plot againſt Demetrius, which had been contrived by the abovementioned kings, Ptolemy, Attalus, and Ariarathes, and privately carried on by Heraclides. Theſe princes being highly incenſed againſt the king of Syria, the former for an attempt he had made upon the iſland of Cyprus, and the two others for the war he had waged with them in behalf of Holophernes, employed Heraclides to find out ſome young man of parts and addreſs, and ſuborn him to perſonate the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes, and under that title to lay claim to the crown of Syria. This Heraclides, as we have related above, had been a great favourite of Antiochus Epiphanes, and his treaſurer in the province of Babylon, while Timarchus his brother was governor of it. But on the coming of Demetrius to the crown, the two brothers being found guilty of mal-verſation and other crimes, Timarchus had been executed, and Heraclides baniſhed. The latter being obliged to quit the dominions of the king of Syria,

Alexander Balas lays claim to the crown.

[k] Juſtin. l. xxxv. c. 1.

Syria, took up his reſidence at Rhodes, and there having found a young man named Balas, of mean extraction, but every way qualified for the abovementioned deſign, he thoroughly inſtructed him to act the part that was given him [1].

HAVING thus formed him for the impoſture, he cauſed him in the firſt place to be acknowledged by the three kings abovementioned, who acted underhand in concert with him; and then carrying him to Rome with Laodice, the real daughter of Antiochus Epiphanes, whom he had gained over, introduced them both to the ſenate, a few days after the flight of young Demetrius. As Rome was at that time highly incenſed againſt Demetrius for the ſudden eſcape of his ſon, the ſenate received them very graciouſly. Heraclides, who preſented them to the ſenate, made on that occaſion a very artful ſpeech, which he concluded with the following words, after having expatiated on the inviolable attachment of Antiochus Epiphanes to the intereſt of Rome, and the cruelties ſuppoſed to have been practiſed by Demetrius, both over his ſubjects and the children of Epiphanes: But you, conſcript fathers, are already too well acquainted with Demetrius, and my complaints will add nothing to the opinion you entertain of that ſubtile and crafty uſurper. You have already openly diſcovered your ſentiments by the reception you gave young Demetrius. You did not think the ſon of an uſurper worthy of your education; nor would you form for the throne a perſon deſigned to perpetuate injuſtice on it. Nevertheleſs you did not then know, that two children of Antiochus Epiphanes had ſurvived their father and their brother Eupator, who was cruelly aſſaſſinated. Appear then, you illuſtrious offspring of one of the heroes of Aſia, I have reſcued you from want and oppreſſion, only to preſent you before the powerful and equitable tribunal of Rome. Make your demands yourſelves; and be aſſured that the protection you will meet with, will be as favourable as your cauſe is juſt. Accordingly Balas ſpoke for himſelf, and addreſſed the ſenate thus: The only favour I aſk is, that you would remember king Antiochus my my father. If his conduct was agreeable to you, you may as much depend on the ſubmiſſion of his ſon. Aſſiſt him with your protection, and he will ſoon give you proofs of his gratitude. If you deſire to ſee Syria united in a cloſe confederacy with Rome, give me only leave to return home. Polybius, who was then at Rome, tells us, that the whole city was fully convinced of the impoſture, and therefore greatly ſurprized to hear that the ſenate had paſſed a decree in favour of the two pretenders. This famous decree was couched in the following terms: The ſenate and people of Rome having examined the petition of Alexander and Laodice, the children of Antiochus Epiphanes king of Syria, the friend and ally of the Roman people, give the ſon leave to recover the rights of his father; and our will and pleaſure is, that our allies aſſiſt him therein [m]. Balas had changed his name, and taken that of Alexander, as Juſtin informs us; whence he is commonly called by the antients Alexander Balas; the latter was, according to Appian, his mother's name.

This impoſtor Balas countenanced by the Roman ſenate.

[1] Liv. Epitome, l. iii. Polyb. legat. 142. p. 966. Juſtin. l. xxxv. c. 1. Appian in Syriac. p. 131. Athenæus, l. 211. Sulpitius Severus, Hiſt. Sacr. l. ii. c. 22. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 3.

ALEXANDER being thus countenanced by the Roman ſenate, met with no difficulty in raiſing troops as ſoon as he landed in Syria. Ariarathes, Ptolemy, and Attalus, ſent him immediately powerful ſuccours; ſo that he was ſoon in a condition to appear before Ptolemais in Paleſtine, and even make himſelf maſter of that important place; the reduction of which was no ſooner heard of in Syria, but great numbers of Syrians out of diſaffection to Demetrius flocked to him from all parts. This brought Demetrius out of his caſtle to provide for his own defence; he drew together all the forces he could, took the field, and at the head of a formidable army marched out to meet the impoſtor. He was well appriſed that Rome had ſet up this rival to his crown; and therefore to appeaſe the republic, he ſent to Rome an impoſtor, named Andriſcus, who pretending to be the ſon of Perſes was come to the court of Syria to ſolicit his eſtabliſhment on the throne of his father in Macedon. The ſenate was well pleaſed to have this mock-king in their hands, but did not on that account diſcountenance in the leaſt the pretender to the crown of Syria, nor ſhew any inclination to aſſiſt Demetrius. This prince, finding the Romans bent on his ruin, had recourſe to Jonathan, who had ſucceeded the famous Judas

[m] Polyb. Liv. Appian. Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

Judas Maccabæus in the command of the Jewiſh forces, and made him moſt tempting offers. He wrote a very obliging letter to him, appointing him commander in chief of all his forces in Judæa, and empowering him to raiſe what troops he thought fit. At the ſame time he commanded the governor of the fortreſs of Jeruſalem to deliver up into his hands all the hoſtages of the Jewiſh nation, which were kept there as pledges of their fidelity to the Syrian intereſt. As the aſſiſtance of Jonathan was like to carry great weight with it, and turn the balance in favour of that ſide for which he ſhould declare, Alexander, hearing what Demetrius had done to gain ſo powerful an ally, ſent alſo his propoſals to him, appointing him high-prieſt of the Jews, honouring him with the title of the king's friend (F), and preſenting him with a purple robe and a crown of gold, as enſigns of the high dignity conferred upon him, none but princes and nobles of the firſt rank being in thoſe days allowed to wear purple. Demetrius, being informed of the advantageous offers of Alexander, reſolved to out-bid him, hoping, by that means, to ſecure to himſelf an ally of ſuch weight; he therefore ſent a ſecond meſſage to Jonathan, offering to confirm all the grants of his rival, and adding to them many extraordinary gifts and privileges to be enjoyed for ever by him and the whole Jewiſh nation, provided he would eſpouſe the cauſe, and maintain the undoubted rights of his family; but as he had, on all occaſions, betrayed an irreconcileable hatred to the Jews, and endeavoured to extirpate the whole nation, Jonathan looked upon all theſe offers as extorted only by the neceſſity of his affairs, and which he would certainly revoke, as ſoon as he ſaw himſelf again in quiet poſſeſſion of the crown. He therefore rejected the propoſals of a prince, on whom he could not, by any means depend, and reſolved to enter into an alliance with Alexander. Of him he accepted the high-prieſthood, and, with the conſent of the people, on the feaſt of tabernacles, which happened pened soon after, he put on the pontifical robes, and officiated as high-priest, after that office had been vacant seven years [n].

(F) The title of the king's friend was highly eſteemed under the Syro-Macedonian kings, being beſtowed upon perſons only of the firſt quality; and to wear a purple robe was a mark of great diſtinction, not only among the Macedonians, but other nations; whence the word Purpuratus in the latin tongue ſignifies a man of quality, or a prince.

Jonathan declares for Alexander Balas.

The two kings having taken the field at the head of their respective armies, Demetrius, who wanted neither courage nor conduct, when his reason was not impaired by immoderate drinking, gained the victory in the first battle; but it was of no advantage to him, for Alexander being speedily reinforced by the three kings who first set him up, and vigorously supported both by Jonathan and the Romans, he still maintained his ground. The Syrians likewise, notwithstanding the overthrow of Alexander, continued to desert in troops from Demetrius, who, by his surly temper, had rendered himself odious to all his subjects; wherefore Demetrius, beginning to apprehend the event of the war, sent his two sons, Demetrius and Antiochus, to Cnidus, a city of Caria, and there committed them, with a great treasure, to the care of a friend of his in that place, that, in case any misfortune should befal him in this war, his children might be out of the reach of his rival, and wait in a place of safety for some favourable turn of fortune [o].

Demetrius, having thus secured his children, and recruited his army the best he could, took the field anew, and being resolved to put the whole to the issue of a battle, engaged his rival at the head of an army far superior in number to his own. Both parties fought with incredible bravery, being encouraged by the example of their leaders. At first Demetrius's left wing put the enemy's right to flight; but pursuing them too far, a fault which has occasioned the loss of many victories, on their return they found the right wing, in which Demetrius fought in person, quite routed, and the king himself killed in the flight. As long as he could prevail upon his men to keep their ground, he distinguished himself in a very eminent manner; and when they began to give way, being bore down by the enemy's numbers, he displayed an extraordinary skill in military affairs, by retiring in good order, and keeping his men together, in hopes that his left wing might return in the mean time from the pursuit; but in the retreat his horse having unluckily plunged into a bog, he was abandoned by his own men, and surrounded on all sides

[n] Maccab. l. i. c. 10. ver. 21. & c. 7. ver. 14. Joseph. Antiq. l. xv. c. 3.

[o] Justin. Liv. ibid. & Eutrop. l. iv.

ſides by the enemy. In this ſituation, quitting his horſe, he fought a conſiderable time on foot with incredible bravery, putting all thoſe to death who dared to approach him; inſomuch, that none venturing to come within his reach, they kept at a diſtance, diſcharging inceſſantly ſhowers of darts, arrows, and javelins againſt him from all quarters. He fell at length, after having received a great many wounds, and for ſome time made head alone againſt the enemy's whole army [p] (G). Polybius and Porphyrius, who were both intimately acquainted with this prince, give him a moſt extraordinary character, and tells us, that he was killed after he had reigned twelve years; but Joſephus, upon what authority we know not, will have him to have reigned eleven years only. Demetriu defeated a killed. Year of flood 284 Year befo Chriſt 15

ALEXANDER, by this victory, having made himſelf maſter of the whole Syrian empire, ſent a ſolemn embaſſy into Egypt, to demand Cleopatra the daughter of Ptolemy, in marriage. The king not only complied with his requeſt, but conducted her to him in perſon; and the nuptials were celebrated at Ptolemais with great pomp and rejoicings. Jonathan, the Jewiſh high-prieſt, being invited by Alexander to aſſiſt at the ceremony, went thither, and was received by both kings with all poſſible marks of honour, eſpecially by Alexander, who cauſed him to be clad in purple, and inrolled among the firſt princes of his kingdom. He likewiſe honoured him with the chief command of all his forces in Judæa; and becauſe many out of envy preſented petitions againſt him, the king not only refuſed to peruſe them, but iſſued a proclamation, forbidding any one to ſpeak ill of him, or offer any complaints againſt his conduct [q].

[p] Maccab. l. i. c. 10. ver. 48, 49, 59. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 5. Juſtin. l. xxxv. c. 1. Appian. in Syriac. p. 131. Polyb. l. iii. p. 165. [q] Maccab. l. i. c. 10. ver. 59——66. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 7.

(G) Polybius, Juſtin, and Joſephus, agree with the author of the firſt book of the Maccabees concerning the unfortunate death of Demetrius; and Appian tells us in expreſs words, that Demetrius loſt at the ſame time his crown and his life, tho' the Latin tranſlator makes this author ſay, that the dethroned prince died in baniſhment; a ſenſe which the Greek original will not by any means bear.

ALEXANDER BALAS, seeing himself in the quiet possession of the crown, thought that his only business now was, to glut himself with all the pleasures which the plenty and power he had attained to could afford him; and therefore, abandoning himself to his natural inclination for luxury, idleness, and debauchery, he shut himself up in the inner parts of his palace with lewd women, spending his whole time with them, and leaving the entire management of affairs to a favourite called Ammonius, who, to use the expression of Justin, discharged the office of a sovereign in his room. As this Ammonius was a man of a suspicious, cruel, and savage disposition, he behaved more like a despotic tyrant than a minister, putting all those to death whom he imagined capable of disturbing his master in the possession of the crown which he had usurped. All those of the blood royal, who fell into his hands, were most inhumanly massacred, and among the rest Laodice, the sister of Demetrius, and Antigonus one of his sons, who had remained in Syria, when the other two were sent to Cnidus: This conduct soon drew, both upon the king and his minister, the hatred of the whole nation; of which Demetrius, the eldest of the deceased king's sons, being informed, he thought this a favourable opportunity to recover his right; and therefore having, by means of Lasthenes (H), hired some companies of Cretans, he left Cnidus where he had been educated, and set sail for Cilicia, which he soon made himself master of, the inhabitants flocking from all parts to join him. This

(H) The person with whom Demetrius entrusted his children, is supposed to be that Lasthenes, of whom mention is made in Josephus and the history of the Maccabees. He was a native of Cnidus, and zealously attached to the interest of Demetrius, whose children he brought up with great care. Hence Demetrius Nicator, the eldest of the two, looked upon him, even after he came to the crown, as his father, and honoured him with this title in the letter which is still extant in the history of the Maccabees. And indeed Lasthenes could not expect less gratitude from a pupil who owed his crown to him. This zealous tutor did not conceal from him any of those large sums, which Demetrius Soter, uncertain of the event, had deposited in his hands, but employed them all in making the necessary preparations for a war with the usurper of the crown of Syria. But, after all, Lasthenes no sooner got the power into his hands, upon his pupil's accession to the crown, but he proved a most cruel and oppressive tyrant, and by his cruelties and oppressions estranged the minds of the Syrians from their lawful sovereign.

This roufed Alexander from his lethargy ; he quitted his feraglio, drew together what forces he could, and having committed the government of Antioch to Hierax and Diodotus, who was afterwards called Tryphon, he took the field ; but upon advice that Apollonius (I) governor of Cæle-Syria, and Phænice, had declared for Demetrius, he began

(I) As the name of Apollonius often occurs in the hiftory of thefe times, it being very common among the Greeks and Syro-Macedonians, to avoid confufion, we fhall give an account of the perfons who bore it, and are mentioned in the occurrences of the times which we are now writing of. The firft we meet with of this name in the hiftory of the Maccabees, is Apollonius the fon of Thrafeas, who was governor of Cœle-Syria, and Phœnice, under Seleucus Philopator, when Heliodorus was fent to Jerufalem to plunder the temple, and who fupported Simon againft Onias the high-prieft (84). He was alfo prime minifter to the fame king, but on the acceffion to the crown of his brother Antiochus Epiphanes, he left Syria, and retired to Miletus, finding himfelf, in all likelihood, excluded from the adminiftration, and fome way obnoxious to the new king. While he refided at Miletus, a fon of his bearing the fame name refided at Rome with Demetrius the fon of Seleucus Philopator, then an hoftage in that city. As this Apollonius was a great favourite of Demetrius, as foon as that prince recovered the crown of his anceftors, he beftowed on the fon the fame government of Phœnice and Cœle-Syria, which the father had enjoyed under Seleucus Philopator (85). And this we take to be the Apollonius, who, being continued in the fame government by Alexander Balas, revolted from him, as we have related, to fide with Demetrius the fon of his old maftter (86). Another Apollonius is mentioned in the fecond book of the Maccabees (87), and faid to be chief minifter to Antiochus Epiphanes ; but he feems to have been of another family being called, in the above-mentioned hiftory, the fon of Mneftheus. He was fent by Epiphanes, with the character of embaffador, firft to Rome (88), and afterwards to Ptolemy Philometor king of Egypt (89). This Apollonius is in all likelihood the fame, who, in the hiftory of the Maccabees, is faid to have been over the tribute, and who, on Antiochus's rerurn from his laft expedition into Egypt, was fent with a detachment of twenty-two thoufand men to deftroy Jerufalem, and build the citadel on mount Acra, which kept the whole Jewifh nation in awe for many years. Befides thefe, there are two others bearing the fame name in the hiftory of the Maccabees, one of whom, being governor to ſuſpect the fidelity of the Syrians, and thereupon called in king Ptolemy, his father-in-law, to his aſſiſtance [r].

(84) Maccab. l. ii. c. 3. ver. 5. & c. 4. ver, 4. (85) Polyb. legat. 114. p. 944, 945. (86) Maccab. l. i. c. 10. ver. 69. (87) Maccab. l. ii. c. 4. ver. 21. (88) Liv. l. xlii. c. 6. (89) Maccab. l. ii. c. 4. ver. 21.

APOLLONIUS's firſt attempt, after he had declared for Demetrius, was to reduce Jonathan, who, mindful of the many favours he had received at the hands of Alexander, perſiſted in his attachment to that prince's intereſt. Apollonius having aſſembled all the troops that were diſperſed in Cæle-Syria, Phœnice, and the neighbouring provinces, advanced to Jamnia, a maritime city between Azotus and Joppa. From thence he ſent a proud meſſage to Jonathan, challenging him to an engagement. Hereupon Jonathan marching out of Jeruſalem with ten thouſand men, advanced to Joppa, and being there joined by his brother Simon, who commanded a ſeparate body, beſieged and took the place in ſight of Apollonius and his army. Being maſter of Joppa, he fell upon Apollonius, and routed him with great ſlaughter. The remains of the enemy's army fled to Azotus, and not thinking themſelves ſafe within the walls of the city, they took ſanctuary in the temple of Dagon; but Jonathan, not thinking himſelf obliged to pay any reſpect to an idolatrous aſylum, entered Azotus by force, and ſetting fire to the city, reduced it to aſhes, together with the temple; all thoſe who had fled thither for ſhelter, periſhing in the flames. All the neighbouring places which had declared for Demetrius underwent the ſame fate; ſo that Apollonius loſt on this occaſion above eight thouſand men. And now Jonathan, being maſter of the field, turned his arms againſt Aſcalon; but the inhabitants, being ſtruck with terror at his approach, opened their gates to him, and received him and his army within the walls. And now, having no more enemies to contend with in thoſe parts, he led back his army to Jeruſalem, loaded with the ſpoils of the conquered enemy and the riches of the plundered cities. Alexander [r] Maccab. l. i. c. 10. ver. 67. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 8. Juſtin. l. xxxv. c. 2. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii. p. 346.

governor of Samaria under Antiochus Epiphanes, was ſlain in battle by Judas Maccabeus (90), and the other, called the ſon of Gennæus, being likewiſe governor of ſome ſeigniory in Paleſtine, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his hatred to the Jewiſh nation (91.)

(90) Maccab. l. i. c. 3. ver. 10. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 7. & 10. (91) Maccab. l. ii. c. 12. ver 2.

ander, when informed of theſe ſucceſſes, teſtified his gratitude with new marks of diſtinction, ſending him a claſp of gold, ſuch as the princes only, who were of the royal family, uſed to wear, and beſtowing upon him the ſovereignty of the city of Accaron and its territory [s].

In the mean time Ptolemy Philometor, to whom Alexander had applied for ſuccours, advanced to his relief, at the head of a mighty army. The author of the ſecond book of the Maccabees emphatically compares his troops to the ſand of the ſea-ſhore. As he entered Paleſtine, all the cities, through which he paſſed, received him with loud acclamations. As he marched by the place on which Azotus formerly ſtood, ſome perſons of his retinue, diſaffected to the Jews, ſhewed him the ruins of that city, and of the once magnificent temple of Dagon, telling him, that theſe were the ſad effects of Jonathan's fury; but notwithſtanding theſe complaints, and the ſight of many dead bodies, which ſtill lay unburied on the road and in the adjoining fields, Ptolemy gave Jonathan, when he came to wait on him at Joppa, as favourable a reception as he could deſire. Both princes ſpent the night in that city, and leaving it the next day, Jonathan accompanied the king as far as Eleutherus a river of Phœnice, and then returned to Jeruſalem. Ptolemy purſued his march, haſtening to the defence of his ſon-in-law and ally; but upon his arrival at Ptolemais, he was, to his great ſurprize, informed, that Alexander had a deſign upon his life, and that Ammonius, the king of Syria's great favourite, had taken upon him to execute this deteſtable piece of treachery: Perhaps Alexander fearing that Ptolemy, coming with ſo powerful an army, might ſeize on Syria for himſelf, had reſolved to prevent this danger, by cutting him off at Ptolemais; for in that city the conſpirators were all aſſembled. Ptolemy could not be perſuaded at firſt, that Alexander had any hand in the plot, aſcribing the whole to the jealous temper of his imperious miniſter, who, without any orders from his maſter, nay, even without his privity, had put to death many Syrian lords of great diſtinction. He therefore wrote a letter to the king of Syria, complaining of the attempt, and demanding the criminal to be delivered up to him; but Alexander refuſing to comply with ſo juſt a demand, Ptolemy concluded from thence, that he was privy to the plot, and that Ammonius had only executed his maſter's orders.

[s] Maccab. l. 1. c. 10. ver. 69——87. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 8. Diodor. in excerpt. Valeſii. p. 346.

Hereupon being highly exaſperated, he reſolved to turn his arms againſt the prince he was come to defend, and accordingly ſent embaſſadors to young Demetrius, offering him his daughter Cleopatra, Alexander's wife, in marriage, and promiſing to ſettle him on the throne of his anceſtors. Demetrius willingly embraced this advantageous offer, went immediately to wait on Ptolemy, and received from him his daughter, who, too eaſily complying with her father's will, was not aſhamed to break through her former engagements, and abandoning her firſt, married a ſecond huſband [t].

When news of this was brought to Antioch, the inhabitants of that city, who had long groaned under the oppreſſions of the favourite miniſter, thinking this a proper opportunity to revenge the many violences he had committed in their city, roſe up in arms in a tumultuous manner, ſurrounded his palace, and killed him, as he was attempting to make his eſcape from the rage of the incenſed multitude in the attire of a woman [u]. Nor did the death of Ammonius put a ſtop to the ſedition, the Antiochians were uneaſy to ſee a prince on the throne, whom his wicked miniſters and his own indolence had rendered odious to the whole nation, and therefore thought of nothing but ſhaking off the yoke. Ptolemy, taking advantage of the preſent diſpoſition of the Antiochians, did all that lay in his power to engage them in favour of Demetrius; but they, remembring the many evils they had ſuffered under Demetrius Soter his father, were afraid the ſon might prove a no leſs cruel tyrant when once fixed on the throne, and therefore refuſed to declare in his favour. However, their hatred to Alexander ſo far got the better of their prejudices againſt Demetrius, that they entered into a confederacy againſt the former, and opened their gates to Ptolemy, offering to place the crown on his head; but that prince, who, as Joſephus tells us, knew how to ſet bounds to his ambition, when not agreeable to the rules of the ſtricteſt equity, rejecting their offer, and aſſembling all the inhabitants of that great metropolis, with a generoſity ſcarce to be paralleled, declared, that he could not, without the moſt flagrant injuſtice, place himſelf on the throne of Syria, by excluding the lawful heir. He repreſented Demetrius to them as a young prince of ſuch amiable qualities as promiſed a mild and peaceable reign; and, to [t] Joſeph. l. xiii. c. 8. Liv. Epit. lib. l. & Maccab. l. i. c. 11. ver. 13.

[u] Joſeph. ibid.

to calm their fears, he offered to be their guarantee for their new ſovereign's conduct, undertaking to aſſiſt him with his advice, and teach him the art of governing. The diſintereſted repreſentations of Ptolemy had the deſired effect; Demetrius was proclaimed king of Syria, and placed on the throne of his anceſtors [w].

In the mean time Alexander, who was then in Cilicia, having aſſembled a numerous army, advanced to Antioch; and being met in the neighbourhood of that city by Ptolemy and his new ſon-in-law, a bloody engagement enſued, in which Alexander being vanquiſhed, all thoſe, who had hitherto ſtood by him, abandoning his party, came over to Demetrius. The unhappy Alexander, inſtead of gathering together the remains of his ſhattered forces, betook himſelf to a precipitous flight, and, being attended only by five hundred horſe, never halted till he got into Arabia. He there thought himſelf ſafe in the houſe of a chief lord of that country, whom the author of the hiſtory of Maccabees calls Zabdiel, Joſephus Zabel, and Diodorus Siculus Diocles; but the place proved fatal to him, for the treacherous Zabdiel ſtabbed him with his own hand, and made this baſe act matter of merit with Ptolemy and Demetrius; but the former was ſcarce able to taſte the fruits of the victory, for his horſe, terrified in the heat of the battle at the braying of an elephant, ſtarted and threw him; and, while he was on the ground, Alexander's men having ſurrounded him, wounded him mortally on the head, and would have killed him on the ſpot, had not his own guards reſcued him out of their hands. But this only prolonged his life a ſhort time; he lay ſenſeleſs four days, the fifth he ſeemed to recover, and in this interval the head of Alexander, which Zabdiel had cauſed to be ſtruck off, was brought to him as a preſent from the Arabian; but the joy he felt on this occaſion ſoon put an end to his life [x]. As for Demetrius, he took, without any further oppoſition, poſſeſſion of his father's dominions, ſtiling himſelf from this victory Nicator, that is, the Conqueror. Alexander Balas had reigned, according to Joſephus, five, according to the hiſtory of the Maccabees, ſix years, reckoning from the one hundred and ſixtieth year of the kingdom of the Greeks, or the Æra of the Seleucidæ, to the one hundred and ſixty-ſeventh ſeventh, which was the firſt of the reign of Demetrius Nicator (K).

[w] Maccab. l. i. c. 11. ver. 8——12. Joſeph. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Photii, cod. 244. [x] Joſeph. l. xiii. c. 8. Liv. Epit. l. iii. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

THIS is the account which Joſephus gives us of the troubles of Syria, and the death of Alexander Balas. But the author of the hiſtory of the Maccabees varies greatly from him, eſpecially in what relates to the character of Ptolemy Philometor king of Egypt, whom Joſephus highly commends, as we have ſeen, and the author of the firſt book of the Maccabees repreſents as an ambitious and perfidious prince, trampling under foot the moſt ſacred laws

(K) Alexander Balas is called, in in the firſt book of the Maccabees (92), the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes; but as all the profane hiſtorians are unanimous in this, viz. that he was an impoſtor, and no ways related to the family of the Seleucidæ, we have, upon their authority, contradicted the writer of that book. Polybius, who was then at Rome, tells us, that the whole city was fully convinced, that Alexander Balas had no right to the crown of Syria, and that the whole was a cheat carried on by Heraclides, who had long waited in Rome for ſome opportunity of raiſing Diſturbances againſt Demetrius, by whom his brother had been put to death, and himſelf baniſhed. The ſame author adds, that the people of Rome were much ſurpriſed to hear, that the ſenate had paſſed a decree in favour of the impoſtor, and even began to ſuſpect, that Heraclides, being well appriſed of the preſent diſpoſition of the ſenate, had ſet up this impoſtor to pleaſe them (93). Livy tells us, that he was meanly born, and that his deſcent was not well known (94). Athenæus calls him the ſuppoſititious ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes (95). Appian ſays, that he intruded himſelf into the family of the Seleucidæ (96). Sulpitius Severus calls him a Rhodian, and adds, that he impudently paſſed himſelf upon ſome for the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes (97). Some modern writers urge the following argument to prove, that he was truly the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes. Jonathan, ſay they, the virtuous high-prieſt of the holy nation, preferred his alliance to that of Demetrius; whence it is plain, that he had a juſt title to the crown (98). But herein they run counter to their own principals; for allowing him to have been the true ſon of Epiphanes, yet, as he was the ſon of the younger brother, who had himſelf uſurped the crown, he could have no right to it in the life time of Demetrius, who was the ſon of the elder brother. Epiphanes himſelf knew, that Demetrius had an indiſputable laws of nature and juſtice, to raiſe himſelf on the ruins of his own ſon-in-law. The acoount which the latter author gives us of this famous revolution, which put an end both to the life and reign of Alexander Balas, is as follows:

(92) Maccab. l. i. c. 10. ver. 1. (93) Polyb. legat. 140. (94) Liv in Epit. l. liii. (95) Athenæus l. v. c. 10. (96) Appian. in Syriac. p. 31. (97) Sulp. Sever. Hiſt. Sacr. l. ii. (98) The authors of the Roman hiſtory publiſhing at Paris. l. xlvii.

PTOLEMY Philometor, being a prince of an unbounded ambition, had formed a deſign of uniting in his perſon the crowns of Syria and Egypt. As Alexander Balas had married Cleopatra the daughter of Ptolemy, and was in imminent danger of being driven from the throne by Demetrius Nicator the ſon of Demetrius Soter, the king of Egypt laid hold of this opportunity to put his deſign in execution. Accordingly, having raiſed a numerous army, he entered Syria, under the ſpecious pretence of aſſiſting his friend and relation againſt the attempts of his rival. All the cities through which he paſſed opened their gates to him, Alexander having commanded them to pay the king of Egypt the honours that were due to him as the father-in-law of their ſovereign; but the treacherous Ptolemy under plauſible appearances, only took advantage of the credulity of the unfortunate Alexander, putting Egyptian garriſons into the cities which had received him as a friend, and by that means ſecuring the poſſeſſion of them to himſelf. Thus he advanced into Syria, making himſelf maſter of all the places he found in his way as far as Seleucia, diſputable right to ſucceed his father in the kingdom of Syria, and therefore pretended at firſt to govern the empire only as guardian to the young prince, who was then under age. Beſides, Jonathan, that virtuous high-prieſt of the holy nation, did not afterwards ſcruple to ſide with the ſon of Demetrius againſt the ſon of Balas, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory. The conduct therefore of Jonathan is no proof of Alexander's right, nor could thoſe authors have alledged it as ſuch, but out of a ſupine and unpardonable inadvertency.

Diodorus Siculus tells tells, that Alexander having ſome time before his death, conſulted a famous oracle in Cilicia, was warned by the god to beware of a place which had given birth to a creature of two ſhapes. It was generally thought, that the city of Abas, where Alexander was killed, was pointed at by this anſwer; for, after his death, upon enquiry, they found, that a woman called Herais, the daughter of Diophantus a Macedonian and of an Arabian woman, after ſhe had been ſome years married to one Samiadas, all on a ſudden changed her ſex, and took her father's name (99).

(99) Diodor. Sicul. in fine. l. xxxii. apud Photium. cod. 244.

cia, a maritime city on the mouth of the Orontes. And now it was in vain for him to diſſemble any longer, the leaſt ſagacious being fully appriſed of his wicked deſign; he therefore pulled off the maſk, and ſending deputies to Demetrius, inviting the young prince to join him againſt their common enemy, he offered him, in order to convince him of his ſincerity, his daughter Cleopatra, Alexander Balas's wife, in marriage; and, the better to palliate his injuſtice, he pretended, that Alexander and his prime miniſter had formed a plot againſt him, and hired aſſaſſins to take away his life, without any regard to their affinity and antient friendſhip. Demetrius not daring to withſtand the ſollicitations of the embaſſadors from ſo powerful a prince, went to wait on Ptolemy, who had nothing in view but his own intereſt in this alliance; for not caring to contend with two enemies at once, he made uſe of Demetrius to haſten the deſtruction of Alexander, not doubting, but when he had once got rid of him, the other would fall an eaſy victim to his ambition. After the ceremonies of the marriage were over, Ptolemy ſet out for Antioch, and there treacherouſly cauſed himſelf to be crowned king of Syria, without any regard to the moſt ſacred rights, and the ſolemn promiſes given to the unhappy Demetrius.

ALL theſe things were tranſacted in the heart of the kingdom, while Alexander Balas, deceived by the falſe promiſes of his father-in-law, was reducing the cities of Cilicia; but the news of the unfaithfulneſs of his wife, and the treachery of Ptolemy, made him drop that enterprize; however, he did not ſink under this ſhocking news, but aſſembling his troops without loſs of time, he advanced, by great marches, to ſtop the progreſs of the uſurper. Ptolemy met him, and offered him battle, which Alexander accepted, having no other reſource but in his courage, which fortune did not proſper. His troops were entirely defeated, and himſelf forced to take refuge in Arabia, where he miſerably periſhed by the hands of Zabdiel, one of the lords of that country. The Barbarian cut off his head, and ſent it to Ptolemy, who did not long enjoy the fruit of his crimes, death three days after putting an end both to his ambitious projects and his life. Upon his death Demetrius took poſſeſſion of the throne, and was by all the Syrians acknowledged for their ſovereign [y].

THIS

[y] Maccab. l. i. c. 11. ver. 1——20.

THIS is the account which the author of the firſt book of the Maccabees gives us of the troubles of Syria. The diſagreement between him and Joſephus, eſpecially with relation to Ptolemy, is very palpable; and therefore, in this oppoſition, we leave the reader to judge which of the two deſerves the preference. As for us, we cannot help thinking it highly improbable, that Alexander Balas ſhould hire aſſaſſins to murder Ptolemy, while he was actually marching to his aſſiſtance with the whole ſtrength of his kingdom. What great advantage could that prince propoſe to himſelf by cutting off ſo powerful an ally, and the only true friend he then had, as Joſephus himſelf is pleaſed to tell us? Some writers have endeavoured to reconcile Joſephus with the book of the Maccabees, by ſaying, that Alexander formed the deſign of aſſaſſinating Ptolemy by means of his favourite miniſter Ammonius, after the unjuſt proceedings of the king of Egypt had convinced him, that this prince had entered his dominions with a deſign to ſeize them for himſelf. But this is rather contradicting Joſephus than reconciling him with the other writer; for the former tells us in expreſs terms, that Alexander had received no provocation from Ptolemy, and this, in our opinion, has not the leaſt appearance of truth. But Joſephus is not the only author who contradicts the hiſtory of the Maccabees; for Diodorus Siculus [z] tells us, that Alexander Balas, having retired after the battle to Abæ a city of Arabia, put himſelf there under the protection of Diocles, one of the chief lords of the country, whom he had a little before entruſted with the care of his ſon Antiochus, who was then a child. While he was here, the officers, who had attended him in his flight, entering into conſpiracy againſt him, ſent privately meſſengers to the conqueror, offering to rid him of an enemy, who was formidable even in his retreat, Demetrius, who had no other view but to ſecure to himſelf the crown of Syria, accepted the offer made him in the name of the conſpirators; whereupon Alexander was ſeized and barbarouſly murdered by thoſe, who to that time had acknowledged him for their ſovereign. Euſebius [a] tells us, that Alexander ſurvived Philometor four years; and that he married the daughter of Ptolemy Euergetes the brother of Philometor; and in this he not only contradicts the book of the the Maccabees and Joſephus, but all the profane hiſtorians whoſe works have reached us.

[z] Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii. l. xxxii. p. 194 [a] Euſeb. in Chron.

DEMETRIUS, having now no rival to contend with, and being altogether a ſtranger to ſtate affairs, left the whole care of the government to Laſthenes, who had hired thoſe Cretans by whom he was attended into Cilicia, when he firſt ſet out from Cnidus. As Laſthenes was a man of a ſevere and imperious temper, he ſoon alienated the minds of the Syrians from their new king. The firſt wrong ſtep he took was, to command all the Egyptians, whom Ptolemy had placed in the maritime cities of Phœnice and Syria, to be cruelly maſſacred by the troops of Syria who were in the ſame garriſons. Hereupon the Egyptian army, which was ſtill in Syria, and had placed Demetrius on the throne, full of juſt horror for ſo barbarous an execution, abandoned him and returned home [b]. After this, Demetrius, at the inſtigation of his prime miniſter, cauſed a ſtrict ſearch to be made after thoſe who had been againſt him or his father in the late wars, and put them all to death. Having by this means got rid, as he imagined, of all his enemies, he diſbanded the greateſt part of his army, keeping in pay only his Cretans and ſome other mercenaries. By this means he not only deprived himſelf of thoſe veterans who had ſerved under his father, and, being well affected to him, would have maintained him on the throne, but made them his greateſt enemies.

IN the mean time Jonathan, ſeeing every thing quiet in Judæa, having gathered together what forces he could, and prepared the neceſſary engines of war, laid ſiege to the fortreſs which the Syrians ſtill held at Jeruſalem. Hereupon complaints being made to Demetrius, that prince advanced as far as Ptolemais, and ſummoned Jonathan to to wait on him there, and give an account of his conduct. Jonathan, ordering his men to purſue the ſiege with all poſſible vigour during his abſence, ſet out for Ptolemais, with ſome of the prieſts and principal men of the nation, carrying with him many rich and valuable preſents. Theſe not only appeaſed the king's wrath, but proved ſuch an efficacious recommendation in behalf of Jonathan, that Demetrius having diſmiſſed the informers, confirmed him in the office of high-prieſt, admitted him into the number of his friends, and, at his requeſt annexed to Judæa the three three governments of Apherema, Lydda and Ramatha, which did formerly belong to Samaria. Moreover, the king agreed to free the whole country under his government from all duties, cuſtoms, and tributes, for three hundred talents to be paid to him by way of equivalent [c]. Demetrius, having thus ſettled matters with the Jews, returned to Antioch, where he gave himſelf up to all kind of exceſſes, Laſthenes putting him, as he was but very young, upon moſt wicked attempts. This behaviour alienated more and more the affections of his people from him, and diſpoſed the whole nation for a general revolt; which being obſerved by Diodotus, afterwards called Tryphon, he thought this a favourable opportunity to make a bold puſh, aiming at nothing leſs than to place the crown on his own head. Diodotus was born in the territory of Apamea, at a place called Secoan, and brought up in the city of Apamea [d]. He had been very ſanguine in the cauſe of Alexander Balas, who had appointed him, in conjunction with Hierax, governor of Antioch, and therefore had no ſhare in the confidence of Demetrius Nicator; but an obſcure and private life did not ſuit the taſte of Diodotus, who was a man of an unbounded ambition. He had very early formed vaſt ſchemes, and, if we believe Strabo, in the very beginning of Nicator's reign, ſeized the fortreſs of Coraceſium in Cilicia, and made it his place of arms, ſcouring from thence the ſeas with impunity, and taking all the inhabitants of the coaſts who fell into his hands, and carrying them to Delos, where he ſold them to the Romans, who, after the reduction of Carthage and Corinth, piqued themſelves upon having great numbers of ſlaves. The indolence of Demetrius Nicator, adds the ſame author, the avarice of the governors, who had their ſhares of the profits ariſing from his piracies, and the connivance of the king of Egypt, a declared enemy to Nicator, encouraged theſe robberies and other diſturbances in the Syrian empire. At length Diodotus, being well appriſed of the diſaffection of the people to their ſovereign, began to entertain thoughts of ſeizing the crown for himſelf. With this view he went into Arabia, and there laying before Zabdiel, who had been entruſted with the perſon and education cation of Antiochus the son of Alexander, the state of affairs in Syria, with great difficulty prevailed upon him to put the youth into his hands, that he might take advantage of the present disturbances to place him on the throne of his father. Appian calls this prince Alexander, and not Antiochus, contrary to the testimony of the history of the Maccabees and of Josephus. He was the son of Alexander Balas by Cleopatra, and was very young when Diodotus drew him from his retreat (L). The traitor's scheme was to make use of the pretensions of Antiochus, till he had drove Demetrius from the throne, and afterwards to cut off the young prince, and place the crown on his own head.

[b] Maccab. l. i. c. 11. ver. 18. Joſeph. l. xiii. c. 8.

[c] Maccab. l. i. c. 11. ver. 23——37. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 8. [d] Maccab. l. i. c. 11. ver. 39. Strabo, l. xvi. p. 752, Liv. l. lii. liii. Joſeph. l. xiii. c. 9. Appian in. Syriac. p. 132.

In the mean time, Jonathan was carrying on the siege of the fortress of Jerusalem with great vigour; but not being able to reduce it, he sent deputies to Demetrius, desiring him to withdraw the garrison which he could not drive out. As that prince was then involved in great difficulties, on account of the seditions and tumults which daily broke out at Antioch, the inhabitants of that metropolis having an utter aversion both to his person and government, he promised to grant Jonathan his request, upon condition he would send him some troops to keep the Antiochians in awe. Hereupon Jonathan sent him immediately three thousand men, by which reinforcement the king believing himself sufficiently strong to undertake any thing, resolved to disarm the Antiochians, and accordingly ordered them all to deliver up their arms. This unexpected order caused a great uproar in the city; the inhabitants ran to their arms, and, to the number of one hundred and twenty thousand men, invested the king's palace, with a design to kill him. The Jews hastened to his relief, fell upon the mutiniers, killed about an hundred thousand of them, and set fire to the city, which soon obliged the rest to submit, and sue for pardon, which was granted them. The tumult being thus quelled, the Jews returned, loaded with spoils, to Jerusalem, after having

(L) Antiochus was, according to Eusebius, about seven years of age when Tryphon drew him from his retreat. Livy tells us, that he was then but two years old, wherein he contradicts himself, if some mistake has not crept into the copy; for he elsewhere owns, that Antiochus reigned only two years under the guardianship of Trypon, by whom he was, according to him, put to death in the tenth year of his age.

having taken this dreadful revenge on the Antiochians, for the wrongs they had ſuffered from them in Judæa and Jeruſalem, eſpecially in the reign of their great perſecutor Antiochus Epiphanes [f].

DEMETRIUS, notwithſtanding the pardon he had granted to the Antiochians, put many of them to death, confiſcated their eſtates, and practiſed upon that unhappy people all ſorts of cruelties and oppreſſions; whereupon the whole kingdom conceived ſuch an hatred and animoſity againſt him, that they only wanted an opportunity to make him feel the moſt dreadful effects of their vengeance. That ungrateful and impolitic prince behaved no better towards Jonathan, than he did towards his own ſubjects; for, notwithſtanding the promiſes he had made to him, and the great obligations he owed him for his late aſſiſtance, he refuſed to ſtand to the treaty concluded with him at Ptolemais, in virtue of which he was to free the Jewiſh nation from all taxes and tributes for three hundred talents. This ſum had been paid; but, for all that, the king exacted the ſame taxes and tributes with the utmoſt rigour, by which means he alienated the Jews from him, as he had done his own ſubjects [g].

WHILE things were in this unſteady condition, Tryphon arrived in Syria, with Antiochus the ſon of Alexander Balas, and laid claim to the crown in his name, ſtiling himſelf guardian and protector of the young king. He no ſooner appeared, but the veterans, whom Demetrius had diſbanded, and multitudes of others, whom he had provoked with his ill conduct, flocked to him, proclaimed him king and marching under his banners againſt Demetrius, obliged that prince to come to an engagement, wherein his army was entirely routed, all his elephants taken, and he himſelf forced to ſhelter himſelf within the walls of Seleucia. Antiochus's party being thus maſter of the field, marched ſtreight to Antioch, which opened its gates to them, and there placed the young prince on the throne of the kings of Syria, giving him the ſirname of Theos, that is, the God [h].

ANTIOCHUS

[f] Maccab. l. i. c. 11. ver. 41.——52. Joſeph. Antiq. l. iii. c. 9. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii. p. 347, 348. [g] Diodor. Sicul. ibid. Maccab. l. i. c. 11. ver. 53. Joſeph. ibid.
[h] Maccab. l. i. c. 11. ver. 54.——56. Liv. Epit. l. lii. Joſeph. ibid. Appian. in Syriac.

ANTIOCHUS being now in poſſeſſion of Antioch and the throne, Tryphon, his guardian, made it his firſt buſineſs to gain over Jonathan and the Jewiſh nation. With this view he ſent an embaſſy to Jonathan and an obliging letter, confirming him in the office of high-prieſt, renewing the grant of the three ſeignories mentioned above, to which a fourth was added, and allowing him to wear purple with a gold claſp, to drink in a gold cup, and to have place among the king's chief friends, or the firſt lords of the kingdom, with many other privileges and advantages to be enjoyed by the whole Jewiſh nation. In virtue of the ſame letter, which was wrote in the new king's name, Simon was appointed commander in chief of all the king's forces, from the Ladder of Tyre, a mountain ſo called on the ſea-coaſt between Tyre and Ptolemais, to the borders of Egypt; the whole on condition, that the two brothers and the Jewiſh nation would declare for Antiochus. Jonathan provoked at the ingratitude of Demetrius, accepted the invitation, and eſpouſed with great warmth the new king's party: whereupon a commiſſion being ſent him, empowering him to raiſe forces for the king's ſervice throughout all Cœle-Syria and Paleſtine, he drew together a great army, and marching round the country as far as Damaſcus, ſecured all thoſe parts in the intereſt of Antiochus. In the mean time, the forces which Demetrius had, in Cœle-Syria and Paleſtine, invaded Galilee, in order to make a diverſion, and oblige Jonathan to turn his arms that way; which he did accordingly, leaving Simon to command in Judæa. On his entering Galilee, he was very near being cut off with his whole army by a ſtratagem; but, while moſt of his men fled, being ſeized with a panic fear, a ſmall body of the moſt reſolute and courageous ſtood their ground, and made head againſt the enemy, till the reſt rallied, and, returning to the charge, renewed the fight, and gained at laſt a complete victory. On the other hand, Simon, laying ſiege to Bethſura, made himſelf maſter of that important place, which had been long in the hands of Syrians [i]. The commander of the king's forces in Galilee, having recruited his army with great expedition, returned againſt Jonathan, who, upon advice of his march, went to meet him as far as Amathis on the borders of Canaan; and there the two two armies encamped over againſt each other. The Syrian commander formed a deſign of attacking Jonathan's camp in the night-time, in hopes of ſurprizing him; but finding, on his approach, the Jews, who had received intelligence of his deſign, ready to receive him, he was ſo diſcouraged at the diſappointment, that he returned to his camp, and having cauſed fires to be lighted there to deceive the enemy, he marched off the ſame night, and got ſo far before Jonathan received advice of his retreat, that he could never come up with him; wherefore, after having purſued him in vain to the banks of the Eleutherus, he turned his arms, firſt againſt the Arabians who were of Demetrius's party, and afterwards entered the territory of Damaſcus, putting all thoſe to the ſword who refuſed to ſide with Antiochus; by which means he entirely ſuppreſſed the party of Demetrius in thoſe parts, while his brother did the ſame in the country of the Philiſtines, after having made himſelf maſter of Joppa, and placed a ſtrong garriſon in it [k].

[i] Maccab. l. i. c. 11. ver. 57——62. Joſeph. ibid.

THE partiſans of Demetrius being thus every-where deſtroyed or driven out of the country, Tryphon thought it high time to put in execution the deſign, he had formed from the beginning, of cutting off Antiochus, and ſeizing the crown of Syria for himſelf; but foreſeeing that Jonathan would, to the utmoſt of his power, oppoſe ſuch a black and treacherous attempt, he reſolved, in the firſt place, to rid himſelf of ſo formidable an enemy, and with this deſign entered Judæa, at the head of a powerful army. Jonathan met him with forty thouſand men at Bethſan, a city of the tribe of Manaſſeth (M). At the ſight of ſo

[k] Maccab. l. i. ubi ſupra. & c. 12. ver. 1——24. Joſeph. ibid.

(M) The city called Bethſan by the Jews, Methora by Zonaras, and Bazan by Cedrenus, ſtood on the confines of Galilee, and is the ſame that is mentioned in the firſt chapter of Joſhua. The Canaanites kept poſſeſſion of this city, which was the moſt conſiderable in the Decapolis, after the Iſraelites had conquered Paleſtine. It ſtood in the middle of a great plain, near the mountains of Gilboa, about a mile on this ſide of the Jordan, and 120 furlongs, according to Joſephus, from the lake of Genneſareth, and 600 furlongs from Jeruſalem. The Greeks gave it the name of Scythopolis; and ſo it is called in the hiſtory of the Maccabees numerous an army, Tryphon was intimidated, and had recourse to artifice instead of force. No declaration of war had been made, and therefore the Syrian, under a false appearance of friendship, easily circumvented the high-priest. He told him, that he was come thither only to consult with him about their common interest, and to put Ptolemais into his hands, as a reward for the services he had done young Antiochus. Credulity is too often the fault of good men. Jonathan believed him, and suffered himself to be prevailed upon to dismiss his army, keeping only three thousand men with him, and of these he afterwards sent two thousand into Galilee, so that he entered Ptolemais with a guard only of a thousand men, expecting according to the traitor's oath, to be put in possession of the place; but he was no sooner got within the walls, than the gates were shut upon him, and he seized, after all his followers had been put to the sword. Troops were likewise immediately detatched after the two thousand men, who were upon their march towards Galilee; but they, having received advice of what had happened to Jonathan and his men at Ptolemais, put themselves in a posture of defence, being resolved to sell their lives at a dear rate; which the enemy perceiving, suffered them to proceed on their march without molestation; so that they arrived safe at Jerusalem, where they found all the inhabitants in tears for what had happened to Jonathan. However, they did not despond, but choosing Simon for their general instead of Jonathan, applied themselves, with all possible speed, to the finishing of the fortifications begun by Jonathan at Jerusalem.

bees (100), because antiently inhabited by the Scythians, who, according to Herodotus, had, in the reigns of Psammitichus king of Egypt, and Cyaxares king of Media, extended their conquests as far as Syria and Palestine. Pliny tells us, upon the credit of an antient tradition, that Bethsan was, in former times, called Nysa, from Bacchus's nurse, whom the Scythians buried near that place. It is now known among the eastern nations by the name of Elbyzan. It was on the walls of this city, if Josephus is to be credited (101), that the Philistians hung up the dead bodies of Saul and Jonathan. Some Jewish authors say, that it was subject to the Israelites before the Babylonish captivity, they having at length driven out the Canaanites; but that the Assyrians afterwards made themselves masters of it, and held it long after the return of the Jews.

(100) Maccab. l. ii. c. 12. (101) Joseph. Antiq. l. vi.

Jeruſalem. On the other hand, the Syrian army, leaving Ptolemais, advanced towards the land of Judah, and encamped near Addus, which is called by Joſephus Addida, and ſtood on a mountain that commanded the plains of Judah, and was not far from Jeruſalem. Simon, at the head of a powerful army, marched out againſt Tryphon, and poſted himſelf near the Syrian camp. Tryphon, not daring to give him battle, had recourſe to his uſual treachey; he ſent a deputation to the camp of the Iſraelites, informing Simon that his brother was alive, that he had detained him priſoner only on account of the money which he owed to the king of Syria, and that he would ſet him at liberty, if the Jews ſent him an hundred talents of ſilver and Jonathan's two ſons as hoſtages. The embaſſadors inſiſted upon the delivering up of the hoſtages as a neceſſary precaution, leaſt Jonathan, who was highly provoked, ſaid they, againſt Tryphon, ſhould revolt from Antiochus, and join Demetrius. Simon ſaw plainly, that his propoſal was no more than a feint, and that ſome treachery was concealed under theſe artful ſpeeches; however, as he apprehended, that, upon his refuſal, Tryphon would put Jonathan to death, and the people blame him as the author of it, he reſolved to comply with the requeſt, and accordingly ſent the hundred talents and the two hoſtages. And then the traitor, having received all he demanded, pulled off the maſk, and declared himſelf an enemy to the Jewiſh nation. He returned into Syria, carrying Jonathan and his two ſons along with him, and having there reinforced his army, he re-entered Judæa, with a deſign utterly to deſtroy the whole nation; but Simon kept ſo cloſe to him in all his marches and countermarches, that he was forced to retire with diſgrace. On his retreat, he put Jonathan to death in the neighbourhood of Baſcama (N); but whether by poiſon or the ſword, no hiſtorian is exact enough to tell us [1]. Tryphon, after the death of Jonathan, believing he had no body to fear, cauſed Antiochus to be privately

[1] Macab. l. 1. c. 12. ver. 39—53. & c. 13. ver. 1—11. & 20—24. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 12.

(N) The author of the hiſtory of the Maccabees tells us, that the ſnow which fell prevented Tryphon from entering into the country of Gilead, and that he ſtopped at Baſcama; whence it is plain, that this city was not, according to that author, in the land of Gilead, where Joſephus and ſome modern geographer place it.

vately murdered. That young prince was troubled with the ſtone, and his guardian cauſing him to be cut for it, ordered the ſurgeons to diſpatch him in the operation [m]. Upon his death the treacherous Tryphon declared himſelf king of Syria in his ſtead, and accordingly took poſſeſſion of the crown, no one daring to oppoſe him.

The firſt ſtep he took, after he had aſcended the throne, was to try whether he could prevail upon the Romans to acknowledge him king, ſince, without their protection, his affairs, as he was well appriſed, could never proſper. He therefore ſent embaſſadors to Rome, to notify to the republic his acceſſion to the crown of Syria, and to preſent the Roman ſenate with the ſtatue of a victory of maſſy gold, weighing a thouſand of thoſe pieces of gold, which were called aurei. He hoped, that, in regard of ſo valuable a preſent, and the good omen of victory which the ſtatue carried with it, the ſenate would not ſcruple to acknowledge his title; but the Romans cunningly eluding his expectation, received the preſent, and ordered the name of young Antiochus, whom Tryphon had lately murdered, to be engraved on it, as if it had been ſent by him [n]. About this time Sarpedon, one of Demetrius's commanders, attempted to recover Phœnice; but his army was defeated by the forces which Tryphon had in thoſe parts. As the victorious army of the uſurper was returning from the purſuit, and quietly marching along the ſea-ſide between Ptolemais and Tyre, a wave ſwelling all on a ſudden to an incredible height, and breaking with great violence on the ſhore, overwhelmed a great many of them, and then, running back with the ſame rapidity, left the dead bodies on the ſtrand, and a vaſt quantity of fiſh mingled with them; whereupon Sarpedon's men returning with all ſpeed, found, that thoſe who had eſcaped the diſaſter, had retired to the neighbouring cities, eſpecially to Ptolemais, whither Sarpedon advanced, and, under the very walls of the city, offered up the fiſh, which he found mingled with the dead bodies on the ſhore, to Neptune the deliverer, by way of thankſgiving for the diſaſter which had befallen the enemy [o].

Demetrius

[m] Maccab. l. 1. c. 13. ver. 31, 32. Liv. l. lv. Strabo. l. xvi. p. 752. Juſtin. l. xxxvi. c. 1. [n] Diodor. Sicul. legat. 31. [o] Strabo. l. xvi. p. 758. Athen. l. viii. c. 2. ex Poſſidonio Stoico.

DEMETRIUS in the mean time lay idle at Laodicea, abandoning himſelf to all manner of lewdneſs and debauchery, without ſo much as ſeeming to be ſenſible of his misfortunes. However, as Tryphon had given the Jewiſh nation juſt reaſon to renounce his friendſhip, Simon ſent embaſſadors to Demetrius, with a crown of gold, to treat with him about an alliance, and to offer him all the forces of Judæa againſt the uſurper. The embaſſadors were kindly received by the king, who, as he had no other reſource in the melancholy ſituation of his affairs, willingly granted them all they demanded, viz. a confirmation of the high-prieſthood and ſovereignty to Simon, an exemption from all taxes and tributes, and a general amneſty for all paſt acts of hoſtility, upon condition that the Jews joined him againſt Tryphon [P].

NOT long after Demetrius had concluded this alliance with Simon and the Jewiſh nation, he was encouraged to attempt the recovery of his kingdom by other embaſſadors ſent to him out of the eaſt, and inviting him thither. The Parthians having over-run and reduced moſt of the eaſtern provinces, from the Euphrates to the Indus, ſuch of the inhabitants of thoſe countries as were originally Macedonians, not being able to bear that uſurpation, nor the pride and inſolence of their new maſters, earneſtly intreated Demetrius, by repeated embaſſies, to come into thoſe parts, promiſing him a general revolt from the Parthians, and a ſufficient number of troops to expel thoſe uſurpers, and recover all the provinces of the eaſt. Demetrius, ſeduced with theſe promiſes, embarqued in this enterprize, and paſſed the Euphrates, leaving Tryphon in poſſeſſion of the greateſt part of Syria. He imagined, that, after he ſhould have made himſelf maſter of the eaſt, with ſuch an encreaſe of power, he ſhould be in a better condition to ſupreſs that rebel on his return. As ſoon as he appeared in the eaſt, the Elymæans, Perſians, and Bactrians declared in his favour; ſo that, by their aſſiſtance, he defeated the Parthians in ſeveral engagements; but at laſt, being deceived by falſe appearances of a treaty of peace, he inadvertently put himſelf into the power of a Parthian commander, who ſeized on his perſon, and cut his whole army in pieces. The king who reigned in Parthia at this time, was Mithridates the ſon of Priapatius, a valiant and wiſe prince. As ſoon as Demetrius was delivered up to him, he carried the captive prince round the provinces which had revolted, expoſing him everywhere to public view, that the people, by ſeeing the perſon, whom they had looked upon as their deliverer, reduced to ſo low and ſhameful a condition, might be the eaſier brought to ſubmit to their former yoke. After this he treated him as a king, ſent him into Hyrcania to reſide there, with a maintenance ſuitable to his dignity, and even gave him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage; however, he kept him ſtill in captivity, tho' with all the liberty that could be granted him in that condition. Juſtin adds, that Mithridates engaged to carry him back into Syria, at the head of a powerful army, and to drive out the uſurper; but the death of the Parthian king fruſtrated all theſe expectations [q]. Syncellus tells us, upon what authority we know not, that Demetrius was kept in irons by Mithridates and his ſucceſſor Phrahates, and that he was from thence ſirnamed Siderites.

[P] Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii. p. 355. Maccab. l. 1. c. 13. ver. 34—42. & c. 14. ver. 38—41. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 11.

CLEOPATRA wife to Demetrius, upon advice of her huſband's captivity, ſhut herſelf up with her two children in Seleucia on the Orontes, whither many of Tryphon's ſoldiers flocked daily to her; for as he was naturally of a cruel and inhuman temper, he ſoon made the Syrians feel all the weight of a tyrannical government, which they not being able to bear, abandoned him, and went over to Cleopatra; but ſtill her party alone was not ſtrong enough to ſupport her, and therefore, fearing leaſt the people of Seleucia ſhould chuſe rather to give her up to Tryphon, than bear a ſiege out of affection to her perſon, ſhe invited Antiochus Sidetes (O), her huſband's younger brother, to join his intereſt with her's, promiſing, on this condition, to marry him and procure him the crown; for being abandoned by Demetrius, who [q] Maccab. l. i. c. 14. 1, 2, 3. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 9. Juſtin. l. xxxvi. c. 1. & l. xxxviii. c. 9.

(O) He was called Sidetes or Sedetes, from the Syriac word Zidah, which ſignifies to hunt, he being much given to that manly diverſion (103). Syncellus thinks he had this appellation from the city of Sidon, whence he firſt marched againſt Tryphon. Joſephus beſtows upon him the ſirname of Pius (104). Juſtin calls him after his father's name, Soter (105), and Euſebius gives him no other name but that of Sidetes, a name, ſays that writer, which he well deſerved from his paſſion for hunting.

(103) Plut. in Prob. (104) Joſeph. Antiq. l. xii. & xiii. c. 16. (105) Juſtin. in Prolog. l. xxxix.

who had married the Parthian king's daughter, ſhe reſolved to ſeek a new intereſt, by diſpoſing of herſelf in marriage to ſome-body elſe; and not ſeeing how ſhe could do this more to her advantage than by marrying the next heir to the crown, ſhe fixed upon him, and took him in the room of his brother [r]. This Antiochus was the ſecond ſon of Demetrius Soter, and had been ſent to Cnidos with his brother Demetrius, to be kept there as in a place of ſafety, during the war between their father and Alexander Balas. He ſeems to have continued in thoſe parts, even after his brother's acceſſion to the crown; for he is ſaid to have been at Rhodes when Demetrius was taken priſoner; and there in all likelihood the meſſenger ſent by Cleopatra found him: For he, having accepted the offer, and thereupon aſſumed the title of king of Syria, wrote immediately a letter to Simon, dated from the iſles of the ſea, that is, from Rhodes, as is commonly underſtood, ſince he had been there a little before [s]. In this letter he complained of Tryphon's unjuſt uſurpation, and acquainted Simon, that he was preparing to come into Syria, to take vengeance on that treacherous aſſaſſin and uſurper, and recover his father's kingdom; and therefore, to gain him over to his intereſt, he confirmed to him all the privileges and immunities which other kings had granted to the Jewiſh nation, exempted Jeruſalem from the juriſdiction of the kings of Syria, and to many other valuable privileges, added that of coining money, the only regal prerogative which the heads of the Jewiſh nation ſeemed to want [t] (P). The wiſe high-prieſt therefore did not think it adviſable to reject ſuch advantageous offers, whereby he was inveſted in the rights of royalty, and made a free, independent and ſovereign arbiter of the religion, revenues, and [r] Appian. in Syriac. p. 132. Juſtin. ibid. Joſeph. ubi ſupra. c. 12. [s] Maccab. l. i. c. 15. ver. 1. Juſtin. Appian. ibid. [t] Maccab. l. i. c. 4. ver. 2.——9.

(P) Till the reign of Antiochus, the Syrian kings had conſtantly refuſed the Jews the privilege of coining money; but Simon, it ſeems, did not wait for the new king's grant, the kings of Syria not being then in a condition to diſpute with him that prerogative. He had three years before ſtruck medals with his own name, and the year in which the Jews had been reſtored to their full liberty, by the reduction of the fortreſs of Jeruſalem. This event was repreſented on the reverſe by the figure of a palm-tree, the ſymbol of Judæa.

and government of his country; but prepared to assist Sidetes in mounting the throne of his ancestors, and driving out the usurper.

The young prince therefore, depending on the friendship of the Jews, in the beginning of the following year, left Rhodes, and landed in Syria, with an army of mercenaries, whom he had hired in Greece, Asia Minor, and the islands, and having married Cleopatra, joined what forces she had to his own, took the field, and marched against Tryphon. At the sight of a prince of the blood of the Seleucidæ, most of the usurper's forces, weary of his tyranny, abandoned him, and going over to Antiochus, augmented his army to the number of an hundred and twenty thousand foot and eight thousand horse. Tryphon, not being in a condition to keep the field against so great a force, had no resource but in flight; he therefore retired to the city of Dora in the neighbourhood of Ptolemais, where he was close besieged by Antiochus, who employed all his sea and land-forces against the place. During this siege the high-priest Simon signalized his zeal for the new king, sending him two thousand chosen men, with considerable presents in gold, silver, arms and engines of war. But prosperity had changed the heart of Antiochus; he sent back to Simon his presents and troops, and with them Athenobius, one of his friends, to demand the restitution of Gazara, Joppa, and the fortress of Jerusalem, with several other places then held by Simon, which he claimed as belonging to the crown of Syria, or else five hundred talents in lieu of them, and five hundred more for the damages that were done by the Jews within the borders of his dominions. To this message Simon answered, That for Gazara and Joppa he was willing to pay the king an hundred talents; but, as to the other places, they originally belonged to Judæa, and had been unjustly taken from the Jewish nation; wherefore, since he had now re-taken them, he was resolved not to part with them. Athenobius was highly offended at this answer, and on his return to the king's camp, inspired him with the same rage and hatred to the Jews which he himself had conceived. Hereupon Cendebæus, one of the chief commanders of the Syrian troops, was immediately detached with one part of the army against Simon, while the king in person, with the other pursued the siege of Dora. When the city was reduced to the last extremity, Tryphon found means to make his escape from thence to Orthosia, another maritime town of Phœnice, and from Orthosia to Apamea, his native city. Frontinus tells us, that all the way he scattered money on the road, in order to keed the pursuers employed, and by that means retarded the troops of Antiochus, and got safe into Apamea; but the city being taken by assault, as Josephus informs us, Tryphon was killed in the third year of the captivity of Demetrius. Appian tells us, that he was taken after a most gallant resistance, and put to death by Antiochus. Strabo says, that he shut himself up in a strong castle, where he was reduced to such straits, that, out of despair, he laid violent hands on himself; and lastly, Syncellus writes, that the city of Orthosia being set on fire, he leaped into the flames, and there perished. Thus Tryphon ended his days, after he had raised great disturbances in Syria, dethroned one of her kings, put his ward to death, possessed himself of the crown, and most grievously oppressed both his friends and enemies (Q). His death having put an end to the intestine broils, Antiochus ascended his father's throne without any further opposition, and enjoyed it nine years. Having now no rival to contend with, for his brother was still a captive in Parthia, he, in the first place, reduced all the cities of Syria, which, taking advantage of the late troubles, had shaken off the yoke, and made themselves independent. He then turned his arms against Judæa, and was attended in this expedition with far better success than Cendebæus one of his generals had been; for he laid siege to Jerusalem itself, and reduced it to such straits, that John Hyrcanus, who had succeeded his father Simon in the office of high-priest, was obliged to capitulate and deliver up the city. But as to the wars which he had made upon the

from

(Q) There are still some medals to be seen, representing Tryphon with a diadem on his head, and on the reverse a helmet, the symbol of war, which he had declared against his lawful sovereign. On these medals he is honoured with the title of king Tryphon, and Tryphon the powerful king. His former name, which was Diodotus, he changed, as soon as he ascended the throne, for that of Tryphon. Josephus says, that he reigned only three years; but others will have him to have reigned six years complete; that is from the beginning of the second year of Simon's high-priesthood, to the end of the seventh, when the usurper died. According to this computation, he died in the one hundred and seventy-sixth year of the kingdom of the Greeks, or the æra of the Seleucidæ.

the Jews, first by Cendebæus, and afterwards in person, we shall relate them at length in the history of that people. As the Jews were at that time under the protection of the Romans, since the treaties made by them with Simon still subsisted under his son and successor in the high-priesthood, Sidetes fearing the resentment of that powerful republic, on account of the devastations he had committed in Judæa, sent embassadors to Scipio Africanus, who was then in Spain, with magnificent presents, hoping, by this means, to appease the wrath of the senate, and obtain the protection of Rome, without which he did not think himself well settled on the throne. Scipio, who had known Antiochus in Asia, received his embassadors in a very polite and obliging manner, assured them of the esteem and affection he had for their master, and accepted of the valuable jewels which they had brought so far; but immediately distributed them among his soldiers, generously rewarding the valour of those who had distinguished themselves in the siege of Numantia, which he was then carrying on [w].

ANTIOCHUS having, as he thought, gained himself a powerful protector among the Romans, and concluded a peace with the Jews, prepared to march with a powerful army into the east, against Phrahates king of Parthia, under pretence of delivering his brother Demetrius Nicator, who had been detained several years a prisoner in Hyrcania. The captive prince had all the honours paid him that were due to a crowned head. He had married Rhodogune the sister of Phrahates, as we have related above, and seemed to live very happily with that princess, being plentifully supplied by his brother-in-law with all the pleasures and diversions he could wish for; but all this did not make him amends for the loss of a throne. In the midst of all his pomp and shew, he still considered himself as a captive and a dethroned king, and had several times attempted to make his escape, but without success, having been pursued, taken, and, for some time, more closely confined. Under the plausible pretence of delivering him, but, in reality, with a design to recover some provinces lately usurped by the Parthians, Antiochus marched with a numerous army against Phrahates. He is said to have had in that expedition above four score thousand men well armed and disciplined; but the train of luxury, as Justin stiles it, consisting of sutlers, cooks, confectioners, actors, singers, lewd women, &c. whose only business was to promote luxury and effeminacy, was four times as numerous merous as the army; for they are ſaid by Athenæus to have amounted to three hundred thouſand perſons and upwards; however, fortune favoured Antiochus in his firſt enterprizes. Upon the report of his march, the Aſſyrians and Babylonians flocked to him from all parts, acknowledging him for their lawful ſovereign. As they had been accuſtomed to live under the government of the ſucceſſors of Alexander the Great, they could not brook a foreign yoke. Antiochus, depending upon the affection of thoſe who came daily to join him, advanced into Babylonia and Media, and being met by Indates the Parthian general, on the banks of the Lycus, entirely defeated him, as he did afterwards Phrahates himſelf in three ſucceſſive battles; by which means he recövered all the provinces which had formerly belonged to the Syrian empire, except Parthia alone, where Phrahates was reduced within the narrow bounds of the ancient Parthian kingdom. John, the high-prieſt of the Jews, followed Antiochus in this expedition, and is ſaid by Euſebius and Sulpitius Severus to have penetrated as far as Hyrcania, and to have taken the ſirname of Hyrcanus from the victories he gained over that people. Be that, as it will, he certainly had a great ſhare in all the victories gained by Antiochus, and, at the end of the campaign, returned to Jeruſalem, loaded with glory and rich ſpoils [x].

[w] Liv. Epit. l. lvii.

The reſt of the army wintered in the eaſt, and, on account of the prodigious number of the ſoldiers and their attendants, amounting in all to four hundred thouſand perſons, were obliged to ſeparate, and quarter at ſuch a diſtance from each other, that they could not, in caſe of any ſudden attack, join in one body for their mutual defence. The inhabitants, whom they had moſt tyrannically oppreſſed in all the places where they were quartered, taking advantage of their being thus ſeparated, conſpired with the Parthians to rid themſelves of their troubleſome gueſts, and maſſacre them all in one day in their ſeveral quarters, before they could come to the aſſiſtance of one another; and this they executed accordingly. Antiochus, who had kept a body of troops about his perſon, marched to aſſiſt the quarters neareſt him; but was overpowered by numbers, and killed, with all thoſe who attended him. The reſt of the army

[x] Juſtin. l. xxxviii. c. 2 & 10. & l. xlii. c. 1. Liv. l. lix. Athenæus. l. x. c. 12. & l. xii. c. 19. Appian. in Syriac. p. 132. Joſeph. l. xiii. c. 16. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 1. Oros. l. v. c. 10.

army underwent the same fate, and the slaughter was so general, that out of such a prodigious number of persons, scarce one had the good fortune to return into Syria, and carry thither the sad news of this dreadful overthrow [y]. This is the account which Justin, Josephus, Eusebius, and Orosius give of this prince's death. Eusebius adds, that Phrahates killed him with his own hand; but Appian tells us, that Antiochus having lost a battle, killed himself in a fit of despair; and Ælian, that the unfortunate prince, after the loss of a battle, threw himself headlong from the top of a high place, that he might not fall alive into the enemy's hands [z]. Some modern writers are of opinion, that this was the Antiochus, of whom mention is made in the epistle of the Jews at Jerusalem to their countrymen in Egypt, as we read in the beginning of the second book of the Maccabees. Upon the authority of that history, they tell us, that Antiochus having a mind to plunder the temple of Nanea, a goddess worshipped by the Parthians (R), declared, that he would marry her, and entering the temple, demanded the treasures of the goddess to be delivered up to him by way of dowry. This sacrilegious proceeding provoked the priests, who, to revenge the affront offered to their deity, killed Antiochus with stones thrown from the roof of the temple, cut his body in pieces, and threw them out of the temple, which he had profaned. This is what we read of one of the Antiochus's of Syria in the history of the Maccabees [a]. And indeed neither the time, nor the circumstances of his death, allow us to apply what is said there to any other; but whether the authority of that writer ought to be preferred in this particular to that of the profane historians, is what we leave to the decision of our readers. We have already observed, that there is a great disagreement among historians with relation to the death of this prince; which is a strong proof, that herein they were destitute

[y] Justin. l. xxxviii. c. 10. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valesii. p. 374. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 16. Oros. l. v. c. 10. Appian. ibid. Athen. l. x. p. 439. [z] Appian. Justin. Joseph. ibid. Ælian. de animal. l. x. c. 34. [a] Macçab. l. i. c. 1.

(R) Most of the interpreters of the scripture are of opinion, that the goddess, which the Medes and Persians called in their language Nanea, was the same with the Diana of the Greeks and Latins. Of this Luther and Melancthon were so fully convinced, that, in the version of the bible which they published, they put Diana instead of Nanea.

deſtitute of authentic records. Juſtin and Joſephus, who tell us that he was killed in battle, add, that Phrahates would have the pleaſure of ſeeing the dead body of his conquered enemy, which he afterwards cauſed to be put in a ſilver coffin, and ſent into Syria, to be there interred among his anceſtors [b]. Athenæus, upon the credit of Poſidonius of Apamea, an antient hiſtorian, writes, that Phrahates, in beholding the dead body of his enemy, reproached him with his raſhneſs and debaucheries in the following words: Your wine, O Antiochus, and your too great confidence have brought you to this untimely end; you thought you could have ſwallowed the kingdom of Arſaces in your great cups [c]. Among the many captives that fell into the hands of the Parthians, were ſome young princeſſes of the blood of the Seleucidæ. One of theſe being carried to Phrahates, that prince was ſo taken with her charms, that he married her. This princeſs was not the daughter of Antiochus, as a modern writer tells us, but of Demetrius Nicator, and had attended her uncle Antiochus in this expedition, as we read in Juſtin [d]. The death of Antiochus was univerſally lamented all over the Syrian empire, he being a prince endowed with ſome excellent qualities. He was a great lover of juſtice, always ready to forgive, and greatly inclined to mercy. Diodorus Siculus [e] and Joſephus himſelf [f] tell us, it was wholly owing to the generoſity and good nature of Antiochus that the Jewiſh nation was not entirely cut off and utterly deſtroyed; for after he had reduced the city of Jeruſalem to the laſt extremity, he granted the inhabitants a peace upon very reaſonable terms, contrary to the opinion of all his officers, and inclination of the whole army; for they all preſſed him to lay hold of that opportunity, and extirpate the whole nation. They urged againſt them, that they had been driven out of Egypt, as an impious people, hated by the gods and abhorred by all mankind; that they looked upon the reſt of human race as enemies, and therefore would have no communication with them, nor eat, drink, or freely converſe with any, except thoſe of their own ſect; that they did not adore the ſame gods, but had laws, cuſtoms and a religion quite different from that of all other nations; on which conſiderations they well deſerved to be treated with the utmoſt contempt contempt, to be hated and abhorred by all nations, and utterly extirpated as declared enemies to all mankind. But notwithſtanding theſe ill-natured inſinuations, Antiochus being touched with a generous compaſſion for the unhappy city, granted the inhabitants more favourable terms than they could ever have expected; nay, he would not even inſiſt upon rebuilding the fortreſs at Jeruſalem, finding Hyrcanus unwilling to comply with this article, though he might at that time have impoſed upon him and the whole nation what conditions he pleaſed. During the ſiege of Jeruſalem, he gave another remarkable inſtance not only of good-nature, but even of piety. For John Hyrcanus having ſent a herald to him, as the feaſt of the tabernacles approached, begging a truce during the feſtival, he not only complied with his requeſt, but moreover ſent victims and other things neceſſary for the ſacrifices that were to be offered at that ſolemnity [g]. Plutarch relates of this prince, that having one day loſt his way in the purſuit of a wild beaſt, he was obliged to paſs a night without any of his attendants, who had taken another rout, in a ſmall cottage, where he met with a poor, but hearty entertainment. At ſupper he ſhewed himſelf very free and eaſy, and as he was deſirous to know the real ſentiments of his ſubjects with reſpect to his conduct, he dextrouſly touched upon that topic; when the maſter of the houſe, not ſuſpecting who he was, told him, that the king, as was commonly believed, meant well, but his immoderate love for the chace made him lay the weight of affairs on others, and repoſe too great a confidence in his miniſters, whoſe actions did not always anſwer the goodneſs of his intentions. This the prince took in good part, and next morning, when the lords of his court arrived at the cottage, he thanked his landlord in their preſence for his kindneſs, but more eſpecially for having told him the truth, which none of theſe, ſaid he, has honeſty enough to do, though I have taken them into my ſervice for that purpoſe. A prince, ſays Plutarch in this place, muſt not expect to hear a word of truth at court, or to know what his ſubjects think of him, while he is ſurrounded by courtiers, whoſe chief buſineſs it is to deceive, and perſuade their ſovereign that his ſubjects are well pleaſed with his conduct, that he in like manner may be ſatisfied with theirs [h]. But to reſume the thread of our hiſtory.

[b] Juſtin. Joſeph. Appian. ibid. [c] Athen. l. i. c. 12. [d] Juſtin. l. xxxviii. c. 10. [e] Diodor. Sicul. l. xxxiv. apud Phot. cod. 244. p. 1150. [f] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 16.

PHRAHATES

[g] Diodor. Sicul. & Joſeph. ibid.

[h] Plut. in Apophthegm

PHRAHATES upon his being defeated in three ſucceſſive battles by Antiochus, had at laſt ſet his brother Demetrius at liberty, and ſent him with a body of troops into Syria with a deſign to raiſe diſturbances there, and by that means oblige Antiochus to abandon Parthia, and haſten home to the defence of his own kingdom. But upon the news of the maſſacre, he detached a party of horſe after him with orders to bring him back. Demetrius had been apprehenſive of ſome order of this nature, and therefore had marched with ſuch expedition, that he was got over the Euphrates into Syria, before the party ſent after him could reach the frontiers of that country. In this manner he recovered his kingdom, and made great rejoicings on that occaſion, while all Syria was in tears for the loſs of the army in the eaſt, there being ſcarce a family in the whole country, which had not a ſhare in that common calamity [i]. The Parthian king, being fluſhed with the late ſucceſs and victory over Antiochus, reſolved to carry the war into Syria, and revenge the invaſion the Syrians had made in his dominions. But while he was making the neceſſary preparations for this expedition, the Scythians, whom he had diſobliged, forced him to keep at home, and employ the forces he had raiſed againſt Syria, in the defence of his own dominions, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of the Parthians. Upon the death of Antiochus, Hyrcanus revolted from the Macedonians, and made himſelf abſolute and wholly independent, neither he, nor any of his deſcendants, paying thenceforth to the kings of Syria any tribute or homage.

IN the mean time, a civil war breaking out in Egypt between Ptolemy Phyſcon and Cleopatra his divorced queen, the latter being greatly diſtreſſed by the loſs of a battle, ſent embaſſadors to Demetrius, who had married her eldeſt daughter by Ptolemy Philometor, to implore his aſſiſtance, and promiſe him the crown of Egypt for his reward. Demetrius without heſitation accepted the propoſal, marched into Egypt with all his forces, and there laid ſiege to Peluſium. As Demetrius had made himſelf very odious to all his ſubjects, by his tyrannical government and vicious manners, the inhabitants of Antioch, Apamea, and other cities, taking advantage of his abſence, raiſed a rebellion againſt him. This forced Demetrius to abandon the ſiege, and return by long marches contempt, to be hated and abhorred by all nations, and utterly extirpated as declared enemies to all mankind. But notwithſtanding theſe ill-natured inſinuations, Antiochus being touched with a generous compaſſion for the unhappy city, granted the inhabitants more favourable terms than they could ever have expected; nay, he would not even inſiſt upon rebuilding the fortreſs at Jeruſalem, finding Hyrcanus unwilling to comply with this article, though he might at that time have impoſed upon him and the whole nation what conditions he pleaſed. During the ſiege of Jeruſalem, he gave another remarkable inſtance not only of good-nature, but even of piety. For John Hyrcanus having ſent a herald to him, as the feaſt of the tabernacles approached, begging a truce during the feſtival, he not only complied with his requeſt, but moreover ſent victims and other things neceſſary for the ſacrifices that were to be offered at that ſolemnity [g]. Plutarch relates of this prince, that having one day loſt his way in the purſuit of a wild beaſt, he was obliged to paſs a night without any of his attendants, who had taken another rout, in a ſmall cottage, where he met with a poor, but hearty entertainment. At ſupper he ſhewed himſelf very free and eaſy, and as he was deſirous to know the real ſentiments of his ſubjects with reſpect to his conduct, he dextrouſly touched upon that topic; when the maſter of the houſe, not ſuſpecting who he was, told him, that the king, as was commonly believed, meant well, but his immoderate love for the chace made him lay the weight of affairs on others, and repoſe too great a confidence in his miniſters, whoſe actions did not always anſwer the goodneſs of his intentions. This the prince took in good part, and next morning, when the lords of his court arrived at the cottage, he thanked his landlord in their preſence for his kindneſs, but more eſpecially for having told him the truth, which none of theſe, ſaid he, has honeſty enough to do, though I have taken them into my ſervice for that purpoſe. A prince, ſays Plutarch in this place, muſt not expect to hear a word of truth at court, or to know what his ſubjects think of him, while he is ſurrounded by courtiers, whoſe chief buſineſs it is to deceive, and perſuade their ſovereign that his ſubjects are well pleaſed with his conduct, that he in like manner may be ſatisfied with theirs [h]. But to reſume the thread of our hiſtory.

[i] Juſtin. l. xxxix. c. 1.

PHRAHATES

[g] Diodor. Sicul. & Joſeph. ibid. [h] Plut. in Apophthegm. p. 184.

PHRAHATES upon his being defeated in three ſucceſſive battles by Antiochus, had at laſt ſet his brother Demetrius at liberty, and ſent him with a body of troops into Syria with a deſign to raiſe diſturbances there, and by that means oblige Antiochus to abandon Parthia, and haſten home to the defence of his own kingdom. But upon the news of the maſſacre, he detached a party of horſe after him with orders to bring him back. Demetrius had been apprehenſive of ſome order of this nature, and therefore had marched with ſuch expedition, that he was got over the Euphrates into Syria, before the party ſent after him could reach the frontiers of that country. In this manner he recovered his kingdom, and made great rejoicings on that occaſion, while all Syria was in tears for the loſs of the army in the eaſt, there being ſcarce a family in the whole country, which had not a ſhare in that common calamity [i]. The Parthian king, being fluſhed with the late ſucceſs and victory over Antiochus, reſolved to carry the war into Syria, and revenge the invaſion the Syrians had made in his dominions. But while he was making the neceſſary preparations for this expedition, the Scythians, whom he had diſobliged, forced him to keep at home, and employ the forces he had raiſed againſt Syria, in the defence of his own dominions, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of the Parthians. Upon the death of Antiochus, Hyrcanus revolted from the Macedonians, and made himſelf abſolute and wholly independent, neither he, nor any of his deſcendants, paying thenceforth to the kings of Syria any tribute or homage.

IN the mean time, a civil war breaking out in Egypt between Ptolemy Phyſcon and Cleopatra his divorced queen, the latter being greatly diſtreſſed by the loſs of a battle, ſent embaſſadors to Demetrius, who had married her eldeſt daughter by Ptolemy Philometor, to implore his aſſiſtance, and promiſe him the crown of Egypt for his reward. Demetrius without heſitation accepted the propoſal, marched into Egypt with all his forces, and there laid ſiege to Peluſium. As Demetrius had made himſelf very odious to all his ſubjects, by his tyrannical government and vicious manners, the inhabitants of Antioch, Apamea, and other cities, taking advantage of his abſence, raiſed a rebellion againſt him. This forced Demetrius to abandon the ſiege, and return by long marches marches to his own dominions; so that Cleopatra, being destitute of all assistance, was forced to leave Egypt. Upon her flight Physcon, having without much trouble settled his affairs at home, resolved to revenge the late invasion of Demetrius, his declared enemy. The Syrians were quite tired out with the tyranny of a prince, whom a nine years captivity had rendered still more wild and insupportable. Physcon therefore, taking advantage of this general aversion, set up an impostor against him, called Alexander Zebina. He was the son of a pawn-broker of Alexandria; but pretending to be the son of Alexander Balas, under that title laid claim to the crown of Syria, Physcon furnishing him with an army to take possession of it (S). On his arrival in Syria multitudes flocked to him, without examining the justice of his pretensions, or caring whom they had for king, provided they got rid of Demetrius, whose tyranny they could no longer bear [k]. That prince, though deserted by most of his subjects, still supported himself with a small army. At length the [k] Justin. ibid.

[i] Juſtin. l. xxxix. c. 1.

(S) Josephus tells us (106), that the Syrians, not being any longer able to bear the tyrannical oppressions of Demetrius, desired Ptolemy Physcon to give them another king of the race of the Seleucidæ; and that Physcon laying hold of this opportunity to be revenged on Demetrius, sent Zebina into Syria at the head of a formidable army. This Zebina was, according to Justin, the son of one Portarchus, a pawn-broker of Alexandria; but to conceal the meanness of his extraction, he gave out that Antiochus Sidetes had adopted him, and that in virtue of this adoption he had an unquestionable right to the crown. This fable was with great care and industry spread by Ptolemy, and credited by the populace, who only wanted a pretence to authorize their revolt. While all things seemed to favour the new king, the body of Antiochus inclosed in a silver coffin was brought to Antioch by order of Phrahates; and the grief Zebina expressed, with the artful tears he shed at the sight of the dead body, confirmed the people in their belief of his pretended adoption. This is the account which Justin gives us of this impostor. But Porphyrius says, that he was sent into Syria by Physcon as the son of Alexander Balas, and that he was from him called Alexander, though the Syrians gave him the firname of Zebina, because he was generally believed to be one of Ptolemy's slaves, that word in the Syriac tongue signifying bought or redeemed (107).

(106) Joseph. l. xiii. c. 17. (107) In Græc. Euseb. Scalig. p. 227.

the two rivals came to a battle in the neighbourhood of Damaſcus in Cœle-Syria, in which Demetrius was entirely defeated, and moſt of his army cut in pieces. The fugitive king made the beſt of his way with a ſmall number of faithful ſervants to Ptolemais, where his wife Cleopatra then was. But ſhe ſtill retaining her former reſentment againſt him for his marrying Rhodaguna, ordered the gates to be ſhut againſt him. Whereupon the unhappy prince having now no reſource in his misfortunes, but the city of Tyre, where was a temple which his brother Antiochus had made a place of refuge, he embarqued at Ptolemais, and ſailed thither, thinking that under the protection of a place ſanctified by religion, he might ſafely wait for a turn of fortune. But he was ſcarce landed, when the traitor, to whom he had committed the government of that city, cauſed him to be put to death, in the beginning of the fourth year of his reign after his return from Parthia [1] (T). Upon his death Cleopatra retained a ſmall part of the kingdom, and Zebina reigned over all the reſt; and for the better ſecuring himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the crown, he entered into a ſtrict alliance with John Hyrcanus prince of the Jews, who, as an able ſtateſman, taking

[1] Juſtin. ibid.

(T) There is a great diſagreement among authors as to the manner of his death. Porphyrius ſays, that he was killed at Tyre, while he was going on board a ſhip with a deſign to ſeek for ſhelter ſomewhere elſe; Joſephus, that he was taken priſoner by his rival, and that the hardſhips he ſuffered in his captivity put an end to his life; Livy and Appian, that he was killed by the expreſs command of his wife Cleopatra. That he was killed at Tyre is certain, and that the Tyrians were acceſſary to his death, is very probable; for from this very year they began a new epoch, as appears from Euſebius (108; whence ſome have concluded, that for killing Demetrius they obtained either of Cleopatra or Zebina their freedom and liberty to live according to their own laws. In the ſeveral antient inſcriptions mentioned by Grotius (109), The city of Tyre is honoured with the epithets of religious, ſacred, and independent. Since therefore the epoch of their liberty and independency began in the very year that Demetrius Nicator was killed in or near their city, ſome writers have, not without good grounds, conjectured, that their liberty was owing to the hand they had in the death of Demetrius (110).

(108) Euſeb. in Chron. (109) Grotius, p. 1105.
(110) Vide Uſher ad Ann. Mundi 3878.

advantage of theſe diviſions, greatly increaſed the power of the nation, which he governed [m] (U).

SELEUCUS, the eldeſt ſon of Demetrius Nicator, by Cleopatra, being now in the twentieth year of his age, took upon him the title of king, and, by the aſſiſtance of ſome of his friends, cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged in the provinces, which lay next to that part of Syria, that was held by his mother. This raiſed no ſmall jealouſy in the breaſt of that ambitious woman, who was for reigning alone; and

[m] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 17.

(U) We cannot help obſerving in this place, that in the troubles of Syria the Jewiſh high-prieſts, though men of unqueſtionable piety, and ſtrict juſtice, never failed to ſide with ſuch princes as offered the moſt advantageous terms for them and their nation, without ever examining whether thoſe who offered them, had any title to the crown or no. It was not hereditary right they minded, but the good of their country; the latter had great weight in their councils, the former none at all; in their opinion, if we may be allowed to judge of their ſentiments from their conduct, that prince alone had right to govern, who governed well. For in what other manner can we account for the conduct of Jonathan, Simon, and John Hyrcanus? Jonathan ſupported to the utmoſt of his power Alexander Balas, a notorious impoſtor and uſurper, againſt Demetrius Soter, who was undoubtedly veſted with all the right which birth can give to a crown. But Balas was like to govern better, and therefore in the opinion of the virtuous high-prieſt had a better title to govern. If Jonathan believed the claim of Demetrius better grounded, he was guilty of the greateſt injuſtice and diſhoneſty in aſſiſting his rival to drive him from the throne, and in putting many thouſands to the ſword for no other reaſon, but becauſe they refuſed to abandon that prince, and join his competitor. On the other hand, if Balas had, in the opinion of Jonathan, a more juſt title to the crown, as he muſt have had in whatever it was grounded, we muſt own there is ſome right which takes place of hereditary right. Nay, the whole conduct of Jonathan, of his brother Simon, and of John Hyrcanus, ſon to the latter, plainly ſhews, that theſe three great luminaries of the Jewiſh church and nation acknowledged no ſuch right; but were altogether ſtrangers to a certain doctrine, which generally obtains, abroad, and has not been without its patrons even among us. For Jonathan not only eſpouſed with great warmth the cauſe of Balas againſt Demetrius Soter, but with the ſame zeal ſupported Antiochus Theus, the ſon of Balas, in oppoſition to Demetrius Nicator, the ſon of Demetrius Soter. Simon, who ſucceeded his brother in the office of high-prieſt, was no leſs ſanguine and beſides feared leſt Seleucus ſhould in time revenge his father's death, which was generally aſcribed to her. To free herſelf therefore from this double uneaſineſs, having invited her ſon to a conference, ſhe killed him with her own hand by plunging a dart into his breaſt, after he had reigned, or rather bore the title of king, one year [n].

NOTWITHSTANDING this barbarous and horrid murder, which raiſed an univerſal indignation all over Syria, three of Zebina's captains, viz. Antipater, Clonius, and Æropus, revolted from him to Cleopatra; and having ſeized on Laodicea, reſolved to annoy from thence, and by degrees reduce, the neighbouring country. But Zebina, who was of a mild temper, and unwilling to uſe ſeverity or violence, till all other means had proved unſucceſsful, invited them to return to their duty, promiſing not only to pardon them, but to reſtore them to their former rank. Upon his parole they put themſelves into his hands, and he not only generouſly forgave them, but even repoſed the ſame confidence in them he had done before, without once reproaching them with their deſertion. All authors agree, that this prince was endowed with many excellent and truly princely qualities. He received all who approached him, in a moſt affable and engaging manner, was ſlow to puniſh, and always ready to pardon, even his moſt inveterate enemies. In ſhort, the good-nature he ſhewed on all occaſions, and the great deſire he had to pleaſe all, gained him the affections of the Syrians to ſuch a decree, that even thoſe who abhorred the impoſture, by which he had got poſſeſſion of the crown, could not help wiſhing he might long enjoy it [o].

IN the mean time Cleopatra, thinking it neceſſary for her intereſt to have one, at leaſt, with the name of king to give countenance

[n] Liv. Epiſt. l. lx. Oroſius, l. v. c. 2. Appian. in Syriac. p. 132. Juſtin. ibid. Porphyr. ibid. p. 227. [o] Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii. p. 377.

guine in the cauſe of Demetrius Nicator againſt Antiochus Theus, than his brother had been in that of Antiochus Theus againſt Demetrius Nicator. Laſtly, John Hyrcanus, when raiſed, upon his father's death, to the high-prieſthood, did not ſcruple to enter into an offenſive and defenſive league with Alexander Zebina, another uſurper and impoſtor, againſt Antiochus Grypus the ſon of Demetrius Nicator, and conſequently by birth the lawful heir to the crown. Is it not manifeſt from hence beyond diſpute, that the heads of the Jewiſh nation either acted with the utmoſt injuſtice, or were quite unacquainted with what we call hereditary right?

countenance to the authority, by which ſhe governed, recalled her other ſon, by name Antiochus, from Athens, whither ſhe had ſent him for the benefit of his education. He no ſooner arrived, than ſhe declared him king of Syria, but allowed him no more than the bare title; all the authority ſhe kept to herſelf, the prince, as he was then quite unexperienced, and under twenty years of age, ſuffering her for ſome time to rule without controul. To diſtinguiſh this from other Syrian princes of the ſame name, he is generally called Grypus, a ſirname taken from his aquiline noſe. Joſephus and Porphyrius ſtile him Philometor, but on his medals he bears the name of Epiphanes [p].

As Zebina had been put in poſſeſſion of the greater part of Syria by troops ſent him out of Egypt, Phyſcon inſiſted upon the doing him homage for his new dominions, and paying an annual tribute to the crown of Egypt, as an acknowledgment of his dependence; which Zebina refuſing to comply with, Phyſcon, coming to an agreement with Cleopatra his niece, gave his daughter Tryphœna in marriage to her ſon Grypus, and ſent a conſiderable army into Syria to drive from the throne the perſon he had a few years before placed on it. One battle determined the diſpute: Zebina's army was defeated, and he forced to ſave himſelf by flight in Antioch. There, as he was in great want of money, he allowed his ſoldiers to ſeize on the rich furniture of the temple of Jupiter, having no other means to pay them their arrears; the ſtatue of victory, which was of maſſy gold, he took for himſelf, ſaying that Jupiter had promiſed him victory. Hereupon the citizens, taking up arms in defence of their temples, fell upon him unexpectedly, aud drove him with great ſlaughter of his men out of the city. In the mean time the united forces of Grypus and Phyſcon coming up, his army diſperſed, not being in a condition to venture a ſecond engagement. Zebina himſelf embarqued on a ſmall veſſel, which he found ready to ſet ſail for Greece; but being taken in his paſſage by a pirate, he was delivered up to Grypus, and by him put to death in the fourth year of his reign [q]. Joſephus ſays, that he was killed in a battle [r]; and Porphyrius, that upon the loſs of his army he put an end end to his life by poiſon, in the fourth year of the hundred and ſixty-fourth olympiad [s].

[p] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 20. in Græc. Euſeb. Scalig. p. 277.
[q] Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii, p. 378. Juſtin. l. xxxix. c. 2.
[r] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 17.

GRYPUS, being thus delivered from a troubleſome rival, began to take on him the authority, as well as the name, of king. Cleopatra could not brook this diminution of her power and grandeur; and therefore reſolved to cut off Antiochus, as ſhe had before done Seleucus, and call to the crown another ſon ſhe had by Antiochus Sidetes; under whom, he being an infant, ſhe hoped to rule without controul, for many years, and thereby fix herſelf ſo on the throne, that her ſon ſhould be entirely dependent on her. With this view the wicked woman, having prepared a poiſonous potion, offered it to Grypus one day as he returned hot and weary from ſome exerciſe. But that prince, having been forewarned of her deſign, pretending reſpect to his mother, deſired her to drink firſt; which ſhe refuſing to do, he called in ſome of the chief lords of his court, and in their preſence told her, that ſhe had been charged with a deſign of poiſoning him, and that the only means ſhe had to clear herſelf from all ſuſpicion of ſo black a crime, was to drink herſelf what ſhe had offered to him. The unhappy woman, having no other evaſion or reſource, was forced to yield. The poiſon had its full operation on her, and in a few minutes put an end to the life of a moſt wicked and ambitious woman, who had been, by her unheard-of crimes, for many years the ſcourge of Syria. She had been the wife of three kings of Syria, viz. of Demetrius Nicator, Alexander Balas, and Antiochus Sidetes, and the mother of four, viz. of Antiochus by Alexander Balas, of Seleucus and Antiochus Grypus by Demetrius Nicator, and of Antiochus, ſirnamed the Cyzicenian, by Antiochus Sidetes. She had been acceſſary to the death of two of her huſbands; and as to her children, ſhe had murdered one with her own hand, and would have in like manner diſpatched another, had he not made her wicked deſign fall npon her own head [t].

UPON her death Antiochus Grypus enjoyed the kingdom of Syria eight years without the leaſt diſturbance; at the end of which a new competitor appeared, and contended with him for the ſovereignty of Syria. This was Antiochus Cyzicenus his half brother. For he was the ſon of Cleopatra by Antiochus Sidetes, and born while Demetrius her former huſband was priſoner among the Parthians. When Demetrius trius returned, and recovered his dominions, after the death of Sidetes, Cleopatra, fearing left her ſon Antiochus ſhould fall a ſacrifice to his jealouſy, ſent him to Cyzicus, a city lying on the Propontis in Myſia Minor, where he was brought up under the care and tuition of Craterus, a faithful eunuch, and from thence called Cyzicenus, or the Cyzicenian. Grypus, to whom he gave umbrage, ordered him to be poiſoned; but Antiochus, being informed of his deſign, took up arms in his own defence, and at the ſame time laid claim to the crown of Syria [u]. Hereupon Grypus, who was then preparing to invade Judæa, dropped that enterprize, and raiſed what troops he could to ſuppreſs in the firſt place his new rival. Cleopatra the daughter of Phyſcon, the late king of Egypt, had married her brother Lathurus; but that prince, though paſſionately fond of her, being obliged by his mother to divorce her and marry his younger ſiſter Selene; the divorced queen, being at her own diſpoſal, married Cyzicenus, and having raiſed an army in the iſland of Cyprus, or, as ſome will have it, gained over the army, which Grypus had there, brought it inſtead of a dowry to her new huſband. By this means the forces of the two competitors being very near equal, they came to a battle, in which Cyzicenus, having the misfortune to be routed, was forced to quit the field, and ſhut himſelf up in Antioch, which had declared for him. The Antiochians ſeemed diſpoſed to ſtand by him to the laſt, and therefore leaving his wife there, as in a place of ſafety, he privately eſcaped from thence with a deſign to raiſe new forces in other parts, and return with them againſt Grypus. But before he could levy the neceſſary troops, Grypus made himſelf maſter of Antioch, where he found Cleopatra wife to Cyzicenus. Tryphœna, her ſiſter and wife to Grypus, no ſooner heard that ſhe was taken, but ſhe earneſtly preſſed her huſband to deliver the captive up to her, that ſhe might have the ſatisfaction of putting her to death; to ſuch a degree was ſhe enraged againſt her, though her own ſiſter both by father and mother, for having married her huſband's enemy, and furniſhed him with an army to invade Syria. As Cleopatra had taken ſanctuary in one of the temples of Antioch, Grypus could not by any means be prevailed upon to comply with his wife's requeſt; nay, he did all that lay in his power to inſpire her with more religious and humane ſentiments. He urged urged againſt her revengeful temper the ſanctity of the aſylum, where her ſiſter had taken refuge; and told her, that the death of her ſiſter would be of no advantage to them, or prejudice to Cyzïcenus; that in all the wars, whether domeſtic or foreign, which he or his anceſtors had ever been engaged in, no ſort of cruelty had been practiſed after victory upon women, eſpecially on ſo near relations; that Cleopatra was her ſiſter, and likewiſe nearly related to himſelf; and therefore he deſired her to ſpeak no more to him on that ſubject, ſince he could by no means conſent to her being uſed with any ſeverity, or even touched, while ſhe was in a place of refuge. But Tryphœna, inſtead of yielding to his reaſons, became more enraged, imagining that he was not prompted to take the part of that unhappy princeſs by motives of compaſſion, but of love; and therefore adding jealouſy to revenge, one day in a violent fit of this double paſſion, ſhe ſent a party of ſoldiers into the temple with orders to kill the unhappy Cleopatra in the ſacred place. At the ſight of the aſſaſſins ſhe fled to the altar, and there the ſoldiers, not being able to tear her from the ſtatue of the god, which ſhe embraced, cut off her arms, and then with a thouſand wounds put an end to her life, while ſhe was imploring the god, whoſe temple they profaned, and uttering with her laſt breath curſes upon the authors of ſo barbarous a murder [w]. And truly her death did not remain long unrevenged; for Cyzicenus, having drawn together another army, came to a ſecond battle with his brother, put his army to the rout, and in the purſuit took the cruel Tryphœna, whom he immediately ſacrificed to the manes of his murdered wife, by a death which her cruelty well deſerved. By this overthrow Grypus being driven out of Syria retired to Aſpendus, a city of Pamphylia, whence he had the ſirname of Aſpendius [x]. But the next year he returned with a great army, recovered Syria, and to put an end to the inteſtine broils, which weakened both parties, conſented to a diviſion of the empire, in virtue of which Cyzicenus reigned at Damaſcus over Cœle-Syria and Phœnice, and Grypus at Antioch over all the other provinces [y]. In this peaceful interval both brothers abandoned themſelves to a moſt idle, indolent, and debauched manner of life, wallowing in all ſorts of pleaſures, and ſpending the greateſt part of their time with lewd women. Cyzicenus's chief delight was to converſe with ſtage-players, rope-dancers,

[s] In Græc. Euſeb. Scalig. p. 227.

[t] Juſtin. ibid. Appian. in Syriac. p. 132.

[u] Juſt. l. xxxviii. c. 1. Appian. in Syriac. p. 132. Porphyr. ibid. p. 227. Joſeph. l. xiii. c. 17.

[w] Juſt. l. xxxix. c. 3. Euſeb. Scalig. p. 62.

[x] Juſtin. ibid. Porphyr. in Græc.

[y] Porphyr. ibid.

cers, pantomimes, and above all with jugglers, applying himself with great care and assiduity to the practice of their tricks, and entirely neglecting the government of his kingdom and welfare of his subjects [z].

While the two brothers were thus exhausting their strength in war, or abandoning themselves to the sloth and luxury of peace, John Hyrcanus, prince of the Jews, encreased his power and wealth to such a degree, that he became one of the most powerful princes of his age, being master of all Judæa, Galilee, and Samaria, and besides of many frontier places in the neighbouring countries. Cyzicenus indeed, at the request of the inhabitants of Samaria, which city Hyrcanus had besieged, attempted to put a stop to his conquests, but was entirely defeated by Aristobulus and Antigonus, the two sons of Hyrcanus. Samaria after this overthrow, and the delivering up of Scythopolis, which Epicrates the Syrian general basely betrayed to Hyrcanus for a sum of money, being destitute of all hopes of relief, was obliged to surrender after having sustained a year's siege [a]. Thus was the Syrian empire curtailed by degrees, and soon brought within very narrow bounds by the intestine troubles and divisions which reigned among the Seleucidæ, and occasioned at last the loss of the empire, as we shall see anon.

The peace between the two brothers, Antiochus Grypus and Antiochus Cyzicenus, was not of long continuance; neither of them being satisfied with their share of the empire, they began a new war; of which several cities taking advantage, shook off the Syrian yoke, and made themselves free and independent; these were Tyre, Sidon, Ptolemais, and Gaza; in others tyrants started up, usurping a sovereign power, while the two kings were wasting their strength against each other; thus Theodorus caused himself to be acknowledged the sovereign lord of Gadara and Amathus; Zoilus possessed himself of Dora and Straton's tower; and others of other places [b].

During these distractions Grypus was assassinated by Heracleon one of his own subjects in the forty-fifth year of his age, and having reigned, according to Josephus, twenty-twenty-nine, according to Porphyrius twenty-six, years [c]. He left behind him five ſons, viz. Seleucus, Antiochus and Philip, twins, Demetrius Euchæres, and Antiochus Dionyſius. Seleucus the eldeſt ſucceeded his father, and the reſt all reigned, or attempted to reign in their turns. On the death of Grypus, Antiochus Cyzicenus ſeized Antioch, and uſed his utmoſt efforts to make himſelf maſter of the whole empire. But Seleucus, having drawn together a conſiderable army, marched againſt his uncle, and gained a complete victory over him. Joſephus tells us, that Cyzicenus was taken in the purſuit, and put to death by Seleucus [d]; Trogus writes, that he was killed in the engagement [e], and Porphyrius, that he killed himſelf to avoid falling into the enemy's hands [f], after he had reigned eighteen years. Upon his death Seleucus made himſelf maſter of Antioch and the whole Syrian empire; but did not hold it long. Antiochus, ſirnamed Euſebes from his piety, the ſon of Cyzicenus, having made his eſcape out of Antioch by the aſſiſtance of a courtezan, when that city was taken by Seleucus, fled to Aradus, where he cauſed himſelf to be crowned king of Syria. From thence he marched at the head of a great army, made up of the ſoldiers who had ſerved under his father, engaged Seleucus, and, having cut great part of his troops in pieces, obliged that prince to ſhut himſelf up in Mopſueſtia, a city of Cilicia, and abandon all the reſt to the mercy of the conqueror [g]. The Mopſueſtians at firſt eſpouſed the cauſe of the fugitive prince with great zeal; but ſoon after being provoked by the exorbitant taxes, with which he loaded them, they turned their affection into hatred, roſe up in arms, and inveſting the palace, in which he reſided, ſet fire to it, the king and all his attendants periſhing in the flames [h]. Porphyrius ſays, he ſaved himſelf from the violence of the flames by voluntary death [i], after a ſhort reign of ſeven months. Antiochus and Philip, the twin ſons of Grypus, to revenge the death of their brother Seleucus, led all the troops they could raiſe againſt Mopſueſtia; and having taken the city by aſſault, raiſed it to the ground, after having put all the inhabitants to the ſword. But on their return return being charged by Euſebes on the banks of the Orontes, and their forces defeated, Antiochus was drowned in attempting to ſwim over that river on horſeback. But Philip having made a judicious retreat, and kept his forces together, was thereby enabled to diſpute the empire with Euſebes. As both maintained on foot great armies, the country was haraſſed in a miſerable manner, and the inhabitants reduced almoſt to beggary [k].

[z] Diodor. Sicul. in. excerpt. Valesii. l. xxxv. p. 385. [a] Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 17. [b] Joseph. l. xiii. c. 20. Just. in. l. xxxix. Appian. in Syriac.

[c] Joſeph. l. xiii. c. 21. Porphyr. ibid. [d] Joſeph. l. xiii. c. 21. [e] Trogus, l. xl. in Prolog. [f] Porphyr. in Græc. Euſeb. Scalig. p. 227. [g] Joſeph. Trog. ibid. & Appian. p. 133. [h] Joſeph. Trog. & Euſeb. ibid. [i] Porphyr. ibid.

Euſebes, to eſtabliſh himſelf the better on the throne, had married Selene the widow of Grypus, that politic princeſs having, on the death of her huſband, taken poſſeſſion of ſome provinces of the Syrian empire, and provided herſelf with good troops. Euſebes therefore to join her intereſt with his own, married her; which giving offence to Lathurus king of Egypt, whoſe wife ſhe had been, till his mother, obliging him to divorce her, gave her in marriage to Grypus; that prince ſent to Cnidus for Demetrius Euchæres, the fourth ſon of Grypus, who had been brought up in that city, and made him king of Damaſcus. As Euſebes and Philip were engaged in war againſt each other, neither of them was at liberty to oppoſe the new king. For though Euſebes had well retrieved his affairs, and conſiderably encreaſed his power by his marriage, yet Philip made his party good againſt him, and at length having drawn him to a battle, gained a complete victory over him, and obliged him to quit Syria, and take refuge among the Parthians. By this means the whole Syrian empire was divided between Philip and Demetrius [l]. Theſe two brothers might have long continued in peaceable poſſeſſion of the kingdom, none of the neighbouring princes daring to attack them ſo long as they were united. But the ambition of Demetrius ſoon put an end to that good intelligence; he fell on that part of Syriã which Philip poſſeſſed, and having driven him out of Antioch, and taken that city, purſued him as far as Beræa, now Aleppo, which he cloſely beſieged, in hopes of getting his brother into his power. But Straton, who was lord of the place, and greatly attached to the intereſt of Philip, called to his aſſiſtance Zizus, an Arabian king, and Mithridates, a Parthian commander; who falling upon Demetrius with their united forces, put his army to flight, and having taken ken him priſoner, ſent him as a preſent to the king of Parthia, where he fell into a lingering diſtemper, of which he died. After this victory Philip ſent home without ranſom all the Antiochians, who had been taken either in the battle, or in the purſuit; which was ſo pleaſing to the inhabitants of that great metropolis, that they welcomed the conqueror on his return with loud acclamations, and conducted him in triumph into the city [m].

[k] Porphyr. & Joſeph. ibid. [l] Joſeph. l. xiii. c. 21. Porphyr. ibid.

PHILIP had ſcarce got rid of Euchæres, when Euſebes appeared a new in Syria, ſupported in all likelihood by the Parthian king, in whoſe dominions he had taken refuge, as we have related above: for he over-ran with great rapidity the Syrian provinces bordering on Parthia, which he could not have done without the aid of ſome powerful prince, and in thoſe quarters none but the king of Parthia could lend him any aſſiſtance. Philip haſtened to ſuppreſs him; but while he was engaged in the north of Syria againſt one rival, another unexpectedly ſtarted up in the ſouth. This was Antiochus Dionyſius his brother, the youngeſt of the five ſons of Grypus, who taking advantage of Philip's abſence, ſeized on Cœle-Syria, and choſe Damaſcus for the capital of his new kingdom [n]. He was ſcarce ſeated on the throne, when he engaged very imprudently in a war with Aretas king of Arabia Petræa, leaving his dominions at the mercy of his brother Philip, who in his abſence made himſelf maſter of Damaſcus by the treachery of Mileſius, who commanded in the caſtle. But that prince not rewarding the traitor as he expected, the firſt time Philip went abroad, Mileſius on his return ſhut the gates againſt him, and kept the place for Dionyſius, and delivered it up to him on his return out of Arabia. Hereupon Philip retired, and on his retreat Antiochus returned into Arabia to renew the war there. In this ſecond expedition he took his rout through Judæa, which giving umbrage to Alexander Jannæus, prince of the Jews, he endeavoured to ſtop his march by drawing lines between Joppa and Antipatris, that being the only way he could march his army. Theſe lines were twenty miles in length, and fortified with a wall and wooden towers at proper diſtances. But all this was to no effect; effect; for Antiochus, having set fire to the towers, and obliged the Jews to retire, broke through the lines, and pursued his march without farther molestation into Arabia, where he was surprized in a disadvantageous post by Aretas, and cut off with the greatest part of his army. Those who escaped the slaughter had no better fate; for having retired after the battle to the village of Cana, they all perished there for want of provisions. Upon the death of Antiochus, Ptolemy the son of Mennæus, prince of Chalcis, a city in that neighbourhood, attempted to make himself master of Damascus. But the inhabitants bearing an utter aversion to him, chose rather to call in Aretas, by whom their king and their army had been lately cut off, than to subject themselves to Ptolemy. Accordingly having no other resource, for they hated Philip more than Ptolemy himself, they sent for Aretas, and made him their king. This prince was no sooner settled in the sovereignty, but he undertook an expedition against the Jews, and defeated Alexander Jannæus in a pitched battle near Addida. But soon after this victory a peace concluded between the contending parties, put a stop to all further hostilities [o].

[m] Joſeph. ibid. & de bello Judaic. l. i. c. 3. [n] Juſtin. l. xl. c. 1. Appian. in Syriac. & Mithridatic. Joſeph Antiquit. ibid.

The Syrians being quite exhausted, and tired out with the continual wars carried on in their country by the ambitious and turbulent princes of the race of Seleucus, and seeing no end of the devastations, slaughters, and other calamities which attended their intestine divisions, resolved at last to exclude them all, and submit to a foreign prince, who might deliver them from the miseries of a civil war, and restore tranquillity to their country. They first cast their eyes on Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus; but it was feared his quarrels with Rome might bring a new war upon Syria. Some proposed Ptolemy king of Egypt; but this proposal was rejected, by reason the Egyptians had always been declared enemies to the Syrians. They therefore pitched on Tigranes king of Armenia, and sent embassadors to acquaint him with the resolution they had taken. Tigranes agreed to it, came into Syria, took possession of that kingdom, and reigned there eighteen years in great tranquillity; the first fourteen of which he governed it by Megdates his lieutenant, till he was obliged to recall him, with the troops he had under his command, to make head against the Romans [p], as we shall relate in the history of Armenia. Tigranes granes no ſooner entered Syria, but Euſebes, abandoning his dominions, fled into Cilicia, where he paſſed the reſt of his life in obſcurity [q]. What became of Philip is not known. Porphyrius indeed mentions both theſe princes as living near thirty years after Tigranes had taken poſſeſſion of Syria [r]; but herein that writer was certainly miſtaken, as we ſhall ſhew in a more proper place. Selene, the wife of Euſebes, retained Ptolemais with part of Phœnice and Cæle-Syria, and reigned there many years without moleſtation, which enabled her to give her two ſons an education ſuitable to their birth. Theſe were Antiochus, ſirnamed Aſiaticus, becauſe brought up in Aſia, and Seleucus Cybio-ſactes [s]. While Selene reigned at Ptolemais, ſome diſturbances happening in Egypt, on account of the averſion which the people had conceived againſt Alexander their king, that princeſs put in her claim to the crown, as being ſiſter to Lathurus; and ſent her two ſons to Rome to ſollicit the ſenate in her behalf. The Romans kept them there two years, giving them all the time hopes of ſucceſs in their negotiation; but with no other view than to oblige Alexander by this means to buy at a dearer rate the favour and protection of the ſenators. And accordingly, when he had ſpent all the treaſures he was maſter of in bribing the ſenate, he was at laſt confirmed in the kingdom, and the young princes ordered to return home [t]. Antiochus the eldeſt reſolved to paſs through Sicily, being deſirous to ſee the curioſities of that celebrated iſland, and eſpecially the city of Syracuſe. While he ſtaid there, he met with an inſult, which ſhews how much Rome was corrupted in the times we are writing of, and what rapines and depredations were committed in the ſight of the world by the magiſtrates ſent by the republic to govern the unhappy provinces. The misfortune of young Antiochus is related at length, and ſet out in its proper light by Cicero [u]. Verres, ſays he, who was at that time Prætor in Sicily, hearing that Antiochus was at Syracuſe, and being at the ſame time informed that he had along with him a great deal of gold and ſilver plate, many valuable jewels, and rich moveables, was tranſported with joy, as if ſome rich inheritance had unexpectedly fallen to him. Upon the prince's arrival he ſent him a preſent of wine, oil, flour,

[o] Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 23. & de Bell. Judiac. l. i. c. 1.
[p] Justin. l. xl. c. 1. Appian. in Syriac. p. 118, 119.

[q] Juſtin. l. xl. c. 2. Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 243. [r] Porphyr. in Græc. Euſeb. Scalig. [s] Cic. in Verr. Act. 4. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 24. Strab. l. xvii. p. 796 [t] Cic. ibid. [u] Cic. ibid.

flour, &c. for the use of his numerous retinue, and some days after invited him to an entertainment; on which occasion the Prætor displayed all his costly furniture, his palace being magnificently adorned, and the tables set off with vessels of most exquisite workmanship; for of these Verres had great store. The banquet was truly noble, and worthy of so great a guest, the Prætor having spared no expences on such an extraordinary occasion. The prince was greatly taken with the elegancy and politeness of the Roman governor, and highly pleased to see himself honoured by an officer of the republic in so eminent a manner. To shew his acceptance, he invited Verres to an entertainment in his turn, exposing to public view an incredible number of gold and silver vessels, cups richly set with jewels, moveables of all sorts of an inestimable value, and amongst other things a wine-vessel cut out of one precious stone, and of such a size, that nothing like it had ever been seen. Verres, greatly surprized at such a pompous and magnificent appearance, took each of the vessels into his hand, viewed, praised, and admired them, the king expressing great joy that the Prætor of the Roman people should be so well pleased with his entertainment. Verres returning home, sent next morning two of his domestics to the prince, desiring he would let him have for a day or two some of the finest vessels he had seen at his house, under pretence of shewing them to his workmen. Antiochus, without the least difficulty or distrust, complied with his request; and then the Prætor sent again, begging he would trust him only for a few hours with the large vessel made of a single precious stone, that he might examine it more exactly, and satisfy his curiosity more at leisure. The prince at his request sent that also. Verres, whose avarice had no bounds, seeing young Antiochus so pliant and complaisant, did not stop here. The two princes had carried with them to Rome, a branched candlestick of massy gold, no less valuable for the exquisiteness of the workmanship, than for the many rich jewels and precious stones, with which it was adorned. With this they intended to present Jupiter Capitolinus; but his temple, which had been burnt in the civil wars between Marius and Sylla, being then rebuilding, and not finished when they left Rome, they carried the present back with them without allowing any one to see it, that it might the more surprize the city, when it should first appear in the temple of Jupiter; for they designed to send embassadors with this magnificent present, as soon ſoon as they heard that the ſtatue of the god was ſet up in his new temple. Verres, by ſome means or other being informed of all this, earneſtly begged the prince to ſend him it, expreſſing a great deſire to ſee it, and promiſing to conceal it even from thoſe of his own family. Antiochus was very unwilling to comply with the prætor's requeſt, not out of any jealouſy or diſtruſt, but becauſe he did not care it ſhould be ſeen by any, till it appeared in the capitol. However, not to diſoblige Verres, he commanded his ſervants to carry it to his houſe, well covered and with all poſſible ſecrecy. The prætor, when he firſt beheld it, could not help crying out in the greateſt ſurprize, This is truly a preſent worthy of a prince, worthy of a king of Syria, worthy of the capitol. For in that inimitable performance, ſays Tully, art ſeemed to vie with the precious materials, and the ſpectators were not more charmed with the number of the jewels, than with the variety of the workmanſhip. Beſides, it was of ſuch an extraordinary ſize, continues the ſame author, as plainly diſcovered that it was not intended for the palace of a man, but for a ſtately temple of ſome god. The officers of Antiochus, having given the prætor full time to conſider it, were preparing to carry it back, when he deſired them to leave it with him, that he might examine it more at his leiſure, which they did accordingly. The prince was not at firſt alarmed, nor entertained the leaſt ſuſpicion of Verres; but having for three ſucceſſive days ſent to demand it, and the prætor always promiſing to return it the next day, he began to be uneaſy, and at laſt applied to him in perſon. Verres received the prince with great marks of eſteem and affection, and was not even aſhamed to beg of him the preſent, which, as he had known from Antiochus himſelf, was deſigned for the great Jupiter, and the Roman people. Antiochus, ſtruck with amazement at this unexpected demand, could not for ſome time return any anſwer; but at length recovering from the ſurprize he was in, he told Verres with great politeneſs, that he was ſorry he could not gratify him, ſince he was bound by a vow he had made, to conſecrate the candleſtic to Jupiter Capitolinus. Verres did not acquieſce to this anſwer, but with an unparallelled impudence replied, that Jupiter would be as well pleaſed with ſuch another, which might be finiſhed before the temple could be in a condition to receive ſo valuable able an ornament. But the prince begged Verres anew to excuſe him, alledging the judgment, which the many nations that had been concerned in the workmanſhip of that gift, and knew for whom it was deſigned, would paſs upon ſuch an action; they would look upon us both, ſaid he, as guilty of ſacrilege, and conſider us in the ſame light, as if we had plundered the temple of Jupiter. Hereupon Verres began to abuſe and threaten him even with death, ſince he had him in his power, if he did not immediately make over to him both the golden candleſtic and the other precious veſſels which he had ſent to his houſe. But his menaces being of no more weight with Antiochus than his entreaties, the rapacious prætor commanded him to depart the iſland before ſun-ſet. Hereupon the prince, withdrawing to the market-place, acquainted, with tears in his eyes, the multitude that flocked to hear him, with the unjuſt and ſcandalous treatment he had met with from the prætor; he declared, calling the gods to witneſs, that Verres had robbed him of a golden candleſtic of an ineſtimable value, which was deſigned for the capitol, as a laſting monument in that auguſt temple of his alliance and amity with the Roman people; he proteſted, that he was not concerned for the loſs of many gold and ſilver veſſels, ſet with precious ſtones, and of other valuable effects, which the avaricious prætor detained with the moſt flagrant injuſtice; but to ſee himſelf thus by violence deprived of a preſent which he had deſigned for the great Jupiter of the capitol, was a misfortune and an affront, which he could not well brook, &c. In the cloſe of his ſpeech calling upon the Roman citizens, who were there preſent, and Jupiter himſelf, to witneſs the ſincerity of his heart and the piety of his intentions, he offered and conſecrated anew the preſent which the prætor had in his cuſtody, to the great Jupiter of the Romans[w]. Thus was a prince with the moſt crying injuſtice abuſed, a gueſt plundered, and an ally and friend of the Roman people with the higheſt indignity expelled the province by the chief magiſtrate ſent thither by the republic to adminiſter juſtice. The ſcandalous behaviour of Verres was publicly known, not only in Sicily and all over Aſia, but even at Rome; and nevertheleſs the injured prince could never receive the leaſt ſatisfaction for the affront, or reparation for the loſs he had ſuffered, Verres having gained by rich preſents many powerful protectors at Rom

[w] Cic. in Verr. act. 6. n. 61——67.

Rome, who were not aſhamed to patronize ſo notorious a robber, and ſcreen him againſt the juſt proſecution of their plundered ally. But to return to our ſubject:

SELENE finding on the return of her two ſons from Rome, that her ſollicitations for the kingdom of Egypt had proved unſucceſsful, attempted to enlarge her dominions in Syria, and prevailed upon many cities to revolt from Tigranes, and ſide with her. This brought the king of Armenia upon her with all his forces; he entered Syria at the head of five hundred thouſand men, and having obliged Selene to ſhut herſelf up in Ptolemais, laid ſiege to that place, reduced it, and having got the princeſs into his power, cauſed her to be put to death at Seleucia in Meſopotamia, whither he had carried her on his return into Armenia [x]. She was the daughter of Ptolemy Phyſcon king of Egypt, and had been at firſt married to Ptolemy Lathurus her brother, but taken from him by her mother, and given to Antiochus Grypus; upon whoſe death ſhe married Antiochus Euſebes the ſon of Antiochus Cyzicenus, and had by him her two ſons, Antiochus Aſiaticus and Seleucus Cybioſactes. Appian tells us, that ſhe married Cyzicenus himſelf, and after his death Euſebes his ſon, and looks upon all the misfortunes, which afterwards befell Euſebes, as a juſt judgment of heaven upon him for this inceſt [y]. But we find no ſuch marriage mentioned by any other hiſtorian, whereas all the antients ſpeak of her marriage with the other three princes. Upon the death of Selene, Tigranes governed Syria without any diſturbance, till he was obliged to recal Megdates with all the troops he had in that country to aſſiſt him againſt Lucullus, who had given him a dreadful overthrow before Tigranocerta, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of Armenia. Syria being by the retreat of Megdates left naked, Antiochus Aſiaticus, to whom, as the next heir of the Seleucian family, that kingdom belonged, took poſſeſſion of ſome provinces of it, and there quietly reigned four years without the leaſt moleſtation either from Lucullus or Tigranes. But theſe four years are comprehended in the eighteen aſſigned to Tigranes; for that prince retained ſome part of Syria while Antiochus reigned in the other, till the whole was reduced to a Roman province. And hence it is, that ſome authors have not ranked Antiochus Aſiaticus among the kings of Syria. However, he ruled over part of that kingdom till Pompey having conquered

[x] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 24. Plut. in Lucullo. Strab. l. xvi. p. 743. [y] Appian in Syriac..

Tigranes impoſed on him the hard condition of returning into Armenia, and confining his ambition to the antient inheritance of his forefathers. As Syria was then without a governor, and no body had more right to rule there than Antiochus Aſiaticus, that prince appeared before Pompey, repreſented to him the misfortunes of his family, urged the juſtice of his claim, and entreated the Roman not to exclude him from a crown, which his anceſtors had long wore with great glory. But as the Romans in the age we are writing of had the bare appearance and outſide of virtue, and did not ſcruple committing the moſt flagrant acts of injuſtice to promote the intereſt of their republic, Pompey gave Antiochus this haughty and diſobliging anſwer: Don't imagine you ſhall be put in poſſeſſion of a kingdom, which you have abandoned. The Syrians deſpiſe you, and will not ſuffer you to reign over them. Why did you not wreſt the ſceptre out of the hands of Tigranes? You have lived eighteen years in dread of the enemy, whom I have conquered. What pretence then have you to deprive us conquerors of the right we have acquired by our victory? The kingdom of Syria belonged to Tigranes, and now that he is conquered, all his rights devolve upon us. The Syrian empire therefore now appertains to Rome, and our republic can defend it better than you from the incurſions of the Jews and Arabians [z]. Thus Pompey made uſe of his victories to oppreſs an unfortunate prince, rob him of his inheritance, and by the moſt notorious piece of injuſtice reduce Syria to a Roman province. Antiochus, thus ſtript of his dominions, ſpent the reſt of his life in obſcurity. Some writers tell us, that Pompey gave him Commagena; but theſe confound Antiochus Aſiaticus with Antiochus Commagenus, as is manifeſted from Strabo, Appian, Dion Caſſius, Juſtin, &c. As for Seleucus Cybioſactes, or as others write it, Cybiotates, he outlived his brother; for Dion Caſſius [a], Strabo [b], and Porphyrius [c] tell us, that the Alexandrians, having placed on the throne of Egypt Bereniice, the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, ſent an embaſſy into Syria, inviting Antiochus Aſiaticus, who by his mother Selene was the next male-heir to that crown, to come into Egypt, and marrying Berenice to reign in conjunction with her. But the embaſſadors finding that he was dead, and thereupon upon returning home, the Alexandrians ſent another embaſſy to Seleucus his brother with the ſame propoſal; which he readily accepting reigned in Egypt, till Berenice growing weary of him cauſed him to be put to death (W). In him ended the whole race of Seleucus; no one of that illuſtrious family being left to ſurvive the loſs of the empire, which they had held, according to Appian, two hundred and ſeventy years, according to Euſebius, from the hundred and ſeventeenth olympiad, the third after the death of Alexander, to the third year of the hundred and twenty-fourth, that is, two hundred and fifty-one years [d].

[z] Appian in Syriac. & Mithridat. Dion. Caſs. l. xxxv. Juſtin. l. xl. c. 2. Porphyr. in Græc. Euſeb. Scalig. [a] Dion. Caſs. l. xxxix. [b] Strab. l. xvii. p. 796. [c] Porphyr. ibid.

SECT.

[d] Euſeb. in Chron.

(W) Porphyry, as quoted by Euſebius, tells us, that Philip the ſon of Grypus was invited by this ſecond embaſſy into Egypt. But as no mention has been made of him in hiſtory ſince his ſeizing on Damaſcus, which happened ſix and twenty years before the time we are now writing of, he was in all likelihood dead, when the Egyptian embaſſadors arrived in Syria. Beſides, if he had been now alive, he would have been too far advanced in years for the propoſed marriage, it being now forty years ſince he ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Syria. The perſon therefore, whom this ſecond embaſſy called out of Syria into Egypt after the death of Aſiaticus, muſt have been his younger brother; for he was invited thither as the next heir to the crown, and this the brother of Aſiaticus alone could be. Frequent mention is made by the writers of thoſe times of this younger brother of Aſiaticus; but none of them acquaint us with his name. However, what Strabo relates of Seleucus Cybroſactes or Cybioſactes evidently ſhews, that he was the perſon we are ſpeaking of For that writer tells us (111), that Seleucus Cybioſactes was invited into Egypt to marry Berenice, and that he was of the Seleucian family; both which things put it beyond doubt, that this Seleucus was the younger brother of Aſiaticus, ſince upon the death of the latter, his younger brother was the only ſurviving perſon of the Seleucian family; and therefore in him ended, as we have related, the illuſtrious race of Seleucus Nicator.

That nothing may be wanting which can give us any light into the hiſtory of Syria, before we diſmiſs this ſubject, we ſhall give our readers a ſuccinct account of the Syrian coins, which have been tranſmitted to us, and repreſent the princes, who have reigned in Syria, according to the order of their ſucceſſion to the crown. And to begin with thoſe of Seleucus Nicator, founder of the Syro-Macedonian empire; two different coins of that prince have reached us, whereof the firſt repreſents him with a lion's ſkin on his head, and the ſecond with the ſame ſkin and the

(111) Strab. l. xvii. p. 796.

the wing of ſome bird covering his ear. The Macedonian kings, eſpecially Amyntas, Philip, and Alexander the Great, are commonly repreſented with the ſkin of a lion on their heads, imitating therein Hercules, from whom they pretended to derive their pedigree. The captains of Alexander, when they uſurped the ſovereign power in their reſpective governments, aſſumed, in their coins, the ſame enſigns and ornaments which that conqueror had uſed, as if they had been his lawful heirs and ſucceſſors. The wing, which we ſee in the ſecond medal, is a ſymbol of diſpatch, quickneſs and expedition, without which no great exploits can be atchieved. On the reverſe of the firſt medal Jupiter is repreſented ſitting, and holding in his right hand a victory, and in his left a ſpear reverſed, to ſhew, that after victory clemency is to be uſed towards the conquered, and not arms or ſeverity. The reverſe of the ſecond medal exhibits a butting ox, and no doubt alludes to what Appian relates of Seleucus Nicator, viz. that he once ſeized by the horns, and ſtopt in his full career, a wild ox, which Alexander was about to ſacrifice, after he had broken the ropes by which he was held by many perſons, and made his eſcape. Both medals bear this inſcription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΣΕΛΕΥΚΟΥ, that is, of king Seleucus, as does alſo a third of the ſame prince, repreſenting the head of Jupiter crowned with laurel, and on the reverſe a chariot drawn by four elephants, and drove by Pallas darting with her right hand a javelin, and holding a ſhield in her left. Jupiter is frequently expreſſed on the Macedonian and Syrian coins as being the pretended father of Alexander, from whom the kings of Syria derived all their power. Pallas was the tutelary goddeſs of Macedon; and as to the elephants, Seleucus far excelled all the princes of his age in the number he conſtantly kept of thoſe warlike animals; for he brought four hundred and eighty with him againſt Antigonus, and had received five hundred from Sandrocottus king of India before he engaged in that war.

Antiochus Soter, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Seleucus Nicator is repreſented with a diadem on his head and a wing above his ear; on the reverſe is Apollo holding in his right hand an arrow and bow in his left with this inſcription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ that is, of king Antiochus. Seleucus Nicator pretended to be the ſon of Apollo, as we have related in the hiſtory of that prince's reign, and hence it is that we meet with the figure of Apollo in moſt of the Syrian coins.

The medals of Antiochus Theus repreſent that prince with the diadem on his head, and on the reverſe Apollo with what the medaliſts call his attributes, viz. a bow and an arrow, as in the former coin. Perhaps the medals bearing the figure of Apollo were ſtruck by the inhabitants of Antioch, who paid a particular worſhip to that god in the neighbouring city or village of Daphne.

Seleucus Callinicus, brother to Antiochus Theus, is repreſented in the ſame manner, viz. with the diadem or royal fillet; on the reverſe is Apollo holding in his right hand an arrow, and leaning with his left arm upon his tripos with a laurel crown upon it. We have two other medals of this prince with Apollo on the reverſe of one, and a horſe on that of the other: Apollo holds an arrow in his right hand, and with his left leans upon his bow; the kings of Syria took great delight in horſes, and their cavalry, generally ſpeaking, behaved with great gallantry. Beſides, a horſe is a ſymbol of war, and denotes a warlike people. Over the horſe is a ſtar, which was, as we are told by the antiquaries, the arms of the city of Adradus, where this medal perhaps was ſtruck. The medals of Seleucus Ceraunus are in every reſpect like thoſe of Seleucus Callinicus.

The medals of Antiochus, ſirnamed the Great, exhibit the head of that prince with the uſual enſigns of royalty, and on the reverſe the figure of a galley, by which ſymbol the Syrians repreſented the city of Tyre. Antiochus made himſelf maſter of that ſtrong and important place at the ſame time that Ptolemais was delivered up to him, with forty ſhips that were in the harbour, by Theodotus commander in chief of the forces of Ptolemy Philopator king of Egypt. The letters which are to be ſeen over the galley are arithmetical characters, and anſwer our numbers 117; whence we learn that this medal was ſtruck in the 117th year of the Seleucian æra, which was according to ſome, the 28th, according to others, the 30th year of Antiochus's reign. Vaillant ſeems to look upon thoſe medals of Antiochus the Great as ſpurious, which bear this inſcription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΜΕΓΑΛΟΥ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ, that is, of king Antiochus the Great, ſince the Syrian kings appear to have been averſe from aſſuming on their coins ſuch pompous titles.

Seleucus Philopator, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Antiochus, is repreſented with the ſame ſymbols as his father. The letters ΡΛC denote the 136th year of the æra, of the Seleucidæ, which was the 11th of his reign.

Antiochus Epiphanes, ſo famous in the hiſtory of the Maccabees, is repreſented with the uſual enſigns of royalty; on the reverſe of ſome of his medals we ſee Apollo taking with his right hand an arrow out of his quiver, and holding a bow in his left; in others the image of Jupiter, armed with a thunderbolt and ſpear; on all his medals is the following inſcription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ ΘΕΟΥ ΕΠΙΦΑΝΟΥΣ, that is, of king Antiochus the appearing god, or, of king Antiochus, who appears to be a god. This impious and haughty title was firſt given him, according to Joſephus (112), by the Samaritans, who wrote a letter to him with this direction.

The medals of Antiochus Eupator, the ſon of Epiphanes, have on the reverſe a Jupiter, ſitting, and holding a winged victory in his right, and a ſpear in his left, with this inſcription, (112) Joſeph. l. xii.

ſcription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ ΕΥΠΑΤΩΡΟΣ, that is, of king Antiochus Eupator. The youthful look of this prince proves that he was very young when he aſcended the throne, as we have ſhewn in the hiſtory of his reign.

We have no fewer than eight medals of Demetrius Soter, the ſon of Seleucus Philopator, all bearing the head of that prince, but different ſymbols on the reverſes. On the firſt is a Jupiter, ſitting with a victory in his right hand, and a ſpear in his left, with this Inſcription; ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΔΗΜΗΤΡΙΟΥ ΘΕΟΥ ΦΙΛΟΠΑΤΟΡΟΣ ΣΩΤΕΡΟΣ, that is, of king Demetrius Theus Philopator Soter: We have ſpoke of the ſirname of Soter in the hiſtory of his reign; but the other appellations are not mentioned by any hiſtorian. On the ſecond is repreſented a victory ſtretching out her right hand, and holding in her left the branch of a palm tree. The figure of victory on the coins of this prince allude, in all likelihood, to the advantages he gained over Eupator and his governor Lyſias. On the third is expreſſed a Mercury, with the branch of a palm-tree in his right hand, and his caduce in the left. Theſe three coins bear the ſame inſcription, and without them we ſhould never have known that Demetrius aſſumed the appellation of Theus and Philopator; the firſt he probably took in imitation of his uncle Antiochus; and the other of his father Seleucus. Mercury is a ſymbol of peace, and, in all likelihood, alludes here to the tranquillity which reigned ſometime all over Syria, after Demetrius had conquered and put to death Eupator and his governor Lyſias. The reverſe of the fourth medal exhibits a galley, the ſymbol of the city of Tyre, with this inſcription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΔΗΜΗΤΡΙΟΥ L. ΡΝΔ. ΤΥΡΙΩΝ, that is, of king Demetrius in the year (of the Seleucian æra) 154, By the Tyrians. On the fifth we ſee an Apollo ſitting in the apparel of a woman, and holding in his right hand an arrow, and a cornu-copia in his left, with this inſcription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΔΗΜΗΤΡΙΟΥ ΣΩΤΗΡΟΣ, and the letters PNH, that is, of king Demetrius Soter, in the year of the Seleucidæ 158. The ſixth medal bears on the reverſe a galley, with the characters ΡΝΘ and ΣΙΔΩΝΙΩΝ, that is, in the year 153. By the Sidonians. As Demetrius ſent his ſon to Rome this year, Vaillant conjectures that the Sidonians conveyed him thither with their gallies, and on that occaſion ſtruck this medal. Perhaps a galley was the ſymbol of Sydon as well as of Tyre, the firſt galley, if Clemens Alexandrinus is to be credited, having been built in that city. On the reverſe of the ſeventh medal is a cornu-copia with the name of Demetrius Soter, and the characters ΡΞΑ, that is, in the 161ſt year of the Seleucidæ that is, the year in which Demetrius defeated Alexander Balas; for that uſurper firſt appeared, according to the hiſtory of the Maccabees, in the 160th year of the kingdom of the Greeks, and was defeated by Demetrius, as we read in the profane hiſtorians, the year following. The eighth and laſt medal of this prince has on the reverſe an Apollo with an arrow in his right, and a cornucopia in his left, with the name of Demetrius Soter, and the letters ΡΞΒ, thrt is, in the 162d year of the Seleucian æra. We read in the hiſtory of the Maccabees, that Demetrius began his reign in the 151ſt year of the kingdom of the Greeks, and from this medal it appears that he was ſtill alive in the 162d of the ſame æra; hence we have preferred the authority of Polybius (113), who was contemporary with this prince, and writes that he reigned twelve years, to the teſtimony of Torniellus Bucholcerus, Funcius, Vignerius, and Gordon, of whom the three firſt will have him to have reigned only ten years, and the two latter but nine. Euſebius (114), Sulpitius Severus (115) and Joſephus (116) agree with Polybius.

rians

The medals of Alexander Balas have on one ſide the head of that prince with the diadem, and on the other either Jupiter, Apollo, Pallas, or Neptune. Jupiter is repreſented ſitting with a victory in his hand; Apollo with an arrow in one hand, and a bow in the other; Pallas with an helmet on her head, a victory in her right hand, and her left leaning on her ſhield; Neptune holding in his right hand a dolphin, and his trident in the left. Moſt of the medals of this prince bear this inſcription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΥ ΘΕΟΠΑΤΟΡΟΣ ΕΥΕΡΓΕΤΟΥ, ΡΞΒ, that is, of king Alexander Theopator Euergetes in the year 162. He aſſumed the ſirname of Theopator, as pretending to be the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes, ſirnamed Theos or God. One of the medals of this prince repreſents his head, together with that of his queen Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy Philometor. On the queen's head is a buſhel after the manner of Iſis and Serapis, two Egyptian deities. This buſhel with the cornu-copia hard by it, is a ſymbol of the happineſs which the people promiſed themſelves from the marriage of the king of Syria with the daughter of the king of Egypt. The dates which theſe medals bear, are 162, 163, 164, 165, 166. The following year, that is in 167, Demetrius Nicator, according to the hiſtory of the Maccabees, began his reign; ſo that our chronology agrees exactly with that of the medals, and of the hiſtory of the Maccabees, it being manifeſt from both that Balas was killed in the ſixth year of his reign. Euſebius was therefore certainly miſtaken, when he allowed him in his chronology ten years and ſeven months.

Some of the medals of Demetrius Nicator, the ſon of Demetrius Soter, bear on the reverſe an eagle, ſome an anchor, the arms of the Seleucian family, others a galley, and ſome the figure of a woman, commonly believed to be Aſtarte, the goddeſs of the Sidonians; the medals with that figure having been ſtruck ſtruck by the Sidonians, as ſome conjecture from the legend in Phœnician characters. The inſcription on the medals of this prince is, of king Demetrius, and on one, of king Demetrius Theus Philadelphus Nicator. The ſirname of Theus he took in imitation of his father; that of Philadelphus was given him for the great affection he had, or rather pretended to have for his brother Antiochus; the appellation of Nicator was beſtowed upon him by his ſubjects for having conquered Alexander Balas, who was not of the Seleucian family. The medals of this prince are dated 167, 168.

(113) Polyb. l. iii. in fine. (114) Euſeb. in Chron. (115) Sulpitius Sever. Hiſt. ſacr. l. ii. (116) Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 5.

Antiochus Theus, the ſon of Balas by Cleopatra, is not ranked by ſome writers among the kings of Syria; but on the antient coins he is repreſented like the others with the diadem, and honoured with the titles of king Antiochus, Theus, Epiphanes, Nicephorus; the ſirnames of Theus and Epiphanes he took in imitation of Antiochus, the fifth of that name, whoſe grandſon he pretended to be: that of Nicephorus or the victorious was given him after his victory over Demetrius. Some writers exclude him from the number of the Syrian kings, becauſe during the ſhort time he lived, Demetrius, his rival, kept poſſeſſion of the greateſt part of the empire. The medals repreſent him very young, and he indeed was not above five years old when he aſcended the throne, and was put to death by Tryphon's orders after he had reigned two years. Funcius and Vignerius will have him to have reigned three years complete, Gordon, Mercator, and Temporarius four, and Joſephus writes, that he was put to death in the ſixth year of his reign.

Tryphon, having on the death of his pupil uſurped the crown, cauſed ſome medals to be ſtruck, wherein he ſtiled himſelf king Tryphon, and Tryphon the powerful king; ſome of theſe medals have reached our times, and bear on the reverſe an helmet, the ſymbol of war, to which is faſtened a large horn, among the antients a mark of power; near the helmet is a ſtar, the arms of the city of Aradus, which ſhews that the medal was ſtruck there; for the cities where ſuch medals were coined, are generally expreſſed either by the initial letters of their names, or by ſome other mark. Thus a cornu-copia ſtands for Antioch, a galley for Tyre, the branch of an olive-tree for Laodicea, a mitre for Tripolis, &c.

The medals of Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius Nicator, expreſs the head of that prince with the uſual diadem, and on the reverſe an eagle with the branch of a palm-tree, and the following legend, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ ΡΟΔ· ΙΕΡ· ΑΣΥ· that is, of king Antiochus, in 174 at Tyre a ſacred aſylum. We have mentioned in our hiſtory the famous aſylum that was at Tyre. Euſebius tells us, that the privilege of an aſylum was granted to the Tyrians in the 187th year of the Seleucian æra: but this medal, which was ſtruck in the 174th year of that æra, plainly ſhews that he was therein greatly miſtaken. Sidetes bears on all his medals the name of Euergetes getes; that of Sidetes, or the hunter, by which he is generally diſtinguiſhed in hiſtory from the other Antiochuſes, not ſeeming to him worthy of being tranſmitted to poſterity. Patinus in his account of the medals of the Syrian kings is greatly at a loſs about thoſe of Antiochus Euergetes: to which of the many Antiochuſes ſays he, thſe medals belong, I leave others to gueſs; for my part, I find no mention made by the antients of any ſuch king as Antiochus Euergetes. Patinus it ſeems, had never read Euſebius; for Porphyry, as quoted by that writer, tells us in expreſs terms, that Antiochus the brother of Demetrius Nicator was known by the name of Antiochus Euergetes (118). The medals of this prince bear different dates, viz. 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 181, 182. Buchaierus and Famiorarius had not ſeen theſe medals, when they wrote that Sidetes reigned only ſeven years.

Demetrius Nicator, being ſet at liberty by the Parthian king, returned into Syria, and reaſcended the throne upon the death of his brother Sidetes, who was cut off with his army by the Parthians. All the medals that were ſtruck after the return of Nicator repreſent him with a long beard after the Parthian manner, and are dated the 184th, 185th, 186th years of the Seleucian æra.

Alexander Zebina is repreſented on the medals with the diadem, as the other kings of Syria, tho' by few of the antients placed in that number. Moſt of the coins of this prince were ſtruck at Damaſcus and bear the following dates, 184, 185, 186; ſome of them have on the reverſe an eagle, ſome a Bacchus with his attributes, ſome a Jupiter, and ſome a Pallas armed with a ſhield and ſpear. They all bear the ſame inſcription, viz. of king Alexander, without any of thoſe pompous titles which the other princes aſſumed.

Seleucus, the eldeſt ſon of Demetrius Nicator by Cleopatra, was ſcarce ſeated on the throne, when he was killed by his own mother, hence we have not reckoned him among the Syrian kings; neither do we find any mention made of him on antient coins. His brother Antiochus, ſirnamed Grypus, the ſecond ſon of Demetrius Nicator and Cleopatra, ſucceeded him, as we have related. On the medals of this prince, ſtruck in the beginning of his reign, that is, in the 187th, and 190th years of the Seleucidæ, we find the heads of Antiochus and Cleopatra joined together with this inſcription, ΒΑΣΙΛΙΣΣΗΣ ΚΛΕΟΠΑΤΡΑΣ ΘΕΑΣ, ΚΑΙ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ, that is, of queen Cleopatra Thea and of king Antiochus. That ambitious woman aſſumed the title of goddeſs or Thea, and even placed her own name before that of the king her ſon. The medals that were coined after the 190th year of the æra we are ſpeaking of, are ſtamped with the head of Antiochus alone, and this inſcription, of Antiochus Epiphanes; the name, or rather (118) Euſeb in Chron.

rather nick-name of Grypus, which is common among authors, is not to be met with on the medals of this prince. The medals of the other princes, viz. of Antiochus Cyzicenus, Antiochus Euſebes, Demetrius Euchærus, Antiochus Dionyſius, and Antiochus Aſiaticus, contain nothing remarkable, which we have not already taken notice of; and therefore, not to trouble the reader with tedious repetitions, we ſhall here put an end to this note and hiſtory, referring thoſe, who deſire to have a more particular account of the Syrian coins, to Foy-Vaillant's elaborate hiſtory of the king's of Syria, whence we have borrowed what we have ſaid relating to this ſubject.

MARE MEDITERRANEVM

Sinus Syrticus

Syrtis Major

Macæ

Nasamones

Psylli

Macæ Cinyphii

CINYPS REGIO

LIBYA DESERTA

CYRENAICA

PENTAPOLIS

Apotinnatæ

Homos

Ammoniacus

MARMARICA

Marmaridæ

Oasitæ Nomi

Oasis magna

Oasis parva

Adyrmachidæ

Marcotis

HEPTANOMIS

AEGYPTVS

ARABIAE FELICIS

ARABIA PETRÆA

Tropicus Cancri

Garamantes

Blemmyes

AETHIOPIAE

LIMES

Colobi

AETHIOPIA SVPRA AEGYPTVM

LIBYARVM REGIO

Ichthyophagi

Troglodytæ

Rhizophagi

Meroe Insula

Eleii seu

ARABICVS SINVS

PARS

AEGYPTVS ET CYRENAICA

MARE

Sinus

Syrtis

Macæ Cinyphii

CINYPS RE

Macæ

Occidens

Catabathmus magnus

Marmarid

ERTA

MAR

RIC

Petras flavas

Petras magnas

Lisardi

Bibliaph

Ammonis

Barathra

Cinyps fluv.

Azuis

Asphodelodes

Cinyps

Alo

Sargina

Magriba

Umbri montes

Chuzambari Montes

Matlyx

Girama

NVBAR

RE

SECT. V.

The Hiſtory of Egypt from the foundation of that monarchy, by Ptolemy Soter, to its being made a Roman province.

BEFORE we proceed to the hiſtory of Egypt under the Macedonians, it will be neceſſary to exhibit a ſeries of their kings with the years of their reſpective reigns according to various ſyſtems, there being a great diſagreement among authors in their chronological accounts of theſe princes.

Ptolemy's Canon of the Macedonian kings who reigned in Egypt.

	Years.		Years.
Ptolemy Lagus	20	Ptolemy Philometor	35
Ptolemy Philadelphus	38	Ptolemy Euergetes II.	29
Ptolemy Euergetes	25	Ptolemy Soter	36
Ptolemy Philopator	17	Ptolemy Dionyſius	29
Ptolemy Epiphanes	24	Cleopatra	22

A Table of the Macedonian kings who reigned in Egypt, with the years of their reigns according to Euſebius.

Ptolemy Lagus	40	Ptolemy Alexander	10
Ptolemy Philadelphus	38	Ptolemy Lathurus reſtored	8
Ptolemy Euergetes	26	Cleopatra alone 6 months.
Ptolemy Philopator	17	Ptolemy Alexander II.	15
Ptolemy Epiphanes	24	Ptolemy Auletes	30
Ptolemy Philometor	35	Ptolemy Dionyſius and Cleopatra	4
Ptolemy Euergetes or Phyſcon	29	Cleopatra alone	22
Ptolemy Lathurus before his baniſhment wanting ſome months.	17

There is no ſmall diſagreement among the eccleſiaſtic writers with reſpect to the years of theſe princes reigns, as appears from the following table.

A TABLE

A TABLE of the Ptolemies of Egypt, with the years of their reigns, according to Clemens of Alexandria [a] Epiphanius [b], and Nicephorus.

	Acc. to Clem.	Acc. to Epiph.	Acc. to Niceph.
Ptolemy Lagus	40	40	40
Ptolemy Philadelphus	27	38	38
Ptolemy Euergetes	25	24	25
Ptolemy Philopator	17	21	17
Ptolemy Epiphanes	24	22	26
Philometor	35	34	35
Ptolemy Physcon	29	29	17 and six months.
Ptolemy Lathurus	36	35	18
Ptolemy Dionysius	29	31	30
Cleopatra	22	32	22

We

[a] Clemens Alexandrin. Stromat. l. i. [b] Epiphan. de Mensur. & ponder.

We ſhall now proceed to the hiſtory of theſe princes reigns, where we ſhall have occaſion to examine which of the various tables we have exhibited deſerves the preference.

Ptolemy Soter his extraction.

Ptolemy, the firſt of the Macedonian race who reigned in Egypt after Alexander the Great, was, according to Arrian [c], a native of Eordæa, a ſmall place in the province of Mygdonia in Macedon, and called Lagides, or the ſon of Lagus, but commonly believed to be the ſon of king Philip; that prince, as Curtius [d] and Pauſanias [e] inform us, having given Arſinoe, the daughter of Meleager and mother to Ptolemy, in marriage, while ſhe was big with child by him, to Lagus a Macedonian of a mean deſcent. Lagus, unwilling to father another man's child, as ſoon as his wife was brought to bed, expoſed the new-born infant, according to the barbarous cuſtom of thoſe times, to be devoured by wild beaſts, or to periſh with famine. But an eagle, ſays Suidas [f], touched with that compaſſion, which found no room in the breaſt of Lagus, performed with wonderful care and aſſiduity all the duties of a fond parent, ſheltering the helpleſs infant with his wings againſt the inclemency of the weather, and nouriſhing it with the blood of his prey inſtead of milk. Lagus being greatly affected with this miraculous adventure, which no doubt, was invented and divulged for that end, and looking upon it as an infallible prognoſtic of ſome extraordinary riſe and good fortune, acknowledged the child for his ſon, and as ſuch brought him up with great care. Theophylus Antiochenus, diſagreeing with the above-mentioned authors, tells us, that Ptolemy was of the royal family of Macedon, not by the father, but by his mother Arſinoe, who was nearly related to Philip the father of Alexander [g]. Lagus, according to this writer, muſt have been a man of rank, ſince he matched into the royal family, and not an obſcure or ignoble Macedonian, as Curtius and Pauſanias call him [h]. Theocritus, in ſpeaking of Ptolemy's family, ſays [i], that Alexander the Great and he were of the ſame race, being both deſcended from Hercules and Hyllus; but does not tell us, whether by the father's ſide, or the mother's. On the other hand, Juſtin, without taking any notice of his pedigree, writes, that he ſerved firſt under Philip, and afterwards under Alexander, in the capacity of a common

[c] Arrian. l i. [d] Quint. Curt. l. iv. [e] Pauſan in Atticis. [f] Suidas in voce Lagus. [g] Theophyl. Antioch. l. ii. [h] Curt. & Pauſan. ibid. [i] Theocritus Idyll. 17.

mon ſoldier, and was raiſed by the latter for his gallant behaviour to a chief command in the army [k]. It appears alſo from what we read in Plutarch [l], that Ptolemy was commonly believed to be of a mean deſcent. For that writer, in ſpeaking of his great moderation and the mildneſs of his temper, tells us, that one day, after he had heard for a long time an empty and trifling grammarian bragging of his great ſkill in antiquity, he at length interrupted him with this queſtion well ſuited to the erudition of a ſhallow pedant: Since you are ſo well verſed in the learning of the antients, pray tell me, grammarian, off-hand, who was the father of Peleus. The gramarian anſwered without heſitation, Pray, tell me firſt, O king, if you can, who was the father of Lagus. This reproachful reflection on the meanneſs of Ptolemy's extraction raiſed no ſmall indignation in the courtiers; but Ptolemy, applauding the humour, and pleaſed with the freedom of the grammarian, told them, that if it was beneath the dignity of a king to bear a joke, it did not by any means become him to joke upon others; that he had been the aggreſſor, and therefore had no more right to reſent the anſwer of the grammarian, with whom he had put himſelf thereby on a level, than the grammarian had to be offended at his queſtion. As for Ptolemy himſelf, he ſeems to have preferred the name of Lagides, or the ſon of Lagus, to all other appellations, ſince he tranſmitted it with his own to all his deſcendants, who from him are called Ptolemæi Lagides, or the Ptolemies deſcended from Lagus. Nay Epiphanius tells us [m], that in honour of his father he inſtituted a military order, calling it from his name Lageion. This, if true, proves the inſtitution of military orders to be of a more antient date than is commonly believed. But whatever was Ptolemy's deſcent, all the antients, who write of thoſe times, give him a moſt extraordinary character. He was one of Alexander's chief favourites, that conqueror repoſing in him the greateſt truſt, and relying entirely on his wiſdom, conduct, and courage, in the execution of his moſt important projects; for he attended him in all his expeditions, and in moſt of them diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very eminent manner. He was no leſs dear to the ſoldiers than to the king, being at the ſame time the prince's favourite, and the darling of the army. At the ſiege of Harmatelia among the Brachmans he had the misfortune Greatly favoured by Alexander, and loved by the army.

[k] Juſtin. l. xiii. [l] Plutarch. de ira cohibenda.
[m] Epiphanius de menſur. & ponder.

misfortune to be wounded with a poiſoned arrow, and muſt have died of his wound, had not providence intervened in a very extraordinary manner, after all human remedies had proved unſucceſsful. For while Alexander was one night bemoaning with himſelf the loſs which he had reaſon to apprehend of ſo great a commander, he fell aſleep, and had ſcarce ſhut his eyes, when a vaſt dragon, if Diodorus is to be credited [n], appeared to him in a dream, carrying a plant in his mouth, acquainting him with the nature and virtue of that vegetable, ſhewed him the place where it grew, and inſtructed him in what manner he ſhould apply it to Ptolemy's wound. The viſion no ſooner diſappeared, but Alexander awaking, went to the place which the dragon had pointed out to him, found the plant, and having applied it to the wound, as he had been directed, cured it in a ſhort time, and reſtored Ptolemy in perfect health to the army, who looked upon his death as the greateſt misfortune that could befal them. Strabo, who ſpeaks of this adventure as happening in the country of Orites, ſays, that Alexander learned the remedy of the natives, and that either he or his flatterers gave out that it had been revealed to him by the gods [o].

Appointed governor of Egypt.

AFTER the death of Alexander he was appointed governor of Egypt, Libya, and the part of Arabia which borders upon Egypt; and theſe provinces he held to his death, and tranſmitted them with many new acquiſitions as an hereditary kingdom to his deſcendants. But as we have already given a particular account of his wars with Perdiccas, Antigonus, and Demetrius [p], we ſhall not treſpaſs on the reader's patience with tedious repetitions, but only take notice in this place of ſome particulars relating to the reign of this prince, which we have not mentioned elſewhere. He is commonly diſtinguiſhed from the other Ptolemies his ſucceſſors by the ſirname of Soter or Saviour, which was firſt given him by the Rhodians on the following occaſion; Antigonus having formed a deſign of ſeizing on the iſland of Cyprus, which was then held by Ptolemy, demanded of the Rhodians a ſquadron of their beſt ſhips for the carrying on of that enterprize; but as thoſe iſlanders drew great advantages from their trade with Egypt, they could by no means be prevailed upon to enter into any meaſures prejudicial to the intereſt of Ptolemy. This gave no ſmall offence to Antigonus, who, to be revenged on the Whence called Soter.

Rhodians,

[n] Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. p. 617.
[o] Strab. l. 14.
[p] See Vol. viii. Book ii. chap. 2. ſect. 7.

Rhodians, ſent his ſon Demetrius, with a mighty fleet, and a powerful army to reduce their iſland. But Demetrius, after having ſpent a whole year in the ſiege of Rhodes, the metropolis of the iſland, without being able to maſter it; was obliged to conclude a peace with the Rhodians upon honourable terms, and leave them in full poſſeſſion of their liberties. As they had been enabled by the timely ſuccours ſent them by Ptolemy to ſuſtain ſo long a ſiege, and by his friendly offices happily delivered from it, as ſoon as the enemy withdrew, to teſtify their gratitude to their deliverer, they conſecrated a grove to him, ſurrounded it with a ſtately portico, which from him they called the Ptolemæum; and, after having conſulted the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, to give the action an air of ſolemnity, decreed, according to the impious flattery of thoſe times, that divine honours ſhould be paid him in that place, and the name of Soter or Saviour given him for having delivered them from the calamities of ſo dangerous a war [q].

Peoples Alexandria.

PTOLEMY, upon his firſt being appointed governor of Egypt, choſe the city of Alexandria for the uſual place of his reſidence, as did likewiſe the other kings, who ſucceeded him; by which means that city became one of the moſt wealthy and populous of the world. Ptolemy granted great privileges to all who ſettled there, whether Greeks, Jews, or Egyptians, which drew ſuch crowds of new inhabitants out of Judæa, that their quarter was one of the largeſt in the place. For the uſe of theſe, as they came by degrees to forget their own language, was made that Greek verſion of the ſacred books, which has ſince been called the Septuagint, as we ſhall ſee in a more proper place. All the antients ſpeak of Alexandria as the next in beauty, wealth, extent, &c. to Rome, ſome calling it the ſecond metropolis of the world, others the city of cities, the queen of the eaſt, a ſecond Rome, &c [r].

Aſſumes the title of king. Year of the flood 2695. Year before Chriſt 304.

THO' Ptolemy had, from the time he was firſt veſted with the government of Egypt, exerciſed the regal authority, yet he did not aſſume the title of king till he ſaw himſelf firmly ſettled in his new kingdom, which happened after the retreat of Antigonus and Demetrius, who had attempted, without ſucceſs, to invade Egypt, that is, nineteen years years after the death of Alexander. From this time Ptolemy in his chronological canon begins to reckon the years of his reign, having hitherto computed by thoſe of Philip and Alexander Ægus, though the latter had been killed five years before. But this fortunate turn in favour of Ptolemy, and his being thereby firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne, gave the chronologer a new epoch to reckon by, which took its beginning from the ſeventh day of our November. From this time Soter reigned twenty years, agreeable to Ptolemy's canon; and theſe with the nineteen aſcribed by that writer to Philip and Alexander Ægus, make up the thirty-nine, which authors commonly allow Ptolemy Soter to have reigned alone. For in the fortieth year of his reign, being fourſcore and upwards, he placed Ptolemy Philadelphus, one of his ſons by Berenice, on the throne, declaring him his partner in the empire and ſucceſſor to the crown after his death. He had ſeveral ſons by his other wives, and among thoſe Ptolemy Ceraunus, or the Thunderer; who being the ſon of Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater, and the eldeſt of the male iſſue, looked upon the crown as his birth-right after his father's demiſe. But Berenice, who came into Egypt merely as a companion to Eurydice, when he firſt married Ptolemy, ſo charmed that prince with her beauty, that he likewiſe married her, and in all affairs of importance was entirely governed by her advice. The crafty princeſs, taking advantage of the aſcendant ſhe had gained over her huſband, prevailed upon him to ſettle the crown upon her iſſue, and exclude Ceraunus, to whom, according to the order of ſucceſſion, it belonged. To prevent therefore the wars which might enſue after his death between the two brothers, he reſolved to place the crown on the head of Philadelphus in his life-time, aud reign in partnerſhip with him. Hereupon Ceraunus, quitting the court, retired to Lyſimachus, whoſe ſon Agathocles had married Lyſandra the ſiſter of Ceraunus both by father and mother. After the death of Agathocles he fled to the court of Seleucus, who received him in the moſt obliging manner, for which he was afterwards repaid with the blackeſt ingratitude [s].

[q] Diodor. Sicul. l. xx. Plut. in Demet. Pauſan. in Atticis.
[r] Vide Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. Strab. l. xvii. Marcellin. l. xxii. Hegeſipp. l. iv. c. 27.

Makes his ſon Philadelphus his partner in the empire.

In this year, which was the firſt of the hundred and twenty-fourth olympiad, the fortieth of Ptolemy Soter's reign, and the firſt of Ptolemy Philadelphus, was finiſhed the famous watch-tower in the iſland of Pharos over-againſt Alexandria, which had been begun by Ptolemy Soter ſome years before. It was commonly called the tower of Pharos, and was counted by the antients among the wonders of the world. It was a large ſquare ſtructure of white marble, on the top of which fires were kept conſtantly burning for the direction of ſailors. It coſt eight hundred talents, which, if they were Attic talents, amounts to one hundred ſixty-five thouſand pounds ſterling and upwards; If Alexandrian, to twice that ſum. The architect, employed by Ptolemy in this wonderful ſtructure, was Soſtrates of Cnidus, who by the following crafty device attempted to uſurp the whole glory of it to himſelf. He was ordered to engrave on it the following inſcription; King Ptolemy to the gods the ſaviours for the benefit of ſailors; but inſtead of Ptolemy's name he cut out his own in the ſolid marble, ond then filling up the hollow of the letters with mortar, wrote on it the abovementioned inſcription. In proceſs of time the mortar with Ptolemy's name being wore off, the following inſcription appeared; Soſtratus the Cnidian, the ſon of Dexiphanes, to the gods the ſaviours for the benefit of ſailors. This, as it was engraved on the ſolid marble, laſted as long as the tower itſelf [t] (A). This wonderful work has been demoliſhed ſome ages ſince; and now in its place ſtands a caſtle, as our modern travellers inform us [u], called Farillon, where a gar-

[s] Pauſan. in Atticis. Juſtin. l. xvi. c. 2. Diogen. Laert. in Demet. Phaler. Theocrit. Idyll. 17. Appian. in Syriac. 128.

[t] Plin. l. xxxvi. c. 12. Strab. l. xvii. p. 791. Memnon. excerpt. c. 9. & 13. Appian. in Syriac. p. 128. [u] Thevenot. part. 1. l. ii. c. 1.

(A) Nicolas Lloyd tells us out of a manuſcript copy of the Greek ſcholiaſt on Lucian, whoſe very words he quotes, that this tower was a ſquare ſtructure of a furlong, or ſix hundred foot on each ſide, and ſo high that it was ſeen at the diſtance of an hundred miles (1). Ebon Adris, an Arabic writer, in his book which the Latin tranſlator ſtiles Geographia Nubienſis, ſays, that this tower was three hundred cubits, or four hundred and fifty foot high. But both theſe accounts are altogether incredible, and generally looked upon as mere hyperboles. The firſt indeed is contradicted by Joſephus (2), who, in ſpeaking of the tower of Phaſelus at Jeruſalem, deſcribes it as a ſquare building of forty cubits, a garriſon is kept to defend the harbour. Pharos was originally an iſland about ſeven furlongs diſtant from the continent, to which it was afterwards joined by a cauſey, like that of Tyre, and commonly called the Heptaſtadium, or the ſeven furlong cauſey, it being ſeven furlongs in length. This was the work of Dexiphanes, the father of Soſtrates, who compleated it at the ſame time, that his ſon put his laſt hand to the tower. As they were both celebrated architects, Ptolemy employed them in theſe and many other works, which he undertook for the adorning and ſtrengthening of Alexandria, the metropolis of his kingdom [w]. Ammianus Marcellinus aſcribes the Heptaſtadium to queen Cleopatra [x]; but as he contradicts therein Cæſar in his commentaries, and all the antients who ſpeak of that great work, his authority is of no weight with us.

(1) Vide Nic. Lloyd in Lexic. Geographic. ad vocem Pharus.
(2) Joſeph. de Bell. Judaic. l. vi. p. 914.

THE ſame year that the tower of Pharos and the heptaſtadium were finiſhed, the image of Serapis was brought out of Pontus to Alexandria, after Ptolemy had for three years together ſollicited in vain Scydrothemis king of Pontus to ſend him it. Of this deity we have the following account from Tacitus [y], Plutarch [z], and Clement of Alexandria [a]. While Ptolemy, the firſt of that name, was employed in fortifying Alexandria with walls, and adorning

The image of Serapis conveyed to Alexandria. Year of the flood 2716. Year before Chriſt 283.

[w] Strab. l. xvii. p. 792. Plin. l. v. c. 31. & l. xiii. c. 11. Cæſar. comment. de bell. civil. l. iii. Pompon. Mel. l. ii. c. 7.
[x] Ammian. Marcell. l. xxii. c. 16.
[y] Tacit. hiſtor. l. iv. c. 83, 84.
[z] Plutarch. de Iſide & Oſiride.
[a] Clem. Alexandrin. in Protreptic.

cubits, or ſixty foot on each ſide, and ninety cubits, or an hundred and thirty-five foot high, and adds, that is was like the tower of Pharos near Alexandria; but as to its circumference much larger. Joſephus had often ſeen both theſe towers, ſay ſome writers, and could not be miſtaken herein. Some writers lay great ſtreſs on the teſtimony of Joſephus in this place; but in our opinion he depreſſes that wonderful work as much as the others raiſe it; for if the tower of Pharos was much leſs than that of Phaſelus at Jeruſalem, how came the former and not the latter, to be ſo much celebrated by all the antients, and even ranked among the ſeven wonders of the world? We are therefore apt to believe, that ſome miſtake has crept into the copy of Joſephus; perhaps inſtead of μείων we ſhould read μείζων. However that be, the two former accounts are in our opinion very impropable, ſince allowing it four hundred and fifty foot in height, and ſix hundred in breadth on each ſide, it would have been a far more wonderful work than the great pyramid which we can hardly believe.

ing it with temples and other ſtately buildings, there appeared to him in his ſleep a young man of extraordinary beauty, and of a ſtature more than human, admoniſhing him to diſpatch into Pontus ſome of his moſt truſty friends to bring from thence his ſtatue, and aſſuring him that the city and kingdom, which entertained it, ſhould prove happy, glorious, and powerful; the young man, having thus ſpoke, diſappeared, mounting up into heaven in a huge blaze of fire. Ptolemy, ſtruck with the augury and miraculous apparition, diſcovered his viſion to the Egyptian prieſts, whoſe profeſſion it was to be ſkilled in things of this nature. But as they appeared to be quite ignorant of Pontus and all foreign countries, he had recourſe to one Timotheus an Athenian of the race of the Eumolpides, who at that time had the adminiſtration of ſacred things in Alexandria. From him he learnt that in Pontus ſtood a city called Sinope, and not far from it a temple greatly reſorted to by the natives, and conſecrated to the infernal Jupiter, near whoſe ſtatue ſtood that of a woman commonly believed to be Proſerpine. But Ptolemy in the mean time applying his mind to other things, entirely neglected the heavenly admonition, till the ſame viſion, appearing to him anew in a more terrible manner, threatened him and his kingdom with certain deſtruction, if he neglected to put in execution the orders that had been given him. Hereupon Ptolemy immediately diſpatched embaſſadors with rich preſents to Scydrothemis, who then reigned in Sinope, to try whether they could prevail upon him to part with the image. They were ordered to take Delphos in their way, and there to conſult the oracle of the Pythian Apollo, which they did accordingly, and received an anſwer from the god void of ambiguity, viz. that they ſhould proceed, and carry home with them the image of his father, but leave behind that of his ſiſter. Upon their arrival at Sinope they acquainted Scydrothemis with their errand, and at the ſame time preſented to him rich gifts in their maſters name. The king accepted the preſents, and was inclined to comply with their requeſt, but deterred from following his inclination by the menaces of the people oppoſing the removal of the ſtatue. In this negotiation three years were ſpent, Ptolemy ſparing no entreaties nor charges, but ſending continually new embaſſadors, loaded with freſh preſents both for the king and his favonrites. However, Scydrothemis continued ſtill irreſolute and wavering, till he was warned by a dreadful ſpectre, which appeared to him in the dead

dead of the night, no longer to retard what the deity had determined. Hereupon having aſſembled the people, he acquainted them with the injunctions of the god, with his own viſion, and with that of Ptolemy, and aſſured them, that, unleſs they readily complied with the orders of heaven, many dreadful calamities would ſoon fall upon them. His ſpeech made no impreſſion on the minds of the populace; they envied Egypt ſuch a bleſſing, and ſurrounding the temple in a tumultuous manner, threatened to put any one to death who ſhould offer to remove their god. Hereupon the god, as ſome authors write, of his own motion and without help, conveyed himſelf into the embaſſadors ſhip, which lay cloſe to the ſhore; and the veſſel, traverſing an immenſe tract of ſea, arrived the third day after ſafe at Alexandria. Other writers tell us, that the inhabitants of Sinope being reduced to great ſtraits by a famine which made a dreadful havock in the city, conſented at laſt to part with their god for a ſupply of corn, which Ptolemy ſent them. The ſtatue of Serapis, being thus brought to Alexandria, was ſet up in one of the ſuburbs of that city called Rhacotis, where a temple was afterwards erected in his honour, ſuitable to the greatneſs of that ſtately metropolis, and called from the god worſhipped there Serapeum (B). This ſtructure, according to Ammianus Marcellinus, ſurpaſſed in beauty and magnificence all other edifices in the world, except the capitol at Rome [b].

[b] Ammian. Marcellin. l. xxii. c. 16.

(B) Julius Firmicus (3), Ruffinus (4), and other eccleſiaſtic writers are of opinion, that the patriarch Joſeph was worſhipped in Egypt under this name. But they can give no other reaſon for this ſtrange conceit, than that Serapis was generally repreſented with a buſhel on his head, which, they think denotes the buſhel with which Joſeph meaſured out his corn to the Egyptians in the time of the famine whereas it may as well repreſent the buſhel, with which Ptolemy meaſured out to the inhabitants of Sinope the corn which he ſent them for their god. This opinion, ridiculous and ill-grounded as it is, has been embraced by Voſſius, Ouzellus, Spencer and many other modern writers of no mean character (5) Theſe

(3) Julius Firmic. in lib. de error. prophanar. Religion.
(4) Ruffin. hiſtor. l. ii. c. 23.

The celebrated library and academy of Alexandria.

WITHIN the verge of this city was a library, which in after-ages became very famous for the number and value of the books it contained. Ptolemy Soter, being a learned prince, as appears from his history of the life of Alexander, which was greatly esteemed by the antients, but has not reached our times, to encourage and improve the liberal arts in his dominions, founded an Academy at Alexandria, or

(5). These will have Serapis to be an antient Egyptian god, the same with Apis, and derive his name from Apis and the Greek word Σορὸς, signifying a coffin; so that according to them Serapis is the same as Apis ἐν Σορῶ, or Apis in his coffin. Their meaning is, that the sacred bull, worshipped by the Egyptians, when alive, was called Apis, when dead, Serapis, or Apis in Soro, for from these words Apis in Soro, they derive the name of Serapis, which according to them was at first Soroapis, and by corruption came to be Serapis. For this etymology they quoteNymphiodorus,Clemens of Alexandria, Eusebius, and Ruffinus, but seem not to be aware of a very obvious objection against this derivation; which is, that the antient Egyptians were unacquainted with the Greek tongue, that language having been introduced into Egypt by the Ptolemies; and therefore had Serapis been an antient Egyptian deity, his name could not have had a Greek etymology. But not to dwell on an argument which sufficiently confutes itself, being entirely founded on a forced, unnatural, and false etymology, it is certain, if the antients are to be credited, that Serapis was not originally an Egyptian deity, nor worshipped by the inhabitants of that country in antient times, as he must have been, had the patriarch Joseph been worshipped under that name. For Polybius tells us (6), that Serapis was first worshipped as a god on the coast of the Propontis on the Thracian side over-against Hierus, and that there Jason sacrificed to him when he went on the Argonautic expedition. From thence, in all likelihood, the worship of that deity was introduced among the inhabitants of Sinope, and from Sinope brought into Egypt in the manner we have related. For till the reign of Ptolemy the first no mention is made by any writer of Serapis as an Egyptian god. Herodotus, who is so diffuse and particular in his account of the Egyptian gods, takes no notice of this; which is a plain proof, that in his time no such deity was known in Egypt. Several authors have wrote after him of the gods, religious ceremonies, and different manners of worship in use among the Egyptians, who were of all people the most superstitious, and yet none of them ever once mention the name of Serapis, till they come to the time of the Ptolemies. Macrobius tells or a ſociety of learned men, who devoted themſelves to the ſtudy of philoſophy, and all other ſciences. For the uſe of theſe he made a collection of choice books, which by degrees grew under his ſucceſſors to a prodigious bulk, and was reckoned the fineſt library in the world. His ſon Ptolemy Philadelphus left in it at his death an hundred thouſand volumes; and the ſucceeding princes of that race enlarged ſtill more, till at length the books lodged in it amounted to the number of ſeven hundred thouſand volumes [c]. The method they followed in collecting them was this: They ſeized all the books that were by the Greeks or other foreigners brought into Egypt, and ſent them to the academy or muſeum, where they were tranſcribed by perſons employed for that purpoſe; the tranſcripts were then delivered to the proprietors, and the originals laid up in the library. Ptolemy Euergetes, for inſtance, borrowed of the Athenians the works of Sophocles, Euripides, and Æſchylus, and only returned them the copies, which he cauſed to be tranſcribed in as beautiful a manner as poſſible; the originals he retained for his library, preſenting the Athenians with fifteen talents for the exchange [d], that is, with three thouſand pounds ſterling and upwards. As the muſeum was at firſt in that quarter of the city, which was called Bruchion, near the royal palace, the library was placed there likewiſe; but when it was filled with books to the number of four hundred thouſand volumes, another library within tells us (7), that when the ſtatue of Serapis was firſt ſet up at Alexandria, Nicocreon, who then reigned in Cyprus, ſent to enquire what god he was, which he would not have done, had he been a deity antiently worſhipped by the Egyptians; for Nicocreon was, as the above-mentioned author informs us, a prince of great learning, and well verſed in the Egyptian mythology. Origen, who was himſelf an Egyptian ſpeaks of Serapis as a god brought into Egypt not long before his time (8). From all we have ſaid, it is manifeſt, that Serapis was not originally an Egyptian deity, and conſequently could not be the Patriarch Joſeph.

(5) Vide Voss. de theolog. gent. l. i. c. 91. & Spencer. de legib. Ritual. Hebr. differt. v. c. 3. (6) Polyb. l. iv. p. 307.

[c] Strab. l, xvii. p. 791. Euſeb. in chron. Ammian. Marcellin. ibid. Tertull. in apologetic. c. 18. Plut, in Epicurum [d] Ammian. Marcellin. ibid. Gellius, l. 6. c. 17, Iſidor. Origin. l. vi. c. 3. Galen. in comment. 2, in tertium libr. Hippocrat. de Morb. vulgar.

(7) Macrob. Saturnal. l. i. c. 20. (8) Origen. contra Celſum, l. v.

within the Serapeum was erected by way of ſupplement to it, and on that account called the daughter of the former. The books lodged in this were in proceſs of time increaſed to the number of three hundred thouſand volumes; aud theſe two put together made up the number of ſeven hundred thouſand volumes, of which the royal libraries of the Ptolemies were ſaid to conſiſt [e]. In the war which Julius Cæſar waged with the inhabitants of Alexandria, the library in Bruchion was unfortunately burnt, and the four hundred thouſand volumes, with which it was ſtocked, reduced to aſhes. But the library in Serapeum ſtill remained, and there it was, without all doubt, that Cleopatra depoſited the two hundred thouſand volumes of the Pergamean library, which Marc Antony preſented her with. Theſe, and others added to them from time to time, rendered the new library of Alexandria more numerous and conſiderable than the former [f]; and tho' it was plundered and ranſacked more than once, during the troubles and revolutions which happened in the Roman empire, yet it was again and again repaired, and filled with the ſame number of books, and continued for many ages to be of great fame and uſe in thoſe parts, till it was at length burnt by the Saracens, on their making themſelves maſters of Alexandria in the 642d year of the chriſtian æra. The manner in which this was effected is too remarkable to be paſſed over in ſilence. We have the following account of it from Abul-Pharagius, in his hiſtory of the tenth dynaſty (C). John, ſirnamed the gram-

[e] Strab. ibid. Epiphan. de ponder. & menſur. Tertull. ibid. c. 18. [f] Plut. in Jul. Cæſar. Ammian. Marcellin. l. xxii. c. 16. Dion. Caſſius. l. xlii. p. 202. Liv. apud Senecam de tranquill. Oros. l. vi. c. 15.

(C) The author here quoted was a native of Malatia, a city in Armenia near the ſprings of the Euphrates, and flouriſhed in the thirteenth century. He wrote an abridgment of the hiſtory of the world, from Adam to his own times, which he divided into ten parts or dynaſties; viz. 1ſt, The hiſtory of the antient patriarchs from Adam to Moſes; 2. Of Joſhua and the other judges of Iſrael; 3. Of their kings; 4. Of the Chaldean kings; 5. Of the Magi or Perſians; 6. Of the Greek kings; 7. Of the Romans; 8. Of the Greek emperors of Conſtantinople; 9. Of the Arabian commanders, and here he is more diffuſe than in all the reſt put together; 10. Of the Moguls. He is more to be depended upon in his hiſtory of the Saracens and Tartars than in his accounts grammarian, a famous Peripatetic philoſopher, being at Alexandria, when that city was taken by the Saracens, and in great favour with Amiri-Ebnol-As their general, he begged of him the royal library. Amiri replied, that it was not in his power to grant ſuch a requeſt; but that he would write to the khalif or emperor on that head, ſince, without knowing his pleaſure, he dared not diſpoſe of one ſingle book. He accordingly wrote to Omar, who was then khalif, acquainting him with the requeſt of his friend; and the emperor's anſwer was, that thoſe books, if they contained the ſame doctrine with the Coran, could be of no uſe, becauſe the Coran comprehended all neceſſary truths; but if they contained what was contrary to that book, they ought not to be ſuffered; and therefore he ordered, that, whatever their contents were, they ſhould be all deſtroyed. Purſuant to this order, they were diſtributed among the public baths, where, for the ſpace of ſix months, they ſerved to ſupply the fires of thoſe public places, whereof there was an incredible number at Alexandria. We may, from hence, form a juſt idea of the prodigious multitude of books lodged in that celebrated library. Thus this ineſtimable treaſure of knowledge, which had been founded by a Macedonian prince, a great encourager of learning, was utterly deſtroyed by an enthuſiaſtic tyrant, who, by his religion, founded in ignorance and made up of inconſiſtent fables, was inſpired with a brutiſh and irreconcileable hatred to all truth, learning and politeneſs. The muſeum, in the quarter called Bruchion, ſtood after the library adjoining to it was conſumed, and laſted till that whole part of the city was deſtroyed by the emperor Aurelian in his war with the Alexandrians: for Ammianus Marcellinus tells us, that, till the reign of Aurelian, it continued to be the habitation of excellent men, meaning the members of that ſociety, which had been founded by Ptolemy Soter, for the improve-counts of other nations, The learned Edward Pocock tranſlated this work into Latin, and publiſhed his tranſlation in 1663; he had obliged the public in 1650 with an abridgment of the hiſtory of the tenth dynaſty, under the following title, Specimen hiſtoriæ Arabum; ſive Gregorii Abul-Faragii Malatienſis de origine & moribus Arabum ſuccincta narratio. The epitomizer's learned obſervations are worthy peruſing. We cannot imagine what induced Abraham Ecchellenſis to give our author the name of Gregorius Bar Hebræus Syrus (9).

(9) Vide Pocock, Simon, Bayle's Dict. Critiq.

improvement of all uſeful ſciences [g]. Strabo, in his deſcription of this muſeum, ſays [h], that it was a large ſtructure, adjoining to the palace and fronting the harbour; that it was ſurrounded by a portico, where the philoſophers walked and converſed together; that the members of the ſociety were under the government of a preſident, whoſe ſtation was ſo honourable, that, under the Ptolemies, he was always nominated by thoſe princes, and in the Roman times by the emperors; and finally, that within the muſeum was a very large hall, where they all met at their meals; for they were ſupplyed very plentifully with all ſorts of proviſions, the muſeum having been endowed, when firſt founded, with large revenues. Hence Timon the Phliaſian, who was contemporary with Ptolemy Soter the founder of it, uſed to call it the talaron or the coop, denoting thereby, that the philoſophers were fed in the muſeum, and fattened like birds in a coop [i]. The muſeum, as the reader muſt have obſerved from the account which the antients give of it, was an inſtitution of the ſame nature with the colleges of the preſent times; and as to theſe, the kingdoms where they flouriſh, and above all our own, are indebted for the great men they have given to the world, ſo Alexandria owed to its muſeum the many excellent writers it produced. Among theſe we may reckon Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and Athanaſius, who had their education in that city.

The celebrated Demetrius Phalereus was the firſt preſident of this ſeat of learning, and as the library was a part of it, he had, in all likelihood, the books likewiſe under his care. We do not hereby mean what Ariſteas ſeems to inſinuate, viz. that Demetrius was librarian to Ptolemy Soter; for this was too mean an employment for a man of his rank. He had been prince of Athens, and governed that ſtate with abſolute authority for the ſpace of ten years, was a great law-giver, an eminent philoſopher, and the moſt able politician in the age he lived in. The emperor Antoninus ranks him with the greateſt princes of thoſe times, and even puts him upon the level with Philip of Macedon, and his ſon Alexander the Great [k]. To ſay therefore that he was library-keeper to Ptolemy, would be degrading, beyond meaſure, a perſon of his merit and reputation.

[g] Ammian. Marcel. l. xxii. c. 16. p. 343. [h] Strab. l. xvii. p. 793. [i] Athen. l. i. p. 22. [k] Antonin. l. ix. c. 24. de ſeipſo.

tation. Beſides, we find another in this employment under Soter, and likewiſe under his ſon Philadelphus, viz. Zenodotus of Epheſus, who, being by profeſſion a grammarian, was very proper to take care of a library, ſuch perſons being generally choſen in thoſe times for this employment; however, it was not below Demetrius to aſſiſt Ptolemy in what he had ſo much at heart, that is, in founding a muſeum, and making a collection of choice books for the uſe of the learned men who were to live in it; nay, Plutarch tells us, that Demetrius was the firſt who propoſed to the king the founding both of the muſeum and library; and that the king readily embraced the propoſal, as being ſuggeſted by a man, who was equally eminent for his learning and other extraordinary qualifications [1]. The ſame author adds, that Demetrius at firſt adviſed the king to collect only ſuch books as treated of civil policy and government, telling him, that he would find in them better advice and counſels than any of his friends dared to give him. And indeed this is almoſt the only means of conveying truth to princes, and ſhewing them, under borrowed names their duties as well as their faults. When the king had once approved of this excellent advice, and taken proper meaſures for the procuring of all ſuch books as anſwered his firſt deſign, it is very natural to ſuppoſe, that he was thereby led to collect all other ſorts of books, and fill with them the library we have mentioned. Demetrius was charged with the care of collecting theſe books, which was no-ways an employment unworthy of ſo great a man, ſince the king himſelf placed therein all his pleaſure and diverſion; a diverſion ſuitable to the taſte of a prince, who was himſelf a man of eminent learning, and an encourager of it in others (D).

TOWARDS

[1] Plut. apophthegm. regum.

(D) Livy, in ſpeaking of this library, ſtiles it a noble monument of the wealth of the Egyptian kings, and of their commendable attention in propagating knowledge among their ſubjects; but Seneca, with all the ſourneſs of a Cynic, finds fault with Livy for commending it, and even blames the kings who were concerned in that great work. Let Livy, ſays he, and other writers beſtow their elogiums on that great collection of books, and on the princes who promoted it; for my part, I look upon it as a laſting monument of the pride and vanity of thoſe monarchs, who amaſſed ſuch a prodigious number of volumes, not for their uſe but merely for pomp and oſtentation. Let every one purchaſe

ſuch

Ptolemy Soter dies.

TOWARDS the cloſe of this year died Ptolemy Soter, in the eighty-fourth year of his age and forty-firſt of his reign, counting the two years he held the empire in partnerſhip with his ſon. Thoſe writers, who will have him to have reigned only thirty-nine years, follow therein Juſtin, who tells us, that he reſigned his crown to his ſon, and diveſting himſelf of all power and authority, attended on the new king as one of his guards, ſaying, that he thought it a more glorious thing to be the father of a king, than to have a kingdom [m]. Theſe authors, as they do not reckon the two years he lived after his reſignation, allow him to have reigned only thirty-nine years. Lucian [n] and Macrobius [o] tell us, that, in the thirty-eighth year of his reign, he admitted his ſon to ſit on the throne with him, and that the father and ſon reigned jointly two years. According to theſe he reigned in all but forty years. The learned Uſher, whom we have followed, obſerves out of Dionyſius the aſtronomer, that Ptolemy Philadelphus was admitted to reign with his father thirty-nine years after the death of Alexander; and that the ſon, in the ſecond year of their common reign, as Dionyſius ſtiles it, by the death of his father, became the ſole maſter of the Egyptian empire: Whence it is plain, that Ptolemy, according to Dionyſius, who formed a new æra, beginning with the reign of Philadelphus, died in the forty-firſt year after the death of Alexander, and conſequently of his own reign [p]. He was the beſt prince of his race, and left behind him an example of prudence, juſtice, and clemency, which none of his ſucceſſors cared to follow. He retained on the throne the ſame ſimplicity of manners, and averſion to all pomp and oſtentation, [m] Juſtin. l. xvi. c. 2. in Græc. Euſeb. Scalig.

[n] Lucian. in Macrob.
[o] Porphyr.
[p] Vide Claud. Ptolem. in magna ſyntax.

ſuch books only as he intends to peruſe; for others ſerve to feed our vanity, without improving our knowledge (10). But, with Senca's leave, are not public libraries of great uſe? and who but princes can bear the charges that attend them? Public libraries, ſays Clemens of Alexandria, are common treaſures, and thoſe who found them, whether princes or private men, deſerve the greateſt commendations, ſince they deliver, as far as in them lies, their country from one of the greateſt evils, ignorance (11).

(10) Seneca. de tranquil. anim. c, 9.
(11) Clem. Alexand. in Stromat. 6.

tation, which he had ſhewn while in a private ſtation. His ſubjects had at all hours a free acceſs to him, and were ſure to find, in recurring to him, a ſpeedy redreſs of all their grievances. He did not think it below the majeſty of a king to converſe familiarly with the meaneſt of his ſubjects, calling them his true friends, ſince they often told him truths, which his courtiers endeavoured to diſguiſe, without any regard to his or their own reputation. He frequently made public entertainments, on which occaſion he thought it no diſparagement, as Plutarch informs us [q], to borrow his friends plate, having no more of his own than what was neceſſary for his common uſe. When one of his favourites repreſented to him that a ſovereign ought to be better provided, his anſwer was, That the true grandeur of a king conſiſted in enriching others, and not himſelf. In the general diviſion of Alexander's empire, Egypt, Libya, and that part of Arabia which borders upon Egypt, were allotted to Ptolemy, as we have ſaid elſewhere; but that prince held, at the time of his death, the following countries, which we find enumerated by Theocritus [r], viz. Egypt, Phœnice, Arabia, Syria, Libya, Æthiopia, Pamphylia, Cilicia, Lycia, Caria, and ſome of the Cyclades. By Syria is to be underſtood here Cœle-Syria; for all the reſt of that country was then in the poſſeſſion of Seleucus Nicator.

Ptolemy had four wives, viz, 1. Artonis, the daughter of Artabazus, who brought him no children. 2. Thais, who had been formerly one of Alexander's concubines, by whom Ptolemy had Leontiſcus, or, as Juſtin calls him, Lenticus, Lagus, and Irene. Irene married, as Athenæus informs us [s], Solon king of Cyprus. 3. Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater, who bore him two ſons, viz. Ptolemy, ſirnamed Ceraunus, and another whoſe name has not been tranſmitted to us and as many daughters, viz. Ptolemais and Lyſandra. Ceranus, being excluded by his father from the ſucceſſion, fled to the court of Seleucus Nicator, who received him in a very friendly manner, and entertained him and his numerous retinue at a vaſt charge; but the wicked wretch, having no ſenſe of gratitude for the many favours conferred on him by Seleucus, conſpired againſt his benefactor, and treacherouſly murdered him, as we have related in the hiſtory of Syria. On the death of Seleucus he ſeized the kingdom of Macedon, which which that prince had won a few months before from Lyſimachus, who had been killed in the battel of Cerupodion in Phrygia; but as Ceraunus did not expect to enjoy the dominions of Lyſimachus in peace, ſo long as his children and Arſinoe his queen were alive, he reſolved to put them to death, and thereby free himſelf from the apprehenſions they gave him. That princeſs was half-ſiſter to Ceraunus, being the daughter of Ptolemy Soter by Berenice; but nevertheleſs, as ſhe was well acquainted with the cruel, ambitious, and treacherous temper of her brother, ſhe had on the death of Seleucus, conveyed both herſelf and her children out of his reach. Hereupon Ceraunus, feigning a paſſion for his ſiſter, offered to marry her, ſnch inceſtuous marriages being allowed in Egypt, and to adopt the two ſons ſhe had by Lyſimachus. Arſinoe rejected at firſt the propoſal, fearing it might prove fatal both to herſelf and children; but Ceraunus, to remove all ſuſpicion, repaired to a temple which the Macedonians held in the greateſt veneration, and there, in the preſence of one of her intimate friends, called the tutelary gods of the country to witneſs the ſincerity of his intentions, and at the ſame time embracing their ſtatues, proteſted with the moſt dreadful oaths and imprecations, that he had nothing in view but the wellfare of his ſiſter and her children. Theſe proteſtations, made before the altars, and ratified with the awful ſeal of religion, prevailed upon Arſinoe to conſent to the marriage, which was accordingly celebrated with the greateſt magnificence, and all poſſible marks of an unaffected joy and tenderneſs. Ceraunus placed the diadem on his ſiſter's head, and declared her queen in the preſence of the whole army. Arſinoe, overjoyed to ſee herſelf ſo glorioufly reſtored to the high ſtation, from which ſhe had fallen by the death of Lyſimachus her firſt huſband, invited Ceraunus to reſide with her in her own city of Caſſandria, repairing thither herſelf the firſt to make the neceſſary preparations for his reception. Ceraunus made the moſt pompous and ſolemn entry that had ever been ſeen in thoſe parts, the public and private houſes being very magnificently adorned, and the ſtreets thronged with incredible multitudes of people in their beſt appaerel, who flocked from all parts to congratulate their new king on his acceſſion to the crown. The two ſons of Arſinoe, viz. Lyſimachus and Philip, the one ſixteen years of age and the other thirteen, marched out of the city with crowns on their heads to meet their father-in-law, who received and embraced them with all the ſeeming tenderneſs that could be ſhewn by the fondeſt of fathers. They conducted him into the city, among Marries his ſiſter Arſinoe.

His iſſue.

Ptolemy Ceraunus aſſaſſinates Seleucus Nicator, and ſeizes the kingdom of Macedon.

[q] Plut. apophtheg, p. 181. [r] Theocrit. Idyll 17. [s] Athen. l. xiii. c. 13.

among the loud acclamations of the multitude, and, together with their mother Arſinoe, put him in poſſeſſion of the citadel; and then the perjured traitor, having nothing to fear, cauſed the two young princes to be murdered in the very boſom of their mother, to whom they had fled for refuge; and ſtripping her of all ſhe poſſeſſed, cauſed her to be dragged out of the city, and then baniſhed her into Samothrace, allowing her only two women to attend her [u]; but providence did not ſuffer ſuch enormous crimes to go long unpuniſhed; for the very next year he was taken priſoner by the Gauls, who had invaded Macedon, and on his being known, tore in pieces; a death which his wickedneſs and treachery well deſerved [w]; for it is plain from what we have related of him, that he was a man of a moſt wicked and perfidious temper, and his behaviour ſufficiently juſtifies his father Ptolemy Soter for having excluded him from the crown, that prince having, without all doubt, been well acquainted with his brutal diſpoſition.

Murders her children by Lyſimachus.

His death.

THE brother of Ceraunus by Eurydice was put to death by Philadelphus, for ſtirring up the inhabitants of Cyprus to rebellion [x]; and his two ſiſters, Ptolemais and Lyſandra were married, the former to Demetrius Poliorcetes, and the other to Agathocles the ſon of Lyſimachus. Ptolemy Soter's fourth wife was Berenice, by whom he had Ptolemy ſirnamed Philadelphus, and Argæus, with two daughters Arſinoe, whom we have mentioned above, and Philotera. Philadelphus ſucceeded his father, and reigned in Egypt. Argæus was put to death by Philadelphus, for having formed a conſpiracy againſt him. Of Arſinoe we have ſpoke already, and ſhall have occaſion to mention her anon. All we know of Philotera is, that ſhe gave her name to a city built in Troglodytis by one Satyrus, whom Philadelphus had ſent thither to take care of his elephants [y].

Ptolemy Philadelphus became, by the death of his father, ſole maſter of Egypt, and the many countries we have mentioned above; and then it was that he vented his rage againſt Demetrius Phalereus, which he had carefully concealed during his father's life-time. We have obſerved above, that Ptolemy Soter was prevailed upon by his wife Berenice to diſinherit the ſons of Eurydice, who were the firſt-born, and place

Ptolemy Philadelphus.

[u] Juſtin. l. xxiv. c. 2——4. Memnon. excerpt. apud. Phot. c. 15. [w] Juſtin. l. xxiv. c. 5. [x] Paus. in Attic. [y] Strabo, l. xvi. p. 132.

place the crown on the head of Philadelphus her ſon. When Ptolemy propoſed this to Demetrius, and aſked his advice about the choice of a ſucceſſor, that unbiaſſed counſellor is ſaid to have, in the firſt place, diſſuaded him from parting with the crown in his life-time, telling him, that if he once gave it away, he would never be able to recover it, but be obliged to live like other ſubjects, in an entire dependence on the capricious humours of his children, which he ſaid, would prove inſupportable to a man of his years, who had been ſo long accuſtomed to command. This ſeaſonable advice made him change his mind, and reſolve to take one of his ſons for his partner, inſtead of diveſting himſelf of the whole power; and in this choice he adviſed again with Demetrius, who earneſtly preſſed him to prefer the children of Eurydice to thoſe of Berenice, being moved thereunto both by his love to juſtice, the children of Eurydice being the firſt-born, and by the affection which he bore to them for the ſake of Caſſander his deceaſed friend, whoſe ſiſter Eurydice was [z]; but Soter, tho' in all other things he willingly followed the advice of Demetrius, was prevailed upon, by the great aſcendant Berenice had gained over him, not to hearken to his counſels in this important affair; but, contrary to his opinion, to appoint Philadelphus his partner in the kingdom, and ſucceſſor to the crown after his death. The advice given by Demetrius greatly provoked Berenice and her ſon; but neither of them expreſſed any diſpleaſure againſt him till Soter was dead; and then the king commanded him to be ſeized, and carried, under a ſtrong guard, to a remote fortreſs, to be kept there under cloſe confinement, till he ſhould determine what further puniſhment to inflict upon him; but, in the mean-time, the accidental bite of an aſp put an end to the life of this great man, whoſe extraordinary learning and other qualifications deſerved a far better fate [a].

Death of Demetrius Phalereus.

Ptolemy Philadelphus marries his ſiſter Arſinoe.

AFTER the death of Ptolemy Ceraunus, Arſinoe, whom he had confined to Samothrace, left the place of her baniſhment, and retired into Egypt to Ptolemy Philadelphus her brother, who falling in love with her, married her, after he had divorced another Arſinoe, the daughter of Lyſimachus, whom he had married on his acceſſion to the crown [b]. The reaſon why Ptolemy parted with his firſt wife, was her being ing convicted of entering into a conſpiracy againſt him; for Arſinoe the wife, finding that he was in love with his ſiſter, and, on that account, neglected her, entered into a plot with Chryſippus her phyſician, and ſeveral others, to cut him off; but the treaſon being diſcovered, all the others, who had any hand in it, were put to death, and Arſinoe confined to a province of the Upper Egypt bordering upon Æthiopia, there to end her days, after ſhe had brought to Philadelphus two ſons and a daughter, of whom the eldeſt ſucceeded his father, and was known by the name of Euergetes. Arſinoe being thus removed, Ptolemy married the other Arſinoe his ſiſter, who, tho' now paſt child-bearing, had ſuch charms to engage his affections, that he never married any other. In the epiſtle which Eleazar the high-prieſt of the Jews wrote according to Ariſteas, to Ptolemy Philadelphus, ſhe is honoured with the title of queen, and, at the ſame time, called the king's ſiſter.

[z] Diog. Laert. in Demet. Cic. de Finib. l. v. Ælian. Hiſt. Var. l. iii. c. 7. [a] Juſtin. l. xvii. Cic. in orat. pro C. Rabir. [b] Theocrit. Scholiaſt. Paus. in Atticis.

Sends Embaſſadors to Rome.

THE Romans having obliged Pyrrhus king of Epirus, after a ſix years war, to abandon Italy, and return with diſgrace into his own country, their name began to be of great fame among foreign nations; whereupon Ptolemy Philadelphus, deſiring to enter into an alliance with them, ſent an embaſſy to Rome for that purpoſe. This was the firſt time that any Egyptians had appeared at Rome; whence the ſenate was overjoyed to ſee foreigners come ſo far to court the friendſhip of their republic, whoſe dominions were yet confined within a narrow compaſs. As they had then ſcarce any thing to recommend them but their virtue, and an obliging behaviour to their allies, they did not ſuffer themſelves to be outdone in politeneſs and civility; but immediately diſpatched into Egypt four embaſſadors, choſen with the utmoſt circumſpection by the ſenate, whoſe chief point in view was to maintain the reputation they had gained in a foreign court. Q. Fabius Gurges was at the head of the embaſſy, and ſo far from being of an avaricious temper, that in his youth, he had been greatly blamed for his prodigality. His three companions were Q. Ogulinus, and two brothers of the Fabian family, being deſcended from the Fabius who was ſirnamed Pictor, or the Painter, becauſe he had painted the temple of the goddeſs of health. Ogulinus indeed was a plebeian, but had enjoyed great employments. At Ptolemy's court they met with a reception ſuitable to their rank, and worthy of ſo great a prince. He gave them a ſplendid entertainment, and took that opportunity to preſent each of them with a crown of gold, which they accepted, being unwilling to disoblige him by declining the honour which he intended to confer upon them; but the very next morning they crowned with them the statues of the king, which were erected in the public places of the city. This contempt of riches gained the Romans great reputation in Egypt; however, the king would not suffer the embassadors to depart without new presents, both for their republic and themselves; but they shewed the same disinterestedness at Rome, depositing all their presents in the public treasury, before they appeared in the senate to give an account of their embassy, declaring thereby, that they desired no other advantage from the service of the public than the honour and satisfaction of discharging it well [c]. Ptolemy, remembring twenty years after the alliance he had made with the Romans, returned the following answer to the Carthaginian embassadors, when they desired him to lend their republic two thousand talents, which they promised to return after the war was ended which they were then engaged in with the Romans; I will assist you against enemies, or indifferent persons; but cannot, without breach of fidelity, lend one friend any aid against another [d]. Hence it appears, that he had made alliances with Carthage and Rome.

Enters into an alliance with the Lacedæmonians and Athenians against Antigonus Gonatus.

AFTER the death of Pyrrhus, Antigonus Gonatus king of Macedon having made himself very formidable to the states of Greece, the Athenians and Lacedæmonians entered into a confederacy against him, and prevailed upon Ptolemy to accede to it. Whereupon Antigonus laid siege to Athens; for the relief of which city Ptolemy immediately sent a fleet under the command of Patroclus, who, not being able to persuade Areus king of Lacedæmon to attack the enemy with their united forces, was obliged, for want of provisions, to sail back with his fleet to Egypt without even attempting to relieve the city. By this misunderstanding between the two commanders, the city of Athens fell into the hands of Antigonus, as we have related in the history of Greece. Patroclus having, on his return into Egypt, touched at Caunus, a maritime city of Caria, found there the poet Sotades, famous for the unbounded licence both of his muse and manners. He had wrote a virulent satire against Ptolemy, full of cutting ting reflections on his marriage with Arſinoe his own ſiſter, and fled from Alexandria to avoid the indignation of the provoked prince; but Patroclus having thus met him in his flight, thought he could not better recommend himſelf to his maſter's favour, than by making an example of a wretch who had abuſed him in ſuch an inſolent manner; accordingly he cauſed him to be wrapped up in a ſheet of lead, and thrown into the ſea, a puniſhment which he well deſerved [e] (E).

[c] Liv. l. xiv. Val. Max. l. iv. c. 3. Dio. in excerpt. Ursini. Eutrop. l. ii. Justin. l. xviii. c. 2. Zonar. l. vii. c. 6. [d] Eutrop. l. ii. Oros. l. iv. c. 9.

The revolt of Magas. Year of the flood 2736. Year before Chriſt 263.

THE long peace and tranquillity which Ptolemy had enjoyed, was unexpectedly diſturbed by the revolt of Magas, whom the king had ever looked upon as one of his beſt and moſt truſty friends. He was half-brother to him, being the ſon of Berenice by one Philip a Macedonian officer, who had been her huſband before ſhe married Ptolemy Soter. As Berenice had a great aſcendant over the king her huſband, ſhe prevailed upon him to give the government of Libya and Cyrene to her ſon Magas, who having ſtrengthened himſelf in thoſe provinces by long poſſeſſion, and likewiſe by his marriage with Apamea the daughter of Antiochus Soter king of Syria, not only endeavoured to render himſelf independent in his government, but even to diſpoſſeſs his brother of the kingdom of Egypt. With this view he advanced, at the head of a numerous army, towards Alexandria, and made himſelf maſter of Paretonion on his march thither; but, as he was proceeding farther, he was obliged to drop the enterprize, and return home, upon certain intelligence, that the Marmarides, a people of Libya, had revolted from him

[e] Athen. l. xiv. p. 620.

(E) This infamous poet is commonly known by the nick-name of Sotades Cinœdus, or Sotades the pæderaſt, which was given him, not only becauſe he was notoriouſly addicted to that monſtrous and abominable vice, bnt more eſpecially for having wrote in iambics a poem in commendation of it, which was in great repute among thoſe, who, like himſelf, were addicted to that unnatural ſort of luſt. Some writers have, not with good grounds, in that verſe of Juvenal (12), Inter Socraticos notiſſima foſſa cinœdos, inſtead of Socraticos, read Sotadicos, being of opinion, that this alteration in the text was made by ſuch as were given to that vice, which they thought, might deſerve ſome excuſe, if they could perſuade the world, that Socrates, a philoſopher of great credit was addicted to it.

(12) Juvenal. ſatir. 2. ver. 10.

him. Ptolemy, who was then with a great body of troops on the frontiers of Egypt, had a favourable opportunity of falling upon him in his retreat, and utterly destroying his army; but was, by a like revolt at home, prevented from laying hold of it; for having taken into his service four thousand Gauls, he was informed that they had entered into a conspiracy, intending nothing less than to drive him out of Egypt, and seize it for themselves. To prevent this, he hastened back into Egypt, and having drawn the conspirators into an island in the Nile, he there shut them up so effectually, that they all perished, either with famine, or with one another's swords, to avoid that lingering kind of death [f]. Magas had no sooner quelled the troubles which had obliged him to return home, but he renewed his designs upon Egypt, and in order to succeed therein more effectually, he engaged in the same war Antiochus Soter his father-in-law. The measures agreed upon between them were, that Antiochus should invade the teritories of Ptolemy on one side, and Magas on the other; but while the king of Syria was making the necessary preparations for this invasion, Ptolemy, who had private intelligence of his designs, sent forces into all the maritime provinces of Syria, which committed every-where such ravages and devastations, as obliged that prince to keep at home, for the defence of his own dominions; and Magas, without his assistance, did not think it advisable to make any further attempts [g].

The advantageous measures taken by Ptolemy for the improvement of trade.

Ptolemy being thus delivered from the apprehension of a war, bent his mind on advancing the riches of his kingdom, by drawing to it all the trade of the east, which the Tyrians had to this time carried on by sea to Elath, and from thence, by the way of Rhinocorura, to Tyre. These were both sea-port towns, Elath on the east-side of the Red-sea, and Rhinocorura at the bottom of the Mediterranean, between Egypt and Palestine; so that through them all the wares of Persia, India, Africa and Arabia centered at Tyre, and were from thence carried into all the western countries. By this means the Tyrians were grown exceeding rich, having engrossed, while subject to the Persian kings, this whole trade. To draw it into Egypt, Ptolemy built a city on the west-side of the Red-sea, from whence he sent out fleets into all those countries to which the Tyrians traded from Elath; but but obſerving that the Red-ſea, towards the bottom, was very dangerous, by reaſon of its rocks and ſhelves, he transferred the trade to another city, which he built at as great diſtance as he could from that part of the ſea, placing it almoſt on the frontiers of Æthiopia, and calling it from his mother Berenice; but the harbour not being convenient, Myos Hormos, a city in that neighbourhood, was preferred, and all the commodities of the above-mentioned countries conveyed thither by ſea, and from thence on camels to Coptus on the Nile, where they were again ſhipped for Alexandria, and from that city diſperſed all over the weſt, in exchange for the merchandize which was afterwards exported to the eaſt. By this means the whole trade being fixed at Alexandria, that place became the chief mart of all the traffic that was carried on between the eaſt and the weſt, and continued to be the greateſt empory in the world for above ſeventeen hundred years, till another paſſage was found out by the cape of Good-hope; but as the road from Coptus to the Red-ſea lay croſs the deſarts, where no water could be had, nor any convenience of towns or houſes for the lodging of paſſengers, Ptolemy, to remedy both theſe evils, cauſed a canal to be opened along the great road, into which he conveyed the water of the Nile, and built on it houſes at proper diſtances; ſo that all paſſengers found every night convenient lodgings, and neceſſary refreſhments for themſelves and their beaſts of burden [h]. As Ptolemy intended to engroſs the whole trade of the eaſt and weſt to himſelf, he fitted out two great fleets to protect his trading ſubjects. One of theſe he kept in the Red-ſea, and the other in the Mediterranean. The latter was very numerous, and had ſeveral ſhips of extraordinary ſize; two of them in particular were of thirty oars on a ſide, one of twenty, four of fourteen, two of twelve, fourteen of eleven, thirty of nine, thirty-ſeven of ſeven, five of ſix, ſeventeen of five, and, beſides theſe, an incredible number of veſſels with four oars and three oars on a ſide. With theſe fleets he not only maintained and protected the trade, but alſo kept in ſubjection, as long as he lived, moſt of the maritime provinces of Aſia Minor, namely, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Caria and the Cyclades [i].

[f] Pausan. in Atticis. [g] Idem. ibid.

[h] Strabo, l. xvii. p. 805. Plin. l. vi. c. 23. [i] Strabo. ibid. Theocrit. Idyll. 17. Appian in præfat. Athen. l. v. 203.

An accommodation effected between Magas and Ptolemy.

MAGAS king of Cyrene and Lybia growing old and infirm, expreſſed a deſire of compoſing all differences with his brother Ptolemy; and in order to ſucceed therein, propoſed a marriage between his only daughter Berenice and king Ptolemy's eldeſt ſon promiſing to make over all his dominions to her by way of dowry. The propoſal was accepted by Ptolemy, and a peace concluded on theſe terms [k]; but Magas dying before the execution of the treaty, after he had held the government of Cyrene and Libya for the ſpace of fifty years, his wife Apamea did all that lay in her power to break off the match between her daughter and the ſon of Ptolemy, ſince it had been concluded without her conſent; but her attempts proved unſucceſsful, and only ſerved to kindle a war between Ptolemy and her brother Antiochus Theus king of Syria, which occaſioned a cruel tragedy in the family of the latter, as we have related in the hiſtory of Syria [l].

IN the heat of this war Ptolemy did not give over his ſearch for books wherewithal to enrich his famous library, and likewiſe for pictures and drawings done by eminent maſters, of which he was a great admirer. Aratus, the celebrated Sicyonian, was one of the agents he employed in Greece to collect pictures for him; and that great man gained his favour by this kind of ſervice to ſuch a degree, that the king looked upon him as one of his beſt friends; and, on the Sicyonian's applying to him for his aſſiſtance towards the reſtoring of his native city to liberty and peace, Ptolemy preſented him with an hundred and fifty talents for this purpoſe. The matter is thus related by Plutarch in the life of Aratus; Aratus having expelled Nicocles tyrant of Sicyon, and recalled the exiles, great diſturbances aroſe about the reſtoration of their lands, which were likely to occaſion new diſorders, moſt of thoſe lands having been transferred to other proprietors, and paſſed through ſeveral hands before the exiles returned. Thoſe who had purchaſed them would not part with their purchaſe, unleſs the money, which they had diſburſed, were paid back to them. Hereupon Aratus, having no other way to ſatisfy them, applied to king Ptolemy, and that generous prince immediately ordered the ſum, which he required to be tranſmitted to Sicyon; by which means every one being ſatisfied, peace and tranquility were reſtored to the city [m].

THE

[k] Juſtin. l. xxvi. c. 3. Vide. Vol. viii. Book. ii. cap. ii. ſect. iv.
[l] Plut. in Arat.

THE troubles and revolutions which happened in the eaſt, induced Antiochus to put an end to the war, which had beeu for ſome time carried on between him and Ptolemy. The particulars of this war have not been tranſmitted to us; but the conditions of the peace agreed to by the contending parties, are related by Polyænus [m], Strabo [n], Athenæus [o], and St. Jerom [p]. One of theſe was, that Antiochus ſhould divorce Laodice, marry Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy, and ſettle the crown on the male iſſue of that marriage. As Antiochus, tho' paſſionately fond of Laodice, ſubmitted to theſe terms, we may conclude from thence, that Ptolemy had gained conſiderable advantages over him. As this marriage was contracted on political views, and founded on very unjuſt conditions, it was attended with thoſe fatal conſequences which we have releated in the hiſtory of Syria [q], to which we refer our readers.

A peace concluded between Ptolemy and Antiochus.

As Ptolemy was a curious collector, not only of books, but alſo of ſtatues, drawings and pictures, he obſerved, while he was in Syria, a ſtatue of Diana in a temple conſecrated to that goddeſs, which he was greatly taken with; and therefore having begged it of Antiochus, carryed it with him into Egypt; but ſoon after his return, Arſinoe his queen being ſeized with a dangerous diſtemper, dreamt, that Diana appearing to her, told her, that Ptolemy had brought the illneſs upon her, by removing out of the temple the above-mentioned ſtatue. Hereupon it was immediately ſent back into Syria, and there replaced in the temple from whence it had been taken. It was accompanied with many rich preſents, and a great many ſacrifices were offered to appeaſe the wrath of the provoked goddeſs; but all to no purpoſe, for the queen's diſtemper was ſo far from abating, that ſhe died of it in a very ſhort time, leaving Ptolemy under the greateſt affliction imaginable; for tho' ſhe was many years older than he, and paſt childbearing when he married her, yet he maintained an inexpreſſible affection and tenderneſs for her to the laſt, and, after her death, did all that lay in his power to perpetuate her memory, calling ſeveral cities which he built by her name, and raiſing obeliſks to her honour, with other monuments to expreſs the great regard he had for her [r]. Of theſe, these the most remarkable was a temple, which he began in Alexandria, with a dome, which was to be lined with loadstone, in order to keep an iron statue of the queen hanging in the air. This was the project of Dinocrates, a famous architect of those times, and it was no sooner proposed to the king, but he commanded it to be put in execution; but, before the work was completed, both the king and the architect died; so that no experiment was made of the virtue and power of loadstones in such a case (F). Ptolemy did not long survive his beloved Arsinoe, for being originally of a tender constitution, which he had moreover weakened by a luxurious manner of life, the infirmities of old age, and the loss of a consort whom he loved beyond measure, sunk him into a languishing distemper, which put an end to his life, in the sixty-third year of his age, and fortieth of his reign [s]. He left behind him two sons and a daughter, whom he had by his first wife Arsinoe the daughter of Lysimachus. Ptolemy surnamed Euergetes, the eldest of his sons, succeeded him in the kingdom; the other, called Lysimachus from his grand-father by the mother, was put to death by his brother, for engaging in a rebellion against him. The name of the daughter was Berenice, whose marriage with Antiochus Theus king of Syria we have related above.

[m] Polyæn. Strat. l. viii. c. 50. [n] Strabo. l. vii. p. 152.
[o] Athen. l. ii. p. 42. [p] Hieronym. in Dan. c. 11 Vide. Vol. vii. Book. ii. Cap. ii. Sect. iv. p. 126. [r] Liban. orat. 11.

Ptolemy Philadelphus dies.

PTOLEMY Philadelphus was without all doubt, a prince endowed with many excellent qualities, and yet we cannot propose him as a perfect model of a good king, his good quali-

His character.

[s] Plin. l. xxxiv. c. 14. Athen. l. xii. c. 10,

(F) Ausonius speaks of this temple as finished by the above-mentioned architect, in the following verses:

Creditor hic forsan fuerit Ptolemaidos aulæ
Dinocrates, quadro cui in fastigia cono
Surgit, & ipsa suas consumit pyramis umbras;
Jussus ob incesti qui quondam fœdus amoris,
Arsinoen Pharii suspendit in aëre templi (13).

It has been long since reported, and even believed by many, that the body of the impostor Mohammed was, after his death laid in an iron coffin, and thus hung in the air by virtue of a loadstone in the roof of the room where it was deposited; but this is a mere fable withuut the least foundation (14).

(13) Auson. Idyll. 9.

(14) Vide Adolph. Verner. in epitom. rer. Turcicar.

qualities being counter-balanced by faults that were altogether as conſiderable. He diſhonoured the beginning of his reign by his reſentment againſt a man of uncommon merit, viz. Demetrius Phalereus, for having given a piece of advice to his father, which was indeed contrary to the intereſt of Philadelphus, but entirely agreeable to the laws of juſtice and equity. He put two of his brothers to death, having, as ſome writers tell us, forged plots in order to give ſome colour of juſtice to his blind jealouſy, which alone prompted him to embrue his hands in their blood; and hence he was ironically called Philadelphus, or a lover of his brothers. He was greatly given to all ſorts of effeminate pleaſures, and entirely neglected all kind of military diſcipline, by which neglect he left the army in a very bad condition, and quite unfit for action. On the other hand, as he was himſelf a prince of great learning, he was a zealous promoter and encourager of it in others, an induſtrious collector of books, and a generous patron of all thoſe, who were eminent in any branch of literature. The fame of his generoſity drew ſeven celebrated poets to his court [s], who, from their number, were called the Pleiades, which are ſeven ſtars in the neck of the bull. Theſe were Aratus, Theocritus, Callimachus, Lycophron, Apollonius, Nicander and Philicus. Theocritus wrote an idyllium, and Callimachus an hymn in praiſe of Philadelphus, which have reached our times. In his court flouriſhed likewiſe Ariſtarchus, a learned grammarian, Manetho the famous Egyptian hiſtorian, Conon and Hipparchus, two celebrated mathematicians, Zenodotus of Epheſus, the firſt who corrected Homer's works, as Suidas informs us, and Ariſtophanes, who, if Vitruvius is to be credited, read over all the books of the Alexandrian library, in the order they ſtood [t]. Zoilus the critic came alſo to his court, and lived ſome time at Alexandria. He had wrote againſt Homer, whoſe works were highly eſteemed and admired by all except himſelf, and had likewiſe criticiſed, in a very biting ſtile, the works of other eminent writers; whence his name grew ſo infamous, that it was afterwards given by way of reproach to all detracting and ill-natured critics; but tho' he was very eminent in his way, and far excelled in criticiſm all who had flouriſhed before him, this could not reconcile Ptole-

[s] Vide Voſſium de hiſtor. Græc. l. i. c. 12.

[t] Vitruv. in præfat. ad lib. vii.

Ptolemy to him, who is ſaid indeed to have admired his wit, but at the ſame time, to have been ſo offended at the bitterneſs of his ſtile, that he would not beſtow any thing upon him, tho' he ſhewed a truly royal generoſity towards all other writers of any wit or learning. Being therefore abhorred by all men, and not relieved by Ptolemy, he died in a miſerable manner. Some ſay he was ſtoned by the enraged multitude; others that he was burnt alive in his houſe; and ſome that he was crucified by Ptolemy for a crime which well deſerved that puniſhment [u]. We have already taken notice of his extraordinary taſte for books, and of his indefatigable induſtry in augmenting and embelliſhing, at an immenſe charge, the library founded by his father; a work which has rendered the names of both theſe princes more famous than the greateſt conqueſts could have done. To Ptolemy Philadelphus we are indebted for the Greek tranſlation of the ſcripture, commonly called the Septuagint, of which we ſhall give a particular account in the hiſtory of the Jews, as in a more proper place. This prince is likewiſe ſaid to have maintained, at a vaſt expence, and ſent into different parts of the world, ſkilful perſons, in ſearch of all ſorts of wiid beaſts, and by that means to have made a great many new diſcoveries relating to the nature of animals [w].

THO' Philadelphus had a peculiar taſte for the ſciences, yet he did not ſuffer them to engroſs his whole attention, but applied himſelf with indefatigable induſtry to buſineſs, ſtudying all poſſible methods to render his ſubjects happy, and raiſe his dominions to a flouriſhing condition. This enticed great multitudes of the neighbouring and moſt diſtant nations to leave their native countries, and ſettle in Egypt; inſomuch, that this prince is ſaid to have had in his dominions no fewer than thirty-three thouſand three hundred and thirty-nine well-peopled cities [x]. As he was well appriſed that the real power of a prince conſiſts in the number and wealth of his ſubjects, the greateſt expences were not capable of diſcouraging him from purſuing ſuch meaſures as were moſt apt to draw inhabitants into his dominions. With this view he built an incredible number of cities, and repaired others, granting many valuable privileges to all, without diſtinction, who came to ſettle in them. Among the latter were the two famous cities of Paleſtine, Ace, which [u] Vitruv. ibid. & Voſſius. de hiſtoric. Græc. l. i. c. 15.

[w] Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. [x] Theo-crit. Idyll. 17.

which he rebuilt on the weſt-ſide of that country, and Rabbah of the children of Ammon, ſo often mentioned in ſcripture, on the eaſt ſide of the ſame province. Ace he called from one of his names Ptolemais, and Rabbah from the other Philadelphia. The former of theſe, which is ſtill ſtanding, in proceſs of time recovered its antient name, and is often ſpoke of in the hiſtory of the holy wars [y]. Beſides this, he left ſo many other public monuments of his magnificence, that all works of an extraordinary taſte and grandeur were proverbially called Philadelphian works [z]. Athenæus calls him the beſt of kings, and the moſt wealthy prince of his age [a]; and truly he died poſſeſſed of immenſe riches, notwithſtanding the great expence he muſt have been at; for he kept two great fleets, one in the Mediterranean, and the other in the Red-ſea, and maintained in conſtant pay an army of two hundred thouſand foot, and forty thouſand horſe, and had three hundred elephants, two thouſand armed chariots, and his armory at Alexandria ſtocked with three hundred thouſand complete ſuits of armour, and all other neceſſary implements and engines of war; but, for all this, he left in his treaſury ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand Egyptian talents in ready money, which reduced to our coin, amounts to a prodigious and almoſt incredible ſum, each Egyptian talent containing ſeven thouſand five hundred drachmas more than an Attic talent [b]. Athenæus therefore called him, not without reaſon, the richeſt of all the princes of the age; and Appian gives him this character, viz. that as he was the moſt magnificent and generous of all kings in laying out his money, ſo was he of all the moſt ſkilful and induſtrious in raiſing of it [c].

Ptolemy Euergetes. Yearafterthe flood, 2755. BeforeChriſt 244

He was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Ptolemy, who, in the beginning of his reign, engaged in a war with Antiochus Theus king of Syria, of which we have given a diſtinct account in the hiſtory of that country [d]. On his return from that war, he brought with him out of Syria two thouſand five hundred pictures and ſtatues, among which were many of the Egyptian idols, which had been carried by Cambyſes, when he conquered Egypt, into Perſia. Theſe Ptolemy reſtored to their antient temples; in acknow-

[y] Vide Reland. Paleſtin. illuſtrat. Sandys, Thevenot, &c.
[z] Philo in vita Moſis [a] Athen. l. v. c. 5. [b] Vide Bernard. de menſur. & ponder. antiquorum. p. 186. & tabulam huic operi præfixam. [c] Appian. in præfat.

knowledgment for which favour the Egyptians gave him the glorious firname of Euergetes, or the Beneficent [e]. In this expedition he made himself master of all the countries that lie between mount Taurus and the confines of India, as we read in Justin [f], Appian [g], Polybius [h], Jerom, &c. [i], with whom the monument of Euergetes, called monumentum Adulitanum, and published at Rome by the celebrated Leo Allatius in 1631 entirely agrees. The words quoted by that writer from the said monument are as follow: Ptolemy Euergetes having received from his father the sovereignty of Egypt, Libya, Syria, Phœnice, Cyprus, Lycia, Caria, and the Cyclades, assembled a mighty army of horse and foot, with a great fleet, and elephants, out of Troglodítica and Æthiopia, some of which had been taken by his father, and the rest by himself; and brought from thence, and trained up for war. With this great force he sailed into Asia, and having conquered all the provinces which lie on this side the Euphrates, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Ionia, the Hellespont and Thrace, he crossed that river with all the forces of the conquered countries, and the kings of those nations, and reduced Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Susia, Persia, Media, and all the country as far as Bactria.

Ptolemy gains great advantages over the king of Syria.

The hair of Berenice.

When Ptolemy Euergetes first set out on his expedition into Syria, his queen Berenice, who tenderly loved him, being apprehensive of the dangers to which he might be exposed in the war, made a vow to consecrate her hair, which was her chief ornament, in case he should return safe. The prince returned not only safe, but crowned with glory and success; whereupon Berenice, to discharge her vow, immediately cut off her hair, and dedicated it to the gods, in the temple which Ptolemy Philadelphus had built in honour of his beloved Arsinoe, under the name of the Zephyrian Venus, on the promontory of Zephyrium in Cyprus; but this consecrated hair being lost soon after, or perhaps contemptuously flung away by the priests, Ptolemy was much offended at this accident, and threatened to punish the priests for their neglect. Hereupon Conon of Samos, a flattering courtier, and great mathemetician, to appease the king's wrath, and gain his favour, gave out, that that the queen's locks had been conveyed up to heaven, and pointed out ſeven ſtars near the tail of the lion, which, till that time, had not belonged to any conſtellation, declaring, that they were the queen's hair. Several other aſtronomers, either to make their court, as well as Conon, to the king, or out of fear of drawing upon themſelves his diſpleaſure, affirmed the ſame thing; and hence coma Berenices, or the hair of Berenice, became one of the conſtellations, and is ſo to this day [k]. Callimachus, who lived in thoſe times, and had been a great favourite of Philadelphus, wrote a hymn on the hair of Berenice, which was afterwards tranſlated by Catullus, whoſe verſion is ſtill extant among his other moſt elegant performances.

[e] Hieron. in Dan. c. 11. & monument. Adulitan. [f] Justin. l. xxvii. c. 1. [g] Appian in Syriac. p. 130. [h] Polyb. l. v. p. 402. [i] Hieron. ibid.

Euergetes offers ſacrifices to the God of Iſrael.

PTOLEMY, on his return from this expedition, having paſſed throgh Jeruſalem, offered there many ſacrifices to the God of Iſrael, in acknowledgment for the victories he had gained over the king of Syria [l], ſhewing thereby, that he preferred the true God to all the idols of Egypt. Perhaps the prophecies in Daniel had been ſhewn to him, whence it was obvious for him to conclude, that his fortunate conqueſts were owing to that God, whoſe prophet had ſo fully and diſtinctly foretold them. Of theſe prophecies we ſpoke in the hiſtory of Syria, to which we refer the reader [m].

Applies himſelf to the improving of his library.

EUERGETES having at laſt concluded a peace with Seleucus king of Syria, who had ſucceeded Antiochus Theus in that kingdom, devoted moſt part of his time to the cultivating of the ſciences, and the improving of his father's library at Alexandria. With this view he ſent perſons of learning into diſtant countries, to purchaſe, at any rate, what books they ſhould think proper for his deſign; but as a ſkilful librarian was neceſſary for the making a good choice, likewiſe for the preſerving of them after they were lodged in the library, upon the death of Zenodotus, who had exerciſed that function from the time of Ptolemy Soter, he invited from Athens Eratoſthenes (G) the Cyrenian, who [k] Hycini. poetic. aſtronom. & Nonnus in hiſtor. ſynag. Joſeph.

[l] in Apion. l. ii. [m] Vide p. vol. viii. book. ii. chap. 2 ſect. 4.

(G) Eratoſthenes had been educated by Callimachus his countryman, and is often quoted by Pliny, Strabo and others, as a man of extraordinary learning; and therefore thoſe are greatly miſtaken, who finding him called Beta, that is, the ſecond, think he had who was a man of universal learning, to take this charge upon him, which he did accordingly, and acquitted himself in it with great applause [n].

The reputation of Joseph, nephew of Onias with Ptolemy.

Onias the high-priest of the Jews, being of a very covetous temper, had neglected to send to Ptolemy the usual tribute of twenty talents, which his predecessors had annually paid to the kings of Egypt, as a token of their subjection to that crown. As the arrears amounted to a great sum; the king sent Athenion, one of his courtiers to Jerusalem to demand the payment of the money, and to acquaint the Jews, if they did not comply immediately with the demand, that he was determined to send a body of troops into Judæa, who should drive them out of the country, and divide it among themselves. When Athenion arrived at Jerusalem with this message, the whole city was thrown into the utmost consternation, not knowing how to appease the king's wrath, and divert the impending storm. At that time Joseph, the nephew of Onias by his sister, was in great repute among the Jews for his prudence, justice, and the sanctity of his life. To him therefore his mother had recourse, and as he was in the country when Athenion came to Jerusalem, he took care to dispatch a messenger to him, with an account of what happened. Hereupon he hastened to Jerusalem, where he severely upbraided his uncle with his ill management of the public had that name to denote, that he was not in the first, but in the second class of the learned; for by that appellation nothing else was meant, but that he was the second librarian of the royal library at Alexandria. As to his knowledge in all the branches of literature, he was inferior to none of the age he lived in, as appears from the great encomiums bestowed by the antients on the many books he wrote; but none of his works have reached us, except his catalogue of the kings of Thebes in Egypt, with the years of their respective reigns, from Menes, who first peopled Egypt after the deluge, to the time of the Trojan war. It contains a series of thirty-eight kings reigning in a direct line of succession one after another, and is still extant in Syncellus. We have made use of it in settling the Egyptian chronology, it being one of the most noble, venerable, and authentic monuments of antiquity now extant, extracted out of the most antient records of that country. This extract was in all likelihood made to supply the defect of Manetho, whose catalogue of the Theban kings begins where this ends (15).

[n] Suidas in voce Απολλωνιος.

(15) Vide Voss. de histor. Græc. Syncell. p. 91——147. Johan. Marsham. in canon. chronic.

ublic money, and told him, that ſince he had brought the nation into ſuch difficulties, the only expedient he could find out to avert the calamities that threatened them, was, that he ſhould go in perſon to the Egyptian court, and endeavour by applying to the king himſelf, to make up matters. But Onias, who was a man of no parts, and beſides ſtricken in years, declared to his nephew, that he would chuſe rather to diveſt himſelf of the high-prieſthood, and live a private life, than undertake ſuch a journey, and appear at court. Joſeph therefore, who was a young man of extraordinary parts, and great addreſs, offered to go in his ſtead; which Onias conſenting to with great pleaſure, Joſeph having aſſembled the people, acquainted them, that he had been appointed by the high-prieſt embaſſador to the court of Egypt, and aſſured them, that, if they thought fit to confirm him in this charge, he ſhould ſoon, by ſome means or other, deliver them from their preſent fears. The people, with loud ſhouts of joy, approved the appointment of the high-prieſt, returned Joſeph thanks for what he intended to do in their behalf, and deſired him to proceed without delay to the court of Egypt. Hereupon Joſeph went immediately to invite Athenion to his houſe, where he not only entertained him with great kindneſs and ſplendor, all the time he ſtaid at Jeruſalem, but, on his departure, made him very conſiderable preſents, which the Syrian was ſo pleaſed with, that he left Jeruſalem, fully determined to do all that lay in his power in behalf of the Jews, and to repreſent matters to the king in the beſt light the caſe would bear. Accordingly, on his return to Alexandria, he made ſo favourable a report to the king of his tranſactions at Jeruſalem, and of the kind and obliging deportment of Joſeph, that Ptolemy ſhewed a great deſire to ſee him. In the mean time Joſeph, having borrowed twenty thouſand drachmas of the Samaritans, which amount to about ſeven hundred pounds of our money, and thereby furniſhed himſelf with an equipage to appear at the Egyptian court, ſet out for Alexandria, and having met on his way thither ſeveral of the chief nobility of Cæle-Syria and Paleſtine, who were travelling to the ſame place, he joined them in the remaining part of his journey. Their buſineſs at that court was, to offer terms for farming the revenues of thoſe provinces; and as their equipages were very magnificent, they laughed at Joſeph for the meanneſs of his, making it the ſubject of their diverſion moſt part of the way. Joſeph took all in good part, but in the mean time hearkening to the con-verſation they had with each other about their buſineſs at court, he got ſuch an inſight into it, as put him in a condition to laugh at them in his turn. On their arrival at Alexandria, they found, that the king had taken a progreſs to Memphis, and Joſeph was the only perſon among them who ſet out for that city to wait on him. As he was haſtening thither, he had the good fortune to meet him returning from Memphis, with the queen and Athenion in the ſame chariot. The king, who had heard great commendations of him from Athenion, was overjoyed to ſee him; and, taking him into his chariot, complained to him in a friendly manner of his uncle Onias, who had, for ſeveral years, neglected to pay him the uſual tribute. But Joſeph excuſed his uncle on account of his great age and ſlender parts in ſo handſome a manner, that he not only ſatisfied the king, but raiſed in him ſuch an opinion of his abilities, that he took him into his favour, allowed him an apartment in the royal palace, and entertained him at his own table. When the day came, wherein the king uſed annually to farm out the revenues of the ſeveral provinces of his empire, and they were ſet up in order to be lett to the beſt bidder, the Syrians and Phœnicians, who had been Joſeph's fellow-travellers, offered no more than eight thouſand talents for the provinces of Cœle-Syria, Phœnice, Judæa, and Samaria. Hereupon Joſeph, who had diſcovered from their converſation on the road, that they were worth more than double the ſum they offered, reproached them for depreciating the king's revenues in that manner, and proffered ſixteen thouſand talents, beſides the forfeitures, which he propoſed to return into the king's treaſury, tho' they had ever before belonged to the farmers. Ptolemy was well pleaſed to ſee his revenues ſo conſiderably increaſed; but queſtioning the ability of the bidder to make good his engagement, aſked him what ſecurity he could give him for the performance of his agreement. To this queſtion Joſeph anſwered, that he would give him the ſecurity of ſuch perſons as he could not refuſe or except againſt; and when he was ordered to name them, he named the king and the queen, adding that they would be bound to each other for the faithful performance of what he undertook. The king was ſo taken with the pleaſantry of this anſwer, that he entruſted him on his own word, without any other ſecurity. Hereupon Joſeph, having borrowed at Alexandria five hundred talents to pay the king his uncle's arrears, was admitted to the truſt of receiver-general general of all the revenues in the above mentioned provinces; and having received a guard of two thouſand men to ſupport him in the execution of his office, he left Alexandria, in order to act in his new ſtation. On his arrival at Aſkelon, the inhabitants of that city not only refuſed to pay him the king's duties, but abuſed him with rude and opprobrious language. Whereupon having ordered his guards to apprehend the ringleaders of that tumult, he cauſed twenty of them to be immediately executed, and ſent their forfeited eſtates, which amounted to a thouſand talents, to the king. The ſame rigour he practiſed at Scythopolis, where he had met with the like oppoſition; which ſo terrified the reſt of the cities, that they all opened their gates to him, and readily paid the king's dues. His prudent conduct, and the punctuality of his payments, gained him ſuch favour at court, that he was continued in his office by Ptolemy Euergetes, Ptolemy Philopator, and Ptolemy Epiphanes, for the ſpace of two and twenty years, that is, till Antiochus the Great making himſelf maſter of theſe provinces, annexed them to the crown of Syria, which happened in the firſt year of the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes[o]. Moſt authors write, that he continued in this office to his death; but herein they plainly contradict Joſephus, who tells us, that he died very old; nay, that he was of a great age when he ſent his ſon Hyrcanus into Egypt, which happened ſome years before his death[p]; and on the other hand ſays, that he was a young man when he firſt entered upon this employment[q]. Now, if he was young at that time, he could not be old twenty-two years after; for allowing him to have been thirty when he was raiſed to that employment, two and twenty more would make him but fifty-two; at which age he could not be called an old man, and much leſs before it. After Antiochus had held the provinces of Cœle- Syria and Paleſtine ſeveral years, he is ſaid to have reſtored them again to Epiphanes, on his marrying his daughter Cleopatra. Perhaps Joſeph was then reſtored to his office, and died in it, being at that time, as Joſephus tells us, very old. This, if true, would clear up all the difficulties which ſome writers have ſtarted againſt the account Joſephus gives us of this matter.

[o] Joſeph. Antiq. l. 12. c. 3. & Græc. Euſeb. Scalig. p. 50.
[p] Idem ibid. c. 4. [q] Idem ibid.

Ptolemy's conquests.

PTOLEMY, having concluded a peace with Seleucus king of Syria, applied himself to the enlarging of his dominions southward, and was therein attended with great success; for he made himself master of all the coasts of the Red-sea, both on the Arabian and Æthiopian sides, down to the streights, through which that sea discharges itself into the southern ocean. The cities and provinces which he subdued in this glorious expedition were, according to Leo Allatius in his monumentum Adulitanum, Agama, Sigsiene, Tiamus, Gambela, Maga, Zingabe, Angavis, Tiama, Athagotis, Calea, Semena, Lazinazaa, Bega, Thancaitis, &c. Most of these provinces bordered upon Æthiopia, and as they were under no apprehension of an invasion, Ptolemy, without much loss or trouble, reduced them, and, having garrisoned the fortified towns returned to Alexandria with an immense booty, which he generously divided among the soldiers who had attended him in that expedition [r]. Upon his return, the Cloemenic war being kindled in Greece, the Achæans sent embassadors to him, imploring his assistance against the Ætolians and Lacedæmonians, which he readily promised them; but they having, in the mean time, engaged Antigonus king of Macedon to support them, Ptolemy was so much offended at these proceedings, that he sent powerful succours to Cleomenes king of Sparta hoping by that means to humble both the Achæans and their new ally Antigonus; but he had the mortification to see Cleomenes, after he had gained very considerable advantages over the enemy's united forces, entirely defeated in the famous battle of Selasia, and obliged to take refuge in his dominions. Phylarchus writes, that, about ten days before this battle, there arrived in Greece embassadors from Ptolemy to Cleomenes, acquainting him, that their master had no mind to send him any further supplies of money, and advising him, in his name, to come to a speedy agreement with Antigonus and the Achæans; and that thereupon Cleomenes, tho' encamped in a very advantageous post, challenged Antigonus to an engagement in the open field [s]. Be that as it will, Ptolemy received him with all possible demonstrations of kindness and esteem, allowed him a yearly pension of four and twenty talents, and assured him, that in due time Assists Cleomenes king of Sparta, against Antiochus Dosson and the Achæans.

[r] Leo Allat. in monument. Adulitan.

[s] Vide Polyb. l. 2. versus finem.

time he would uſe his utmoſt efforts to replace him on the throne. But Ptolemy, before he could fulfil his promiſe, died in the twenty-ſeventh year of his reign, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Ptolemy Philopator [t]. Ptolemy Euergetes was a no leſs generous encourager of learning than his father and grandfather had been; for he applied himſelf with the ſame care and attention to the enlarging of his library and purchaſing of books at an immenſe charge, invited with ample rewards to his court all thoſe who were of any note for their learning, and took great pleaſure in improving his own knowledge by their converſation; for he was himſelf, as Athenæus informs us [u], well verſed in all the branches of learning, having been brought up by the famous Ariſtarchus, and he even wrote in his youth hiſtorical commentaries, which were in great repute. He was the laſt of his race, in whom any virtue, humanity, or moderation appeared, thoſe who ſucceeded him being deſtitute of all true virtue, and plunged in all manner of vice, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory. We are told by Tacitus, that, in this king's reign a phœnix was ſeen at Heliopolis in Egypt, drawing after her great flocks of other birds, which were taken with her beauty [w]. His death and character

PTOLEMY Philopator, the ſon of Ptolemy Euergetes and Berenice, ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Egypt, and proved a moſt debauched and wicked prince. Juſtin tells us, that he was ironically called Philopator, that is, Lover of his father, becauſe he murdered him in order the ſooner to aſcend the throne [x]. But upon what authority Juſtin affirms this, we know not; Polybius, who flouriſhed ſoon after the reign of this prince, tells us, that Ptolemy Euergetes fell ſick and died, without mentioning any violence uſed either by his ſon or others [y]. It is certain, that this Ptolemy, on ſeveral coins which have reached us, bears the title of Philopator; and who can believe, that, if it had been given him by antipharſis or a contrary meaning, as Juſtin will have it, he would have ſuffered it to be impreſſed on the coins, and tranſmitted to poſterity? He was alſo ſirnamed Tryphon, from the effeminate life he led, and Gallus, becauſe he uſed to walk a- Ptolemy Philopator. Year of the flood 2782. Before Chriſt 217.

[t] Plut. in Cleom. Polyb. l. ii. p. 155. [u] Athen. l. ii. c. 33. [w] Tacit. Annal. l. vi. [x] Juſtin. l. xxix. c. 1. [y] Polyb. l. ii. verſus finem.

bout the ſtreets on the Bacchanal ſolemnities, or feaſts of Bacchus, with a crown of ivy on his head, after the manner of the Galli, or prieſts of the goddeſs Cybele [z]. In the very beginning of his reign he cauſed his brother Magas to be murdered, being prompted thereto by Soſibius his prime miſter, who repreſented Magas as a man of great intereſt in the army, who might one day raiſe troubles in the kingdom, and even, with the aſſiſtance of the foreign troops who ſerved in Egypt and were entirely at his devotion, place the crown on his own head [a]. The death of Magas was ſoon followed by that of Cleomenes king of Sparta. That prince, being driven out of Greece by Antigonus, as we have related above, had fled to Ptolemy Euergetes, and had been kindly received by him. But Philopator treated him in a very different manner, eſpecially after he had got rid of his brother Magas, who gave him no ſmall umbrage. As Cleomenes was generally eſteemed a man of great wiſdom and ſagacity, Soſibius, who was Ptolemy's prime miniſter, employed him in the beginning of that prince's reign, and admitted him into his moſt ſecret counſels, even imparting to him his deſign of cutting off Magas and aſking his advice about it. Cleomenes did all that lay in his power to diſſuade the king from ſuch an attempt, telling him, that he had not in his court a more zealous perſon for his ſervice, nor one who was more capable of aſſiſting him with good advice in the well-governing of his kingdom. This quieted Ptolemy for ſome time, but his fears and jealouſies being revived by the artful Soſibius, Magas, notwithſtanding the advice of Cleomenes, was cut off; and the king, after his death thinking himſelf ſecure, devoted all his time to pleaſures and diverſions, not ſuffering them to be interrupted by cares or application of any kind. His example was followed by the courtiers, who abandoned themſelves to all manner of vice and licentiouſneſs, ſo that, all buſineſs being neglected, the kingdom fell, as it were, into a kind of anarchy. In the mean time Cleomenes, who led a melancholy life at ſo vicious a court, received advice, that Antigonus king of Macedon was dead, that the Achæans were engaged in a war with the Ætolians, and that the Lacedæmonians had joined the latter againſt the Achæans and Macedonians. As he was not able to bear any longer the diſſolute manners of Puts his brother Magas to death.

[z] Plut. in Cleom. Polyb. l. v. Trog. in prolog. Plin. l. vii.
[a] Polyb. l. v. p. 380.——382.

of the Egyptians, and all things ſeemed to recal him to his native country, he repreſented to the king the ſtate of his affairs, and put him in mind of his former promiſes; for Ptolemy had promiſed, while he apprehended the power of his brother Magas, to ſend him back into Greece with a powerful fleet and reſtore him to his kingdom. Finding that Ptolemy would not grant him his requeſt, he deſired him at leaſt to give him and his followers leave to depart, ſince he could not hope for a more favourable conjuncture, than that which now offered, for the recovery of his kingdom. But Ptolemy was too much taken up with his pleaſures to come to any reſolution touching the requeſt of Cleomenes. Soſibius, who governed the kingdom with an abſolute ſway, while the king was immerſed in pleaſures and debauches, having aſſembled his friends to deliberate on the requeſt of Cleomenes, it was concluded in that council, that the king of Sparta ſhould not only be denied the ſuccours he demanded, but even leave to depart the kingdom. As Antigonus was dead, and Cleomenes had no rival in Greece who could withſtand him, they were afraid, leſt he ſhould invade Egypt, after having recovered his own dominions; for he was thoroughly acquainted with the ſtate of their affairs, and had the king and his miniſters in the utmoſt contempt. On theſe conſiderations it was not thought proper to grant Cleomenes the aſſiſtance he deſired, or even to permit him to leave Egypt. For, as he was a bold and enterprizing prince and had been refuſed the ſuccours he demanded, they did not doubt, but he would one day or other, if allowed to return to his kingdom, revenge the affront which had been put upon him. Soſibius was even of opinion, that he ſhould not be allowed his liberty in Alexandria; and accordingly by the king's orders he was ſeized and kept under confinement, as we have related in the hiſtory of Sparta, till, in concert with his friends who uſed to viſit him, he came to a reſolution, which deſpair alone could ſuggeſt; this was to eſcape out of priſon with all his domeſtics and friends, and to ſtir up the people of Alexandria to ſhake off the yoke they groaned under. But not ſucceeding in this attempt, he and his followers cloſed it by a tragical and bloody cataſtrophe, killing one another to avoid a more cruel and ignominious death [b]. For a more full account of the unhappy end of this great prince, we refer the reader to our hiſtory

His baſe treatment of Cleomenes king of Sparta,

[b] Plut. in Cleom. & Polyb. l. v

of Sparta. The king cauſed his body to be flead and hung upon a croſs, ſentencing at the ſame time to death his mother Cratiſiclea, his children, and all the women who attended them [c].

ANTIOCHUS king of Syria, who was afterwards from his conqueſts ſirnamed the Great, taking advantage of Euergetes's death and the ſucceſſion of ſo voluptuous and profligate a prince, undertook the recovering of Cœle-Syria, Paleſtine, and Judæa, which had formerly belonged to Seleucus Nicator and ſome of his ſucceſſors. But, as we have already given a diſtinct account of this war [d], we ſhall only obſerve here, that Ptolemy, notwithſtanding the advantages gained over Antiochus, being deſirous of putting an end to the war which interrupted his voluptuous pleaſures, concluded a peace with Antiochus, when he might with great eaſe have driven him quite out of Syria. The diſcontent which followed hereon, throughout the whole kingdom of Egypt, broke ſoon out into an open rebellion; and thus Ptolemy by avoiding a war abroad kindled one in his own dominions [e]. And indeed, that there was ſuch a war, Polybius tells us in expreſs terms [f]; but neither he nor any other author gives us an account of the event of it. All we know is, that Ptolemy continued to enjoy the ſame power and authority which he had before the civil war broke out; whence it is plain, that he maſtered this difficulty and got the better of the rebels. In whoſe favour the Jews declared, is no-where recorded; but Euſebius tells us [g], that about this time forty thouſand of them were cut off and deſtroyed, very likely during theſe inteſtine broils, for at this time they were very numerous in Egypt.

Proſecutes the Jews.

PTOLEMY being highly provoked againſt the jews for their obſtructing his entrance into the temple, as we have related in the hiſtory of Syria, began on his return to Alexandria, to vent his rage upon ſuch of the Jewiſh nation as lived in that metropolis. In the firſt place he publiſhed a decree, which he cauſed to be engraved on a pillar erected for that purpoſe at the gate of his palace, excluding all thoſe who did not ſacrifice to the gods he worſhipped. By this means the Jews were debarred from ſuing to him for juſtice, or obtaining his protection, in what caſe ſoever they might ſtand in need of it. We have obſerved elſewhere, that the [c] Plut. ibid. See Vol. viii. book ii. cap. ii. ſect iv. [e] Juſtin. l. xxx. c. 1. Hieronym. in Dan. c. 11 [f] Polyb. l. v. p. 444. [g] Euſeb. in Chron.

the Jews, by the favour of Alexander the Great and Ptolemy Soter, enjoyed at Alexandria the ſame privileges as the Macedonians, and were enrolled among thoſe of the firſt rank; for the inhabitants of that great metropolis were divided into three ranks or claſſes; in the firſt were the Macedonians, the original founders of the city; in the ſecond the mercenaries, who had ſerved under Alexander; and in the third the native Egyptians. Now Ptolemy, to be revenged on the Jews, ordered by another decree, that they ſhould be degraded from the firſt rank, in which they had been from the founding of the city, and enrolled among the common people of Egypt, who were of the third rank; by this decree they were ſtript at once of all the rights and privileges, which had prompted them to leave their native country and ſettle in Egypt. But this was not the greateſt grievance; for in the ſame decree it was enacted, that all the Jews at an appointed time ſhould appear before the proper officers in order to be enrolled among the common people; that at the time of their enrollment they ſhould have the mark of an ivy leaf, the badge of Bacchus, impreſſed with a hot iron on their faces; that all, who were thus marked, ſhould be made ſlaves; and finally, that if any one ſhould ſtand out againſt this decree, he ſhould be immediately put to death. But that he might not ſeem an enemy to the whole nation, he declared, that thoſe who ſacrificed to his gods ſhould enjoy their former privileges, and remain in the ſame claſs. Notwithſtanding this tempting offer, three hundred only, out of many thouſand, of the Jewiſh race who lived in Alexandria, were prevailed upon to abandon their religion in compliance with the king's will. The others choſe rather to be ſtigmatized in the manner the king had ordered, or to redeem themſelves from that ignominious mark by parting with all they had to the king's officers. Thoſe who continued in the religion of their forefathers excluded their fallen brethren from all manner of communication with them, expreſſing thereby the abhorrence they had of their apoſtaſy. This their enemies conſtrued as done in oppoſition to the king's order, which ſo enraged Ptolemy, that he reſolved to extirpate the whole nation, beginning with the Jews who lived in Alexandria and other parts of Egypt, and then proceeding with the ſame ſeverity againſt the inhabitants of Judæa and Jeruſalem. Purſuant to this reſolution, he commanded all the Jews, who lived in any part

part of Egypt, to be brought in chains to Alexandria, and there to be ſhut up in the hippodrome, which was a very ſpacious place without the city, where the people uſed to aſſemble to ſee horſe-races and other public ſhows. When news was brought him that all the Jews, who lived in Egypt, were, agreeable to his order, confined within the hippodrome, he ſent for Hermon, maſter of the elephants, and ordereded him to have five hundred of them ready againſt the next day to be let looſe upon the priſoners in the hippodrome. But when the elephants were prepared for the execution and the people aſſembled in great crowds to ſee it, they were all diſappointed for that day by the king's abſence. For, having been late up the night before with ſome of his drunken and debauched companions, he did not awake the next day, till the time for the ſhow was over and the ſpectators returned to their reſpective homes. He therefore ordered one of his ſervants to call him the day following betimes, that the people might not meet with a ſecond diſappointment. But when the perſon appointed awaked him, he was not yet returned to his ſenſes, having a little before withdrawn exceeding drunk; and therefore not remembering the order he had given, flew into a violent paſſion, threatening the perſon, who ſpoke to him of it; which cauſed the ſhow to be put off to the third day. In the mean time the Jews, who continued ſhut up in the hippodrome, ceaſed not to offer up prayers to the Almighty for their deliverance, which he accordingly granted them. For on the third day when the king was preſent and the elephants brought forth and let looſe upon the priſoners, thoſe fierce animals inſtead of falling upon the Jews, turned their rage upon the ſpectators and ſoldiers, who aſſiſted at the execution, and deſtroyed great numbers of them; which, with other appearances ſeen in the air, ſo terrified the king, that he commanded the Jews to be immediately ſet at liberty, acknowledged the power of the God they worſhipped, and to appeaſe his anger, reſtored his people the full enjoyment of their former privileges, beſtowing upon them beſides many favours, and loading them with preſents at their departure; for the king not only allowed them to return to their reſpective homes, but would himſelf bear the charges of their journey. The Jews ſeeing themſelves thus reſtored to the king's favour, demanded and obtained leave of him to put all thoſe of their own nation to death who had abandoned their religion;

The Jews miraculouſly delivered.

gion ; which permiſſion they ſoon made uſe of without ſparing a ſingle man [h]. This miraculous deliverance is related at length in the book of the Maccabees, which Phloſtorgius, in the beginning of his eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, calls the book of miracles. Joſephus gives us no account of this whole matter in his antiquities ; but we find it mentioned in the Latin edition, which Ruffinus publiſhed, of his ſecond book againſt Apion ; as for the Greek original, it is there wanting. According to Ruffinus's verſion, this miraculous deliverance was effected in the reign of Ptolemy Phyſcon, many years after the time in which we have placed it agreeable to the hiſtory of the Maccabees ; where this perſecution, and the deliverance of the Jews is related at length, as happening in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator, immediately on his return from Syria, after the famous victory gained by him at Raphia over Antiochus, of which we have ſpoke elſewhere [i].

ABOUT this time, the ninth year of Philopator's reign, the Romans ſent M. Atilius and M. Acilius to Alexandria, to renew their antient friendſhip and alliance with Egypt ; for they were then engaged in a war with Carthage. The embaſſadors carried as a preſent to the king a purple tunic and an ivory chair, and to the queen a purple robe finely embroidered with a ſcarf of the ſame colour. This queen is called by Juſtin Eurydice, by Livy in this place Cleopatra [k], and by Polybius [l] and the author of the third book of the Maccabees Arſinoe. Not long after this embaſſy, Decius Magius, an illuſtrious Capuan, greatly attached to the intereſt of Rome, being ſeized by Hannibal and put on board a veſſel in order to be conveyed to Carthage, was by a ſtorm driven into the port of Cyrene, a city belonging to the king of Egypt, and there by Philopator's order was taken out of the hands of his enemies, conducted to Alexandria, and kindly received by the king, who gave him leave to return either to Capua or Rome ; but he choſe to continue in Egypt, where he lived under the protection of his deliverer [m]. Ptolemy willingly embraced this opportunity of obliging the Romans ; and, by protecting their friend, teſtified his gratitude for the preſents they had ſent to him and his queen.

The Romans ſend an embaſſy to Philopator. Year of the flood 2791. Before Chriſt 208.

ARSINOE

[h] Maccab. l. iii. c. 2, 3, 4, 5.
[i] Vide vol. viii. book. ii. chap. 2. ſect. 4.
[k] Liv. l. xxvii.
[l] Polyb. l. v.
[m] Liv. l. xxii. c. 10.

Arsinoe brings him a son.

ARSINOE, who was both wife and sister to Ptolemy, after having been barren for several years, brought him at last a son, who was sirnamed Epiphanes or the illustrious, and succeeded his father when but five years of age. His birth occasioned great rejoicings all over Egypt and the neighbouring provinces subject to that crown. Most persons of distinction in Syria and Phœnice went up to Alexandria to congratulate the king on that occasion, and among the rest Hyrcanus the son of Joseph, the king's receiver-general, of whose transactions at the court of Egypt we shall have occasion to speak in the history of the Jews. But, in the mean time, the king, pursuing his old course of life, gave himself up to riots, pleasures and excesses of every kind. Drinking, gaming, and lasciviousness, were the whole employments of his life. Sosibius, an old and crafty minister, who had served under three kings, managed the affairs of state, in which by his long experience he was thoroughly versed, not indeed in the manner he desired, but as the favourites would permit him; for he was subservient to the king and his worthless favourites in all their vilest designs. While things were thus managed, Arsinoe was little regarded by the king, his minister, and the other courtiers; which she not being able to bear, spared neither her clamours nor complaints on all occasions, which much offending the king and those who governed him, orders were given to Sosibius to rid them of her. The wicked minister complied with their request, employing for that purpose one Philammon, who had been used to such cruel and barbarous assassinations [n]. She had shewed on all occasions an extraordinary affection for her husband, accompanied him in his wars with Antiochus king of Syria, and not only encouraged his soldiers before the famous battle of Raphia, but continued by him the whole time of the engagement, exposing herself to the same dangers [o]. Upon her death the king fell in love with one Agathoclea, a woman of mean extraction, and was entirely governed by her, by her brother Agathocles,, who was subservient to his unnatural lust, and by their mother Oenanthe. These disposed of all the civil and military employments, which of course were filled with their creatures and favourites; insomuch, that the king himself, was entirely in their hands, had no power power at all, being only their tool and property [p]. The murder of Arſinoe and ſeveral other actions of the ſame nature provoked the people to ſuch a degree againſt Soſibius, that they obliged the king to diſmiſs him from his ſervice, and raiſe to the office of prime miniſter one Tlepolemus, a young man of quality, who had ſignalized himſelf in the army and was at that time the king's treaſurer. To him Soſibius reſigned the king's ſeal, which was the badge of his office, and by virtue thereof Tlepolemus governed all the affairs of the kingdom ſo long as the king lived. But in that ſhort time he ſufficiently ſhewed, that he was no-ways equal to the charge, he having neither the experience, craft, nor application of his predeceſſor [q].

He murders his wife Arsinoe.

[n] Polyb. l. xv. p. 719. Valesii excerpt. p. 65. Justin. l. xxx. c. 1.
[o] Polyb. ibid.

Obliged to diſmiſs his prime miniſter.

PTOLEMY, having by his continual debaucheries and intemperance wore out a very ſtrong conſtitution, died in the flower of his age, as it often happens to thoſe who indulge themſelves, like him, without reſtraint in all manner of pleaſures. He was about twenty when he came to the crown, and reigned only ſeventeen years. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of five years old [r]. As the only perſons preſent when the king expired were Agathocles, his ſiſter, and their creatures, they concealed his death as long as they could, and, in the mean time, carried off all the money, jewels, and other valuable effects in the palace they could lay their hands on. At the ſame time they formed a project for maintaining the authority they had enjoyed under the deceaſed king, by uſurping the regency during the minority of his ſucceſſor. They vainly imagined, that they might carry this point, if they could but take off Tlepolemus, who had ſucceeded Soſibius in the miniſtry; and accordingly they concerted meaſures for putting him out of the way. When they thought proper to acquaint the public with the king's death, they ſummoned a general council of the Macedonians, that is, of thoſe Alexandrians who were of the Macedonian race. When they were met, Agathocles and Agathoclea appeared in the council; the former holding ing the young king in his arms and ſhedding abundance of tears, implored the protection of the Macedonians, telling them, that the late king, when at the point of death, had committed the young prince to the care of Agathoclea, and recommended him to the fidelity of his Macedonian ſubjects; and therefore he recurred, with great confidence, to them againſt Tlepolemus, who, as he was informed by unexceptionable witneſſes, intended to ſeize the crown for himſelf. He imagined that this weak artifice would have ſtirred up the Macedonians againſt Tlepolemus, on whoſe death he might have eaſily eſtabliſhed himſelf in the regency. But, the malice of this contrivance being too glaring, the people, inſtead of falling upon Tlepolemus, vowed the utter ruin of him, his ſiſter and all their creatures. For, on this occaſion the memory of all their paſt crimes and miſdemeanors being revived, the people of Alexandria roſe in a general tumult againſt them; and having firſt taken from them the young king, and placed him on the throne in the hippodrome, they brought before him Agathocles, Agathoclea, and their mother Oenanthe, and cauſed them there, as by the king's order, to be put to death in his preſence. Their dead bodies were dragged through all the ſtreets of Alexandria and tore in pieces by the incenſed multitude. The other ſiſters, relations, and creatures of Agathocles met with the ſame treatment, every one of them being cut off by the people, whom they had oppreſſed and abuſed.

The death of Ptolemy Philopator.

[p] Polyb. l. xv. p. 720. Valeſii excerpt. p. 65 Juſtin. l. xxx. c. 1. & 2. Plut. in Erotico & Cleom. Athen. l. vi. c. 6. & l. xiii. c. 13. Hieronym. in Daniel. c. 11. [q] Valeſii excerpt. ex Polyb. l. xvi. [r] Juſtin. xxx. c. 1. & 2. Hieronym. in Daniel. c. 11.

His favourite put to death.

PHILAMMON, who had been employed to murder queen Arſinoe, being returned from Cyrene to Alexandria about three days before this tumult broke out, the women, who had attended on that unhappy princeſs, no ſooner heard of his arrival, but laying hold of the opportunity which the diſtractions of the city gave them, they reſolved to revenge their miſtreſs's death; and accordingly, breaking into his houſe, they killed him with ſtones and clubs, a death which he well deſerved, for becoming the inſtrument of ſuch a wicked and deteſtable murder [s].

THE guardianſhip of the young king was for the preſent committed to Soſibius, the ſon of that Soſibius who had been prime miniſter during the three laſt reigns. Whether he was ſtill living or no, is no-where ſaid; but it is certain, that he lived to a very great age, having for the ſpace ſpace of three-ſcore years been at the helm, and governed Egypt, we may ſay, with an abſolute ſway; and for this reaſon he was ſirnamed Polychronos, or the long-liver. He was as crafty and as wicked a miniſter as ever any prince employed in the adminiſtration of public affairs. He did not ſcruple to commit the blackeſt crimes, when they were any ways conducive to the ends he propoſed. Polybius imputes to him the murder of Lyſimachus, the ſon of Ptolemy; of Arſinoe the daughter of Lyſimachus; of Magas the king's brother; of Berenice the king's mother; of Cleomenes king of Sparta; and laſtly of queen Arſinoe [t]. It is ſurprizing, that this old Egyptian politician, after having behaved with ſo much haughtineſs and cruelty in his adminiſtration for ſuch a number of years, ſhould at laſt be ſuffered to retire unmoleſted and end his days in peace. There are very few inſtances of this nature to be met with in hiſtory, moſt miniſters, who acted on his principles, having fallen at laſt victims, either to the juſt reſentment of the princes themſelves, whom they pretended to ſerve, or of the people, whom they oppreſſed.

[s] Polyb. l. xv. p. 712, 713, 714, &c. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii, p. 294. & excerpt. Polybii, p. 56. Plut. in Cleom.

Character of Ptolemy Philopator.

PTOLEMY PHILOPATOR was, without all doubt, one of the moſt wicked and debauched princes that ever ſwayed a ſcepter; for he began his reign with the murther of his mother Berenice and his brother Magas, and cloſed it with that of his ſiſter and wife Arſinoe. He minded nothing from the time he aſcended the throne to his death, but his pleaſures and diverſions, wallowing in all ſorts of vices, and taking moſt pleaſure in ſuch as were moſt repugnant to nature. His favourites, catamites, and the many lewd women, with whom he ſpent his whole time, governed him and the kingdom, diſpoſing of all the employments civil and military to perſons of their own ſtamp, and conſequently no ways equal to them. However, he was not without ſome virtues; witneſs his liberality towards the Rhodians, after the famous earthquake, which threw down their coloſſus, their arſenal, and great part of their walls, to the repairing of which he contributed more generouſly than any prince of his age; for, upon the firſt application made to him in their behalf, he ſent them three hundred talents of ſilver, a million of artabes or buſhels of wheat, materials for building of twenty quinqueremes and the like number of triremes, three thouſand talents for the rebuilding rebuilding of the coloſſus, an hundred architects, and three hundred and fifty artificers, promiſing to pay annually fourteen talents for their ſubſiſtence ſo long as the Rhodians wanted them. Beſides, he gave them ten thouſand artabes of corn for their ſacrifices, and twenty thouſand for the ſervice of their fleet[u]. Athenæus tells us, that he was an encourager of learning, and when ſober took pleaſure in converſing with one Sephærus an eminent philoſopher. The ſame author adds, that he built a magnificent temple in honour of Homer, placing in it the ſtatue of that great poet, and round his ſtatue the figures of the ſeveral cities that claimed him[w]. Ptolemy, the ſon of Ageſarchus, a native of Megalopolis, wrote the hiſtory of this prince's reign[x]; which, had it reached our times, would enable us to give a more particular and diſtinct account of his actions.

[t] Valeſii excerpt. ibid. Plut. in Cleom. Polyb. ibid.

Ptolemy Epiphanes. Year of the flood 2799. Year before Chriſt 200.

HE was ſucceeded, as we have related above, by his ſon Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of five years old. During his minority, Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, entering into an alliance with Philip of Macedon, made himſelf maſter of Paleſtine and Cæle-Syria; but was ſoon diſpoſſeſſed of them again by Ariſtomenes, the prime miniſter of Egypt, as we have related in the hiſtory of Syria[y]; where the reader will find a particular account of the troubles which diſturbed the beginning of his reign, and were occaſioned partly by the ambition of Antiochus, and partly by the treachery of Scopas the Ætolian, who was commander in cief of Ptolemy's forces. In the third year of his reign the Romans, as Juſtin[z] and Livy[a] inform us, ſent three deputies to him, viz. Caius Claudius Nero, Marcus Æmilius Lepidus, and Publius Sempronius Tuditanus, to notify to the court of Egypt the victory which they had gained over Hannibal, and the treaty of peace concluded between Rome and Carthage; to thank him for his inviolable attachment to the republic, at a time when the neighbouring nations had in a cowardly manner deſerted her; and laſtly, to exhort him always to continue this good underſtanding with the Romans, in caſe Philip ſhould oblige them to carry the war into Macedon. The Egyptian lords, who were guardians to the young king, Embaſſy of the Romans to Ptolemy.

encouraged

[u] Polyb. l. v. [w] Athen. l. v. p. 204. Ælian. Var. Hiſt. l. xiii. c. 2. [x] Athenæus, l. x. p. 426. See Vol. viii. book. ii. cap. ii. ſect. iv. [z] Juſtin. l. xxx. c. 1. [a] Liv. l. xxxi. c. 4.

encouraged by this embaſſy, thought they could not better ſecure the life of their prince, than by putting him and his kingdom under the protection of the Roman ſenate; which they did accordingly, ſending a ſolemn embaſſy to Rome for that purpoſe. The ſenate complied with their requeſt, and ſent M. Lepidus to take upon him the guardianſhip, which he after a ſhort ſtay in Egypt, conferred upon Ariſtomenes, by birth an Acarnanian, but an experienced miniſter of that court, and thoroughly acquainted with the affairs of Egypt. He undertook the charge, and acquitted himſelf in it with great prudence and fidelity [b]. In the beginning of his adminiſtration, being informed of the ravages Philip had committed in Attica, and of the motion of the Macedonian troops to lay ſiege to Athens, he adviſed his royal pupil to ſend an embaſſy to the ſenate, acquainting them, that he was ready to deliver Athens from the danger that threatened her, provided it were agreeable to the Romans. This act of ſubmiſſion from ſo powerful a king was highly acceptable to the ſenate, who returned thanks to Ptolemy for the reſpect he had ſhewn them, and gave the embaſſadors the following anſwer; that Rome was reſolved to aſſiſt the Greeks againſt Philip, that ſhe would give Ptolemy notice when ſhe wanted his aſſiſtance, and was fully convinced of their maſter's fidelity and affection [c]. Ariſtomenes in like manner took care to renew the antient alliance between the crown of Egypt and the republic of Achaia, on which occaſion Lycortas, the father of Polybius the hiſtorian, and two others were ſent by the Achæan confederacy into Egypt to ſign the treaty [d].

Offers the Romans aſſiſtance againſt Philip.

In the mean time, the king having attained to the fourteenth year of his age, his enthronization, called by the Alexandrians Anaclateria, was celebrated with great pomp and magnificence, and the adminiſtration of affairs put into his hands; for at that age the kings of Egypt were, according to the cuſtom of the country, declared to be out of their minority. So long as Ariſtomenes was at the helm, matters were managed in ſuch manner as gained the king an univerſal applauſe and approbation; for he followed in all things the advice of that prudent and expe-experienced minister. But as soon as he became his own master, the flattery of his worthless courtiers prevailing over the wise councils of so able and faithful a servant, the kingdom suffered great calamities, and the remaining part of his reign was rendered infamous. Aristomenes did not cease to give him good advice, and entreat him to conduct himself in a manner more worthy of his exalted station; but the young prince plunging himself into all the vices which had rendered his father's name and reign so odious, instead of hearkening to his wholesome admonitions, ordered him to be put to death for the liberty he had taken. Having thus got rid of so troublesome a censor, he abandoned himself to excesses and disorders of all kinds, following no other guides in the administration of affairs but his wild passions, and exercising a most cruel tyranny over his subjects [e]. The Egyptians not being able to bear the grievances they suffered under his arbitrary administration, began to cabal against him; and, being headed by many persons of the first quality, entered into a conspiracy with a design to depose him, which they were very near putting in execution [f]. To extricate himself out of these difficulties, he appointed Polycrates his prime minister, who was a man of great abilities and experience in affairs both of peace and war; for he had commanded in quality of general under his father in the famous battle of Raphia, and on that occasion greatly contributed to the signal victory which was there gained. He had been afterwards made governor of Cyprus, and happening to come from thence to Alexandria, when the conspiracy of Scopas [g] broke out, he had a great share in the suppressing of it [h]. By his means Ptolemy having got the better of the rebels, obliged their leaders, who were the chief lords of the country, to capitulate and submit upon certain conditions. But, having got them into his power, he forfeited his promise; and, after treating them in the most cruel manner, caused them all to be put to death. This treacherous conduct involved him in new difficulties, from which he was again delivered by the wisdom of his faithful minister Polycrates [i].

[b] Juſtin. & Liv. ibid. Polyb. l. xv. p. 717. [c] Liv. ubi ſupra.
[d] Polyb. legat. 37.

'uts Aristonenes to eath.

His subjects revolt.

He maintained, during the whole time of his reign, a strict friendship with the Romans. For Livy tells us [k], that Cultivates the friendship of the Romans.

and

[e] Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. 294. Polybius, l. xvii. p. 773. [f] Diodor. Sicul. ibid. [g] See vol. ix. p. 13. [h] Polyb. in excerpt. Valesii, p. 113. [i] Polyb. ibid. [k] Liv. l. xxxvi. c. 3.

he offered the Romans a thouſand pounds weight of gold and twenty thouſand of ſilver, to carry on the war againſt Antiochus king of Syria, whoſe daughter Cleopatra he had married; nay, after Antiochus was by the arms of the republic driven out of Europe, he ſent an embaſſy to Rome to congratulate the ſenate on the deliverance of Greece and the flight of Antiochus, and to offer them, in his name and in that of his queen Cleopatra, what ſhips, money, or proviſions they wanted to purſue the war with the king of Syria [l]. Ptolemy hated Antiochus on account of the diſturbances he had raiſed and fomented in his kingdom, and Cleopatra in all likelihood was ſhocked at his treachery and cruelty; for he is ſaid to have married her to Ptolemy with no other view but to get rid of him by her means, and have Egypt delivered into his hands. But the virtuous young queen inviolably attached to her duty, joined with Ptolemy againſt Antiochus, and preferred conjugal affection to the ties of blood [m]

And of the Achæans.

PTOLEMY in like manner cultivated with great care the friendſhip of the Achæan republic; for in the end of his reign he ſent embaſſadors to them, inviting the confederacy to join with him in an offenſive and defenſive league, and promiſing them ſix thouſand ſhields, two hundred talents of braſs and ten ſhips of fifty oars rigged and equipt. His offer was accepted, and embaſſadors were appointed, viz. Lycortas with his ſon Polybius and young Aratus, to renew the alliance, and bring the ten ſhips into Peloponneſus [n]. But while they were preparing to ſet out, news was brought of the death of Ptolemy.

THIS prince having reduced his rebellious ſubjects at home, as has been already related, was preparing to make war abroad upon Seleucus king of Syria. But, as his finances were exhauſted, one of his chief officers aſked him, by what means he would raiſe money to carry on the war which he was ready to embarque in. The king replied, that his friends were his treaſure; which anſwer being ſpread abroad among his officers and the chief men about him, they inferred from thence, that he deſigned to purſue the war with their fortunes and eſtates. To prevent therefore this evil which made a ſtronger impreſſion upon them than any misfortunes which could befal their country, they cauſed poiſon to be given to the king, which put an end to his

Is poiſoned.

[l] Polyb. legat. 17.
[m] Hieronym. in Dan. c. 11.
[n] Polyb. legat. 57.

project and life, in the twenty-fourth year of his reign and twenty-ninth of his age [o]. Cato, as quoted by Priſcian the grammarian, commends him as an excellent and bountiful prince; and ſuch he was, ſo long as he followed the counſels of Ariſtomenes; but after he had cauſed him to he poiſoned, he abandoned himſelf to all manner of wickedneſs and debauchery. He left two ſons, both under age, viz. Ptolemy Philometor and Ptolemy Phyſcon, and one daughter by name Cleopatra. Ptolemy Philometor, who was but ſix years old, ſucceeded his father under the guardianſhip of his mother Cleopatra, who for the ſpace of eight years governed the kingdom of Egypt with great prudence and moderation. Upon her death the regency fell to Lennæus, a nobleman of great diſtinction in that country, and to Eulæus an eunuch, who was charged with the care of the young king's education. Theſe no ſooner entered on the adminiſtration, but they demanded Cœle-Syria and Paleſtine of Antiochus Epiphanes, who at that time reigned in Syria. Theſe provinces had always been in the poſſeſſion of the kings of Egypt from the time of Ptolemy the firſt, till Antiochus the Great wreſted them out of the hands of Ptolemy Epiphanes; and by this title alone Antiochus Epiphanes now held them. However, this demand occaſioned a war between the two crowns, the particulars whereof we have related elſewhere at length [p], and therefore ſhall not repeat in this place. Philometor having in the courſe of this war, either of his own accord delivered himſelf up to Antiochus, or, as others will have it, been taken priſoner by that prince, the Alexandrians, looking upon him as loſt, raiſed his younger brother to the throne, who from that time took the name of Ptolemy Euergetes the ſecond, which was afterwards changed into that of Phyſcon, or the great-bellied, by reaſon of the prominent belly which by his luxury and gluttony he acquired. On his aſcending the throne, Cineas and Cumanus were appointed to ſerve him in quality of prime miniſters, and charged with the care of reſtoring the kingdom to its former ſplendor and flouriſhing condition [q]. But Antiochus Epiphanes, returning ſoon after into Egypt, drove Phyſcon from the throne, and reſtored the whole kingdom, except the city of Peluſium, to Philometor. His deſign was to kindle a war between the two brothers, and ſeize the kingdom for himſelf, after they had waſted their ſtrength by Ptolemy Philometor. Year of the flood 2823. Before Chriſt 176.

War between him and the king of Syria.

His brother Phyſcon raiſed to the crown.

[o] Hieronym. ubi. ſupra. [p] See vol. ix. p. 71. [q] Porphyr in Græc. Euſeb. Scalig. p. 60——68. Polyb. legat. 81. p. 907 by their domeſtic feuds. With this view he retained Peluſium, that having this city, which was the key of Egypt, in his hands, he might re-enter that country at his pleaſure. But Philometor, being well appriſed of his deſign, invited his brother Phyſcon to an accommodation, which was happily effected by the mediation of Cleopatra their ſiſter. In virtue of this agreement both brothers were to reign jointly, and oppoſe, to the utmoſt of their power, Antiochus as a declared and common enemy [r]. Hereupon Antiochus invaded Egypt at the head of a mighty army; but was obliged by the Romans to leave that country in the manner we have related in the hiſtory of Syria [s].

The two brothers reign jointly.

THE two brothers, being by the retreat of Antiochus freed from all apprehenſion of a foreign enemy, began to quarrel with each other; and the diviſions between them roſe to ſuch a height, that the Roman ſenate wrote to their embaſſadors Cneius Octavius, Spurius Lucretius, and Lucius Aurelius, whom they had ſent a little before into Syria, injoining them to proceed from thence to Alexandria, and uſe their utmoſt endeavours to reconcile the two kings. But before the embaſſadors reached Egypt, Phyſcon the younger brother had driven Philometor from the throne, and obliged him to quit the kingdom [t]. Whereupon embarquing for Italy, he landed at Brunduſium; from whence he travelled to Rome on foot, meanly dreſſed and with very few attendants. This humble appearance he affected, in all likelihood, to raiſe the compaſſion of the ſenate. Demetrius, the ſon of Seleucus Philopator, late king of Syria, who was then an hoſtage at Rome, having had notice of the arrival of Ptolemy in Italy, and of the deplorable conditon in which this unfortunate prince was going to appear in the metropolis of the world, cauſed an equipage to be prepared for him ſuitable to his dignity, and went out with it himſelf to meet him, that he might appear at Rome as a king. He found him at twenty-ſix miles diſtance from Rome, on foot and covered with duſt, embraced him, put a crown upon his head, and begged he would make uſe of the royal equipage which he had brought for that purpoſe. Ptolemy expreſſed his gratitude for the honour and reſpect the Syrian had ſhewn him; but had his reaſons for not accepting the offers of the prince. Nay, he would not even permit him to accompany him the reſt of the way; but he entered Rome on foot, with the ſame mean attendance and in the ſame dreſs with which he firſt ſet out on his journey, and without any ſtate or ceremony took up his lodging in the private houſe of a painter of Alexandria, his ſubject. The ſenate was no ſooner informed of his arrival, but they ſent for him, and excuſed themſelves for not having received him with thoſe ceremonies which were uſual on ſuch an occaſion, aſſuring him, that it was not from any neglect or want of reſpect for his perſon, but merely becauſe his coming had been kept ſo private, that they had no notice of it till after his arrival. After this having deſired him to quit the habit in which he came, and to fix a day for an audience of the ſenate, in order to lay before them the motives of his journey, he was conducted by ſome of the ſenators to lodgings ſuitable to his royal dignity; and the quæſtor was ordered to ſupply him, at the expence of the public, with all things neceſſary during his ſtay at Rome [u].

Philometor driven out by his brother Phyſcon.

[r] Liv. l. xlv. c. 11. Juſtin. l. xxxiv. c. 2. Porphyr. ibid. p. 60. Euſeb. in Chron. p. 68. [s] See vol. ix. p. 81. [t] Porphyr. ubi ſupra.

The differences of the two brothers compoſed by the Romans.

On the day appointed for his having an audience of the ſenate, he repreſented to the conſcript fathers the injuſtice of his brother and the wrong done him ſo effectually, that they immediately decreed his reſtoration; and deputed two of their body, viz. Quintius and Canuleius, to attend him to Alexandria, and cauſe their decree to be put in execution. They reconducted him accordingly, and on their arrival in Egypt ſucceeded in negotiating an accommodation between the two brothers; in virtue of which Phyſcon was put in poſſeſſion of Libya and Cyrene, and Philometor of all Egypt and the iſland of Cyprus, each of them being declared independent of the other in the dominions allotted them [w]. The treaty of agreement was confirmed with the cuſtomary oaths and ſacrifices. But oaths had been long among the generality of princes no more than mere ceremonies, by which they did not think themſelves bound in the leaſt. For not long after the youngeſt of the two kings, being diſſatisfied with the part allotted him, ſent embaſſadors to Rome, deſiring that, beſides Libya and Cyrene, the iſland of Cyprus might be aſſigned him. As he could not obtain this of the conſcript fathers by means of his embaſſadors, he went to Rome in perſon to ſollicit the ſenate for it. But Menithyllus of Alabanda, whom Philometor had ſent to plead his cauſe, maintained it with

New diſputes between them.

[u] Diodor. Sicul. in excert. Valeſii, p. 322. Val. Max. l. v. c. 1. Polyb. legat. 113. p. 941. Liv. l. xlvi. Zonaras, l. ii.

[w] Polyb. ibid. p. 943. Epitom.

with great zeal and ability. He repreſented to the ſenate, that Phyſcon had had a much greater ſhare than he could in reaſon have expected. "His brother, ſaid he, has given "him Cyrenaica; and will not this rich maritime country "ſatisfy the deſires of a younger brother? Nay, Philometor "has done more for Phyſcon; he has ſaved his life. For "after the death of Cleopatra, Phyſcon, being ſuſpected of "parricide, would not have eſcaped the fury of the incenſed "multitude, had he not been protected by the king his bro-"ther. Beſides, an accommodation was made, conſcript "fathers, by your embaſſadors between the two competitors: "It was agreed, that Philometor ſhould reign in Egypt and "and in the iſland of Cyprus, and that Libya and Cyrene "ſhould be given to Phyſcon with the title of king. This "treaty was ſigned and ratified at the altars, each par-"ty binding themſelves by the moſt ſolemn oaths to the ob-"ſervance of it. But the ambition of Phyſcon knows no "bounds; he pays no regard to his oath, and even deſpiſes "your decrees." The embaſſadors, whom Rome had ſent to negotiate the accommodation between the two brothers, being preſent in the ſenate, confirmed the truth of all Menithyllus had advanced. Phyſcon had nothing to anſwer, but that he was forced by the neceſſity of his affairs at that time to conſent to the propoſal of an ambitious brother, though greatly to his prejudice. "It is certain, ſaid he, that I was in-"jured in the diviſion of my father's dominions; and there-"fore, conſcript fathers, I have recourſe to your equity; "That with me ſhall ſupply the place of gods and oaths. I "ſtill abate of what is due to me in juſtice. All I deſire is "the iſland of Cyprus, which, though granted, will not "put me upon the level with my brother. Egypt is a large "kingdom, and if Philometor reigns alone there and in the "iſland of Cyprus too, his power will become very formi-"dable [x].

The Romans adjudge the iſland of Cyprus to Phyſcon.

NOTHING could be more equitable than the deciſions of the ſenate, when their own intereſt did not interfere and help to turn the balance. But, as it was for the advantage of the republic that the ſtrength of the kingdom of Egypt ſhould be divided, and conſequently leſſened, thoſe refined politicians without any regard to equity or juſtice, granted the younger brother what he demanded. Polybius obſerves here, that the Romans were ever careful to improve to their own advantage the quarrels and diſputes which aroſe among kings and princes, conducting themſelves therein in ſuch a manner, as to make the contending parties believe that they favoured them, while they promoted their own intereſt, which they had ſolely in view in all their reſolutions [y]. This alone prompted them to favour Phyſcon, and adjudge to him the iſland of Cyprus, as an addition to his ſhare, contrary to the treaty of diviſion concluded a little before by their own embaſſadors. Demetrius, who was then at Rome, and whoſe intereſt it was that Cyprus ſhould not continue ſubject to ſo powerful a prince as the king of Egypt, ſupported the demand of Phyſcon with all his credit. Two commiſſioners were therefore ſent with the king of Cyrene, viz. T. Torquatus and Cn. Merula, to put him in poſſeſſion of Cyprus. Their orders were to uſe gentle methods, and endeavour by fair means to prevail upon Philometor to give up Cyprus to his brother.

[x] Polyb. legat. 113. p. 941. & legat. 117. p. 950.

While Phyſcon was at Rome on this occcaſion, he had often the opportunity of ſeeing Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, who was the pattern of her ſex and the prodigy of her age. The Egyptian, being taken, not ſo much with her charms, as with her virtue, ſuperior underſtanding, and extraordinary qualifications, cauſed propoſals of marriage to be made to her. But ſhe, being the daughter of Scipio Africanus and the widow of Tiberius Gracchus, who had been twice conſul and once cenſor, deſpiſed the offer, thinking it more honourable to be one of the firſt matrons of Rome, than to reign with Phyſcon in Libya and Cyrene [z].

Physcon ſet out from Rome with the two embaſſadors, and arriving in Greece on his way to Cyprus, he there raiſed a great number of mercenaries, with a deſign to ſail forthwith to Cyprus, and poſſeſs himſelf by force of that iſland. But the embaſſadors having acquainted him that they were injoined by the ſenate to uſe gentle methods, and procure him the poſſeſſion of the iſland by way of treaty with his brother, and not by dint of arms, at their requeſt he diſmiſſed his forces, and with Merula returned to Libya, while Torquatus purſued his journey to Alexandria. The deſign of the embaſſadors was to bring the two brothers to an interview on the frontiers of their dominions, and there to ſettle matters between them in an amicable manner, agreeable to the inſtructions of the ſenate.

[y] Idem. ibid. [z] Plut. in Tiber. Gracch.

ſenate. But Torquatus, on his arrival at the court of Alexandria, found Philometor no ways inclined to comply with the decree of the ſenate. He urged the late agreement made between him and his brother, by Quintus and Canuleius the former embaſſadors; in virtue of which Cyprus having been allotted to him, he thought it very ſtrange, that it ſhould, contrary to the articles of that treaty, be now taken from him and given to his brother. However, he did not abſolutely refuſe to yield to the orders of the ſenate, but ſhewing himſelf inclined to grant ſome things, and objecting againſt others, he ſpun out the time without coming to any determination [a]. In the mean time Phyſcon, who waited at Apis in Libya, as had been agreed on, to hear the reſult of Torquatus's negotiations, receiving no intelligence from him, ſent Merula alſo to Alexandria, hoping that both the embaſſadors might prevail upon Ptolemy to comply with the expreſs orders of their republic. But Philometor ſtill obſerved the ſame conduct, treating the embaſſadors with great kindneſs, flattering them with fair words, and entertaining them at a great charge for forty days together, without ever giving them any poſitive anſwer. At length, when he found they would be put off no longer, he plainly declared that he was reſolved to ſtand to the firſt treaty, and would hearken to no other [b]. With this anſwer Merula returned to Phyſcon, and Torquatus to Rome.

Philometor refuſes to ſubmit to the decree of the ſenate.

In the mean time the Cyreneans, being informed of the ill conduct of Phyſcon during his ſhort reign at Alexandria, conceived ſo ſtrong an averſion againſt him, that they reſolved to keep him out of their country by force of arms. It was not doubted, but Philometor fomented under-hand theſe diſturbances in order to find his brother employment at home, and thereby divert him from raiſing new commotions in Egypt or Cyprus. Phyſcon, being informed of theſe troubles, and at the ſame time receiving intelligence that the Cyreneans were already in the field, laid aſide all thoughts of Cyprus, and leaving Apis where his fleet lay in harbour, he haſtened to Cyrene with all his forces, but was on his arrival overthrown by the rebels. Hereupon being involved in great difficulties, he reſolved to ſend two embaſſadors to Rome, there to renew his his complaints againſt his brother, not daring to go thither in perſon, till ſuch time as the troubles raiſed at Cyrene were appeaſed. The embaſſadors, ſetting out with Torquatus and Merula, arrived ſafe at Rome, where, after a long debate between them and Menithyllus, whom Philometor had ſent back to Rome on this occaſion, the ſenate not only declared in favour of Phyſcon, but to expreſs their reſentment againſt Philometor for not ſubmitting to their decree, renounced all friendſhip and alliance with him, and ordered his embaſſadors to leave the city in five days. Two embaſſadors were immediately diſpatched to Cyrene, to acquaint Phyſcon with the reſolution of the Roman ſenate [c].

The Cyreneans riſe up in arms againſt Phyſcon.

[a] Polyb. legat. 113. p. 942.

[b] Polyb. legat. 116. p. 950.

A conſpiracy formed againſt him.

PHYSCON, having at laſt got the better of his rebellious ſubjects, eſtabliſhed himſelf in Cyrene; but his wicked and vicious conduct ſoon eſtranged the minds of the Cyreneans from their new king to ſuch a degree, that ſome of them, entering into a conſpiracy againſt him, fell upon him one night as he was returning to his palace, wounded him in ſeveral places, and left him for dead on the ſpot. This he laid to the charge of his brother Philometor, and as ſoon as he was recovered returned to Rome to make his complaints to the ſenate, and ſhew them the ſcars of his wounds, accuſing him of having employed the aſſaſſins, from whom he had received them [d]. Though Philometor was known to be a prince of a moſt mild and humane diſpoſition, and of all men living the moſt unlikely to have given countenance to ſo black an attempt, yet the ſenate, being offended at his refuſing to ſubmit to the regulations they had made with reſpect to the iſland of Cyprus, hearkened to this falſe accuſation, and carried their perjudice againſt him to ſuch a height, that they would not ſo much as hear what his embaſſadors had to ſay in confutation of the charge, but ordered them forthwith to depart the city. At the ſame time they appointed five commiſſioners to conduct Phyſcon into Cyprus, and put him in poſſeſſion of that iſland, enjoining all their allies in thoſe parts to furniſh him with forces for that purpoſe [e].

Phyſcon defeated, and taken priſoner by his brother Philometor who generouſly pardons him

PHYSCON, having by this means got together an army, which ſeemed to him ſufficient for the execution of his deſign, landed in Cyprus; but, being there encountered by [c] Polyb. legat. 116, 117. p. 950. [d] Idem legat. 132 p. 961. [e] Polyb. legat. 133. & in excerpt. Valeſii, p. 197.

by Philometor in perſon, his forces were put to flight, and he obliged to ſhut himſelf up in Lapitho, a city in that iſland, where he was cloſely beſieged, and at length taken and delivered up to Philometor, whom he had ſo highly provoked. Every one expected he would have treated him with the ſeverity he well deſerved; but the prince gave on this occaſion a ſignal proof of his good nature and truly generous temper; for he not only forgave him, but reſtored to him Libya and Cyrene, adding ſome other territories in lieu of the iſland of Cyprus, and promiſing him his daughter in marriage [f]. Thus an end was put to the war between the two brothers, the Romans being aſhamed to oppoſe any longer a prince, whoſe clemency had gained him the affection of all the neighbouring nations.

PHILOMETOR on his return to Alexandria appointed one Archias governor of the iſland of Cyprus. But he, ſoon after the king's departure, agreed with Demetrius king of Syria to betray the iſland to him for five hundred talents. The treachery was diſcovered before it took effect, and the traitor, to avoid the puniſhment which he deſerved, laid violent hands on himſelf. Archias had formerly ſerved Ptolemy with great fidelity, and even attended him to Rome, when he was driven out of his kingdom, and forced to implore the aſſiſtance of the ſenate in his diſtreſs. But as he was of a covetous temper, his fidelity was not proof againſt money; and therefore offered to betray his truſt for the abovementioned ſum, and loſt his life by the bargain [g]. Ptolemy, being diſguſted with Demetrius for his attempt upon Cyprus, joined Attalus king of Pergamus and Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, in ſetting up a pretender to his crown, and ſupporting him with all the ſtrength of his kingdom, as we have related at length in the hiſtory of Syria [h]. This was Alexander Balas, to whom he even gave his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, after he had placed him on the throne of Syria. But he, notwithſtanding theſe and many other favours, being ſuſpected of having entered into a plot againſt his benefactor, Ptolemy, highly provoked at his ingratitude, became his greateſt enemy, and marching againſt him routed his army in the neighbourhood of Antioch, Death of Philometor

[f] Polyb. in excerpt. Valeſii, p. 197. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Val. p. 334, 335. Liv. l. xlvii. Zonar. ex Dion.
[g] Polyb. in excerpt. Val. p. 170. [h] See vol. ix. p. 110.

Antioch, but died a few days after of the wounds he received in the engagement, as we have related elsewhere [i].

His character.

He was, without all doubt, an excellent prince, and is by all the profane historians highly commended on account of his clemency and good nature. Polybius, who was his contemporary, gives him this character; he was, says that historian, an enemy to all kind of cruelty and oppression, averse from spilling the blood of his subjects, and so much inclined to mercy, that during the whole time of his long reign he put none of his nobles, nor even of the citizens of Alexandria, to death, though some of them well deserved it. Though his brother, continues the same writer, had provoked him to the highest degree, and committed such crimes as to others would have seemed unpardonable, yet he not only forgave him, but treated him with the affection of a kind brother [k]. 'Tis true, that in the beginning of his reign he was looked upon, as Justin informs us [l], as a very mean-spirited prince, keeping, while in the army, at as great a distance from all dangers as he was able, and afterwards submitting in a shameful manner to the will of Antiochus Epiphanes king of Syria, by whom he suffered himself to be deprived of a rich and powerful kingdom without attempting to recover it. But this mean behaviour was not owing to his want of natural courage or capacity, for he afterwards gave many instances of both, as we have seen, but to his effeminate education. For the eunuch Eulæus, who had the care of his education and was at the same time one of his prime ministers, endeavoured to corrupt him with all manner of luxury, in order to render him unfit for governing, and by that means keep the power in his own hands. He took the name of Philometor to testify his gratitude to his mother Cleopatra, for her prudent and careful administration during his minority. He allowed the Jews to build a temple in Egypt like that of Jerusalem, being induced thereunto by Onias, who was in high favour both with him and his queen Cleopatra [m]. Aristobulus an Alexandrian Jew, and a Peripatetic philosopher of great note, is said to have been Ptolemy's preceptor, and to have dedicated to him a comment, which he wrote on the five books books of Moſes [n]. The author of the hiſtory of the Maccabees, in his account of the troubles of Syria, repreſents Ptolemy as an ambitious and perfidious prince, trampling under his feet the moſt ſacred laws of juſtice and nature, to raiſe himſelf on the ruins of his ſon-in-law Alexander Balas; which no-ways agrees with the character given him by Joſephus, Polybius, and other profane hiſtorians [o].

[i] See vol. ix, p. 121. [k] Polyb. in excerpt. Val. p. 191. [l] Justin. l. xxxiv. c. 2. [m] Joseph. contra Apion. l. ii.

Ptolemy Phyſcon. Year of the flood 2858. Year before Chriſt 141.

CLEOPATRA, queen of Egypt, on the death of Philometor her brother and huſband, endeavoured to ſecure the crown for the ſon ſhe had by him, being therein ſupported by ſome chief lords of the kingdom; but others, declaring for Phyſcon the deceaſed king's brother, ſent embaſſadors to invite him from Cyrene, where he then reigned, to Alexandria. This obliging Cleopatra to provide for her defence, ſhe had recourſe to Onias and Doſitheus, two Jews, who had had the whole managment of affairs during the laſt years of Philometor's reign. Theſe with an army of their countrymen haſtened to her aſſiſtance. But before hoſtilities were committed on either ſide, matters were compromiſed by the interpoſition of Thermus, a Roman embaſſador at that time in Alexandria, on the following terms, viz that Phyſcon ſhould marry Cleopatra, and reign jointly with her during his life, but at the ſame time declare her ſon by Philometor next heir to the crown [p]. To theſe terms both parties agreed; but as Phyſcon could not but look with jealouſy on the young prince, whoſe birth entitled him to the crown, he murdered him in his mother's arms on the very day of the nuptials. This prince, as we have obſerved above, was commonly called Phyſcon by reaſon of his prominent belly; but the name which he aſſumed was Euergetes, that is, the benefactor; this the Alexandrians changed into that of Kakergetes, or the evil-doer, a ſirname to which he had the juſteſt title; for he was the moſt cruel, wicked, and likewiſe the moſt vile and deſpicable, of the Ptolemies, who reigned in Egypt. He began his reign with the murder of his nephew in the manner we have related, and continued it to the laſt with the ſame cruelty and wickedneſs. He was no ſooner ſeated on the throne, than he cauſed all thoſe to be put to death, Marries Cleopatra, and on the day of the nuptials murders her ſon.

[n] Euſeb. Præp. Evang. l. xiii. c. 12. & Clem. Alexand. Strom. l. i.
[o] See Vol. ix. p. 123. [p] Joſeph. l. ii. contra Apion. p. 1064. Juſtin. l. xxxviii. c. 8.

His cruelty. death, who had shewn any concern for the murder of the young prince. Transported with rage against the Jews, for having espoused the cause of Cleopatra, he treated them more like slaves than subjects. Josephus tells us, that he condemned all those of that nation, who were at Alexandria, to be trod to death by elephants, and that by the miraculous interposition of heaven in their favour they escaped the fury of those animals. But that writer places a fact here which happened in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator, as is plain from the history of the Maccabees. However, it is certain, that this wicked prince made himself the curse of his people by his unparallelled cruelties; putting every day some of them to death, either on groundless suspicions, or for the smallest faults; and often for no faults at all, but merely to gratify his cruel and inhuman temper. Those who had the greatest share in the confidence of his brother Philometor, were sacrificed the first; and next to them most of the leading men, who had declared in his favour against Cleopatra, for as they had by their interest placed him on the throne, so they might by the same, as he apprehended, drive him from it; and therefore he resolved to dispatch his own friends after he had got rid of his brother's [q].

In the second year of his reign queen Cleopatra brought him a son, while he was employed in the performance of certain religious ceremonies, practised, according to the sacred rites of Egypt, by their kings soon after their accession to the crown. Physcon was transported with joy at the birth of a son, whom he designed for his successor, calling him Memphitis, from the ceremonies which he was discharging at the time of his birth in the city of Memphis. However he could not forbear his cruel practises even during the public rejoicings on account of the young prince's birth; but caused some chief lords of Cyrene, who attended him into Egypt, to be barbarously murdered, for having on that occasion cast some reflections on one of his favourite courtesans, by name Irene [r]. On his return to Alexandria, he banished all those who had been brought up with his brother Philometor, and without the least provocation, gave his guards, who consisted of Greek and Asiatic mercenaries, free liberty to murder and

[q] Justin. ibid. Diodor. Sicul. in exceprt. Valesii, p. 350. [r] Diodor. Sicul. ibid. p. 354.

and plunder the inhabitants of that rich metropolis at their pleaſure; and the cruelties practiſed by thoſe greedy and inhuman wretches upon this licence are not to be expreſſed. Juſtin [s] and Athenæus [t] tells us, that not only the private houſes, but the ſtreets, and even the temples ſtreamed daily with the blood of the innocent citizens; which ſo terrified the few Alexandrians, who outlived theſe repeated maſſacres, that ſtealing privately away, they fled into other countries, and left their native country in a manner deſolate. Phyſcon therefore that he might not reign over empty houſes, invited ſtrangers, by his edicts diſperſed over the neighbouring countries, to repeople the place. Upon this invitation great multitudes flocking thither, he gave them the habitations of thoſe who had fled, and, admitting them to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the former citizens, by this means repeopled the city [u]. As there were among thoſe who had leftEgypt on this occaſion many grammarians, philoſophers, phyſicians, geometricians, and maſters of other liberal arts and ſciences, by their means learning was revived in Greece, Aſia Minor, the iſlands of the Archipelago, and in other places where they ſettled. The wars, which had been carried on for a long tract of time among the ſucceſſors of Alexander, had in a manner extinguiſhed learning in thoſe parts; and it would have been entirely loſt, but for the protection and encouragement given to learned men by the Ptolemies of Egypt. The firſt Ptolemy erected at Alexandria a muſæum or college, as we have related above, for the ſupport of thoſe who devoted their time to the ſtudy of the liberal arts; and, adding to it a great library for their uſe, drew by that means moſt of the learned men out of Greece to his metropolis. Ptolemy the ſecond, and alſo the third, having herein followed the example of their predeceſſor, Alexandria became the place where the ſciences flouriſhed, when they were quite neglected elſewhere, moſt of the inhabitants of that city being bred up in the knowledge of ſome ſcience or other. Whence when they were driven by the cruelty and oppreſſions of this wicked tyrant into foreign countries, as they were qualified to gain themſelves a maintenance by teaching in the places where they ſettled the particular arts they were ſkilled

Learning revived in Greece, Aſia Minor, &

[s] Juſtin. l. xxxviii. c. 8. [t] Athen. l. iv. c. 24. [u] Juſtin. & Athen. ibid.

ſkilled in, they erected ſchools for this purpoſe in the countries, through which they were diſperſed; and being ſatisfied, by reaſon of their poverty, with a ſmall ſalary, great numbers of ſcholars flocked to them. By this means the ſeveral branches of learning were revived in thoſe eaſtern parts, in the ſame manner as they were in the latter ages in the weſtern after the taking of Conſtantinople by the Turks. For that city being reduced by the infidels in the year of the chriſtian æra 1453, the learned men, who lived there and in the other parts of Greece, to avoid the cruelty of the Turks withdrew into Italy, where, under the patronage of the Italian princes, eſpecially of Lorenzo de Medicis, they propagated their books and their learning.

Three Roman embaſſadors arrive at Alexandria.

BUT to return to Alexandria; while foreigners were flocking from all parts to that metropolis with a deſign to ſettle there, on the encouragement given them by Phyſcon, three Roman embaſſadors landed at that port, viz. Scipio Africanus the younger, Spurius Mummius, and L. Metellus. They had been ſent by their republic to viſit the countries which were ſubject to Rome, as Greece and Macedon, and thoſe alſo that were only in alliance with her; their commiſſion, being to paſs through Greece and Macedon, and from thence to the courts of the princes of Egypt, Syria, Pergamus, Bithynia, &c. to obſerve the ſtate of affairs in each kingdom, to compoſe what differences they ſhould find among their kings, and to ſettle in all places peace and concord. The report of Scipio's coming had reached Egypt before him; and upon the news of his arrival, the inhabitants repaired to the port in great crowds to ſee a man, who had filled the whole world with the fame of his exploits. On his landing he had covered his face with one of the lappets of his gown; but the Alexandrians deſired him to ſhew his face to them; the multitude being come on purpoſe to ſee him. Scipio complyed immediately with their requeſt, whereupon he was with loud acclamations applauded by the numerous crowds [u]. The king himſelf went out to meet the embaſſadors; but made ſuch an appearance as inſpired them with a contempt for him. He had, ſays Athenæus, out of the ſeventh book of Poſſidonius the Stoic [w], a great head, and a broad face, extremely deformed and ſhocking, upon a ſhort ſquat body, with a belly enormouſly prominent. His [u] Plut. in Apoph. [w] Athen. l. xii. c. 27.

His dreſs was agreeable to his vicious diſpoſition; for he wore only a fine ſtuff, which was ſo tranſparent as to leave thoſe parts viſible, which it is the chief end of garments to conceal. Scipio and his collegues were extremely offended with theſe indecencies, but they had no right to reform them. The more conſcious the king was of his crimes and wicked adminiſtration, the more reſpect he affected to ſhew to the embaſſadors. He entertained them during their ſtay at Alexandria with all the varieties of the moſt ſumptuous viands; but they, ſcorning that rich fare, as prejudicial both to their bodies and minds, touched nothing but what was neceſſary in the moſt temperate manner for the ſupport of nature. Such was the temperance of the Romans in the times we are now writing of. The king ſhewed them in perſon his palace and treaſury, and whatever elſe was worth ſeeing at Alexandria. After they had viewed that great metropolis, and made themſelves well acquainted with the ſtate of affairs there, they ſailed up the Nile to Memphis and the other parts of Egypt. In this progreſs obſerving the great number of cities, the vaſt multitudes of inhabitants, the fertility of the ſoil, &c. they concluded, that nothing was wanting to render the kingdom of Egypt one of the moſt powerful ſtates in the world, but a prince of abilities and application; and therefore were mighty well pleaſed to find a prince on the throne entirely deſtitute of every qualification that was neceſſary for ſuch an undertaking [x].

Kindly entertained by Phyſcon.

THE embaſſadors no ſooner left Egypt, but Phyſcon began to exerciſe the ſame cruelties upon the new inhabitants of Alexandria, which had obliged the antient citizens to abandon their country. No day paſſed without ſome ſignal inſtance of his cruelty and tyranny, ſuch of the Alexandrians, as were poſſeſſed of large eſtates, being daily murdered under ſome pretence or other. We have obſerved above, that he married Cleopatra, his ſiſter and brother's widow, and ſlew her ſon in her arms on the very day of the nuptials. But now falling in love with a daughter ſhe had by Philometor, who was alſo called Cleopatra, he firſt raviſhed and afterwards married her, having divorced her mother to make room for her. Theſe and many other exceſſes of the like nature exaſperated the Alexandrians a-Phyſcon divorces his ſiſter, and marries his niece.

gainſt

[x] Juſtin. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Val. Max. l. iv. c. 3. Athen. l. vi. c. 273.

gainſt him to ſuch a degree, that they wanted only an opportunity of taking up arms, and ridding themſelves of a tyrant, who was become the contempt, as well as the hatred and deteſtation, of his people. That he kept the crown on his head, under ſo general an odium and averſion of his ſubjects, was wholly owing to Hierax his chief miniſter. He was a native of Antioch, and had in the reign of Alexander Balas, in a joint commiſſion with Diodotus called afterwards Tryphon, governed the city of Antioch, as we have related elſewhere. On the turn of affairs, which aftewards happened in Syria, he retired into Egypt; and there, entering into the ſervice of Ptolemy Phyſcon, was raiſed to the chief command of the army, and moreover charged with the whole management of the affairs of the kingdom. As he was a man of great valour and wiſdom, he took care to gain the affections of the ſoldiery by paying them punctually, and to ballance, ſo far as in him lay, by his good and wiſe adminiſtration, the wicked conduct of his maſter; and by this means had the good luck to keep for ſeveral years all things quiet in the kingdom, under the moſt contemptible, brutal, and cruel tyrant that had ever ſwayed a ſcepter [y]. But afterwards, Hierax being either dead, or removed from his ſtation, the Alexandrians began openly, to complain of the oppreſſions they groaned under, and throw out threats againſt their king in caſe he did not change his conduct. But Phyſcon, in order to put them out of a condition of attempting any thing againſt him, reſolved on a general maſſacre of all their young men, in whom the whole ſtrength of the place conſiſted. Accordingly when they were one day aſſembled in the gymnaſium or place of their publick exerciſes, he cauſed fire to be ſet to it, ſo that they all periſhed in the flames, or by the ſwords of his mercenaries, whom the tyrant had placed at all the avenues. Hereupon the people, being exaſperated to the higheſt degree, aſſembled in a tumultuous manner, and running without any guide, but their rage and deſpair, to the king's palace, ſet fire to it, and reduced it to aſhes. But he had the good fortune to make his eſcape undiſcovered, and to retire to the iſland of Cyprus, with Cleopatra his wife and Memphitis his ſon by his ſiſter Cleo-

A general maſſacre of all the young men of Alexandria.

[y] Diod. Sicul. in excerpt. Val. p. 361. Athen. l. iv. p. 184. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 1. & 2.

Cleopatra [z]. Upon his flight the Alexandrians placed on the throne his divorced queen and ſiſter; but he fearing leaſt they ſhould beſtow the crown on his ſon, whom he had appointed governor of Cyrene, ſent for him into Cyprus, and as ſoon as he was landed cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated. This new act of cruelty provoking the people ſtill more againſt him, they pulled down and daſhed to pieces all the ſtatues which had been erected to him in Alexandria, which he ſuppoſing to have been done at the inſtigation of his divorced queen, his rage ſtifled all natural affection in him; wherefore conſidering Memphitis only as Cleopatra's child he reſolved to revenge the mother's quarrel upon him. Accordingly, without the leaſt concern at ſpilling the blood of a young prince, his own ſon, and amiable for his beauty and riſing virtues, he cauſed his throat to be cut in his own ſight, and his mangled members to be put into a box, with the head entire, to ſhew thereby to whom they belonged, and ſent to Alexandria. The meſſenger, who was one of his guards, was ordered to wait till the queen's birth day, which approached, and was to be celebrated with extraordinary pomp and magnificence, and then to preſent it. His orders were executed and the box conveyed to the queen in the midſt of the public rejoicings, which were quickly changed into a general mourning. The horror and deteſtation which the ſight of ſo diſmal an object ſtirred up in all who were preſent, againſt the author of ſuch a monſtrous and unparellelled cruelty, cannot be expreſſed. The abominable preſent, being expoſed to the view of the public, had the ſame effect on the populace as it had had on the nobles at court. They knew what they were to expect from a king, who had thus treated his own ſon, and therefore nothing was thought of, but how to prevent that monſter of cruelty from ever reaſcending the throne. An army was ſoon raiſed, and the command of it given to Marſyas, whom the queen had appointed general, enjoining him to take the neceſſary ſteps for the defence of the country [a].

Phyſcondriven from the throne.

Murders his own ſon, and ſends his mangled members to Cleopatra his mother.

On the other hand, Phyſcon having hired a numerous body of mercenaries, ſent them under the command of Hegelochus againſt the Alexandrians. Hereupon the two armies meeting on the frontiers of Egypt, a bloody battle

[z] Val. Max. l. ix. c. 2 Juſtin. l. xxxviii. c. 8. Oroſius, l. v. c. 10. Epit. Liv. l. lix. [a] Juſtin. ibid. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Val. p. 374. Liv. l. 3 lix. Jul. Obſequens de prodig. Val. Max l.ix. c. 2.

enſued, wherein the Egyptian army was entirely defeated, and their general Marſyas taken priſoner, and ſent in chains to Phyſcon. Every one expected that ſo bloody a tyrant would have made his unhappy priſoner firſt ſuffer the moſt exquiſite torment, and then put him to ſome cruel death. But he, to the great ſurprize of all, pardoned him, and gave him his liberty. For finding by experience that his cruelties did not keep in awe, but exaſperated the people, he reſolved to try whether he could by uſing lenity regain their affections [b]. Cleopatra, being greatly diſtreſſed by this overthrow and the loſs of her army, which was almoſt entirely cut to pieces, ſent to demand aid of Demetrius king of Syria, who had married her eldeſt daughter by Philometor, promiſing him the crown of Egypt for his reward. Demetrius, accepting the propoſal without heſitation, marched with all his forces into Egypt, and there laid ſiege to Peluſium [c]. But he being by his tyrannical government, vicious manner, and haughty behaviour, no leſs hated by the Syrians than Phyſcon was by the Egyptains, the people of Antioch, taking advantage of his abſence, broke out into open rebellion, and were joined therein by the Apamæans, and moſt of the inhabitants of the other cities of Syria. This obliged Demetrius to leave Egypt and haſten back into Syria. Cleopatra being deſtitute of the aid ſhe expected, and no-ways in a condition, after the defeat of her army, to make head againſt Phyſcon, put all her valuable effects on board a ſhip, and ſet ſail for Ptolemais, where her daughter Clopatra queen of Syria then reſided. This Cleopatra had been in her father's life-time firſt married to Alexander Balas, and afterwards to Demetrius. But Demetrius being taken priſoner by the Parthians and detained amongſt them, ſhe had after her father's death diſpoſed of herſelf to Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius. Sidetes dying ſoon after, ſhe returned to the bed of Demetrius her firſt huſband, upon his being ſet at liberty by the Parthian king [e]. Upon the flight of Cleopatra, Phyſcon returned to Alexandria, and reaſſumed the government, there being, after the retreat of Cleopatra and defeat of Marſyas, no power in Egypt to withſtand him. His firſt thoughts, after his being ſettled anew on the throne, were to be revenged on Demetrius for his Phyſcon reſtored.

[b] Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii. p. 376. [c] Juſtin. l. xxxviii. c. 9. &. l. xxxix. c. 1. [e] Juſtin. ibid. & Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 17.

his late invaſion. With this view he ſet up an impoſtor againſt him, called Alexander Zebina, whoſe adventures we have related at length in the hiſtory of Syria [f]. From this time Phyſcon held the kingdom of Egypt undiſturbed till the twenty-ninth year of his reign, and ſixty-ſeventh of his age, when he died at Alexandria, and by his death put an end to a moſt wicked life, and a moſt cruel and tyrannical reign, he having been infamous for both, beyond all who reigned before him in that country [g]. His death.

One would hardly believe, that a prince who is repreſented by hiſtorians as a monſter rather than a man, ſhould have deſerved the reputation of being the reſtorer of letters and the patron of learned men. But this is atteſted in ſeveral places by Athenœus, Vitruvius, Epiphanius, and others[h]. Athenœus tells us, that, in ſhort intervals between his debaucheries, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the polite arts and ſciences. Nay, according to this author, he had ſo extenſive a knowledge, and ſo great an eaſe in diſcourſing of all kinds of literature, that he acquired the ſirname of Ptolemy the Philologiſt. The ſame author adds, that he wrote an hiſtory in twenty-four books, and a learned comment on Homer. His hiſtory, as Epiphanius informs us, was in great repute among the antients, and often quoted by thoſe who wrote on the ſame ſubject. Galen tells us, that he enriched the Alexandrian library with a great number of valuable books, which he purchaſed at a vaſt expence, having ſent men of learning into all parts of the world for that purpoſe. He allowed one Panaretus who had been a diſciple of Arceſilas and was a man of great learning, an annual penſion of twelve talents, that is, of two thouſand three hundred and twenty-five pounds ſterling [i]. He left three ſons behind him, viz. Apion, whom he had by a concubine, Lathyrus or Lathurus, and Alexander, his children by Cleopatra his niece, whom he had married after divorcing Cleopatra her mother. He left the kingdom of Cyrene to his eldeſt ſon Apion, and that of Egypt to his widow Cleopatra in conjunction with one of her ſons, whom ſhe ſhould think fit to chuſe. The crown belonged by right of inheritance to Phyſcon an encourager of learning.

[f] Vide p. 146. [g] Porphyr. in Græc. Euſeb. Scalig. Ptolemæus in can. Epiphan. de ponder. & menſur. Hieron in Dan. c. 11. [h] Athen. l. ii. c. 33. Epiphan. de ponder. & menſ. Vitruvius in præfat. ad l. vii. [i] Vide Uſher. ad ann. Mundi 3835.

Lathyrus, the eldeſt of his lawful children; but, Phyſcon either from an ill-judged policy, or an exceſſive condeſcenſion to his wife, gave her the abſolute diſpoſal of it; and ſhe looking upon Alexander as the moſt likely to leave the whole management of affairs in her hands, reſolved to chuſe him. But the people of Alexandria, taking up arms upon this unjuſt preference, obliged her to ſend for Lathyrus from the iſland of Cyprus, whither ſhe had procured him to be baniſhed in his father's life-time, and admit him to reign jointly with her [k]. But before ſhe would ſuffer him to be inaugurated, according to the cuſtom of the country, at Memphis, ſhe forced him to divorce his eldeſt ſiſter Cleopatra, whom he paſſionately loved, and to marry in her ſtead Selene his youngeſt ſiſter, for whom he had no inclination. On his inauguration he took the name of Soter; but is called by Strabo, Trogus Pompeius, Pliny, Joſephus, and Clemens Alexandrinus, Lathyrus or Lathurus, by Athenæus and Pauſanias Philometor, which Natalis Comes, in his tranſlation of Athenæus changes into that of Philopator. The name Philometor was given him, as Pauſanias obſerves [l], by antiphraſis, no one having ever hated his mother more than he did. But he is commonly known by the name, or rather nick-name of Lathyrus, which in the Greek tongue ſignifies a chich-pea, he having in all likelihood ſome mark of this ſort on his face. The Greek word Lathyros anſwers the Latin Cicer, whence the family of the Ciceros had their name, one of their anceſtors having an excreſcence like a pea on his noſe. Cleopatra, whom Lathyrus had been obliged to repudiate, diſpoſed of herſelf in marriage to Antiochus Cyzicenus, carrying with her an army, which ſhe raiſed in Cyprus, for her portion, and thereby enabling Cyzicenus to make head againſt Antiochus Grypus his half brother and competitor, as we have related in the hiſtory of Syria [m]. However, Cyzicenus was defeated by Grypus, and his wife Cleopatra dragged from one of the temples of Antioch, where ſhe had taken ſanctuary, and put to death by the command of her ſiſter Tryphæna, the wife of Grypus [n].

Ptolemy Lathyrus Year of the Flood 2887. Before Chriſt 112.

In

[k] Juſtin. l. xxxix. c. 5. Appian. in Mithridat. 225. Trog. in Prolog. 39. & 40. Joſeph. Antiquit. l. xiii. c. 18. Clem. Alexandrin. Strom. l. i. Strab. l. xvii. p. 705. Plin. l. ii. c. 67. & l. vi. c. 30. [l] Pausan. in Atticis, p. 7. [m] Vide p. 152. [n] Juſtin. l. xxxix. c. 3.

In the mean time Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, the common mother of theſe two ſiſters, did not ſeem to be any ways affected, either with the death of the one, or the crime of the other. Her mind was ſo actuated by ambition and the deſire of reigning, that ſhe had no other thoughts, but how ſhe might beſt ſupport her authority in Egypt, and there continue to reign without controul during her life. To ſtrengthen herſelf the better, ſhe gave the kingdom of Cyprus to Alexander her younger ſon, that ſhe might from thence be aſſiſted by him againſt his brother Lathyrus, in caſe he ſhould ever diſpute the authority, which ſhe was determined never to part with [o].

Cleopatra drives out Lathyrus, and places on the throne Alexander her younger ſon.

Lathyrus had not reigned long, before his mother, provoked at ſome meaſures entered into againſt her will, found means by baſe artifices to gain over the people of Alexandria to the intereſt of her youngeſt ſon, and to place him on the throne. The matter is thus related by Juſtin [p], Pauſanias [q], Porphyrius [r], and Joſephus [s]: While the two competitors for the crown of Syria were waſting their ſtrength againſt each other, John Hyrcanus prince of the Jews, ſeeing they had nothing to fear from them, undertook the ſiege of Samaria. Hereupon the Samaritans had recourſe to Cyzicenus, who marched to their relief; but had the misfortune to be overthrown in battle by the two ſons of Hyrcanus, who had beſieged the place. After this victory the two brothers returned to the ſiege, and purſued it with ſuch vigour, that the beſieged were obliged to implore once more the aſſiſtance of Cyzicenus, who, not having ſufficient forces of his own for ſuch an attempt, deſired Lathyrus king of Egypt to ſend him a body of troops to be employed againſt the victorious Jews. Lathyrus readily complied with his requeſt, and ordered ſix thouſand men into Syria, contrary to the opinion and inclination of Cleopatra his mother. For as ſhe had two Jews, Chelcias and Ananias, the ſons of that Onias who built the Jewiſh temple in Egypt, for her chief favourites and miniſters, ſhe was very unwilling to do any thing that might redound to the diſadvantage of their nation; and therefore, being highly provoked againſt Lathyrus for this and ſome other attempts of the like nature againſt her authority, ſhe firſt took his wife Selene from him, though he had already two ſons by her, and then drove him out of the kingdom. As this could not be effected without the conſent of the Alexandrians, the treacherous and unatural mother, to ſtir up the populace againſt her own ſon, cauſed ſome of her favourite eunuchs, on whoſe fidelity ſhe could depend, to be wounded, and then bringing them covered over with blood into the public aſſembly of the Alexandrians, pretended, that they had been thus treated and abuſed by Lathyrus, for defending her perſon againſt his wicked attempts. She inflamed the people by this black fiction to ſuch a degree, that they roſe in a general tumult againſt the prince, and would have tore him in pieces had he not ſaved his life on boa'd a ſhip, which immediately ſet ſail, and delivered him from the imminent danger he was in [t]. Upon the flight of Lathyrus, Cleopatra ſent for her younger ſon Alexander, on whom ſhe had beſtowed the kingdom of Cyprus, and having declared him king of Egypt in the room of Lathyrus, obliged the latter to be content with Cyprus on his brother's quitting it [u]. This happened, according to Porphyrius [w], in the eighth year of Alexander's reign in Cyprus, and eleventh of Cleopatra's in Egypt.

[o] Pauſan. in Atticis. Porphyr. in Græc. Euſeb. Scalig. [p] Juſtin. l. xxxix. c. 4. [q] Pauſan in Attic. [r] Porphyr. ubi ſupra. [s] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 19.

NOT long after this revolution, Alexander Jannœus, king of the Jews, having ſettled matters at home, marched out againſt the inhabitants of Ptolemais, and having vanquiſhed them in battle, obliged them to ſhut themſelves up within the walls of their city, and there cloſely beſieged them. Hereupon they diſpatched meſſengers to Ptolemy Lathyrus king of Cyprus, imploring his aſſiſtance, and begging he would come in perſon to their relief. But the meſſengers were ſcarce gone, when, upon ſecond thoughts, they began to repent of what they had done. They apprehended, that they might ſuffer as much by Ptolemy's coming to them as a friend, as they could from Alexander their enemy; for they did not doubt but Cleopatra, upon their entering into an alliance with Lathyrus, would march againſt them with all the forces of Egypt. Upon this conſideration they reſolved to defend themſelves without admitting any auxiliaries at all, and took care to acquaint Ptolemy with their reſolution. But he having in the mean time, with incredible expedition, encreaſed his army to the number of thirty thouſand men, and prepared veſſels to tranſport them, notwithſtanding Lathyrus paſſes from Cyprus, where he reigned, into Phœnice.

[t] Juſtin. l. xxxix. c. 4. Pauſan. in Attic. Porphyr. ibid. p. 60.
[u] Juſtin. Pauſan. &c. ibid.
[w] Porphyr. in Græc. Euſeb. Scalig.

ſtanding their remonſtrances, landed his forces in Phœnice, and marched towards Ptolemais, encamping at a ſmall diſtance from the city. But the Ptolemaians refuſing to admit his embaſſadors into the town, or to enter into any treaty with him, he was under great perplexity, not knowing what courſe to take. While he was in this condition, meſſengers arrived at his camp from Zoilus prince of Dora and from the Gazœans, deſiring his aſſiſtance againſt the Jews; for Jannœus, having divided his army, beſieged Ptolemais with one part of his forces, and had ſent the other to lay waſte the territories of Zoilus and Gaza. Ptolemy was glad of this opportunity of employing his troops; and accordingly marched to the aſſiſtance of thoſe who had called him. This obliged Jannœus to raiſe the ſiege of Ptolemais, and lead back his army from thence to watch the motions of Lathyrus. As he was not in a condition to make head againſt ſo powerful an enemy, he pretended to court his friendſhip, and entering into a treaty with him, he engaged to pay him four hundred talents of ſilver, on condition, that he would deliver Zoilus into his hands, with the places which he held. Lathyrus cloſed with the propoſal, and accordingly ſeized on Zoilus and all his territories, with a deſign to deliver them up to Alexander Jannœus. But in the mean time, being informed that Alexander was treating under-hand with Cleopatra, in order to bring her upon him with all her forces and drive him out of Paleſtine, he broke off all friendſhip and alliance with him, and reſolved to do him all the miſchief he could [x]. Accordingly the next year, having divided his army into two bodies, he detached one of them to form the ſiege of Ptolemais for not having admitted his embaſſadors; with the other he marched in perſon againſt Alexander. At firſt he took Aſochis a city of Galilee on a ſabbath day, and carried away from thence ten thouſand captives with an immenſe booty. From Aſochis he advanced to Sepphoris, another city of the ſame country, which he inveſted; but was ſoon obliged to raiſe the ſiege, upon intelligence that Alexander was coming full march againſt him at the head of fifty, or as others write of fourſcore, thouſand men. The two armies met at Aſophos, not far from the Jordan, and engaged with the utmoſt fury. Victory was ſometime doubtful, eight thouſand of Alexander's men, who carried brazen bucklers having fought with great intrepidity and reſolution; but at length the Jews were put put to the rout after having loſt thirty thouſand, or, as Timagrines writes, fifty thouſand men, not including the priſoners taken by Lathyrus after the victory. The ſucceſs of this day was chiefly owing to one Philoſtephanus, who obſerving that his men were ready to turn their backs, being warmly charged by the Jewiſh targeteers, flanked the enemy with freſh troops, put them in confuſion, and obliged them, as they were not relieved by their companions, to give ground and ſave themſelves by a precipitate flight [y]. A moſt cruel and barbarous action is related to have been done by Lathyrus on this occaſion. For having taken up his quarters in the evening after this victory in the neighbouring villages, and finding them full of women and children, he cauſed all their throats to be cut, and their mangled limbs to be put into boiling caldrons, as if he intended to make a repaſt with them for his army. His deſign was to make the Jews believe, that his men fed upon human fleſh, and thereby ſtrike a greater terror and dread of his army into the neighbouring country. This fact is related by Joſephus on the authority of Strabo and Nicholaus Damaſcenus [z]. Lathyrus, after the defeat of Alexander, ravaged and laid waſte the whole country, the Jews being no-ways in a condition to make head againſt him, or even appear in the field.

And makes war upon Alexander Jannæus.

And defeats him.

[x] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 20.

Cruelty of Lathyrus.

THIS victory, and the advantages attending it, alarmed Cleopatra, who apprehending, that, if Lathyrus ſhould make himſelf maſter of Judæa and Phænice, he would thereby be in a condition to invade Egypt and recover that kingdom, reſolved to put a ſtop to his further progreſs. She therefore commanded an army to be raiſed, with all poſſible expedition, under the command of Chelcias and Ananias, the two Jews of whom we have made mention above. At the ſame time ſhe equipped a powerful fleet with a great number of tranſports, and putting her troops on board of them, ſhe embarqued with them herſelf and ſet ſail for Phænice; where ſhe landed her army, and ſo terrified Lathyrus with her unexpected arrival, that he abandoned the ſiege of Ptolemais and retired in great haſte into Cæle-Syria. Cleopatra diſpatched Chelcias with one part of her army after him, and marched with the other, which ſhe put under the command of Ananias, to Ptolemais, expecting the citizens would open their gates to her. But they refuſing to admit her, ſhe inveſted the place, with a deſign to reduce by force that important Obliged by Cleopatra to quit Phœnice.

[y] Joſeph. ibid, c. 20, 21.

[z] Joſph. ibid.

important fortreſs. In the mean time Chelcias having loſt his life in purſuing Lathyrus into Cæle-Syria, that prince, taking advantage of the diſorder occaſioned in the army by the loſs of their general, marched with all his forces into Egypt, hoping to find it unprovided with forces in the abſence of his mother, who had carried her beſt troops with her into Phænice. But he was diſappointed in his expectation; for the forces, which Cleopatra had left for the defence of the country, made good their ground, till they were joined by other troops, which, on this attempt of Lathyrus, ſhe detached from Phænice to reinforce them. Upon their arrival Lathyrus was obliged to return to Paleſtine, and there take up his winter quarters at Gaza [w].

Cleopatra takes Ptolemais.

CLEOPATRA, however, purſued the ſiege of Ptolemais with ſo much vigor, that ſhe reduced it at laſt. She no ſooner entered it, but Alexander Jannæus haſtened thither with rich preſents to implore her protection. What chiefly recommended him to her favour was his enmity to Lathyrus; and on this account he was received kindly by the queen; but ſome perſons about her thinking ſhe had now a fair opportunity of making herſelf miſtreſs of all Judæa by ſeizing Alexander, earneſtly preſſed her to it. The queen was not averſe from following their advice; but Ananias repreſented to her how baſe and diſhonourable it would be to treat thus an ally engaged with her in the ſame cauſe; that it was contrary to the faith of treaties, which are the foundations of ſociety; that ſuch a conduct would be highly prejudicial to her intereſt, and would not fail to draw upon her the abhorrence of all the Jews diſperſed throughout the world. Partly by theſe conſiderations, and partly by his credit, which was great with the queen, he prevailed upon her to drop the deſign, and to renew her alliance with Alexander, who having, after his return to Jeruſalem, recruited his army, took the field anew, and croſſing the Jordan laid ſiege to Gadara [x]. Lathyrus having ſpent the winter at Gaza after his retreat out of Egypt, and finding that all his efforts againſt Paleſtine would prove ineffectual, ſo long as his mother oppoſed him, abandoned that country and returned to Cyprus. Hereupon Cleopatra on her ſide ſailed back into Egypt; and thus Paleſtine, to the great joy of the Jewiſh nation, was delivered from all foreign forces [y].

CLEOPATRA

[w] Idem ibid. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Joſeph. ibid.

CLEOPATRA, understanding on her return to Alexandria, that a treaty was carrying on at Damascus between her son Lathyrus and Antiochus Cyzicenus, in virtue of which the Syrian was to supply Ptolemy with a body of troops to be employed in a second attempt upon Egypt, the queen, to render their measures abortive, gave her daughter Selene, whom she had taken from Lathyrus, to Antiochus Grypus, sending him at the same time a considerable supply of men and money. By this means Grypus being enabled to renew the war with his brother Cyzicenus, the latter had so much employment upon his hands at home, that he was not in a condition to lend any assistance to Lathyrus, who thereupon was forced to drop the project [z] and return to Cyprus.

IN the mean time Ptolemy Alexander, the younger brother, acted the base part of a slave under the specious appearance of a sovereign. But at last being tired out with the indignities he was forced to suffer from this fury, and terrified at the barbarous cruelty with which she persecuted his brother Lathyrus, especially in thus taking from him his wife and giving her to his enemy; and moreover observing, that she did not scruple to commit the greatest crimes to gratify her ambition, that prince did not think himself any longer safe near her, and therefore stole away privately from Alexandria, chusing rather to live in banishment with safety, than to reign with so wicked and cruel a mother in continual danger of his life. His flight alarmed the queen, who was well apprised, that the Alexandrians would never suffer her to reign without one of her sons. She therefore used all possible artifices to prevail upon her son to return; and it was not without great sollicitation that he was induced thereunto. Not long after his return he found, that this restless woman had formed a conspiracy against his life, and hired assassins to murder him. But Alexander having notice of it prevented the plot, and by cutting her off first made it turn upon her own head. She was a most wicked woman, as her actions sufficiently shew, and well deserved this death, had it come from any other hand but her own son. As soon as it was known at Alexandria, that the son had caused the mother to be put to death, the enormity of the crime stirred up all his subjects against him; they could not suffer a parricide to reign over them, but drove him out with ignominy, and Alexander murders his mother Cleopatra, and is driven from the throne.

[z] Justin. ibid. Liv. epit. l. lxviii.

and ſending to Cyprus for Lathyrus, replaced him on the throne. Alexander led for ſome time a rambling life in the iſland of Cos, while his brother returned in triumph into his dominions amidſt the acclamations of his people [a]. Alexander having got together ſome ſhips, he next year attempted to return into Egypt; but being met at ſea by Tyrrhus, Ptolemy's admiral, he was defeated, and obliged to fly to Myra in Lycia. From Myra he ſteered his courſe towards the iſland of Cyprus, hoping that the inhabitants would declare in his favour, and place him on the throne, which his brother had left empty to return to Egypt. But Chœreas, another of Ptolemy's admirals, coming up with him while he was ready to land, diſperſed his fleet, and killed him in the engagement, after he had reigned, or rather bore the title of king, for that was all his mother allowed him, for the ſpace of nineteen years [b]. He left a ſon behind him named alſo Alexander, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

Alexander killed.

During all the troubles that diſturbed Egypt, Apion, the natural ſon of Phyſcon, maintained peace and tranquillity in his dominions; and at length, after a reign of one-and-twenty years, in order to ſecure them from the miſeries, in which the countries ſubject to the Egyptian government were involved, deviſed them by will to the Romans. He was, as we have related above ſon to Phyſcon by a concubine named Irene, and by him at his death appointed king of Cyrenaica. This country enjoyed its freedom, till it was reduced by Ptolemy the firſt king of Egypt; after it became ſubject to the crown of Egypt, it was governed by the brothers or younger ſons of thoſe princes, till Ptolemy, ſirnamed Apion or the lean, bequeathed it to the Romans. It comprehended the following cities, Cyrene, Berenice, Arſinoe, Ptolemais, and Apollonia, whence it was called the African Pentapolis. The firſt was the capital of the country, and one of the moſt wealthy cities in Africa. Near it was the fountain Cyre mentioned by Callimachus, and mount Cyra ſpoke of by Juſtin. Ariſtippus the founder of the ſect of the Cyrenaics, Eratoſthenes the geographer, and Carneades the philoſopher, were all natives of Cyrene. This city is mentioned by the prophet Amos [c], and in the ſecond book of Apion by his laſt will leaves the kingdom of Cyrenaica to the Romans.

[a] Juſtin. l. xxxxix. c. 4. Appian. in Syriac. Epit. Liv. l. lxxviii. Memnon. c. 33. Euſeb. in Chron. Pauſan. in Attic. Athenæus, l. xii. p. 550. [b] Porphyr. in Græc. Euſeb. Scal. [c] Amos. c. 9.

of kings by the name of Kir; but is now called Corene and Cairan. Herodotus gives a very particular, but fabulous, account of the origin of this city [d]; and Juſtin is pretty diffuſe on the ſame ſubject [e]; but Strabo tells us in few words, that Cyrene was built by one Battus, a native of the iſland of Thera, of whom we have ſpoken in the hiſtory of the iſlands of the Ægean ſea, or the Archipelago. From him the Cyreneans are called by the poet Silius Battiadæ [f]. As the iſland of Thera, the native country of Battus, belonged to the Lacedæmonians, Joſephus tells us, that the Cyreneans were originally Lacedæmonians [g]. The ſecond of the five cities took its name from Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus and wife of Ptolemy Euergetes the firſt. This city was firſt called Heſperis and Heſperides, and ſtood but at a ſmall diſtance from the Great Syrtis. Some have placed in its territory the famous gardens of the Heſperides, and the river Lethon or Lethe, which has furniſhed the poets with numberleſs fictions. It is at preſent a miſerable village, called by its beggarly inhabitants Bernichio. Arſinoe, another conſiderable city of Cyrenaica, took its name from the wife of Ptolemy Philadelphus, to whom the Egyptians, as Callimachus tells us, paid divine honours, equalling her to Venus. The antient name of this city was, according to Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, Stephanus, &c. Teuchira or Tauchira. Ferrarius gives it the name of Sues, but the Turks call it Barraru. Ptolemais was antienly called Barca, according to Pliny, Strabo, and Stephanus. But Ptolemy makes Barca and Ptolemais two different cities, placing the former in the inland country, and the latter on the coaſt. It is now commonly called Tolemata. Cyrenaica comprehended other countries beſides the Pentapolis, which the Romans upon the death of Apion did not fail to take poſſeſſion of. But they were at firſt very moderate in the exerciſe of their power, declaring the people a free nation, and only obliging them to pay an annual tribute of laſer, which grew here in great quantities, and was better than in any other part of the world (H). By this means the Libyan Pentapolis enjoyed

[d] Herodot. l. iv. c. 156.
[e] Juſtin. l. xiii. c. 7.
[f] Silius Italic. l. xi. v. 60.
[g] Joſeph. de Bell. Judaic. l. xi. c. 28.

(H) The Laſer of Africa, which ſome moderns confound with the Benjamin, was a viſcous and medicinal juice drawn by inciſion from a plant, which the Latins called Laſerpitium, and the Greeks Σελφιον. It grew in ſome places of Cyrenaica, and the liquor enjoyed a perfect freedom, and acknowledged no foreign dominion, Rome being at present content with lessening very considerably the power of Egypt. Not long after this country became a prey to two tyrants, who successively usurped a sovereign authority over their fellow-citizens; but Lucullus, while he served under Sylla in quality of quæstor, having touched liquor it produced was according to Pliny, worth its weight in silver. Strabo tells us, that in his time the species was lost, some Nomades, who made an interruption into Egypt, having tore up the roots of that shrub (16). But Pliny ascribes the loss of it to the avarice of the publicans, or public farmers, who used to feed their cattle with it. Nevertheless in Nero's time there was one shrub of it found, which the natives sent as a great rarity to that emperor (17). The same author gives in the place we have quoted an account of the qualities of the Laser, and describes the manner of preparing it; for it was formerly prescribed in many cases by physicians, and thought to be a sovereign remedy against several distempers. The stalks baked under ashes, and taken before any other food for forty days together, purified the blood, corrected the vicious humours, and was deemed a great restorative of a worn-out constitution. Pliny adds, that it had the same effects on cattle as on men. It fattened sheep and oxen, according to him, and gave the meat an exquisite flavour. In the year of Rome 660, Valerius and Herennius being consuls, it was first brought from Cyrenaica to that city, as the same writer informs us; and there greatly admired, and sought for by all the citizens. From that time the care and sale of it was committed to the quæstors. In the beginning of the civil war, Julius Cæsar, having seized the public treasury, is said to have taken out of it, besides other things, fifteen hundred pounds of laser. Afterwards Rome was supply'd with this plant from Persia, Syria, and Media; but the laser brought from those countries had much less virtue than that of Cyrenaica. Some botanists have confounded this famous specific with Assa-fœtida, and others with Benjamin, which is a valuable sort of rosin brought from the kingdom of Lao, and several parts of the East-Indies. Theophrastus has given us in his history a full account of the properties and uses of the Laserpitium; and described its roots, leaves, stalks, and the peculiar form of each of its parts (18). From this antient botanist Pliny seems to have copied the accounts which we read of it in his nineteenth book. If we stand to either of the descriptions or accounts, we must own, that the laser is very different both from the Benjamin, and from the stinking and and offensive drug called Assa-fœtida.

(16) Strab. l. ix. (17) Plin. l. ix. c. 3. (18) Theophrastus, l. iii.

touched at Cyrene as he coaſted along Africa, reſtored the oppreſſed province to its former liberty, reſettled it in peace, and reformed its laws, putting at the ſame time the Cyreneans in mind of the anſwer Plato had formerly given to the deputies of their nation, deſiring him to give them a plan of government. The philoſopher refuſed to grant them their requeſt, ſaying, that a people ſo happy and rich as they were, would never ſubmit to the authority of laws [h]. But to return to Egypt.

Lathyrus takes the city of Thebes and plunders it.

Ptolemy Lathyrus, being upon the death of his mother and brother delivered from two formidable competitors to his crown, began to ſettle all things on their antient footing, and to remedy, as far as in him lay, the many diſorders and abuſes which had crept in during the late troubles. But the city of Thebes in the Upper Egypt refuſed to ſubmit to his regulations, and even attempted to ſhake off the yoke, and reſume their antient liberties. Hereupon Lathyrus marched againſt the rebels, defeated them in a pitched battle, and laid cloſe ſiege to their city, which with incredible obſtinacy held out againſt the utmoſt efforts of a victorious army for the ſpace of three years. But it was at laſt taken, and by way of puniſhment given up to be plundered by the enraged ſoldiery, who left every-where melancholy marks of their avarice and cruelty. Thebes, which till that time had been one of the greateſt and moſt wealthy cities of Egypt; was on this occaſion reduced to ſo low a condition, that it never after made any figure in hiſtory [i]. It is ſurprizing, that Pauſanias, deceived by the identity of names, ſhould apply the hiſtory of the revolt and conqueſt of Thebes in Egypt to the city of Thebes in Bœotia. What had the kings of Egypt to do with Thebes in Bœotia, which at this time was under the protection of the Romans, having been united in intereſt with that republic againſt the kings of Macedon, during the whole time of the Macedonian war?

TOWARDS the latter end of this king's reign, Lucullus, being ſent by Sylla to procure ſhips from the princes who retained any regard for the Roman name, in order to block up the ports of Piræeus and Munychia, landed at Alexandria; where the inhabitants, purſuant to Lathyrus's orders, received him with thoſe honours which were paid only to the kings of Egypt. His entrance into that city was a kind of of triumph. Upon the news of his approach the royal fleet ſailed out in good order to meet him. The king received him with all poſſible marks of diſtinction; appointed him an apartment in his own palace, an honour which had never before been beſtowed upon any foreigner; and ordered his miniſters to give Lucullus's attendants four times the allowance, which was uſually given to the other embaſſadors. But the Roman contented himſelf with bare neceſſaries, and refuſed a preſent in money which Ptolemy preſſed him to accept. He likewiſe declined going to Memphis, and to the other famous cities of Egypt, to ſee there the wonders that were the admiration of all ſtrangers, ſaying, that ſuch amuſements became none but idle perſons, and that it would be ſhameful in him to take a journey of pleaſure, while his general was daily hazarding his life in the ſervice of his country. But, after all, the king could not be prevailed upon to part with any of his ſhips, pretending, that he was threatened with a civil war in his own dominions. He therefore diſmiſſed Lucullus without complying with his requeſt, after having preſented him with his picture cut in an emerald of great value [k]. This picture, or head of Ptolemy, cut in an emerald, Turnebius is pleaſed to turn into a cup ſet with precious ſtones.

[h] Appian. in Mithridat. Plut. in Lucullo. [i] Pauſan. in Atticis, p. 8.

NOT long after Lathyrus died, having reigned from the death of his father thirty-ſix years, viz, eleven jointly with his mother in Egypt, eighteen in Cyprus, and ſeven alone in Egypt, after his mother's death. Ptolemy the aſtronomer takes no notice of Alexander in his canon, but reckons the whole time from the death of Ptolemy Phyſcon to that of Ptolemy Lathyrus, as the reign of the latter, though he lived half of them in the iſland of Cyprus (I). He was ſucceed- Lathyrus dies.

ed

[k] Plut. in Lucullo.

(I) Though no two perſons were ever more unlike, than Cleopatra the mother of Philometor and Phyſcon and Cleopatra the mother of Lathyrus and Alexander, yet the two jeſuits, Catrou and Rouille, authors of the Roman hiſtory now publiſhing at Paris, confound them, and charge the former, who was a princeſs of an unblemiſhed character, and governed with great equity, wiſdom, and moderation, during the minority of her children, with the many enormous crimes, which by all hiſtorians, except themſelves, are imputed to the latter (19). Their confounding thus the ed by Cleopatra his daughter, and only legitimate offspring. She is called by Pauſanias [l] Berenice, which was her proper name; for as all the males, according to the eſtabliſhed cuſtom of the royal family of Egypt, had the name of Ptolemy, ſo the females had that of Cleopatra, and beſides other names to diſtinguiſh them from each other. Thus for inſtance, Selene was called Cleopatra, and ſo were alſo her two ſiſters [m]. In like manner the daughter of Lathyrus, whoſe proper name was Berenice, bears alſo that of Cleopatra. The obſerving of this will remove many obſcurities and difficulties which occur in the hiſtory of Egypt. Sylla, who, at this time, was perpetual dictator at Rome, and gave or took away crowns at pleaſure, hearing that Lathyrus was dead without male iſſue, ſent Alexander the ſon of that Alexander, who had reigned before Lathyrus and murdered his mother, to ſucceed his uncle in the kingdom, as the next heir of the male line.

(19) Vide Hiſt. Rom. l. xliij.

Alexander II. Year of the flood, 2923. Year before Chriſt, 76.

THIS Alexander had met with many adventures. When Cleopatra, the mother of Ptolemy Alexander and Ptolemy Lathyrus, marched wirh her army into Phænice againſt the latter, ſhe ſent her grandſon Alexander, the ſon of the former, who then reigned with her in Egypt, into the iſland of Cos, with a great ſum of money, all her jewels the two mothers leads them of courſe into the like confuſion with reſpect to their children; and this ſecond miſtake, ſtill more material than the former, plunges them into endleſs blunders, which plainly betray in thoſe reverend writers a very ſuperficial knowledge, not to ſay a total ignorance of the Syrian hiſtory. For what they find related by the antients of Lathyrus and Alexander the ſons of Phyſcon, and his niece Cleopatra, they apply to Philometor and his brother Phyſcon, the ſons of Antiochus Epiphanes, and Cleopatra the daughter of Antiochus the Great. Thus, for inſtance, they tell us, that Phyſcon the youngeſt was alſo called Alexander, that the capricious mother, whom they call elſewhere a virtuous princeſs (20), conceived a fondneſs for him, which tended to nothing leſs than robbing Ptolemy the elder brother, whom ſhe hated, of the crown, and that hence the ſirname of Philometor was given him by way of deriſion. A few lines after they tell us, that the ſon, whom ſhe tenderly loved, killed her with his own hand, and that he, and not the elder, was for (20) Lib. xxxix. Ad. ann. urb. 561.

[l] Pauſan in Atticis.

[m] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 24.

jewels, and her moſt valuable effects, to be depoſited there as a reſerve againſt all events. When Mithridates made himſelf maſter of that iſland, the inhabitants delivered up into his hands the young Egyptian prince, and the treaſures which his grand-mother had lodged there with him. The king of Pontus gave him an education ſuitable to his birth; but he, not thinking himſelf ſafe with a prince who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his own children, fled from the court of Mithridates, and took refuge in Sylla's camp, while that general was making war in Aſia. From that time he had lived in the dictator's family, and in a manner among his domeſtics, till news was brought to Rome of the death of Lathyrus. Then Sylla ſent him to take poſſeſſion of the crown of Egypt, as the neareſt heir male of the deceaſed king. But the Alexandrians, having placed Cleopatra the daughter of Lathyrus on the throne ſix months before his arrival in Egypt, to compromiſe the matter and avoid diſpleaſing Sylla, who governed Rome with an abſolute ſway, prevailed upon Alexander to marry Cleopatra and reign jointly with her. The nuptials were Alexander marries Cleopatra the daughter of Lathyrus, and murders her.

for this parricide ironically ſirnamed Philometor. What a complication of blunders, anachroniſms, and contradictions! This is, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, turning the whole hiſtory of Syria topſy-turvy. Cleopatra, the mother of Philometor and Phyſcon, died quietly in her bed, when her eldeſt ſon was but thirteen years old; for the year enſuing he was declared, as S. Jerom informs us (21), to be out of his minority, which was a great ſolemnity among the Egyptians called Ανακλητηρια, or, the ſolemnity of ſalutation, becauſe they then firſt ſaluted their young prince as king. This ceremony was always performed in the fourteenth year of their king's age, he being then, according to their laws, out of his minority. Polybius tells us (22), that Cleopatra, as ſhe was ſiſter to Antiochus Epiphanes king of Syria, and mother to Philometor and Phyſcon, prevented, ſo long as ſhe lived, a rupture between them; but that upon her death the management of affairs falling into the hands of Lennæus a nobleman of the court, and Eulæus an eunuch, theſe no ſooner entered on the adminiſtration, but they demanded of Epiphanes the provinces of Cœle-Syria and Paleſtine. This gave occaſion to the war, and not the ambition of Antiochus, veiled with the ſpecious pretence of aſſiſting Philometor againſt the intrigues of his mother, prejudiced in favour of her youngeſt ſon, Cleopatra being dead a whole year before this rupture.

(21) Hieronym. in c. 11. Dan. (22) Polyb. legat. 82, p. 908.

accordingly celebrated with great pomp and magnificence; but Alexander, either out of a diſlike to Cleopatra's perſon, or not caring to have a partner in the government, cauſed her to be aſſaſſinated nineteen days after the marriage, the blackeſt murders aud parricides being now become in a manner faſhionable at the court of Egypt [n]. Porphyry and Appian tell us, that the Alexandrians, highly provoked at this murder and the haughty and imperious airs their new king aſſumed, roſe up in arms, ſurrounded his palace, and dragging him into the gymnaſium, there put him to death, after a reign of nineteen days [o]. But it is manifeſt from Suetonius and Cicero, that he reigned fifteen years after the death of Cleopatra, as we ſhall make appear in the ſequel of this hiſtory, againſt the common opinion, or rather miſtake, of hiſtorians and chronologers, who begin the reign of Ptolemy Auletes here, confounding it with that of Alexander. This prince reigned fifteen years during which time he made himſelf ſo odious to his ſubjects by his cruelties and vices, that at laſt they made a general inſurrection, and would have ſacrificed him to their reſentment, had he not ſeaſonably withdrawn himſelf from the fury of the enraged multitude. He fled firſt to Pompey, who was then in that neighbourhood carrying on the war with Mithridates king of Pontus, and offered him rich preſents and a large ſum of money, in hopes of prevailing upon him, by that means, to eſpouſe his cauſe and reſtore him to the crown; but Pompey refuſed to meddle with this matter, as being foreign to his commiſſion. Hereupon the baniſhed prince took refuge in the city of Tyre, whither he had ſent before great part of his treaſures, and there died ſome months after, perhaps with grief for the loſs of his crown [p]. It is to be obſerved, that Ptolemy, in his chronological canon, does not reckon Alexander among the kings of Egypt, but begins the reign of Auletes his ſucceſſor from the death of Lathyrus, tho' it is manifeſt, both from Cicero and Suetonius, that Alexander reigned full fifteen years between theſe two princes [q]. Perhaps Auletes, on his father Lathyrus's death, got poſſeſſion of ſome part of the Egyptian empire; and, on this account [r]s driven out.

Dies in baniſhment.

[n] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 24. Appian. de bell. civil. l. i. Porphyr. in Græc. Euſeb. Scalig. [o] Appian. & Porphyr. ibid. [p] Sueton. in Jul. Cæſ. c. 11. Trogus in prolog. Cic. in orat. 2. contra Rullum. [q] Cic. & Suet. ibid.

account, is looked upon by Ptolemy as his immediate ſucceſſor, tho' he had not the whole kingdom till fifteen years after.

ALEXANDER, when driven from his dominions and forced to ſhut himſelf up in the city of Tyre, had, by his embaſſadors, appealed to the Roman ſenate againſt his rebellious ſubjects; but dying before the negotiation was finiſhed, he made over, by his laſt will, all his rights to the Roman people, declaring them heirs to his kingdom, not out of any affection to the republic, but to raiſe, by that means, a diſpute between Rome and his rival Auletes, whom the Egyptians had placed on the throne. The will was brought to Rome, where it occaſioned great debates. Some, with Lucius Marcius Philippus, were for taking immediate poſſeſſion of the kingdom bequeathed to them in prejudice of Auletes. Others, with Cicero, were of opinion, that no notice ſhould be taken of ſuch a will, ſince Alexander had no right to diſpoſe of his dominions in prejudice of his ſucceſſor, and to exclude from the crown all thoſe who were of the royal blood of Egypt. Cicero repreſented, that ſuch a notorious uſurpation would debaſe the majeſty of the Roman people, and involve them in endleſs wars and diſputes; that the fruitful fields of Egypt would be a ſtrong temptation to the ambition of the tribunes and to the avarice of the common people, who would claim thoſe lands as due to them on account of their poverty; and laſtly, that this new acquiſition would revive the bloody quarrels, which the Agrarian laws had ſo often raiſed in the heart of the republic. The authority of Cicero and the reaſons he alledged againſt the opinion of Marcius Philippus were of great weight with the ſenate; but what prevented them from ſeizing on Egypt at that time was, their lately having taken poſſeſſion of Bithynia, in virtue of the will of Nicomedes, and of Cyrene and Lybia by the like will of Apion. They thought therefore, that if they ſhould, on the ſame pretence, take poſſeſſion of Egypt, this might give too great umbrage, as if they deſigned to engroſs to themſelves all foreign dominions; beſides, as Mithridates was not at that time entirely reduced, they were afraid this might involve them in a new war, while they had the other ſtill on their hands. On theſe conſiderations they contented themſelves, for the preſent, with ſending deputies to Tyre, to take poſſeſſion of the effects of

of the deceased king for the use of the republic, and dropped all the rest [r].

Ptolemy Auletes. Year of the flood, 2938. Before Christ 61.

THE Egyptians, having driven Alexander from the throne in the manner we have related, called to the crown Ptolemy, sirnamed Auletes, or the Flute-player, the natural son of Ptolemy Lathyrus, who had no male issue by his wife, that survived him, but several by his concubines. One of these had the kingdom of Cyprus, where he reigned till he was, with the greatest injustice, deprived of it by the Romans. Auletes, on whom the Alexandrians bestowed the crown after the expulsion of Alexander, is also called by the historians Dionysius Neos, or the New Bacchus. The name of Auletes was given him, because he piqued himself upon his skill in playing on the flute, and even debased himself so as to contend for the prize in the public games. He took great pleasure in imitating the effeminacies of the Bacchanals, dancing in a female dress, and in the same measures that they used during the solemnities of their god Bacchus; aud hence he had the name of the New Dionysius or Bacchus [s]. Strabo tells us, that he surpassed all the kings who reigned before him in the effeminacy of his manners, and was no less infamous on that account, than his grandfather Physcon was for his wickedness [t].

Is acknowledged by the Romans.

As he had but a contested title to the crown, being only the natural son of Lathyrus, and the Romans pretending, that in virtue of the last will of Alexander, his dominions were devolved upon their republic, his first care was to get himself declared an ally of Rome, which was a certain means of being authentically acknowledged lawful king of Egypt. This he obtained by applying to Julius Cæsar, who was then consul, and, being immensely in debt, willingly embraced this opportunity of raising money; for he obliged the king of Egypt to purchase the desired alliance at the price of six thousand talents, that is, one million one hundred sixty-two thousand five hundred pounds sterling, paid partly to himself, and partly to Pompey, whose interest was necessary for obtaining the consent of the people [u]. Tho' that prince's yearly revenues were twice this sum, yet he could not raise it immediately without overtaxing his subjects, which occasioned a general discontent throughout throughout the kingdom. While the Egyptians were thus diſſatisfied with the conduct of their king, and even ready to riſe up in arms againſt him, a moſt unjuſt decree was carried at Rome by the tribune Clodius, for depoſing Ptolemy king of Cyprus, ſeizing his kingdom for the republic, and confiſcating all his effects. When the Alexandrians heard of the intentions of the republic, they preſſed Auletes to demand that iſland as an antient appendant on Egypt, and, in caſe of a denial, to declare war againſt the imperious and encroaching republic; which he refuſing to do, the people, already provoked with the exorbitant taxes with which he loaded them, ran to arms and ſurrounded the palace; but the king eſcaped their fury, and, by the advice of his favourite Theophanes, who gave him timely notice of the inſurrection, having privately withdrawn from Alexandria, croſſed Egypt, and embarqued for Rhodes, with a deſign to implore the aſſiſtance of his old protectors at Rome [w]. In his flight he had time to reflect, as Tully obſerves [x], on his change of fortune, and being very hungry and much fatigued, he applied to a peaſant, who received him into his poor hut, and preſented him with a piece of brown bread; which ſeemed ſo ſavoury to him, that he uſed to ſay, he had never had a more delicious meal.

[r] Cic. in orat. 1 & 2. in Rull. [s] Strabo, l. xvii. p. 796. Trogus in prolog. 39. Lucian de non tem. cred. calum. [t] Strabo, ibid. [u] Plut. in Cæs. Dio. Cass. l. xxxviii.

Is driven from the throne.

THE king arriving in Rhodes was informed, that the famous Cato was there in his way to Cyprus, being charged by the ſeditious Clodius to put in execution the unjuſt decree of the people, depriving Ptolemy of that iſland, as we have related at length in the hiſtory of Cyprus [y]. Auletes, deſirous to confer with a man of his prudence and integrity about his affairs, ſent immediately to acquaint him with his arrival, expecting, that, upon this notice, he would without delay come and wait upon him; but the proud Roman told the meſſenger, that, if the king of Egypt had any thing to ſay to Cato, he might, if he thought proper, come to his houſe. Accordingly Auletes went to pay him a viſit; but Cato did not vouchſafe ſo much as to riſe when the king entered his chamber, or to ſalute him otherwiſe than as a private perſon. The Egyptian monarch was much ſurprized to ſee ſo much haughtineſs and ſtate joined to the great ſimplicity and modeſty which he obſerved in the Roman's dreſs and Confers with Cato at Rhodes.

[w] Dio. Caſſ. & Plut, ibid. Epitom. Liv. l. 104. [x] Cic. Tuſcul. quæſt. l. v. [y] See vol. 7. book ii. c. 1. ſect. 5.

equipage, and would have entertained a very mean opinion of him, had he not discovered in his conversation an extraordinary fund of probity and good sense; for the king having laid before him the situation of his affairs, Cato blamed him for leaving Egypt, the richest kingdom in the world, in order to expose himself to the many insults and indignities which he would meet with at Rome, nothing being there in request but wealth, pomp, and grandeur. He did not scruple to tell him, that all the riches of Egypt would not be sufficient to satisfy the rapacious avarice of the leading men there; that they would not concern themselves about the interests of a king, who brought nothing with him but wants and complaints; that new patrons, after he had purchased them at a great rate, would prove new chains to him, &c. He therefore advised him to return to Egypt, and strive, by a more equitable conduct, to regain the affections of his people, which he had lost by his male-administration. He even offered to reconduct him thither in person, and employ his mediation and good offices in his behalf [z]. Ptolemy, reflecting on what the wise Roman told him, perceived the error he had committed in quitting his kingdom, and entertained some thoughts of returning to it; but, the friends he had with him having dissuaded him from the following Cato's good counsel, he pursued his journey to Rome.

Goes to Rome.

His daughter Berenice placed on the throne.

In the mean time the Egyptians, not knowing what was become of him, and either believing, or feigning to believe, that he was dead, placed Berenice his daughter on the throne, and sent an embassy into Syria to Antiochus Asiaticus, who, by his mother Selene the daughter of Ptolemy Physcon, was the next male heir of the family, inviting him into Egypt, in order to marry Berenice, and reign jointly with her; but he being dead, the embassadors were injoined by the chief men of Alexandria, to make the same proposal to Seleucus his brother [a], who readily accepted the offer. This Seleucus Strabo describes as a monster of deformity, and adds, that his ill-shaped body was animated by a yet more deformed soul. The Egyptians soon discovered his true character, and gave him the nick-name of Cybiosactes, that is, the Scullion; for such he was in his whole conduct and behaviour. He was scarce seated on the throne, when he gave a signal instance of of his ſordid and avaricious temper. Ptolemy the firſt had cauſed the body of Alexander the Great to be depoſited in a coffin of maſſy gold; this Cybioſactes ſeized, and by this ſhocking crime provoked Berenice, who was already grown weary of him, to ſuch a degree, that, breaking through the moſt ſacred ties, ſhe cauſed him to be ſtrangled [b]. Having thus got rid of a man, whoſe preſence ſhe could no longer bear, ſhe married one Archelaus, high-prieſt of Comana in Pontus, who pretended to be the ſon of Mithridates the Great, tho' he was, in fact, only the ſon of that king's chief general, whom we ſhall have occaſion to bring upon the ſcene in the hiſtory of Pontus [c].

[z] Plut. in Caton. [a] Porphyr. ubi supra. & Strabo, l. xvii. p. 796.

She murders her huſband Seleucus, and marries Archelaus.

AULETES, on his arrival at Rome, found, to his great concern, that Cæſar, on whom he chiefly depended, was making war in Gaul. However, Pompey, his other patron, who was then in the city, received him with great expreſſions of kindneſs, gave him an apartment in his houſe, and omitted nothing that lay in his power to ſerve him; but, notwithſtanding the protection of ſo powerful a man, the king was forced to go from houſe to houſe, like a private perſon, ſolliciting the ſuffrages of the ſenators. After he had ſpent immenſe treaſures in procuring a ſtrong party at Rome, he was at laſt, by the intereſt of Pompey, admitted to lay his complaints before the ſenate; which he did with a great deal of art, exaggerating the hard uſage he had met with from his rebellious ſubjects, and putting the ſenators in mind of his alliance with the republic, by the articles of which they were bound to ſupport him to the utmoſt of their power, againſt his enemies both foreign and domeſtic. While Auletes was thus making intereſt at Rome, and courting the republic for her conſent to his being reſtored by force of arms, the Alexandrians, being informed of what paſſed in Italy, ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to the ſenate, conſiſting of an hundred citizens of diſtinction, to juſtify their revolt before the conſcript fathers. Dion, a celebrated academic philoſopher, who had many powerful friends at Rome, was at the head of this embaſſy; but Ptolemy found means to deſtroy moſt of them, either at Rome, or before their arrival in that metropolis; which ſo intimidated the reſt, that they declined clined acquitting themselves of their commission, and even demanding justice for the murder of their collegues[d]. The rumour of these murders raised the indignation of the public, and gave a general alarm. Marcus Favonius the stoic was the first who declared in the senate against Auletes. He accused him before the fathers, and exaggerated his late murders, his former miscarriages, and the shameful meanness of many self interested senators, who had suffered themselves to be corrupted with his money. At the motion of this zealous senator, Dio, the chief of the embassy, was summoned to appear before the senate, in order to give, by word of mouth and upon oath, an authentic account of the assassination of the embassadors; but Pompey, Lentulus, and the other great men at Rome, whose interest the perfidious king had bought at a vast price, declared so openly in his favour, that Dio was afraid to appear; however, he was soon after stabbed by an assassin, whom Ptolemy had hired for that purpose. The king, knowing he could depend on Pompey's protection, was not ashamed to own himself the chief author of that crime; nay, he even pretended to justify so base and treacherous an action; but nevertheless a prosecution was carried on against Ascitius the assassin, his accomplices, who were for the most part the domestics of Luceius at whose house Dio lodged, attesting upon oath, that he stabbed him with his own hand; but, in spite of these and other unexceptionable evidences, Ascitius was acquitted. Then an action was brought by the adverse party against the judges, for selling themselves to Ptolemy and betraying their trust; but, Pompey and his faction employing all their interest against the accusers, the venal judges were likewise cleared, and injustice triumphed [e].

[b] Suet. in Veſpaſ. c. xix. Strabo, l. xvii. p. 794. [c] Strabo. ibid. Dio. Caſſ. l. xxxix. p. 115—117. Cic. in Piſon, n. 49, 50.

Auletes protected at Rome.

THO' the scandalous behaviour of Auletes at Rome had made him highly odious and contemptible to the generality of the Romans, yet, by the powerful interest of Pompey's party, a decree was carried in the senate, wherein it was enacted, That the Egyptians should be compelled, by force of arms, to receive their king. All the great men of Rome were ambitious of being charged with the commission of re-conducting a king, who was undoing himself

A decree for his restoration carried in the senate.

[d] Dio. Cass. l. xcvii, xcviii. Plin. l. xxxviii. c. 10. Cic. Epist. familiar. in Pison. & pro Cael. Plut. in Cat. Min. Strab. l. xvii.
[e] Dio. Cass. Strabo, Plin. Cic. ibid.

himſelf and ruining his kingdom, to reward thoſe who protected him. No one had more reaſon to expect it than P. Lentulus Spinther the proconſul, he having been appointed governor of Cilicia, which lay in that neighbourhood, and Cicero ſupporting him with all his eloquence and intereſt. Pompey likewiſe, Cn. Cornelius Marcellinus who was then conſul, and many others, were no leſs deſirous of a commiſſion, which, they well knew, would be attended with immenſe profit. After ſome months warm debates, Pompey, whoſe too great power gave already no ſmall umbrage, was excluded, under this honourable pretence, that his preſence was neceſſary at Rome, he being charged with the care of maintaining plenty there. After the excluſion of Pompey, all things ſeemed to favour the proconſul of Cilicia's claim; but what through the ſuperſtition of the people, what by the artifices of one of the tribunes, he was unexpectedly diſappointed as well as Pompey. A ſtatue erected on the hill of Alba being beat down with thunder, the Sibylline books were conſulted, to diſcover the meaning of a prognoſtic which was deemed ominous. C. Portius Cato, who was then a young man, and one of the tribunes, took this opportunity of opening the Sibylline books, and thereby fruſtrating the intrigues and expectations of the leading men in Rome; for he was an eloquent ſpeaker, a zealous advocate for virtue, and highly incenſed at the meanneſs of the Roman magiſtrates, who, for great ſums of money, had engaged to protect a king, whoſe crimes had rendered him inſupportable to his ſubjects. He read, or pretended to read, in the Sibylline prophecies the following words: If a king of Egypt ſhall apply to you for ſuccour, aſſiſt him, but not with an army; if you uſe violence, fear great dangers and misfortunes [f]. Cicero acknowledges, that all men of ſenſe were convinced, that the pretended prediction was forged; but nevertheleſs the young tribune obliged the keepers of the Sibylline books to report it to the people, and rehearſe the words in full comitia. The law required, that theſe oracles ſhould never be divulged till they had been examined by the ſenate, who ſuppreſſed or publiſhed them as they thought fit; but Cato, being well appriſed, that Ptolemy would, by his immenſe profuſions,

But oppoſed by Porcius Cato.

prevail

[f] Cic. l. i. ad familiar. ep. 1. & in orat. pro Rabir. Poſthumo, & in L. Piſon. Plut. in Pomp. Strabo, l. xvii, p. 796, Dio. l. xxxix.

prevail upon the self-interested senators to suppress an oracle no-ways favourable to his restoration, had no regard to this law, but proclaimed the pretended answer of the Sibyls without the imparting it to the senate [g]. The reading of the words of the Sibyl in the comitia had the desired effect on the minds of the people; and the decree, which empowered Lentulus Spinther to carry back Auletes to his dominions, was, at their request, revoked and annulled [h]. Then several expedients were proposed, in order to facilitate the king's return, without disobeying the pretended oracle; but the whole year being spent in fruitless debates, Auletes leaves Rome.

Ptolemy, tired out with these delays, resolved to leave Rome, where he had incurred the hatred of the people, and retiring to the temple of Diana at Ephesus, the most venerable asylum in Asia, wait there in safety the decision of his fate. From thence he wrote to Ammonius, whom he had left with the character of his embassador to the senate, desiring, that Pompey might be appointed to replace him on the throne; and his letter being read in the comitia by Aulus Plautius tribune of the people, his collegue Caninius, whom Plutarch through mistake calls Canidius, was of opinion, that Pompey attended only by two lictors, for no violence could be used without disobeying the oracle, should go into Egypt, and by his authority alone, bring the king into favour with his rebellious subjects; but the tribune was herein opposed by the senate, and Pompey, notwithstanding his great interest, obliged to drop the pursuit of an honour which he most passionately desired. Pompey being thus excluded, the senators were greatly divided in their sentiments. Bibulus and the consul Marcellinus were of opinion, that the king should be restored by three embassadors, and that those only should be chosen who had no other employment. Their view in this was to exclude Lentulus, at that time governor of Cilicia and Cyprus. Crassus agreed with Bibulus and Marcellinus, as to the re-settling of the king on his throne by three embassadors without an army; but was not for excluding such as had employments. Cicero never quitted the interest of Lentulus, who, during his consulship, had greatly contributed to his being re-called from banishment; nay, he was so desirous that his friend should have the honour of re[g] Cic. l. i. ad familiar. epist. 4. & Dio. ibid. [h] Cic. ibid. [i] Cic. & Dio, ibid.

re-eſtabliſhing the king of Egypt, and enjoy the advantages, which, he was well appriſed, would accrue to him from thence, that, after Lentulus was gone into Cilicia, he wrote to him, adviſing him to advance, without any further orders from the ſenate, with all his ſea and land-forces to Alexandria, and oblige the inhabitants by force to receive their king. "You are the beſt judge, ſays he "in a letter he wrote to him on this occaſion, of what "you can undertake and perform. If you can reduce "Alexandria and the other cities of Egypt, it is, with-"out doubt, both for your honour and that of the re-"public, that you advance thither with your fleet and "army, leaving the king at Ptolemais, or ſome other "neighbouring place, till you have got the better of the "rebels, and ſettled all things in peace, ſo that he may "return without danger. In this manner you will re-"inſtate him without troops, which, as our zealots "pretend, is the meaning of the Sibyl." The Romans were prohibited by the oracle to re-conduct the king of Egypt with an army; and Cicero was of opinion, that if Lentulus had firſt reduced Egypt by force of arms, and then carried back the king without an army, he would not have acted therein contrary to the prohibition of the Sibyl, ſince it would be ſtill true, that the king had returned without an army. One would hardly believe, that ſuch a grave magiſtrate as Cicero could be capable of eluding the oracle by ſuch an evaſion; but he looked upon it only as a political contrivance to diſappoint the expectations of Pompey, Lentulus, and the other great men, who were deſirous to command the army on this occaſion. But Lentulus, being well appriſed of the many difficulties, which, he foreſaw, would attend this enterprize, followed the advice which Cicero gave him in the cloſe of his letter, viz. that he ſhould by no means undertake ſo great an enterprize, unleſs he could promiſe himſelf certain ſucceſs.

Recurs to Gabinius governor of Syria.

POMPEY, on his being excluded from the honour of reſtoring the king, had wrote to him, adviſing the baniſhed prince to recur to Gabinius, who commanded in Syria in quality of proconſul; and Ptolemy, ſeeing the ſenate came to no reſolution with reſpect to his reſtoration, but ſpent the whole time in fruitleſs debates, determined

* Cic. ad famil. l. i. epiſt. 7.

ed to follow Pompey's advice. Gabinius was a man of a moſt infamous character, and ready to undertake any thing for money, without the leaſt regard to law, juſtice, or religion. He had quite ruined, by his enormous robberies and oppreſſions, the unhappy province of Syria, whither he had been ſent after his conſulſhip; and, finding that the Syrians could no longer gratify his avarice, had reſolved to make war upon the Arabians, in hopes of enriching himſelf with their ſpoils; but, in the mean time, Mithridates, who had been driven out of Parthia by his brother Orodes, flying for refuge to him, prevailed on the avaricious proconſul, by promiſing him large ſums, to turn his arms againſt Parthia, and aſſiſt him in the recovery of his crown. He had already begun his march and paſſed the Euphrates, with a deſign to replace Mithridates on the throne, not doubting but he ſhould return loaded with an immenſe booty, the Parthians being deemed at that time a very wealthy nation; but as he was advancing with Mithridates, whom he took along with him for his guide, towards the borders of Parthia, Ptolemy came up with him, and delivered into his hands letters from Pompey, their common friend and patron, whereby he was deſired to reſtore the baniſhed king, upon ſuch terms as he ſhould think fit to require and the king to grant. It was againſt an expreſs law for any governor to go out of the limits of his province, or to make war, upon any pretence whatſoever, even with the neighbouring princes or ſtates, without poſitive orders from the ſenate and people of Rome; but the authority of Pompey and the hope of a great reward made the proconſul deſpiſe this law, and undertake the re-eſtabliſhing of the king of Egypt, contrary to the opinion of all the officers of the army, except Marc Antony alone, who commanded the horſe, and ſupported with great warmth the king's intereſt[1]. The more dangerous the enterprize was, the more right Gabinius thought he had to make Ptolemy pay dear for it; and therefore was not aſhamed to demand of the king ten thouſand talents for his pains, that is, one million nine hundred thirty-ſeven thouſand five hundred pounds ſterling, one half of it to be paid immediately, and the other as ſoon as as he ſhould be ſettled on the throne. Ptolemy, who was glad to be reſtored upon any terms, agreed to pay the proconſul the above-mentioned ſum; but Gabinius would not ſtir till the firſt payment was made, which obliged the king to borrow it of Caius Rabirius Poſthumus, a Roman knight, Pompey interpoſing his credit and authority for the payment of the capital and intereſt [m]. Who undertakes to reſtore him.

[1] Dio. Caſſ. l. xxxix. Appian. in Parthic. & Syriac. Plut. in Auton. Cic. in orat. pro Rabir Poſthum. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 11. & de bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 6. Juſtin. l. xlii. c. 4.

GABINIUS, having received the ſum of five thouſand talents, repaſſed the Euphrates, and leaving Mithridates to ſhift for himſelf, began his march towards Egypt. As he drew near the borders of that country, he detached Antony with a body of horſe to ſeize the paſſes, and open the way for the reſt of the army. As this young Roman was the chief promoter of the expedition, ſo he acted in it with the utmoſt vigor and reſolution; for he not only poſſeſſed himſelf of the paſſes of a ſandy deſart, and found a way through the marſhes of Solonis, which the Egyptians call the exhalations of Tryphon, but took the city of Peluſium, which was a place of great importance, and the key of Egypt on that ſide [n]. For this ſucceſs he was indebted to Hyrcanus prince of Judæa and Antipater the father of Herod, who not only aſſiſted him with proviſions, but prevailed upon their countrymen, who lived in Peluſium, to favour the Romans, and introduce them into the city. Ptolemy, on his entering the place, was for putting all the Egyptians to the ſword; but Antony oppoſed ſo barbarous an execution, remonſtrating, that it would draw both upon him and the Romans the general hatred of the nation, and by that means retard at leaſt, if not prevent, his reſtoration; ſince the Egyptians would chuſe rather to die in battle, than be ſacrificed, after the victory, to the reſentment of the conqueror [o]. As ſoon as Gabinius received advice of Antony's good ſucceſs, he advanced into the heart of Egypt, the waters of the Nile, as it was then winter, being very low. Archelaus, who, as we have ſaid before, had married Berenice and reigned jointly with her, met Gabinius at the head of a conſiderable army, and offered him battle; but the Egyptian troops were cut in pieces, Archelaus himſelf taken priſoner, ſo that the proconſul might at once have put an end to the war; but his avarice prompted him to prolong it; Mark Antony diſtinguiſhes himſelf in this war.

[m] Cic. Plut. Joſeph. Dio. ibid. [n] Plut. in Anton. ApPian de bell. civil. l. v. p. 676. [o] Plut. ibid. Joſeph. l. i. de bell. Jud. c. 6. & l. xiv. 10.

it; for he gave Archelaus his liberty, upon his paying a conſiderable ranſom, and then pretending that he had made his eſcape, demanded freſh ſums of Ptolemy to purſue the war. Rabirius, who followed the king in this expedition, lent him what money he wanted at a very high intereſt. Such were the artifices made uſe of by the Romans of this age to enrich themſelves. Archelaus, when again at liberty would have long diſputed the crown with his rival, had his troops ſeconded his valour, for he was a young man of extraordinary parts; but the Egyptians having, in ſeveral encounters, turned their backs at the very firſt onſet, he was at length obliged to ſhut himſelf up in Alexandria, which Gabinius cloſely beſieged, both with his ſea and land-forces. Archelaus defended the place with incredible bravery, till he was reduced to the laſt extremity; and then he marched out of the diſtreſſed city to hazard another battle, which put an end both to his reign and life; for being abandoned by his effeminate and daſtardly troops, he choſe rather to die in the field, than ſurvive the loſs of his crown [p]. Marc Antony, who had been his particular friend and gueſt, hearing that he was ſlain, commanded his body to be ſought for among the dead, wept over it when it was found, and took upon himſelf to inter it with all the pomp and magnificence that was due to a perſon of his rank [q].

Auletes reſettled on the throne.

PTOLEMY, being now maſter of Alexandria, eaſily reduced the reſt of Egypt to his obedience, and was thereby thoroughly reſettled on his throne. For the preventing of new inſurrections, Gabinius, before he returned into his province, left ſome of his Roman forces in Alexandria to keep that city in awe; but theſe ſoon exchanged the Roman manners for the Egyptian, and gave into the luxury and effeminacy of thoſe among whom they lived [r]. Auletes, ſeeing himſelf again in quiet poſſeſſion of the crown, began to vent his rage on all thoſe who had been any ways concerned in the rebellion. His daughter Berenice was ſacrificed the firſt to his reſentment. The crime he laid to her charge was her having accepted of the vacant throne when the Alexandrians offered it to her [s]. Afterwards he cut off moſt of the wealthy citizens of Alexandria, under pre-

Puts to death his daughter Berenice.

tence

[p] Dio, l. xxxix. Val. Max. l. ix. c. i. [q] Plut. ibid
[r] Cæſar. Commentar. de bell. civil. l. iii. Lucan. l. x. ver. 402. [s] Strabo, l. xvii. p. 796. Dio, ibid. Porphyr, in Græc. Euſeb. Scalig. p. 226.

tence that they had been concerned in the rebellion, and confiscated their estates, in order to raise the vast sums which he was still to pay Gabinius, or had borrowed of Rabirius. To be rich was a crime for which many were condemned, the king filling his dominions, as Dion Cassius expresses it, with blood and slaughter, that he might thereby fill his coffers with the treasures of his unhappy subjects. These oppressions and violences the cowardly Egyptians suffered with great patience, being kept in awe by the Roman garrison which Gabinius had left in Alexandria; but neither the fear of the Romans nor the authority of Ptolemy could make them put up a much less affront; for a Roman soldier having killed a cat, which animal, as it is well known, was worshipped by the Egyptians, the supposed sacrilege was no sooner known, but the Alexandrians made a general insurrection, and gathering together in crowds, made their way through the Roman guards, dragged the soldier out of his house, and, in spite of all opposition, tore him in pieces [t]. Diodorus Siculus, who relates this insurrection, was an eye-witness of it.

His ingratitude to Rabirius Posthumius.

Caius Rabirius Posthumius had lent Ptolemy Auletes, as we have hinted above, immense sums to defray the expence of his expedition against the usurper of his crown, and had reason to expect in gratitude to be speedily repaid; but finding that the king affected delays, he resolved to leave Rome, where he then was, and go into Egypt. When he arrived at Alexandria, he pressed the king to perform his engagements; but Ptolemy shewed little regard to his remonstrances, excusing himself on account of the bad condition of his finances since the late revolution; nevertheless he offered to make him general collector of his revenues, that he might, in that employment, pay himself. The unfortunate creditor accepted the offer, for fear of losing his debt, for which he was himself indebted to others; but the base prince soon after, upon some frivolous pretence, ordered him and all his servants to be close confined. This shocking treatment of a man who had assisted him in his distress exasperated Pompey as much as Rabirius, the former having been in a manner security for the debt, as the money had been lent at his request, and the whole business neſs tranſacted by him at a country-houſe of his near Alba; however, Rabirius had reaſon to fear the worſt from a cruel and faithleſs prince, and therefore, having found means to make his eſcape, was glad to ſave his life from the wicked deſigns of his debtor; but, to complete his misfortunes, he was proſecuted as ſoon as he returned to Rome, 1ſt, For having enabled Ptolemy to corrupt the ſenate with ſums lent him for that purpoſe. 2dly, For, having debaſed and diſhonoured the character of a Roman knight, by farming the revenues and becoming the ſervant of a foreign prince. And, laſtly, For having been an accomplice with Gabinius, and ſharing with him the ten thouſand talents, which the proconſul had received for his Egyptian expedition. Rabirius ſeems to have been acquitted; and the eloquent oration which Cicero ſpoke in his defence, will be an everlaſting monument of Ptolemy's treachery and ingratitude [u]. As for Gabinius, three actions were commenced againſt him as ſoon as he returned to Rome; one of high treaſon againſt the people, for reſtoring Ptolemy to his dominions, contrary to the expreſs orders of the republic, and thereby being guilty of the death of ſo many perſons who were killed on that occaſion; the other of bribery and corruption, ſince it was notorious that he had been induced, by vaſt ſums of money, to replace that cruel and wicked prince on the throne, in defiance of the laws and the prohibition of the Sibyl; the third action was of tyranny and oppreſſion in his government. Cicero repreſented his crime in ſo ſtrong a light, that he eſcaped death very narrowly; for, notwithſtanding the powerful intereſt of Cæſar and Pompey's party, and the vaſt ſums he ſpent in bribing the judges, he was cleared from the firſt charge by a majority of ſix votes only out of ſeventy; but in the other two actions he was caſt, and condemned to perpetual baniſhment, the only puniſhment which the Roman laws inflicted on public extortioners and oppreſſors [w]. We are told, that, before he left Rome, he was reduced to great poverty, having ſpent the money, which he got by oppreſſion, bribery, and corruption, in bribing and corrupting others, in order to eſcape the puniſhment which he deſerved. He lived in baniſhment till the time of the civil wars, when he was recalled by Cæſar, in whoſe ſervice he loſt his life [x].

[t] Diodor. Sicul. l. i. p. 74, 75.

Gabinius baniſhed Rome.

AULETES

[u] Cic. pro Rabir. Poſth. [w] Dio, ibid. Cic. ad Attic. l. iv. epiſt. 16. & ad Quint. Fratr. l. iii. epiſt. 4. [x] Hirt. de bell. Alexandrin. c. 43.

AULETES, notwithſtanding the unheard-of tyrannies with which he haraſſed his ſubjects, died in the peaceable poſſeſſion of his kingdom, about four years after his re-eſtabliſhment, and thirty after he had firſt aſcended the throne, leaving behind him two ſons and two daughters. He bequeathed his crown to his eldeſt ſon and his eldeſt daughter, ordering them to be joined in marriage, according to the cuſtom of their family, and to govern with equal power; and becauſe they were both under age, the daughter, who was the eldeſt, being but ſeventeen years old, he left them under the tuition of the Roman people, whom he conjured, by all the gods and by his alliance with Rome, to take care that his will was duly executed [y]. Eutropius tells us [z], that a copy of his will being tranſmitted to Rome, the people appointed Pompey the young prince's guardian. The ſons were both called Ptolemy; the daughters name were Cleopatra and Arſinoe. This was the Cleopatra who afterwards became ſo famous, and had a great ſhare in the civil wars of Rome. We know but very little of the beginning of her and her brother's reign. The firſt thing we find recorded of hers is, that two of the ſons of Bibulus, who had been conſul with Julius Cæſar and was at this time proconſul of Syria, being killed in Alexandria by the Roman ſoldiers, whom Gabinius had left for a guard to Ptolemy Auletes, Cleopatra ſent the murderers to Bibulus, that he might puniſh them as he thought fit; but the proconſul ſent them back untouched, with this meſſage, that the puniſhing them belonged not to him, but to the ſenate of Rome [a].

Auletes dies.

Ptolemy and Cleopatra.

Year of the flood 2968. Before Chriſt 31.

As Ptolemy was a minor, under the tuition of Pothinus an eunuch and Achillas commander in chief of the Egyptian forces, theſe two miniſters, to engroſs the whole power to themſelves, deprived Cleopatra of that ſhare in the ſovereignty which had been left her by the will of Auletes, and drove her out of the kingdom. Cleopatra thus injured retired into Syria, and having raiſed in that country and in Paleſtine a very conſiderable army, led it herſelf into Egypt, with a deſign to aſſert her right by force of arms. On the other hand, Ptolemy, having drawn together all the forces he could, took the field, and marched againſt his Cleopatra driven out by her brother's miniſters.

[y] Cic. l. viii. ad familiar. epiſt. 7. Cæſ. l. iii. Comment. de bell. civil. [z] Eutrop. l. vi. [a] Val. Max. l. iv. c. 1. Cæſ. ibid. Senec. ad Marciam.

Caſius, obſerving the motions of each other, neither of them being inclined to venture an engagement. While affairs were in this ſituation, Pompey, after the loſs of the battle of Pharſalia, arrived off Peluſium, hoping to find in the kingdom of Egypt an open and ſafe aſylum; for he had been as we have obſerved above, the great friend and conſtant protector of Auletes, the father of the reigning prince; and therefore, as his favours were of a late date, he expected to find the ſon, and thoſe who were about him grateful; but gratitude is a virtue unknown to princes and miniſters, as Pompey found by woeful experience, and many others have done ſince his time. The unfortunate Roman, obſerving from the ſea a great army encamped on the ſhore, concluded from thence, that the king was at war with his ſiſter, and that, in ſuch a conjuncture, he ſhould find the young prince the more ready to protect him, ſince he might ſtand in need of his aſſiſtance; he therefore ſent ſome of his friends to acquaint the king with his arrival, and to demand permiſſion to land and enter his kingdom [b]. The king himſelf, who was then but thirteen years old, gave no anſwer; but Pothinus and Achillas, the two reigning miniſters, taking Theodotus a rhetorician, who was the king's præceptor, and ſome others to conſult with them, adviſed together what anſwer to return. In this council ſome were for receiving Pompey, thinking it would be a reproach to the Egyptian nation and king to abandon him in his diſtreſs, and refuſe protection and relief to one who had been the late king's zealous and conſtant protector, and was the preſent king's guardian. Others were for rejecting his petition, and deſiring him to ſeek a retreat and aſylum elſewhere; but Theodotus diſplayed all his eloquence to ſhew, that the ſafeſt courſe they could take was to diſpatch him. His reaſons were, becauſe, if they received him, Cæſar would not fail to be revenged on them for protecting and abetting his enemy; and if they refuſed to receive him and affairs ſhould take a turn in his favour, he would, without all doubt, when again become powerful, make them pay dear for their refuſal; and therefore the only ſafe way to guard againſt both theſe evils was to cut him off, which, ſaid he, will gain us the friendſhip of Cæſar, and prevent the other from doing us any miſchief; for dead men according to the antient proverb, don't bite [c]. Some writers tell us, that Theo-

Pompey arrives off Peluſium.

[b] Cæſ. ibid. l. iv. Appian. p. 480. Plut. in Pomp. Dio, l. 42. [c] Liv. l. 112. Plut. ubi ſup. & in Bruto.

Theodotus maintained this cruel paradox only to diſplay his eloquence and talents ; but however that be, his advice prevailed, and was put in execution in the manner we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of Rome.

And is murdered.

In the mean time Cæſar, being informed that Pompey had ſteered his courſe towards Egypt, purſued him thither, and arrived at Alexandria, juſt as the news of his death was brought to that city. Soon after Theodotus, or, as others will have it, Achillas preſented him with the head and ring of his rival ; but he wept at that ſight, and, turning away his eyes with abhorrence, ordered the head to be buried in a proper place, with the uſual ſolemnities [d]. Cæſar, for the greater expedition, had purſued Pompey with few forces, having with him, when he arrived at Alexandria, only eight hundred horſe and three thouſand two hundred foot. The reſt of his army he had left behind him in Greece and Aſia Minor, under the command of his lieutenants, with orders to purſue the advantages of his late victory, and ſecure his intereſt in thoſe parts ; and therefore, confiding in his good fortune and the fame of his ſucceſs at Pharſalia, he ventured to land at Alexandria with the ſmall body abovementioned, but was very near paying dear for it ; for the few forces he had with him not being ſufficient to defend him againſt the unruly mob of that populous city, which was all in an uproar on account of Pompey's death he, with much ado, got into the king's palace, and there ſhut himſelf up with part of his men, the reſt having been driven back to their ſhips by the outrageous multitude [e].

Julius Cæſar arrives at Alexandria.

Where he is in great danger.

As it was not in Cæſar's power to leave Alexandria, by reaſon of the Eteſian winds, which in that country continue blowing all the dog-days, in the beginning of which Cæſar had entered that port, and prevent any ſhips from ſailing out, he ſent orders to the legions he had left in Aſia to join him with all poſſible expedition ; but the tumult being appeaſed before the arrival of his troops, he ventured out of the palace, and having, by his affable behaviour, gained the affections of the common people, he ſpent his time in viſiting the curioſities of that great and ſtately metropolis and ſeemed to take great pleaſure in aſſiſting at the public ſpeeches and harangues, made by the Alexandrian orators and rhetoricians by way of tryal ; but, that he might not ſpend his whole time in diverſions only, ſince he could not leave the place, he began to ſollicit the payment of the money due to him from Auletes, and to take cognizance of the difference between young Ptolemy and his ſiſter Cleopatra [f].

[d] Liv. l. cxii. Plut. in Cæſar. [e] Liv. ibid. Dio, l. xlii.

We have related above, that, during Cæſar's firſt conſulſhip, Auletes had, by the promiſe of ſix thouſand talents, obtained of him the alliance of the Roman people, and by that means ſecured to himſelf the crown. The king had paid him only part of this ſum, and given him an obligation or bond for the remainder. This debt now Cæſar called for, wanting it to pay his ſoldiers, and exacted it with great rigour; which Pothinus the king's treaſurer by ſeveral artifices made appear greater than it really was, for he plundered their temples of their gold and ſilver utenſils, and perſuaded the king and all the great perſons of the kingdom to eat in earthen or wooden veſſels, inſinuating under hand, that Cæſar had ſeized on all their gold and ſilver plate, in order to ſtir up the people againſt him; but what moſt provoked them, and at laſt drove them to take up arms againſt Cæſar, was the haughtineſs with which he acted as judge between Ptolemy and Cleopatra; for he not only cited them to appear before him for the deciſion of their difference, but iſſued out a peremptory order, commanding them to diſband their armies, and ſtand to the ſentence which he, after hearing their reaſons, ſhould pronounce. This was looked upon in Egypt as a violation of the royal dignity, and an open encroachment on the prerogative of their ſovereign, who being independent acknowledged no ſuperior, and therefore was not, like a ſubject, to be adjudged by any man. To theſe complaints Cæſar replied, that he did not take upon him to judge as ſuperior, but as an arbitrator appointed by the will of Auletes, who having put his children under the tuition of the Roman people, and all their power being now veſted in him as their dictator, it belonged to him to arbitrate and determine this controverſy as a guardian of Auletes's children by virtue of his will; and that he claimed for no other end than to ſettle peace between the king and his ſiſter [g]. This explanation quieting all for the preſent, the cauſe was brought to Cæſar's tribunal, and advocates were appointed on both ſides to plead before him.

Endeavours to make up the differences between Ptolemy and Cleopatra.

But

[f] Cæs. Comment. ibid. Dio, l. iv. [g] Plut. in Cæſ. Dio. l. xlii. Oros. l. vi. c. 15. Cæs. Comment. de bell. civil. l. iii,

But Cleopatra, being informed that Cæſar had a very particular regard for ſuch of her ſex, as were recommended to him by their youth and beauty, reſolved to make uſe of both, and by their means attach him firſt to her perſon, and next to her cauſe. Accordingly ſhe ſent a private meſſenger to Cæſar, complaining, that her cauſe was betrayed by thoſe ſhe employed, and demanding his permiſſion to appear before him in perſon. Plutarch ſays, that Cæſar preſſed her the firſt to come and appear before him in perſon. Be that as it will, ſhe no ſooner knew that Cæſar was inclined to ſee her, but taking along with her only one of her ſervants, Apollodorus the Sicilian, ſhe embarqued in a ſmall veſſel, and, in the duſk of the evening, arrived under the walls of Alexandria. She was afraid of being diſcovered by her brother, or thoſe of his party who were maſters of the city, and would not have failed to ſtop her, and prevent her from going to Cæſar's houſe. In order therefore to get thither without being known, ſhe cauſed herſelf to be tied up in a mattreſs, and was thus carried by Apollodorus on his back through the ſtreets of Alexandria to Cæſar's apartment. There he laid down his burthen at Cæſar's feet, ſaying he had brought him a preſent, and having untied it, up ſtarted a fine lady with the beſt airs ſhe could put on. Cæſar was highly pleaſed with the ſtratagem, but much more with the perſon of Cleopatra, whoſe extraordinary beauty ſo charmed him, that he kept her with him all that night, and thinking himſelf engaged by the favours ſhe granted him, to do all that lay in his power in her behalf, the next morning he ſent for Ptolemy, and preſſed him to receive his ſiſter again upon her own terms. By this propoſal Ptolemy found, that Cæſar, from being their common judge, was become her advocate, and being at the ſame time informed, that his ſiſter was with him in that part of the palace where he lodged, the young prince left Cæſar in a violent paſſion, and running into the ſtreets, took the diadem off his head, tore it to pieces, and threw it on the ground, complaining with his face bathed in tears, that he was betrayed, and relating the whole to the multitude that flocked round him, in a moment the whole city was in an uproar; the king himſelf, at the head of the populace, led them tumultuouſly to charge Cæſar, which they did with all the fury which is uſual on ſuch occaſions. The Roman ſoldiers who were near him ſecured the king's perſon, and delivered him up to Cæſar; but nevertheleſs, as Cleopatra gains over Cæſar to her intereſt.

Ptolemy ſtirs up the Alexandrians againſt him.

the reſt of his forces, who knew nothing of what paſſed, were diſperſed in the ſeveral quarters of that great city, Cæſar muſt neceſſarily have been overpowered, and tore to pieces by the enraged multitude, had he not had the preſence of mind to ſhew himſelf from a balcony which was out of their reach, and from thence aſſure them, that he was ready to do whatever they ſhould think fit to ſuggeſt to him. Theſe fair promiſes appeaſed the tumult for the preſent [h].

THE next day, having ſummoned a general aſſembly of the people, he brought out to them Ptolemy and Cleopatra, and then cauſing their father's will publicly to be read, he decreed as guardian and arbitrator, that Ptolemy and Cleopatra ſhould reign jointly in Egypt agreeable to the will; and that Ptolemy the younger ſon and Arſinoe the younger daughter ſhould jointly enjoy the iſland of Cyprus. He added this laſt article to appeaſe the people, and by that means eſcape their fury, which he was then in great fear of; for the iſland of Cyprus had for ſome time belonged to the Romans, as we have related elſewhere. This decree pleaſed all except Pothinus; for as he had been the cauſe of the breach between Cleopatra and her brother, and alſo of the expulſion of that princeſs, he had reaſon to apprehend, that ſhe on her return would deprive him of the great power he had at court, and perhaps of his life. To prevent therefore Cæſar's decree from taking effect, he inſpired the people with new jealouſies giving out, that the Roman dictator had, by force and againſt his inclination, beſtowed the crown on both; but that his true deſign was to place Cleopatra alone on the throne. When he had, by ſowing ſuch reports among the populace, ſtirred them up anew againſt Cæſar, for the Egyptians could not bear to be governed by a woman alone, he ſollicited Achillas, by private letters and meſſengers, to advance at the head of the army from Peluſium, where he was then encamped, to Alexandria, in order to drive Cæſar out of the city. The general was eaſily prevailed upon to fall in with his meaſures, and approaching Alexandria with twenty thouſand regular and well diſciplined troops, put all things there again in confuſion. Cæſar, who had but a ſmall number of forces with him, perſuaded the king to ſend out embaſſadors to Achillas, Cæſar beſieged in Alexandria.

[h] Florus. l. iv. c. 2. Dio, l. xlii. Suet. in Julio. Plut. in Cæſ. Liv. l. cxii. Cæs. ubi ſupra.

las, ordering him to forbear using any violence, since he was well pleased with what Cæsar had decreed. Dioscorides and Serapion, who had been embassadors at Rome and had great authority at court, were employed on this occasion; but Achillas was so far from complying with the king's orders, that he commanded the two embassadors to be seized and put to death; and accordingly one of them was killed on the spot, and the other carried off by his own men for dead. Cæsar, finding that Achillas would hearken to no proposals, resolved to keep within the walls of the town, not being in a condition to make head against the enemy in the open field. He therefore posted his men so well in the streets and avenues of that quarter of the town which he had taken possession of, that he found no difficulty in supporting the attack of the whole Egyptian army. Achillas, not being able to force that quarter, changed his measures, and went to attack the port, with a design to make himself master of the Egyptian fleet at anchor there, to the number of seventy-two ships, and by that means to shut up the Romans by sea, and prevent them from receiving succours and convoys on that side; but Cæsar prevailing there likewise caused the fleet to be set on fire, and at the same time seizing the tower of Pharos, placed a strong garrison in it, and by this means secured his communication with the sea, without which he must necessarily have been soon obliged to surrender at discretion. Some of the ships, when on fire driving to the shore, communicated their flames to the adjoining houses, which, spreading into the quarter of the city called Bruchium, consumed the noble library, which had been the work of so many kings, and contained at that time four hundred thousand volumes [i].

The library in the quarter called Bruchium burnt.

Cæsar, finding himself thus engaged, contrary to his expectation, in a dangerous war, dispatched messengers into all the neighbouring countries, solliciting speedy succours. He wrote, amongst others, to Domitius Calvinus his lieutenant in Asia, properly so called, acquainting him with the danger he was in. That general, upon the receipt of his letter, immediately detached two legions, putting the one on board some transports which he had ready, and sending the other by land. The former arrived very seasonably; ſeaſonably ; but the latter did not reach Alexandria till the war was over. But Cæſar was beſt ſerved by Mithridates of Pergamus, a man of great valour and experience in war ; for he being ſent into Syria and Cilicia to haſten the ſupplies there, brought thoſe forces which extricated him out of danger, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel [k].

[i] Cæs. & Dio, ibid. Oros. l. vi. c. 15. Senec. de tranquill. anim. c. 9. Aul. Gell. l. v. c. 17. Ammian. Marcel. l. xxii.

In the mean time Cæſar, that he might not be forced to fight the numerous troops of the enemy till his ſuccours arrived, fortified that quarter of the city where he lay, with walls, towers, and other works including within them the palace, a theatre adjoining to it, which he made uſe of as a citadel, and a paſſage to the harbour. Cæſar, from the very beginning of the tumult, had taken care to get the king into his power, that this war might ſeem to be undertaken only by a few malecontents, and not by his authority or approbation. While he was thus detained in Cæſar's quarters, Pothinus, who attended him there as his governor and chief miniſter, carried on a private correſpondence with Achillas, and, by letters ſecretly conveyed to him, gave him intelligence of all that paſſed, encouraging him to puſh on the war with vigour ; but at length one of his letters being intercepted and the treaſon thereby diſcovered, Cæſar cauſed him to be put to death. Hereupon Ganymedes, another eunuch, who was charged with the education of Arſinoe the king's younger ſiſter, fearing the ſame puniſhment, as having been privy to the treaſonable practices of Pothinus, ſecretly conveyed the young princeſs out of Cæſar's quarters, and fled with her to the Egyptian army, who, wanting one of the royal family to head them, were overjoyed at her arrival and proclaimed her queen ; but Ganymedes, who entertained thoughts of ſupplanting Achillas, cauſed an accuſation to be formed againſt him, as if he had betrayed the fleet which Cæſar had burnt in the harbour, and having by this means got him condemned and executed, he took on himſelf the command of the army and the adminiſtration of all the affairs of that party ; and indeed he was thoroughly qualified for the employment of a prime miniſter, being a man of great penetration and activity, and no probity. He contrived a thouſand artful ſtratagems to diſtreſs Cæſar during the courſe of this war, ſhewing himſelf at the ſame time a diſcerning ſtateſman and a crafty general ; for inſtance, he found means means to ſpoil all the freſh water in Cæſar's quarters, and thereby reduced him to great ſtraits; for the Alexandrians having no other freſh water but that of the Nile, the whole city was vaulted underneath their houſes for the receiving and keeping of it. Once a year, on the great ſwell of the Nile, the water of that river came into the city by a canal cut for that purpoſe, and being by ſeveral ſluices let into the vaults, filled them all, they being built without any partitions in a general communication from one to another under the houſes. The water let in on this occaſion ſerved for the common uſe of the inhabitants the whole year, every one having an opening in his houſe, not unlike the mouth of a well, through which the water was drawn in buckets or pitchers. Ganymedes having ſtopt up the communications between the vaults or reſervoirs in Cæſar's quarters and thoſe of the reſt of the city, found means to turn the ſea-water into the former, and thereby ſpoilt all the freſh-water that was kept in them. This raiſed a general uproar among Cæſar's ſoldiers, and he would have been obliged to abandon his quarters very much to his diſadvantage, had he not immediately ordered wells to be dug, and diſcovered, after he had ſunk them to an incredible depth, ſprings of freſh-water, which made amends for that which was ſpoiled [l].

[k] A. Hirtius de bell. Alexandrin. Joſeph. Antiq. l. vii.

After this Cæſar receiving advice, that the legion which Calvinus had ſent him by ſea was arrived on the neighbouring coaſts of Libya, but was detained there by contrary winds, advanced with his whole fleet to convoy it ſafely to Alexandria, being then reduced almoſt to the utmoſt extremity, and his men quite tired out with the continual aſſaults of the enemy. Ganymedes immediately aſſembled all the Egyptian ſhips he could, with a deſign to intercept him on his return. Cæſar was unwilling to engage, being deſirous to get the legion ſafe into the city; but a Rhodian galley, which was placed in his right wing, being attacked by ſeveral of the enemy's ſhips, he could not forbear aſſiſting his faithful allies, which brought on an engagement between the two fleets, wherein Cæſar gained a conſiderable advantage, and would have entirely deſtroyed the Egyptian fleet, had he not been obliged by night coming on to retire with his ſhips and legion into the harbour [m].

To

[l] Hirtius, Plut. & Cæſ. ibid.

[m] Dio. Caſs. l. xlii, Hirtius, ibid.

To repair this and other loſſes, for Cæſar had by this time deſtroyed an hundred and ten Egyptian ſhips, partly in the harbour, and partly in the arſenal, Ganymedes drew together all the ſhips that were in the mouth of the Nile, and in the private arſenals, and, having formed with them another fleet, entered the port of Alexandria. This produced another fight at ſea, in which Cæſar gained a ſecond victory, which was owing chiefly to the great valour and ſkill of the Rhodians in naval affairs. To make the moſt of the advantage he had got, he endeavoured to ſeize the town of Pharos, and the mole leading to it called the Heptaſtadium; but after he had landed his troops in the iſland, he was repulſed with the loſs of above eight hundred of his men, and was very near periſhing himſelf in his retreat; for finding the ſhip in which he endeavoured to eſcape ready to ſink, by reaſon of the numbers of thoſe who had crowded into it, he threw himſelf into the ſea, and with great difficulty ſwam to the next ſhip, whence he ſaw, to his great concern, the veſſel which he had left ſink with all the men [n]. And here we muſt not paſs over in ſilence a circumſtance which is omitted by Hirtius, but recorded by Dion Caſſius [o], Plutarch [p], Suetonius [q], and Oroſius [r]. Theſe tell us, that Cæſar, while he thus made his eſcape, carried his commentaries, which he had then with him, in one hand, holding it up the whole time, leſt the water ſhould reach them, and ſwam with the other. Appian relates this whole affair in a quite different manner; for he writes, that Cæſar, being ſurrounded on a bridge by the enemy, was obliged to throw off his purple garment, and leap into the ſea, and that the king's ſoldiers purſuing him, he ſwam under water, raiſing up his head now and then, to one of his own ſhips, where he was known and taken up [s]. Suetonius tells us, that he held his purple coat in his mouth, dragging it after him, leſt it ſhould fall into the enemy's hands; and Florus [t], with whom Plutarch agrees [u], that he left it in the waves, either by chance or on purpoſe, that the enemy purſuing him might diſcharge their darts and arrows at his garment. Appian and Dio add, that the Egyptians having got it, fixed it on a trophy which they had ſet up for having put the [n] Hirtius, ibid. [o] Dio. l. xlii. [p] Plut. In Cæſar.

[q] Suet. in Julio. [r] Oros. l. vi. c. 15. [s] Appian. de bell. civil. l. ii. p. 523.
[t] Flor. l. iv. c. 2. [u] Plut. ibid.

the Romans to flight, and ſeemed to be as much pleaſed and elated, as if they had taken Cæſar himſelf [w].

THE Alexandrians, finding that the Romans were rather encouraged than diſheartened by their late loſs, and were making the neceſſary preparations to repair it, ſent embaſſadors to Cæſar, demanding their king, and aſſuring him, that his compliance with their requeſt would gain over the multitude to him, and put a ſpeedy end to the war; For your keeping the king confined and in a manner priſoner, ſaid they, is what chiefly provokes the populace, and prevents them from hearkening to any terms of an accommodation: allow him his liberty, and you will find them ready to lay down their arms and come to an agreement. Cæſar, tho' well acquainted with the ſubtle and deceitful temper of the Alexandrians, readily complied with their requeſt, knowing, that he hazarded nothing in giving them up their king's perſon; and that, if they failed in their promiſes, the continuation of the war and the evils attending it would be laid to their charge. Before he diſmiſſed the young prince, he exhorted him to take this opportunity of inſpiring his ſubjects with ſentiments of peace; to redreſs the evils which a war, very imprudently undertaken, had brought upon his dominions; to approve himſelf worthy of the confidence he repoſed in him by granting him his liberty, and to ſhew himſelf grateful for the ſervices he had rendered his father. Ptolemy, early inſtructed by his maſters in the art of diſſimulation and deceit, begged Cæſar, with tears in his eyes, that he would not oblige him to depart, aſſuring him, that he had rather live with him like a private perſon, than reign without him. The event ſoon ſhewed how little ſincerity there was in the young king's tears and profeſſions of friendſhip; for he was no ſooner at the head of his troops, than he renewed hoſtilities with more vigour than ever. The firſt thing Ptolemy, who was entirely governed by Ganymedes, attempted, was to intercept with his fleet all Cæſar's proviſions. This occaſioned a new fight at ſea near Canopus, in which the Romans, under the conduct of Tiberius Nero, had again the victory. In this engagement Euphanor, the Rhodian admiral, loſt his life and his ſhip, after having ſignalized himſelf in a very eminent manner [x]; but [w] Dio. ibid. & Appian. ubi ſupra. p. 484.

[x] Hirtius & Dio, ibib.

but by this time Mithridates of Pergamus was drawing near with an army which he had raised with great expedition in Syria.

MITHRIDATES, had been sent, as we have related above, into Syria and Cilicia, to raise there what forces he could, and lead them into Egypt. In this commission he acquitted himself with such diligence and prudence, that he soon formed a considerable army, being greatly assisted therein by Antipater the Idumæan, who not only joined him with three thousand Jews, but prevailed upon Hyrcanus, who was then at the head of that nation, and the neighbouring princes of Arabia and Cæle-Syria, to send him considerable reinforcements. With these troops Mithridates, attended by Antipater in person, marched into Egypt; and on his arrival at Pelusium, took that important place by storm. This advantage was chiefly owing to Antipater; for he was the first that mounted the breach, and thereby opened the way to the others. From Pelusium they advanced towards Alexdria; but as they approached the borders of the province of Onion, they found all the passes seized by the Jews who inhabited that part of Egypt; so that it was impossible for them to proceed any farther. This unexpected obstruction would have rendered their design abortive, had not Antipater, partly by his own authority, and partly by that of Hyrcanus, from whom he brought letters to the Jews, prevailed upon them to embrace Cæsar's party [y]. Their example was followed by the Jews of Memphis, and Mithridates was plentifully supplied by both. Asinius the Trallian, who wrote an account of the civil war, tells us, that Hyrcanus himself invaded Egypt with Mithridates. As they drew near the Delta, Ptolemy detached a considerable body of troops to dispute with them the passage of the Nile. This drew on a battle, in which Mithridates commanded one part of the army, and Antipater, the other. Mithridates's wing was soon obliged to give ground, being attacked by the Egyptians with incredible fury; but Antipater, who had defeated the enemy on his side, hastening to his relief, the battle began anew, and the Egyptians were totally routed. The two victorious generals pursed the advantage, drove the enemy out of the field with great slaughter, and having taken their camp, obliged those to repass the Nile who had the good luck to make their escape [z]. Mithridates immediately acquainted acquainted Cæſar with this victory, aſcribing with great ingenuity, if Joſephus is to be credited, the whole glory of it to Antipater.

[y] Hirtius, ibid. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 14 & 15. Dio. ibid.
[z] Hirtius & Joseph. ibid.

THE king, upon advice that the troops he had ſent were defeated, advanced with his whole army againſt Mithridates and Antipater. At the ſame time Cæſar, leaving the city in the night-time, marched with all poſſible expedition to join Mithridates, before the Egyptians could fall upon him. Accordingly he was the firſt who brought him intelligence of the king's deſign. The Egyptian army appeared ſoon after; whereupon a bloody engagement enſuing, moſt of the enemy's forces were cut in pieces, and the king himſelf drowned in the Nile, as he was attempting to make his eſcape in a boat. His body was afterwards thrown on the ſhore, and there known by the gold cuiraſs which the Ptolemies of Egypt uſed to wear, as Julius Capitolinus informs us [a]. He had reigned from the death of his father Auletes three years and eight months. In this engagement twenty thouſand Egyptians were killed in the battle and the purſuit, and twelve thouſand taken priſoners. On Cæſar's ſide five hundred only were killed, and about a thouſand wounded. Among the latter was Antipater, who fought with incredible bravery, and had a great ſhare in the victory [b].

CÆSAR, in confidence of this victory, returned to Alexandria, and entering that city without oppoſition, beſtowed the crown of Egypt on Cleopatra, obliging her to marry Ptolemy her younger brother. This was in effect giving it to Cleopatra alone, the young prince being then but eleven years old. The paſſion which Cæſar had conceived for that princeſs, was the ſole motive that prompted him to embarque in this dangerous and infamous war; and therefore, having been attended with ſucceſs in ſo bold an enterprize, he took care that ſhe ſhould reap the advantages of his victory. The ſame paſſion detained him longer in Egypt than his affairs could well admit; for tho' he had ſettled all matters there in January, yet he did not leave that country till the latter end of April, paſſing his time in revels and banquets with Cleopatra and the Egyptians of her court. He took great pleaſure in diverting himſelf with her on the Nile in a large galley called Thalamegos, being attended by a fleet of four hundred ſail. Suetonius tells us, that he deſigned to ſail with her as far as Æthiopia, but that his troops refuſed to follow him him [c]. He had even a mind to carry her with him to Rome, and there marry her, after having caused a law to pass in the comitia, by which the Roman citizens should be allowed to marry such women, and as many, as they pleased. Marius Cinna, then tribune of the people, declared after Cæsar's death, that, at his earnest request, he had prepared an harangue for the proposing of the law to the people [d]. In this war Cæsar having taken Arsinoe prisoner, carried her to Rome with him, and there caused her to walk before his triumphal chariot, bound with chains of gold. After that show was over, he gave her liberty, but would not allow her to return to Egypt, lest her presence should raise new troubles in that kingdom. The banished princess took up her residence in the province of Asia; for there Antony found her after the battle of Philippi, and, at the request of Cleopatra her sister, caused her to be put to death [e]. Before Cæsar left Alexandria, in acknowledgment of the assistance he had received from the Jews, he confirmed all the privileges they enjoyed in that city, and commanded a brazen pillar to be raised, whereon all those privileges were engraved, with the decree confirming them [f]. What made him at last take his leave of Egypt and his beloved Cleopatra, by whom he had a son called from his own name Cæsarion, was the war with Pharnaces, king of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, and son of Mithridates the last king of Pontus. The success that attended that prince, in the recovery of his father's dominions, roused Cæsar out of the lethargy in which Cleopatra's charms had lulled him, and put him again upon action. He left part of his forces in Egypt to protect Cleopatra, and with the rest marched into Syria.

[a] Hirtius & Dio, ibid, Liv. l. xii. Oros. l. vi. c. 16. Flor. l. iv. c. 2. Eutrop. l. vi

[b] Joſeph. l. xiv. c. 15.

AFTER Cæsar's departure, Cleopatra enjoyed the crown without the least disturbance, having all the power in her own hands during the minority of her brother; but the young prince no sooner attained to the fourteenth year of his age, when, according to the laws of the country, he was to share the royal authority as well as the name; but she caused him to be poisoned in the fourth year of his reign, and from that time governed Egypt [g] without a partner.

Not

[c] Sueton. in Julio. Appian. l. ii. de bell. civil. p. 484. Josephus. l. xiv. c. 17. & l. ii. contra Apion. p. 1963. [d] Sueton. ibid. [e] Cæs. Dio, Hirtius, Appian. &c. ibid. [f] Joseph. ubi supra. [g] Joseph. Antiquit. l. xv. c. 4. Porphyr. in Græc. Euseb. Scalig.

Not long after, Cæſar being killed at Rome, and the famous triumvirate formed between Antony, Lepidus, and Octavius to avenge his death, Cleopatra declared, without heſitation, for the triumvirs, and ſent to Albienus, the conſul Dolabella's lieutenant, four legions, which were the remains of Craſſus and Pompey's armies, and part of the troops which Cæſar had left with her to guard Egypt. Theſe four legions were taken by Caſſius, who, by frequent meſſages, ſollicited Cleopatra to join him againſt the triumvirs; but ſhe being indebted to Cæſar for her crown, could, neither by ſollicitations nor menaces, be prevailled upon to aſſiſt his murderer. Hereupon Caſſius began his march towards the frontiers of Egypt, with a deſign to invade that kingdom; but being preſſed by Brutus to join him, he dropped that enterprize. Cleopatra being thus delivered from all apprehenſions of an invaſion, ſailed with a numerous fleet to join Antony and Octavius; but falling ſick was obliged to return to Egypt, after having loſt a great number of her ſhips by a violent ſtorm [h].

Antony, after the battle of Philippi, having paſſed over into Aſia to ſettle all matters there for the intereſt of the conqueror, was informed that Cleopatra, or at leaſt ſome of her governors, had ſent ſuccours to Caſſius againſt Dolabella. Hereupon he ſummoned the queen of Egypt to appear before him at Tarſus in Cilicia, whither he was then going to ſettle the affairs of that province. Cleopatra, convinced of the great power of her charms, by the proof ſhe had already ſo ſucceſsfully made of them on Cæſar, did not doubt but ſhe ſhould eaſily captivate Antony, and the more, becauſe the former had been acquainted with her only when ſhe was very young, and had no knowledge of the world; whereas ſhe was going to appear before Antony at an age, when women unite to the bloom of their beauty a ripeneſs of underſtanding, which qualifies them to treat of and conduct the greateſt affairs; for ſhe was then twenty-five years old, had a great deal of wit and humour, and was no leſs agreeable in her converſation than in her perſon. She provided herſelf with rich preſents, vaſt ſums of money, and above all with magnificent and ſumptuous habits and ornaments; and thus provided embarqued on a ſtately galley, and, attended with the [h] Appian. l. iv. p. 625.

the reſt of her fleet, ſet ſail for Cilicia, croſſed the ſea of Pamphylia, and, entering the Cydnus, arrived at Tarſus, where Antony waited for her. Never had there been ſeen in thoſe parts a more ſplendid equipage than her's. Her galley was guilt all over, the ſails of purple, and the oars plated over with ſilver. The queen appeared under a canopy of cloth of gold, raiſed on the deck, in the ſame attire and attitude as Venus was then generally painted, being ſurrounded by a great many comely youths fanning her like Cupids, and beautiful virgins, repreſenting, ſome the Nereids, and others the Graces. The dales and hills ecchoed, as ſhe ſailed up the river, with the melodious ſounds of various inſtruments, with which the oars keeping time, ſeemed in a manner to double the harmony. The great quantity of perfumes that were burnt on the deck, ſpread the odours on each ſide of the river to a great diſtance, and filled the air with the moſt fragrant ſcents. As ſoon as it was known in the city that the queen of Egypt was drawing near, the citizens of all ranks and ages, abandoning their houſes and interrupting their moſt ſerious occupations, crowded out of the gates to meet her; inſomuch, that Antony, who was diſtributing juſtice and hearing cauſes in the forum, ſaw his tribunal all on a ſudden deſerted, not a ſingle perſon remaining with him but his lictors and domeſtics; and indeed no wonder, that the whole city flocked to ſee her, a rumor being ſpread all over Tarſus, that the goddeſs Venus was coming to pay a viſit to Bacchus, and confer with him about the good of Aſia. She was no ſooner landed, than Antony ſent to invite her to ſupper; but the queen anſwered, that, according to the rules of civility, he ought firſt to come to her, and that therefore ſhe expected to ſee him that very night in the tents, which would be ſoon ſet up on the banks of the river. Antony complied with her invitation, and was received and entertained with a magnificence not to be expreſſed. Antony invited her in his turn for the next day, and no expence was ſpared; but in ſpite of his utmoſt efforts, he owned his entertainment far inferior to the queen's, and was himſelf the firſt to ridicule the parſimony and plainneſs of his own, when compared with the ſplendor and elegance of Cleopatra's. The more Antony converſed with the fair Egyptian, the more he was charmed with her converſation, which, being attended with all poſſible ſweetneſs and gaiety, had attractions ſtill more irreſiſtible than her form and features. Little or no mention was made of the complaints which had been brought

brought againſt her, and were indeed without foundation. She ſoon got ſo abſolute an aſcendant over her judge, that it was not in his power to refuſe her any thing ſhe aſked, however repugnant to the laws of juſtice, humanity, or religion [i]. At her requeſt aſſaſſins were diſpatched to Miletus, as Appian tells us [k], or to Epheſus, as Joſephus will have it [l], with orders to murder Arſinoe, which were accordingly executed in the very temple where ſhe had taken refuge. Cleopatra, to attach Antony the more to her perſon and intereſt, made daily entertainments during her ſtay at Tarſus, inviting him and the chief officers of his army to partake of them, and ſpending on thoſe occaſions immenſe ſums of money. In one of theſe banquets Antony expreſſing great ſurprize at the vaſt number of gold cups, enriched with jewels which were diſplayed on all ſides, the queen told him, that ſince he admired ſuch trifles, he was very welcome to them, and immediately ordered her ſervants to carry them all to his houſe. The next day ſhe invited him anew, and deſired him to bring a good number of gueſts along with him. He accepted her invitation, and came attended with all the chief officers at that time in Tarſus. When the banquet was over, and the numerous company ready to depart, Cleopatra preſented them with all the gold and ſilver plate which had been made uſe of during the entertainment [m]. In one of theſe feaſts happened what Pliny, and after him Macrobius, relates of Cleopatra's magnificence, or rather profuſeneſs. The queen had at her ears two of the fineſt and largeſt pearls that ever had been ſeen, each of them being valued at fifty-two thouſand five hundred pounds of our money. One of theſe ſhe cauſed to be diſſolved in vinegar, and then ſwallowed it for no other end, but to ſhew the little account ſhe made of ſuch toys, and how much ſhe could ſpend on one draught. She was preparing in like manner to melt the other, when Plancus, who was preſent, ſtopt her, and ſaved the pearl, which was afterwards carried to Rome by Auguſtus, and, being by his orders cut in two, ſerved for pendants to the Venus of the Julian family [n].

[i] Plut. in Anton. Appian. l. v. p. 671——676. Diodor. Sicul. l. xlviii. p. 371. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 23. [k] Appian. l. v. p. 676. [l] Joſeph. l. xv. c. 14. [m] Athen. l. iv. p. 147, 158. [n] Plin. l. xxxiii. c. 3. Arnob. l. iv.

In the mean time Antony being obliged by his affairs to leave Tarſus, Cleopatra, accompanied him as far as Tyre, and there taking her leave of him returned into Egypt. But the triumvir was ſo taken with her charms, that he could not now live without her; having therefore appointed Plancus to be his lieutenant in Aſia Minor, and Saxa in Syria, he haſtened after her to Alexandria, and there ſpent the whole enſuing winter with her in ſports, banquets, and all kinds of diverſions, treating each other every day at an immenſe and incredible expence. Cleopatra's whole ſtudy was to amuſe him, and make him paſs his time agreeably. She never left him day or night, but was continually contriving new diverſions, that he might not have leiſure to reflect, or entertain thoughts of leaving her. Antony took particular pleaſure in angling; but being one day attended with very bad luck, and much concerned to appear before the queen without his uſual addreſs and good fortune, he ordered the fiſhermen he had with him to dive ſecretly under water, and faſten to his hook ſome of the largeſt fiſhes which they had taken in their nets. His orders being punctually executed, Cleopatra expreſſed in appearance great ſurprize and admiration every time he drew up his line, but, being well appriſed of the artifice, ſhe cauſed one of her own people to dive ſecretly under water, and faſten to the triumvir's hook a large dry fiſh of that kind that was brought from the Euxine ſea into Egypt. When Antony drew up his line, the whole company was highly diverted at the ſight of the ſalt-fiſh, and could not help laughing at the triumvir's extraordinary good luck; but he putting on a ſerious air, the queen took him in her arms, and diſplaying all her charms, Leave, ſaid ſhe, good general, leave the angling line to us kings and queens of Pharos and Canopus; it becomes you to take cities, kingdoms, and princes.

While Antony was thus amuſing himſelf with childiſh and trifling diverſions, Labienus at the head of the Parthian army made great conqueſts in Syria, which obliged him to take his leave of Cleopatra early in the ſpring. As he was on his march againſt the Parthians he altered his meaſures, and ſailed into Italy with two hundred ſhips againſt young Octavianus, with whom he ſoon after reconciled himſelf, marrying by the advice of his friends his ſiſter Octavia, a woman of extraordinary merit who was lately become a widow by the death of Marcellus. It was believed, this marriage would make him forget Cleopatra; but his paſſion for

for the Egyptian ſoon reviving, after he had ſpent the winter with his new wife at Athens, he haſtened back to Alexandria, where he gave himſelf up to the ſame looſe and ſcandalous way of living, which he had followed the winter two years before. On his removing from Alexandria into Syria to purſue the war againſt the Parthians, he left her in Egypt; but before he ſet out on that expedition, he ſent for her into Syria againſt the advice of all his friends. On her arrival ſhe influenced him to commit ſuch flagrant acts of cruelty and injuſtice, as rendered his name and government odious to the whole nation. Many Syrian lords were on falſe pretences put to death, that ſhe might have their forfeited eſtates. Among theſe was Lyſanias the ſon of Ptolemy Mennæus, prince of Chalcis and Ituræa, whom ſhe accuſed to Antony of having entered into an alliance with the Parthians. Upon this groundleſs accuſation, Lyſanias was condemned, and his dominions granted to her. The ſtay he made with her before he ſet out againſt the Parthians, and the hurry he was in to return to her again, were the occaſion of the many misfortunes that befel him in that unhappy expedition. On his return into Syria, having with much difficulty got to the borders of Armenia, inſtead of putting his army there into winter quarters, as his officers adviſed him, being impatient to ſee Cleopatra, he obſtinately purſued his march, in the depth of winter, over that mountainous country then covered with ſnow, which, with the long march of three hundred miles he had made before he reached Armenia, ſo harraſſed his troops, that, on his arrival in Syria, he found that ſixty thouſand of them had periſhed in that deſtructive undertaking, moſtly by the hardſhips they had ſuffered on their long and fatiguing marches °.

As ſoon as Antony had got back into Syria, he retired to Leucecome, a caſtle in Phœnice, lying between Sidon and Berytus, and there, having ſent for Cleopatra, paſſed his time with her in feaſting and revelling, without ſhewing the leaſt concern for the loſs of his army. Cleopatra brought with her cloaths for the poor remains of his ſhattered troops, which with a large donative in money were diſtributed among the ſoldiers in Cleopatra's name, though the money was given by Antony. Having thus quieted the ſoldiery, and made them amends for the hardſhips they had ſuffered, he returned with his beloved queen into Egypt, where he ſpent the remainder of the winter, in all manner of luxury and voluptuouſneſs [q]. In the mean time the kings of Parthia and Media falling out about the diviſion of the booty, which they had taken from the Romans, the latter ſent an embaſſy to Antony, offering to join him againſt the Parthian with all his forces. At the ſame time news was brought him, that the Parthians had taken up arms againſt their king, and that all things were there in the utmoſt confuſion. Hereupon Antony, reſolved to lay hold of ſo favourable an opportunity of being revenged on that nation, haſtened into Syria, with a deſign to make the neceſſary preparations for a ſecond expedition againſt that formidable enemy. But Octavia being come as far as Athens in her way to Antony, Cleopatra was under no ſmall apprehenſion, leſt by her virtue, wiſdom, and the gravity of her manners ſhe ſhould recover the affection of her huſband, and therefore employed all her arts to prevent their meeting. She affected to die for love, and having made herſelf lean and pale, by taking little nouriſhment, ſhe wrote to him, that his abſence had caſt her into a languiſhing condition, and that ſhe muſt die unleſs he returned to her again. This brought the credulous lover back to Alexandria, where Cleopatra with tears, careſſes, reproaches, menaces, &c. prevailed upon him to put off his expedition into Parthia, and to order Octavia to proceed no farther, but to wait for him at Athens. This ſcandalous behaviour of Antony towards Octavia was highly reſented by her brother Octavianus, and became the firſt cauſe of that war, which ended in the ruin of both thoſe lovers [r].

° Liv. epit. l. cxxx. Strab. l. xi. p. 525. Plut. in Anton. Dio. l. xlix. Flor. l. iv. c. 10. Vellei Patercul. l. ii. c. 82.

EARLY in the ſpring, Antony ſet out for Syria, with a deſign to march from thence into Parthia. Cleopatra pretending that ſhe could not live without him, agreed to attend him to the banks of the Euphrates. To render his abſence leſs grievous to her, before he ſet out, he beſtowed on her all Cyrene, Cyprus, Cœle-Syria, Ituræa, and Phœnice, with great part of Cilicia and Crete. But theſe provinces and kingdoms not ſatisfying her boundleſs ambition, ſhe ſollicited him very earneſtly to put to death Herod king of Judæa and Malchus king of Arabia Petræa, that their kingdoms might thereupon be granted to her. But Antony tony would not by any means comply with her requeſt. However, to quiet her, he was forced to give her that part of Malchus's kingdom which bordered upon Egypt, and out of Herod's the territory of Jericho with the balſam-gardens. Theſe large grants gave great offence to the Roman people, and eſtranged their minds from Antony [s]. Cleopatra accompanied him as far as the Euphrates, and returning from thence by the way of Apamea and Damaſcus, came to Jeruſalem, where ſhe was ſplendidly entertained by Herod. During her ſtay in that city, ſhe pretended to be in love with the king, and employed all her charms to draw him into a criminal converſation with her. The impudence of this attempt raiſed in him an irreconcileable averſion to her, which, joined to the hatred he had juſtly conceived againſt her for the ill offices ſhe had done him with Antony, provoked him to ſuch a degree, that he reſolved, now he had her in his power, to put her to death. But his friends, whom he adviſed with, having laid before him the fatal conſequences that would unavoidably attend her death, he altered his mind, and continued to entertain her with all poſſible reſpect and ſplendor, ſo long as ſhe ſtaid with him, and on her departure waited on her in perſon to the borders of her kingdom [t].

[q] Flor. l. iv. c. 18. Plut. ibid. [r] Dio. Caſſ. l. xlix. p. 411. Plut ibid.

In the mean time Antony, having in defiance of the moſt ſacred oaths and ſolemn promiſes taken Artabazus king of Armenia priſoner, and thereupon reduced all that country, was preparing to return into Egypt. Before he left Armenia he agreed on a match between Alexander, one of his ſons by Cleopatra, and a daughter of the king of Media, and then putting his army into winter quarters in Armenia and the neighbouring countries, he haſtened back to Alexandria, which city he entered in a triumphal chariot, cauſing the booty which he had taken, with king Artabazus, his wife, and children, and other priſoners of diſtinction, to be carried before him in the ſame manner as was uſually done in the triumphs at Rome. Cleopatra waited for the triumphing conqueror in the forum, being ſeated on a golden throne which was placed on a ſcaffold over-laid with ſilver, and ſurrounded by the chief lords of her court in their beſt apparel. To her, thus placed on her throne, was preſented the king in golden chains, and with him the other priſoners. They were all ordered to kneel down before her, but not one of them them could be prevailed upon to submit to an obeysance so mean and degrading. When news of this triumph was brought to Rome, the Romans, who looked upon this ceremony as peculiar to their city, conceived an implacable hatred to Antony for carrying it elsewhere to gratify a woman of a most infamous character [u].

[s] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xv. c. 4. & de Bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 13. Plut. & Dio. Caſſ. ibid.

[t] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xv. c. 5.

A few days after, Antony, having feasted at an immense charge all the people of Alexandria, summoned them to meet in the gymnasium, and there being seated on a throne of gold, and Cleopatra by him on another, he made an oration to that numerous audience, wherein he proclaimed Cœsarion, the son of Cleopatra and Julius Cæsar, king of Egypt and Cyprus in conjunction with his mother. As he himself had three children by the same Cleopatra, viz. Alexander, Ptolemy, whom he sirnamed Philadelphus, and Cleopatra, at the same time he gave to Alexander Armenia, Media, Parthia, and the rest of the eastern countries from the Euphrates to India, when they should be subdued; to Cleopatra, the twin-sister of Alexander, Libya and Cyrene; and to Philadelphus, Phœnice, Syria, Cilicia, and all the countries of Asia Minor from the Euphrates to the Hellespont, conferring on each of them the title of king of kings. At the same time he obliged Cleopatra to take the name of Isis, assuming to himself that of Osiris; the former being the great goddess, and the latter the great god, of the Egyptians. From thenceforth they both affected to appear in public in the dress which was deemed peculiar to those deities [w]. By these follies he lessened his character among all wise and sober men, and daily alienated more and more the affections of the Romans from his person and cause, which Octavianus made good use of to hasten his ruin.

Antony, as soon as the season allowed him to take the field, marched into Armenia, and, having there rendevoused his troops, began his march into Parthia, and advanced as far as the banks of the Araxes, when news was brought him that Octavianus had stirred up the people of Rome against him, and was making the necessary preparations, as if he designed to come to an open rupture with him. Hereupon he dropt the Parthian expedition, and detaching Canidius, one of his lieutenants, with sixteen legions to the coasts of the Ionian sea, he himself hastened after them to Ephesus, to be there ready at hand to act in case

[u] Plut. & Dio. Cass. ibid. [w] Dio. Cass. lib. p. 421.

caſe of a rupture, which there was great reaſon to expect. In this journey he carried Cleopatra with him, which proved his ruin. His friends earneſtly entreated him to ſend her back to Alexandria, there to wait the event of the war. But the queen, fearing leſt in her abſence Antony ſhould hearken to an accommodation with Octavianus and receive again Octavia, left no ſtone unturned to obtain leave to accompany him, and at laſt, having by rich preſents gained Canidius to ſpeak in her favour, prevailed upon him to comply with her requeſt. Her chief argument was, that ſince ſhe contributed moſt to the expences of the war, for ſhe had advanced twenty thouſand talents towards it, it was but reaſonable that ſhe ſhould be allowed to accompany the perſon for whoſe ſake ſhe was at ſo great an expence. Beſides, Canidius repreſented, that her departure would diſcourage the Egyptians, who made up the bulk of his maritime forces, that Cleopatra was not inferior in prudence or capacity to any of the princes in the army, and thatAntony might, with great ſafety, depend upon and follow her advice in the moſt important and difficult affairs. Antony was eaſily perſuaded, that Cleopatra's preſence was neceſſary, and therefore repaired with her from Epheſus to Samos, whence he ſailed to Athens, and in both theſe places lived after his uſual manner, ſpending great part of the year in luxury, pomp, and voluptuouſneſs [x]. As Antony was well acquainted with Cleopatra's character, during their ſtay at Athens, he began to ſuſpect, notwithſtanding the paſſion ſhe profeſſed for him, that ſhe had a mind to poiſon him, and therefore would not touch any diſh at their banquets till it had been taſted by others. The queen being appriſed of his fears, in order to cure him of them, and at the ſame time convince him, that, if ſhe harboured deſigns of that nature, no precaution could guard him againſt them, cauſed the flowers to be dipt in poiſon, of which the garlands, uſed according to the cuſtom of thoſe times in public feaſts, were compoſed. When Antony began to be warm with wine, Cleopatra propoſed drinking the flowers of their garlands, and Antony in the height of his gaiety falling in with that frolick, threw ſome of them into his cup, and was on the point of ſwallowing them with his wine, when the queen, taking hold of his arm, told him that the flowers were poiſoned, and that ſhe, againſt whom he took ſuch mighty precautions precautions, had prepared the poiſon, adding, that if ſhe could poſſibly live without him, ſhe could in ſpite of all his care, find means to get rid of him. She then commanded a criminal, already condemned, to be brought in, and to drink the wine in Antony's cup, which immediately put an end to his life [y]. This fully convinced him that his fears were ill-grounded, and made him thenceforth repoſe an entire confidence in her.

[x] Plut. ibid. Dio Caſs. l. xlix. p. 416.

In the mean time Antony, being informed that Octavianus was ſtirring up the people of Rome againſt him, called together the chief men of his party, and by their advice declared war againſt his adverſary, and at the ſame time ſent a bill of divorce to Octavia, with meſſengers to drive her by force out of his houſe at Rome. Antony's preparations for the war were ſo far advanced, that if he had attacked his rival without loſs of time, the advantage muſt have been unavoidably on his ſide, Octavianus not being then in a condition to make head againſt him, either by ſea or land. But Antony to gratify his luxury put off taking the field to the next year, and continued to banquet and revel at Athens with Cleopatra, as in the moſt peaceable times. He never appeared in public without her; even when he adminiſtred juſtice on his tribunal in the forum, Cleopatra was to be placed on a throne by him; when he ſpoke to her he gave her no other title but that of queen and ſovereign, and often followed her on foot among the eunuchs, while ſhe was drawn in a ſumptuous and ſtately chariot. The aſcendant ſhe had gained over him inſpired her with hopes of becoming one day queen of Rome; for we are told, that her uſual oath was, As I hope to give law in the capitol [z].

While Antony was thus trifling away his time at Athens, Octavianus, having got ready a conſiderable fleet and army, no longer delayed declaring war, but cauſed it to be decreed only againſt Cleopatra, to avoid offending Antony's friends, who were very numerous and powerful at Rome. What chiefly provoked Octavianus was Antony's declaring Cleopatra to have been married to Julius Cæſar, and conſequently Cæſarion, whom ſhe had by him, to be his lawful ſon; which tended to deprive Octavianus of the inheritance of Julius Cæſar, ſince he held it only as his adopted ſon. War being declared, as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit, the two armies took took the field, and the fleets put to ſea. After ſeveral encounters both by ſea and land, Antony was at laſt prevailed upon by Cleopatra, contrary to the advice of Canidius who had the chief command of the army, to put the whole to the iſſue of a ſea-fight. This was the worſt counſel that could be given him, his land-forces being far ſuperior both in number and bravery to the enemy's; whereas he had been obliged to burn many of his ſhips for want of rowers and mariners, and the reſt were but very indifferently manned. But Cleopatra, being well appriſed that, in caſe Antony ſhould be defeated, ſhe might with greater eaſe and ſafety make her eſcape by ſea than by land, perſuaded him to engage the enemy's fleet. This memorable battle was fought on the fourth of the nones of September at the mouth of the Ambracian gulph near the ſmall city of Actium, in ſight of both armies, the one being drawn up on the north, and the other on the ſouth ſide of the ſtraits, there to wait the event of the action, which continued doubtful, till Cleopatra, frightened with the noiſe of the battle, which appeared very dreadful to her, betook herſelf to flight before ſhe was in any danger, and drew after her the whole Egyptian ſquadron, conſiſting of ſixty large ſhips. Antony ſeeing her fly, made after her, as if he had been quite deſtitute of his underſtanding, and by his flight yielded the victory to Octavianus, which till then he had diſputed with great vigor and reſolution. The particulars of this memorable battle we ſhall relate more at length in the hiſtory of Rome, contenting ourſelves at preſent to touch upon ſuch circumſtances only as concern the affairs of Egypt.

[y] Plin. l. xxi. c. 3. [z] Dio. Caſſ. p. 421, 422. Eutrop. l. 7.

THE next day Octavianus detached a ſquadron of his beſt ſailors in purſuit of Antony and Cleopatra; but they, deſpairing to overtake them, ſoon returned to the fleet. In the mean time, the two fugitives, ſteering their courſe towards Peloponneſus, got ſafe to Tœnarus in Laconia. Antony had been by Cleopatra's orders taken on board her ſhip as ſoon as he came up with it, but had not ſeen her during this whole voyage. On his firſt entering her ſhip he ſat down in the prow; and there leaning his elbows on his knees and his head on both his hands, he continued in that poſture, reflecting with profound melancholy on his ill conduct, and the misfortunes he had brought on himſelf, till he had got to Tænarus, where by the interpoſition of Cleopatra's women, being brought together again, they converſed and lived as uſual. For Antony was ſo bewitched to this woman, that he ſtill continued his fondneſs to her even at this time, when he had all the reaſon in the world to abhor and deteſt her, as having been the cauſe of his ruin in the manner we have related [a].

From Tænarus Cleopatra ſailed to Alexandria, and Antony to Libya, where he had left Pinarius Scarpus, with a conſiderable body of troops, to guard the frontiers of Egypt on that ſide. But on his landing he found, that Scarpus, with all the troops under his command, had revolted to Octavianus; which unexpected diſappointment threw him into ſuch deſpair, that he was with much ado prevented by his friends from putting an end to his unhappy life. The only reſolution therefore he could now take was, to follow Cleopatra to Alexandria, where ſhe was arrived a little before [b]. That crafty princeſs, fearing ſhe might not be received by her ſubjects, were her misfortunes known, entered the harbour with crowns on the prows of her ſhips, as if ſhe had obtained ſome ſignal victory. By this means being admitted into her metropolis, ſhe put all thoſe to death, who were any ways averſe to her, to prevent the tumults which ſhe feared they might raiſe, when the true ſtate of her affairs ſhould be known [c]. Antony on his arrival in Egypt, found her engaged in a very extraordinary undertaking. To avoid falling into the hands of Octavianus, who, ſhe foreſaw, would follow her into Egypt, ſhe undertook the carrying of her ſhips in the Mediterranean into the Red-Sea, over the iſthmus of ſeventy miles which lay between them. Theſe ſhips ſhe deſigned to join to thoſe ſhe had in the Red-Sea, and, putting all her treaſures on board of them, to go in queſt of ſome other place to ſettle in, out of the enemy's reach. But the Arabians, who inhabited that coaſt, having, at the inſtigation of Q. Didius, who had ſeized on Syria for Octavianus, burnt all the ſhips that were carried over, and the others ſhe had there before, ſhe was forced to drop this enterprize [d]. Antony, on his arrival at Alexandria, declined ſeeing Cleopatra, and ſhut himſelf up in a houſe, which he cauſed to be built on the ſhore, ſequeſtring himſelf from the company and converſation of all men. For, being forſaken by thoſe he moſt confided in, he pretended to act the part of Timon the miſanthrope, or man-hater; and therefore called this this houſe his Timonium, there ſpending his time in ſolitude, and deteſting all men for the ſake of thoſe who had abandoned him, as if his misfortunes had been owing to them, and not to his own conduct and folly [e]. But he did not long reliſh this way of living; his paſſion for Cleopatra ſoon revived, and drew him from his retirement to the queen's palace, where he ſpent the remaining part of his life, in his uſual exceſſes of luxury, voluptuouſneſs, and folly.

[a] Plut. in Anton. Dion. Caſſ. ibid. [b] Plut. ibid. Eutrop. l. vi. [c] Dion. Caſſ. l. li. p. 446. [d] Plut. ibid. Dion. Caſſ. l. li. p. 447.

In the mean time, Octavianus, having ſettled the affairs of Greece and Aſia Minor, repaired to Samos, and there took up his winter-quarters. Early in the ſpring from Samos he paſſed over to Rhodes, where Herod king of Judæa came to offer him his aſſiſtance againſt Antony and Cleopatra. That prince had been greatly attached to the intereſt of Antony, had aſſiſted him to the utmoſt of his power, and continued faithful to him, till his caſe was grown abſolutely deſperate. On his return into Egypt he had ſent a ſpecial meſſenger to him with the beſt advice the ſtate of his affairs was then capable of; this was to kill Cleopatra, ſeize her kingdom, and with her treaſures raiſe a new army for the carrying on of the war. In caſe he followed his advice, he promiſed to ſtand by him to the utmoſt, and venture both his life and kingdom in his cauſe. But when he found that Antony would not hearken to his counſels, nor by any means be prevailed upon to abandon Cleopatra, he thought it high time to take care of himſelf, and endeavour to make up matters with Octavianus, on the beſt terms he could [f]. From Rhodes Octavianus paſſed through Aſia Minor into Syria, with a deſign to invade Egypt on that ſide, while Cornelius Gallus, the famous poet, whom he had appointed to ſucceed Scarpus in Libya and Cyrene, entered it on the other. In the mean time Antony and Cleopatra tried, but without ſucceſs, to appeaſe Octavianus. They ſent three different embaſſies to him, and even went ſo far as to offer themſelves ready to reſign all, and live a private life in Athens, or any other place which he ſhould appoint; the only thing they deſired was, that the kingdom of Egypt might be given to Cleopatra's children. Though Cleopatra joined her embaſſadors with Antony's, yet ſhe gave them inſtructions to treat ſeparately for herſelf, and ſent privately by them to Octavianus a ſceptre, a crown, and a chair of gold, reſigning, as it it were, all her power and authority to him. Octavianus accepted Cleopatra's presents, and in public returned her embassadors the following answer, viz. that if the queen of Egypt would lay down her arms and resign her kingdom, he should then consider, whether she ought to be treated with rigour or mercy; but privately he promised her impunity, and even her kingdom, in case she would put Antony to death [g]. As for Antony's embassadors, he would not so much as see them, though they delivered up to him, as a present from their master, Q. Turullius a senator, one of Cæsar's murderers and Antony's intimate friends. On the third embassy Antony sent his own son with a great sum of money; which Octavianus took, but sent him back his son without any answer, though Antony had, among other things, offered to kill himself, provided Octavianus would engage his word, that the kingdom of Egypt should be given to Cleopatra's children [h]. As Octavianus was desirous of having Cleopatra's person and treasures in his power, the former for the adorning of his triumph, and the latter for the discharging of the debts he had contracted on account of this war, he sent her several kind messages, promising to treat her with great kindness, provided, she would render herself worthy of his favour by killing Antony, who was the author of all her misfortunes. This she could not be prevailed upon to do; but she promised to deliver both him and her kingdom into his hands. Agreeable to this promise, the strong and important city of Pelusium was by her private orders betrayed to Octavianus, though in a condition to hold out a long siege. Antony, not apprehending any danger on that side, the place being well fortified and garrisoned, was gone to lay siege to Peritonium, the key of Egypt on the western side. As Cornelius Gallus, who held that place for Octavianus, had no other forces with him but those that had formerly served under Antony, he hoped that, on his appearing before the town, they would again return to their former master, and deliver up the place to him. But when he approached the wall, with a design to exhort them to return to their duty, Gallus caused all the trumpets to sound, so that not one word was heard of what he said. After this Gallus made a vigorous sally, repulsed his land-forces, and having by a stratagem hemmed in all his ships in the port, destroyed his whole fleet, not one of them having been able to [g] Dio. Cass. l. li. p. 447.

[e] Plut. ibid. Strab. l. xvii. p. 794.

[f] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xv. c. 10. & de Bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 15.

[h] Dio. Cass. ibid. p. 448.

to eſcape [i]. Antony hearing after this defeat that Peluſium was taken, and that Octavianus was advancing towards Alexandria, haſtened thither to defend the capitol. On his arrival, Cleopatra, the better to conceal her treachery, cauſed her jewels and moſt valuable effects to be removed from the palace to a monument of an extraordinary height and wonderful ſtructure, which ſhe had formerly cauſed to be built near the temple of Iſis. Thither likewiſe ſhe conveyed a great quantity of perfumes, aromatic wood, flax, &c. giving out, that, ſhould the town be taken, ſhe would raiſe there a funeral pile, and conſume herſelf and her treaſures in the flames, to prevent their falling into the enemy's hands. This ſhe did, that Antony might not diſtruſt her as being of intelligence with Octavianus; but the latter, not knowing her real intentions, was greatly alarmed; and, apprehending that deſpair might induce her to lay violent hands on herſelf and deſtroy her treaſures, ſent daily kind meſſages to her, giving her great hopes of a friendly and generous treatment, and in the mean time advanced with great marches towards the city [k]. On his arrival he encamped in the Hippodromus, hoping to make himſelf ſoon maſter of the city by means of the intelligence he held with Cleopatra, on which he relied more than on his troops. Antony, not miſtruſting Cleopatra in the leaſt, having made the neceſſary preparations for a vigorous defence, ſallied out upon the enemy's horſe, before they had time to refreſh themſelves after their march; and, having entirely defeated them, returned victorious into the city, and among the loud acclamations of the Alexandrians threw himſelf, armed as he was, at Cleopatra's feet and kiſſed her hand, recommending to her one of his ſoldiers, who on that occaſion had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very eminent manner. The queen immediately ſent for the ſoldier, and in the preſence of the whole people preſented him with an armour and helmet of pure gold; which he accepting, with great proteſtations of gratitude and loyalty, deſerted that very night to the enemy [l]. After this Antony made another ſally, but was repulſed with great loſs, the Egyptians having, by Cleopatra's private orders, abandoned him in the heat of the engagement. Hereupon his friends, who had watched more narrowly Cleopatra's conduct, told him

[i] Plut. & Dio. Caſſ. ibid.
[k] Plut. ibid. & Dio. p. 449.
[l] Plut. ibid. Dio. 450.

him in plain terms that she betrayed him, and maintained a correspondence with the enemy. This Antony was so far from believing, that he expressed great wrath against those who seemed to suspect her, telling them, that he might put a speedy end to the war, if those, who affected to be his friends, proved as faithful to him as his dear Cleopatra. Early next morning he went down to the harbour, and having drawn up his ships, he sailed out with a design to attack the enemy's fleet. But the signal was no sooner given for the engagement, than Cleopatra's admiral, followed by all the Egyptian ships in compliance with her orders, went over to Octavianus. Hereupon Antony hastened back to his land-army, which he had drawn up on some eminences within the city; but was greatly surprized, when he found that they had all to a man both horse and foot deserted to the enemy. This opened Antony's eyes, and made him give credit to what his friends had told him of the queen's perfidy. In this extremity not knowing whom to confide in, and having no forces to oppose the enemy, he sent to challenge Octavianus to a single combat; but he, smiling at this new proposal, answered, that if Antony was tired of his life, there were not wanting halters and daggers enow in Alexandria. The brave Romans looked upon such challenges as the effect of despair, and not of valour. Antony, seeing himself thus ridiculed by his enemy, abandoned by his friends, and, what most of all grieved him, betrayed by his beloved Cleopatra, flew full of rage and despair to the palace, with a design to kill the perfidious queen. But she by a timely flight escaped his fury, retiring to the abovementioned monument, with two of her maids and one of her eunuchs. There she shut herself up, and caused it to be given out, that she had killed herself to avoid falling into the enemy's hands. Antony, too credulous, did not allow himself time to examine a piece of news, which he ought not to have easily credited after Cleopatra's late behaviour; but passing from an excess of rage to the most violent transports of grief, thought of nothing but following her, by putting a speedy end to his unhappy life [m].

HAVING taken this desperate resolution, he shut himself up in his apartment with a faithful slave called Eros, who had long before promised to kill him, when the desperate state of his affairs should require that mournful office at his hands. Taking

[m] Plut. & Dio. ibid.

Taking therefore his armour off, he put Eros in mind of his promiſe, and turning his back to him, commanded him to run him through with the ſword he put into his hand. But the ſlave, full of affection, reſpect, and fidelity for his maſter, ſtabbed himſelf with it, and fell dead at his feet. Antony, encouraged by his example, fell upon his ſword, and gave himſelf the wound, of which he afterwards died. But as he did not expire immediately, he begged ſome of his friends, who had broke into his apartment, to give him the laſt inſtance of their friendſhip and affection by completing what he had begun. But they all fled out of the room, leaving him wallowing in his blood. Dercetæus, one of Antony's guard, concealing under his garment the ſword, with which he had given himſelf the mortal wound, haſtened to Octavianus, and, ſhewing him the ſword covered all over with blood, acquainted him the firſt with the death of his rival. Octavianus at the ſight of the ſword withdrew, without uttering a ſingle word, to the innermoſt part of his tent, and there with many tears lamented the unhappy fate of his collegue and relation. Having thus given, or pretended to give vent to his grief, he called in his friends, and read to them the imperious and threatening letters, which Antony had wrote to him. He then ſent Proculeius into the city, ordering him to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to get Cleopatra alive into his power [n].

In the mean time, the tumult and noiſe, which the news of Antony's death occaſioned all over the city, alarming Cleopatra, ſhe looked out from the top of the monument, and hearing that Antony had wounded himſelf, but was not yet dead, ſhe commanded Diomedes her ſecretary to bring him to her into the monument. Diomedes entering his room found him lying by the dead ſlave in a torrent of blood; but he no ſooner pronounced the name of Cleopatra, than he opened his dying eyes; and being informed that ſhe was ſtill alive, and deſirous to ſee him, he ſuffered his wound to be dreſſed, and cauſed himſelf to be carried by the hands of his ſlaves to the gate of the monument, which Cleopatra would not ſuffer to be opened for fear of ſome ſurprize. However, ſhe ordered her ſervants below to faſten him to the ropes, which which hung from the top of the monument, and were made use of to pull up stones, that part not being yet finished. They obeyed her orders, and Antony being made fast to the ropes, Cleopatra, assisted by her two women, with much ado drew him up, her servants below raising him till he was out of their reach. Never was there a more moving sight. Antony, all bathed in his blood, with death painted in his face, was dragged up in the manner we have related, turning his eyes, and extending his arms to Cleopatra, as if he conjured her to receive his last breath; while she, bathed in tears, underwent a fatigue she had never been used to, for the poor satisfaction of taking her last farewell of him, and seeing him die in her arms. As soon as she had taken him in, she laid him on a bed; and there, after having expressed her grief and concern in the most tender and affecting terms, she cut off his hair, according to the superstition of the pagans, who looked upon this as a relief to those who died of a violent death. Antony, seeing Cleopatra's affliction, called for some wine, and having by that means somewhat raised his drooping spirits, he endeavoured to comfort her in the best manner he could; he told her, that he thought himself happy as he died in her arms; that as to his defeat, he was not ashamed of it, since it was no dishonour for a Roman to be overcome by a Roman; he advised her to consult her own interest, to save her life and kingdom, provided she could do it with honour; and lastly, to trust none of the friends of Octavianus except Proculeius. With these words he expired, and the same moment Proculeius arrived from Octavianus's camp. But the queen kept in the monument, refusing to surrender herself to him, unless he would promise her in the name of Octavianus both the kingdom of Egypt and her liberty. These were terms which Proculeius could not grant; for Octavianus, having a great desire to carry her in triumph, had warned him not to promise her any thing, that could prevent him from treating her as a captive. However, they had a long conference, Cleopatra standing within, and Proculeius close to the gate without. In this conference she begged the kingdom of Egypt for her children, and insisted on having her liberty granted to her; on these two conditions she offered to deliver into his hands both her person and her treasures. But Proculeius exhorting her only in general terms to confide in Octavianus, and refer all things to his generosity and good nature, she broke

[n] Dio. Caſſ. p. 449, 450. Liv. l. cxxxiii. Flor. l. iv. c. 11. Vellei. Patercul l. ii. c. 87. Strab. l. xvii. p. 793. Sueton. in Octav. c. 17. Eutrop. l. vii. Oros. l. vi. c. 19.

broke off the conference and retired. Proculeius made his report to Octavianus, who immediately ſent Cornelius Gallus, a man of great learning and eloquence, to confer with her, being greatly afraid leſt ſhe ſhould be driven by deſpair to lay violent hands on herſelf, and to deſtroy her treaſures. While Gallus amuſed her with fine ſpeeches at the gate of the monument, Proculeius having cauſed a ladder to be brought, ſcaled the wall, and entering with two ſervants at the ſame place where Antony had been taken in, haſtened down to the gate, where ſhe was conferring with Gallus. When Cleopatra ſaw him unexpectedly appear, ſhe drew a dagger, which ſhe always carried about her, with a deſign to ſtab herſelf. But Proculeius flying to her took her in his arms, and forced the dagger out of her hands, before ſhe could make uſe of it. He afterwards ſearched her, and ſhook her robes, leaſt ſhe ſhould have any weapon or poiſon concealed in them; and having exhorted her to be of good cheer, and to confide in the goodneſs and clemency of the conqueror, he ſent one to acquaint Octavianus, that the queen of Egypt was his priſoner. Octavianus, overjoyed at this news, ſent Epaphroditus one of his freedmen to guard her carefully, and prevent her from making an attempt upon her own life, injoining him ſtrictly at the ſame time to treat her with all poſſible complaiſance and reſpect[o].

In the mean time, Octavianus leaving his camp drew near the city of Alexandria, and finding the gates open entered it, talking with Arius, a native of the place, who had been his preceptor, and leaning upon him with an air of familiarity, that his countrymen might honour him the more, in ſeeing him thus honoured and favoured by their conqueror. He went directly to the gymnaſium, and having aſcended a tribunal, which he had cauſed to be erected there, he firſt commanded the inhabitants, who had fallen proſtrate on the ground before him, to riſe; and then in an elegant harangue told the multitude, that he freely pardoned them in regard of their god Serapis, on account of the beauty and greatneſs of their city, and for the ſake of Arius their fellow-citizen, for whom he had a great value and eſteem [p].

[o] Plut. ibid. Dio. l. li. p. 450, 451. [p] Plut. in Anton. Dio ibid. p. 454. Julian. epiſt. 51. ad Alexand. Sueton. in Octav. c. 89. Senec. in lib. de clement. Oros. l. vi. c. 19.

Octavianus, being now in poſſeſſion of Alexandria, ſent Proculeius to comfort the queen, and aſk her in his name, whether ſhe had any requeſt to make him? Cleopatra received him with great kindneſs, and, after returning many thanks to Octavianus, ſaid, that ſhe had but one favour to beg of him, which was, that he would give her leave to bury Antony. This he willingly granted, allowing her to perform the funeral obſequies with all poſſible ſplendor, and to ſpend on that occaſion what ſums ſhe pleaſed. And indeed ſhe ſpared no coſt to render the interment magnificent; according to the Egyptian cuſtom, ſhe cauſed his body to be embalmed with the beſt perfumes of the eaſt, and placed it in the burying-place of the kings of Egypt [q]. As this mournful ceremony renewed her grief, ſhe was ſeized with a fever which ſhe with great joy laid hold of as a pretence to abſtain from all food, and by that means put an end to her life. This her deſign ſhe imparted to Olympus her phyſician, who approved of it, and promiſed to bring her ſoon into a conſumption. But Octavianus, being informed of her indiſpoſition, ſent phyſicians to her, whom he could confide in, and, by uttering threats againſt her children, prevailed upon her to follow their preſcriptions. When ſhe was pretty well recovered, Octavianus ſent Proculeius to acquaint her, that he ſhould be glad to wait upon her, provided ſhe gave him leave; for he treated her with the utmoſt complaiſance, the better to conceal his deſign, which was to adorn his triumph with ſo noble and famous a captive. Though ſhe was greatly diſfigured by her illneſs and grief, yet ſhe did not deſpair of inſpiring the young conqueror with ſentiments of tenderneſs and love, as ſhe had formerly done Cæſar and Antony. She was therefore overjoyed to hear, that he intended to pay her a viſit, and as ſoon as he entered her room, ſhe threw herſelf at his feet, and afterwards, in laying before him the ſtate of her affairs, exerted all her charms in hopes of conquering her conqueror. But whether her charms had no longer the ſame power, or that ambition was Octavianus's ruling paſſion, he was not affected either with her perſon or converſation; the whole time ſhe ſpoke he kept his eyes fixed on the ground; and when ſhe had done ſpeaking, he returned her the following Laconic anſwer: Woman be of good chear; you ſhall have no

[q] Plut. & Oros. ibid.

no harm done you [r]. She was far from being inſenſible of this coldneſs and indifference, which ſhe looked upon as no good omen; but, however, diſſembling her concern, ſhe thanked him for the honour he had done her, and told him, that in token of her gratitude ſhe deſigned to deliver up to him all the treaſures of the kings of Egypt. Accordingly ſhe put an inventory into his hands of all her moveables, jewels, and revenues. Seleucus, one of her treaſurers then preſent, accuſed her to Octavianus of having concealed part of her moſt valuable effects; which ſhe looking upon as an affront not to be bore, flew at him in a violent paſſion, and, taking hold of him by the hair, gave him ſeveral blows in the face; then turning to Octavianus, who could not help ſmiling, Is it not very hard, ſaid ſhe, ſince you have been ſo good as to viſit me in my preſent condition, that one of my own ſervants ſhould thus inſult me in your preſence? I have, 'tis true, reſerved ſome jewels, not to adorn my own perſon, but to make a preſent of them to your ſiſter Octavia and your wife Livia, that by their interceſſion you may treat an unfortunate princeſs with more favour and kindneſs. Octavianus was overjoyed to hear her talk in this manner, not doubting but ſhe had laid aſide all thoughts of deſtroying herſelf. He gave her leave to diſpoſe of the jewels ſhe had reſerved to whom and in what manner ſhe pleaſed; and having aſſured her, that ſhe ſhould be treated with more generoſity and kindneſs than ſhe expected, he withdrew, imagining he had deceived her, whereas he was deceived himſelf [s]. For Cleopatra, not doubting but Octavianus intended to make her ſerve as an ornament to his triumph, was firmly determined to avoid that ſhame by a voluntary death, and had no other thoughts than how to put her deſign in execution. She was narrowly watched by Epaphroditus, who never ſuffered her to go out of his ſight. In hopes therefore of finding ſome opportunity to deceive him, ſhe ſent one of her domeſtics to Octavianus, deſiring his permiſſion to pay her laſt duty at the tomb of Antony, and take her leave of him. Octavianus willingly complying with her requeſt, ſhe bathed the tomb with her tears, covered it with flowers, and with many ſighs and lamentations performed ſuch ceremonies as were practiſed among the Egyptians on like occaſions. But Epaphrodi-

[r] Plut. ibid. Dio. l. v. p. 451. Flor. l. iv. c. 11. [s] Plut. ibid.

tus keeping close to her the whole time, under colour of attending her, she returned to her apartment, without having had an opportunity, of attempting any thing on her own life. On her return she was accosted by a messenger from Cornelius Dolabella, who told her, that her time was short, Octavianus, who was to march by land through Syria, having given orders, that she and her children should, within three days, be put on board a vessel which was ready in the harbour, and be conveyed by sea to Rome. Cornelius Dolabella was one of Octavianus's intimate friends; but as he was in love with Cleopatra, he had promised to give her timely notice of all his designs with relation to her person. Upon this message Cleopatra, the better to amuse Epaphroditus, commanded a noble entertainment to be prepared, and having invited to it some of her friends, she shewed a more than usual chearfulness during the feast. In the height of the mirth, she rose from table, and having wrote a letter to Octavianus, she gave it sealed up to Epaphroditus, begging he would deliver it himself into his own hands, since it contained matters of the utmost consequence. This was only a pretence to send Epaphroditus, who kept a watchful eye over her, out of the way. When he was gone, she withdrew to her room attended by Nairas and Charmion, two of her women; and having there dressed herself in her royal robes, she lay down on her bed, and asked for a basket of figs, which one of her faithful servants had brought her in the disguise of a peasant. Among the figs was concealed an asp, a kind of serpent peculiar to Egypt and Libya, and of a very venomous nature; for those who were bit by it fell immediately into a kind of lethargy, and died without any pain or uneasiness. This venomous insect Cleopatra applied to her left arm, and that very instant falling, as it were, asleep, expired in the arms of her two maids [u]. Other writers tell us, that Cleopatra having made a deep wound in her arm with her teeth, poured the poison of the asp, which she had prepared before-hand, into it, and gently expired [w]. In the mean time, Octavianus having received from Epaphroditus and read Cleopatra's letter, found from the contents of it that she designed to lay violent hands on herself, since the whole subject of it was to beg, that he would Cleopatra's death. Year of the flood 2990. Year before Christ 9.

[u] Flor. l. iv. c. 11. Velleius Patercul. l. ii. c. 87. Dio. l. li. p. 457. Eutrop. l. vii. Oros. l. vi. c. 19. [w] Plut. in Anton. Galen. in lib. de theriac. Strab. l. xvii. p. 795. Dio. 452, 453.

would ſuffer her to be buried in the ſame tomb with Antony. He therefore immediately diſpatched ſome of his friends to ſee what had happened, and to prevent her if ſtill alive, from attempting any thing on her own life. Theſe found the guards ſtanding at the gate, and miſtruſting nothing; but when they entered her apartment, they to their great ſurprize ſaw her lying dead, on a golden bed in her royal robes, one of her maids likewiſe dead, at her feet, and the other ready to expire. They immediately acquainted Octavianus with what had happened, who haſtened to the queen's apartment, ſaw her body, and, not believing ſhe was dead, tried all poſſible means to recover her. But finding that all his endeavours were to no purpoſe, though he was very much grieved to ſee himſelf thus deprived of the chief glory and ornament of his triumph, yet he granted her laſt petition, and commanded her body to be buried with all poſſible pomp, and laid in the ſame tomb with Antony [x]. Thus died Cleopatra, after ſhe had reigned from the death of her father twenty-two years, and lived thirty-nine. She was a woman of extraordinary parts, for ſhe is ſaid to have been thoroughly ſkilled in Greek and Latin, and beſides to have ſpoke with great eaſe and readineſs many other languages, converſing with the Ethiopians, Troglodites, Jews, Arabians, Syrians, Medes, and Perſians without an interpreter, and always giving to ſuch of thoſe nations as had occaſion to addreſs her an anſwer in their own language. She retained in the midſt of her pleaſures a taſte for polite learning, and erected in the place where the famous library ſtood a new one, no-ways inferior to the former, enriching it with the two hundred thouſand volumes of the library of Pergamus, which Antony had preſented her with [y]. In her ended the family of Ptolemy Lagus the founder of the Egyptian monarchy, after it had ruled over Egypt from the death of Alexander two hundred and ninety-four years, or, as others will have it, two hundred and ninety-three and three months. For from this time Egypt was reduced to a Roman province, and governed by a prætor ſent thither from Rome. The firſt, on whom Octavianus conferred that dignity, was Cornelius Gallus, the famous poet, who is the ſubject of Virgil's tenth eclogue. Cæſarion, Cleopatra's ſon by Julius Cæſar, the conqueror cauſed to be put [x] Dio ibid. Sueton. in Octav. c. 17. Oros ibid. Plut. in Anton.

[y] Ptol. in Can. Plut. ibid. Euſeb. in Chron. Porphyr. in Græc. Euſeb. Scaliger. Clemens Alexandrin. Strom. l. i.

to death, because he pretended to be the lawful heir, which the adopted son could not bear. Her children by Antony he treated with great kindness, as he did all her friends and servants. All the statues of Antony he caused to be thrown down and broke to pieces, but left those of Cleopatra standing, having been prevailed upon by one Archibilius, who had been long in her service and made him a present of a thousand talents, to spare them. Octavianus, having thus reduced Egypt, returned to Rome, and in his triumph carried her image, since he could not her person, with an asp fixt to her arm [z]. From this conquest of Egypt began the æra of the Actiac victory, by which the Egyptians afterwards computed their time, the Philippic æra, which commenced from the death of Alexander, and the begginning of the reign of Philippus Aridæus his successor, having been in use among them till the reduction of their country by Octavianus. Though this æra had its name from the Actiac victory, yet it did not begin till near a full year after it, that is, till Egypt was entirely reduced; for the Actiac victory was gained on the second of September, and the æra of that victory commenced on the twenty-ninth of the ensuing August, which was then the first day of the Egyptian month. As this month was the first of their year, from whence they began all their calculations, they thought it the most proper time to begin such alterations in their year and æra, as the Romans on the conquest of their country took upon them to make in both. This æra ought, properly speaking, to have been called the æra of the Egyptian conquest, since it had its beginning from that conquest. But the Egyptians, to avoid the shame of thus owning themselves conquered, chose rather to call it the æra of the Actiac victory, it being in their power, since this æra was used only in Egypt, to call it by what name they pleased [a].

[z] Plut. Dio. Flor. ibid. & Dio. Cass. l. li. p. 457.

[a] Vide Macrob. Saturnal. i. c. 12.

CHAP.

40 45 50 55 60 65 70 75 80

Septentrio

Occidens

Orientis

Meridies

30 35 40 45

15 20 25 30

SCYTHIÆ PARS

PONTI EUXINI PARS

MARE CASPIUM

MARE ARAL

SOGDIANA

GABAZA

MARGIANA

BACTRIANA

ARIANA

PARAPAMISUS

INDIA INTRA GANGEM

INDIA EXTRA GANGEM

ARMENIA MAJOR

ARMENIA MINOR

MEDIA MAGNA

ATROPATIA

ALBANIA

COLCHIS

IBERIA

CAPADOCIA

PHRYGIA

PONTUS

Paphlagonia

Gallogræcia

Leucosyri

Lycaonia

Cataonia

CILICIA

CYPRUS

SYRIA

Cœlesyria

PHŒNICIA

JUDÆA

PERÆA

Galilæa

Samaria

Iturea

Trachonitis

Ammon

Moab

Idumæa

ARABIA PETRAEA

Saraceni

Midianitis

Nabatæi

Thamydeni

ARABIA DESERTA

ARABIA FELIX

SINUS ARABICUS

SINUS PERSICUS

MESOPOTAMIA

ASSYRIA

ADIABENE

CHALDÆA

BABYLONIA

SUSIANA

PERSIA

PARÆTACENE

PARTHIA seu PARTHIENE

CARMANIA DESERTA

CARMANIA

GEDROSIA

ARIASPÆ Euergetæ

ARACHOSIA

PANCHAIA

MARE ERYTHRAEUM

OCEANUS INDICUS

SINUS GANGETICUS

Pontus Euxinus

Caucasus Mons

Bosporani

Dioscurias

Harmastis

Neorus

Madia

Sesmara

Albana

Getara

Harmozica

Phasis

Pitzus

Trapezus

Artaxata

Vera

Cyropolis

Sophene

Artegaræ

Gazæ

Orcha

Batana sive Batane

Ecbatana

Ligranocerta

Taurus Mons

Taurantium

Armosata

Taurus M.

Niphates M.

Amida

Gordiene

Ninus

Lycus flu.

Gabena

Heraclea

Taba

Caper flu.

Nisibis

Gauga mela

Arsacia

Apamea

Raphan

Rhapsa

Hecatompylus

Carræ

Edessa

Eleia

Nicephorum

Ur

Singara

Gyndes flu.

Sittacene

Ctesiphon

Chaospes R.

Cibina

Cossæi

Pylæ Susidis

Palmyra

Heliopolis

Jura

Libanus M.

Antilibanus M.

Seleucia

Hamath

Arethusa

Emesa

Laodicea

Tripolis

Berytus

Sidon

Tyrus

Ptolemais

Ace

Thapsacus

Euphrates flu.

Barbalissus

Babylon

Cochebe

Apamia

Mesenes

Tigris flu.

Susa sive Choaspes R.

Pasitigris flu.

Seleucia

Characene

Charax

Elymais

Bethana

Chauanata

Petra

Bostra

Kedar

Thamydeny

Hippos mons

Hippos vicus

Cophar

Zabram regia

Carman regia

Macoraba

Iabma

Itanos portus

Maorothmus

Regama promontorium

Crypsus portus

Solis promontorium

Lar Flu.

Nagara

Mapha metropolis

Badeo regia

Sabæi

Sabe

Maraba

Sabatha

Thurifera regio

Saphar

Pudni

Muza emporium

Arabia emporium

Ocelis emporium

Sanina

Homerite

Madoa

Ascitæ

Prion Flu.

Persepolis

Araxes flu.

Pasargadæ

Thaspis

Nipista

Chodda

Carmana metropolis

Granis flu.

Gabæ

Anamis flu.

Andanis flu.

Harmozia sive Armoza

Sabis

Alexandria

Ichthyophagi

Oritæ seu Oritæ

Pasira

Arbis

Arabitæ

Parsis metropolis

Susiana

Xylenopolis

Barce

Patala

Indus Flu.

Urbs Præstorum

Sabi regnum

Sabaræ

Ganga

Gangaridæ

Padæi

Musarna

Oscana

Omira

Musicani

Præsti

Alexandria

Joxdorum regio

Uxentus Mons

Cartinagra

Celydna

Parisara

Aganagora

Scopolura

Barigaza emporium

Supara

Simulla empor.

Hippocura regia

Calligeris

Nitriæ

Muziris emporium

Modura

Vertex Taprobanæ

Tacola

Lestarum regio

Chersonesus Aurea

Sinus Magnus

Cyropolis Ext.

Alexandria ult.

Laxartes R.

Alexandria

Bazaria

Maracanda

Polytimetus R.

Oxus R.

Marginia

Bactra

Barcani

Arlocouna

Alexandria

Susia

Peucela

Peucelaotis

Assaceni

Massaca

Ora

Echolima

Bubacene

Arachotus

Alexandria

Prophthasia

Thaspis

Parapamisus Mons falso Caucasus

Meros M.

Nysa

Nicæa

Alexandria

Choaspes sive Choarus

Bactra

Parapamisus

Indus Flu.

Hydaspis Flu.

Acesines flu.

Oxydracarum

Hydraotis sive Hydraches flu.

Hypasis sive Hyphasis flu.

Arcæ Alexandri

Argala

Bucephale

Alexandria

Athenagurum

Palibothra

Erannoboa flu.

Ganges flu.

Imaus Mons

Ganges Mons

Caspius Mons

Caucasus Mons

Taurus Mons

Antitaurus Mons

Libanus M.

Antilibanus M.

Euphrates flu.

Tigris flu.

Araxes flu.

Indus Flu.

Ganges flu.

Hydaspis Flu.

Acesines flu.

Hydraotis sive Hydraches flu.

Hypasis sive Hyphasis flu.

Erannoboa flu.

Oxus R.

Jaxartes R.

Celydna

Parisara

Aganagora

Padæi

Gangaridæ

Sabaræ

Ganga

Scopolura

Barigaza emporium

Supara

Simulla empor.

Hippocura regia

Calligeris

Nitriæ

Muziris emporium

Modura

Vertex Taprobanæ

Tacola

Lestarum regio

Chersonesus Aurea

Sinus Magnus

Sinus Gangeticus

Oceanus Indicus

Mare Erythraeum

Sinus Persicus

Sinus Arabicus

Arabia Felix

Arabia Deserta

Arabia Petraea

Assyria

Mesopotamia

Babylonia

Susiana

Persia

Parætacene

Parthia seu Parthiene

Carmania Deserta

Carmania

Gedrosia

Ariaspæ Euergetæ

Arachosia

Panchaia

Margiana

Bactriana

Ariana

Parapamisus

Sogdiana

Gabaza

Scythiæ Pars

Ponti Euxini Pars

Mare Caspium

Mare Aral

Albania

Media Magna

Atropatia

Armenia Major

Armenia Minor

Iberia

Colchis

Capadocia

Phrygia

Pontus

Paphlagonia

Gallogræcia

Leucosyri

Lycaonia

Cataonia

Cilicia

Cyprus

Syria

Cœlesyria

Phœnicia

Judæa

Peræa

Galilæa

Samaria

Iturea

Trachonitis

Ammon

Moab

Idumæa

Arabia Petraea

Saraceni

Midianitis

Nabatæi

Thamydeni

Arabia Deserta

Arabia Felix

Sinus Arabicus

Sinus Persicus

Mesopotamia

Assyria

Adiabene

Chaldæa

Babylonia

Susiana

Persia

Parætacene

Parthia seu Parthiene

Carmania Deserta

Carmania

Gedrosia

Ariaspæ Euergetæ

Arachosia

Panchaia

Mare Erythraeum

Oceanus Indicus

Sinus Gangeticus

MA
AR
Alexa
A Cahus R.
B
A. seu
ENE
tompyr
4 R

CHAP. III.

The Hiſtory of the Armenians.

SECT. I.

The deſcription of Armenia.

WHENCE the tract we commonly call Armenia borrowed its name is not determined. The Greeks will have it ſo called from one Armenus, who, after attending Jaſon in the Argonautic expediton, ſettled in this country. Others, transforming Armenia into Aramia, derive its name from Aram the ſon of Shem, or from one of the kings of Armenia bearing that name [a]. Bochart [b] takes Armenia to be a contraction or compound of Aar, ſignifying in Hebrew a mountain, and Mini the name of a province in this country mentioned by Jeremy [c], and placed by that prophet between Ararat and Aſhchenaz. This opinion ſeems to be ſupported by the Chaldee interpreters, who both on this and a like paſſage in Amos [d], inſtead of Mini read Armenia; ſo that Armenia ſignifies the mountain or mountainous part of Mini, or Mynias, as Nicolas of Damaſcus calls it. The name of Mini, Menni, and Mynias, or Mylias was at firſt peculiar to one province; but in proceſs of time became common to the whole country. As to the word Mini or Menni, it is thought to be originally derived from an Hebrew word, ſignifying metal, ſeeing Armenia abounded with mines, as is plain from Procopius [e]. Name.

ARMENIA was antiently divided into the Greater and Leſſer, or Armenia Major and Minor. Armenia Major, which Diviſion.

we

[a] Moſes Charen. Hiſt. Armen. p. 49. [b] Bochart. Phaleg. l. i. c. 3. [c] Jerem. li. 27. [d] Amos iv. 3.
[e] Procop. l. i. de Bell. Perſic.

we ſhall treat of in the firſt place, was, according to Strabo [f], bounded on the ſouth by mount Taurus, ſeparating it from Meſopotamia; on the eaſt by both Medias, viz. The Great Media, and that which was known under the name of Atropatia; on the north by Iberia and Albania, or rather that part of the Caucaſus which ſurrounds them both; on the weſt by Armenia Minor, or the mountains Paryadres, by ſome Pontic nations, and the Euphrates. Ptolemy divides all Armenia into three diſtricts, as we may call them; the firſt comprehending that part which lies between the Cyrus and the Araxes; the ſecond thoſe provinces which extend weſtward to the bending of the Euphrates; and the third all the country lying between the ſprings of the Tigris and that part of the Euphrates which ſeparates Commagene from Armenia Major. Ptolemy enumerates in his firſt diviſion the following provinces; Catarzene towards the Moſchick mountains, probably the ſame as Strabo's Chorzene; Oſſarene and Motene, both on the banks of the Cyrus; Colthene on the banks of the Araxes; Soducene, Sibacene, and Sacapene; theſe two laſt provinces extend to the mountains Paryadres. The ſecond diviſion comprehends the following provinces; Baſiliſſene, Bolbene, Arſeta, Aciliſene, Auſtanitis, and Sophene. In the third diviſion Ptolemy places Azetene, Thoſpitis, Corinea, Bagrauandene, Gordene, called alſo Gorduene, Gordyene, and Corduene from the Gordyæan mountains. To theſe we may add Gorgodylene, which Strabo [g] mentions as lying under the mountain Niphates; Cholobetena mentioned by Stephanus and Bochart [h], who conjectures it to have been ſo called from Chul, the ſon of Aram and Shem's grandſon; Taurantium, mentioned by Tacitus [i] and other antient writers, &c.

Cities. PTOLEMY enumerates a great many cities in Armenia, which we find mentioned by no other geographer or hiſtorian, and therefore ſhall take no notice of them here, but deſcribe ſuch only as we can give ſome tolerable account of. Among theſe the following are the moſt conſiderable; Artaxata, the metropolis of all Armenia, and from its foundation the reſidence of the Armenian kings. This city

[f] Strab. l. xi. p. 363.
[g] Strab. l. xi. p. 363.
[h] Bochart. Phaleg. l. xi. c. 9.
[i] Tacit. l. xiv. c. 23.

city, as Strabo informs us [k], was built upon a plan which Hannibal gave to king Artaxas or Artaxias, who made it the capital of Armenia. It was ſituated upon an elbow of the river Araxes, which forms a kind of peninſula, and ſurrounded the town like a wall, except on the ſide of the iſthmus; but the iſthmus was ſecured by a rampart and a broad ditch. This is the account Strabo gives us of that ſtrong town. But Cornelius Nepos in his life of Hannibal does not mention his journey into Armenia; he only ſays, that after the defeat of Antiochus he withdrew firſt to Crete, and from thence to Bithynia, where he died. Plutarch, however [l], ſeems to confirm what Strabo advances, ſaying, that Hannibal, after the overthrow of Antiochus by Scipio Aſiaticus, fled into Armenia, where he aſſiſted king Artaxas with his advice, and perſuaded him to build the city of Artaxata in a very advantageous ſituation. Lucullus, after having defeated the Armenians under the command of their king Tigranes in two battles, would not venture, notwithſtanding the enemies were not able to keep the field, to lay ſiege to Artaxata, which he looked upon as impregnable. But Pompey, who ſucceeded him in the command of the army, preſſed Tigranes ſo hard, that he was obliged to deliver up his capital without ſtriking a blow. Pompey ſpared both the city and the inhabitants; but in Nero's reign, Corbulo, the commander in chief of the Roman forces in the eaſt, having forced Tiridates to yield up Artaxata, levelled it with the ground. Tiridates, having thus loſt his metropolis and with it his kingdom, went to Rome to throw himſelf at Nero's feet; who not only reſtored him the diadem, but alſo gave him leave to take workmen with him to aſſiſt him in rebuilding Artaxata, which by way of acknowledgment he called Neronia from the name of his benefactor. The ruins of this city, according to the tradition of the Armenians, are ſtill to be ſeen at a place called Ardachat. The inhabitants of this place, ſays a late traveller [m], call the town Ardachat from the name of Artaxias, whom in the eaſt they call Ardechier. There are here ſome remains of a ſtately palace, which the Armenians take to be the palace of Tiridates, who reigned in the time of Conſtantine the Great; one front of this building is but half ruined, a great many pillars of black marble and of an extraordinary ſize

[k] Strab. l. xi. p. 363, 364.
[l] Plutarch in Lucullo.
[m] Chardin, voyag.

ſize are ſtill ſtanding, and many other fine antiquities, which the inhabitants call Tact-Tardat, that is, the throne of Tiridates. Tavernier alſo [m] mentions the ruins of Artaxata, between Erivan and mount Ararat, but does not ſpecify them. The antient geographers mention another city bearing the ſame name, and likewiſe ſituated on the Araxes, but in the northern part of Media, known among the antients by the name of Atropatia. This ſome moderns have confounded with the metropolis of Armenia.

THE other cities of note in antient times were, Sebaſtia, ſeated on the banks of the Euphrates not far from the mountain Taurus, ſo called from Auguſtus, whom the Greeks ſtyled Sebaſtos. Armoſata or Arſamoſata, once a very conſiderable city, and of the greateſt note after Artaxata. It was ſituated between the Tigris and the Euphrates, which has made ſome place it in Meſopotamia [n], though Pliny, Polybius, and Tacitus call it in expreſs words a city of Armenia. Tigranocerta built by Tigranes in the time of the Mithridatic war, and ſo named from its founder, the word Certa in the Parthian, Armenian, and Syriac languages, ſignifying a city. It was ſeated in the ſouthern part of Armenia, on the top of a ſteep hill, between the ſprings of the Tigris and the mountain Taurus. This city Tigranes peopled with the inhabitants of divers nations which he had conquered, and enriched, we may ſay, with the wealth of all Armenia; for there was not one Armenian from the higheſt to the loweſt that did not contribute towards the embelliſhing of it. Lucullus took it without great reſiſtance, the inhabitants, as being of different nations, not agreeing among themſelves; and found in it, beſides an immenſe quantity of other valuable things, no leſs than eight thouſand talents in ready money. Artagera, where the emperor Caius received the wound of which he died [o]. Carcathiocerta called by Strabo [p] the metropolis of Sophene, which province is waſhed by the Euphrates, but placed by Pliny [q] near the Tigris. Colonia the ſtrongeſt place of all Armenia, when poſſeſſed by the Romans. In latter ages Theodoſiopolis, built by the emperor Theodoſius, of whom it borrowed its name. It was a great and wealthy city, and in thoſe days accounted imimpregnable (A). Chorſa placed by Ptolemy on the banks of the Euphrates, and taken by ſome for the preſent city of Cars, which made Sanſon place the city of Cars on the Euphrates, though that river runs at a great diſtance from it (B).

[m] Tavernier voyage au Levant. [n] Lucas Holſtenius in annot. ad Ortelium. [o] Velleius Partercul. l. ii. c. 102. Zonaras. Tom. 2. p. 167. [p] Strab. l. xi. p. 363. [q] Plin. l. vi. c. 9.

As

(A) 'Tis generally believed, that Erzeron is the antient city of Theodoſiopolis, which a late judicious traveller (1) does not think improbable, provided we ſuppoſe, that the Inhabitants of Artze retired to Theodoſiopolis after the demolition of their own city, which ſuppoſition is not ill-grounded. For Cedrenus informs us, that in the reign of Conſtantine Monomachus, who died about the middle of the eleventh century, Artze was a great and wealthy borough, inhabited by the merchants of different nations, who, confiding in their numbers and ſtrength, would not retire with the effects to Theodoſiopolis, during the wars between that emperor and the Mohammedans. By theſe the place was beſieged, and the inhabitants made ſuch a vigorous defence, that the general of the Mohammedans apprehending the town might be relieved, cauſed it to be ſet on fire on all ſides, ſacrificing the booty to his reputation. Cedrenus tells us, that an hundred and forty thouſand ſouls periſhed in the ſiege by fire or ſword. The huſbands, ſays he, leaped into the flames with their wives and children in their arms. The conqueror found abundance of gold arms, which the fire could not conſume. As the town was reduced to aſhes, it is not unlikely, that the few inhabitants, who outlived the deſtruction of their country, retired with the foreign merchants to Theodoſiopolis, which, according to Cedrenus, was ſituated cloſe by it. The Turks, thinking perhaps Theodoſiopolis too long and troubleſome a name, gave it that of Artzerum; that is, Artze of the Greeks or Chriſtians; from Artzerom comes Erzeron. We muſt not confound this city of Theodoſiopolis with another of the ſame name on the river Abhorras in Meſopotamia, which the emperor Anaſtaſius, as Procopius informs us, fortified with ſtrong walls. 'Tis commonly believed, that Orthogul, father of the famous Othoman, the firſt emperor of the Turks, took Erzeron; but it is certain, that the Armenians had a king of their own, even in the reign of Selim the firſt. Some writers, miſled by the ſimilitude of names, take Erzeron to be the city of Aziris placed by Ptolemy in Armenia Minor.

(B) Cars is the laſt Town of Turky towards the frontiers of Perſia. It is built on a riſing ground, expoſed to the ſouth-ſouth-eaſt. It is defended by a caſtle built on a ſteep rock, and has behind it a deep valley watered by a river, which not far from thence diſembogues itſelf into the Arpagi, without ever coming near the city of Erzeron, contrary to the deſcription Sanſon has given us of

(1) Tournefort. Voyage au Levant.

Rivers. As to the rivers of this country, Strabo enumerates ſix of great note among the antients, viz. the Lycus and Phaſis falling into the Pontus; the Cyrus and Araxes diſcharging themſelves into the Caſpian ſea; and the Tigris and Euphrates which diſembogue themſelves into the Perſian gulf. The Lycus, the Phaſis, and the Cyrus, though they riſe in Armenia, yet are more properly reckoned by moſt of the antient geographers rivers of Pontus, Colchis, and Albania, ſince the two former waſh but the ſkirts of Armenia, and the latter ſprings from the hills of Iberia, which ſeparate that country from Armenia, whence it is by ſome accounted a river of Iberia, but by the generality of geographers after Ptolemy, of Albania; where being encreaſed with ſeveral others, it becomes a very conſiderable ſtream. The Araxes, or, as the Turks call it, the Aras, ſprings from the ſame mountain as the Euphrates. This mountain Strabo[r] calls Abus, and places it between the mountain Niphates and Nibarus; Domitius Corbulo, who had been upon the ſpot, gives it the name of Aba; Nutianus, who had alſo viſited the country, calls it Capotes; and Euſtathius with Dionyſius Periegetes ſtyle it Achos. Springing from this mountain, which is part of mount Taurus, it continues its courſe eaſtward to the city of Atropatene; from thence bending its courſe north-weſtward, it flows cloſe by Azara and Artaxata, and falls at length into the Caſpian ſea (C). It is too rapid to bear a bridge, and carried away thoſe which the maſters of the world built over it. On the banks of this river have appeared the moſt famous of it. Theſe two rivers joined together are known by the name of Arpagi, and ſerve as a frontier to the two empires. Sanſon places Cars at the conflux of the two imaginary branches of the Euphrates, which, according to him, form a conſiderable river that waters Erzeron. The Arpagi falls into Araxes, or Aras, as the Turks and Perſians call it.

[r] Strab. l. xi. p. 363.

(C) Strabo and many others (2) ſay, that the Araxes falls into the Caſpian ſea near the mouth of the Cyrus; but Pliny (3), Plutarch (4), and Appianus (5), make it diſcharge itſelf into the Cyrus. Ptolemy (6) divides the Araxes into two branches, and deſcribes one joining the Cyrus, the other he makes fall into the Caſpian ſea. All our modern maps make the Araxes diſembogue itſelf into the Cyrus.

(2) Strab. l. xi. c. 346. (3) Plin. l. vi. c. 9. (4) Plutarch. in Pomp. p. 634. (5) Appian. Mithridat. p. 401. (6) Ptolem. l. 5. c. 13.

famous warriors of antiquity, Xerxes, Alexander, Lucullus, Pompey, Mithridates, &c. The modern geographers, who make this river flow from mount Ararat, muſt certainly miſtake the river which runs near Aſcourlon for the Araxes. The Euphrates ſprings from the ſame hill as the Araxes, and immediately divides itſelf into two branches, which the antient hiſtorians call the ſources of the Euphrates. The firſt flows from eaſt to ſouth, and running between the mountains, at the foot of which the town of Erzeron is ſituated, continues its courſe ſouthward to a little borough called Mommacotum. The other ſtream flows northward to the town of Elijah, and thence bending weſtward along the road to Tocat, is obliged by the diſpoſition of the ground to turn ſouthward at Mommacotum, where it joins the other branch, which is far more conſiderable. The town of Erzeron is not ſeated on the banks of the Euphrates, as the modern geographers place it, but in a peninſula formed by the two branches of the Euphrates, the firſt of which runs a days journey diſtance from Erzeron, and the other a day and a half, or rather two days journey. But we have already deſcribed the whole courſe of this river [s] (D). The Tigris, according to Strabo [t], riſes on the ſouth ſide of mount Taurus; according to Pliny [u], in a great plain of Armenia, which he calls Elegoſine, runs through the lake Arethuſa, and meeting with mount Taurus buries itſelf under-ground, and appears again on the other ſide of that mountain. This breaking

[s] Univerſ. Hiſt. vol. iv. p. 309. [t] Strab. l. xi. p. 259.
[u] Plin. l. vi. c. 27.

(D) Procopius ſeems to have known nothing of the two branches of the Euphrates. For he calls one of the branches the Tigris, and the other the Euphrates. There is, ſays he, a mountain in Armenia five miles and a half from Theodoſiopolis, whence iſſue two great rivers; that which flows to the right is called the Euphrates, the other the Tigris; whereas Strabo tells us in expreſs words, that the ſprings of theſe two rivers are two hundred and fifty miles diſtant from each other. Pompey, as we are informed by Florus, was the firſt that built a bridge over this river, which he did in purſuing Mithridates. This bridge in all likelihood was built near the elbow, which this river makes, after its two branches are joined at Mommacotum. For our modern travellers ſeem to agree in this, that the battle between Pompey and Mithridates was fought in the plain of Erzeron, and Mithridates is ſaid to have paſſed by the ſources of the Euphrates on his retreat into Colchis; a few years before Lucullus had ſacrificed a bull to this river in order to obtain a favourable paſſage.

ing out of the river Strabo evidently miſtook for its firſt riſe, for in all the reſt he agrees with Pliny and Ptolemy. This river runs with an incredible rapidity, whence it had the name of Tigris, which in the language of the Medes ſignifies an arrow. It continues its courſe, after it had paſſed under the huge bulk of mount Taurus, waſhing the eaſtern ſkirts of Meſopotamia, which it divides from Aſſyria, till, mixing with its fellow-traveller the Euphrates at Apamea in Chaldea, it falls at length into the Perſian gulf. Many writers take theſe four rivers, viz. the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Phaſis, and the Araxes to be the four rivers mentioned by Moſes, as coming out of the terreſtrial paradiſe. They ſuppoſe the Phaſis to be the Piſon, and the Araxes or Aras the Gihon. But of this ſubject, and the various ſuppoſitions and opinions relating thereunto, we have treated elſewhere at large [w] (E). Beſides theſe rivers there were ſeveral others of leſs note, namely, the Muſis mentioned by Pliny [x], as diſcharging itſelf into the Araxes; Nicephorius running, according to Tacitus [y], between Tigranocerta and Artaxata, and falling into the Euphrates; Niphates mentioned by Lucan [z] and Silius Italicus [a], and ſpringing from a mountain of the ſame name.

Mountains.

THE moſt conſiderable mountains of this country are the Moſchick mountains, ſeparating the weſtern parts of Armenia from Colchis; ſome writers will have them ſo called from Meſech or Moſoch the ſon of Japhet. Paryadræ extending from the Moſchick mountains to the borders of Armenia Minor

[w] Univerſ. Hiſt. Vol. I. p. 184, and following. [x] Plin. l. vi. c. 9. [y] Tacit. l. xv. c. 24. [z] Lucan. l. iii. v. 245. [a] Silius Italic. l. xiii. v. 765.

(E) The commentators on the book of Geneſis, even thoſe who are moſt confined to the literal ſenſe, do not think it neceſſary, in order to fix the ſituation of Eden, to find a river, which divides itſelf into four branches, conſidering the great alterations that may have been occaſioned by the flood; but think it enough to ſhew the heads of the rivers mentioned by Moſes, namely, the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Piſon and Gihon. And thus, taking the Phaſis for Piſon and the Araxes for Gihon they come to place the terreſtrial paradiſe in the beautiful vales of Georgia, and namely in the country of the Three Churches about ſixty miles diſtant from the ſprings of the Euphrates and Araxes, and about as many from thoſe of the Phaſis. The extent of Eden muſt at leaſt have reached to the ſprings of theſe rivers, and thus comprehended all Media and part of Armenia and Iberia.

Minor and Pontus. Maſius bounding the Province of Sophene to the ſouth, as Antitaurus does to the north. Niphates well known to the poets, and famous for the ſprings of the Tigris. Abus from which iſſues the Euphrates. The Gordæan mountains, which ſeparate, according to Strabo [b], the province of Sophene and the reſt of Armenia from Meſopotamia. Of the mountains of Ararat, whereon the ark reſted, we have treated elſewhere [c].

THIS country is very hilly and mountainous, but the hills are here and there interſperſed with fruitful and moſt beautiful dales and valleys. All ſorts of grain are but very indifferent in Armenia; in moſt places it yields but four-fold. If they had not the conveniency of watering their lands, they would be almoſt barren. What the country produces is almoſt entirely owing to the painful labour of the inhabitants, who either actually water it by hand, or dig trenches and other conveniencies of that kind, for the fecundation of their fields. The wine of this country is cried down by the generality of our modern travellers. One of theſe [d] has ſtarted an objection which tends to overthrow the tradition of the ark's reſting on one of the mountains of Armenia: for the olive, ſays he, is not found thereabouts, nor in any part of Aſia beyond Aleppo, except one ſingle place near Caſbin in Perſia. However, it ſeems to have been otherwiſe antiently, for we are told by Strabo [e], that the olive grew in Gogarene, a province of Armenia. The cold is ſo extraordinary here, that all kinds of fruit are more backward than in moſt of the northern countries. The hills are covered with ſnow the whole year round, and it ſometimes falls even in the month of June. Lucullus, when appointed to command the Roman army in Armenia, was greatly ſurprized to find the whole country covered with ſnow at the autumnal equinox, to ſee moſt of the rivers frozen up, and vaſt numbers of the horſes of his army dying every day by reaſon of the coldneſs of the waters. Alexander Severus was no better pleaſed with this country, having loſt on his march through it great part of his army, the cold being then ſo exceſſive, that many of the ſoldiers, as Zonaras informs us, were frozen under their tents, and others loſt their hands and feet, being obliged to incamp in the ſnow.

The ſoil,

A modern

[b] Strab. l. xi. p. 359. [c] Univerſ. Hiſt. Vol. I. p. 318.
[d] Tournefort. Voyage, lett. 7. [e] Strab. l. xi. p. 800.

A modern traveller tells us [f], that even in the middle of July he often found ice about the ſprings before the riſing of the ſun, notwithſtanding it was exceeding hot in the day-time; this cold keeps every thing ſo back, that the corn, as the ſame traveller obſerved, was not at that time of the year a foot high, and the other fruits of the earth ſcarce ſo forward as they are about Paris at the end of April. Their method of plowing the land is ſomewhat ſurprizing, for they uſually put to one plough ten or twelve yoke of oxen, each yoke having a driver, and this to make deeper furrows, experience having taught them, that it was neceſſary to go very deep, either to mix the upper ſoil, which is too dry, with that which lies beneath and is leſs ſo, or to preſerve the ſeed from the hard froſts; for were it not on ſome ſuch conſideration, they would not be at ſuch an expence. Notwithſtanding all this, we are told, that the corn would be quite burnt up were not the fields frequently watered either by hand, or by trenches dug for that purpoſe. Perhaps great plenty of water is neceſſary to diſſolve the ſalt and nitre, wherewithal the ſoil in moſt parts of Armenia is impregnated, and which would burn up the roots, if the clods were not well moiſtened with a proportionable quantity of liquid.

Antiquity. As to the origin of the antient Armenians, Herodotus, and after him Stephanus, derives them from the Phrygians by reaſon of ſeveral Phrygian words that were crept into the antient language of the Armenians; but this may be aſcribed to the communication they had, as merchants, with the Phrygians, as they likewiſe had with other neighbouring nations. And we are moreover told, that a colony of the Aſcanians, who were Phrygians, ſettled in Armenia, which the prophet Jeremy ſeems to inſinuate in joining Ararat (that is, Armenia, as it is agreed on all hands) with Aſchenaz, who is generally believed to have been the founder of the Phrygian nation, and therefore is taken for the Phrygians, ſeeing the name of the founder is commonly uſed in ſcripture for the nation he founded. Other writers ſuppoſe Hul or Chul the ſon of Aram and Meſech the ſon of Japhet to have been the progenitors of the antient Armenians; which opinion has no better foundation than the ſmall ſimilitude we find between Meſech and Moſchick, between Chul and Cholna the name of a town in Armenia. Beroſus tells us, that the ark reſted in Armenia, and that Noah going from thence left his mother, his wife, and ſeveral of his deſcendants to people the country country, ſuppoſing thereby Noah to have remained many years after the flood in Armenia [i]. Strabo takes them to be originally Syrians, or rather conſiders the Syrians and Armenians as two tribes of one and the ſame nation. This Opinion Bochart [k] looks upon as the moſt probable, finding a great agreement between theſe two nations both in manners and language. In proceſs of time many foreigners ſettled among them, namely Phrygians, Greeks, and Perſians, as Strabo [l] and Ptolemy [m] witneſs.

[f] Tournefort, ubi ſupra.

Government

ARMENIA was advanced very early to the honour of a kingdom. Beroſus makes one by name Scytha the firſt king thereof, and Barzanes his ſucceſſor, which Barzanes, he informs us, was conquered and driven out by Ninus; wherein he is greatly miſtaken; for beſides that the word Scytha was never heard of till many ages after, as we ſhall ſhew in its proper place, Barzanes was not conquered by Ninus, as Diodorus Siculus informs us, but having made a peace and alliance with him, joined his forces againſt the Bactrians. Some writers by Scytha underſtand Hul, and will have him ſucceeded by Barzanes: After the death of Barzanes, they tell us, that Armenia was divided into ſeveral petty kingdoms, which is vouched alſo by Pliny [n]. Plutarch mentions one Araxes king of Armenia [o], who in a war with the Perſians being aſſured by an oracle that he ſhould return home loaded with ſpoils, provided he ſacrificed his two daughters, cauſed the two daughters of one Mieſalcus, a nobleman of his court, to be ſacrificed in their ſtead, flattering himſelf that he had thereby complied with the oracle. But Mieſalcus did not fail to revenge the death of his daughters by that of the king's daughters, and purſued the prince himſelf ſo cloſe, that he was drowned in endeavouring to ſave himſelf by ſwimming over the river then called Helmus, but ever after by the king's name Araxes. The Armenians were in proceſs of time ſubdued by the Medes, to whom they were made, as we read in Xenophon, tributaries by Aſtyages. However, they continued to be ruled by kings of their own country; for Tigranes and Sabaris, in whom we are told the royal family of the Armenian kings was extinguiſhed, were the ſons of that king whom Cyrus afterwards ſubdued. We find no mention of kings, but only of prefects appointed by the kings of Perſia, during the whole time they continued ſubject to that empire; whence we may conclude, that after the death of Tigranes and Sabaris Armenia became a province of Perſia. Alexander the Great, having poſſeſſed himſelf of Armenia, made Mithrines governor of both Armenias; Mithrines was ſucceeded by Phrataphernes, and he by Orons, both appointed by Perdiccas. After the death of Orons the Armenians, if we believe Diodorus, ſhook off the Macedonian yoke, and ſet up kings of their own; one of theſe, according to him, was Ardoates, who with a powerful army aſſiſted Ariarathes III. king of Cappadocia; the ſame author mentions another king of Armenia contemporary with Nicomedes I. king of Bithynia. Theſe two princes may, for ought we know, have ſeized on the crown of Armenia; but we are very ſure, that the country was again brought under ſubjection by the Macedonians, there being nothing more certain, than that Armenia was held by Antigonus, and after him by Seleucus and his poſterity to the time of Antiochus the Great; that is, to the ſixth generation. During the minority of Antiochus, Zadriades and Artaxias, governors of Armenia, joining their forces together, ſeized on the country they had been ſet over, and adding ſome of the neighbouring provinces to it, while Antiochus's troops were employed elſewhere, erected not one, but two kingdoms, viz. that of Armenia Major, which Artaxias kept for himſelf; the other of Armenia Minor, which fell to Zadriades. Of theſe two kingdoms only our intent is to write here, ſeeing whatever is ſaid of the more antient kings of Armenia is altogether uncertain, and over-caſt with ſuch a miſt, that it is impoſſible to give any tolerable account of them. The Armenians tell us of Haikh, Amaſia, and a great many others, which, as we find them mentioned by no authors of any credit, we hardly think it worth our while to take any notice of. What the primitive government of Armenia may have been we know not; but under the later kings it was abſolute and arbitrary, their princes being, as appears from hiſtory, quite uncontrouled by the ſubject.

[i] Beroſus, l. iii. [k] Bochart. Phaleg. l. i. c. 9. [l] Strab. l. 16. [m] Ptolem. l. v. c. 13. [n] Plin. l. vi. c. 9. [o] Plutarch. de fluviis.

Laws and religion.

WE have no ſyſtem of their laws, and ſcarce wherewithal to form any particular idea of them; but we are not ſo much at a loſs for what concerns their religion; for Strabo tells us, that the Armenians, Medes, and Perſians worſhipped the ſame deities, and of the religion of the antient Perſians we have already given a very particula cular and diſtinct account. However, the chief deity of the Armenians ſeems to have been the goddeſs Tanais, or, as ſome ſtile her, Anaitis. To her ſeveral temples were erected all over Armenia, but more eſpecially in the province of Acileſina, where ſhe was worſhipped in a particular manner. Here ſhe had a moſt rich and magnificent temple, with a ſtatue of ſolid gold and ineſtimable workmanſhip. This temple was plundered by the Roman ſoldiers in Mark Antony's wars with the Perſians; on which occaſion it was reported, and univerſally believed, that the firſt, who laid ſacrilegious hands on the treaſure and ſacred utenſils, was ſtruck blind by the deity of the place, and ſo terrified that he died ſoon after. But many years after Auguſtus being entertained at Bononia by an old commander, who had ſerved in the Perſian war, and enquiring about the truth of this report, the officer frankly owned, that he was the man, and added, that the only evil, that happened to him on that occaſion was a plentiful eſtate, which was altogether owing to that ſacrilege. In honour of this goddeſs, and in her temple the Armenians uſed to proſtitute their daughters, it being a cuſtom among the young women to conſecrate their virginity to Tanais, that is, to her prieſts. Baris was another deity peculiar to the Armenians, and had a ſtately temple erected to him, as Strabo informs us; but after what manner he was worſhipped we find no-where mentioned. Juvenal [p] charges them with foretelling future events, by examining the entrails of pigeons, of dogs, and ſometimes of children. Others tell us, that they uſed human ſacrifices, which ſeems to be in ſome degree confirmed by what we have related above out of Plutarch.

Their learning and arts.

We can ſay nothing particular of their learning and arts, but what we have from writers of no great credit. Beroſus [q] tells us, that Noah inſtructed here his poſterity in all manner of human and divine ſciences, and committed to writing many natural ſecrets, which the Prieſts alone were allowed to learn, no-body elſe being ſuffered to ſee thoſe writings. He adds, that he left among the Armenians books of religious ceremonies, that he taught them aſtronomy and the diſtinction of years and months, and that he was on this account ſtiled by them Olybama and Arſa, that is, heaven and ſun; that they dedicated many cities to him, and even worſhipped him under the name and title of Jupiter Sagus, accounting him the ſoul of the heavenly bodies. The Armenians tell us, that Noah taught them huſbandry and the planting of vines, and ſhew to this day ſome vines which they pretend to be of Noah's planting; for they ſuppoſe him to have been their firſt king, and in quitting Armenia to have left behind him his mother, his wife, and ſeveral of his deſcendants to people the country. Theſe and many ſuch-like fables are looked upon by the preſent Armenians as truths not to be called in queſtion.

[p] Juvenal. Satir. 6.

[q] Beroſus, l. iii.

THE language of the antient Armenians was, according to Strabo, much the ſame with that of the Syrians; at leaſt it is very plain from Polyænus [r], that they uſed the Syriac characters. The modern Armenians uſe two languages, the vulgar and the learned; the latter, if we believe them, has no affinity with the other oriental languages, is very expreſſive, and enriched with all the terms of religion, and of arts and ſciences; which, if true, ſhews that the Armenians were formerly men of much greater learning than they are at preſent. This language is to be found only in their antient manuſcripts, and is uſed in divine ſervice. To underſtand it well is reckoned a great accompliſhment, and is all that is requiſite to be admitted into the order of the Vertabiets, who make ſuch a noiſe among the Armenians. The Vertabiets are doctors, and their province is to preach and inſtruct the people; when they once underſtand the learned language, and have got by heart a few ſermons of Gregory Altenaſi, a great maſter of it, and, as we may call him, their chief claſſic, they are abundantly qualified for that eminent degree (F).

THOUGH

[r] Polyænus, l. iv.

(F) The Vertabiets are ordained, but their proper function is to preach. Their ſermons generally turn upon very ill-contrived parables, upon paſſages of the ſcripture, ill underſtood and worſe explained, and upon ridiculous traditions: however, they deliver themſelves with a great deal of gravity, and theſe diſcourſes procure them as much credit and authority as the patriarch himſelf has. [s]They challenge the ſole power of excommunicating. After exerciſing themſelves for ſome time in the villages and boroughs, they are with abundance of ceremonies admitted to the degree of doctor by an old Vertabiet, who puts into their hands a paſtoral ſtaff, which they are allowed to hold while they preach, and alſo to ſit; whereas the biſhops, who are not Vertabiets, are obliged to preach ſtanding. They live on the gatherings that are made for them after their ſermons, which, we are told, are very con

THOUGH the modern Armenians are perhaps the greateſt traders on the earth, yet we find no mention of any commerce carried on by them in antient times. Sha-Abbas the Great, king of Perſia, is ſaid to have been the firſt, who, conſidering the œconomy and indefatigable induſtry of this people, put them upon trade, and ſettled a colony of Armenians at Julfa, the famous ſuburb of Iſpahan, deſcribed by moſt of our modern travellers. This place contains at preſent above thirty thouſand inhabitants, all Armenians and merchants (G). Though none of the antients have mentioned the trade of the Armenians in former ages, yet the eaſy and ſafe navigation of the Tigris and Euphrates, and the example of their next and moſt induſtrious neighbours the Syrians Their trade.

conſiderable, eſpecially in places where the caravans ſtop. They obſerve celibacy, and faſt very rigorouſly three quarters of the year, abſtaining not only from meat, but alſo from fiſh, eggs, and milk.

(G) Sha-Abbas, by ſettling a numerous colony at Julfa, and other colonies of Armenians in divers other parts of the kingdom, had two things in view, namely to ſecure his dominions from being attacked by the Turks, and to enrich them by trade and commerce. As Armenia was the chief place where the Turks uſed to make their attempts to penetrate into Perſia, he unpeopled it ſo as to make it impoſſible for them to maintain an army in that country. The inhabitants of Julfa, the moſt populous and greateſt city of Armenia, were ordered to retire with their effects to Iſpahan, from whence they were ſoon after removed to the other ſide of the river Zenerou, to ſeparate them from the Mohammedans, who deſpiſed them on account of their religion. This new ſettlement they called Julfa in memory of their antient habitation, the ruins whereof are to be ſeen to this day on the banks of the Araxes, between Erivan and Tauris. The inhabitants of Nacſivan alſo were diſperſed into ſeveral parts of the kingdom, and above twenty thouſand Armenian families tranſplanted into the ſingle province of Guilan. The king, having thus ſecured his frontiers, employed the Armenians in carrying on the ſilk trade, truſting them at firſt with a great many bales, to carry by caravans into foreign countries, on condition they ſhould pay at their return for each bale a certain price ſettled by perſons of judgment before their departure. For their greater encouragement, he allowed them by way of reward for their pains and induſtry whatever they could get above the price agreed on, which was very reaſonable. The ſucceſs anſwered the hopes both of the king and the merchants, and ſilver and gold, which to that time had been very ſcarce in Perſia, began to appear in great plenty at the return of the caravans. To that expedient the wealth of Perſia is owing even to this day.

rians, may perhaps have induced them to carry on a trade, as well for their own growth as for foreign production; neither do we ſee by what other means they could acquire the great wealth they enjoyed under ſome of their kings. But as we find no mention of their trade in antient hiſtory, we ſhall take no farther notice of it.

SECT. II.

The reigns of the kings of Armenia Major.

Artaxias. OUR intent is to write of thoſe kings only that reigned in Armenia after that people had ſhaken off the Macedonian yoke, which happened in the beginning of the reign of Antiochus the Great, when Zadriades and Artaxias, whom he had appointed governors or prefects of Armenia, entering into a conſpiracy and uniting their forces, ſtirred up the Armenians to a revolt, and cauſed themſelves to be proclaimed kings of the provinces which were under their juriſdiction. As Antiochus was then very young, and his troops employed againſt other rebels, their attempts were attended with ſucceſs beyond expectation, which encouraged them to purſue their conqueſts, and extend the boundaries of their new, but ſmall, kingdom. Accordingly, invading with a conſiderable army the neighbouring countries, they took from the Medes the provinces of Caſpiana, Phaunitis, and Baſoropida; from the Iberians Chorzena and Cogarena on the other ſide of the Cyrus; from the Chalybes and Moſſynæci Parenета and Xerxena, which bordered on Armenia Minor. By theſe new acquiſitions, Armenia from a ſmall province became all on a ſudden ſo conſiderable a kingdom, that Juſtin, in enumerating thoſe of his time, gives it the preference in wealth, power, and extent to any other, that of Parthia alone excepted. The conquerors, having thus enlarged their new territories, divided their conqueſts into two kingdoms; and on this occaſion the diviſion of Armenia into the Greater and Leſſer was firſt introduced. Zadriades kept for himſelf that part which lay next to Cilicia, calling it the kingdom of Armenia Minor, and yielded the far greater part to Artaxias, which began to be known under the name of Armenia Major. Antiochus did not fail to lead a powerful army againſt them, but was not able to recover one ſingle province of the many they had uſurped. Wherefore, after many unſucceſsful attempts, he at laſt concluded a peace with them, deſigning to fall upon them again after he had ſettled the affairs of his his kingdom, which was then rent into ſeveral parties. But they in the mean time entering into an alliance with the Romans, ſecured to themſelves and their poſterity the provinces which they had uſurped. Artaxias built the famous city of Artaxata, the metropolis of Armenia and the ſeat of the kings of that country: Some ſay, as we have hinted above, that he followed therein the direction of Hannibal, whom they ſuppoſe to have fled into Armenia, after the defeat of Antiochus by Scipio Aſiaticus. But it is not at all probable, that Artaxias, who owed, we may ſay, his crown to the Romans and reigned under their protection, would entertain a ſworn enemy of theirs. Artaxias enjoyed his kingdom peaceably to the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, by whom his army was cut in pieces, and himſelf made priſoner, and put in irons [r]. We read of an embaſſy ſent by him, four years after this misfortune, to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, ſolliciting that prince to put to death Mithrobuzanes, one of the two ſons of Zadriades, who had fled to him for ſhelter, and to aſſiſt him in the recovering of his kingdom. But Ariarathes ſharply rebuked the embaſſadors, and was ſo far from complying with their requeſt, that he reſtored Mithrobuzanes to his father's kingdom; and moreover declared, that he would give no manner of aſſiſtance to one who could think him capable of committing ſuch an infamous piece of treachery.

Artaxias defeated by Antiochus Epiphanes. Year of the flood 2834. Year before Chriſt 165.

By whom Artaxias was ſucceeded is uncertain, the Armenian hiſtory being interrupted here with a chaſm of about ſeventy years, for ſo many paſſed between the defeat of Artaxias and the reign of Tigranes the Great; which interruption may perhaps be owing, not to the want of writers, but of any thing worth writing performed by the intermediate princes. All we know of this time is, that Tigranes was by his father delivered up to the Parthians as an hoſtage, whence it is plain, that the Armenians had warred with the Parthians to their diſadvantage. The Parthians ſet Tigranes at liberty upon the news of his father's death, having firſt obliged him to yield up to them a conſiderable part of his kingdom by way of ranſom [s].

Tigranes. Year of the flood 2904. Before Chriſt 95.

Tigranes being thus reſtored to his father's kingdom, was prevailed upon in the beginning of his reign by Mithridates Eupator, to enter into an alliance with him againſt the [r] Appian. Syriac. p. 117. & 131. Porphyr. apud Hieronym. in Daniel. c. 11.

[s] Strab. l. xi. p. 537. Juſtin. l. xxxviii. c. 3. Appian. in Syriac. p. 118.

the Romans, whoſe power began to give jealouſy to all the princes of Aſia. One of the articles of agreement between theſe two kings was, that Mithridates ſhould have the conquered cities and countries, and Tigranes the captives and plunder. In virtue of this treaty, Tigranes was to invade Cappadocia, which Mithridates had been lately obliged by a decree of the ſenate of Rome to give up to Ariobarzanes. But before either of the princes took the field, a marriage was ſolemnized, with all poſſible pomp and magnificence, between Tigranes and Cleopatra daughter to Mithridates. As ſoon as the nuptial ſolemnities were over, Mithridates ſent his brother Socrates to invade Bithynia, and drive from that throne Nicomedes, whom the Romans had appointed king; and Tigranes, according to his engagement, ordered Mithridates and Bagoas, his two chief commanders, to fall upon Cappadocia, which they reduced without the leaſt oppoſition; Ariobarzanes, who was but a very mean-ſpirited prince, having abandoned his kingdom and fled to Rome, upon the firſt news of their march. Tigranes having thus got poſſeſſion of Cappadocia, enriched himſelf with the booty, but yielded the country to Ariarathes, Mithridates's ſon, whom he cauſed to be proclaimed with great pomp, and univerſal ſatisfaction of the people [t]. In the mean time the Syrians, being harraſſed with a long and inteſtine war of the Seleucidæ, who could not agree among themſelves, invited Tigranes to take poſſeſſion of their country, which he did accordingly, driving out the Seleucidæ, who were not in a condition to oppoſe him, and obliging Antiochus Pius not only to yield that part of Syria which he poſſeſſed, and extended from the Euphrates to the ſea, but likewiſe great part of Cilicia. Tigranes muſt have made peace with the Romans ſoon after his expedition into Cappadocia, and left Mithridates in the lurch; for in the council of the Syrians, after they had reſolved to call in a foreign king, three princes being propoſed, namely Mithridates king of Pontus, Ptolemy king of Egypt, and Tigranes king of Armenia; the latter was unanimouſly choſen, and Mithridates rejected for no other reaſon but his being at war with the Romans [u]. Tigranes enjoyed Syria, without the leaſt diſturbance, for the ſpace of eighteen years, till he was driven out by Pompey, and Syria reduced to the Invades Cappadocia.

Tigranes is choſen king of Syria.

[t] Juſtin. l. xxxviii. c. 3. Appian. in Mithridatic, p. 176.
[u] Juſtin. l. xl. c. 1, 2.

the form of a Roman province. With this new addition of ſtrength Tigranes, giving the reins to his aſpiring and unbounded deſire of power, invades Armenia Minor, kills king Artanes, who met him on the frontiers at the head of a conſiderable army, diſperſes his troops, and in one campaign reduces the whole kingdom. From Armenia Minor he marches his victorious army againſt the Aſiatic Greeks, the Adiabenians, the Aſſyrians, and the Gordians, carrying all before him, and obliging the people, where-ever he came, to acknowledge him for their ſovereign. From this ſecond expedition he returned loaded with an immenſe booty, which he ſoon after encreaſed with the ſpoils of Cappadocia, invading that kingdom the ſecond time at the inſtigation of Mithridates, who had been obliged by the Romans to withdraw his forces from thence. From Cappadocia Tigranes, beſides the other booty, brought back into Armenia no fewer than three hundred thouſand captives, having ſurrounded the country with his numerous army in ſuch manner that no one could eſcape him. Theſe, together with the priſoners he had taken in his two firſt expeditions, he employed to build, and afterwards to people, a large and noble city, which he founded in the place, where the crown of Armenia had been firſt put upon his head, calling it from his own name Tigranocerta, that is, the city of Tigranes [w]. In the mean time Mithridates, who had concluded a peace with the Romans, but with no other deſign than to gain time and ſtrengthen his party, ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to Tigranes, inviting him to enter into an alliance againſt the common enemy. Metrodorus Scepſius was at the head of this embaſſy, a man had in ſuch reſpect and veneration by Mithridates, that he was commonly called the king's father: he was at firſt a philoſopher of great note, and afterwards raiſed by the king to the dignity of a judge, with ſuch an unbounded authority, that it was not lawful to appeal from his ſentence to the king himſelf. So great was the opinion Mithridates had of his honeſty. Tigranes before he returned any anſwer to this embaſſy, preſſed Metrodorus to tell him honeſtly, whether he thought it adviſeable for him to enter into a war with the Romans. Metrodorus at firſt declined giving any anſwer to ſuch an unſeaſonable queſtion, but being at laſt prevailed upon by Reduces Armenia Minor, and other countries.

[w] Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 216. Strab. l. xi. p. 532.

by the preſſing inſtances of the king, replied, As I am an embaſſador, I adviſe you to join your father-in-law againſt the Romans; as a counſellor, I am for your living in peace and amity with ſo powerful a people. Tigranes informed the king of what he had ſaid, ſuppoſing he would not take it amiſs, nor entertain a worſe opinion of his embaſſador on the ſcore of his ſincerity. But it fell out otherwiſe, as was commonly believed, Metrodorus dying on the road as he was returning home, not without ſuſpicion of poiſon. Tigranes, who had betrayed him, to expreſs his concern, cauſed his body to be interred with the utmoſt magnificence. This prince at firſt refuſed to join Mithridates againſt the Romans, but in the end was prevailed upon by the importunity of his wife Cleopatra, to ſend him conſiderable ſupplies [x], though he never came heartily into that war, not caring to provoke the Romans, who on their ſide kept fair with him, taking no notice, for the preſent, of the ſupplies he had ſent to Mithridates. This unfortunate prince was ſoon after, upon the defeat of his army by Lucullus, forced to fly for ſhelter into Armenia, where he met with a very cold reception from his ſon-in-law, who would neither treat with him, nor ſee him, nor acknowledge him for his relation; however, he promiſed to protect his perſon, and allowed him in one of his caſtles, a princely retinue, and a table ſuitable to his former condition [y]. This total overthrow of Mithridates might well have made Tigranes open his eyes, and oppoſe with all his might the growing power of ſo formidable an enemy. But inſtead of that, leaving the Romans to purſue their conqueſts, he marches at the head of a very numerous army againſt the Parthians, with a deſign to recover the ſeventy vallies which the Parthians had extorted from him before they had ſet him at liberty. Thoſe he eaſily retook, and not ſatisfied with what had formerly belonged to the crown of Armenia, added to them all Meſopotamia, the country that lay about Ninus and Arbela, and the fruitful province of Mygdonia, with the great and ſtrong city of Niſibis, called by the Greeks Antiochia Mygdonica, the Parthians, though at that time a mighty people, flying every-where before him [z]. From Meſopotamia he took his march towards Syria to quell a rebellion which Sends ſupplies to Mithridates.

Reduces Meſopotamia.

[x] Strab. l. xiii. p. 609, 610. [y] Memnon. c. 48. Appian. ibid. [z] Plutarch. in Lucullo. Strab. l. xi. p. 533. Joſeph. l. xiii. c. 24. Oros. l. vi. c. 3.

which had been raiſed there by Cleopatra, ſirnamed Selene, who, after the death of her huſband Antiochus Pius, reigned jointly with her ſons in that part of Syria which Tigranes had not ſeized on. The malecontents were quickly reduced, that part of Syria which Cleopatra poſſeſſed, brought under ſubjection, and the queen herſelf taken priſoner, and confined to the caſtle of Seleucia, where ſhe was ſoon after put to death by Tigranes's order [a]. From Syria he paſſed into Phœnice, which he ſubdued either entirely, or in great part, ſpreading far and wide the terror of his arms; inſomuch, that all the princes of Aſia, except thoſe that were joined in alliance with the Romans, either in perſon, or by their deputies, ſubmitted and paid homage to the conqueror. Among the others, Alexandria queen of Judæa, upon a report that Tigranes with an army of five hundred thouſand men was ready to fall upon her kingdom, diſpatched embaſſadors, loaded with rich preſents, to aſſure him, that ſhe and the whole nation of the Jews coveted nothing more than the friendſhip of ſo powerful a prince, which they were willing to cultivate by all the good offices that lay in their power. The king, who was then employed in the ſiege of Ptolemais, which city not long after ſurrendered, commended them for undertaking ſo long a joorney to do him homage, and bidding them be of good chear, ſent them back into Judæa [b]. Appian tells us, that Tigranes over-ran all the Syrian nations on this ſide of the Euphrates on the borders of Egypt [c]; and Lucullus in Pluturch expreſly ſays, that he made himſelf maſter of Paleſtine. But on the other hand, Eutropius [d] and Joſephus [e] write, that he ſtopt in Phœnice, and was maſter but of part of that country. And now Tigranes, elated with a long and uninterrupted ſeries of victories and proſperous events, began to look upon himſelf as invincible, and far above the level of other crowned heads: he aſſumed the haughty title of king of kings, and had many kings waiting upon him in the nature of menial ſervants: he never appeared on horſeback without the attendance of four kings running by his horſe in livery: and when he gave anſwers ro the nations that applied themſelves to him, they ſtood on either ſide of the throne with their hands claſped together, that attitude of all others

Phœnice.

And all Syria to the borders of Egypt.

[a] Strab. l. xvi. p. 749. [b] Joſeph. Antiquitat. l. xiii. c. 24. [c] Appian. in Syriac. p. 118. [d] Eutrop. l. vi. [e] Joſeph. ubi ſupra.

others being accounted then among the orientals the greateſt acknowledgment of vaſſalage and ſervitude [f]

Lucullus ſends Appius Claudius to demand of him Mithridates.

By this time Lucullus, having entirely reduced the kingdom of Pontus, and wanting a pretence to fall upon Tigranes, ſent Appius Claudius, his wife's brother, with the character of embaſſador, to demand of him Mithridates, who, as we have hinted before, had retired into Armenia, and lived there under the protection of his ſon-in-law Tigranes. Appius on his journey perſuaded ſeveral princes, and among the others Zarbienus, king of the Gordians, to ſide with the Romans in caſe of a rupture between them and Tigranes. The embaſſador not finding the king at Epidaphne, or Antioch, he being gone from thence a few days before his arrival to reduce ſome cities of Phænice, and being ordered to wait there till he returned, employed that time in ſolliciting the neighbouring cities to ſhake off the Armenian yoke, and join the Romans as ſoon as their army ſhould appear in thoſe parts, which they did accordingly. Tigranes being at laſt returned to Antioch, Appius in the audience which he had, told him abruptly, that he was come to demand Mithridates, as belonging to Lucullus's triumph; and, in caſe he did not readily comply with his demand, to proclaim war againſt him. Tigranes, though no ways accuſtomed to ſuch freedom of ſpeech, anſwered with a great deal of temper, that he had not himſelf approved of Mithridates's proceedings; but yet could not help having ſome regard for a man ſo nearly

Whom he refuſes to deliver up.

related to him; that all the world would condemn him, if he delivered his father-in-law into the hands of his ſworn enemies; he was therefore unalterably reſolved to ſtand by him, and protect him in his adverſe fortune; and if the Romans ſhould on that ſcore make war upon him, or invade his dominions, he was in a condition to pay them back in their own coin. He was greatly offended that Lucullus in his letter did not give him the title of king of kings, and therefore in his anſwer would not ſo much as give him the title of general. He offered great preſents to Appius, both for himſelf and Lucullus; but he accepted only of a gold cup, fearing the king might take it amiſs, if he rejected them all [e]. In the mean time Tigranes being informed that Zarbienus king of the Gordians had entered into a private alliance with the Romans, put put him, his wife and children to death; and returning into Armenia, received with the greateſt pomp and magnificence imaginable his father-in-law Mithridates, whom to that time he had not admitted to his preſence, though the unhappy prince had reſided a year and eight months in his dominions; they held ſeveral private conferences, and in the end Mithridates was ſent back into Pontus with ten thouſand horſe to make a diverſion by raiſing there what diſturbances he could [f].

[f] Plut. in Lucull. [e] Strab. l. xvi. p. 749. Memnon. c. 48.

On the other hand Lucullus, hearing of the king's reſolution, performed at Epheſus the vows which it was cuſtomary for the Roman generals to perform after having ſubdued a powerful enemy; ſo confident was he of ſucceſs. From Epheſus he marched back into Pontus, and from thence, after reducing the ſtrong city of Sinope he began his march to Armenia with two legions only and three thouſand horſe, having left Sornatius in Pontus with ſix thouſand men to keep that kingdom in awe, and defeat the deſigns of Mithridates [g]. He took his rout through Cappadocia, where his army was abundantly ſupplied with all manner of proviſions by Ariobarzanes, whom he had lately reſtored to that kingdom; and arrived in a few days at the Euphrates, which he paſſed without the leaſt oppoſition, where it ſeparates Cappadocia from Armenia (H). Having now entered the enemy's country, he detached two parties, one to beſiege a city, wherein he was informed that Tigranes's concubines and great part of his treaſures were kept; the other under the command of Sextilius to block Lucullus marches into Armenia.

[f] Memnon. c. 57. & Plut. in Lucul. [g] Salluſt. hiſtor. l. iv. apud Nonium. Memnon. c. 58. Plut Appian. ibid.

(H) Plutarch informs us (7), that the Euphrates, being at that time ſwelled to an extraordinary height by reaſon of the winter rains, upon the arrival of Lucullus began to abate, inſomuch that the waters being reduced by the next morning within their banks, afforded him an eaſy and ſafe paſſage. Whereupon the inhabitants began to look upon him as a god, and were confirmed in their opinion by what they reckoned a great prodigy; for no ſooner had he paſſed the river, but one of the oxen conſecrated to the Parian Diana, though wild, and never caught without great difficulty by the barbarians, came of its own accord to offer itſelf to Lucullus for a ſacrifice. He offered alſo a bull to the deity of the river in thankſgiving for his ſafe paſſage.

(7) Plutarch. in Lucull.

block up Tigranocerta, in hopes of drawing the king to a battle. But Tigranes, after having put to death the ſcout that brought him the firſt intelligence of the Romans arrival, made towards mount Taurus, which he had appointed for the place of the general rendezvous [h]. Lucullus diſpatched Muræna in purſuit of the king, who having overtaken and engaged him in a narrow paſs, put the Armenians to flight, and beſides all the king's baggage and carriages, carried back with him a great many priſoners, the king having fled in the beginning of the ſkirmiſh. Sextilius, was attended with the like ſucceſs againſt a large body of Arabians, which he fell in with, as they were marching to join the king; for Lucullus had ſent out ſeveral parties to ſcour the country, and prevent the innumerable forces that were in full march on all ſides, from drawing into one body. But notwithſtanding all the diligence Lucullus could uſe, the king's army daily encreaſed to a great degree, the Gordians, Medes, Arabians, Adiabenians, Albans, Iberians, and moſt of the inhabitants of the neighbouring kingdom flocking to him in great bodies, not ſo much out of any affection to the king, as upon a ſtrong perſuaſion, that the Romans were come into thoſe quarters with a deſign to ranſack the country, and plunder their wealthy temples: this opinion, which was induſtriouſly ſpread abroad by Tigranes, armed, we may ſay, all Aſia againſt Lucullus [i]. With theſe ſupplies the king's army, before he left mount Taurus, conſiſting according to Plutarch's [k] computation, of twenty thouſand archers and ſlingers, fifty-five thouſand horſe, and a hundred and fifty thouſand foot, all armed cap-a-pe, beſides thirty-five thouſand pioneers. But Lucullus was ſo far from being under any apprehenſion on account of the enemies number, that on the contrary the only thing he feared was, that Tigranes ſhould follow Mithridates's advice, which was not to engage the Romans, but by ravaging the country, diſtreſs them for want of proviſions; a leſſon he had learnt the year before at his own expence, ſince Lucullus by that means had made his army moulder away, and then carried ſeveral ſtrong places without ſtriking a blow. To divert the king from this reſolution, Lucullus determined to decamp, and joining Sextilius at Tigranocerta, to carry on the [h] Plutarch. in Lucull. Appian. ubi ſupra, ubi ſupra. Cic. in orat. pro lege. Manilia.

[i] Plutarch.

[k] Plut. ubi ſupra.

the ſiege of that place in good earneſt, perſuading himſelf, that Tigranes at the head of ſo numerous an army would never ſit ſtill, and ſuffer his wealthy metropolis to be taken and plundered under his eyes. As Lucullus imagined, ſo it fell out; for Tigranes having ſummoned a council of war, it was there unanimouſly reſolved to attack the Romans, and relieve the place, before the enemy could receive any new ſupplies; and Taxiles, whom Mithridates had ſent to diſſuade the king from venturing a battle, was in danger of loſing his head for diſapproving their reſolution. Purſuant to this determination, while the Romans were buſied in carrying on their attacks before Tigranocerta, the king's army all on a ſudden appeared on the top of the neighbouring hills, and was welcomed with loud ſhouts and acclamations by thoſe who were in the city, the hills and dales echoing on all ſides, victory, victory. The Armenians within the town flocking to the walls, menaced from thence the Romans, ſhewing them the king's forces on the hills. Lucullus finding by the enemies motions that they were reſolved to come to an engagement, left Muræna with ſix thouſand foot to continue the ſiege, and marched himſelf with ten thouſand foot only, and about a thouſand horſe, to meet the king, who upon a view of the Roman camp, turning to thoſe who attended him, If theſe men, ſaid he, come as embaſſadors, there is enow of them, but if they come as enemies they make but a very indifferent appearance [l]. As Lucullus was drawing up his forces to paſs a river which parted the two camps, and to attack the enemy, one of his officers ſuggeſted to him, that that day was marked in the kalender as unlucky, the Romans under the conduct of Cepion having been defeated on that very day by the Cambrians: the general replied calmly, It is therefore incumbent upon us to behave ourſelves with more gallantry, that ſo diſmal a day may henceforth become a day of joy and mirth for the people of Rome [m]. The Armenians ſuffered Lucullus to ford the river without the leaſt moleſtation, which he had no ſooner done, than charging the enemy in perſon at the head of his ſmall army, to encourage his men, who were under no ſmall

Tigranes defeated by Lucullus.

[l] Memnon. c. 59. Plut. ubi ſupra. Appian. Xiphilin. ex Dione.
[m] Plut, ubi ſupra. & in Camill. & in Apophthegmat.

ſmall apprehenſion, he forced the right wing to give ground, and with great ſlaughter of the enemies penetrated to the very centre. The Romans, thus encouraged by the example of their generel, plied the Armenians ſo warmly with their javelins, that the whole army began to give way, and ſoon after betook themſelves to a precipitous flight. The Romans purſued them a hundred and twenty furlongs, trampling all the way on heaps of dead bodies, till night coming on, obliged them to give over the dreadful carnage [n]. In this battle Lucullus performed the duty both of an experienced commander, and a gallant ſoldier; whereas Tigranes behaved himſelf in a moſt cowardly manner, having quitted the field in the very beginning of the engagement, and attended only by a hundred and fifty horſe, ſaved himſelf in one of his caſtles [o]. Plutarch informs us [p], that on the enemies ſide there fell a hundred thouſand of the foot, and that but few of the cavalry eſcaped; whereas of the Romans five men only were killed, and a hundred wounded. Antiochus the philoſopher, mentioning this fight [q], ſays, that the ſun never beheld the like; and Livy, that the Romans never fought at ſuch a diſadvantage as to numbers, the conquerors not equalling the twentieth parth of the conquered (I). Tigranes on his flight meeting his ſon in as forlorn a condition as himſelf, reſigned to him, not without many tears, his diadem and royal robes, bidding him ſhift for himſelf, and ſave thoſe royal enſigns; the young prince delivered them to a truſty friend, who, being taken by the Romans, conſigned them to Lucullus [r].

In

[n] Memnon. c. 59. Appian. in Mithridatic. [o] Memnon. & Plutarch. ubi ſupra. Oros. l. vi. c. 3. & Xiphilin. in epitome Dionis. [p] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. [q] Antioch. Philoſoph. in comment. de diis. [r] Memnon, Plutarch. Oros. Xiphilin. ubi ſupra.

(I) Phlegon ſays, that of the Armenians five thouſand only were ſlain, and a great many made priſoners. Oroſius on the other hand writes (8), that thirty thouſand were ſlain in the battle, and a great many in the flight. Plutarch's account ſeems to be greatly exaggerated, conſidering that the Romans were but eleven thouſand, or at moſt according to the computation of Eutropius, Sextus Rufus, and Jornandes, eighteen thouſand.

(8) Oros. l. xvi. c. 3.

In the mean time Mithridates having levied a conſiderable army, was marching to join Tigranes; when he received the diſmal account of his overthrow, and ſoon after met the king himſelf quite diſheartened, and in a great dread of being taken by the Romans. Mithridates no ſooner ſaw him, but diſmounting from his horſe, he tenderly embraced him, and condoling his misfortune, reſigned to him his own retinue, and royal apparel. Having by this friendly treatment cheared him up, he encouraged him, inſtead of bewailing unfruitfully his preſent diſaſter, to rally his troops, raiſe new ſupplies, and with freſh vigour renew the war, not queſtioning but by a prudent conduct he might eaſily repair in another campaign all the loſſes he had ſuffered in that. Tigranes was ſo taken with this obliging deportment, that he not only promiſed to follow Mithridates's advice, but moreover committed the whole management of the war to his conduct [s], owning him fitter to deal with the Romans than himſelf. This conference was no ſooner over, but Tigranes diſpatched meſſengers to all his prefects, enjoining them to raiſe what forces they could: Magdates, who had been governor of Syria for the ſpace of fourteen years together, was ordered to abandon that kingdom, and haſten with his army to the king's aſſiſtance: embaſſadors were ſent in the joint names of Mithridates and Tigranes to the neighbouring princes, particularly to Arſaces king of Parthia, ſolliciting them to riſe up in arms againſt the common enemy, whoſe unbounded ambition aimed at nothing leſs than the empire of all Aſia [t] (K).

While the confederate kings were thus preparing to renew the war with more vigour than ever, Lucullus was employed in reducing the ſtrong-holds of Armenia. From

[s] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. Memnon. c. 59. [t] Appian. in Syriac. 118, 119, 133.

(K) Among the remains of the fourth book of Salluſt's hiſtory, we read the entire letter of Mithridates to Arſaces on this occaſion; he extenuates the late victory, aſcribing it rather to the raſh and imprudent conduct of Tigranes, who engaged the enemy in narrow places, than to the Roman valour. Then addreſſing Arſaces, "But you, ſays he, who are lord of the great city of "Seleucia, and the powerful kingdom of Perſia, who poſſeſſes "immenſe riches, and are one of the greateſt potentates of Aſia, "can you think the Romans will ever ſuffer you quietly to enjoy "what the gods have liberally beſtowed upon you? They are at "war

Tigranocerta taken by Lucullus.

the field of battle he marched back to Tigranocerta, which town was a few days after delivered up to him by the Greek mercenaries that were then in garriſon. Theſe Mancœus, governor of the place, diſtruſting their loyalty, had not only diſarmed, but was moreover going to ſeize them, which the Greeks ſuſpecting, provided themſelves with cudgels, and wrapping their garments about their arms inſtead of bucklers, fell upon the Armenians, and ſtripping thoſe they knocked down, enabled themſelves with their army to attack and gain ſome of the forts, which they immediately delivered up to the Romans, and thereby put them in poſſeſſion of the town (L). From Tigranocerta Lucullus marched into the ſmall kingdom

" war with all mank'nd, but exert their cruelty chiefly on thoſe
" who have wherewithal to glut their avarice. They pillage
" kingdoms, ſell the inhabitants for ſlaves, plunder the temples
" of the gods, acknowledging no other law but their own arbi" trary will and pleaſure. However, we are ſtill in a condition,
" with your aſſiſtance, to defeat their impious deſigns. By ſhut-
" up the paſſes which lead from Armenia into Meſopotamia, you " may eaſily make their army moulder away for want of provi-
" ſions, and thereby gain to yourſelf the glory of ſuppreſſing " great robbers, and relieving great kings. And this is what I
" earneſtly entreat you to do, unleſs you had rather encreaſe
" one day with the addition of your own kingdom the power of " the common enemy, than by your friendſhip become a con-
" queror yourſelf". However Arſaces, or rather Pacorus, (for Arſaces was a name common to all the Parthian kings) could not be prevailed upon to come into Mithridates's meaſures, having promiſed to the embaſſadors of Lucullus a ſtrict neutrality.

(L) So Plutarch and Appian (9), who agree in each particular. But Dio (10) informs us, that the inhabitants, moſtly Cilicians, upon a difference that aroſe between them and the Armenians, let the Romans into the town by night. Memnon (11) ſays, that Tigranes's commanders having no hopes of relief, procured good conditions for themſelves; and ſurrendered the town to Lucullus, who, beſides many other things of great value, found in the king's coffers eight thouſand talents in ready money: he allowed the ſoldiers to plunder the city, and moreover gave to each of them eight hundred drachmas; having found many players gathered together from all parts by Tigranes, who was about to dedicate a new theatre, he employed them in interludes, which he exhibited for the diverſion of the ſoldiery (12): the wives of the chief officers dom of Gordyene, where he celebrated with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence the obſequies of king Zarbienus, whom Tigranes had put to death for entering into a private alliance with the Romans. Lucullus himſelf after a ſhort ſpeech in commendation of the deceaſed, put fire to the funeral pile, which was the moſt ſtately and ſumptuous that ever had been ſeen in Aſia, being adorned with all the enſigns of royalty, and the richeſt ſpoils that were found in Tigranocerta. In this kingdom Lucullus found, beſides immenſe ſums of gold and ſilver, ſuch ſtore of proviſions, as enabled him to purſue the war without putting the republic to any manner of charges [t].

(9) Plutarch. in Lucull. & Appian. in Mithridatic. (10) Dio, l. xxxv. (11) Memnon. c. 59. (12) Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

In the mean time the two confederate kings, having levied new forces, were taking the field, and had appointed their troops to rendezvous in the ſpacious plains on the other ſide of mount Taurus: Whereupon Lucullus, leaving Gordyene, began his march, and paſſing the Taurus, encamped cloſe by the enemy. There happened ſeveral ſkirmiſhes between the parties that were ſent out to forage, without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide; but Lucullus could by no means draw them to a general engagement. Whereupon he reſolved to decamp and lay ſiege to Artaxata, where Tigranes had left his wife and children with the greater part of his treaſures. But he had ſcarce formed his camp when the enemy appeared, and ſat down cloſe by him, with the ſmall river of Arſimia between the two camps. Lucullus did not allow them time to fortify their camp, but immediately drawing out his forces, paſſed the river, and charged the Mardian and Iberian horſe, in whom Tigranes chiefly confided, with ſuch vigour, that after a faint reſiſtance, they betook themſelves to flight, and put the whole army in confuſion. The Romans purſued them all night with great ſlaughter, took the chief officers priſoners, and returned the next day to the ſiege loaded with an immenſe booty.

Tigranes and Mithridates defeated by Lucullus.

[t] Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

officers he ſent back untouched to their huſbands, and by that means gained them over to his ſide: the Greeks he ſent to their own country, giving them wherewithal to defray the expences of their journey: he gave alſo leave to the Cappadocians, Cilicians, Iberians, &c. who had been tranſplanted thither againſt their will, to return to their reſpective homes: and thus by the ruin of one, many cities, recovering their inhabitants, were reſtored to their antient ſplendor, and ever afterwards looked upon Lucullus as their founder.

booty. In this battle there fell on the enemy's ſide more officers and perſons of diſtinction than in the former, though the ſlaughter was not near ſo great. Mithridates being under great apprehenſion of falling into the Romans hands, fled in the very beginning of the battle, and his example was ſoon followed by Tigranes, who withdrew into the moſt remote parts of his dominions. The Romans, however, could not prevail upon the governor of Artaxata, either by threats or promiſes, to ſurrender the city; and in the mean time great quantity of ſnow falling, and the cold growing very ſevere, though it was no later in the year than the autumnal equinox, the ſoldiers requeſted Lucullus by their tribunes to break up the ſiege, and allow them to retire into winter quarters; which he rejecting with indignation, the whole army having cauſed the retreat to be ſounded, retired in the dead of the night from before the city, and abandoned the enterprize, notwithſtanding all Lucullus could ſay or do to put them in mind of their duty. However he prevailed upon ſome of the legions to follow him into Mygdonia, a warm and fruitful country, and there in hopes of a great booty to lay ſiege to Niſibis or Antiochia Mygdonica [u]. This city was built by the Macedonians, as Joſephus informs us [w], and had been taken ſome years before from the Parthians by Tigranes, who had placed there many things of great value. It was very ſtrong of itſelf, and defended by a numerous body of choſen troops commanded by Guras brother to Tigranes, having under him Callimachus, who was famous for his ſkill in fortification, and had lately defended the city of Amiſus with incredible bravery. The Romans met with a warmer reception than they expected, but nevertheleſs after ſome months carried the place, having by the favour of a dark and ſtormy night, which had obliged the centinels to abandon their poſts, got over the ditch, and ſcaled the wall, without being perceived by the enemy. Thoſe who fled into the caſtle, ſurrendered upon terms, among whom Guras, who was treated very generouſly by Lucullus; but Callimachus he loaded with chains for having ſet on fire the city of Amiſus after the Romans had got poſſeſſion of it, and thereby deprived him of an opportunity of obliging the Greeks by preſerving it, as he intended to do. Callimachus promiſed to diſcover great ſums of gold which lay hid under ground, provided he

The Roman ſoldiers mutiny againſt Lucullus.

Niſibis taken by the Romans.

[u] Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

[w] Joſeph. l. xx. c. 2.

he would give him his liberty ; but could not by any means appeaſe his reſentment [x]. Here Lucullus paſſed the winter to the great ſatisfaction of the ſoldiery ; but as he was preparing early in the ſpring to take the field, and march out againſt Mithridates and Tigranes, who had again invaded Cappadocia, the legions refuſed to follow him, nor could he bring them to a ſenſe of their duty, though he went in perſon from tent to tent, embracing the moſt refractory, and entreating them with tears in his eyes to ſerve but one campaign more, which, he aſſured them, would put an end to the war, and enrich the conquerors with the ſpoils of two wealthy kingdoms. But all was to no purpoſe ; the mutineers, throwing their empty purſes at his feet, replied, that as he had enriched himſelf alone, ſo he ſhould carry on the war by himſelf. Thus was that great commander forced to ſit ſtill, and ſuffer the enemy to plunder before his eyes the allies of the Roman people, and recover in great part the countries which he had taken from them. This ſedition was ſtirred up and fomented by P. Clodius, brother to Lucullus's wife, a man of a reſtleſs and mutinous temper, and whom Lucullus for his baſe behaviour had turned out of a commiſſion, which he himſelf had given him. Clodius was ſupported by Pompey's party at Rome, where Lucullus was charged with ſpinning out the war in order to be continued in the command of the army, which he employed, ſaid his enemies, not in ſubduing kings, but in plundering their countries, and enriching himſelf with the booty. The charge perhaps was not ill-grounded ; for had Lucullus after the firſt and ſecond battle purſued Tigranes, he might very eaſily have prevented his raiſing a new army, and thereby have put an end to the war ; but the hopes of booty made him after both battles abandon the enemy and attack thoſe places in which he had heard the king's treaſures were kept ; and truly the riches, which he heaped up in this and the Mithridatic war, are almoſt inconceivable. This gave his enemies a plauſible pretence to ſtir up the people againſt him, having employed the forces of the republic in carrying on a war for his own private ends. Whereupon a law was at laſt publiſhed by C. Manilius, tribune of the people, whereby Lucullus was enjoined to reſign to Pompey the legions and provinces under his command, together with the whole management of the war againſt Mithridates and Tigranes. This law was greatly oppoſed, but to no effect, by the nobility, who, though they did not approve of Lucullus's conduct, yet could not help thinking him highly injured by the people; ſince Pompey was ſent rather to take poſſeſſion of the ſpoils of a conquered enemy, than to carry on a war, and to triumph rather than to fight [y]. Lucullus met Pompey at the caſtle of Danala in Galatia, and endeavoured to perſuade him to return, ſince Pontus and Armenia were already as good as conquered, and the kings not in a condition to oppoſe the Roman forces; but Pompey anſwering that he could not do otherwiſe than obey the orders of the republick, a quarrel aroſe between them, Lucullus upbraiding Pompey with an unbounded ambition, and Pompey Lucullus with an inſatiable avarice; and neither could be ſaid, as Velleius Paterculus obſerves, to lay any thing to the other's charge that was not true [z]. At laſt Pompey removed his camp, forbidding under ſevere penalties any one to come near Lucullus, or obey him; and Lucullus, ſet out on his journey to Rome where he was received by the ſenate with all the poſſible marks of honour and eſteem. He brought along with him great ſtore of valuable books, with which he furniſhed his library, that was always open to men of learning [a].

Pompey ſent to ſucceed Lucullus in the command of the army.

[x] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. & Dio.

The ſon of Tigranes takes up arms againſt his father.

In the mean time Mithridates and Tigranes had over-run Cappadocia, and recovered all Armenia, with great part of Pontus, and would have gained greater advantages, had not Tigranes's ſon, by name alſo Tigranes, taking up arms againſt his father, obliged him to divide his troops. The father and ſon coming to a pitched battle, the latter was put to flight, and forced to ſave himſelf in Parthia, where being joined by the diſcontented Armenians, he perſuaded Phrahates king of the Parthians to declare war againſt his father, and invade Armenia; which he did at the head of a very numerous army, laying ſiege to Artaxata, and obliging Tigranes the elder to hide himſelf in the mountainous parts of his kingdom [b]. Phrahates, finding the city in a condition to ſtand a long ſiege, left part of his forces with Tigranes the younger, and returned home; which Tigranes the father hearing, he immediately abandoned the faſtneſſes of the mountains, and falling upon his ſon at the ſiege of Artaxata, diſperſed the rebels with great ſlaughter, and entered

[y] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in Pompeio. in Pompeio & Lucullo. l. xxxvi.

[z] Velleius Pater. l. ii. c. 33. Plutarch. in Pompeio & Lucullo.

[a] Iſidor. Origin. l. vi. c 3. & Plutarch.

[b] Liv. l. c. Appian. p. 242. Dio.

tered his metropolis in triumph. Tigranes the ſon fled firſt to Mithridates, but finding him reduced to great ſtraits, having been overcome a few days before by Pompey with the loſs of forty thouſand men, he went over to the Romans, and led them into Armenia againſt his father, as an ally of Mithridates. By his advice Pompey marched againſt Artaxata, where the king then reſided, who hearing of his march, diſpatched deputies to him, offering to ſurrender the city upon certain conditions, which Pompey rejected at the inſtigation of Tigranes the younger, tho' the deputies brought along with them in chains the embaſſadors that Mithridates had ſent to ſollicit ſuccours againſt the Romans. Hereupon the king being quite diſpirited, and not in a condition, after the revolt of his ſon to withſtand the enemy, took a reſolution to go and meet Pompey in perſon, and, as he had a great opinion of his clemency and good-nature, to put himſelf, without any reſerve, into his hands, and acquieſce to ſuch conditions as he ſhould think fit to grant him. Accordingly he ſet out for the camp, which was within fourteen miles of the city, and was met at ſome diſtance by a party of Roman horſe detached from the army to eſcort him. As he entered his works, two lictors ſent by Pompey deſired him to diſmount, no-body being allowed to come into the Roman camp on horſeback. The king readily obeyed, and unbuckling his ſword, delivered it into their hands. As ſoon as Pompey, who went on foot to meet him, appeared, pulling off his diadem, he threw himſelf at his feet; but Pompey embracing him, raiſed him up, and with his own hand put the diadem again on his head. He afterwards conducted him to his tent, and there gave him audience, ſitting between him and his ſon, who did not ſo much as riſe up when his father came in, nor take any notice of him [c]. The king expatiated in commendation of Pompey, ſaying, that he was come not to propoſe, but to accept whatever conditions he ſhould think fit to offer him; that he did not look upon it as any diſparagement to his royal dignity to own himſelf conquered by one whom fortune had raiſed above the reſt of mankind, and that he had ſuch an opinion of his juſtice, honour, and generoſity, as to think himſelf ſafer in his camp than he could be in his own metropolis. Pompey afterwards invited them both to ſupper; but the ſon abſented himſelf, which was the firſt thing that made Pompey conceive ſome jealouſy of him

And leads Pompey into Armenia.

Tigranes puts himſelf into Pompey's hands.

[c] Cicero. pro Sextio. Eutrop. l. vi. Dio. Appian. ubi ſupra. Plut. in Pomp. & Lucull.

him [d]. The next day Pompey, after hearing both parties, (for Tigranes had appealed to him for justice against his son) restored the kingdom of Armenia to the father, with the greatest and best part of Mesopotamia; but set a fine upon him of six thousand talents for making war upon the people of Rome without cause. To the son he gave the government of the provinces of Gordyene and Sophene; but the treasures that were kept in the latter he adjudged to the father, because, without them, he could not pay the fine. The son being thus disappointed, endeavoured first to make his escape, and afterwards, by private messengers, sollicited the inhabitants of Sophene not to deliver the treasures to his father; which Pompey taking very much amiss, caused him to be kept in irons, and even then he found means to stir up Phrahates king of the Parthians, whose daughter he had married, against the Romans, and to form a conspiracy against his father's life; whereupon Pompey sent him in chains to Rome, where he was kept in the house of L. Flavius a senator, till the tribuneship of P. Clodius, who, being bribed with a large sum of money, set him at liberty in spite of Pompey and the senate [e]. The father willingly yielded to the Romans Cappadocia, Cilicia, Syria, and that part of Phænice which he possessed, contenting himself with his paternal kingdom, and not only paid the fine laid upon him, but moreover made large presents to Pompey, and to all the officers and soldiers of his army, which gained him the title of a friend and ally of the Roman people [f]. He afterwards waged war with Phrahates II. king of the Parthians, by whom he was overcome, and would have been driven out of his kingdom, had not a peace been soon concluded between them by the mediation of Pompey [g]. He ever afterwards cultivated a strict friendship and amity with theRomans; insomuch, that he not only refused to receive Mithridates, who fled to him after he had been routed by Pompey near mount Stella, but even offered a reward of one hundred talents to any one that should put him to death. His second son also, by name Sariaster, took up arms against him; but, by the assistance of the Romans, that rebellion was soon quelled. He died in the eighty-fifth year of his age, and was succeeded by

Who restores him to the kingdom of Armenia.

Tigranes dies.

[d] Vel. Patercul. l. ii. c. 37. & Dio, ubi supra. [e] Plut. & Dio, ubi supra. Cic. in orat. pro domo sua. [f] Plut. ubi supra. Strabo, l. xi. p. 530. Vel. Pater. l. ii. c. 37. [g] Dio, l. xxxvii. Plut. ubi supra. & Appian. 244.

by his ſon Artuaſdes, called by Joſephus [h] Artabazes, by Oroſius [i] Artabanes, and by others Artoadiſtes.

ARTUASDES I. out of a private grudge he bore to Artavaſdes king of Media, adviſed Marc Antony, as he was marching at the head of a powerful army againſt the Parthians, to invade Media, offering to ſerve him in perſon as a guide, and to aſſiſt him with all his forces. Marc Antony, followed his advice; but in the mean time Artuaſdes being privately reconciled to the king of Media, he led the Roman army a long way about, over mountains, and through roads that were almoſt impracticable; inſomuch, that they were obliged to leave behind them moſt part of their baggage, and all their warlike engines. At laſt he brought them into the province of Atropatene, where Statianus, who commanded a body of twenty thouſand Romans, being ſet upon by the Medes and Parthians, while his men were tired with their long and tedious march, was killed, and his whole army cut in pieces. Polemo king of Pontus, who had joined the Romans, was taken priſoner, and with him a great many commanders of diſtinction, who were come to ſerve in the Roman army; but of the Romans themſelves not one outlived that battle. After this overthrow Artuaſdes marched back with his forces into Armenia, leaving Marc Antony at the ſiege of Phrahata in Media Atropatena, which he was ſoon after obliged to raiſe, and make a precipitate retreat into Armenia, being cloſely purſued the whole way by the joint forces of Parthians and Medes. After twenty-ſeven days march he paſſed the Araxes, which divides Media Atropatena from Armenia; and having here muſtered his army, found, that he had loſt in that expedition twenty thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe, with all the military engines and baggage of the army [k]. He was met on the frontiers of Armenia by Artuaſdes, whom he was ſo far from upbraiding with his treachery, that, on the contrary, he received him with greater demonſtrations of friendſhip and kindneſs than ever he had done before. Thus he diſſembled his reſentment for the preſent (and no-body was a greater maſter of the art of diſſembling than he) for fear of provoking the king, who had a powerful army on foot; whereas the Romans were in extreme want of all things, and no-way in a condition either to face any enemy or purſue their march. He prevailed upon Artuaſdes, what by promiſes, what by his obliging behaviour, to allow his troops winter Artuaſdes. Year after the flood 2962. Before Chriſt 37.

[h] Joſeph. l. i. bell. Judaic. c. 13. & l. xv. c. 5. [i] Oroſ. l. xv. c. 19. [k] Dio. p. 407. Vellei Patercul. l. ii. c. 8. Plut. in Anton. Liv. l. cxxx.

ter-quarters in Armenia; which being granted, he haſtened to the caſtle of Leucocome, between Berytus and Sidon, where he had appointed Cleopatra to meet him. During his ſtay here he invited Artuaſdes into Egypt, pretending to have ſome affairs of great moment to impart to him; but the king, ſuſpecting his real deſign, excuſed himſelf, as tho' the affairs of his kingdom required his preſence. Antony ſuſpecting that the king miſtruſted him, to remove all jealouſy, ſent Q. Dellius to him, with the character of embaſſador, to propoſe a match between the king's daughter and his ſon Alexander, whom he had by Cleopatra; and then removed, as it was now the beginning of the ſpring, to the city of Nicopolis in Armenia Minor. From Nicopolis he diſpatched meſſengers to Artuaſdes, inviting him as an ally of the Roman people, and a friend in whom he repoſed an entire confidence, to come and aſſiſt him with his advice in the war which he was about to undertake againſt the Parthians. The king again excuſed himſelf at firſt, but was in the end prevailed upon, partly by his friends, partly by Antony's promiſes and repeated expreſſions of friendſhip and kindneſs, to wait upon him in his camp, where he was immediately ſeized, and by Antony's order loaded with chains, and forced, thro' fear of a more ſevere treatment, to diſcover his treaſures, which Antony appropriated to himſelf. The Armenians, upon the news of the king's captivity, placed his eldeſt ſon Artaxias on the throne, who, having ventured a battle with the Romans, was defeated, and obliged to ſhelter himſelf among the Parthians, leaving his new kingdom a pray to the inſatiable avarice of Antony, who returning into Egypt with a great booty, entered Alexandria in triumph, Artuaſdes, with his wife and children, being led by his chariot in golden chains. He afterwards preſented them to Cleopatra ſitting in a chair of gold; but neither the king, nor any of the Armenian captives, could be induced to give her the title of queen, tho' Antony had commanded her to be honoured by all with the title of queen of kings. Antony beſtowed the kingdom of Armenia on Alexander his ſon by Cleopatra, whom he married to Jotape the daughter of Artavaſdes king of the Medes. As for Artuaſdes king of Armenia, he was not long after put to death by Antony's orders, and his head ſent as a preſent to his rival the king of Media [1].

Artuaſdes treacherouſly taken, and put in irons by Marc Antony.

Is put to death.

Artaxias II. Year after the flood 2967. Before Chriſt 32.

ARTAXIAS, the eldeſt ſon of Artuaſdes, was by the Armenians proclaimed king upon the firſt news of his father's captivity; captivity; but being overcome by the Romans, as we have mentioned above, was obliged to abandon his kingdom, and fly into Parthia, from whence he soon returned at the head of a numerous army of Parthians and Armenians, and having defeated the Medes who were joined in alliance with Alexander, recovered his paternal kingdom; but did not long enjoy it, being strangled, as Tacitus informs us [m], by the treachery of his nearest friends, or driven from the throne, as we read in Josephus [n], by Archelaus king of Cappadocia and Claudius Tiberius Nero afterwards emperor.

[1] Dio, l. xlix. p. 475. Joſeph. l. xv. c. 5. Oros. vi. c. 11. Plut in Antonio.

ARTAXIAS II. being put to death, or, as others will have it, driven from the throne, the kingdom of Armenia was by Tiberius, whom Augustus had sent to settle the affairs of the east, bestowed on his younger brother Tigranes. Tiberius himself put the crown on his head, honouring him with the title of a friend and ally of the Roman people [o]. Tigranes, after a short reign, was by Tiberius's orders put to death, without any regard to the intimate friendship that had once passed between them, for keeping a private correspondence with the enemies of Rome. He was succeeded, if we believe Tacitus, by his sons [p], who performed nothing worth mentioning, the Armenian kings being now mere deputies of the Roman officers who governed the eastern provinces. Tigranes II.

AFTER the death of Tigranes and his sons, the kingdom of Armenia was given by Augustus to Artuasdes, whom some will have to have been the son of Artaxias II. but the Armenians, already tired with the Roman yoke, drove him out, and called in Phrahates king of Parthia, chusing to live in subjection to the Parthians rather than to the Romans [q]. This revolt gave great uneasiness to Augustus, who, as he was now stricken in years, could neither head the army in person, nor had he any one whom he could trust with the command of it, Tiberius having withdrawn himself from all public affairs. At last he pitched upon Caius, whom he had not long before adopted, a youth of no experience, and quite unfit for such an expedition, being then only in the nineteenth year of his age; however, at the approach of the Roman army, which was commanded, under Caius, Artuasdes II

by

[m] Tacit. l. ii. Annal. c. 3. [n] Joseph. l. xv. c. 5. [o] Sueton. in Octav. c. 9. Dio. l. liv. p. 526. [p] Tacitus, ubi supra. [q] Flor. l. iv. c. 12. Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 100. Tacit. Annal. l. ii. c. 3. Dio, in Zonara & excerpt. a Fulv. Ursino. Sext. Ruf. in breviario.

by Marcus Lollius, whose daughter or niece Caius had married, Phrahates withdrew his army from Armenia, and sued for peace, which Caius readily granted him, on condition that he should give no manner of assistance to Tigranes, who, on the retreat of the Parthians, had caused himself to be proclaimed king [r]. Caius having now to deal with Tigranes alone, drove him in a few days out of Armenia; from whence, the war being ended there and Artuasdes restored to the throne, he marched into Syria. In the mean time Artuasdes, or as some stile him, Artabazes, being dead, Tigranes sent embassadors to Augustus with rich presents, begging of him the kingdom of Armenia. As in his letter to Augustus he did not write himself king, the emperor accepted the presents, and in his answer enjoined him, not without giving him hopes of obtaining his request, to wait upon Caius, who was at that time in Syria [s]; but Tigranes trusting more to his sword than the emperor's fair words, having raised a considerable body of Armenians, made himself master of several strong holds, and thereby got possession of great part of Armenia. This obliged Caius to quit Syria, and march his army back into the countries which he had left a few months before as quite settled. On his arrival, having put to flight and dispersed Tigranes's army, which was not in a condition to make head against him, he sat down before the castle of Artagera. The governor of the place, not at all daunted at the sight of so powerful an army, invited Caius to a private conference, as if he designed to betray the castle; and having insensibly drawn the unwary prince close to the wall, dangerously wounded him, and got safe into the city. This treachery incensed the Romans to such a degree, that betaking themselves to their arms, they carried the place by assault, and levelled it with the ground, after having put all the garrison to the sword(M).

Tigranes III

The

[r] Dio, legat. 39. in excerpt. ab Ursin. edit. [s] Dio, in excerpt. legat. a Fulv. Ursin. edit. Sextus Ruf. in brev.

(M) Florus relates the fact thus (13): Domitius, whom Tigranes had made governor of Artaxata, feigning a revolt, fell upon Caius while he was perusing a paper which he had given him as containing an account of the treasures lodged in the city. He was wounded, adds Florus, but soon recovered. The Romans, having carried the place by assault, set fire to it, into which the governor who was wounded, throwing himself, gave with his death

(13) Flor. l. iv. cap. ult.

The other cities of Armenia ſubmitted to the conqueror, and Tigranes being again driven out, Ariobarzanes, a Mede by birth, was, at the requeſt of the Armenians, placed by Caius on the throne [t]. After the reduction of Armenia, Caius, falling into a lingering diſtemper occaſioned by his wound, reſigned the command of the army, and begged Auguſtus to give him leave to lead a private life in ſome remote corner of the earth, and not oblige him to ſhew himſelf at Rome, ſince the indiſpoſition of his body had, in no ſmall degree, likewiſe affected his mind. Auguſtus entreated him to return at leaſt into Italy; and he, with great reluctancy, undertook the journey, but died at Limyra a city of Lycia [u].

Ariobarzanes did, nothing worth mentioning. He was ſucceeded by Vonones, whom the Armenians choſe for their king, he being driven by his own Subjects from the kingdom of Parthia, which Auguſtus had beſtowed upon him. Vonones was ſoon obliged to abandon his new kingdom by Artabanus king of the Parthians and Medes, who had turned him out of his own. In his room he placed his ſon, by name Orodes, who was not long after overcome by Germanicus, and forced to yield the crown to Zeno the ſon of Polemo king of Pontus, who, after his acceſſion to the crown, was called Artaxias, from the city of Artaxata, where he received the crown from Germanicus [w]. Artaxias enjoyed the crown peaceably for the ſpace of ſixteen years, and was ſucceeded by Arſaces, whom his father Artabanus ſent, upon the news of Artaxias's death to invade Armenia. Arſaces, with the aſſiſtance of the Medes and Ariobarzanes.

Vonones.

Orodes.

Artaxias III.

Arſaces.

[t] Tacit. Annal. l. i. [u] Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 102. Zonar. ex Dion. Tacit. Annal. l.i. c. 3. Sueton. in Octavio. [w] Joſeph. l. xviii. c. 3. Tacit. Annal. l. iii. c. 4. Suet. in Tiberio, c. 49.

death ſatisfaction to Cæſar, who out-lived him. Sextus Rufus in his breviary, follows Florus; but as this had been tranſacted in Parthia, and not in Armenia, ſubjoins, that the Parthians, to atone for ſuch a piece of treachery, did then, for the firſt time, give hoſtages to Octavianus Cæſar, and reſtored the enſigns which they had taken in the Caſſian war. He confounds what Suetonius (14) wrote of the Parthians with what others relate of the Armenians, miſtaking all along Claudius for Caius, which led Jornandes into the ſame miſtake, and alſo Georgius Syncellus in his Greek chronicle.

(14) Sueton. in Octaviano. c. 21.

and Parthians, without much trouble, got poſſeſſion of that kingdom; but was treacherouſly murdered in the firſt year of his reign by his own ſervants, at the inſtigation of Mithridates Iberus and his brother Pharaſmenes king of Iberia, whom Tiberius had ſtirred up againſt him. Artabanus hearing of his ſon's death, ſent back his other ſon Orodes into Armenia, at the head of a numerous army, which was routed by Pharaſmenes, who ſingled out Orodes himſelf, dangerouſly wounded him, and would have diſpatched him, had not his guards come timely to his reſcue. Pharaſmenes being maſter of the field, took ſeveral cities by ſtorm, and amongſt others Artaxata, which he diſmantled. The Parthians being thus again driven out of Armenia, that kingdom was given by Tiberius to Mithridates Iberus [x].

Mithridates Iberus. Year of the flood 2971. Year before Chriſt 28.

In the beginning of his reign, Artabanus, having recovered his own kingdom, invaded Armenia the third time, and reduced great part of it, without any regard to the menaces of Tiberius; nay, in his anſwer to the emperor's letter commanding him to withdraw his forces from Armenia, he upbraids him with his parricides, murders, cruelty, incontinence, and lazineſs; adviſes him to put an end to his ſcandalous and worthleſs life, and rid the world of ſuch an abominable monſter, by laying violent hands on himſelf; and adds, that as he had invaded Armenia, ſo he deſigned, after the reduction of that kingdom, to fall upon Syria [y]. but his deſign was prevented by the governor of Syria, who not only oppoſed his entering into that kingdom, but drove him out of Armenia. In the mean time Caligula, who had ſucceeded Tiberius, conceiving ſome jealouſy of Mithridates Iberus, cauſed him to be ſent in chains to Rome, where he was kept cloſe priſoner till the reign of Claudius, by whom he was reſtored to his kingdom [z]. During his impriſonment at Rome, the Parthians had ſeized on moſt of the ſtrong holds of Armenia, which he ſoon recovered with the aſſiſtance of his brother Pharaſmenes and the Roman legions. The Romans reduced the forts and cities, while the Iberians, under the command of Pharaſmenes, kept the field to make head againſt Demonactes general of the malecontent Armenians, who having ventured a battle, was ſlain, and his whole army cu cut in pieces. This victory put Mithridates in poſſeſſion of all Armenia [a]; but he did not long enjoy his kingdom, being taken off by a ſtorm, which broke out from a quarter whence he leaſt expected it. The fact is thus related by Tacitus [b]; Pharaſmenes had a ſon, by name Rhadamiſtus, a daring young man, of extraordinary parts, and no leſs beloved by his own countrymen for his obliging behaviour, than eſteemed by the neighbouring nations in regard of his military exploits. The uncommon affection which the Iberians of all ranks ſhewed him, joined to the eager deſire which he had betrayed on ſeveral occaſions of aſcending the throne, gave his father, who was advanced in years, no ſmall uneaſineſs. To divert him therefore from attempting any thing upon his own perſon or kingdom, he cunningly turned his thoughts upon Armenia, telling him, that that kingdom belonged of right, not to Mithridates, but to himſelf, who had reſcued it from the Parthians; and that the world might very juſtly condemn him as a mean-ſpirited prince and an unkind father, ſhould he ſuffer his brother to enjoy quietly a kingdom that was due to his own ſon. Having thus inflamed the young man's ambition, they agreed that the ſafeſt way to compaſs their deſign was at firſt to uſe policy; and that Rhadamiſtus, pretending to fall out with his father, ſhould fly to his uncle Mithridates, as not being able to brook the ill-treatment he met with at home from his father and ſtep mother. Mithridates pitying his condition, received and entertained him as if he had been his own child; but this kindneſs did not prevent Rhadamiſtus from privately ſtirring up to ſedition ſuch of the chief men as he found diſaffected to Mithridates; whom after he had gained and diſpoſed for a revolt, feigning a reconciliation with his father, he returned home, and acquainted him to what paſs he had brought matters by policy. Pharaſmenes thinking it now neceſſary to employ force, under pretence that Mithridates had diſſuaded the Romans from lending him any aid againſt the Albanians, ſent his ſon at the head of a powerful army to invade Armenia, and take revenge of ſuch an unnatural proceeding. This unexpected irruption, and the revolt of ſeveral chief lords of Armenia, obliged Mithridates, not knowing whom to truſt, to ſhut himſelf up in the caſtle of Mithridates.

[x] Tacit. Annal. l. vi. c. 31 & 33. Joſeph. l. xviii. c. 6 Dio. l. lviii. p. 638. [y] Sueton. in Tiber. c. 66. Dio. l. li p. 661. [z] Dio. l. lx. p. 670.

[a] Tacit. Annal. l. xi. c. 8 & 9. [b] Idem, Annal. xii. c. 10.

of Gorneas, a place looked upon as impregnable, and defended by a Roman garriſon, Cœlius Pullio being governor, and Caſperius, a man of no leſs honeſty than courage, his centurion. Rhadamiſtus having attempted in vain to reduce the place by force, and tired out his men without making any progreſs in the ſiege, had recourſe to another method, which was to offer the governor, whom he knew to be venal, a large ſum of gold, on condition he delivered Mithridates into his hands. Pullio ſhewed no diſinclination to this propoſal; but Caſperius openly proteſted, that no bribes ſhould ever prevail upon him to betray an ally of Rome, or ſuffer the kingdom of Armenia, a gift of the Roman people, to be ſhamefully ſold; however, he agreed to a ſuſpenſion of arms, with a deſign to try in the mean time, whether he could perſuade Pharaſmenes to call home his ſon, and in caſe of refuſal, to acquaint T. Venidius Quadratus governor of Syria with the poſture of affairs in Armenia. Caſperius was ſcarce departed, when Pullio, lying now under no check, began openly to treat with the enemy, and, being gained with large ſums, forced, rather than perſuaded Mithridates to conſent to an interview with his nephew. The time and place being appointed for the conference, Mithridates went out of the caſtle, attended by a ſmall guard, and was received with all the marks of friendſhip and reſpect by Rhadamiſtus, who falling down at his feet, embraced them, giving him, with great ſhew of tenderneſs, the title of father, and ſwearing by all the gods, that he ſhould not receive any hurt at his hands, either by the ſword, or by poiſon. Afterwards he invited him into a neighbouring grove, pretending he had cauſed a ſacrifice to be got ready there, that the peace might be confirmed, and their antient friendſhip renewed in the preſence of the gods. It was a cuſtom among the orientals in thoſe days, in concluding a peace, or ſtriking an alliance, to join their right-hands, and bind together the thumbs of the contracting parties with a running knot, which, by one of the company, was drawn ſo tight, as to make the blood ſtart out at the leaſt prick. This blood they mutually licked, deeming their friendſhip ever after ſacred and inviolable, as being ratified by each other's blood. The perſon who was to perform this ceremony between Mithridates and Rhadamiſtus, taking hold of Mithridates unawares, threw him down on the ground, and others running in, loaded him with chains, and hurried him away, his wife and little children filling the air with their cries, till they were alſo apprehended, and all all thruſt into covered waggons, where they were kept under a ſtrong guard, till Pharaſmenes's pleaſure was known. That wicked prince, without any regard to the ties of friendſhip or blood, ordered his brother and daughter, who was wife to Mithridates, to be put to death without delay; which order was executed by his ſon, who, mindful of the oath he had taken not to hurt them by poiſon or the ſword, cauſed them to be laid on the ground, and preſſed to death. Mithridates's children, who were very young, underwent the ſame fate, tho' Rhadamiſtus had received no ſuch orders, becauſe they bewailed their father's misfortune. The whole family of Mithridates being thus extinct, Rhadamiſtus took poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Armenia; which when Quadratus governor of Syria underſtood, he ſummoned a council of the chief officers, to adviſe with them about the meaſures that were to be taken on ſuch an extraordinary emergency. He himſelf was for purſuing with fire and ſword the authors of ſo cruel and treacherous an action; but moſt of the counſellors were of opinion, that no notice ſhould be taken of the death of Mithridates, alledging, that it was not their buſineſs to diſcountenance, but rather to promote, all manner of wickedneſs and treachery among the barbarians, that being odious to each other, and divided among themſelves, they might the more eaſily be kept in awe and ſubjection to Rome. They added, that the Roman princes, being well appriſed of this policy, had beſtowed Armenia ſometimes upon one, and ſometimes upon another family, with no other view than to raiſe jealouſies among the enemies of Rome, and ſet them together by the ears. This opinion prevailed; but however, leſt they ſhould forego their right to the diſpoſal of Armenia they diſpatched meſſengers to Pharaſmenes, injoining him to withdraw his troops from that kingdom. In the mean time Julius Pelignus, governor of Cappadocia, a noted coward, and no leſs contemptible for his perſon than infamous for his vices, but highly in favour with the emperor Claudius, with whom he had formerly lived in great intimacy, having drawn together the auxiliaries of the provinces, as if he deſigned to recover Armenia, began to ravage and plunder the neighbouring provinces, without diſtinction of friend or foe. At laſt being abandoned by his own people, he had recourſe to Rhadamiſtus, whom he encouraged, being gained by rich preſents, to aſſume the title of king of Armenia, and aſſiſted in perſon at his coronation; which when the governors of the neighbouring provinces heard, that the ignominy of ſuch an infamous action might not redound upon them, they ſent Helvidius Priſcus with a legion into Armenia, to compoſe the unſettled ſtate of affairs in that kingdom; but were obliged to recall him before he could execute his commiſſion, being informed that Tiridates, at the head of a formidable army of Parthians, was already arrived on the frontiers, with a deſign to aſſert the antient right of his family to that crown.

Mithridates treacherouſly murdered by his nephew Rhadamiſtus.

Rhadamiſtus

TIRIDATES was brother to Vologeſes king of Parthia, who, tho' he laid claim to the kingdom of Armenia as held by ſome of his anceſtors, and had even named his younger brother Tigranes to that crown, as ſoon as he aſcended the throne of Parthia, yet, as he did not care to engage in a war with the Romans, had kept quiet at home during the reign of Mithridates Iberus, whom they had placed on the throne; but when he heard that Rhadamiſtus, by the murder of that prince and deſtruction of his family, had uſurped a crown to which he had no imaginable right or title, he then aſſembled all his forces, and heading them in perſon, marched into Armenia, to aſcertain his claim by dent of arms. Rhadamiſtus, not daring to face ſo formidable an enemy, retired with his Iberians in proportion as the Parthians advanced. The cities of Artaxata and Tigranocerta voluntarily ſubmitted, and the other ſtrong holds were ready to follow their example; but in the mean time winter coming on, which proved very ſevere, and a great ſcarcity of proviſions enſuing, ſuch a mortality began to rage in the Parthian army, as obliged Vologeſes to abandon the enterprize, and in all ſpeed return home.

Rhadamiſtus driven out by the Parthians.

UPON their departure, Rhadamiſtus again invaded Armenia, now more outrageous and bloody than ever, as incenſed againſt a people that had already abandoned him, and were ſtill ready to revolt on the firſt occaſion; inſomuch, that the Armenians, tho' inured to ſlavery, could not brook his tyrannical government. Having therefore formed a conſpiracy, they roſe up in arms, ſecured the king's guards, and inveſted the palace, with a deſign to retaliate upon him his cruelty towards Mithridates; but both he and his wife Zenobia found means to make their eſcape on horſe-back. Zenobia, who was big with child, being ſoon tired with the violence of the motion, and not able to keep up with her huſband, begged him to deliver her by an honourable honourable death from an ignominious captivity. At firſt he embraced her with great tenderneſs, and encouraged her to bear the fatigue of the flight a little longer; but at laſt, finding that ſhe was ready to faint away, and being ſtruck with fear, leſt, if he left her, ſome other might poſſeſs her, he drew his ſcymetar, and having wounded her, dragged her to the banks of the Araxes, committing her body to the water. He himſelf purſued his flight full ſpeed, till he reached Iberia the kingdom of his father. In the mean time ſome ſhepherds finding the body of Zenobia floating near the ſhore, with manifeſt ſigns of life, and gathering from her beautiful aſpect that ſhe was of no mean rank, bound up her wound, and carried her to Artaxata; from whence, her name and misfortune being known, ſhe was conveyed, at the expence and care of that city, to Tiridates, who received and entertained her as a queen [b].

Returns but is driven out again by the Armenians.

Tiridates.

Not long after Rhadamiſtus returned again into Armenia, at the head of a powerful army of Iberians; but was anew driven out by the Parthians, who being ſoon obliged, by their inteſtine broils, to return home, that unhappy kingdom was the fourth time invaded by Rhadamiſtus, and he the ſame year forced by the Parthians, after they had ſettled their own affairs, to abandon it. The Armenians being thus harraſſed, and their country near quite deſtroyed by the Parthians and Iberians, reſolved to ſend a ſolemn embaſſy to Rome, to lay the ſtate of their deſolate nation before the emperor Nero, and beg him to give them a king that could deliver them from the inexpreſſible calamities they groaned under. Hereupon the emperor appointed Domitius Corbulo to ſettle the affairs of Armenia, and divided the forces of the eaſt, ſo that part of the auxiliaries, with two legions, were to remain in Syria, under the command of Numidius Quadratus, governor of that province, and an equal number of allies and Romans was aſſigned to Corbulo, with an addition of the cohorts and other troops which wintered in Cappadocia. The confederate kings were ordered to make ready their forces, and obey either, according to the exigences of the war. The legions were completed, and poſted on the borders of Armenia; bridges were made on the Euphrates, and all things got ready to invade the Parthian territories; however, both Corbulo and Quadratus thought fit, before they began hoſtilities ſtilities, to exhort Vologeſes by meſſages to prefer peace to war, and, by the delivery of hoſtages, to maintain that reverence towards the Roman people which his anceſtors were wont to pay. Vologeſes, to gain time, and to remove, under the name of hoſtages, ſuch as might aſpire to the crown, delivered up the moſt illuſtrious of the family of the Arſacides. They were received by Hiſteius, a centurion, whom Quadratus had diſpatched to the king for this very end; which Corbulo no ſooner heard than he ſent Arrius Varus, prefect of a cohort, to take them; and hence a quarrel aroſe between the centurion and the prefect. The deciſion of the difference being referred to the hoſtages themſelves and the deputies who conducted them, they preferred the pretenſions of Corbulo (N) [c].

[b] Tacit. Annal. l. xii. c. 10.

In the mean time, Vologeſes having, with the utmoſt expedition, drawn together his troops, openly declared, that he would neither ſuffer his brother Tiridates to be driven from a kingdom which he himſelf had conferred upon him, nor to hold it as a gift from any other power. On the other ſide, Corbulo was reſolved to recover what had been formerly gained by Lucullus and Pompey; and moreover, the Armenians implored the protection both of the Romans and Parthians, tho' they were, generally ſpeaking, more addicted to the latter, as being linked with them in marriages, and not unlike in manners. To Corbulo it proved a far greater labour to bring his Troops under diſcipline than to ſubdue the enemy; for the legions brought out of Syria, by a long peace grown lazy and idle, bore with much impatience the toils of war. There were many veterans among them that had never ſtood centry, nor had ever ſeen a camp or intrenchment, having fulfilled the time of their ſervice in cities, where they gave themſelves up to all manner of debauchery. Corbulo therefore, having diſcharged ged such as were unfit for military duties, caused levies to be made in Cappadocia and Galatia, and to these was added a legion from Germany, with some troops of horse, and a detachment from the cohorts. To inure the soldiery to hardships, he kept the Army encamped in the open fields all the whole winter, tho' the frost was so violent, that they could not, without much labour, break the ground in order to pitch their tents. Many lost the use of their limbs by the cold; and some, as they stood centry, were frozen to death. The fate of one soldier was very remarkable; for his hands, as he carried a bundle of wood, mortified, and, as he still clasped the burthen, dropped from his arms, as if they had been cut off. Corbulo himself in a thin habit and bare-headed, whether they marched or worked, was continually encouraging them, more by his example than by speeches. As many, refusing to bear the rigour of the season, began to desert, he had recourse to severity; for he did not proceed as in other armies, where the first and also the second offence was forgiven; but instantly put to death such as deserted their colours. Corbulo had posted his cohorts in convenient places, under the command of Pactius Orphitus, whom he warned not to engage the enemy under any pretence whatsoever, but to keep within his trenches and wait for greater forces; but he, upon the arrival of some few troops of horse, who rashly demanded battle, having engaged the enemy, contrary to the general's orders, was shamefully put to flight. This event gave great concern to Corbulo, who, after having bitterly reproached Pactius and the other commanders, expelled them all from the camp, ordered them to lie without tents or defence, and kept them under this ignominious punishment, till they were released at the intercession of the whole army.

[c] Tacit. Annal. l. xii. c. 2.

(N) This occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between the generals: Quadratus complained, that he had been unjuſtly deprived of what he had compaſſed by his own counſels; and Corbulo on the contrary, maintained, that the king had ſhewn no inclination to deliver hoſtages, till he himſelf, being appointed general, had changed his hopes into fear. Nero, to put an end to their jarrings, ordered by an edict, that, for the ſucceſsful conduct of Quadratus and Corbulo, the laurel ſhould be annexed to their faſces.

Corbulo, having thus brought his soldiers under good discipline, early in the spring invaded Armenia; but could by no means draw Tiridates to a battle, tho' his Army was superior in number to that of the Romans. Having therefore divided his forces, he ordered his several lieutenants to attack at once divers quarters; and at the same time directed king Antiochus to fall upon that part of Armenia which bordered upon his dominions. Pharasmenes too, king of Iberia, having put to death his son Rhadamistus, and thereby freed himself from all apprehension of disturbances at home, ravaged those parts of Armenia which lay contiguous to his kingdom. The Inſechians, a nation never before confederate with the Romans, being gained over by Corbulo, poſſeſſed themſelves of ſeveral ſtrong-holds, and from thence infeſted, with continual incurſions, ſuch as adhered to the Parthians. Tiridates, being thus ſurrounded on all ſides by enemies, diſpatched embaſſadors to Corbulo, to expoſtulate, in his own name and that of the Parthians, upon what ſcore it was, that, after he had ſo lately delivered hoſtages to the Romans, and renewed with them his former friendſhip, he muſt yet be driven out of Armenia, a kingdom ſo long enjoyed by his anceſtors. He added, that his brother Vologeſes had not as yet taken up arms, becauſe they both deſired to put an end to all differences by the way of accommodation, rather than by the ſword; but if war were ſtill to be obſtinately purſued by the Romans, he hoped that the Arſacides would not find themſelves forſaken by that courage and fortune, which their enemies had often tried to their coſt. Corbulo, who was well informed, that not a deſire of peace, but the revolt of Hyrcania was what kept Vologeſes from aſſiſting his brother in perſon, in his anſwer to this embaſſy, adviſed Tiridates to recur to the emperor, and acknowledge his ſovereignty, by accepting the crown as a gift of the people of Rome, aſſuring him, that, by cloſing with the meaſures which he ſuggeſted, he ſhould enjoy the kingdom of Armenia, without any diſturbance from the Romans. Hereupon Tiridates propoſed an interview with the Roman general; for which the time and place being appointed, Tiridates declared, that he would come attended only by a guard of a thouſand horſe, but would not reſtrain Corbulo to any number of troops, provided they came diſarmed, as a proof of their diſpoſition to peace. From this propoſal Corbulo was fully convinced, that nothing but ſnares could be intended; however, diſſembling all his apprehenſions, he returned anſwer, That matters which concerned the intereſt of both nations, would be more properly diſcuſſed in preſence of both armies, and accordingly choſe a place fit for drawing up his forces. On the day appointed, he advanced with his troops in battle array; but Tiridates did not appear till it was very late, and at ſuch a diſtance that he could hardly he heard; ſo that Corbulo ordered his Men to retire to their ſeveral camps; and ſoon afterwards dividing them into three bodies, invaded Armenia, and reduced moſt of the ſtrong holds held by Tiridates. He ſtormed in perſon the fort of Volandum, and put to the ſword all that were arrived to full age, without the loſs of one man. Equal ſucceſs

Tiridates driven out by Corbulo.

ceſs attended the other commanders, who in one day, took three caſtles by ſtorm; inſomuch, that all the others voluntarily ſubmitted. Such a ſeries of good fortune encouraged the Roman general to attempt the ſiege of Artaxata; which Tiridates having in vain endeavoured to prevent, the citizens opening their gates, made an unreſerved ſurrender; whereby their perſons were ſaved, but the city was fired, and laid level with the ground, the walls being of ſuch a wide circuit, that they could not be defended without a numerous garriſon, which Corbulo could not ſpare, and at the ſame time proſecute the war. After the demolition of Artaxata, he marched his army againſt Tigranocerta, which not only ſubmitted to the conqueror, but moreover preſented him with a golden crown, as a token of hoſpitality and friendly reception; whereupon the town was ſpared, and the inhabitants were left in the full enjoyment of their former privileges.

Tigranes.

CORBULO having thus ſubdued all Armenia, Tigranes was preferred by Nero to that crown. He was the ſon of that Alexander who was put to death by his father Herod the Great, and of Glaphira daughter to Archelaus king of Cappadocia. Upon the new monarch Nero beſtowed a guard of a thouſand legionary ſoldiers, three cohorts, and two wings of horſe, to ſupport him in maintaining his new kingdom. As he had lived many years at Rome in the quality of a hoſtage, he was entirely addicted to the Roman intereſt, and aſſumed no more power than if he had been one of their deputies. Several parts of Armenia were ſubjected to the neighbouring kings, Pharaſmanes, Polemon, Ariſtobulus, and Antiochus, by way of reward for their ſervices againſt Tiridates and the Parthians. Corbulo, having thus ſettled the affairs of Armenia, withdrew into Syria, which province was aſſigned to him upon the death of Numidius Quadratus the late governor. In the mean time Vologeſes, hearing that his brother was driven from the throne, and a ſtranger eſtabliſhed king of Armenia, raiſed two powerful armies, one of which he ſent into Armenia under the conduct of Moneſes, an experienced officer; and the other he headed in perſon, with a deſign to make an irruption into the Roman provinces; but Moneſes being obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Tigranocerta, and Corbulo having in time diſpoſed his troops along the banks of the Euphrates, ſo as to obſtruct the enemy's march into Syria, which province Vologeſes intended to invade in perſon, the Parthians ſued for peace, and, at the

the

the threats of Corbulo, withdrew their forces from Armenia; however, Vologeſes, that he might not ſeem to give up his claim to that kingdom, ſent embaſſadors to Rome, to beg it of the emperor for his brother Tiridates; but the embaſſadors returning unſucceſsful, Vologeſes concluded a peace with the Hyrcanians, and turned all his forces againſt the Romans, with a deſign to recover Armenia, and ſettle his brother on that throne at any rate. Cæſennius Pætus, whom Nero had charged with the affairs of Armenia, having notice of his deſign, marched with two legions to the aſſiſtance of Tigranes (O); but was ſoon obliged to return for want of proviſions. He took indeed a few forts, but could not hold them, the Parthians having laid waſte all that part of the country. In the mean time Vologeſes having raiſed a formidable army, took his rout towards Syria, which province he deſigned to invade, and thereby oblige the Romans to withdraw their troops from Armenia; but finding the banks of the Euphrates carefully guarded by Corbulo, he gave over all thoughts of making an inroad into Syria, and turned all his hope and efforts towards Armenia. Here he beſieged Pætus in his winter quarters, who, not having courage enough to hold out till the arrival of Corbulo, who was in full march to join him, deſired a conference with the king. Vologeſes refuſed to come in perſon, but ſent Vacſaes, his general of horſe, to hear what Pætus had to propoſe. In this interview, after a long debate, it was agreed between them, that the Romans ſhould be releaſed from the ſiege; that with all their forces they ſhould depart the territories of Armenia, and deliver up all their fortreſſes and ſtores to the Parthians, who, after a complete performance of theſe articles, ſhould have free privilege to ſend embaſſadors to Rome. In the mean time Pætus laid a bridge over the river

The Romans, under the command of Pætus, ſhamefully driven out of Armenia, by Vologeſes king of Parthia.

(O) Tacitus informs us (15), that an unlucky omen accompanied his entrance into Armenia; for in paſſing over the Euphrates, which he croſſed upon a bridge, the horſe which carried the conſular ornaments, took all on a ſudden a fright, and fled back. Moreover, a victim which ſtood by the works, as they were fortifying their quarters againſt winter, broke violently through, leaped quite over the pales, and fled. He adds, that the ſoldiers javelins took fire of themſelves, which ſeemed the more ominous, becauſe the Parthians, whom they were marching againſt, uſed no other weapons.

(15) Tacitus Annal. l. xv. c. 2.

ver Arſanias, which flowed cloſe to his camp, under colour of marching off that way; but it was in reality a work injoined him by the Parthians, as a monument of their victory, for the Romans took a different rout. Before the Roman army decamped, the Armenians, in an inſulting manner, entered their works, beſet all the avenues, challenged and carried away whatever the Romans had got by plunder; nay, they even ſtripped the Romans of their cloaths, and ſeized their arms, the ſoldiers yielding whatever the enemy thought proper to take, to cut off all occaſion of a quarrel. Vologeſes raiſed a pompous heap of all the arms and bodies of the ſlain, as a monument of his victory; and Pætus withdrew into Cappadocia, marching forty miles a day, and every-where dropping and forſaking his wounded, as if he had been cloſe purſued by the enemy. On his return to Rome, Nero upbraided him with his ſhameful behaviour; but immediately added, that he freely forgave him, leſt the apprehenſion of puniſhment, as he was of ſo fearful a temper, ſhould throw him into ſome dangerous diſtemper [c]. Vologeſes, after the defeat of Pætus, ſent embaſſadors to Corbulo, deſiring him to withdraw his ſeveral garriſons from beyond the Euphrates, and let the river remain, as formerly, the common boundary to both empires. Corbulo too inſiſted, that all the Parthian garriſons ſhould evacuate Armenia; which the king complying with, all the fortifications raiſed by Corbulo on the other ſide of the Euphrates were demoliſhed. Thus, both by the king and Corbulo, the Armenians were left to their own diſpoſal; for Tigranes died ſoon after the invaſion of the Parthians. In the mean time, the embaſſadors of Vologeſes arrived at Rome, deſiring that the kingdom of Armenia might be beſtowed upon Tiridates, and a peace concluded between the Parthians and Romans. They expatiated on the clemency and moderation which Vologeſes had ſhewn to Pætus and the legions, in diſmiſſing them free and unhurt, when it was in his power to have made them all ſlaves, or put them all to the ſword; and added, that Tiridates would not refuſe coming to Rome to receive there the crown; but that, as he was a Magian, the religious laws of his prieſthood with-held him. He was ready, however, to addreſs himſelf to the Roman enſigns and the images of Cæſar; and there, in the preſence of the legions, receive the ininveſtitute of the kingdom. The embaſſadors being heard, it was unanimouſly reſolved in a council of the chief men of the city, that war ſhould be made upon the Parthians, and the whole management thereof committed to Corbulo, who, by the experience of ſo many years, knew both the ſoldiery and the enemy. The embaſſadors were therefore diſmiſſed without obtaining their ſuit, but loaded with rich preſents, thence to give hopes, that, were Tiridates to aſk in perſon, he would not aſk in vain. The government of Syria was committed to Seſtius, and to Corbulo were granted all the forces, which were encreaſed by the fifteenth legion, led by Marius Celſus from Pannonia. Orders were alſo ſent to the kings and tetrarchs in the eaſt, and to all the governors and ſuperintendents of the neighbouring provinces, to pay entire obedience to the orders of Corbulo, who was truſted with the ſame extenſive and unlimited authority, which the Roman people had conferred upon Pompey, in his expedition againſt the pirates. Corbulo having, in the beginning of the ſpring, drawn together all his forces, entered Armenia, took and razed ſome caſtles, and with his very name ſtruck terror into the whole country; inſomuch, that Tiridates ſent embaſſadors to demand a ceſſation of arms, and to agree with him on a day and place for a conference; which being appointed, Corbulo ſent one Tiberius Alexander, an illuſtrious Roman knight, and Vivianus Annius, his own ſon-in-law, to the camp of Tiridates, under colour of paying him a viſit, but in reality to remove from him all apprehenſion of treachery or unfair dealings, which he could not well fear ſo long as he was poſſeſſed of ſuch hoſtages [d]. The king and Corbulo took, each twenty horſe, and advanced to the place of the interview. As ſoon as Corbulo appeared, the king leaped from his horſe, and Corbulo returning the compliment, both on foot joined their right hands. The general commended the prudence and wiſdom of Tiridates for preferring peace to war, and chuſing rather to compoſe their differences by way of treaty than by dint of arms. The king at firſt expatiated on the nobility and ſplendor of his familiy; but purſued the reſt of his diſcourſe with a great deal of modeſty and condeſcenſion, ſaying, that he would travel to Rome, and there preſent a new ſubject of glory to Cæſar, a prince of the Arſacides his ſuppliant, and that at a time when the Parthians

[c] Tacitus Annal. l. xv. c. 4.

Corbulo invades Armenia.

A conference between him and Tiridates.

[d] Tacitus Annal. l. xv. c. 6. & 7.

thians were rather victorious, than daunted by any misfortune. It was then agreed, that he ſhould reſign the royal diadem before the image of Cæſar, never to reſume it more except from the hand of Nero; and thus ended the conference. A few days after the two armies met with great parade and oſtentation. On one ſide ſtood the Parthian horſe, ranged into troops, and diſtinguiſhed by the ſtandards of their ſeveral nations. On the other were poſted the legions with their enſigns diſplayed, and the figures of the deified emperors repreſented like deities in a temple. In the centre was placed a tribunal, which ſupported a chair of ſtate with Nero's image. To this Tiridates approached, and having, according to cuſtom, offered ſacrifices, pulled off his crown, and laid it at the feet of the ſtatue. The ceremony being over, Corbulo entertained the king with a ſumptuous banquet, who ſeemed to be greatly taken with the Roman cuſtoms. The next day he deſired time to viſit his brothers and his mother before he undertook ſo long a journey; and in the mean time left his daughter as an hoſtage, with letters of ſubmiſſion to be ſent to Nero. Thus he departed, and found Pacorus his younger brother in Media, and his elder brother Vologeſes at Ecbatana, who, not unmindful of Tigranes's concerns, had, by a ſpecial embaſſy, deſired of Corbulo, that his brother might bear no marks of ſlavery, nor be obliged to ſurrender his ſword, nor be debarred from embracing the governors of provinces, nor ſtand waiting at their gates for admittance; and that in Rome the ſame honour ſhould be paid him as was paid to the conſuls[e]. He was received at Rome by Nero with the utmoſt magnificence, and entertained during his ſtay in that city, at the expence of above ſix thouſand pounds a day. On the day appointed for his inauguration, the emperor appeared at the roſtra, ſitting in a curule chair, attired with a triumphal habit, and ſurrounded by his guards and their cohorts, with their enſigns diſplayed, and their colours flying. Tiridates approaching his chair, fell down at his feet; but the emperor immediately raiſed him with his right-hand, and honoured him with a kiſs. Then Tiridates pronounced his ſpeech, wherein he begged Nero to beſtow upon him the kingdom of Armenia, which he ſhould always acknowledge as a gift of Rome. Having ended his ſpeech, which was interpreted to the vaſt crowds of ſpectators by a Roman of the prepretorian rank, and pulled off his tiara, Nero, with his own hand, placed the diadem on his head. From the roſtra they proceeded to the theatre, where the emperor placed Tiridates, after he had renewed his ſupplication, on his right-hand. After he had been for ſome time entertained in Rome at an incredible expence, Nero diſmiſſed him, and, on his departure, preſented him with a ſum to the amount of near eight hundred thouſand pounds to defray the expences of his journey [f]. He not only allowed him to rebuild the city of Artaxata, which Corbulo had demoliſhed; but moreover ordered ſuch Roman builders and artificers as the king deſired, to attend him into Armenia. By the direction and aſſiſtance of theſe he reſtored that city to its former ſplendor, and by way of acknowledgment called it Neronia, from the name of his benefactor. He was ever after faithful to the Romans, who aſſiſted him in recovering great part of his kingdom taken from him by the Albani, who, after having over-run Media and driven his brother Pacorus from that throne, had with a mighty army invaded Armenia. Tiridates met them on the frontiers, and having ventured a battle, his army was routed and himſelf narrowly eſcaped being taken priſoner. He reigned nine years after his return from Rome, and was ſucceeded by ſeveral kings, who held the crown as vaſſals of the Roman empire, being either appointed or confirmed by the emperors. In this ſtate Armenia continued till Trajan's time, who, adding Meſopotamia to his dominions, reduced the antient kingdoms of Armenia to the form of a province, and made the Tigris the eaſtern boundary of the empire, which Auguſtus had thought fit to extend no farther than the banks of the Euphrates; but it ſoon recovered its liberty, and was again governed by its own kings in the reign of Conſtantine the Great and his ſucceſſors, to whom the kings of Armenia were feudatories. In the reign of Juſtinian II. the Saracens ſubdued, and held it till the irruption of the Turks, who poſſeſſed themſelves of this kingdom, and gave it the name of Turcomania. The Turks, after the reduction of Armenia, invaded Perſia, and other countries ſubject to the emperors of the caſt, which gave the Armenians an opportunity of ſhaking off the Turkiſh yoke, and ſetting up kings of their own, by whom they were governed till the country was again ſubdued by Occadan, or, as ſome ſtile

Tiridates crowned at Rome by the emperor Nero.

[e] Tacitus, ubi ſupra.

[f] Sueton. in Nerone.

ſtile him, Heccata, the ſon of Cingis and firſt cham of the Tartars. Neither was the conqueſt of Armenia by the Tartars ſo abſolute as to extirpate the race of their kings; ſeeing we read of Heithon, ſirnamed the Armenian, reigning ſome time after, and going in perſon to treat with Mongo the great cham of Tartary, of the concerns of his kingdom; and in our own chronicles we find mention made of Leo king of Armenia, who, in the reign of Richard II. came into England to ſue for aid againſt the Turks, by whom he had been driven from his kingdom. In the year 1472 of the chriſtian æra, Uſſan Caſſanes king of Armenia, ſucceeding to the crown of Perſia, made Armenia a province of that empire; in which ſtate it continued till the year 1522, when it was ſubdued by Selim II. and made a province of the Turkiſh empire. Some ſay, that Selim I. reduced it on his return from Perſia, where he had gained a compleat victory over the great ſophi of Iſmael. But Sanſovin aſſures us, that in the reign of Selim I. who died in 1520, both the Leſſer and Greater Armenia had their own kings; and adds, that Selim cauſed the head of the king of the Leſſer Armenia to be cut off and ſent to Venice, as a mark of his victory. We read no where elſe of any kings of Armenia after it became a province of Perſia. Be that as it will, the Turkiſh annals cited by Calviſius inform us, that Selim II. conquered Armenia in 1522, ſince which time it has ever continued ſubject to the Turks, except the eaſtern part, which the Perſians are maſters of to this day.

SECT. III.

The Hiſtory of Armenia Minor.

ARMENIA Minor was bounded on the eaſt by the Euphrates, parting it from Armenia Major; on the ſouth by mount Taurus, ſeparating it from Cilicia; on the weſt and north by a long chain of mountains, called in different places Mons Scordiſcus, Amanus, and Antitaurus. By theſe mountains it is divided from Cappadocia. It is a very mountainous country; but the mountains are here and there interſperſed with pleaſant and fruitful vales, abounding with with oil and wine no-ways inferior to the beſt of Greece. This country was a part of Cappadocia till the reign of Antiochus the Great, when Zadriades and Artaxias, ſeizing on Armenia and adding it to ſome of the neighbouring provinces, introduced the diſtinction of Armenia the Greater and Leſſer. In the time of the Romans it was divided into theſe four provinces, Laviana, Mariana, Aravena, and Melitene, each of which had their ſeveral cities, all mentioned by Ptolemy; but thoſe of chiefeſt note were Melitene, ſituate in the province of that name, and the Metropolis of Armenia Minor. It was afterwards called Malaxia, and now Suur. It is ſaid by Onuphrius to be a colony of the Romans; and is celebrated by Euſebius and other eccleſiaſtic writers for the piety of the chriſtian inhabitants during the time of perſecution. Nicopolis, built by Pompey in memory of a ſignal victory obtained over Tigranes the Great, whence it is ſtilled Nicopolis Pompeii. Garnace, a ſtrong and well fortified town mentioned by Tacitus, and called Gorneas. Aza, placed by Pliny in Armenia, but by Ptolemy in Pontus. Arabyſſus, Daſcuſa, Zimara, Ladana, and many others mentioned by Ptolemy, of which we know nothing but the meer names. As to the manners, cuſtoms, religion, &c. of the inhabitants of Armenia Minor, they were much the ſame with thoſe of the inhabitants of Armenia Major, of which we have already taken notice.

Kings of Armenia Minor. Zadriades.

THE firſt that reigned in Armenia Minor was Zadriades, who, together with Artaxias, revolting from Antiochus the Great, ſeized on that part of his kingdom which was afterwards called Armenia Minor, as we have mentioned above. He entered into an alliance with the Romans, by whom he was maintained on the throne which he had uſurped. His poſterity held the kingdom of Armenia till the reign of Tigranes I. king of the Greater Armenia, by whom Artanes, the laſt king of the Zadriadan race, was ſlain in battle. We find no mention of the intermediate kings, whence we conclude, that they performed nothing worth mentioning. Tigranes having killed Artanes, and routed his army, poſ-Artanes.

Dejotarus.

ſeſſed himſelf of Armenia Minor; but was ſoon driven out by Pompey, who beſtowed it upon Dejotarus, king, or rather tetrarch, of Galatia, for his remarkable affection to the people of Rome, and eminent ſervices during the Mithridatic war, in which he obtained a complete victory over that king's generals. To Armenia Minor the ſame Pompey added great part of Pontus, and a large portion of Colchis, with ſome pro-provinces of Galatia, which till his time had been ſubject to other princes. Dejotarus lived in great intimacy with Sylla, Lucullus, Pompey, Murena, Cato, Cicero, and Brutus, and was by the ſenate honoured with the title of friend and ally of the people of Rome, for whoſe intereſt he ſhewed on all occaſions ſuch zeal, that Pompey uſed to ſay, Of all the friends of Rome Dejotarus was the moſt hearty; of all their allies the moſt ſincere, and the only one on whom they could entirely rely [g]. He proved very ſerviceable to Cicero in the Cilician war, his troops being trained up after the Roman diſcipline. In the civil war he ſided with Pompey, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the battle of Pharſalia. During his abſence Pharnaces king of Pontus revolting from the Romans, invaded Armenia Minor, and having obtained a complete victory over the joint forces of Dejotarus and Domitius Calvinus, Julius Cæſar's lieutenant in Aſia, got entire poſſeſſion of that kingdom [h]; but he was ſoon driven out by Cæſar, who reſtored Armenia to Dejotarus, whom he pardoned at the requeſt of Brutus, obliging him to relinquiſh the tetrarchy of Galatia, and pay a large ſum of money for joining Pompey in the civil war. Some writers ſay, that Cæſar reſtored the kingdom not to him, but to his ſon. Be that as it will, he retained the title of king, and either alone, or together with his ſon, governed the kingdom of Armenia. He was afterwards accuſed at Rome by Caſtor his daughter's ſon, as if he and his ſon, had plotted againſt Cæſar, with a deſign to murder him during his ſtay in the tetrarchy of Galatia; but was cleared from that charge, by Cicero, who on this occaſion, made the oration which is ſtill extant, and pronounced it in Cæſar's houſe at Rome. Dejotarus revenged this calumny with the death of his daughter and her huſband, and cauſed the caſtle where they reſided to be levelled with the ground [i]. After Cæſar's death he recovered whatever he had forfeited for ſiding with Pompey, having by a bribe of one hundred thouſand ſeſterces, gained Fulvia Marc Antony's wife, who cauſed an edict to be fixed in the capitol, wherein all things were feigned to have been reſtored to him by Cæſar himſelf [k]. New troubles ariſing at Rome upon the death death of Cæſar, Dejotarus ſent a body of troops to join Brutus; but Amyntas, who commanded them, went ſtreight to Antony's camp, as if he had been enjoined by Dejotarus to aſſiſt Antony, and not Brutus; whereupon, after the defeat of Brutus, Dejotarus was allowed to hold Armenia; and the tetrarchy of Galatia, after his death, was beſtowed upon Amyntas. Dejotarus reigned to a very great age, and, as ſome ſay, out-lived his ſon Dejotarus whom Cæſar appointed king during his father's life-time.

[g] Strabo, l. vii. p. 547. Cic. Philip. II. [h] Hirtius cum Appian, l. ii. p. 484. & Dion. xlii. [i] Strabo, l. xii. p. 568. [k] Cic. l. xiv. ad Attic. epiſt. 12. &. Philip. II.

Dejotarus II

DEJOTARUS II. reigned together with his father, and was no leſs addicted to the Romans than he, having been brought up by Cato, as Plutarch informs us [l]. Cicero deemed him one of the beſt friends he had in the world, and even truſted his two ſons to his care during his Cilician war [m]. At his inſtigation Dejotarus joined Caſſius in the civil war that broke out upon the death of Cæſar; but died before the domeſtic troubles of the republic were ſettled. As he left no iſſue, that part of Galatia which he held was beſtowed upon Amyntas and Caſtor his ſiſter's ſon. The family of Dejotarus being extinct, the kingdom of Armenia Minor was firſt given to Artuaſdes king of Media, and afterwards by Marc Antony to Polemon king of Pontus. Polemon was ſucceeded by Archelaus the Cappadocian, and he by Cotys of Boſphorus. Nero beſtowed this kingdom on Ariſtobulus, great-grandſon to Herod the Great, upon whoſe death it fell to Tigranes his near relation, who dying without iſſue, Armenia Minor was by Veſpaſian made a province of the Roman empire, and continued ſo till the diviſion of the empire, when it was ſubjected to the emperors of the eaſt; and, on the decline of their power, ſubdued firſt by the Perſians, and afterwards by the Turks, who gave it the name of Genech, and have held it ever ſince.

[l] Plut. in Catone. [m] Cic. l. v. ad Attic. epiſt. 17, 18.

CHAP.

CHAP. IV.

The hiſtory of the kingdom of Pontus.

SECT. I.

The deſcription of Pontus.

SOME derive the name of this country from the neighbouring ſea, commonly called by the Latins Pontus Euxinus, or the Euxine ſea; others from an antient king named Pontus, who imparted his name both to the country and the ſea on which it lies. But Bochart [n] makes it come from the Phœnician word botno, ſignifying a filbert, as if that kind of nut remarkably abounded here. The word botno, by tranſpoſing, changing, and adding of letters, he transforms into Pontos, in the ſame manner that he might have derived it from a thouſand other words bearing perhaps a nearer ſimilitude to it in ſound, which, in many etymologies, ſeems to be his chief, if not only rule. The country, adds he, gave its name to the neighbouring ſea, and, in proceſs of time, the appellation which was peculiar to one became common to all ſeas; but the common opinion, viz. that the country borrowed its name from the ſea, ſeems by far the moſt probable. That ſea was called by way of excellency the pontus, or the ſea, being the greateſt that was known to the antient inhabitants of that country; whence not only that tract which we are now ſpeaking of, but the whole country extending along the coaſt, was formerly, as Strabo informs us, called Pontus. Name.

THE proper Pontus, as preciſely as we can gather, lies between the forty-firſt and forty-third degrees of north lati[n] Phaleg. l. i. c. 10.

tude, and was bounded by the Euxine sea on the north, by Armenia Minor on the south, by Colchis on the east, and by the river Halys on the west. This country is divided by Ptolemy in three parts, viz. Pontus Galaticus, Pontus Polemoniacus, and Pontus Cappadocius. Pontus Galaticus, so named because added to Galatia in the time of the Romans, extended from the Halys to the river Thermodon. The chief cities in this tract were, Amisus, built by the Milesians, and peopled partly by them, and partly by a colony from Athens, it was at first a free city, like the other Greek cities in Asia; but afterwards subdued by Pharnaces king of Pontus, and made the metropolis of his kingdom. It was taken by Lucullus in the Mithridatic war, and restored to its antient liberty. Eupatoria, close to Amisus, so called from Mithridates Eupator its founder. This city was likewise taken by Lucullus, and levelled with the ground; but afterwards rebuilt by Pompey, who made it one city with Amisus, and gave it the name of Pompeiopolis. It was taken, during the war between Cæsar and Pompey, by Pharnaces king of Pontus, who put most part of the inhabitants to the sword; but Cæsar having conquered Pharnaces, made it again a free city. Amasia, seated among mountains at three miles distance from the river Iris, now Casalmach; from whence there is a trench, as Tavernier informs us, cut out of a hard rock, to convey water to the town. It is still a large place, the capital of this country, and the seat of the governor or beglerbeg. The river, which, about sixty miles below, falls into the Euxine sea, is so large, that ships of burden can come up to the town. It is so defended by craggy mountains, that it is inaccessible, except on one side. It has been customary for the eldest son of the grand-signior to reside here till he is called to the throne. This city was antiently the seat of the kings of Cappadocia, and some marks of its former grandeur still appear in the ruins of very magnificent buildings. It gave birth to Strabo the geographer, and in Christian times was the see of an archbishop. Themiscyra, now Fanagoria, seated on a spacious plain on the sea-coast, sixty miles north-east of Amasia, antiently giving name to the adjoining province, and a city of no small note, being always numbered among the chief towns of this district; but at present a beggarly village. Cabira, memorable for the defeat of Mithridates by Lucullus, and afterwards called Diospolis. Comana, called

Pontica,

Pontica, to diſtinguiſh it from two other cities bearing the ſame name, the one in Cappadocia, and the other in Piſidia. It was ſeated on the ſouth borders of this province, about ſeventy miles from Themiſcyra, and eighty from Amaſia, and in antient times the ſecond city of Pontus Galaticus; but now very inconſiderable.

PONTUS POLEMONIACUS, ſo called by the Romans from Polemon king of this country, on whoſe death it fell to them, extended from the river Thermodon, to the country of the Chalybes, or Pontus Cappadocius. The moſt conſiderable cities of this province are, Neocæſarea, the metropolis after it became a Roman province, and in former times a city of great renown. Sebaſtia, ſo called from Auguſtus, whom the Greeks ſtiled Sebaſtos. This was one of the firſt cities of Aſia that made head againſt Tamerlan, in revenge whereof he cauſed twelve thouſand of the inhabitants to be buried alive in pits dug for that purpoſe. Not far from this city is mount Stella, famous in the Roman hiſtory for the final overthrow of Mithridates by Pompey. On the ſame ſpot, as ſome writers inform us, Tamerlan, with an army of eight hundred thouſand Tartars, encountered Bajazet marching to the relief of Sebaſtia with an army of five hundred thouſand Turks, cut two hundred thouſand of his men in pieces, and took Bajazet himſelf priſoner. Zela, ſeated near the river Lycus, and famous for the defeat of Triarius by Cæſar. This city was enlarged by Pompey, and called Megalopolis. Conſtantine the Great added it to the province of Helenopontus. Polemonium, a famous town and harbour built by Polemon, whom Marc Antony created king of that country. From this town, if we believe Ptolemy, Pontus Polemoniacus had its name. This country is watered by the river Thermodon, and is ſuppoſed to have been the kingdom of the Amazons, who admitted no men among them, and yet were famous for warlike exploits. They are ſaid, or rather feigned, to have been originally the wives of thoſe Scythians, who, in the reign of Seſoſtris king of Egypt, broke into Aſia. A party of theſe Scythians is ſaid to have invaded this part of Pontus, under the conduct of Plinos and Scolopythus, two young men of a great family, who had been driven out of their own country by a contrary faction. They ruled this country for many years; but at laſt both they and their army being all to a man treacherouſly murdered, their wives, under the command of Lampedo and Marpeſia, fell upon the conquerors, and not only overthrew them, but ſubdued the neighbouring nations, and erected a female monarchy, which they enjoyed for ſome ages. The names of their queens that occur in hiſtory, are, Lampedo, Marpeſia, Ortara, Antiopa, whoſe ſiſters Hippolite and Menalyppe are feigned to have challenged Hercules and Theſeus to ſingle combat, and to have been conquered by them with great difficulty. Pentheſilea, who came with a body of brave heroines to aid Priam king of Troy, and was ſlain by Pyrrhus ſon to Achilles; ſhe is ſaid to have invented the battle-ax. Thaleſtris, who, as Juſtin and others inform us, came to viſit Alexander the Great while he was in Hircania, and plainly told him, that her errand was no other than to have a child by ſo great a hero. Theſe warlike women ſuffered no man to live among them; if they brought forth any male children by the converſation they had twice a year with the men of the neighbouring countries, they either killed them, or ſent them to their fathers; but the females they bred up to the uſe of arms. They are ſaid to have extended their empire as far as Epheſus; but coming into Europe, they were defeated by the Athenians, under the conduct of Theſeus, and driven back. But the whole ſtory of the Amazons is deſervedly looked upon as a mere fable, which perhaps had its riſe from the cuſtom which prevailed among the Scythian women of accompanying their huſbands in their wars.

Pontus Cappadocius, ſo called becauſe it bordered on Cappadocia, and was added to that province by the Romans, extended from Pontus Polemoniacus to Colchis, having Armenia Minor and the upper ſtream of the Euphrates for its ſouthern bounds. The chief cities of this tract were, Ceraſus built by the inhabitants of Sinope in Paphlagonia, to whom it paid, as Xenophon obſerves, a yearly tribute. From this town Lucullus brought firſt cherries into Italy, called therefore by the Latins Ceraſa. Tournefort tell us, that the country here is very hilly, and that the hills are covered with woods, wherein cherry-trees grow naturally. Tertullian ironically expoſtulates with the Gentiles for not making Lucullus on this conſideration a god, ſeeing they had beſtowed divine honours on Bacchus for tranſplanting the vine into the weſtern countries. Ceraſus, according to Arrian, was afterwards named Pharnacia; but Strabo and Ptolemy ſpeaks of Ceraſus and Pharnacia as two diſtinct towns. It is ſtill a pretty large town known by the name of Ceraſonte, and ſeated on the ſea-coaſt at the foot of a little little hill between two very ſteep rocks, with a ruinous caſtle built by the emperors of Trebiſond on the top of the rock, which is to the right as you enter the harbour. Tripoli, mentioned by Arrian and Pliny, about three miles from the coaſt, but now reduced to a poor village. Trapezus or Trebiſond, called now Taraboſan, a Greek city, having been founded by the inhabitants of Sinope, to whom it even paid tribute, as we are informed by Xenophon, who paſſed by Trebiſond when he led back the remains of the ten thouſand. It was ſituated on the ſea-coaſt in a peninſula, and ſurrounded by ſteep mountains. The antients ſpeak of it as a city of great note. After the overthrow of Mithridates, who had ſeized it, the Romans reſtored it, as they did moſt of the Greek cities in Aſia, to its former liberty and privileges. This city became famous in the middle ages for the court of the Greek emperors of the family of the Comneni, who reſided here after the Latins had made themſelves maſters of Conſtantinople under the conduct of Baldwin earl of Flanders. Alexis Comnenes was the firſt who reigned here with the title of emperor, though Vincent de Beauvais gives him only the title of lord of Trebiſond. He began his reign in 1204. and David Comnenes, the eleventh in ſucceſſion, was overcome, and cruelly murdered with his ſeven ſons, by Mohamet the Great in 1461, when Trebiſond was taken by the Turks, and Pontus, Paphlagonia, aud Cappadocia, which the emperors of Trebiſond had held, ſubmitted to the conqueror. It is ſtill a very conſiderable city, and a place of great reſort for the trade to Conſtantinople, Caffa, and other places on the Pontus or Black-Sea. It contains twenty thouſand inhabitants, but having ſuffered a great deal in wars, eſpecially in 1617, when it was burnt by the Ruſſians, the buildings are very inconſiderable. The caſtle is pretty large, and built on a rock, out of which the ditches, that ſurround it, are cut. The inſcription that is on the gate of the caſtle ſhews, that the emperor Juſtinian repaired the edifices of the city. It is ſtrange, that Procopius ſhould not mention this, ſeeing he employs three entire books in deſcribing even the moſt inconſiderable buildings erected by that prince in every corner of his empire. That hiſtorian barely tells us, that Juſtinian cauſed an aqueduct to be built at Trebiſond, and called it the aqueduct of S. Eugenius the martyr. The port of Trebiſond, called Platena, is to the eaſt of the town. The emperor Adrian cauſed it to be repaired, as we are informed by Arrian. The harbour which the Genoeſe are ſaid to have made there is almoſt deſtroyed. This town was in former ages a place of great trade, as appears from ſeveral medals produced by Tournefort.

Rivers. THE chief rivers of Pontus are, the Halys, which riſing in the greater Cappadocia, divides Pontus from Paphlagonia, and not far from Amiſus diſcharges itſelf into the Euxine ſea. It flows towards the weſt, and then bends to the north, as Strabo deſcribes it; but all our modern geographers make it come from the eaſt, following therein Herodotus, whoſe miſtake was long ago taken notice of, and corrected by Arrian, who ſurveyed theſe places by order of the emperor Adrian. It took its name, at Strabo informs us, from the ſalt-pits, in which great part of the country abounds through which it flows. The Iris, now Caſalmac, which has its riſe in Pontus, and receiving into its channel the Lycus and the ſmall river of Themiſcyra, falls into the Euxine ſea not far from the Halys. The Thermodon, a river famous among the antients for watering the little empire of the Amazons. It had its riſe near the ſmall city of Pharnaræa in Pontus Polemoniacus, and diſcharged itſelf, like the other rivers of Pontus, into the Euxine ſea.

Soil and climate. THE air of this country is reckoned very wholeſome, and the ſoil in many places fruitful; the hills are for the moſt part covered with olive or cherry-trees, and the plains abound with all ſorts of grain, being plentifully watered with ſmall rivers. The honey of this country is of a very particular nature; the effect it had on the army of the ten thouſand is related by Yenophon. "As there were a great "many bee-hives in the neighbourhood of Trapezus or Tre-"biſond, ſays this author, our ſoldiers having eat greedily "of it, were taken with violent evacuations upwards and "downwards attended with deliriums: ſuch as were the leaſt "affected ſeemed to be drunk, and the others to have run "quite diſtracted: the ground was ſtrewn with dead bodies "as after a battle; none, however, died of it, and the di-"ſtemper ceaſed the next day about the ſame hour that it "began. Ariſtotle was of opinion, that the bees gathered "this honey from the box-trees; and adds, that it depri-"ved thoſe of their ſenſes who were in health before eat-"ing it; and on the contrary, cured ſuch as were alrea-"dy mad. Pliny ſpeaks of it thus; In ſome years the "honey

" honey is very dangerous about Heraclea in Pontus; au" thors know not from what flowers the bees extract
" it. Here is what we have been able to learn of this " matter: there is a plant in those parts called Ægolethron,
" whose leaves in a wet spring imbibe a very dangerous qua" lity: the honey which the bees extract from them is more
" liquid than usual, more heavy and redder; its smell causes
" sneezing; those who eat of it, lie on the ground, sweat
" violently, and care for nothing but coolers. There is " also found on the same coast of the Pontus another " sort of honey called Mœnomenon, because it makes
" those run mad who eat of it. 'Tis thought the bees
" collect it from the flower of the Rhododendros, which " the forrests there abound with. The people of those " parts, though they pay the Romans part of their tribute
" in wax, are very cautious how they offer them their
" honey."

Their origin, arts, sciences, &c.

It is commonly believed, that the antient inhabitants of this country were the descendants of Tubal, but in process of time mixed with Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and other foreign nations, not to mention the many Greek colonies which settled in Pontus, when most of them were reduced by Mithridates the Great and Pharnaces. As for their arts and manufactures, all we know is, that the inhabitants of Pontus Cappadocius called Chalybes are celebrated by the antients for their extraordinary skill in working of Iron, and making of steel armour; whence they are said to have had their name; and truly they seem to have excelled much more in the labours of the hand, than in those of the head. They were very likely a trading people, having many convenient havens on the Euxine sea, and great store of timber proper for building of ships growing on the coast. Their language and religion were much the same with those of Cappadocia, of which hereafter. Their chief deities were, Ceres, Jupiter, and Neptune, to whom they offered burnt-sacrifices, pouring on the fire, honey, milk, oil and wine. In honour of Neptune, they used to drive into the sea chariots drawn by four white horses, which they drowned.

Government

This country was originally a part of Cappadocia, extending from mount Taurus to the Euxine sea, and divided into several petty kingdoms, which, if we believe Diodorus, were first subdued by Ninus. The Medes and Persians were in their turns masters of this and all the countries bor-bordering on the Euxine ſea. The latter divided Cappadocia into two ſatrapies or governments, and beſtowed that part or ſatrapy, which was afterwards by the Macedonians named Pontus, on one of the anceſtors of Mithridates, as Juſtin informs us. This happened, as it is commonly believed, in the reign of Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, who conferred this new kingdom on one Artabazes of the royal family of Perſia; ſo that Pontus, which to that time had been but a province of Cappadocia, began to be ruled by its own kings, and be a ſeparate kingdom in the reign of Darius Hyſtaſpes. However, they paid tribute to the Perſians, and were in a manner their vaſſals till the reign of Ariobarzanes, who ſhook off the Perſian yoke, and greatly enlarged his ſmall kingdom. In proceſs of time the kings of Pontus became very conſiderable, having added to their dominions all Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and great part of Bithynia to the weſt, and of Colchis to the ſouth; inſomuch, that Mithridates VII. ſirnamed Eupator, is looked upon as one of the moſt powerful princes that ever reigned in the eaſt, having held out for forty years together againſt the Romans, though their armies were commanded by the greateſt generals which Rome ever produced, namely by Sylla, Lucullus, and Pompey. The kingdom of Pontus was governed by princes deſcended from Achæmenes of the royal family of Perſia, till the death of Darius, ſon to Pharnaces II. in whom the Achæmenian family ended. Upon the death of Darius, which happened ſoon after the battle of Philippi, the kingdom of Pontus was beſtowed by the Romans on Zeno, who was ſucceeded by his ſon Polemon I. and he by his ſon Polemon II. upon whoſe death, the family of Zeno being extinct, the kingdom of Pontus was made a Roman province in the reign of the emperor Claudius.

SECT.

SECT. II.

The reigns of the kings of Pontus.

THE firſt king of Pontus, we find mentioned in hiſtory, is Artabazes, whom Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes perferred to that crown [o]. Some writers tell us, that he was one of the ſeven competitors to the kingdom of Perſia upon the death of Cambyſes; and others, that he was deſcended from one of them, which ſeems more probable, ſeeing he is not named among them by Herodotus. Artabazes.

RHODOBATES appears next; he is mentioned by Laertius [p], and ſaid to have reigned in the time of Darius Nothus; whence it is plain, that he did not ſucceed Artabazes, who was contemporary with Darius Hyſtaſpes, between whoſe reign and that of Darius II. ſirnamed Nothus, chronologers count above eighty years. Rhodobates.

RHODOBATES was ſucceeded by Mithridates I. who refuſing to pay the uſual tribute to Artaxerxes Mnemon king of Perſia, was by him overcome in battle; but a peace was ſoon after concluded between them by the mediation of Tiſſaphernes. He entered into an alliance with Clearchus, afterwards tyrant of Heraclea, by whom he was betrayed and taken priſoner. For Clearchus, having promiſed to deliver the city of Heraclea into his hands, Mithridates no ſooner entered the town, but he and thoſe that attended him were ſurrounded and diſarmed. The king was detained priſoner till ſuch time as he paid a large ſum for his ranſom, and then diſmiſſed [q]. This is all we read of him in hiſtory. Xenophon gives him only the title of governor of Cappadocia. Mithridates I.

MITHRIDATES was ſucceeded by Ariobarzanes, who, being appointed by Artaxerxes governor of Lydia, Ionia, and Phrygia, employed the forces that were under his command againſt his prince, and not only invaded the kingdom of Pontus, but added to it great part of the neighbouring Ariobarzanes I.

[o] Florus, l. ii. c. 5. Polyb. l. 5.
[p] Laer. in Platone.
[q] Diodor. l. vi.

bouring provinces, which to that time had been subject to the Persians. Autophradates, sent by Artaxerxes to dispossess him of the provinces which he had seized, laid siege to Assos, and at the same time Cotys king of Paphlagonia sat down before Sestus; but were both obliged to withdraw by Agesilaus and Timotheus the Athenian, whom Ariobarzanes had with great promises invited to his assistance. The king, being by their timely arrival delivered from the dangers that threatened him, rewarded Agesilaus with a great sum of money, and bestowed on Timotheus the cities of Erithon and Sestus, which he had not long before taken from the Persians. He used his utmost endeavours, as Demosthenes informs us, to reconcile the Lacedæmonians and Thebans; but not being able to bring the Thebans to any reasonable terms, he assisted the Lacedæmonians with immense sums of money. The Athenians, as the same author acquaints us [r], shewed such an esteem for this prince, that they not only made him free of their city, but granted both him and his children whatever they asked of them. He was murdered, as we read in Aristotle [s], in the twenty-eighth year of his reign by one Mithridates, whom some take to be his son. As the death of Ariobarzanes happened at the time that Alexander the Great invaded Persia, the kingdom of Pontus was seized on by the Macedonians, but recovered by Mithridates II. son to Ariobarzanes, in the reign of Antigonus, to whose share that country fell. This event is related thus by Polybius [t], Florus [u], Aurelius Victor [w], and others: Antigonus having dreamt that he had a field in which gold grew after the manner of corn, and that Mithridates cut it down and carried it into Pontus, began to entertain no small jealousy against him, and even gave private orders for the apprehending of him, with a design to put him to death. But Mithridates, having received from Demetrius timely notice of the king's intention, withdrew into Paphlagonia, attended only by six horsemen. Here, with the assistance of many others that joined him, he possessed himself of Ciniatum, a strong-hold situated near mount Olgasys, and from thence, his army growing daily stronger, made an irruption into Cap-

Mithridates II.

[r] Demosth. orat. contra Aristocrat. [s] Aristot. l. v. Politi. c. 10. [t] Polyb. l. v. p. 388. [u] Flor. l. iii. c. 5. [w] Aurel. Victor, de vir. illustribus, c. 76. & Strabo, l. xii. p. 562.

Cappadocia, and having driven the commanders of Antigonus from that part which borders on Pontus, he entered in triumph his paternal kingdom, which in ſpite of all the efforts of Antigonus he held for the ſpace of twenty-ſix years, and tranſmitted to his poſterity. During his father's life-time he was highly in favour with Artaxerxes Mnemon, having to gratify that prince, treacherouſly murdered Datames, governor of Cappadocia, who oppoſed his deſigns upon that country. He is ſaid to have lived to the age of eighty-four years [u]. Diodorus tells us, that he was put to death by Antigonus for ſiding with Caſſander; he was ſucceeded by his ſon.

MITHRIDATES III. who added to the kingdom of Pontus all Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, as Diodorus informs us [w]. He entered into an alliance with the inhabitants of Heraclea, after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts upon that city. He reigned thirty-ſix years. Mithridates III.

MITHRIDATES III. was ſucceeded by his ſon Ariobarzanes II. who made war upon the Galatians; but with what ſucceſs, we know not. Ariobarzanes II.

MITHRIDATES IV. came to the crown after the death of his father Ariobarzanes; as he was then very young, the Galatians invaded his kingdom, and were attended with ſucceſs; but all on a ſudden turned their forces againſt the free city of Heraclea; but not being able to maſter it, they returned home, and ſuffered Mithridates to recover and peaceably enjoy what they had ſeized. Mithridates IV.

MITHRIDATES V. who ſucceeded his father Mithridates IV. made war upon the inhabitants of Sinope, a Greek city upon the coaſt of Paphlagonia; he made himſelf maſter of all the adjoining places; but finding the whole peninſula, on which Sinope itſelf ſtood well fortified, and garriſoned, not only by the inhabitants, but alſo by their allies the Rhodians, he gave over the enterprize [x]. He afterwards proved a great friend to the Rhodians, and aſſiſted them with money to repair the loſſes they had ſuffered by an earthquake. He entered into a ſtrict alliance with Antiochus the Great, who married one of his daughters, named Laodice. Mithridates V.

HIS ſon Pharnaces I. falling unexpectly on the city of Sinope, took it by ſtorm; whereupon the Rhodians ſent em- Pharnaces I.

[u] Plutarch. in Demet. Appian. in Mithridat. p. 174. & Lucian. in longævis. p. 176. [w] Diodor. l. x. [x] Polyb. l. iv, v, vii.

embaſſadors to Rome to complain of the violent proceedings of the king of Pontus againſt their allies; but Pharnaces was ſo far from being intimidated at the threats of the Romans, that on the contrary he invaded the territories of Eumenes king of Pergamus, a great friend and ally of the republic. Eumenes likewiſe diſpatched embaſſadors to Rome to complain of Pharnaces, and in the mean time entering into an alliance with Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, ſecured his dominions againſt any attempts of the enemy. Pharnaces finding himſelf thus diſappointed, and not caring to engage in a war with the Romans, ſent deputies to Rome to complain of Eumenes and Ariarathes, as if they had been the aggreſſors. Hereupon Marcius and other Roman citizens of great integrity were ſent into Aſia as umpires between the two contending parties, and charged to compoſe, if poſſible, all differences in an amicable manner. Marcius found Eumenes and Ariarathes encamped with a conſiderable army in the plains of Amiſus, but ready to lay down arms, and refer the whole matter to arbitration; whereupon he enjoined them to withdraw their forces from the enemy's country, which they did accordingly, ordering their troops the very next morning to march back into Galatia. But Pharnaces could by no means be prevailed upon to come to an interview with Eumenes, or aſſiſt at any conference where he ſhould be preſent; with much ado they perſuaded him to ſend embaſſadors with full power to treat of ſuch matters as concerned both nations, and to agree to ſuch articles as the arbitrators ſhould judge equitable. The conference being opened, thoſe, who were ſent by Pharnaces, ſtarted ſo many difficulties, that nothing could be ſettled; wherefore Marcius, plainly perceiving that Pharnaces had no mind to come to an agreement, broke off the conference, and returned to Rome. Upon his departure Eumenes took the field again, and Pharnaces on his ſide ſent Leocritus, his commander in chief, at the head of ten thouſand men to lay waſte Galatia, at that time ſubject to Eumenes. Leocritus on his march beſieged the city of Teios, or, as ſome call it, Pius, and having obliged the garriſon, which entirely conſiſted of mercenaries, to capitulate, he promiſed to convey them with their arms and effects to what place they ſhould chuſe; but having ſoon after their departure received expreſs orders from Pharnaces to put them all to the ſword, he purſued them, and ſlew them all to a man [y]. In this war Pharnaces depended upon the aſſiſtance of Seleucus king of Syria, who was already come as far mount Taurus, in order to join him; but being reminded by the Roman embaſſadors of the articles ſtipulated between his father Antiochus and the republic, he thought fit to march back, and leave Pharnaces to ſhift for himſelf [z]. The king of Pontus finding himſelf thus diſappointed, and at the ſame time his dominions invaded by the confederate kings of Pergamus and Cappadocia ſupported by the Romans, condeſcended at laſt to ſue for peace, which was granted him upon the following conditions: that he ſhould forth-with withdraw his forces from Galatia and diſannul all engagements and alliances with the inhabitants of that country; that he ſhould in like manner evacuate Paphlagonia, and ſend back to their reſpective homes with all their effects ſuch as he had carried thence into ſlavery; that he ſhould reſtore to Ariarathes all the places which he had taken during the war, the hoſtages of both kings, all their priſoners without ranſom, and moreover deliver up to them ſuch of their ſubjects, as from the firſt breaking out of the war had fled to him; that he ſhould return to Morzias, a petty king in thoſe parts, and to Ariarathes the nine hundred talents, which he had ſeized in the war, and pay down three hundred more to Eumenes, as a fine for invading his dominions without any provocation. Mithridates king of Armenia, having in this war joined Pharnaces, was by the articles of agreement obliged to pay three hundred talents to Ariarathes for having aſſiſted his enemy, contrary to a treaty of peace and alliance at that time ſubſiſting between them. In this treaty were compriſed Artaxias king of Armenia, Gatalus king of Sarmatia, Acuſilochus another petty king, and the free city of Heraclea, Meſembrya, Cherſoneſus, and Cyzicus [a]. The city of Sinope remained to Pharnaces, and was held by his ſucceſſors till the time of the Mithridatic war, when it was reſtored by Lucullus to its former liberty. The hoſtages for the performance of theſe articles were no ſooner delivered, but the confederate kings diſbanded their armies, and retired home. Pharnaces died ſoon after, and left to his ſon Mithridates

[y] Polyb. Legat. 53. & Diodor. in excerpt. Valeſ. p. 312.
[z] Diodor. ubi ſupra.
[a] Polyb. legat. 59.

thridates the kingdom of Pontus, more weakened by this peace than by all his wars. Pliny tells us [b], that the herb centory had its name in Greek from this king, who is ſuppoſed to have applied himſelf to the ſtudy of botanics.

Mithridates VI.

MITHRIDATES VI. was the firſt king of Pontus that entered into an alliance with the Romans, ſending them a conſiderable ſupply of ſhips in their third war with the Carthaginians [c]. He likewiſe proved a faithful ally to them in the war, which they carried on, at firſt with great loſs, againſt Ariſtonicus, who upon the death of Attalus laid claim to the kingdom of Pergamus. After the defeat of P. Craſſus moſt of the princes of Aſia either ſided with Ariſtonicus, or retired home; but Mithridates could by no offers or promiſes be prevailed upon to abandon the cauſe he had once eſpouſed. On which conſideration he was rewarded by the ſenate with Phrygia Major, and honoured with the title of friend and ally of the people of Rome [d]. Appian tells us, that Phrygia was beſtowed on him, not by the ſenate, but by Manius Aquilius, who ſucceeded M. Perpenna in the command of the Roman forces in Aſia, being bribed thereunto by the king with a large ſum of money [e]. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the ſenate took Phrygia away from his ſon, during his minority, and declared it a free and indepedent ſtate, as he himſelf complains in his ſpeech related by Trogus [f]. Mithridates, after a long and proſperous reign was treacherouſly murdered by ſome of his intimate acquaintance. He left two ſons, of which the elder named alſo Mithridates, ſucceeding him in the kingdom of Pontus, eclipſed all thoſe who had reigned before him, and is generally counted one of the greateſt princes that ever ſwayed a ſcepter. He maintained a moſt bloody war with the Romans for the ſpace of forty-ſix years, and alone gave them more trouble, as their own writers witneſs, than Pyrrhus, Hannibal, and the powerful kings of Syria and Macedon had done altogether. He received many dreadful overthrows, his armies were often cut in pieces, his ſtrong-holds taken and levelled with the ground, and his whole kingdom laid waſte; but ſtill he returned more formidable than ever, as if he had received new ſtrength from his very loſſes; and at laſt in ſpite of all the efforts of

[b] Plin. l. xxv. c. 4. [c] Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 171. [d] Juſtin. l. xxxvii. c. 1. [e] Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 177. & 208. & l. i. bell. civil. p. 362, 363. [f] Juſtin. ubi. ſupra.

of his powerful adverſaries, died a voluntary death in his own kingdom, which he tranſmitted to his poſterity. We ſhall give here a ſhort, but diſtinct account of his war with the Romans, commonly called the Mithridatic war, it being one of the greateſt and moſt expenſive that the republic ever waged.

MITHRIDATES VII. ſirnamed the Great, was according to Strabo, eleven years old; according to Eutropius, twelve; and according to Memnon, thirteen; when he came to the throne. His future greatneſs was foretold, if Trogus may be credited [g], by two comets, one of which appeared at his birth, and the other the firſt year of his reign. Both theſe comets were ſeen for ſeventy days and ſeventy nights together; their ſplendor was ſuch as to eclipſe the ſun, and raiſe in peoples minds the dread of a final conflagration. They covered the fourth part of the heaven, and in raſing or ſetting took up the ſpace of four hours (P). Mithridates VII. Year of the flood, 2875. Year before Chriſt 124.

MITHRIDATES began his reign with moſt inhuman and unnatural acts of cruelty practiſed on his mother and neareſt relations. His father by his laſt will appointed him and his mother joint heirs to the kingdom; but he claiming the whole, threw his mother into priſon, where he kept her under cloſe confinement, till through hard uſage ſhe ended her days [h]. Servius ſays, that he poiſoned her, that he might being then but a child lie under no check [i]. Thoſe, to whom the [g] Juſtin. l. xxxvii. c. 2, & 3. Photii, c. 32. Strab. l. x. p. 477. [h] Memnon, in excerpt. Juſtin. l. xxxvii. c. 1. [i] Servius, in Virgil. l. vi. Æneid.

(P) That which happened at his birth muſt be the comet which Seneca mentions in the following words (16): "In the "reign of king Attalus there appeared a comet, which being "ſmall at firſt, afterwards ſpread itſelf as far as the equinoctial "circle, ſo that its extent equalled that region of the heaven "which we call the milky way." If this comet appeared, as Seneca affirms, in the reign of Attalus, we muſt allow Mithridates, with Eutropius (17), and Oroſius (18), who uſually follow Livy, ſeventy-two years of life; for had he lived only ſixty-eight or ſixty-nine, as Appian inſinuates (19), the comet had appeared after the death of Attalus, and not in his reign, as Seneca ſays.

(16) Seneca, lib. vii. c. 15. (17) Eutrop. lib. vi. (18) Oroſ. lib. vi. c. 5. (19) Appian p. 249.

the care of his education was committed, obſerving him to be of a cruel and unruly temper, made various attempts on his life, but could never compaſs their deſign, he being always on his guard, and armed, even in ſo tender an age, againſt all manner of treachery, without ever ſhewing the leaſt diffidence (Q). In his youth, to inure his body to hardſhips, he applied himſelf to the manly exerciſe of hunting, paſſing whole months in the open fields, and often taking his reſt amidſt the frozen ſnow. When he came of age, he married his own ſiſter, by name Laodice, a thing frequently practiſed in thoſe days by the eaſtern kings, and had by her a ſon named Pharnaces. Having now an heir to his kingdom, and aſpiring to nothing leſs than the empire of all Aſia, attended with a few friends, he undertook a progreſs through the various kingdoms of that great continent, with a deſign to obſerve the cuſtoms, laws, and manners of the inhabitants, to learn their different languages, whereof he is ſaid to have ſpoke twenty-two, to take an eſtimate of their ſtrength, and above all, to view narrowly their ſtrong-holds, and fortified towns. In this journey he ſpent three years, during which time it being noiſed abroad that he was dead, his wife Laodice gave

(Q) Juſtin tells us (20), that his governors made him ride and perform his exerciſes on a wild and unmanageable horſe, which he governed with ſuch ſkill and dexterity, that his very enemies could not but admire and applaud him. They had afterwards recourſe to poiſon; but he being appriſed of their treacherous deſigns, armed himſelf againſt them with ſuch antidotes and preſervatives, that when he attempted in his old age to poiſon himſelf, the moſt exquiſite poiſons rather nouriſhed than deſtroyed the conſtitution of his body. Martial (21) ſays, that he was from his infancy ſo accuſtomed to take poiſon, that in his old age no poiſon could hurt him.

Profecit poto Mithridates ſæpe veneno,
Toxica ne poſſent ſæva nocere ſibi.

He was the inventor of Mithridate, which borrowed its name from him, as Pliny, Paulus, Ægineta, Cornelius Celſus, Gellius, Galen witneſs, and Q. Serenus in the following verſes.

Antidotus vero multis Mithridatica fertur
Conſociata modis: ſed magnus ſcrinia regis
Cum raperet victor, vilem deprendit in illis
Syntheſin, & vulgata ſatis medicamina riſit.

(20) Juſtin. l. xxxvii. c. 2. (21) Mart, lib. v.

gave herſelf up to all manner of lewdneſs; and having brought forth a ſon by a criminal converſation with one of the lords of her court, to conceal her guilt, and avoid the juſt reſentment of her provoked huſband, welcomed him on his return with a poiſoned potion which had no other effect but to incenſe him more againſt her, and haſten her own deſtruction, which was ſoon effected by his order, all thoſe being involved in the ſame puniſhment, who were any ways acceſſory to her incontinence and diſloyalty [k].

Invades Paphlagonia.

AND now thinking it time to put in execution his vaſt deſigns, he invaded, and eaſily reduced the neighbouring kingdom of Paphlagonia, which he divided with his friend and ally Nicomedes king of Bithynia. As the Romans had not long before declared Paphlagonia a free ſtate, they ſent embaſſadors to both kings, enjoining them to withdraw their forces, and reſtore that nation to its former condition. Mithridates returned anſwer, that Paphlagonia had belonged to his father, and therefore was his by inheritance, adding, that he could not well underſtand why the Romans, without being appealed to, ſhould trouble themſelves about controverſies ariſing among the princes of Aſia. The embaſſadors threatened him with war; but he was ſo far from being intimidated by their menaces, that from Paphlagonia he marched directly into Galatia, which he made himſelf maſter of, though it was at that time under the protection of the people of Rome. Having thus reduced Paphlagonia and Galatia, the next kingdom he caſt his eyes upon was that of Cappadocia, held at that time by Ariarathes, who had married his ſiſter, and with whom he had lived in great friendſhip. As Ariarathes was one of the moſt powerful princes in all Aſia, and a great favourite of the Romans, in whoſe ſervice his father had been killed, during their war with Ariſtonicus, Mithridates thought it ſafer to attempt the accompliſhing of his deſigns by treachery, than by dint of arms, and accordingly bribed one Gordius privately to diſpatch him. Upon his death Nicomedes king of Bithynia invaded Cappadocia, and having driven out the ſon of the deceaſed prince, married his widow in hopes of eſtabliſhing himſelf by that means on the throne. This gave Mithridates a plauſible pretence of falling upon Cappadocia, and at the ſame time of weakening his former ally, but now rival, Nicomedes. For under pretence of reſtoring his nephew, he made war upon Nicome-

And Cappadocia.

[k] Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

des, and drove him quite out of Cappadocia. As this war gained him the reputation, not only of gallantry, but good-nature, (for no body imagined that he had any hand in the murder of Ariarathes) out of a certain regard to public fame he reſtored the kingdom of Cappadocia to its lawful owner, and marched his troops back into his own territories. But ſoon after repenting what he had done, and preferring power to fame, he began to ſeek ſome pretence of quarrelling with his nephew. With this view he preſſed him to recall from baniſhment Gordius, who had aſſaſſinated his father; which the young prince highly reſenting, and Mithridates threatening to bring him back by force of arms, matters were brought by degrees to that paſs, that both princes took the field. Mithridates entered Cappadocia at the head of an army conſiſting of eighty thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, and ſix hundred chariots armed with ſcythes, hoping with ſuch a powerful army to carry all before him; but finding his nephew ready to receive him with a ſtrength no-ways inferior to his own he altered his deſign; and feigning a deſire of reconciliation, invited him to a conference; which the young prince willingly agreeing to, Mithridates in ſight of both armies ſtabbed him with a dagger, which he had concealed in the plaits of his garment (R). This barbarous and unexpected piece of treachery ſtruck the Cappadocians with ſuch terror and amazement, that they immediately threw down their arms, and ſuffered Mithridates without any moleſtation to ſeize on all the ſtrong-holds of the kingdom, which he reſigned to his ſon a child but eight years old, calling him Ariarathes, a name peculiar to the kings of Cappadocia, and committing both him and the whole management of his affairs to the care of Gordius. But the Cappadocians, diſdaining to be ruled by a public aſſaſſin, ſhook off the tyrannical yoke, and placed on

(R) It was a cuſtom in antient times among kings, as Juſtin informs us (22), to ſend perſons of diſtinction to ſearch each other before they met, leſt any treacherous deſigns might be carried on under colour of a friendly conference. The perſon who was appointed to ſearch Mithridates, being very buſy in looking for ſome weapon under his belly, the king deſired him to take heed leſt he ſhould find there a weapon of a very different nature from that which he was ſo carefully looking for. This jeſt raiſed in the ſpectators a loud laughter, and made the ſearcher deſiſt from any farther enquiries; by which means the dagger, which Mithridates had brought, was concealed.

(22) Juſtin. lib. xxxviii. c. 1.

on the throne the brother of their late king, who to that time had kept himself concealed in some city of Asia. But his reign was short, being soon driven out by Mithridates, and the Cappadocians again brought under subjection. The unhappy prince seeing himself thus stript of his paternal kingdom, and reduced to the utmost misery, no body daring to entertain him through fear of Mithridates, died of grief in the very flower of his age; and in him was extinct the family of Pharnaces, which had ruled over Cappadocia from the time of Cyrus the Great.

Upon his death Nicomedes king of Bithynia, being jealous of the overgrown power of Mithridates, and fearing left he should fall upon his dominions, if he were suffered to enjoy quietly the neighbouring kingdom of Cappadocia, suborned a youth of a comely and majestic aspect to pass himself upon the Romans for the son of Ariarathes, as if he had left three sons, and not two only, as was commonly believed. The youth being well instructed how to behave himself, and what he should say, set out for Rome; and there presenting himself before the senate, complained with tears in his eyes of the monstrous and unnatural cruelty of his uncle Mithridates, bewailed the untimely death of his brothers, expatiated on the services of his grandfather, who had lost his life in the cause of the republick; and concluded his speech by entreating them to convince the world of the tender regard they had for their friends, by restoring to his paternal kingdom the grandson of one, whom they had thought fit to honour with that glorious title. The senate was no less affected by his speech, than taken by his modesty, address, and gracious mien. Being ordered to withdraw, Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes and sister to Mithridates, who upon her husband's death had married Nicomedes, as we have hinted before, came in and deposed that she had three sons by her former husband Ariarathes, of which the petitioner was one. Whereupon the senate with many kind and grateful expressions promised to espouse his cause, and never forsake him, till he was reinstated in the kingdom of his forefathers. But in the mean time Mithridates receiving notice of the plot, dispatched Gordius to Rome to disclose it to the senate, and assure them, that the child, whom he had preferred to the crown, was the lawful son of Ariarathes. This unexpected embassy raised a strong suspicion of both kings in the minds of the senators, who thereupon examining more narrowly into the matter, and discovering the deceit, commanded Mithridates to relinquish Cappadocia, and Nicomedes Paphlagonia. Both these states were by a decree of the senate declared free; but the Cappadocians, protesting that they could not live without a king, were allowed to chuse one of their own body. Mithridates used great interest in behalf of Gordius; but he being excluded by the Romans, Ariobarzanes was preferred to the crown by the majority of votes, as Strabo informs us, or, as Justin has it, by appointment of the senate.

And now the Romans, growing jealous of the power of Mithridates, and the sway which he bore among the princes of Asia, sent L. Cornelius Sylla into Cappadocia under appearance of an embassy, but in reality to disappoint the measures which he was pursuing, and the steps he was taking to grasp the empire of all Asia. Sylla with a handful of men defeated Gordius, cut in pieces his army composed of Cappadocians and Armenians, and settled, according to the decree of the senate, Ariobarzanes on the throne. But Sylla had no sooner set out for Rome, than Mithridates, who had suffered his son to be driven from the throne of Cappadocia, as if that no-ways concerned him, stirred up Tigranes king of Armenia against Ariobarzanes, who, upon his approach abandoning the kingdom, fled to Rome. Tigranes, having without the loss of one man possessed himself of Cappadocia, placed anew on the throne Ariarathes, son to Mithridates, and restored all things to the state they were in before the arrival of Sylla. At the same time Nicomedes Philopator, king of Bithynia, dying, Mithridates invaded that kingdom, and drove out his natural son, named also Nicomedes, whom the Romans had appointed to succeed him, placing in his room his own brother Socrates, sirnamed Chrestus, or the Thrifty. Nicomedes likewise fled to Rome, where it was decreed by the senate, that both he and Ariobarzanes should be restored to their kingdoms. In pursuance of which decree, Manius Aquilius, who had then ended the servile war in Sicily, and Marcus Altinius, being sent into Asia in quality of legates, and there joined by the forces of Lucius Cassius governor of Asia Pergamena, or Asia Proper, and by the auxiliaries of the allied kings, Nicomedes was reinstated in the kingdom of Bithynia, and Ariobarzanes in that of Cappadocia. The legates according to their instructions charged both kings to Seizes on Bithynia.

to make frequent inroads into the neighbouring territories of Mithridates, and practiſe there whatever hoſtilities they could, aſſuring them of the powerful aſſiſtance of the Romans in caſe he ſhould reſent the provocation. This the legates did to pick a quarrel with Mithridates, who, not thinking himſelf as yet a match for the Romans, had tamely ſuffered both his brother and his ſon to be driven out of the kingdoms which they had uſurped. Ariobarzanes could by no means be induced to provoke ſo powerful a neighbour; but Nicomedes, being partly with promiſes, partly with menaces, prevailed upon to comply with the injunctions of the legates, entered Pontus in a hoſtile manner, and putting all to fire and ſword, laid waſte whole provinces, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition. For Mithridates, to juſtify in the eyes of the world the war which he had long deſigned againſt the Romans, had ordered his lieutenants to forbear returning any hoſtilities, till ſuch time as he had laid his complaints before the legates. This he did ſoon after, ſending one Pelopidas to expoſtulate with them about the proceedings of Nicomedes. But the legates returning anſwer, that he having been the firſt aggreſſor, Nicomedes had but paid him in his own coin, and that they would not ſuffer him to uſe any violence againſt their friend and ally, Mithridates thought it high time, having on foot a numerous and well-diſciplined army, to enter upon action; and accordingly ſent his ſon Ariarathes into Cappadocia, who put to flight the united forces of Ariobarzanes and Altinius the Roman legate, and anew took poſſeſſion of that kingdom. At the ſame time Nicomedes making inroads into Pontus, Mithridates, to gain time, and make the Romans believe that he was ſtill inclined to a peace, diſpatched embaſſadors to Rome to beg of the ſenate, that, if Nicomedes was their friend, they would oblige him by their authority to forbear giving him any further moleſtation; but if they accounted him an enemy, they would give him leave to do himſelf juſtice, and repel force by force. The ſenate, being well appriſed of Mithridates's views, replied, that Nicomedes had done nothing without juſt provocation, and therefore they ſaw no cauſe why they ſhould lay any injunctions on him; whereas they had many things to enjoin Mithridates, but above all, to reſtore without further delay the kingdom of Cappadocia to its lawful owner, and conclude a ſpeedy peace with their friend and ally Nicomedes, on pain of being accounted an enemy to Rome, and treated accordingly. With this anſwer, the embaſſadors were diſmiſſed, and the ſame day ordered to depart the city; but before their departure charged to acquaint their maſter, that the people of Rome would admit of no embaſſadors from him, till ſuch time as he had complied with theſe their commands [k].

In the mean time the legates in Aſia drawing together what forces they could muſter in Bithynia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Galatia, and being joined by Caſſius governor of Aſia, took the field without waiting for the determination of the ſenate. They divided their army into ſeveral ſmall bodies: Caſſius encamped on the confines of Bithynia and Galatia; Aquilius with his body poſſeſſed himſelf of the avenues leading from Pontus into Bithynia; Q. Oppius ſecured the entrance into Cappadocia; and Minutius Rufus and C. Popilius admirals lay with a fleet of three hundred ſail at Byzantium, to prevent the enemy from entering into the Euxine ſea. Each of the generals had an army of forty thouſand men under his command, beſides a body of fifty thouſand foot and ſix thouſand horſe, which Nicomedes brought to their aſſiſtance [l].

On the other ſide, Mithridates, having enticed many of the neighbouring nations to join him againſt the Romans, found at the general rendezvous, that his whole ſtrength conſiſted of two hundred and fifty thouſand foot, fifty thouſand horſe, a hundred and thirty chariots armed with ſcythes, three hundred ſhips, and one hundred gallies. Nicomedes, as he was on his march to take poſſeſſion of an important poſt, according to the direction of the Roman generals, happened to fall in with a numerous body of the enemies; whereupon a bloody battle enſued, the victory inclining ſome time to one ſide, and ſome time to another. The fight laſted many hours, both armies behaving themſelves with the utmoſt gallantry and reſolution. But at laſt the Bithynians, though far ſuperior in number, being put in diſorder by the armed chariots, which mowed down entire files, betook themſelves to flight, leaving behing them their baggage, money, and proviſions, which fell to the conqueror. Nicomedes, the greater part of his men being ſlain, with much ado got into Paphlagonia, and from thence marched with the remains of his ſcattered army to join Caſſius. Nicomedes being thus driven Defeats the Bithynians.

[k] Liv. l. lxxiv. Appian. Mithridatic. p. 177, & 179. Dio legat. 31. [l] Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 179.

driven out of the field, Mithridates detached part of his army, under the command of Neoptolemus and Nemanes an Armenian, to fall upon Aquilius, who guarded the paſſes leading into Bithynia with an army of forty thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe. Upon their approach Aquilius withdrew his forces in good order, but being purſued cloſe, and harraſſed on his march by the enemy, he reſolved to venture a battle, which proved very unſucceſsful, ten thouſand of his men being killed on the ſpot, three hundred taken priſoners, and the reſt quite diſperſed. The legate himſelf, attended by a ſmall body of horſe, having the ſame night reached the river Sangarius, ſwam over, and arrived ſafe at Pergamus [m]. Upon the news of this double overthrow, the other Roman generals abandoned their poſts, and left Mithridates maſter of the field. The fleet alſo diſperſed, and the greater part of the ſhips were either taken or ſunk by the king's admirals. Mithridates reſolved to improve the opportunity which now offered of accompliſhing his deſigns; and, driving the Romans quite out of Aſia, over-ran all Phrygia, Myſia, Aſia Proper, Caria, Lycia, Pamphylia, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and whatever other countries either belonged to, or had ſided with, the Romans, as far as Ionia. He was received every-where with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy, the inhabitants flocking to him in white garments, and calling him their father, their deliverer, their god, the great and ſole lord of all Aſia [n]. What thus gained him the affections of the people, was his kind uſage to the priſoners he had taken in the two engagments; for he not only ſent them all home without ranſom, but furniſhed with good ſtore of proviſions, and even money to defray the expences of their journey. This piece of good-nature was every-where ſo cried up by his friends, and had ſuch an effect on the minds of his enemies, that all the nations of Aſia ſhewed an ambition to live under the mild government of ſo clement a prince. Embaſſadors came flocking to him from all parts, and among others thoſe of Laodicea on the Lycus, to whom the king promiſed his protection, on condition they delivered up to him Q. Oppius, governor of Pamphylia, who had retreated thither. The inhabitants readily complied with his deſire desire, and sent Oppius to him in chains, ordering lictors to walk before him with their fasces in derision of the Roman pride and ostentation. Mithridates was overjoyed to see a Roman general and a proconsul his prisoner; and his joy was soon after encreased by the delivery of Manius Aquilius, whom the Lesbians, revolting from the Romans, sent to him in fetters with many other Romans of distinction. As he had been the chief author and promoter of the war, Mithridates, led him about with him, whithersoever he went, either bound on an ass, or on foot coupled to one Bastarnes, a public malefactor, forcing him to proclaim with his own mouth to the crowds flocking to see him, that he was Manius Aquilius the Roman legate. When he came to Pergamus, he caused him first to be publicly whipt, afterwards to be put upon the rack, and lastly melted gold to be poured down his throat, upbraiding thereby the Romans in general, and him in particular, with avarice, bribery, and corruption [o].

Over-runs the greateſt part of Aſia.

[m] Appian. comparat. cum. Memnon. & Liv. l. lxxvii Strab. l. xii. p. 562.

[n] Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſii, p. 401. Athen. l. v. c. 11. Memnon. c. 33. Liv. l. lxxvii. Appian. p. 183.

Puts Manius Aquilius to a cruel death.

Mithridates after so many conquests being now looked upon as invincible, all the free cities of Asia opened their gates to him; he was received at Magnesia, Mitylene, and Ephesus with loud acclamations; the latter, to ingratiate themselves with him, pulling down all the monuments which the Romans had erected. His generals too were attended with like success, the cities, where-ever they appeared, voluntarily submitting to them, and contributing large sums of money to defray the charges of the war. By this means he amassed such treasures as enabled him to maintain several numerous armies on foot for the space of five years, without levying any taxes or tributes on his subjects [p].

As most of the provinces subdued by Mithridates were either subject or allied to Rome, many Roman citizens had settled in the chief cities, and were dispersed all over Asia. Mithridates considering these as so many spies, who would not fail to observe his motions and acquaint the senate with his designs, took the most cruel and inhuman method of ridding himself of them that had been heard of till his time, but has been practised in after-ages by other nations. He dispatched private letters to all the governors and magistrates of the cities where the Romans resided, enjoining them, on pain pain of death and utter destruction of their country, to cause all of the Italian race, women and children not excepted, to be murdered on the thirtieth day from the date of his letters, and to let their bodies lie unburied in the open fields. One moiety of their goods was to be forfeited to the king, and the other bestowed as a reward on the assassins. Whatever slave murdered his master was to receive his liberty, and one-half of the debt was to be remitted to the debtor that should kill his creditor. Whoever concealed any of the Italian race, under what pretence soever, was to be punished with immediate death (R). When the fatal day came, a day as Tully calls it, of horror and confusion, the gates of the cities being shut, and all the outlets beset with soldiers, the king's orders were proclaimed; which caused an universal alarm and consternation, not in those only, who were destined to die, but in such of the natives too as had the least spark of humanity, seeing themselves obliged either to betray and barbarously murder their innocent guests, friends, and relations, or be liable themselves to a cruel death. However, as most of the Asiatics bore a mortal hatred to the Romans, and were moreover animated by the promise of an ample reward, the king's orders were without delay put in execution, and all Asia in one day turned into a shambles [n]. The inhabitants of Ephesus, where Mithridates then resided, dragged such as had taken sanctuary in Diana's temple from the very statue of the goddess, and put them to the sword. The Pergamenians discharged showers of darts upon them, as they embraced the statues in the temple

[o] Liv. l. lxxviii. Athenæus ubi supra. Appian. p. 184. Plin. l. xxxiii. c. 3. Cicero in orat. pro lege Manil. & lib. v. Tusculan. quæst. [p] Justin. l. xxxviii. c. 3.

Orders all the Romans in Asia to be massacred. Year of the flood 2911. Before Christ 88.

[n] Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 185. 206. 209. 212. Cic. in Orat. pro lege Manil. & pro Flacco. Memnon. in excerpt. c. 33. Liv. l. lxxviii. Velleius Patercul. l. ii. c. 18, Flor. l. iii. c. 5. Eutrop. l. v. Oros. l. vi. c. 2, &c.

(R) Theophanes the Mitylenian, who wrote the life of Pompey, tells us, that P. Rutilius Rufus, a man of proconsular dignity, who had been banished Rome, and lived at that time in Asia, put Mithridates upon this barbarous resolution; and adds, that Pompey found in the fort Caino, amongst many other valuable books, an oration composed by Rutilius, wherein he stirred up the king to this massacre (23). But Tully assures us (24), that Rutilius had no hand in it, having saved himself by disguising his condition with a philosopher's mantle, and in that garb making his escape, as some others did, out of Asia undiscovered.

(23) Plutarch. in Pomp. (24) Cic. pro C. Rabinio Posthamo.

temple of Eſculapius. At Adramyttium in Myſia many were murdered in the water, while they were attempting with their children on their backs to ſwim over to the iſland of Leſbos. The Caunians, who not long before had been delivered by the Romans from the yoke of the Rhodians, and reſtored to their ancient privileges, excelled in cruelty all the reſt; for, as if they had apoſtatized from human nature, they took pleaſure in tormenting and butchering the innocent children under their mothers eyes, ſome of them running diſtracted, and others dying for grief at a ſight which nature could not bear. The Trallians were the only people on the continent, who could not find in their hearts to imbrue their hands in the blood of their innocent gueſts. However, as the king's orders were peremptory, they hired one Theophilus a Paphlagonian to diſpatch the few Romans that lived among them. He having ſhut them all up together in the temple of Concord, firſt cut off their hands as they embraced the ſtatues of the gods, and then hacked them to pieces [o]. Many Romans were ſaved on the floating iſlands of Lydia, called Calaminæ, where they concealed themſelves till ſuch time as they found an opportunity of making their eſcape out of Aſia [p]; but nevertheleſs a hundred and fifty thouſand Roman citizens were maſſacred that day, according to Plutarch and Dion [q]; but according to others only eighty thouſand [r].

MITHRIDATES, having thus got rid of ſuch as could any ways diſturb him in the quiet poſſeſſion of his conqueſts on the continent, embarqued great part of his forces in order to reduce the adjacent iſlands. He ſailed firſt to Cos, where he was joyfully received by the natives, who delivered up to him Alexander, the ſon of Alexander, who being driven from the throne of Egypt was killed by Chareas a ſea captain, as he was retiring in a ſmall veſſel to Cyprus. With the young prince they put into the king's hands vaſt ſums of money, with all the golden veſſels and jewels to an immenſe value, which his grandmother Cleopatra had left with him, and had been amaſſing for many years. To the young prince Mithridates gave an education ſuitable to his birth, and ever treated him like a king's ſon, but kept the treaſures for himſelf [s].

Here

[o] Appian. ubi ſupra, p. 185. & comparat. cum Dion. in excerptis, p. 642. [p] Plin. l. ii. c. 95. [q] Plut. in Sylla. Dion. legat. 36, & 37. [r] Memnon. c. 33. Valer. Maxim. l. ix. c. 2. [s] Appian. ubi ſupra, p. 186. 252, 253. & bell. civil. l. i. p. 414.

Here likewiſe he found eight hundred talents in ready money, which at the firſt breaking out of the war, had been depoſited by the Jews of Aſia in this iſland as in a place of ſafety, and was deſigned, as Joſephus informs us [t], for the temple of Jeruſalem. From Cos the king ſteered his courſe to the iſland of Rhodes, where all the Romans who had eſcaped out of Aſia found a ſanctuary, and amongſt others L. Caſſius the proconſul. The Rhodians, upon the firſt news of the king's being at ſea, equipped their fleet, and put their city in a poſture of defence, determined neither to deliver up the Romans, nor admit him within their gates. As he drew near, they ordered their admiral, by name Damagoras, a man of great experience in ſea affairs, to meet him, and, if poſſible, draw him to a battle, knowing that his fleet, though ſuperior in number, was but very indifferently manned. As the Rhodians advanced, the king's fleet retir'd, making towards the coaſts of Lycia; but Damagoras chacing them, ſix of his ſhips came up with twenty-five of the king's, and after a ſharp engagement ſunk two, and put the reſt to flight. In this encounter Mithridates, though he had never before ſeen a ſea-fight, behaved with extraordinary courage and intrepidity; but one of the ſhips of his own ſquadron falling foul of that which carried him, by which accident he was very near being taken priſoner, he ever after abhorred the ſea, and took an averſion to all the Chians, becauſe the pilot of that ſhip was a Chian. However, being unwilling to give over the enterprize, he took new forces on board, with great ſtore of warlike engines to batter the city, and unexpectedly appeared again on the coaſts; but was anew forced to retire with diſgrace, and lay aſide all thoughts of reducing the iſland [u].

His fleet defeated by the Rhodians.

MITHRIDATES, being thus diſappointed at Rhodes, entruſted his generals with the command of his armies, and himſelf retired to Pergamus, there to ſettle the civil government of Aſia, and levy new forces to be ſent to his generals as they ſhould have occaſion for them. Archelaus, commander in chief of all his forces, was ſent to Greece with an army of a hundred and twenty thouſand men, where by the treachery of one Ariſtio or Athenio he got poſſeſſion of Athens, and either put to the ſword, or ſent to Mithridates all thoſe who favoured, or were ſuſpected to favour, the Romans. From Athens he diſpatched parties to re-

Archelaus make himſelf maſter of Athens.

[t] Joſeph. l. xiv. c. 12.

[u] Appian. comparat. cum Memnon. c. 33. & Liv. l. lxxviii.

reduce the neighbouring caſtles and the iſland of Delos; which they did accordingly; but the iſland was ſoon recovered by Orobius a Roman general, who hearing that the enemies kept no guards, but paſſed their time in debauchery and carouſing, by the favour of a dark night, landed without being perceived, and, falling upon them in one of their revels, put every man of that party to the ſword except Apellicon the commander, who found means to make his eſcape [w]. Metrophanes, another of the king's generals, entering Eubæa, laid waſte the whole country, exerting his rage chiefly againſt the cities of Demetrias and Magneſia, which refuſed to admit him within their gates. But as he was ſailing off with a great booty, Bruttius prætor or governor of Macedonia, coming up with him ſunk ſome of his ſhips, and took others, putting all the priſoners to the ſword. Mithridates upon the news of this loſs, ſent his ſon Ariarathes with a powerful army to invade Macedonia, which he ſoon reduced, together with the kingdom of Thrace, driving the Romans every-where before him. The generals which he ſent into other quarters were no leſs ſucceſsful, having, at the return of the Romans into Greece, as Aulus Gellius [x], Valerius Maximus [y], and Quintilian [z] aſſure us, twenty-five different nations, which paid him homage. The ſame authors add, that he was ſkilled in every one of their various languages, ſo as to ſpeak with the natives without an interpreter whenever he had occaſion. Among theſe we find reckoned the Rhoxani, now Ruſſians or Muſcovites, whom Diophantes, one of the king's generals, brought under ſubjection, after having ſlain in one engagement fifty thouſand of the Barbarians, who came with an innumerable army to oppoſe him. And now Mithridates was maſter not only of Aſia, but of all Greece and the adjacent iſlands, except Rhodes, as far as the Cyclades.

The inteſtine broils and civil diſſenſions, which at this time reigned in Rome, proved a favourable opportunity for Mithridates to extend thus the confines of his empire; but at laſt the ſenate upon certain advice that he deſigned to invade Italy, and had even been invited thither by the Italians, who had revolted from them, began ſeriouſly to deliberate on the means of oppoſing ſo powerful and inſulting an enemy. Lucius Sylla, who on many occaſions had given given ſignal proofs of his courage, conduct, and experience in war, was appointed general, and ordered with all poſſible expedition to ſail over into Greece, where Archelaus domineered without controul. He put to ſea with five legions only and a few cohorts, and landing in Attica detached part of his forces to lay ſiege to Athens, he himſelf marching with the main body of his ſmall army againſt Archelaus, who was encamped near Piræum [a] (S). Upon his approach Archelaus retired within the walls, and Sylla, as winter was drawing on, contented himſelf to cut off his communication with Athens by a deep trench, which he contiued from the mountains quite to the ſea. By this means the city for want of proviſions fell into his hands, as he himſelf relates in his commentaries, on the calends of March [b]. Ariſtio, who was at the head of the king's party, retiring with thoſe of his faction into the caſtle, where they held out for a long time, but at laſt were obliged for want of water to ſurrender at diſcretion; Sylla commanded Ariſtio to be put to death, and all thoſe who had bore any employment under the king, or any way, violated the conſtitutions, which the Romans had eſtabliſhed after the conqueſt of Greece.

[w] Appian. l. v. c. 11. [x] Aul. Gell. l. xvii. c. 17. [y] Val. Max. l. viii. c. 7. [z] Quintilian. l. xi. c. 3.

Driven from thence by Sylla.

As Archelaus had a powerful fleet, and Sylla but a few frigates, he diſpatched L. Lucullus, his lieutenant general, a man of great repute among the Romans, to the iſland of Rhodes,

[a] Plut. in Sylla. Dio. in excerpt. Valeſii. Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 390. [b] Plutarch. in Sylla.

(S) Mithridates at that time reſided at Pergamus, where amongſt many other prodigies mentioned by the antient writers, it is ſaid, that at the ſame inſtant Sylla put to ſea, the Pergamenians in the theatre were letting down with engines a ſtatue of victory, bearing a crown to be put on the king's head; but the crown before it reached him fell to the ground, and was daſhed in pieces, which accident being looked upon as a bad omen, ſtruck the people and Mithridates himſelf with great terror (25). At Stratopedo the crows killed a vultur, and the goddeſs Iſis was ſeen to ſtrike with thunder a ſtar fallen from heaven. The ſame author adds that while the king was firing a grove conſecrated to the furies, a great laughing was heard among the trees, but no body could be found, and that the king being adviſed by the ſoothſayers to ſacrifice a Virgin to the furies, the young woman was taken with ſuch a fit of laughing, that the ſacrifice being diſturbed, the prieſts thought fit to give it over.

(25) Plutarch. in Sylla.

Rhodes, with orders to the Rhodians to join him with their fleet. But this being found impracticable, by reaſon that the king's fleet had, as it were, overſpread the whole ſea, Lucullus, deſpiſing all danger, ventured out boldly with ſix frigates only, and ſailing to Syria, Egypt, Lybia, and Cyprus, returned with ſuch ſupplies of ſhips and experienced mariners, as enabled Sylla after their conjunction with the Rhodian fleet to act offenſively even by ſea [c]. Archelaus finding himſelf thus ſtraitened on all ſides, diſpatched meſſengers to Taxiles, who commanded in Thrace and Macedonia, inviting him to his relief. Taxiles made what haſte he could, and having joined Archelaus, they both marched againſt Sylla, leading under their colours a hundred and twenty thouſand men. On the other ſide, Sylla, being acquainted with their deſigns, was in full march to meet them, though his whole army conſiſted but of fifteen hundred horſe and fifteen thouſand foot. The two armies came in ſight of each other near the city of Chæronea, and neither declining the engagement, the Romans, animated by the example of their leader and an eager deſire of revenging the death of their fellow-citizens maſſacred in Aſia by the king's order, put that day a hundred and ten thouſand of the enemy to the ſword, having loſt on their ſide but twelve men, as Sylla himſelf witneſſes in his commentaries. Archelaus narrowly eſcaped with the remains of his army to Chalcis.

The battle of Chæronea

THE ſucceſs which attended Sylla, raiſed new jealouſies againſt him at Rome, where the contrary faction began to prevail. Whereupon the ſenate ſent Lucius Valerius Flaccus, conſul of that year, with two legions into Aſia, in appearance to attack Mithridates on that ſide, but with private inſtructions to fall upon Sylla, if they found him diſaffected to the ſenate. As Flaccus had no experience in war, C. Fimbria, a ſenator of great repute among the ſoldiery, was appointed to attend him with the character of legate or lieutenant general. Sylla was at that time in Bæotia, but hearing what meaſures the ſenate had taken againſt him, he left that province, and with all expedition marched into Theſſaly with a deſign to meet Flaccus, who, having embarqued his troops at Brunduſium, was ſteering his courſe towards that province. But Sylla being arrived at the city of Melitea, intelligence was brought him, that the country, which he had abandoned, was over-run with a powerful army of the king's under the command of Dorylaus, his chief favourite. Upon this advice he returned into Bœotia, and in two ſucceſſive engagements gained two ſignal victories, which put an end to the war in Greece. In the firſt encounter Dorylaus loſt fifteen thouſand men, as Appian and Oroſius inform us [d], or two hundred thouſand, as Eutropius will have it; in the ſecond the remaining part of the army, which conſiſted of ninety thouſand choſen troops, was entirely cut off; twenty thouſand were driven into a river, where they all periſhed; an equal number was ſurrounded, and all put to the ſword, in a marſh, whither they had retired; the reſt were killed in the flight, the Romans giving no quarter to men that had treated their fellow-citizens after ſo barbarous a manner in Aſia. Plutarch tells us [e], that the marſhes were died with blood, that the courſe of the river was ſtopt by the dead bodies, and that even in his time, that is near two hundred years after, a great many bows, helmets, coats of mail, and ſwords were found buried in the mud. Archelaus, who had joined Dorylaus, with a body of ten thouſand men a few days before the battle, lay three days ſtript and naked among the dead, till he found a ſmall veſſel which carried him over into Eubœa, where he muſtered together what troops he could, but was never in a condition to take the field. As for Sylla he gave up the province of Bœotia to be plundered by his ſoldiers, as being ready to revolt on every freſh occaſion. From Bœotia he marched into Theſſaly, where he took up his winter-quarters, and cauſed his old ſhips to be refitted, and ſeveral new ones to be built, in order to paſs over into Aſia in the beginning of the ſpring, and drive from thence not only Mithridates, but alſo his rival Flaccus whom the ſenate had in oppoſition to him appointed governor of that province (T).

[c] Plutarch. in Lucullo.

Dorylaus routed by Sylla.

In

[d] Appian. l. lxxxii. & Oros. l. vi. c. 2. [e] Plutarch. in vit. Syllæ.

(T) Livy tells us (26), that Archelaus delivered up himſelf and the king's fleet to Sylla; and Aurelius Victor (27), that the king's fleet was intercepted by Sylla through the treachery of Archelaus

(26) Liv. l. lxxxii. (27) Aurel. Victor. de vir. illuſtrib. c. 76.

Differences arisebetween Flaccus and Fimbria.

In the mean time Flaccus, being joined by the Roman allies in Asia, had possessed himself of Byzantium, and from thence marched into Bithynia, where upon some differences arising between him and his legate Fimbria, some of the soldiery sided with one, and some with the other; which the consul, as he was of a haughty imperious temper, not being able to bear, deprived Fimbria of his command and named another in his room. Fimbria being thus cashiered repaired to Byzantium, where he prevailed upon that part of the army which Flaccus had left there, to forsake the consul and follow him. With this body he crossed the Hellespont, and obliged all the cities of that neighbourhood, without distinction of friend or foe, to contribute large sums towards the maintenance of his army, allowing at the same time his soldiers an uncontrouled licence to commit all sorts of villainies and rapine. This liberty brought daily over to him a great many from Flaccus, insomuch, that thinking himself now a match for the consul, he took upon himself the supreme command, and turned out all the civil as well as military officers, which Flaccus had appointed, placing his own creatures in their room. Such extraordinary proceedings soon brought back Flaccus from Chalcedon, whither he had sailed with his fleet; but finding Fimbria'sparty stronger than he expected, he was forced to conceal himself in a friend's house, till he had an opportunity of stealing away in the night-time to Chalcedon, and from thence to Nicomedia. Fimbria, having intelligence of his flight, pursued him close, took Nicomedia by storm, and dragging the consul from a well, where he lay concealed, put him to death. His head he threw chelaus, adding, that there was a good understanding between these two commanders, as was plain from Sylla's bestowing on him ten thousand acres of Land near the city of Chalcis in Eubœa. The treachery of Archelaus is also mentioned by Sallust (28), who introduces Mithridates complaining of him in a letter to Arsaces, in the following words: Archelaus, the most unworthy of all those who were under me, gave a check to my enterprises by betraying my army. And Strabo (29) informs us, that Archelaus was afterwards greatly esteemed and caressed both by Sylla and the senate. But Sylla himself in his commentaries (30), and Dio (31), endeavour to clear Archelaus, from all suspicion of treachery.

(28) Sallust. hist. l. iv. (29) Strab. l. xii. p. 558. & lib. xvii. p. 796. (30) Plutarch. in Sylla. (31) Dio legat. 33. or 34.

threw into the ſea, and left his body unburied on the ſhore [f]. Upon the death of Flaccus, Fimbria took upon himſelf the command of the Roman forces in Aſia, beſieged and took a great many towns, but at the ſame time practiſed ſuch cruelties upon perſons of all ranks, that his name became more odious than even that of Mithridates (U). Having perſuaded the inhabitants of Cyzicum to admit him as a friend into the city, he not only plundered it, but put the moſt wealthy citizens to death in order to ſeize on their eſtates, as if they had been guilty of treaſon; others he forced with threats to give up to him all they had [g]. The minds of the Aſiatics being by the cruelty of Fimbria alienated from the Romans, Mithridates, in order to improve this hatred into an open revolt, commanded his ſon, by name alſo Mithridates, to join Taxiles, Diophantes, and Menander, three of the moſt experienced commanders he had, and to return at the head of a numerous army into Aſia, not doubting but the inhabitants, thus harraſſed by Fimbria, would ſhake off the Roman yoke, when they ſaw ſo powerful an army in the field ready to protect them. Fimbria diſtruſting the Aſiatics, marched out to meet the enemy, and offered them battle before they entered the province. As the king's army was far ſuperior to his in number, the Romans ſuffered greatly in the engagement, but held out till night parted them, when they withdrew to the oppoſite ſide of a river, which was at a ſmall diſtance from the field of battle. Here they deſigned to intrench themſelves. But in the mean time a dreadful ſtorm ariſing, Fimbria laid hold of that opportunity, and fording the river in the dead of the night, ſuprized the enemy and made ſuch a havock of them, as they lay in their tents, that only the commanders and ſome

Cruelties of Fimbria.

Fimbria defeats the king's generals.

[f] Appian. p. 204, 205. Liv. l. lxxxii. Patercul. l. ii. c. 24. Strab. l. xiii. p. 594. Aurel. Vict. de vir. illuſtrib. c. 70, &c.
[g] Diodor. Sicul. p. 409.

(U) Dio gives us an inſtance of his cruelty (32). Having, ſays he, one day ſet up ſome poſts, to which he uſed to cauſe men to be faſtened, and whipt to death, he found that there were more poſts provided, than perſons condemned to that puniſhment. Whereupon he commanded ſome of the ſpectators to be ſeized, faſtened to the poſts and whipt to death, leſt they ſhould ſeem to have been ſet up to no purpoſe.

(32) Dio in excerptis Valeſii. p. 653.

few troops of horse escaped [h]. Among these was the king's son, who attended with a few horse got safe to Pergamus where his father resided. But Fimbria, pursuing him night and day without intermission, entered Pergamus sword in hand; and hearing that both the father and son had fled from thence a few hours before his arrival, he continued the pursuit, and would have taken the king himself prisoner, had he not thrown himself with a considerable body of horse into Pritane. This place Fimbria immediately invested, blocking up all the avenues by which the king could make his escape by land; but as he had no ships to intercept his retreat by sea, he dispatched a messenger to Lucullus, who commanded the Roman navy in Asia, entreating him, as he tendered the welfare of his country, to make what haste he could to Pritane, and assist him with his fleet in taking one, who of all the kings in the world was the most cruel and implacable enemy of the people of Rome. But Lucullus, being swayed by a party-grudge more than by the good of the republic, would not stir out of the harbour, though he might with all ease, as his fleet was riding but at a small distance, at once have put an end to a war, which afterwards cost the people of Rome so much blood and treasure. Fimbria, finding himself thus disappointed, carried on the siege with all possible vigour, in hopes of making himself master of the town, before the king's fleet could come to his relief. But as the town was well fortified both by art and nature, and defended by a numerous garrison, animated by the king's presence and example, before the Romans could approach the walls, the fleet appeared, and being received with loud shouts of joy, took the king on board, and to the eternal disgrace of Lucullus, carried him, without the least molestation, to Mitylene [i].

FIMBRIA soon after the king's departure took the place by storm, and reduced most of the cities of Asia, setting large fines on such as did not voluntarily submit. As he approached the antient city of Troy the Trojans shut their gates against him, and at the same time sent deputies to Sylla, declaring, that they were ready to submit to him, and begging his protection against the cruelty and avarice of Fimbria. Sylla commended them for returning to their antient alliance with the people of Rome, and promised to hasten to their relief, adding, that it was no matter whether [h] Memnon, c. 28. [i] Plut. in Lucull. & Oros. ubi. supra.

ther they ſubmitted to him, or to Fimbria, they being both citizens of Rome, and originally deſcended from the Trojans. But at the ſame time he warned Fimbria by a meſſenger not to moleſt thoſe who had ſubmitted to him, and on that regard ought to be looked upon as allies of Rome. This embaſſy fired Fimbria's haughty temper, who thereupon laying cloſe ſiege to the town, carried it by ſtorm the eleventh day, bragging, that he had reduced in ſo ſhort a time a city, which Agamemnon had not been able to maſter in leſs than ten years, though aſſiſted by a fleet of a thouſand ſhips and the whole power of Greece. Entering the city he put moſt of the inhabitants to the ſword, not ſparing even thoſe who had taken ſanctuary in the temple of Minerva, which he cauſed to be burnt with all that were in it. He levelled the walls with the ground, ſet fire to the houſes and temples, and reduced the city to a heap of aſhes. He racked and murdered in a moſt barbarous manner thoſe that had been employed on the embaſſy to Sylla, and in ſhort did not leave one houſe ſtanding, or one ſoul alive in the whole town that he could meet with (W). Takes and deſtroys Troy

MITHRIDATES, being thus preſſed by Fimbria in Aſia and by Sylla in Greece, and his fleet entirely defeated in two ſea-engagements by Lucullus, began to be weary of the war; and accordingly charged Archelaus to ſtrike up a peace with Sylla upon as honourable conditions as he could. On the other hand, Sylla hearing of the ſtrange diſorders that Cinna and Carbo, the leading men of the adverſe party commit-

(W) Aurelius Victor (33) ſays, that Minerva's temple ſtood untouched, being without all doubt, preſerved by the goddeſs herſelf. But Julius Obſequens and Appian aſſure us, that the temple was burnt; and add, that amongſt the ruins the famous palladium, which Diomedes and Ulyſſes were ſuppoſed to have ſtolen, was found ſafe and entire. Servius (34) tells us, that the palladium was on this occaſion diſcovered by Fimbria, and afterwards brought to Rome. This ſecond deſtruction of Troy happened, according to Appian (35), on the hundred and ſeventy-third olympiad, a thouſand and fifty years after the firſt; but Eratoſthenes, Apollodorus, and Diodorus Siculus, compute a thouſand and ninety-nine years between the taking of Troy by the Greeks, and the fourth year of the hundred and ſeventy-third olympiad, when this deſolation by Fimbria happened.

(33) De vir. illuſtrib. c. 70. (34) Servius in lib. ii. Æneid. (35) Appian. p. 206.

ted at Rome; was very willing to put an end to the war, and haſten to the relief of his friends, who were daily flocking to him, being baniſhed their country for favouring his cauſe. Wherefore, on the firſt notice of the king's intention, he went in perſon to confer with Archelaus; who, meeting him at Apollo's temple near Delos, adviſed him to return home and ſuccour his friends at Rome, where the oppoſite faction grew daily ſtronger by his abſence; he offered him what ſhips, men, and money he pleaſed, and aſſured him, that the king would aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of his power. On the other hand, Sylla endeavoured to perſuade Archelaus to deliver up to him the king's fleet, promiſing, in caſe he complied with his requeſt, to place him on the throne of Pontus, and honour him with the title of a friend and ally of the people of Rome. But Archelaus ſhewing the utmoſt abhorrency of ſuch an infamous piece of treachery, Sylla propoſed ſome preliminaries, one of which was, that Mithridates ſhould forthwith withdraw his garriſons from all the places that were not poſſeſſed by him before the war broke out. This article was agreed to by Archelaus, and ſeveral places immediately evacuated; but concerning the others, he wrote to the king to know his pleaſures therein. Mithridates ſent without delay embaſſadors to Sylla, charging them, among other things, to diſſuade Sylla from inſiſting on the delivery of Paphlagonia and the fleet, which was one of the preliminaries. This put Sylla in ſo violent a paſſion, that he was with much ado prevailed upon to continue the conferences. But Archelaus deſiring to be ſent to the king, and aſſuring Sylla that he would either diſpatch him, or make him conclude a peace upon Sylla's own terms, he was appeaſed. Archelaus was as good as his word; for on his return he acquainted Sylla, that the king had ſubmitted to his terms, but at the ſame time ſhewed a great deſire of having an interview with him before matters were quite ſettled; which Sylla agreeing to, they met at Dardanus a city of Troas. The king came attended with twenty thouſand foot, ſix hundred horſe, and a great many chariots armed with ſcythes, beſides a fleet of ſix hundred ſhips. Sylla had but two legions with him, and two hundred horſe. Both armies being drawn up, Mithridates and Sylla retired with a ſmall retinue into a neighbouring field. The king coming up to Sylla offered to embrace him, but he ſtopt him, deſiring firſt to know whether he was willing to conclude a peace upon the terms which Archelaus had propoſed to him. Mithri-

A conference between Sylla and Mithridates.

Mithridates at firſt deſired that ſome alterations might be made, but the Roman general ſo terrified him with his paſſionate and threatening ſpeech, that he conſented without exception to all he required; and then Sylla having embraced and kiſſed him, after mutual expreſſions of friendſhip they parted, Mithridates retiring into Pontus, according to their agreement, and Sylla advancing to Thyatira, where Fimbria lay encamped [d]. The conditions of the peace were as follow: that Mithridates ſhould relinquiſh all his conqueſts, and content himſelf with his paternal dominions, which were confined within the limits of Pontus: that he ſhould forthwith reſign Bithynia to Nicomedes, and Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, and releaſe without ranſom all the captives and priſoners he had made during the war: that he ſhould pay to the Romans two, or, as Memnon has it, three, thouſand talents, and deliver up to Sylla eighty ſhips, with all their arms and ammunition, and five hundred archers: laſtly, that he ſhould not any ways moleſt ſuch cities or perſons, as had during the war revolted from him, and ſided with the Romans [e]. Thus ended the firſt Mithridatic war to the great diſadvantage of the king and to Sylla's glory, who in leſs than three years time drove him out of Greece, Macedon, Ionia, and the province of Aſia, confined him within the narrow bounds of his father's kingdom, and killed above a hundred and ſixty thouſand of his beſt troops, without loſing one thouſand of his own.

A peace concluded. Year of the flood 2914. Year before Chriſt 85.

And now Sylla having, no other enemy to contend with, led his army againſt Fimbria, and having encamped within two furlongs of Thyatira, where he lay intrenched, ſummoned him to deliver up the army, as having taken the command upon him againſt the known laws of Rome. Fimbria replied, that his authority was equally uſurped: whereupon Sylla began to draw a trench in order to beſiege him in his camp, which Fimbria's men perceiving, they openly proteſted that they would not by any means imbrue their hands in the blood of their fellow-citizens, and paſſed over in troops to Sylla. Fimbria, finding himſelf no ways in a condition to oppoſe Sylla by force, had recourſe to treachery, and ſuborned a ſlave to paſs into Sylla's camp as a deſerter, and there to ſtab him; but his heart failing him, and being ſuſpected, by the fear he betrayed, to be ſent on ſome ſuch errand, he was apprehended; and having openly owned the whole matter, Sylla's men were filled with ſuch indignation, that it was no eaſy matter to keep them within the camp, every one deſiring to revenge ſuch an execrable piece of treachery with the death of the traitor. The plot being diſcovered, Fimbria, not truſting even his own troops, retired with a few of his friends to a ſtrong fort, whence he invited Sylla to a parly. Sylla refuſed to ſee him, but ſent one Rutilius in his ſtead to offer him a ſafe conduct to the ſea-ſide upon condition he reſigned the troops under his command, and abandoned Aſia. To this offer Fimbria made no other reply than that he knew a more expeditious way to prevent bloodſhed; and withdrawing in a violent paſſion, ſtole away to Pergamus, where he ſtabbed himſelf in the temple of Eſculapius. But the wound not proving mortal, one of his ſervants diſpatched him at his requeſt, and afterwards killed himſelf. Sylla cauſed his body to be decently interred, which was ſo pleaſing to his ſoldiery, that they came over to Sylla all to a man [f]

[d] Memnon, c. 37. Plutarch. in Syll. Appian. p. 207, 208.
[e] Memnon, ubi ſupra. Plut. & Appian, ubi ſupra. Liv. l. lxxxiii. Velleius Patercul. l. ii. c. 23.

Fimbria lays violent hands on himſelf.

SYLLA, having now an uncontrouled power in Aſia, declared the Chians, Rhodians, Lycians, Magneſians, and Trojans, whoſe city he rebuilt, a free people, and friends of the people of Rome, by way of reward for having ſided with the Romans; but on the other cities he laid heavy fines, condemning them to pay in one year's time twenty thouſand talents, and quartering his ſoldiers in the houſes of ſuch as had ſhewn any diſaffection to the Romans. Each private man was to receive of his landlord ſixteen drachmas a day, and each officer fifty; and, beſides, were to be ſupplied with proviſions, not only for their own ſuſtenance, but to regale ſuch of their friends as they ſhould think fit to invite. By theſe impoſitions moſt of the inhabitants of Aſia were reduced to beggary, eſpecially the Epheſians, who had above others exerted their hatred againſt the Romans. The province of Aſia being thus put out of a condition to revolt, Sylla, loaded with immenſe treaſures, ſet ſail for Italy, leaving behind him Lucullus with the character racter of quæſtor, and Muræna with that of prætor (X). He conſigned the two legions that had ſerved under Fimbria to Muræna, ſuſpecting them inclined to Marius whoſe faction he was going to quaſh at Rome.

[f] Appian p. 211. Liv. lxxxiii. Vellei. Patercul. l. ii. c. 24. Plut. in Sylla. Aurel. Victor. de viris illuſtrib. c. 70. Oros. l. vi. c. 3.

MITHRIDATES returning to Pontus reduced thoſe nations which had revolted during the war, beginning with the Colchi, who, upon the approach of his army, offered to ſubmit, provided he would appoint his ſon Mithridates king over them; which was no ſooner granted, but they returned to their duty. This raiſed a diffidence in the king, as if his ſon's ambition had occaſioned that revolt. Whereupon he kept him for ſome time bound with gold fetters, and afterwards put him to death without any regard to his eminent ſervices during the war [g]. The Boſphori, likewiſe a very warlike people, had ſhaken off the yoke, and in order to reduce them, or at leaſt under that pretence, he began to make ſuch preparations both by ſea and land, as raiſed no ſmall jealouſy in the Romans; the more, becauſe he had not, according to the articles of agreement, reſigned to Ariobarzanes the whole and entire poſſeſſion of Cappadocia, but reſerved to himſelf ſome places of great importance, and had complained of Archelaus, as if at his inſti-

[g] Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 213, 214.

(X) Amongſtother things of great value, Sylla brought out of Aſia ſeveral libraries, namely that of Ariſtotle, which he ſeized on upon the death of Apellicon the Teian, who had purchaſed it with an immenſe ſum of money. Apellicon was one of the wealthieſt men in Aſia, and grudged laying out his money on any thing except books; but in theſe he was extravagant to a great degree, outbidding even kings when any valuable purchaſe offered; for which he ranſacked all the public and private libraries of Aſia, bribing with large ſums the librarians to deliver to him by ſtealth ſuch as were not to be ſold. By this means he got a collection of all the moſt ſcarce and valuable books that could be purchaſed. However, like many in our days, he was more pleaſed with the ſight than the uſe of them. Having purchaſed of the heirs of Nileus Scepſius the libraries of Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus, and finding many of the books compoſed by them greatly damaged and worm-eaten, he undertook to tranſcribe them, but was often miſtaken in filling up the chaſms, which made the books that were publiſhed by him be looked upon as leſs correct, though copied from the originals. As Apellicon died during the Mithridatic war, Sylla ſeized on all his books, and with them enriched his own library at Rome (36).

(36) Plutarch. in Sylla. Athenæus, l. v. c. 1. Strab. l. xiii. p. 609. Lucian. lib. adv. indoctum.

inſtigation he had granted more to Sylla than he ought to have done. This jealouſy was encreaſed by the unexpected arrival of Archelaus, who, dreading the effects of the king's diſpleaſure, fled for refuge to Muræna, and, aſſuring him that thoſe vaſt preparations were not deſigned againſt the Boſphori, prevailed upon him to be before-hand with the king in making war. Having therefore drawn together with all poſſible expedition his troops, he marched into Cappadocia with a deſign to invade Pontus. The king hearing of his motions, diſpatched embaſſadors to him to put him in mind of the articles of peace, which Sylla, whoſe prætor he was, had agreed to. Muræna, who was more inclined to war than peace, in hopes, as Appian informs us, of deſerving a triumph, replied, that he knew nothing of any ſuch articles: for Sylla had ſet nothing down in writing, but contented himſelf with the execution of what had been agreed upon. Having diſmiſſed the embaſſadors with this anſwer, he begun to lay waſte and plunder the country, without ſparing even the temples, or the treaſures conſecrated to the gods. Having put all to fire and ſword on the frontiers of Pontus towards Cappadocia, he paſſed the river Halys, and on that ſide poſſeſſed himſelf of four hundred villages belonging to the king, without the leaſt oppoſition, Mithridates being unwilling to commit any hoſtilities before the return of the embaſſadors, whom he had ſent to Rome to complain both to the ſenate and to Sylla of ſuch violent proceedings. The embaſſadors returned at laſt, and with them one Callidius ſent by the ſenate, who in a publick aſſembly commanded Muræna to forbear moleſting a friend and ally of the Roman people; but afterwards calling him aſide, had a private conference with him, in which ſome writers ſuppoſe, as he brought no decree of the ſenate, that he encouraged him to purſue the war; at leaſt he continued practiſing the ſame hoſtilities, and even made an attempt upon Sinope, the place where the king reſided, and the royal treaſures were kept. But as the town was well garriſoned, he was forced to retire with ſome loſs; and in the mean time Mithridates himſelf taking the field, appeared at the head of a powerful army on the oppoſite banks of the river, which he paſſed in ſpite of all Muræna's efforts, drove the Romans from their camp, and forced them with great ſlaughter to ſave themſelves over the mountains into Phrygia. This ſudden and unexpected victory brought many of the cities of Aſia again to ſide with Mithridates, who, having having driven the Romans quite out of Cappadocia, made a great fire on the top of a high hill, and offered after the manner of his country ſolemn ſacrifices to Jupiter the powerful in war. But in the mean time Sylla being created dictator, and having got all the power into his own hands, he ſent Aulus Gabinius into Aſia to charge Muræna, in his name, to give over moleſting Mithridates, whom he had honoured with the title of a friend and ally to Rome. No ſooner was Sylla's pleaſure known to Muræna, but he drew off his forces, and abandoned all the places he had taken after the departure of Sylla. He was ſoon after recalled, and M. Thermus appointed prætor of Aſia in his room [h]. Gabinius was alſo charged to reconcile Mithridates and Ariobarzanes; which he did accordingly, Mithridates, giving to the Cappadocian his own ſon, about four years old, as an hoſtage. Muræna on his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph, and received with loud acclamations, as if he had performed great things.

The ſecond Mithridatic war.

MITHRIDATES being now quite at leiſure fell upon the Boſphori, and having ſubdued them, appointed Machares, one of his ſons, king of that country. From thence he led his army againſt the Achæans, a people bordering on the Colchi, and originally deſcended from the Greeks, who on their return from Troy, miſtaking their way into Greece, had ſettled there. They oppoſed the king with great reſolution, and obliged him to abandon the country with the loſs of three parts of his army [i]. Being returned into Pontus he recruited his army, and made vaſt preparations with a deſign to invade them anew; but in the mean time Sylla dying, he altered his reſolution, and unwilling to loſe thoſe countries, which he had delivered up agreeable to the articles of peace concluded with Sylla, determined to attempt at all adventures the recovery of them. Having therefore induced Tigranes, king of Armenia and his ſon-in-law, to invade Cappadocia, he himſelf, after performing ſolemn ſacrifices to Jupiter and Neptune, entered Paphlagonia with an army of a hundred and twenty thouſand foot trained up after the Roman diſcipline, ſixteen thouſand horſe, and a hundred chariots armed with ſcythes. From Paphlagonia, which readily ſubmitted to him, he marched into Bithynia, which had been lately bequeathed to the Romans by king Nicomedes. Neither did he meet meet here with any oppoſition, or in the province of Aſia, which, being oppreſſed with moſt exorbitant taxes, looked upon him as their deliverer. In entering the cities of Aſia he made M. Manus or Magius, whom Sertorius had ſent him from Spain to diſcipline and command his army, walk before him with the conſular enſigns, as if he were the chief magiſtrate, the king following him like one of his attendants. He made ſeveral cities free, but at the ſame time acquainted them, that they were not indebted to him for their liberty, but to Sertorius. Thus by the connivance of Sertorius, who was a great oppoſer of Sylla's faction, many cities ſided with the king, without knowing that they revolted from the Romans. At this time Julius Cæſar being at Rhodes, whither he had retired to apply himſelf at leiſure to the ſtudy of oratory, under the diſcipline of Apollonius Molon, a moſt eminent teacher of that art, and hearing what havock the king's officers made in the adjacent countries, gathered together what troops he could, and falling upon them, drove them quite out of Aſia, though he was then but in the twenty-fifth year of his age [k].

[h] Appian. Mithridatic. p. 215, 216. Cic. pro lege Manilia.
[i] Appian ubi. ſupra, p. 216.

Lucullus ſent againſt Mithridates.

By this time the ſenate being appriſed of the king's deſigns, and finding a new war unavoidable, appointed Lucullus, who was then conſul, and having been Sylla's legate in Aſia, was well acquainted with the country, to manage it (Y). Cotta, the other conſul prevailed upon the ſenate with much importunity to be likewiſe employed in that war, and was ſent with a fleet to guard the Propontis and defend Bithynia [l]. Lucullus having raiſed one legion in [k] Sueton. in Julio. [l] Plut. in Lucullo. Cic. pro Muræna. Memnon. c. 39. Eutrop. l. vi.

(Y) As Sylla, and ſuch officers as ſerved under him, had got great riches in the firſt Mithridatic war, the command of the army was courted by many. But Lucullus, at that time conſul, having by means of Præcia a common ſtrumpet, gained Cethegus, who bore great ſway at Rome, was preferred to all others. The province of Gallia Ciſalpina had fallen to his lot, but that of Cilicia being vacant by the death of Octavius, he was firſt by the intereſt of Cethegus promoted to that, and afterwards, as Cappadocia, which which was in all likelihood to be the ſeat of war, lay near Cilicia, was charged with the management of the Mithridatic war (37).

(37) Plutarch. in Lucullo.

in Italy paſſed over with it into Aſia, where he was joined by four others, two of which, as they had ſerved under Fimbria, in a manner uncontrouled, proved at firſt very mutinous and refractory; the other two were not much better having been long inured to the luxury of Aſia. The diſciplining of theſe troops kept Lucullus ſome time in a ſtate of inactivity, while all the ſtates of Aſia were up in arms, and ready to ſhake off the Roman yoke, being on one hand harraſſed in a moſt extraordinary manner by the collectors, and on the other invited with great promiſes to join Mithridates, who was advancing with two very numerous armies, and a fleet of four hundred ſhips of thirty oars, beſides a great many ſmaller veſſels, called penteconteri and cercuræ. One of theſe armies was ordered to march, under the conduct of Diophantus Matharus, into Cappadocia, and oppoſe Lucullus, if he offered to enter Pontus on that ſide. The other, conſiſting of a hundred and fifty thouſand foot, twelve thouſand horſe, and a hundred chariots armed with ſcythes, Mithridates commanded in perſon. He had alſo a third army encamped in the neighbourhood of Heraclea in Pontus, and commanded by Manius and Eumachus, two generals of great experience in war. Lucullus, hearing that the king's fleet was out, commanded Cotta to keep his, which was inferior in number, within the harbour of Chalcedon, while he advanced by land to engage Mithridates. Cotta followed his injunctions in not venturing out with the fleet, but, at the ſame time, drawing together what troops he could, he reſolved to be before-hand with him in fighting Mithridates, not doubting in the leaſt of the victory. And very unluckily for him it happened, that Mithridates bent his rout to Chalcedon; which Cotta no ſooner heard, but he ſent P. Rutilius his legate with a conſiderable body to obſerve his motions. Rutilius was met on his march by Manius and Eumachus, and not declining the engagement, moſt part of his army was cut in pieces, and he himſelf ſlain. The ſame misfortune befel ſeveral other officers of diſtinction ſent out to oppoſe Mithridates, who, being elated with ſuch ſucceſs, ordered his admiral to ſail into the very harbour, and fire the Roman fleet; which he did accordly, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition either from Cotta, or Nudus his admiral, who kept cloſe within the walls of the town, and tamely beheld the enemy burning ſome of their ſhips, ſinking others, and carrying away the reſt, to the number of ſixty. The loſs of the Romans on this occaſion was very conſiderable. Plutarch tells us, that Cotta loſt in the land engagements four thouſand foot [m], and that few of the mariners were ſaved. Memnon ſays, that both the ſea and land were covered with the dead bodies of the Romans, eight thouſand of them being ſlain in the ſea-engagement, and four thouſand five hundred taken priſoners, and five thouſand three hundred of the land forces, all Italians, being either killed or taken priſoners; whereas Mithridates loſt in all but ſeven hundred and thirty men (Z).

THIS victory and the bad conſequences that attended it, moſt cities of Aſia being ready to revolt, made Lucullus haſten his march. When he came in ſight of the king's army, he was ſurpriſed to ſee ſo numerous a body; and having with him but thirty thouſand foot and two thouſand five hundred horſe, he thought it was moſt adviſeable to decline an engagement; however, there happened frequent ſkirmiſhes between the Roman and Pontic cavalry, wherein the former gained no ſmall advantages; which ſo raiſed their ſpirits, a little before quite ſunk, that Lucullus had much ado to keep them within the trenches, ſo eager were they for a general engagement (A). Mithridates finding that he could not draw Lucullus to a battle, and being loth to ſpend the ſummer, after ſo great preparations, without doing

[m] Plut. ubi ſupra. [n] Memnon, ubi ſupra.

(Z) This is the victory which Mithridates brags of in a letter to Arſaces, thus; I have entirely defeated M. Cotta the Roman General near Chalcedon, and ſtripped him of his fleet in a ſea-fight (38).

(A) Plutarch tells us (39), that Lucullus finding the king's army ſo much ſuperior in number to his own, was at firſt unwilling to venture a battle; but Manius marching up to the very gates of his camp, and challenging him out, he drew up his forces, with a deſign to engage; but as the two armies ſtood faceing one another, and expecting the ſignal, the heavens opening all on a ſudden, a large flaming body fell from thence between the two armies, which ſo terrified both parties, that they retired to their reſpective camps. This prodigy, ſays Plutarch, happened near Otryæ in Phrygia (40).

(38) Salluſt. l. iv. (39) Plut. ubi ſupra. (40) Plut. ubi ſupra.

ing any thing, ſilently decamped in the dead of the night, and by break of day reached the mountain Adraſtia or Dindymus which commanded the city of Cyzicum. This city was the key of Aſia, and greatly addicted to the Romans. In the overthrow of Chalcedon they loſt three thouſand citizens and ten of their beſt ſhips, and had on all occaſions ſhewn an unalterable attachment to the Roman intereſt. Mithridates, hoping either to get poſſeſſion of ſo important a place, or to draw Lucullus to an engagement, if he offered to relieve it, began the ſiege, and inveſted the city with his whole army by land, and four hundred ſhips by ſea. Lucullus having timely notice of the king's retreat, followed him cloſe, and falling upon his rear, killed ten thouſand of his men, and took thirteen thouſand priſoners. After this victory, to encourage the Cyzicenians, he encamped on a riſing ground in ſight of the town; but Mithridates, giving out that Lucullus was at a great diſtance, and thoſe they ſaw were ſupplies ſent him by Tigranes, they began to be anxious about the Romans, and continued in great apprehenſion, till one of Lucullus's men, ſwimming in the night through the enemies fleet, got into the city and undeceived them. He delivered to the magiſtrates a letter from Lucullus, wherein he acquainted them with his late victory, and aſſured them, that he would not fail to relieve them[o]. Lucullus, in taking a view of the ground where the enemy was encamped, obſerved a mountain, by the gaining of which he might eaſily cut off their communication with the country, and prevent their having any proviſions but what were brought by ſea; but as there was only one way leading to it, and that very narrow, and guarded by a ſtrong body of the king's forces, he had laid aſide all thoughts of ſo hazardous an attempt, when he was adviſed by a meſſenger from L. Manius or Magius, whom Sertorius had ſent to conclude a treaty of friendſhip and alliance between him and Mithridates, to remove his camp to the above-mentioned hill, and acquainted, that Manius had perſuaded the king to withdraw his forces from the narrow paſſes, and ſuffer him to encamp where-ever he pleaſed: and truly Manius had made the king believe, that the Fimbrian legions, which had formerly ſerved under Sertorius, were in a day or two to come over to him, and adviſed him not to oppoſe the Romans if they offered to paſs the ſtreights, which would coſt him much blood, ſince he was ſure of the victory without out ſtriking a blow. The king, not ſuſpecting any treachery, hearkened to his advice, and even ſent out a ſtrong party to meet the Fimbrian legions, which, according to agreement, made a ſhew as if they intended to join him; but, as the party drew near, the legions unexpectedly falling upon them, cut them in pieces all to a man [P]. Thus Lucullus gained that important poſt, and having cut off the enemy's communication with the country, was ſupplied in great plenty with all manner of proviſions, while they had nothing to depend upon but their fleet, which, as the winter was drawing near, could hardly ſupply with proviſions, ſo numerous an army. This made Mithridates double his efforts to reduce the town, which he battered night and day with engines of a new invention, which did great execution (B); but the citizens were no leſs active in defending it, repairing with indefatigable labour by night the breaches made by the king's engines in the day-time. The king finding that it was in vain to batter the walls began to undermine them; but in this too his efforts were unſucceſsful, and he was near being taken in one of his mines by the counter-mines of the city. In the mean time winter coming on, the king's army was ſo diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, that many died for hunger, and thoſe that lived were forced to feed on the fleſh of their dead companions. The famine was followed by a plague, which daily ſwept away great numbers; inſomuch, that Mithridates, having now loſt all hopes of reducing the city, began to think only of a retreat, which it was no eaſy matter to effect, moſt of his Ships being ſhattered by ſtorms, and all the paſſes by land blocked up

[o] Plut. ubi ſupra. Strabo, p. 575, 576.

[P] Memnon, c. 42.

(B) Among other engines, Nicodemus a Theſſalian contrived one called helepolis, about one hundred cubits high. Upon this they planted a tower ſtored with all manner of machines for throwing ſtones of a vaſt ſize, which ſo battered the walls that the citizens were obliged to labour all night in repairing them. This fatigue they could not have long endured, but a ſudden ſtorm of wind ariſing, the helepolis was blown down, and the machines planted on the tower rendered unſerviceable; which proved a great relief to them (41).

(41) Plut. & Appian. ubi ſupra.

up by the Romans (C). The firſt opportunity that offered was the departure of Lucullus, gone with a ſtrong detachment to beſiege a caſtle at ſome diſtance. The king laying hold of this occaſion, ſent away the beſt part of his horſe by night, ordering them not to halt till they were out of the reach of the enemy; but Lucullus, receiving timely notice of their march, haſtened back, and with ten companies of foot and all his horſe, purſued them ſo cloſe, notwithſtanding the exceſſive cold and deep ſnow, in which many of his men periſhed, that he came up with them as they were paſſing the river Rhyndacus, took ſix hundred horſe, with all the beaſts of burthen, fifteen thouſand men, and put the reſt to the ſword; moſt of their horſes having died on their march, but a very few got ſafe into Bithynia. On his return he fell in with Ariſtonicus the king's admiral, whom he took priſoner, as he was upon the point of

(C) Plutarch, Appian, Julius Obſequens, and others tell us, Mithridates was greatly terrified by the following prodigy, which was related and believed, both by the Cyzicenians and the king's army. In the city they uſed yearly to ſacrifice a black heifer to Proſerpine; but that year the town being blocked up on all ſides, they made one of dough, and brought it to the altar. They no ſooner began the ceremony, but the true heifer which was deſigned for Proſerpine's feſtival, and was grazing on the other ſide of the gulf, threw herſelf into the ſea, and ſwimming through the enemies fleet, got ſafe to the mouth of the harbour; there ſhe dived under the chain that obſtructed the entry, and paſſing through the middle of the city, went ſtreight to Proſerpine's temple, and preſented herſelf before the altar, where ſhe was ſacrificed (42). The ſame authors add, that Proſerpine appearing in the night-time to Ariſtagoras, the chief magiſtrate of the city, told him, that ſhe had provided a piper againſt the pipers, or, as Plutarch has it, a Libyan piper againſt the Pontic trumpeter. This at firſt ſeemed a riddle to the Cyzicenians; but in the mean time a violent wind blowing from Libya, which diſperſed the king's fleet, and overturned all his engines, they underſtood the myſterious ſaying of the goddeſs. It was alſo ſaid, that Minerva appeared to many in the city of Troy, dropping with ſweat, ſhewing part of her veil tore, and telling them, that ſhe was going to ſuccour the Cyzicenians. The Trojans, as Plutarch informs us, uſed to ſhew the pillars, whereon decrees and letters concerning this miraculous event were engraved.

(42) Plut. & Appian. ubi ſupra. Jul. Obſeq. de prodigiis.

of putting to ſea with a large ſum of money to inveigle the Roman army, which he alſo ſeized [q]. The king's army before Cyzicum being now extremely weakened by the plague, famine, and daily loſſes, the inhabitants ſo harraſſed them with frequent ſallies, that Mithridates determined to break up the ſiege, and return with part of his forces by ſea, while the others marched by land, under the conduct of Manius and Hermœus, whom Sertorius had ſent to head the king's troops. Accordingly the king, in the dead of the night, embarqued, and at the ſame time Manius and Hermœus marched off with thirty thouſand men, making the beſt of their way to Lampſacus; but were overtaken by Lucullus at the river Æſopus, which at that time was not fordable, being greatly ſwelled by the heavy rains. Twenty thouſand were killed on the ſpot, eleven thouſand of which were ſaid to have been ſent by Sertorius; nor could one man have eſcaped, had not the Romans given over the purſuit to gather the gold and ſilver, which, by the advice of their generals, well acquainted with the Roman avarice, they had ſcattered about on the road, on purpoſe to retard their purſuit [r]. Lucullus on his return entered Cyzicum, among the loud acclamations of the citizens, who afterwards inſtituted publick ſports in honour of him, which they called Lucullea. The city he declared free, and the ſenate heaped upon the inhabitants all the privileges, immunities, and exemptions which were enjoyed by the natives of Rome itſelf. Plutarch and Appian [s] tell us, that Mithridates loſt in all before Cyzicum three hundred thouſand men, which is alſo confirmed by Oroſius [t]. Strabo ſays, that the king's army conſiſted but of one hundred and fifty thouſand men, of which one hundred thouſand according to Eutropius periſhed in the ſiege [w]. The king himſelf, in a letter to Arſaces, writes, that he was forced to raiſe the ſiege of Cyzicum, not on account of any great loſs he had ſuſtained, or for fear of the enemy, but becauſe he could have no proviſions, the country being laid waſte all round, partly by his own forces, and partly by the enemies [x].

From

[q] Plut. ubi ſupra. [r] Memn. c. 42. Polyb. ſtrateg. l. vii. Flor. l. iii. c. 5. Plut. Appian. ubi ſupra. Oros. l. vi. c. 2. [s] Plut. & Appian. ubi ſupra. [t] Oros l. vi. c. 2. [u] Strabo, l. xii. 575. [w] Eutrop. breviar. l. vi. [x] Salluſt. l. iv. hiſtor.

FROM Cyzicum Lucullus marched with his army along the coaſt of theHelleſpont, and arriving at Troas, equipped his fleet there, and put to ſea in chace of Manius, Alexander, and Dionyſius, three of the king's generals, who were roving up and down the ſea, with a fleet of fifty ſhips, and ten thouſand land forces on board (D). He came up with them near the iſland of Lemnos, took thirty-two of the king's ſhips, and put great part of the land-forces to the ſword. The day after the engagement the three generals were diſcovered in a cave where they had concealed themſelves, and dragged from thence to Lucullus, who, after having ſeverely upbraided Manius for fighting againſt his country, cauſed him to be put to death. Before the battle, he had given orders to his ſoldiers not to kill any that had but one eye, meaning Manius, who had loſt an eye; not that he deſigned to ſave him, but becauſe he was willing to reproach him with his ignominious behaviour before he put him to death. Alexander and Dionyſius were reſerved for the triumph; but the latter prevented that diſgrace by a doſe of poiſon [y]. From Lemnos Lucullus ſteered his courſe to Bithynia, upon intelligence that Mithridates had appeared with his fleet on thoſe coaſts; but the king having timely notice of his deſign, made what haſte he could to gain Pontus and arrived at Heraclea on board of a pirate, by name Selemus, with whom he was forced to truſt himſelf, his fleet being diſperſed by a violent ſtorm, and the ſhip that carried him caſt away (E).

[y] Plut. Appian. ubi ſupra.

(D) Plutarch and Appian tell us (43), that at Troas Venus appearing to him in his ſleep, addreſſed him with the following verſe;

Τὶ κνάσσεις; μεγάθυμε λέων, ἰεβόλδε τὸι ἐγγύς that is, Why do you ſleep, ſtout lion, while the fawns are ſo near you? The ſame authors add, that while he was relating his dreams to his friends, news was brought him, that thirteen of the king's ſhips had appeared off of Troy, ſteering their courſe to Lemnos; whereupon he immediately ſet ſail, took all the ſhips, and killed Iſodorus the king's admiral.

(E(Dio writes, that Mithridates was twice ſhip-wrecked as he was ſailing to Pontus, and that he loſt in both wrecks ſixty ſhips, and ten thouſand men. Mithridates himſelf, in a latter to Arſa-ces,

(43) Plut. & Appian. ubi ſupra.

WHILE Lucullus was thus chasing Mithridates out of the sea, his commanders were no less successful by land. Triarius, sent by him to besiege Apamea, reduced that place. From Apamea he marched to Pesura, situated near mount Olympus, which he took by storm and plundered. The strong and important city of Prusias likewise submitted to the conqueror, after having obliged the king's garrison to withdraw. Niccæa followed the example of the others, the Pontics having abandoned the city on the first news of the approach of the Romans [z]. From Prusias Triarius marched with all possible expedition to join Cotta, who lay encamped near Nicomedia, where the king himself at that time resided; but before the two armies were joined, Mithridates found means to make his escape, first to Heraclea, which was betrayed to him by one Lamachus, and thence to Sinope (F).

LUCULLUS, having now reduced all Paphlagonia and Bithynia, marched thro' Cappadocia, and joined Cotta and Triarius at Nicomedia, with a design to invade Pontus; but hearing that Heraclea was in the king's hands, and supposing that the citizens had submitted to him of their own accord [z] Memnon. c. 43 & 49. Appian. p. 223. Oros. l. vi. c. 3. ces, says, that he lost the flower of his troops by two shipwrecks, the one at Para, the other at Heraclea (44). Orosius tells us, that while Mithridates was sailing against Byzantium, (whither, Eutropius says, he was chased by Lucullus) he lost by sudden storm eighty ships armed with brazen beaks, and many of his men; and Florus, that his whole fleet, with all manner of stores for the Pontic war, was dispersed, and one hundred ships lost.

(F) Lamachus was the chief magistrate of Heraclea; but being bribed with a large sum, promised to deliver up the city to Mithridates; and accordingly having invited the citizens to a very magnificent entertainment without the walls of the town, while they were in the height of their revels, privately acquainted Mithridates, that the gates were open and none of the citizens in a condition to oppose him. The king arrived the same night, and entering the city without opposition, secured it with a garrison of four thousand men, under the command of Connacoriges, an officer of great experience. Next day he summoned the magistrates, and in a friendly manner encouraged them to stand by him, since he had no other design in what he had done but to protect them against the Romans (45).

(44) Sallust. l. iv. histor. (45) Memn. c. 44.

accord, he altered his plan, and detached Cotta againſt Heraclea. Triarius was ordered with the fleet to the Helleſpont and Propontis, to intercept the king's fleet, which was daily expected from Spain with new ſupplies from Sertorius. Lucullus himſelf, with the main ſtrength of his army, purſued his march into Pontus [a]. His army was greatly harraſſed, eſpecially in the narrow paſſes between Cappadocia and Pontus, by flying parties of the enemy; but more for want of proviſions, the country being all about laid waſte by the king's troops; inſomuch, that Lucullus, having loſt almoſt all his beaſts of burthen, was obliged to take along with the army thirty thouſand Galatians, each of them carrying a ſack of corn on his back. At laſt he gained the plains of Pontus, a rich country, and ſo ſtored with all manner of proviſions, that an ox was ſold in the camp for a drachma, and every thing elſe as cheap in proportion. Lucullus having refreſhed his ſoldiers, and finding no army of the king's in the field, divided his forces, and at the ſame time inveſted Amiſus, a very ſtrong town; Eupatoria, which Mithridates had built and made the place of his reſidence, and Themiſcyra, ſituated on the banks of the river Thermodoon; Eupatoria was ſoon taken; but Themiſcyra made a vigorous reſiſtance. The townſmen gauled the Romans with their engines to ſuch a degree, that not daring to approach the walls openly, they contented themſelves with undermining them; but in this too they met with no ſmall difficulty from the enemy, who often engaged them under ground, and let into their mines bears and other wild beaſts, with ſwarms of bees, which obliged them to abandon their works; however, the town was at laſt obliged to ſurrender for want of proviſions, and the hard duty, which the Romans had undergone with great chearfulneſs, was rewarded with a rich booty. As for the city of Amiſus, Lucullus himſelf ſat down before it; but as the town was very ſtrong in itſelf, and defended by a numerous garriſon, the flower of the king's troops, he thought it adviſeable to ſpare his men, and reduce it by famine; and on this occaſion it was that the Romans firſt complained of their general, as if he ſpun out the war, on purpoſe to be continued in the command of the army; which charge, as we ſhall afterwards ſee, was not quite groundleſs. While he lay before Amiſus, Mithridates advancing to Cabira, a city not far diſtant from Amiſus, was there joined by forty thou-

[a] Plut. ubi ſupra. Memn. c. 45. Eutrop. l. vi.

and foot and four thousand horse. Lucullus hearing of the king's approach, left Murœna, the son of that Murœna whom Sylla had appointed prætor of Asia, with two legions to continue the siege, and marched himself with the rest of the army thro' the mountains to meet the king (G). Mithridates had placed one Phœnix of the blood royal with a considerable body in the narrow passes, enjoining him to give notice by fires of the approach of Lucullus, and defend the straits till he came up with his whole army to relieve him; but Phœnix was so far from opposing Lucullus, that he joined him; however, the king, being by other parties informed of the enemy's motions, passed the river Lycus, and meeting Lucullus in the champain country, proffered him battle, which he declined at first, but was soon after brought to a general engagement of the horse, wherein the Romans were driven back to the mountains with considerable loss, Pompeius, or, as some call him, Pomponius, general of their horse, being taken, and many officers of great distinction killed on the spot (H). Mithridates, flushed with success, drew up his army in battalia for several days successively; but finding that Lucullus kept on the mountains, he began to make the necessary dispositions for marching up to him; which Lucullus fearing decamped in the night-time, and being conducted by one Apollodorus a Greek, whom he found with others of the same nation concealed in a cave, got through the mountains, and by break of day pitched his

(G) Tully, in his oration for this Muræna, tells us, that he was legate to Lucullus during the Mithridatic war, that he led armies, fought battles, defeated the enemy's forces, besieged and took many towns; that he so behaved himself in Asia, at that time a rich country, and greatly corrupted with luxury, as not to betray the least inclination to avarice or luxury; and that he performed many noble exploits without the general's assistance, but the general none without his (46).

(H) Pompeius being brought to Mithridates dangerously wounded, the king asked him, whether he would become his friend, if he granted him his life? Pompeius answered, that he should be his friend, if he concluded a peace with the people of Rome; but if he persisted to make war upon them, he should continue to be his enemy. This answer provoked the barbarians to such a degree, that they would have cut him in pieces, had not the king protected him, saying, that he would not suffer cruelty to be practised upon valour, merely because unfortunate (47).

(46) Cic. pro Muræna.

(47) Plut. & Appian. ubi supra.

his camp on a riſing ground near the city of Cabira, where he knew the enemy could not force him to an engagement [b]. Mithridates followed him, and encamped at a ſmall diſtance; but thought it adviſeable not to attack him in his camp. While both armies were in this poſture, a party from the king's camp paſſing cloſe to that of the Romans in purſuit of a deer, ſome Roman ſoldiers running out, ſtopped their chace. This bred a quarrel, and many flocking from both camps to relieve their companions, the Romans were forced to give way; which Lucullus obſerving, went out alone to meet them, and having ſtopped the foremoſt in the flight, marched back with them againſt the enemy, whom he put to flight and purſued to the very camp, fighting himſelf the whole time in the firſt rank. On his return to the camp, he ſtripped thoſe who had fled of their arms, and commanded them according to his cuſtom to dig a trench twelve foot wide, the reſt of the army ſtanding by and looking on [c].

But now proviſions grew very ſcarce in the Roman camp, which obliged Lucullus to divide his army, and detach great parties into Cappadocia, the only place from whence he could have ſupplies. Taxiles and Diophantus, two of the king's generals, were encamped on the frontiers of that country, in order to cut off its communication with the Romans. Theſe ſuffered Adrianus with a conſiderable body of foot to enter Cappadocia, in hopes of intercepting him and the convoys on his return; which they might eaſily have done, had they fallen upon him in the plain country; but as they attacked him in the ſtraits of the mountains, where there was no room for their horſe to engage, they were utterly routed, firſt on the mountains, and then in the plains, where there enſued a bloody engagement, the Romans being reinforced with a freſh body from the camp, and the king's men fighting with great courage and reſolution, till their commanders diſheartned them by their flight. The king, upon the news of this defeat, reſolved to break up his camp and retire, not queſtioning but Lucullus, upon the return of his troops, would attack him. This reſolution he no ſooner imparted to his nobles, but they began privately to ſend away their moſt valuable goods; which the ſoldiers finding out, and taking it unkindly that no notice had been given them, plundered their baggage, and put thoſe that eſcorted them to the ſword. On this occaſion Dorylaus, one of the king's generals, was killed for a purple garment which he wore, and Hermæus, a famous ſouthſayer, trod to death in the crowd. After this the ſoldiers betook themſelves to a precipitous flight, crowding out of the gates in the utmoſt confuſion; which the king perceiving, haſtened to ſtop their flight, but no one ſhewing him the leaſt reſpect, he was carried away with the crowd, and falling down, was very near being trod to death [d] in the throng. Being thus forſaken by his army, he retired with a ſmall retinue, firſt to Cabira, and thence into Armenia to Tigranes his ſon-in-law (I), and not into Iberia, as is falſely related by Joſephus [e]. Lucullus having at the ſame time received news of the victory of his parties, and of the diſorderly flight of the enemy, ſent the beſt part of his horſe to purſue them, and himſelf marched againſt thoſe, who not having time to make their eſcape, had remained in the camp, and had put themſelves in a poſture of defence. Theſe he ſurrounded with his legions, but moſt of them made their eſcape, the Romans being buſied, contrary to the general's orders, in plundering the camp, where they found a rich booty. Having taken the camp, Lucullus made what haſte he could in purſuit of the king, who being overtaken by a company of Galatians, cauſed a mule loaded with part of his treaſures to be driven in amongſt them, and made his eſcape while they were intent upon the booty, and quarrelling among themſelves [f] (K) about the diviſion of the ſpoils. Mithridates remembering in his flight, that he had left his ſiſters, wives and concubines at Pharnacia, diſpatched Bacchis, or Bacchides, an eunuch, with orders to put them all to death, leſt they

[b] Plut. Appian. ubi ſupra. [c] Plut. ubi ſupra.

Mithridates being forſaken by his army, retires into Armeuia.

[d] Plut. ubi ſupra. [e] Joſeph. l. xiii. c. 24. [f] Memn. c. 46. Plut. & Appian. ubi ſupra.

(I) Appian ſays, that he fled firſt to the mountains, and thence through by-ways into Armenia. Plutarch writes, that he was carried out of the camp by the throng, and that one Ptolemy an eunuch ſeeing him toſſed to and fro in the croud, with manifeſt danger of his life, proffered him his horſe, and thereby enabled him to make his eſcape before Lucullus came up (48).

(K) Of the kings eſcape Tully writes thus: Mithridates, in his flight out of Pontus, left behind a great deal of gold and ſilver, part whereof he had received of his anceſtors, and part raked together during his firſt war in Aſia, and carried into his own kingdom. While our men were buſied in the plunder, the king ſlipt out of their hands.

(48) Appian, ubi ſupra. Memn. c. 46.

they ſhould fall into the enemies hands; which was done accordingly (L).

The cities of Pontus ſubmit to Lucullus.

LUCULLUS, finding it was in vain to purſue Mithridates any farther, returned to his camp, and thence marched againſt the city of Cabira, which ſurrendered upon conditions. The example of Cabira was followed by moſt of the ſtrong holds of Pontus, the king's governors flocking from all parts to tender their ſervice to the conqueror. Among theſe was the grand-father of Strabo the geographer, whom the king had diſobliged, by putting to death Tibias, his couſin-german, and his ſon Theophilus. He was a man of ſuch credit, that it was no ſooner heard he had abandoned the king's party, but fifteen other commanders delivered up to Lucullus the places which they had been entruſted with [g]. And thus was Pontus, hitherto inacceſſible to any enemy, laid open to the Roman legions [h] (M). At the ſame time Triarius, who was ſent, as we have mentioned above, to intercept the king's fleet, obtained [g] Strabo, l. xii. p. 557.

[h] Cic. pro lege Manilia & pro Archia.

(L) When Bacchis acquainted them with his commiſſion, Monima, one of the king's wives, by birth a Mileſian, attempted to diſpatch herſelf with the bands of her diadem; but they ſoon breaking, ſhe threw down the diadem, and treading on it, ſaid, O! thou curſed Diadem, art thou not ſerviceable even for this uſe? and then preſented her bare neck to Bacchides. Berenice, another of his wives, and her mother, ended their days by a doſe of poiſon, as did the king's two ſiſters, Roxana and Statira. Roxana, before ſhe took the potion, inveighed againſt her brother with many curſes and reproaches; but Statira, with many kind expreſſions, thanked her brother for the regard he had ſhewn for them, in taking care, while himſelf was in great danger, that they ſhould die free, and by their death prevent the diſhonourable treatment which they had reaſon to expect from a proud and inſulting enemy (49).

(M) Mithridates, in a letter to Arſaces, puts this varniſh upon his flight: "I recruited my army, ſays he, at Cabira, and after "many ſharp engagements between the Romans and me, we "were both diſtreſſed for want of proviſions. The Romans "were ſupplied by Ariobarzanes king of Cappadocia; but I "was obliged to retire into Armenia, the whole country where "I was encamped being laid waſte by the enemies and my "own forces (50)."

(49) Plut ubi ſupra. (50) Salluſt. l. iv. hiſtor.

obtained a complete victory near the island of Tenedos, where he either took or sunk sixty ships, whereby the great fleet which the king had brought with him into Asia was entirely destroyed.

COTTA was all this time employed in the siege of Heraclea, and had made but small progress. He made several assaults; but was always repulsed with great loss. His engines did no execution on the walls, which so incensed him, that he caused most of them to be burnt, and the engineer who contrived them to be put to death. After this, leaving part of his army before the town, to prevent their receiving any supplies, he encamped in the Lycæan fields, a plentiful country, with a design to refresh his army, and return before the town, which was now reduced to great straits for want of provisions, and on account of the intestine quarrels between the townsmen and the garrison. Having refreshed his soldiers, he returned to the siege; but found the town plentifully supplied by sea with all manner of necessaries, and in a better condition to hold out a long siege than it was when he first invested it. Hereupon, despairing ever to reduce it alone, he sent orders to Triarius to assist him with his fleet, and block up the city by sea, as he had done by land. Triarius was very willing to undertake this task, being now quite disengaged; and having on his first arrival defeated the Heraclean fleet, brought the town in a few months to such straits, that the third part of the garrison died for hunger; whereupon Conacorix, governor of the place, resolved to purchase his own safety at the expence of the townsmen, and marching out in the night-time, as he had agreed with Triarius, delivered one of the gates to the Romans, who, entering the city sword in hand, exercised all manner of cruelty on the abandoned and helpless inhabitants.

Heraclea taken, and plundered.

Cotta, who lay encamped at some distance from the city, hearing it was taken and plundered by Triarius, (for Conacorix had not imparted his design to him, knowing he was a man not to be relied on) flew into a passion at seeing himself bereaved both of the rich booty, and the glory of reducing a place which had kept him employed two whole years, and marching in all haste to the city, fell upon the Romans who were busy in plundering, which would have occasioned a great deal of blood-shed, had not Triarius interposed, and put an end to the scuffle, by promising Cotta and his men an equal share of the booty. Conacorix, after marching out of Heraclea, to conceal his treachery, seized on two forts belonging to the Romans, Teium and Amaſtus; which Triarius being ſent to recover, Cotta, in his abſence, plundered the city anew, rifled and ſtripped the temples, which the other had ſpared, put all the citizens he could meet to the ſword, and having ſecured on board of his ſhips all the ſtatues, pictures, gold and ſilver veſſels of the temples, all the rich furniture of the private houſes, and whatever elſe was worth carrying away, for his laſt farewel commanded his ſoldiers to ſet fire to the city in ſeveral places, which in a ſhort time reduced it to a heap of aſhes. Thus was Heraclea, one of the richeſt and moſt famous cities of Pontus, taken, after having held out a long ſiege of two years [i]. Conacorix delivered the two places he had ſeized to Triarius, who ſuffered him to retire without moleſtation. And Cotta, having no further uſe for his troops, diſmiſſed the auxiliaries, reſigned the legions to Lucullus, and himſelf put to ſea with his fleet on his return to Rome; but he had ſcarce got out of the harbour, when part of his ſhips, being over-freighted with the ſpoils of the city, ſunk; and the others were by a violent north wind daſhed againſt the ſhore, which occaſioned the loſs of great part of the booty [k]. On his return to Rome he was highly applauded by the ſenate, and honoured with the title of Ponticus.

LUCULLUS having now reduced Pontus, marched againſt the Chaldeans, Tibarenians, and the inhabitants of Armenia Minor, who, of their own accord, ſubmitted, and put him in poſſeſſion of all their ſtrong holds. From Armenia he led his forces to the ſea-ſide, and returned before Amiſus, which ſtill held out, Callimachus, governor of the place, having harraſſed the Romans with engines of his own contriving to ſuch a degree, that they had given over aſſaulting the town, and contented themſelves with blocking it up by land, tho' the garriſon was at the ſame time ſupplied with all manner of proviſions by ſea. Lucullus, on his arrival, ſummoned the garriſon to ſurrender, and offered them very honourable terms; which they refuſing to comply with, after encouraging his ſoldiers, he made a general aſſault at the time when Callimachus uſed to draw off great part of his troops to give them ſome reſpite. The Romans applying their ſcaling ladders, got over the wall before Callimachus could come to the aſſiſtance of thoſe he had left to guard it; however, by ſetting the city on fire, he found means in that confuſion to make his eſcape. Lucullus, out of pity to the periſhing city ty, commanded part of his men to ſtand to their arms, and the others to uſe their utmoſt endeavours in quenching the fire; but the ſoldiers neglecting the houſes, ſaved only the furniture, and ſuch things as they could carry off, whereby the city was in great part deſtroyed, to the grief of Lucullus who deſigned to ſave it, and ſhew the ſame favour to the Amiſians that Sylla had done to the Athenians. The fire was at laſt quenched by a violent and unexpected ſhower; and Lucullus having, with much ado, reſtrained his ſoldiers from committing any further hoſtilities on the citizens, repaired the city in great meaſure before he left it, and ſuffered the inhabitants peaceably to enjoy their houſes and lands [l]. Some years after Lucullus having beſieged Niſibis, or, as the Greeks called it, Antiochia Mygdonica, defended likewiſe by Callimachus, under Guras brother to Tigranes king of Armenia, would hearken to no conditions till Callimachus was delivered up to him; and having him in his power, revenged the deſtruction of Amiſus with death, notwithſtanding he offered to diſcover great ſums of money concealed under ground, if he would grant him his life [m].

Amiſus taken.

[i] Mem. c. 51, 53, 54. m

[k] Idem ibid.

And now Lucullus having reduced all Pontus, and made it a province of the Roman empire, and ſettled all Aſia with excellent laws, ſent Appius Claudius, his wife's brother, embaſſador into Armenia, to demand of Tigranes the delivery of Mithridates, as belonging to his triumph; and, in caſe of refuſal, to proclaim war againſt him. From the time Mithridates had ſheltered himſelf in Armenia, Tigranes his ſon-in-law had promiſed to protect his perſon, and had not been wanting in any duties of hoſpitality; but could by no means ever be prevailed upon to ſee him, or treat with one who had loſt ſo great a kingdom (N). To this embaſſy Tigranes Tigranes refuſes to deliver up Mithridates.

[l] Plut. ubi ſupra. & Memn. c. 47. [m] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. & Dio, l. xxxv.

(N) Plutarch ſays, that he received him with great ſcorn and contempt, and confined him to a barren and unwholeſome country (51). But Memnon aſſures us, that he aſſigned him one of his caſtles for his reſidence, a princely table, and a retinue ſuitable to his former condition, though he could never be induced to admit him to his preſence (52).

(51) Plut. ubi ſupra. (52) Memn. c. 48.

Tigranes replied, that he was far from approving the conduct of Mithridates; but; however, as he was ſo nearly related to him, the demand of the Romans ſeemed pretty extraordinary, neither could he with any reputation comply with it, ſince all the world would look upon him as a very mean ſpirited prince, if he ſhould, for fear of an enemy, deliver up to puniſhment his father-in-law. Having with this anſwer diſmiſſed the Roman embaſſador, he ſent for Mithridates, and condeſcended to ſee him for the firſt time, after he had reſided a year and eight months in his dominions. In a private conference held by the two kings, it was agreed, that Tigranes ſhould march againſt the Romans, and Mithridates with ten thouſand horſe return into Pontus, and, levying there what forces he could, rejoin Tigranes, before Lucullus, who was then employed at the ſiege of Sinope, could enter Armenia; but in the mean time Sinope (O) having

(O) Sinope was held by a body of Cilicians of the king's party, commanded by one Cleochares, as Oroſius calls him, or, Bacchis, as Strabo names him. Cleochares finding the city reduced to great ſtraits, maſſacred moſt of the citizens, plundered the city, and ſet it on fire, retiring in the night-time with the ſpoils to the inner part of Pontus, inhabited by the Sanegians and Lazians. Lucullus obſerving the town all in a flame, and not doubting but the Cilicians had abandoned it, commanded the ſoldiers to ſcale the walls; and having entered the town without oppoſition, put to the ſword eight thouſand of the king's party who had not time to embarque with the others. The fire was with much ado quenched by the Romans, and the citizens not only ſpared, but, as they were well-affected to the republic, reſtored to the quiet poſſeſſion of their lands and houſes, and declared a free people (53). Plutarch and Appian inform us, that Lucullus was moved by a viſion to ſhew ſo great favour to the city of Sinope; for as he was ſleeping, ſay they, in his tent, one appearing to him, ſpoke theſe words; Go forward, Lucullus, for Autolychus is coming to meet you. When he awaked, he obſerved the city in a flame; and tho' he did not underſtand the meaning of the words he had heard, yet he advanced to the walls; and having taken the city, found on the ſhore, whither he purſued the Cilicians, a ſtatue of exquiſite workmanſhip, carefully wrapped up, and bound with cords, which the enemy had not been able to ſhip off, as they intended to do, had not Lucullus, awaked by this viſion, purſued them ſo cloſe. When the ſtatue was unfolded, Lucullus was not a little ſurpriſed to find it reſembling in every feature the perſon that having surrendered, Lucullus, with all possible expedition, marched against Tigranes, and having drawn him to a general engagement, entirely defeated his army before he was joined by Mithridates, who heard the first news of this overthrow as he was marching with a considerable body to his assistance. Soon after he met Tigranes himself, flying with a small retinue to shelter himself in some remote corner of his kingdom. Mithridates encouraged him to raise new forces, not questioning but another campaign would repair all the former losses, provided he would commit to his charge the whole management of the war; which Tigranes agreeing to, as thinking him more fit to deal with the Romans than himself, orders were issued out for raising a new army, and all the Armenians able to bear arms summoned to meet at the place of the general rendezvous. Out of these Mithridates chose seventy thousand foot and thirty-five thousand horse, and having trained them up during the winter after the Roman discipline, in the beginning of the spring he left part of them with Tigranes, and marched himself with the rest into Pontus, where he recovered many important places, and overcame in a pitched battle M. Fabius, whom Lucullus had appointed governor of thar province (P) [n]. Being flushed with this success, as soon as the wounds he re-

(53) Memn. c. 56. Plut, Appian. ubi ſupra. Oros. l. vi.

Is defeated by Lucullus

[n] Dio, & Appian. ubi supra.

that had appeared to him in his dream; and upon examination learnt, that it was the statue of Autolychus founder of Sinope. When Lucullus heard this, he recollected, say our authors, what Sylla had left in his commentaries, viz. that nothing is more certain, or more to be relied upon than dreams (54). This statue, which was the work of Sthenides, Lucullus carried along with him, and a curious sphere made by Billarus. All other ornaments and things of value he restored to their lawful owners.

(P) This victory he gained by the treachery of the Thracians that served under Fabius, and of the slaves that followed the Roman camp; for Fabius marching carelessly and in disorder, upon the report of some Thracian scouts, that the king was at a great distance, fell in with him unawares; and at the same time the Thracians revolting, he was obliged to retire with the loss of five hundred men. In his retreat the slaves, who were very numerous in the Roman camp, being enticed by Mithridates with hopes of their liberty and great rewards, fell unexpectedly on received in the engagement ſuffered him to move, he purſued Fabius, and beſieged him in the city of Cabira, whither he had retired; but in the mean time Triarius, who was marching out of Aſia to join Lucullus, hearing what diſtreſs the Romans were in, haſtened to their relief, and appearing unexpectedly on the neighhouring hills, ſtruck ſuch terror into the enemy, that they raiſed the ſiege, and made the beſt of their way into Cappadocia. Triarius purſued them, and got ſo near them as to be parted only by a river. Here he halted, with a deſign to paſs the river after he had allowed his men ſome reſt; for they were tired out with long marches. But Mithridates was beforehand with him, and croſſing the river on a bridge, where he had placed a ſtrong guard, attacked the Romans with great reſolution, before they had time to refreſh themſelves. The battle was bloody, and the event doubtful, till the bridge breaking down with the weight of the multitude that paſſed, the king's troops who had engaged, relying chiefly on their numbers, began to loſe courage, ſeeing they could receive no further aſſiſtance; and the Romans charging them with freſh vigour, they betook themſelves to a precipitate flight. After this engagement, as winter came on, both armies were glad to retire to their winter-quarters °.

(54) Plut. & Appian. ubi supra.

Mithridates defeated by Triarius

DURING the winter Mithridates raiſed new forces, and having received conſiderable ſupplies from Tigranes, took the field early in the ſpring, in hopes of driving the Romans out of Pontus, before Lucullus, who had work enough on his hands in Armenia, could come to their aſſiſtance. With this view he marched ſtraight againſt Triarius and Sornatius, to whom Lucullus had committed the care and defence of that province; and finding them encamped near the city of Gaziurſa, proffered them battle; which they declining, he ſent a ſtrong detachment to beſiege a caſtle where the Romans had left all their baggage, hoping they would ° Dio, & Appian. ubi ſupra.

on the Romans, who would have been all cut in pieces, had not the king himſelf fallen from his horſe, having received two dangerous wounds, one on the knee with a ſtone, the other under his eye with a dart; 'for while the enemy were buſy in carrying him off, the Romans laying hold of that opportunity, retired unmoleſted (55).

(55) Dio. & Appian. ubi ſupra.

would rather venture an engagement to relieve the place, than loſe all the had got with ſo much toil and labour during the war ; neither was he diſappointed in his hopes, for tho' Triarius was for keeping cloſe in his camp, till the arrival of Lucullus, whom he daily expected, having acquainted him with his danger, the ſoldiers hearing that the caſtle was beſieged, declared in a tumultuous manner, that if he did not lead them, they would march to the relief of the place without his leave. Triarius being thus forced, not by the enemy, but his own men, to fight, drew out his forces againſt the king, whoſe army was three times his number ; but while they were upon the point of engaging, both armies were by a violent ſtorm forced to retire to their reſpective camps ; but Triarius receiving that very day intelligence of the approach of Lucullus, and fearing he would ſnatch the victory out of his hands, reſolved to make a bold puſh, and next morning by break of day attack the king in his camp. If he conquered, the glory, he thought, would be entirely his own ; if he were overcome, the enemy could reap no great advantage from his victory, Lucullus being at hand with a powerful army.

The Romans defeated by Mithridates.

The king, in that ſurpriſe, putting himſelf at the head of a few troops of his guards, ſuſtained the brunt of the Romans, till the reſt of his army drawing up, came to his relief, and attacked the enemy with ſuch fury, that the Roman foot was forced to give way, and was driven into a moraſs, where they were ſurrounded, and great numbers of them cut to pieces. Their horſe were likewiſe put to flight, and purſued with great ſlaughter, till a Roman centurion in the king's ſervice's pitying his country-men, attempted to kill him. The king's life was ſaved by his breaſt-plate; but as he received a deep wound in the thigh, he was obliged to give over the purſuit himſelf, and thoſe that were about him cauſed the retreat to be ſounded, which, as it was unexpected, occaſioned great confuſion in the whole army. The centurion was immediately cut in pieces ; but the Roman horſe in the mean time getting the ſtart of the enemy, found means to make their eſcape. Above ſeven thouſand of the Romans were killed in that battle, and among them one hundred and fifty centurions, and twenty-four tribunes, the greateſt number of officers that had been loſt in any engagement to that day. Mithridates being cured of his wound, that he might not for the future be expoſed to ſuch dangers, cauſed all the Romans that ſerved

in

in his army to be formed into one body, as if they were to be sent out on a party, aud then ordered them to retire to their tents, where they were all to a man cut in pieces [p] (Q).

THE king, however elated with success, yet would not engage Lucullus; but with long marches hastened into Armenia Minor, and encamped upon a hill near the town of Talura, expecting Tigranes, who was advancing with a strong army to join him. Lucullus, in pursuit of Mithridates, marched over the field of battle, leaving those unburied who had fallen in the engagement, which was the first thing that alienated the minds of the soldiery from him [q]; who began to be very mutinous, being stirred up by Appius Claudius, whom Lucullus had turned out of his command for his vile behaviour, notwithstanding he was nearly related to him, Lucullus having married his sister. The Romans mutiny against Lucullus.

[p] Appian. Plut. Dio. ubi supra. [q] Plut. in Lucullo.

(Q) Appian says, that this battle happened near mount Scotius, a place says he, ever memorable for the victory of Mithridates, and defeat of the Romans (56). Hirtius likewise, in his commentaries on the war of Alexandria, mentions this overthrow of the Romans, and tells us, that it happened at a place about three miles distant from the town of Zela in Pontus. Tully, in his oration for the Manilian law, which he pronounced about half a year after that misfortune befel the Roman army, speaks of it thus: "The army was courageous and victorious; "but Mithridates fell upon them. Suffer me in this place, like "those who write of the Roman affairs, to pass over in silence "the misfortunes, which were so great, that Lucullus received "not the tidings of them by any messenger from the fight, but "by common fame and report." And in another place of the same oration, "Having received that overthrow in Pontus, says "he, which I put you in mind of against my will, our friends "and allies being terrified, the power and courage of our enemies "encreased, and the province having no strength to rely upon, "Asia had been lost, O Romans, had not fortune, in that critical juncture of time, brought Pompey, as it were from heaven, to the relief of those countries. His presence stopped "Mithridates, tho swelled with success, and deterred Tigranes "from invading Asia, which he threatened with a powerful "army (57).

(56) Appian. p. 254.

(57) Cic. in orat. pro lege Manil.

The diſcontent that prevailed in the army came to ſuch a height, that Lucullus was obliged to lie ſtill in his camp all that ſummer, the ſoldiers declaring in a mutinous manner, that they would not follow him any longer, nor ſerve under a general who refuſed to ſhare the booty with them, taxing thereby Lucullus with covetouſneſs; which charge was not altogether groundleſs, for he amaſſed immenſe riches during that war, and was ſuſpected at Rome of ſpinning it out, that he might be continued in the government of Aſia. Theſe complaints, and the general diſcontent that reigned in the army, obliged the ſenate to recal Lucullus, and appoint Manius Acilius Glabrio, conſul of that year, in his room. Glabrio arriving in Bithynia, gave notice by public criers to all the cities, that the ſenate had diſcharged Lucullus and his army, and confiſcated his goods for protracting the war, and refuſing to comply with their injunctions. Hereupon Lucullus was abandoned by the greater part of his army, and forced to retire into Galatia, not being in a condition to make head againſt the joint forces of the two kings, who laying hold of that opportunity, recovered the beſt part of Pontus, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Armenia Minor; for tho' Glabrio had haſtened into Pontus, as if he intended to engage the enemy, and rob Lucullus of the victory; yet, upon the firſt news of the approach of the two kings, he thought fit to retire, and leave the country open on all ſides to the enemy. When this was heard at Rome, a law was enacted there by C. Manilius, a tribune of the people, whereby the management of the war againſt Mithridates and Tigranes was committed to Pompey, and likewiſe the provinces of Cilicia, then under Quintus Marcius, and of Bithynia, under Glabrio. By the ſame law he was continued in that unlimited power by ſea, with which he was inveſted when he was firſt ſent out againſt the pirates of Cilicia [r] (R). In virtue of this law, Pompey, who had Pompey appointed to ſucceed Lucullus.

[r] Dio. l. xxxvi. Liv. lib. c. Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 33. Plut. in Pomp.

(R) Livy obſerves, that this law paſſed againſt the will of the nobility, who thought it a manifeſt injury to Lucullus, that one ſhould be appointed to ſucceed him, not ſo much in the war, as in the triumph, and to take poſſeſſion of the ſpoils, rather than to carry on a war; beſides, the ſenate was unwilling to recal Marcius had juſt then ended the war with the Cilician pirates, took upon him the command of the army, and directed all the allies of the Roman people to join him with all poſſible expedition; but before he took the field, he renewed the alliance which Sylla and Lucullus had concluded with Phrahates king of Parthia, and then ſent friendly propoſals to Mithridates, who at firſt ſeemed to give ear to them, and accordingly diſpatched an embaſſador to the Roman army to treat of a peace. Pompey required of him to lay down his arms, if he was in earneſt, and deliver up to him all thoſe who had revolted from the Romans during the war. This demand was no ſooner bruited abroad in the king's camp, but the deſerters, who were very numerous in the king's army, betaking themſelves to their arms, threatened to put Mithridates himſelf to death, and would have occaſioned a great diſturbance, had not the king appeaſed the growing tumult, by aſſuring them, that he had ſent embaſſadors not to treat of a peace, but only to take, under pretence of ſuing for peace, a view of the enemy's ſtrength. He moreover obliged himſelf, by a ſolemn oath in the preſence of the whole army, never to enter into any treaty of friendſhip with the Romans, nor to deliver up to them ſuch as had ever ſerved under him [s]. Pompey, finding his propoſals rejected, advanced againſt the king with an army of thirty thouſand foot and twenty thouſand horſe, as Plutarch [t] writes, or thirty thouſand, as we read in Appian [u], all choſen troops; for he diſcharged moſt of thoſe who had ſerved under Glabrio and Lucullus. As he entered Galatia, he was met by Lucullus, who endeavoured to perſuade him to march back, the war being near finiſhed, and even Mithridates rejects Pompey's propoſals.

[s] Dio, ubi ſupra. & Appian. [t] Plut. in Pomp. [u] Appian. p. 238.

Marcius and Glabrio from their governments, before the time, for which they had been given, was expired. But what gave them the greateſt uneaſineſs was, the extenſive and uncontrouled power which by this law was veſted in Pompey, the command of all the armies out of Italy being conferred upon him. When news was brought to Pompey that this law had paſſed, he is ſaid to have complained, as if the people of Rome had laid too great a burden on him; whereas every one knew that the law had been propoſed by Manilius at his inſtigation, and that his main aim was to have all the power in his own hands (58).

(58) Plut. in Pomp. Dio. l. xxxvi.

ven deputies ſent by the republic to ſettle the province of Pontus; but not being able to prevail with him, after mutual complaints againſt each other, they parted; and Pompey removing his camp, commanded the troops that were with Lucullus to join him, except one thouſand ſix hundred, whom he left to attend Lucullus in his triumph. From thence Lucullus ſet out for Rome, where he was received by the ſenate with great marks of eſteem, moſt men thinking him highly injured by the authors of the Manilian law. Pompey purſued his march into Pontus; but finding that he could not by any means draw the king to a battle, he marched back into Armenia Minor, with a deſign either to reduce that province, or oblige Mithridates to venture a battle in order to relieve it. Mithridates followed him at ſome diſtance, and entering Armenia, encamped on a hill over-againſt the Romans, and by intercepting their convoys, reduced them to ſuch diſtreſs, that they were obliged to remove to a more convenient place, the king cutting off many in their rear, and harraſſing them with frequent attacks, till he fell into an ambuſcade laid by Pompey, whoſe perſonal courage and prudent conduct on that occaſion, confirmed the king in his reſolution not to hazard a general engagement. The two armies encamped again over-againſt each other, Pompey on one hill, and the king on another, near the city of Daſtira, in the province of Aciſilene, at a ſmall diſtance from the Euphrates, which divides Aciſilene from Armenia Minor[w]. Here Pompey, ſeeing he could neither draw the king to a battle, nor force his camp, which was pitched on a ſteep and craggy mountain, began to block him up with a ditch, which he carried round the bottom of the hill where the king was encamped, and meeting with no oppoſition, finiſhed his work, and quite cut off the enemy's communication with the country. Pompey was amazed to ſee the king thus tamely ſuffer himſelf to be ſhut up, and could not help ſaying, that he was either a fool or a great coward; a fool, if he did not apprehend the danger he was in; a coward, if, being apprized of it, he did not, to the utmoſt of his power, prevent it. By this ditch, which was one hundred and fifty furlongs in circuit, and defended by many forts raiſed at ſmall diſtances from each other, the king was ſo cloſely beſieged, that he could neither ſend out parties parties to forage, nor receive the ſupplies that came to him from Pontus. He was thus beſieged for the ſpace of forty-five or fifty days, and his army reduced to ſuch ſtraits, that having conſumed all their proviſions, they were at laſt forced to live on their dead horſes. Hereupon Mithridates reſolved, at all events, to break through the Roman fortifications; and accordingly, having put to the ſword all thoſe that were ſick or diſabled, that they might not fall into the enemy's hands, he attacked in the dead of the night the Roman guards, and having overpowered them with his numbers, got ſafe into the open fields, and continued his march all night toward Armenia Major, where he was expected by Tigranes. Pompey, next morning by break of day, purſued the enemy with his whole army, and having with much ado overtaken them, found the king encamped on a hill, to which there was but one aſcent, and that guarded by a ſtrong body of foot. The Romans encamped over-againſt them; but Pompey, fearing the king ſhould make his eſcape in the night-time, privately decamped, and taking the ſame rout the enemies were to hold in order to gain Armenia, poſſeſſed himſelf of all the eminences and defiles through which the king was to paſs. Mithridates thinking that Pompey was returned to his former camp, purſued his march, and, about the duſk of the evening, entered a narrow valley, which was ſurrounded on all ſides by ſteep hills. On theſe hills the Romans lay concealed, expecting the ſignal to fall upon the enemy, and attack them on all ſides at once, while they were tired with their march, and ſeemingly, as they had ſent out no ſcouts, in great ſecurity (S). Pompey was at firſt for putting off the attack till the next morning, thinking it not ſafe to engage in the night-time among ſuch ſteep and craggy mountains; but

[w] Plut. ubi ſupra.

(S) Plutarch tells us, that Mithridates, retiring to his pavilion to take ſome repoſe after his march, was by a dream forewarned of the misfortune that befel him; for he ſeemed to be ſailing with a fair wind in the Pontic ſea, and to diſcover with great joy the Boſphorus, when all on a ſudden he found himſelf ſhipwrecked, and caſt on an abandoned and inhoſpitable ſhore. While he was in this perplexity, his generals ruſhed into the tent, and acquainted him that Pompey was at hand, which gave him great uneaſineſs, tho' he did not at that time communicate his dream to any of his moſt intimate friends (59).

(59) Plut. in Pomp.

Pompey attacks Mithridates in the night.

but was at laſt prevailed upon, by the earneſt prayers and entreaties of all the chief officers of his army, to fall upon the enemy that very night. It was therefore agreed, that, in the dead of the night, all the trumpets ſhould at once ſound the charge, that this ſignal ſhould be followed by an univerſal ſhout of the whole army, and that the ſoldiers ſhould make what noiſe they could, by ſtriking their ſpears againſt the braſs veſſels that were uſed in the camp. The king's army, at this ſudden and unexpected noiſe, which was echoed again by the mountains, imagined at firſt that the gods themſelves were come down from heaven to deſtroy them; and the Romans charging them on all ſides with ſhowers of ſtones and arrows from the tops of the hills, they betook themſelves to a precipitate flight; but finding all the paſſes beſet with ſtrong bodies of horſe and foot, were forced to fly back into the valley, where, for many hours together, they were expoſed to the enemy's ſhot, without being able, in that confuſion, either to attack them, or defend themſelves. They attempted indeed to make ſome reſiſtance when the moon roſe; but the Romans running down upon them from the hills, did not give them time to draw up, and the place was ſo narrow, that they had not room even to make uſe of their ſwords (T). The king loſt on that occaſion ten thouſand men according to Appian, but forty thouſand according to Eutropius and others [x]. On Pompey's ſide there fell between twenty and thirty private men and two centurions. Mithridates, at the head of eight hundred horſe, broke thro' the Roman army, and being, after this effort, abandoned by all the reſt, becauſe they were cloſely purſued by the enemy, he travelled all night, attended by three perſons only, viz. his wife, or, as Plutarch calls her, his concubine, by name Hypſicratia, his daughter Dripetine, and an officer. At day break he fell in with a body of mercenary

And gains a complete victory.

[x] Appian. in Mithridat. p. 239, 240. Eutrop. l. vi. Dio, l. xxxvi. Plut. ubi ſupra.

(T) Florus, Plutarch, and Eutropius tell us, that as the Romans advanced, the moon ſhining on their backs, and becauſe ſhe was then in her wane, making their ſhadows appear mighty long, the enemy thereby judging of their nearneſs, diſcharged their darts againſt their ſhadows, and gave the Romans an opportunity of attacking them unarmed (60).

(60) Flor. l. iii. Eutrop. l. vi. Plut. ubi ſupra.

nary horſe and three thouſand foot, who were marching to join him. By theſe he was eſcorted to the caſtle of Sinoria, ſituated on the borders of the two Armenias. As great part of his treaſures were lodged here, he rewarded very liberally thoſe who accompanied him in his flight, and taking ſix thouſand talents, withdrew into Armenia. As ſoon as he entered the borders, he diſpatched embaſſadors to Tigranes, acquainting him with his arrival; but that prince, who was then on the point of concluding a ſeparate peace with the Romans, clapt his embaſſadors in irons, pretending that his ſon Tigranes had, at the inſtigation of Mithridates, revolted firſt to the Parthians and then to the Romans. Mithridates, finding himſelf thus abandoned, even by his ſon-in-law, left Armenia, and directing his courſe towards Colchis, which was ſubject to him, and had not as yet been invaded by the Romans, paſſed the Euphrates the fourth day, and got ſafe into his own territorities. Pompey ſent out ſeveral parties in purſuit of the king; but remained himſelf with the main body of the army in the field of battle, where he built a city, calling it, from that remarkable victory, Nicopolis. This city, with the adjoining territory, he beſtowed upon ſuch of his ſoldiers as were old or diſabled; and many flocking to it from the neighbouring countries it became, in a ſhort time, a very conſiderable place [y]. This battle is by moſt of the Roman hiſtorians ſaid to have been fought in the night-time (U), tho' Appian, and thoſe that have copied after him, tell us, that it happened in the day-time. Be that as it will, it was certainly attended with very fatal conſequences for Mithridates, who was forced, his army being entirely either cut off or diſperſed, to abandon his own dominions, and fly for ſhelter to the moſt remote parts of Scythia. Pompey, having concluded a peace with Tigranes, as we have related in the hiſtory of Armenia, and ſettled the affairs of that kingdom, began his Mithridates retires to Colchis.

[y] Appian. ubi ſupra. Strabo, l. xii. p. 555. Oros. l. vi. c. 4.

(U) Plutarch, Florus, Dio, Eutropius, and Oroſius (61) agree, that this memorable battle was fought in the night-time; but Appian (62) relates it as happening in the day-time, and after the following manner: Both armies, ſays he, were drawn up early in the morning, and ſome parties beginning to ſkirmiſh among the

(61) Ubi ſupra. Oroſ. l. vi. c. 4. (62) Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 239, 240.

his march in purſuit of Mithridates, through thoſe countries that lie about mount Caucaſus. The barbarous nations through which he paſſed, chiefly the Albanians and Iberians, attempted to ſtop his march; but were put to flight. However, he was obliged, by the exceſſive cold and deep roads, to paſs the winter near the river Cyrus. Early in the ſpring he purſued his march; but meeting with great oppoſition from the Iberians, a warlike nation, and entirely devoted to Mithridates, he was employed moſt part of the ſummer in reducing them, as we ſhall relate more at length in the hiſtory of that people. In the mean time Mithridates, who had wintered at Dioſcurias, on the iſthmus between the Euxine and Caſpian ſeas, and had been joined there by ſuch of his troops as had made their eſcape from the late unfortunate battle, continued his flight through the countries of the Achæans, Zygians, Heniochians, Cercetans, Moſchi and Colchians. Of theſe nations ſome received him kindly, and even entered into an alliance with him; through others he was forced to make himſelf a way with his ſword [z]. Pompey took the ſame rout, directing his courſe by the ſtars, eſpecially in the northern parts of Scythia, and carrying with him even proviſion of water to ſupply the army in the vaſt deſarts through which he marched. He ſpent two years in warring with theſe nations, and was often in danger of loſing both his life and his army; but at laſt he overcame them all, and believing Mithridates, of whom he could have no account, to be dead, he marched back to Armenia Minor, where he allowed ſome reſt to his ſoldiers, who were quite worn out with Pompey purſues him.

And ſubdues the Colchi, Albanians, &c.

[z] Liv. 101. Appian. p. 240. Dio. l. xxxvi.

the rocks, ſome of the king's horſe diſmounting, haſtened to the relief of their friends; but ſeeing the Romans ſupported by a body of cavalry, ran back for their horſes, that they might ſo be a match for the enemy; but the Pontics that were encamped on the eminences, obſerving their companions running back in ſuch a hurry, and apprehending that the enemy had entered the camp in ſome other part, betook themſelves to precipitate flight, and finding all the avenues poſſeſſed by the Romans, threw themſelves headlong from the rocks. As they were thus diſorder'd, and intangled among the rocks, it was eaſy for Pompey to perform the reſt. He put ten thouſand to the ſword, made a great many priſoners, and took their camp with all their baggage and proviſions. Thus Appian.

with the hardſhips they had endured in that expedition [a]. Having refreſhed his army, he marched into Pontus, to reduce ſome ſtrong holds, which were ſtill garriſoned by the king's troops. While he was at Aſpis in Pontus, many of the king's concubines were brought to him; but he ſent them all home to their parents, without offering them the leaſt injury, and thereby gained the affection of the chief lords of Pontus, whoſe daughters they were. The ſtrong caſtle of Symphori was delivered up to him by Stratonice one of the king's concubines, upon no other terms than that he would ſpare her ſon Xiphares, who was with the king, in caſe he ſhould fall into his hands. She likewiſe diſcovered to him great treaſures hid under ground, which he, with great generoſity, beſtowed upon her, reſerving for himſelf only ſome veſſels to ſet off his triumph [b]. Having taken another fort called the New-Caſtle, and to that time looked upon as impregnable, he found in it great ſtore of gold, ſilver, and other valuable things, which he afterwards conſecrated to Jupiter Capitolinus. Here in looking over the king's manuſcripts, he came to diſcover where the reſt of his treaſures were concealed, what troops he could raiſe and maintain, what ſums were yearly paid him by his ſubjects and tributaries, &c. whereby he could make a true eſtimate of his whole power and wealth [c]. Amongſt other manuſcripts he found ſome books of phyſic wrote by Mithridates himſelf, which he commanded Lenæus, a learned grammarian to tranſlate into Latin [d]. Pompey, having thus reduced all Pontus, marched into Syria, with a deſign to recover that kingdom, and paſſing through Arabia to penetrate as far as the Red-Sea. But while he was employed in this expedition news was brought him, that Mithridates, whom he believed dead, had appeared unexpectedly in Pontus at the head of a conſiderable army, and ſurpriſed Panticapæum, a famous empory at the mouth of the Euxine ſea. He had lain all this time concealed in the territories of a Scythian prince adjoining to the Palus Mœotis; but hearing that Pompey had left Pontus, and was engaged in other wars, he ventured out of his hiding-place, reſolved either to recover his paternal kingdom, or die in the attempt. He returned privately into Pontus, and managed matters there ſo dexterouſly, that the Roman garriſons knew nothing Mithridates appears again at the head of a conſiderable army.

[a] Dio. l. xxxvii. Plut. in Pomp. [b] Plutarch. Appian. Dio. ubi ſupra.
[c] Plutarch. ubi ſupra.
[d] Plin. l. xxv. c. 2.

nothing of his arrival till he appeared with a conſiderable army in the field. He advanced firſt to the caſtle of Symphori, and underſtanding that Stratonice had delivered it up to Pompey on condition he would ſave the life of her ſon in caſe he ſhould take him priſoner, the king immediately cauſed the youth, who was in the army, to be put to death, and his body to be left unburied, Stratonice beholding from the walls the cruel and unnatural murder, for he was her ſon by Mithridates, and had ſerved him with great fidelity. At the ſame time he ſent embaſſadors to Pompey to treat of a peace, offering to pay a yearly tribute to the republic on condition he reſtored him to his kingdom. Pompey replied, that he would hearken to no propoſals whatſoever without the king came to treat with him in perſon, as Tigranes had done. This Mithridates looked upon as no ways conſiſtent with his dignity, and therefore laying aſide all thoughts of an accommodation, began to make what preparations he could for renewing the war. He ſummoned all his ſubjects that were able to bear arms to meet at an appointed place, and having choſen out of the whole multitude ſixty cohorts, each conſiſting of a hundred men, incorporated them with the regular troops that were already on foot. Being now in a condition to act offenſively, forPompey had left but a ſmall number of troops in Pontus, he poſſeſſed himſelf of Phanagorium, Cherſoneſus, Theudoſia, Nymphæum, and ſeveral other important places. But in the mean time Caſtor, whom Mithridates had appointed governor of Phanagorium, falling out with Tripho, one of the king's favourite eunuchs, killed him, and dreading the king's reſentment, ſtirred up the inhabitants to a revolt; and by this Phanagorium was again loſt; but the caſtle which was defended by four of the king's ſons, Artaphernes, Darius, Xerxes, and Oxathres, held out for ſome time. The king haſtened to their relief; but the caſtle, being ſet on fire by the rebels, they were forced to ſurrender themſelves to Caſtor before his arrival. Theſe four ſons with one of the king's daughters, by name Cleopatra, Caſtor ſent to the Romans, and fortifying himſelf in the town, perſuaded moſt of the neighbouring cities, which were oppreſſed with heavy taxes, and ſtrangely harraſſed by the king's collectors, to join in the rebellion. Mithridates, finding that he could neither rely upon the ſoldiery, moſt of them being forced into the ſervice, nor on his other ſubjects, who were diſſatisfied by reaſon of the exorbitant taxes, ſent embaſſadors to invite invite the princes of Scythia to his relief, and with them his daughters to be beſtowed in marriage upon ſuch as ſhewed themſelves moſt inclined to aſſiſt him. But as the embaſſadors he employed on this occaſion were eunuchs, a race of men no leſs abhorred by the army than favoured by the king, over whom they had a great aſcendant, eſpecially in his old age, the ſoldiers who were ſent to attend them on their journey, put them all to the ſword as ſoon as they were out of the king's reach, and delivered his daughters up the Romans. Mithridates finding himſelf thus deprived of his children, betrayed by his army, and forſaken even by thoſe on whom he chiefly relied, could not yet be induced to ſubmit to the Romans, though Pompey promiſed him honourable conditions provided he came to treat with him in perſon. In this deſperate condition he left no ſtone unturned to ſtir up the princes of Aſia againſt the Romans, eſpecially the Parthians, but finding them awed by the great opinion they all had of Pompey, he had recourſe at laſt to the European Gauls, whom he underſtood to be at war with the Romans; and having ſent before ſome of his truſty friends to engage them in his favour, taking leave of his own kingdom, he began his long march, deſigning to paſs through Boſphorus Cimmerius, Scythia, Pannonia, &c. and joining the Gauls, paſs the Alps and invade Italy. This deſign was no ſooner known in the army, but the ſoldiers began openly to complain and mutiny, exaggerating the boldneſs of the attempt, the length of the march, and the inſurmountable difficulties that muſt neceſſarily attend ſuch a deſperate enterprize. The chief commanders did all that lay in their power to divert him from it, repreſenting to him, that if he was not able to cope with the Romans in his own kingdom, much leſs would he be a match for them in Italy or Gaul, where they could daily receive new ſupplies, whereas he would loſe the beſt part of his army in ſo long and difficult a march, and the reſt perhaps in the firſt engagement, without any poſſibility of repairing the loſs. But all was to no purpoſe, for they found him ſo unalterably fixed in his reſolution, that he cauſed thoſe to be put to death who with moſt warmth remonſtrated againſt it, not ſparing even his own ſon Exipodras for dropping ſome unguarded expreſſions on that occaſion [e]. Thus they were forced to let him purſue his own own measures, till they found a more proper opportunity to oppose them, which soon after offered as they were encamped at Bosphorus Cimmerius on their march into Scythia. Here Pharnaces, the king's favourite son, whom he had appointed to succeed him, observing the general discontent that reigned in the army, began to entertain thoughts of placing the crown on his own head, and not doubting but the soldiery would stand by him, if he declared against the intended expedition into Italy, openly protested among the Roman deserters, who were a considerable part of the army, that if they would follow him, he would return into Pontus. The Romans, who were well apprised of the danger that attended such an undertaking, and had most of all exclaimed against it, promised to support him to the utmost of their power, and even encouraged him, upon some expressions, which he purposely dropt, to assume the title of king, a title which his father seemed determined to hold till he had destroyed by his rash and desperate attempts himself, his friends, and his army. Pharnaces, finding he could depend on the Romans, engaged the same night most of the chief commanders in his party, and by their means the greater part of the soldiery. It was agreed that next morning by break of day all those who had declared in his favour should appear in arms, and with a loud shout proclaim Pharnaces king; which was done accordingly, and the shout returned even by those, whom Pharnaces had not thought fit to let into the secret. The king, who had taken up his quarters in the city, being awaked by the noise, sent out some of his domestics to know what had happened in the army. Neither did the officers or soldiers dissemble the matter, but boldly answered, that they had chosen a young king instead of an old dotard governed by eunuchs. Hereupon Mithridates mounted on horse-back, and attended by his guards, went out to appease the tumult; but his guards forsaking him, and his horse being killed under him, he was obliged to fly back into the city; from whence he sent several of his attendants one after another to desire of his son a safe conduct for himself and his friends. But as none of the messengers returned, some being slain, others siding with the new king, Mithridates endeavoured to move his son to compassion by signifying to him from the walls the distressed condition he was reduced to by a son, whom he had favoured above the rest of his children; but finding him

And poſſeſſes himſelf of ſeveral important places.

The army mutiny againſt Mithridates.

[e] Dio, l. xxxvii. Oros. l. vi. c. 5. Appian. p. 246. Flor. l. iii. c. 5. Plutarch. in Pomp.

His son revolts.

him no ways affected by his speech, turning to the gods, he beseeched them with many tears to make a son know one day by experience the grief and agony which a father must feel in seeing his love and tenderness requited with such ungrateful and monstrous returns. Having thus spoke, he thanked in a very obliging manner those who had stood by him to the last, and exhorted them to make their submission to the new king on the best terms they could procure, adding, that as for himself, he was determined not to outlive the rebellion of a son, whom he had always distinguished with particular marks of paternal affection. After this he withdrew into the apartment of his wives and concubines, where he first took poison himself and then presented it to them, and to his favourite daughters Mithridatis and Nissa, who not long before had been betrothed to the kings of Egypt and Cyprus. To the women it proved immediate death, but on the king who had from his infancy inured his constitution to poisonous potions, it had so slow an operation, that he was forced, through fear of falling into the rebel's hands to recur to his sword. Neither did the wound, as he was greatly weakened by the poison, prove mortal; so that the rebels having in the mean time stormed the town, and broke into the house, found the king wallowing in his blood, but still alive, and in his senses; which Pharnaces hearing, sent some of those that were about him to dress his wound, with a design to deliver him to the Romans, and thereby ingratiate himself with Pompey. But in the mean time a Gaul, who served in the army, by name Bitæus, or Bithocus, entering the king's room in quest of booty, and being touched with compassion in seeing him forsaken by all his friends, and struggling on the bare ground with the pangs of death, drawing his sword, put an end to his present agonies, and prevented the insults which he chiefly apprehended, if he should fall alive into his son's hands. The barbarian is said when he first saw the king, to have been so awed with the majesty of his countenance, that, forgetful of his booty, he fled out of the room, but being called back, and earnestly entreated by the dying prince to put an end to his misery, he summoned all his courage to perform, as he did with a trembling hand, that office, and immediately retired without touching any thing that belonged to the king, tho' the hopes of a rich booty, was the only motive that led him in thither [f]. Thus died

Mithridates lays violent hands on himself. Year of the flood 2935. Before Christ 64.

[f] Dio, l. xxxvii. Liv. l. 102. Flor. l. iii. c. 5. Valer. Maxim. l. ix. c. 2. Plin. l. xxv. c. 2. Justin. l. xxxvii. c. 2. Appian. p. 248. &c.

died Mithridates at Panticapæum in the Cimmerian Bosphorus (W), in the sixtieth year of his reign, a prince, as Velleius Paterculus [g] describes him, neither to be passed over in

His character.

[g] Velleii Patercul. l. ii. c. 18.

(W) Appian (63) tells us, that Pharnaces having conspired against his father's life, and being discovered by his accomplices on the rack, was apprehended, but pardoned at the entreaties of Menophanes, one of the king's chief favourites. Dio makes no mention of his being pardoned, but often repeats, that the king, finding him to be at the head of the conspiracy, sent a detachment of his guards to seize him, but that they being won over by him, joined the other conspirators, took the city of Panticapæum, and the king himself prisoner. He adds this observation, that Mithridates, in other respects a wise prince, did not consider that arms and a multitude of subjects do not avail without their good will; but on the contrary, the more numerous they are, the more they are to be dreaded, if they are disaffected to the prince or his government. As to the time which the Mithridatic war lasted, Orosius writes thus (64): "The Mithridatic war, "which involved many provinces, was protracted for the space "of forty years. For it broke out in the year 662 of Rome, a "year remarkable for the first civil war, and in the consulship "of Cicero and Antonius; to use the expression of that excel-"lent poet Lucan, Barbarico vix consummata veneno, it was "ended not by dint of sword, but by poison". But this space consists of thirty years only, and how most authors came to write forty, is not easy to find out. Justin (65), Florus (66), and Eutropius (67) will have the Mithridatic war to have lasted forty years; Appian (68) writes, that Mithridates warred with the Romans forty-two years; the inscription which Pompey placed under the spoils consecrated to Minerva in the temple at Rome, informs us, as it is related by Pliny (69), that the Mithridatic war lasted only thirty years. But neither is it an easy matter to make out even the space of thirty years, for from the first breaking out of the war to the death of Mithridates, we can reckon but twenty-six years, even taking the years of peace between the first and second war into the account; so that the war may be said to have lasted thirty years only to make up an even number; this Tully in an oration, which he made during his consulship (70), says, that he had defended C. Rabirius, forty years before that honour was conferred upon him: but Dio by a more exact computation shews this to have happened only thirty-six years before that time (71).

(63) Appian. p. 246. (64) Oros. l. vi. c. 1. (65) Justin. l. xxxvii. c. 1. (66) Florus. l. iii. c. 5. (67) Eutrop. l. vi. (68) Appian. p. 170. (69) Plin. l. vii. c. 26. (70) Cic. in Pisonem. (71) Dio, l. xxxvii.

in ſilence, nor mentioned without reſpect, endowed with eminent virtues, which would have put him upon a level with the beſt of princes, had he not ſtained them with no leſs vices; an experienced commander, but more to be admired for the greatneſs of mind with which he bore misfortunes, than for the many victories he gained. Tully calls him the greateſt king after Alexander that ever ſwayed a ſceptre [h]. He ſubdued twenty-four nations, and could talk their various languages with the ſame eaſe and fluency as his own. He is ſaid to have applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Greek tongue, and even to have wrote in that dialect a learned treatiſe of botanics [i]. Pliny tells us [k], that he had extraordinary ſkill in phyſic, and was the inventor, not only of Mithridate, but of many other uſeful medicines. But nothing gives us a greater idea of this prince than the joy which the Romans ſhewed, notwithſtanding their many victories, and the low ebb he was reduced to, when they firſt heard the news of his death. Pompey, who was at that time engaged in a war with the Jews, received the firſt notice of the death of Mithridates, as he was on his march to Jeruſalem. The meſſenger, who brought the joyful tidings, was ſent by Pharnaces, and appeared unexpectedly before Pompey with the branch of a laurel, as was cuſtomary on the like occaſions, twiſted round the head of his javelin. When he heard what had happened at Panticapæum, he was ſo impatient to impart it to the ſoldiery, that he could not even wait till they raiſed him a mount with turf to ſpeak from thence to the army, according to the cuſtom of the camp; but ordered thoſe who were by him to form a kind of mount with their ſaddles, and from thence acquainted the ſoldiery that Mithridates had laid violent hands on himſelf, and his ſon Pharnaces was ready to acknowledge the kingdom as a gift of the people of Rome, or reſign it, if they were unwilling he ſhould reign. This news was received with joyful ſhouts of the whole army, and the day ſolemnized with feaſts and ſacrifices throughout the camp, as if in Mithridates alone all the enemies of the republic had died [l]. Pompey diſpatched without delay a meſſenger with letters to the ſenate, acquainting them with the death of Mithridates and the ſubmiſſion of his ſon Pharnaces. When his letters were read, the ſenators were ſo overoverjoyed, that they appointed, at the propoſal of Cicero then conſul, twelve days for returning due thanks to the gods, who had delivered them from ſuch an inſulting and powerful enemy [m]; and the tribunes of the people enacted a law, whereby Pompey, in conſideration of his eminent ſervice in the Mithridatic war, was to wear a crown of laurel with the triumphal gown at the Circenſian ſports, and a purple gown at the ſcenical plays [n].

The joy of the Romans at his death.

[h] Cicer. in Lucull. [i] Epiphan. Panar. tom. 1. [k] Plin. l. xxv. c. 2. [l] Plut. in Pomp.

But to return to Pharnaces, when he heard of his father's death, he cauſed his body to be preſerved in brine, propoſing to preſent it to Pompey, who had promiſed to return into Pontus after the reduction of Judæa, and there ſettle matters to his ſatisfaction. And accordingly, having taken the city and temple of Jeruſalem, he ſet out with two legions for Pontus, and being arrived at Sinope, he was met there by the embaſſadors from Pharnaces, acquainting him, that their maſter had forbore aſſuming the title of king, till his will and pleaſure was known; that he put both himſelf and the kingdom entirely into his hands, and that he was willing to attend him at what time or place he thought fit to appoint. The ſame embaſſadors delivered up to Pompey thoſe who had taken Manius Aquilius the Roman legate, whom Mithridates had put to a cruel death, all the priſoners, hoſtages, and deſerters, whether Romans, Greeks, or Barbarians, and the body of Mithridates, with his rich apparel and arms, which were greatly admired by Pompey and the other Romans. Both ſoldiers and officers flocked to ſee the king's body, but Pompey declined that ſight; and ſaying that all enmity between that prince and the people of Rome was ended with his life, he returned the body to the embaſſadors, and cauſed it to be interred with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence among his anceſtors in the burying-place of the kings of Pontus, Pompey defraying all the charges of that ceremony, which was the moſt coſtly and pompous that ever had been ſeen in thoſe parts. With the body Pompey reſtored his wearing apparel and armour; but the ſcabbard of his ſword, which coſt four hundred talents, was ſtolen by Rublius a Roman, and ſold to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia; and his cap or turbant, which was a very curious piece of workmanſhip, was privately taken by one Caius, who preſented it to Fauſtus the ſon

[m] Cicero de provin. conſular. [n] Vellei. Patercul. l. ii. c. 40. Dio, l. xxxvii.

ſon of Sylla, in whoſe houſe it was kept, and ſhewn for many years after among the many rarities which Sylla had brought out of Aſia. Pompey beſtowed the kingdom of Boſphorus on Pharnaces, and honoured him with the title of a friend and ally of the people of Rome [o]. Pharnaces, being thus acknowledged king of Boſphorus, ſent orders to all the garriſons of Pontus to ſubmit themſelves with the caſtles and treaſures which they were truſted with to Pompey, who by that means amaſſed an immenſe booty. In the city of Talaura, which Mithridates uſed to call his wardrobe, he found two thouſand cups of onyx ſet in gold, with ſuch ſtore of gold and ſilver veſſels, of coſtly furniture, of ſaddles, bridles, and trappings ſet with jewels and precious ſtones, that the Roman commiſſaries ſpent thirty days in taking an inventory of the whole [p]. In another caſtle he found three large tables with nine ſalvers of maſſy gold enriched with precious ſtones to an ineſtimable value, the ſtatues of Minerva, Mars, and Apollo, of pure gold and moſt curious workmanſhip, and a pair of gaming tables of two precious ſtones, three foot broad and four foot long, on which was a moon of gold weighing thirty pounds, with their men all of the ſame precious ſtone. In a fort ſituated among the mountains were delivered up to him the king's ſtatue of maſſy gold eight cubits high, his throne and ſceptre, and the bed of Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes. Moſt of theſe treaſures had been tranſmitted to him from his anceſtors, chiefly from Darius king of Perſia; ſome belonged to the Ptolemies of Egypt, and had been depoſited by Cleopatra, as we have hinted above, in the hands of the Coans, who delivered them to Mithridates; great part of them had been collected by the king himſelf, who was very fond of rich and ſtately furniture [q]. Pompey, having thus got entire poſſeſſion of Pontus, and reduced it to the form of a Roman province, marched into Aſia properly ſo called, and, having wintered at Epheſus, early in the ſpring ſet out for Italy with a fleet of ſeven hundred ſhips. As he brought over his army with him, the ſenate was under no ſmall apprehenſion, leſt he ſhould make himſelf abſolute and rule without controul. But he no ſooner landed at Brunduſium than

Pompey beſtows the kingdom of Boſphorus on Pharnaces.

[o] Dio, l. xxxvii. Appian. p. 250, 251, 252, 253, 254.
[p] Appian. p. 251, 252.
[q] Appian. ubi ſupra. Plin. l. xxxvii. c. 2.

than he disbanded the army, without waiting for any decree either of the senate or people; what neither his friends nor his enemies had believed [r]. His triumph lasted two whole days, and though he was attended in his triumphal chariot by three hundred and twenty-four captives of distinction, among whom were five sons and two daughters of Mithridates, yet he would not suffer any of them to be put to death, as it had been practised by others, but sent them all back, except such as were of royal extraction, to their respective countries, and even supplied them with money to defray the charges of their journey [s]. After his triumph he delivered into the treasury twenty thousand talents, though at the dismissing of the army he had divided sixteen thousand talents among the tribunes and centurions, two thousand sestertiums among the quæstors, and had given to each soldier fifty sestertiums.

Pharnaces II. POMPEY had no sooner left Asia, but Pharnaces fell unexpectedly upon the Phanagorenses, a People of Bosphorus, whom Pompey had declared free, because they had revolted the first of all from Mithridates, and by their example induced others to abandon the king's party. Pharnaces besieged their city, Phanagoria, and kept them blocked up, till for want of provisions they were forced to sally out, and put all to the issue of a battle; which proving unsuccessful, they delivered up themselves and their city to the conqueror [t]. Some years after, the civil war breaking out between Cæsar and Pompey, he laid hold of that opportunity to recover the provinces which his father had formerly possessed; and having raised a considerable army, over-ran Pontus, Colchis, Bithynia, Armenia, and the kingdom of Moschis, where he plundered, as Strabo observes [u], the temple of the goddess Leucothea. He also took the strong and important city of Sinope, but could not reduce Amisus. But in the mean time Cæsar, having got the better of Pompey and his party, appointed Cn. Domitius Calvinus governor of Asia enjoining him to make war upon Pharnaces with the legions that were quartered in that province [w]. Domitius immediately dispatched embassadors to Pharnaces, commanding him to withdraw his troops troops from Armenia and Cappadocia. The king returned anſwer, that he was willing to abandon Cappadocia; but as for the kingdom of Armenia Minor, it was part of his hereditary dominions, and therefore he would not reſign it, till he had an opportunity of laying his pretenſions before Cæſar himſelf, whom he was ready to obey in all things. Hereupon Domitius, drawing together what forces he could, marched into Cappadocia, which he recovered without oppoſition, Pharnaces having abandoned it to make a ſtand in Armenia, which lay nearer his own dominions. Thither Domitius purſued him, and having overtaken him near Nicopolis, found his army drawn up in battle-array, and the king ready to come to an engagement, which Domitius not declining, both armies advanced. The king at the head of a choice body of men fell upon the Romans left wing, conſiſting moſtly of raw and undiſciplined Aſiatics; and having without much ado put them to flight, penetrated to the center, where the thirty-fifth legion, the only one which Domitius had, after a faint reſiſtance gave ground, and, retiring to the neighbouring mountains, left their allies to ſhift for themſelves, who were all cut off. Domitius with the remains of his ſcattered army marched back into Cappadocia, and from thence, winter drawing on, into the province of Aſia[x]. The king being puffed up with this victory, and hearing that Cæſar with the flower of the Roman forces was engaged at the ſiege of Alexandria, appointed one Aſander governor of Boſphorus, and marched himſelf into Cappadocia in purſuit of Domitius, with a deſign to invade Aſia and recover all the provinces which had been once ſubdued by his father. Bithynia and Cappadocia, readily ſubmitted; but Armenia the Leſſer, which was held by Dejotarus, made ſo vigorous a reſiſtance, that he was forced to give over the enterprize, leſt the Romans ſhould in the mean time ſtrengthen themſelves in Aſia, whither he was in haſte to march, in hopes of meeting there with the ſame ſucceſs as his father Mithridates had done. But before he reached that province, he was informed that Aſander had revolted, in hopes of gaining thereby the good-will of the Romans, and obtaining of them the kingdom of Boſphorus for himſelf. At the ſame time he received intelligence, that Cæſar, having at laſt reduced Alexandria and ſettled the affairs of Egypt and Syria, was marching into Armenia. He was not a little diſmayed at this news, and therefore without delay diſpatched embaſſadors to ſue for peace, hoping that Cæſar, who was haſtening into Italy with a deſign to paſs over into Afric, would willingly give ear to any propoſals of that nature. Cæſar courteouſly entertained the embaſſadors, and though he did not propoſe to agree to their conditions, yet, that he might come upon Pharnaces unawares, he ſhewed himſelf very deſirous of entering into a treaty of peace. But in the mean time he purſued his march with all poſſible expedition, and arriving on the confines of Pontus, ordered all the troops that were quartered in the neighbouring provinces to join him; for he had brought from Alexandria but one legion, namely the ſixth, and that conſiſting of a thouſand men only, the reſt having been killed at the ſiege of Alexandria. Beſides this veteran legion he found at the place of the general rendezvous three others, but all of them very indifferently armed and worſe diſciplined [y]. With theſe forces, however, ſuch as they were, he advanced againſt Pharnaces, who being greatly frightened at his approach by reaſon of the ſucceſs that had attended him in all his expeditions, again diſpatched embaſſadors to him with a crown of gold, offering him his daughter in marriage, and promiſing to do whatever he ſhould require. The embaſſadors took care to let Cæſar know, that their maſter, though highly obliged to Pompey, yet had never been prevailed upon to ſend him any ſupplies during the civil war, which Dejotarus king of Armenia the Leſſer, whom he had honoured with his friendſhip, had done. Cæſar returned anſwer, that he was willing to conclude a peace with Pharnaces, provided he retired without delay from Pontus, returned all the captives and hoſtages, whether Romans or their allies, and reſtored the goods of the Roman citizens and publicans which he had ſeized ſince he firſt took up arms. He added, that as to his not ſending ſupplies to Pompey, they ought rather to have concealed ſuch an ungrateful proceeding of their maſter, than alledged it as any merit; ſince the forſaking of one, to whom he was indebted for his crown, beſpoke him a man of mean, ſelfiſh, and wicked principles [z]. Pharnaces upon the return of his embaſſadors acquainted Cæſar, that he agreed to the conditions; but finding that Cæſar's affairs called called him into Italy, he required a longer term of time for the performance of what was ſtipulated between them, ſtarting daily new difficulties, in hopes that Cæſar would in the mean time be obliged to depart, and leave the affairs of Pontus in the ſame poſture he had found them. Cæſar ſeeing himſelf thus diſappointed, and put off from day to day, could not longer brook the king's deceitful behaviour. Wherefore he determined to put himſelf at the head of his ſmall army, and attack the enemy in his camp, when he leaſt expected it. And accordingly marching out in the night, he came by break of day in ſight of the king's army, and uttering theſe words, Shall this treacherous parricide go unpuniſhed? broke into the camp at the head of a thouſand horſe. The king's chariots, which were armed with ſcythes, cauſed ſome ſmall diſorder among Cæſar's horſe; but in the mean time the reſt of his army coming up, he put the enemies to flight, and obtained a complete victory [a]. This battle was fought near the place where Mithridates had routed with great ſlaughter the Roman army under the command of Triarius. Moſt of the kings army were either taken or cut in pieces; but Pharnaces himſelf had the good luck to make his eſcape, while the Romans were buſy in plundering the camp. This victory was ſo quick, that Cæſar in a letter to his friend Aminitius, or Anitius at Rome, expreſſed it in three words, thus: I came, I ſaw, I conquered. He ever afterwards uſed to call Pompey a fortunate, rather than a great commander, ſince he had gained his chief glory in the Mithridatic war, fighting with ſo cowardly an enemy [b]. He divided the rich booty and the ſpoils of the camp among his ſoldiers, and becauſe Mithridates had erected a trophy near that place as a monument of his victory over Triarius, which Cæſar, as it was conſecrated to the gods, did not think lawful to pull down, he ſet up another over-againſt it to tranſmit to poſterity his victory over Pharnaces. After this victory he recovered and reſtored to the allies of Rome all the places which Pharnaces had poſſeſſed himſelf of during the war, declared Amiſus a free city, and appointed Mithridates Pergamenus, of whom more hereafter, king of Boſphorus in the room of Pharnaces. Having thus ſettled the affairs of Pontus, he ſet ſail for Italy, leaving Domitius Calvinus to purſue the war againſt Pharnaces, if he ſhould appear again in the field. Pharnaces had retired after the battle to Sinope with a thouſand horſe, where he was quickly beſieged by Domitius, to whom he ſurrendered the town upon no other conditions than that he ſhould be ſuffered to retire into Boſphorus with the ſmall body that attended him. This Domitius willingly granted, but cauſed all the kings horſes to be killed, ſince he had aſked a ſafe conduct only for his horſemen [c]. With theſe and a band of Scythians and Sarmatians he attempted to recover the kingdom of Boſphorus; but being met between Theudoſia and Panticapæum, both which cities he had reduced, by Aſander, who was ſtill in poſſeſſion of the kingdom, a ſharp engagement enſued, wherein the king's men, as not being uſed to fight on foot, were put to flight, and Pharnaces himſelf, who remained alone in the field, ſurrounded by the enemy and cut in pieces, after having reigned in Boſphorus Cimmerius, the kingdom which Pompey had beſtowed upon him [d], according to Appian, fifteen years, according to others ſeventeen.

Recovers great part of his hereditary dominions.

[r] Vellei. Patercul. l. ii. c. 40. Plutarch. Appian. Dio, ubi supra. [s] Appian ubi supra. [t] Appian. p. 253, 254. [u] Strab. l. xi. p. 254. [w] Dio, l, xlii. Hirtius de bell. Alexandrin.

Defeats Domitius Calvinus.

[x] Hirtius de bell. civil. l. ii. & Appian. p. 484. & Dio, l. xlii.

Sends embaſſadors to Cæſar to treat of a peace.

[y] Hirtius, ubi ſupra.

[z] Hirtius, ubi ſupra. Dio. l. xli. xlii.

Overcome by Cæſar.

[a] Appian de bell civil. l. ii. p. 485. Jul. Frontin. Strategemat. l. ii. c. 2. [b] Plutarch. in Cæſare. Appian. ubi ſupra, p. 254.

And killed by Aſander.

Darius. UPON the death of Pharnaces the kingdom of Pontus was again reduced to the form of a province, and ſo continued to the triumvirate of Marc Antony, who after the battle at Philippi conferred it upon Darius the ſon of Pharnaces for his ſervices during the civil war [e]. He continued faithful to the Romans, but did nothing during his reign worth mentioning.

Polemon I. DARIUS was ſucceeded in the kingdom by Polemon, preferred to that honour by Marc Antony. He was the ſon of Zeno, a famous orator of Laodicea, and greatly favoured by Antony. From him that part of Pontus, which borders on Cappadocia, borrowed the name of Pontus Polemoniacus. He attended Marc Antony in his expedition againſt the Parthians, and being taken priſoner in the unſucceſsfull battle fought by Statianus, he was ſent by the king of the Medes, an ally of the Parthians, to conclude a peace with the Romans. In which embaſſy he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that Antony added the kingdom of Armenia to his other dominions. In the war between Antony and Auguſtus he ſided with the former; but after the battle at Actium, was received in favour by the latter; and being ſent by Agrippa againſt Scribonius, who upon the death of Aſander had uſurped the kingdom of Boſphorus, he overcame him, and reduced the kingdom of Colchis, which was beſtowed upon him him by Agrippa, who likewiſe honoured him with the title of friend and ally of the people of Rome. He afterwards waged war with the neighbouring Barbarians, refuſing to live in ſubjection to the Romans, but was overcome, taken, and put to death by the Aſpungitani, a people bordering, according to Strabo, on the Palus Mœotis [f].

[c] Appian. ubi ſupra, p. 485. [d] Appian in Mithridatic. p. 254. [e] Appian. bell. civil. l. v.

UPON his death his ſon Polemon II. was by the emperor Caligula raiſed to the throne of Boſphorus and Pontus. But the emperor obliged him to exchange the kingdom of Boſphorus with part of Cilicia, and Nero with his conſent reduced that part of Pontus, which he enjoyed, to the form of a province. He fell in love with Berenice daughter to Agrippa king of Judæa, and, in order to marry her, embraced the Jewiſh religion. But as ſhe became ſoon tired of his riotous way of living, and returned to her father, ſo he renounced his new religion, and again embraced the ſuperſtitions of paganiſm [g]. Polemon dying without iſſue, the antient kingdom of Pontus was parcelled out into ſeveral parts, and added to the provinces of Bithynia, Galatia, and Cappadocia, only that part of it, which was called Pontus Polemoniacus, retaining the dignity of a diſtinct and ſeparate province. During the civil diſcords between Veſpaſian and Vitellius, one Anicetus, firſt a ſlave, afterwards freedman to king Polemon, and laſtly commander of the royal navy, took up arms with a deſign to reſcue the kingdom from the Roman bondage; and being joined by great multitudes, drawn together with the proſpect of ſpoil, overran the country, and poſſeſſed himſelf of Trapeſund, a city founded by the Grecians on the utmoſt confines of Pontus. Here he cut in pieces a cohort made up of the inhabitants, but which had been formerly preſented with the privilege of Roman citizens. He likewiſe burnt their fleet, and with ſcorn and inſults ſcoured the ſea, Mucianus having called to Byzantium moſt of the Roman gallies. Hereupon Veſpaſian, who was at that time in Syria, ſent Verdius Geminus into Pontus with a choice body of vexillaries from the legions. He, aſſailing the enemy, while they were in diſorder, and roaming aſunder in purſuit of prey, drove them into their veſſels; then with ſome gallies chaſed Anicetus into the mouth of the river Chobus, where he thought himſelf ſafe Polemon II.

[f] Strab. l. xi. Plutarch. in Anton. Appian. bell. civil. l. v. Dio, l. xlix, li, lii. [g] Joſeph. l. xx. Antiq. Dio, Zonaras, Eutropius, &c.

under the protection of Sedochus king of the Lazians, whose alliance he had purchased with large sums and rich presents. Sedochus at first refused to deliver him to the Romans, but was soon prevailed upon, partly by threats, partly by presents, to surrender both him and all the other fugitives who had taken sanctuary in his dominions [h]. Thus ended that servile war, and the kingdom of Pontus continued to be a province of the empire till the time of David and Alexis Comneni, who, being driven from Constantinople by the French and Venetians under the command of Baldwin earl of Flanders, settled, the one at Heraclea, the other at Trebisond. The new troubles that arose among the Latins gave Alexis Comnenes, an opportunity of erecting here a new empire, which comprehended great part of Pontus, and was known by the name of the empire of Trebisond. The Comneni held it above two hundred and fifty years, till the time of Mohamed II. who carried David Comnenes, the last emperor of Trebisond, prisoner to Constantinople, with all his family, and subjected his empire to that of Constantinople, in which abject slavery Trebisond and all Pontus have continued ever since.

[h] Tacit. hist. l. iii.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

The hiſtory of the Cappadocians.

SECT. I.

The deſcription of Cappadocia.

THIS country was known to the antients by the name of Syria or Aſſyria, and the inhabitants by that of Leucoſyri. It borrowed the name of Cappadocia, according to Pliny [h], from the river Cappadox; according to Herodianus [i], from one Cappadocus the founder of this nation and kingdom. Others ſuppoſe the name of Cappadocia derived from ſome barbarous word, whereof the meaning is unknown to us; for the river Cappadox is mentioned only by Pliny, and Cappadocus, the pretended founder of the nation, is ſpoke of by none of the antient hiſtorians. Cappadocia in antient times compriſed all that country which lies between mount Taurus and the Euxine ſea, and was divided by the Perſians into two ſatrapies or governments, by the Macedonians into two kingdoms, the one called Cappadocia ad Taurum and Cappadocia Magna, the other Cappadocia ad Pontum, and commonly Pontus. Of the latter we have given the hiſtory already; of the former we are to write in this chapter. Cappadocia Magna, or Cappadocia properly ſo called, lies between the thirty-eighth and forty-firſt degrees of north latitude, and was bounded by Pontus on the north, by Lycaonia and part of Armenia Minor on the ſouth, by Galatia on the weſt, and by the Euphrates and part of Armenia Minor on the eaſt. Under king Archelaus and ſome of his predeceſſors, Cappadocia was divided, as Strabo informs us, into ten prefectures, five of which lay lay near mount Taurus, viz. Melitena, Cataonia, Cilicia, Tyanitis, Iſſauritis; the other five comprehended the remaining part of the kingdom; but Strabo leaves us in the dark as to their ſituation, and the towns of note which they contained.

Name and diviſion.

[h] Lib. vi. c. 3.

[i] Herodian. apud Stephan.

Cities.

The metropolis of all Cappadocia in antient times was Mazaca or Euſebia, called afterwards Cæſarea by Tiberius in honour of Auguſtus. This latter name it ſtill retains, being called by the inhabitants Keſaria. It is built round a rock, as Tavernier informs us, on the top of which ſtands a caſtle, and is ſtill a populous and conſiderable city. It was the ſee of the renowned St. Baſil, and its archbiſhop to this day holds the firſt rank among the prelates who are under the patriarch of Conſtantinople. The other cities of note in Cappadocia, are, Comana, called Comana Cappadocia, to diſtinguiſh it from another city of the ſame name in Pontus. This city was famous in antient times for a temple conſecrated to Bellona, whoſe prieſts and attendants of both ſexes amounted in Strabo's time to the number of ſix thouſand and upwards. The chief-prieſt was lord of the adjoining country, and in honour next to the king, being commonly of the royal family. Nyſſa in Chriſtian times the ſee of Gregory, ſirnamed Nyſſenus, and brother to St. Baſil. Nazianzum the ſee and place of nativity of another Gregory, no leſs celebrated by the writers of the eccleſiaſtic hiſtory. Archelais, ſo called from Archelaus king of Cappadocia, who either founded, or repaired and embelliſhed it. Diocæſarea placed by Pliny in Cappadocia, by others in Phrygia, and antiently called, as we read in Strabo, Cabira. Fauſtinopolis, ſo called in honour of Fauſtina, wife to the emperor Antoninus. Cabiſtra, mentioned by Tully in his letters [k]. Pterium, memorable for the overthrow of Cræſus by Cyrus, which was attended with the ruin of the Lydian kingdom.

Rivers.

The rivers of this country that deſerve any notice, are, the Melas, which indeed riſes in the weſtern borders of Galatia, but paſſes through the ſouthern borders of this kingdom and Armenia, and falls into the Euphrates; the Halys, which riſes near Nazianzum, and bending firſt to the weſt, and then to the north, paſſes through Galatia and Paphlagonia, and diſcharges itſelf into the Euxine ſea between Sinope and Amiſus; the Iris, now Caſalmac, which, as Strabo informs us, paſſed through Amaſia maſia his own country, and receiving the Themiſcyra falls into the Euxine ſea not far from Amiſus.

[k] Cic. lib. xv. epiſt. 11. ad ſenat. & ad Attic. l. v. epiſt. 18.

THIS country produces excellent wines and moſt kind of fruits; and was formerly rich in mines of ſilver, braſs, iron, and allom; affording alſo great ſtore of alabaſter, chryſtal, jaſper, and onyx-ſtone. But it was chiefly celebrated by the antients for its breed of horſes, which were and ſtill are in great requeſt. Some parts of Cappadocia are very mountainous and barren, the Antitaurus running through thoſe provinces which border on the two Armenias. In this part of Cappadocia ſtands mount Argaus, of ſuch an extraordinary height, that one may ſee, as ſome authors relate, from the top of it the Euxine ſea on one ſide, and the Mediterranean on the other. Soil and climate.

CAPPADOCIA was probably peopled by Togarmah, the laſt ſon of Gomer, and his deſcendants; for it lies contiguous to thoſe countries, which the reſt of Gomer's family poſſeſſed, and is ſituated conformable to that expreſſion of the prophet [l], Gomer and all his bands, the houſe of Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his bands; which ſeems to be ſpoken of their ſituation with reſpect to Judæa. Turcomannia, where many have placed this colony, ſeems too remote, becauſe they are ſaid to have traded to the fairs of Tyre [m]; and what confirms their having ſettled in Cappadocia is, that they brought horſes, horſemen and mules; for that country produced excellent horſes and mules, which laſt are ſuppoſed to have come firſt from thence. Beſides in the borders of Pontus and Cappadocia, we find a people called Trocmi, Trogmi, or Trocmeni, as Stephanus calls them. In the council of Chalcedon they are called Trocmades or Trogmades, which names have an affinity with Togarmah, or, as the Greeks uſually write it, Thorgama. Bochart [n] obſerves, that the Cappadocians are ſaid by the fathers to be deſcended from Caphtorim, the laſt of the offſpring of Mizraim, and that Caphtor is rendered by the ſeptuagint Cappadocia. In this without all doubt they followed the Jews, who explain thoſe names the ſame way, as do the three Chaldee paraphraſts. But by Cappadocia in theſe writings is not to be underſtood Cappadocia in Aſia Minor, as Bochart judged; but ſome place in Egypt, generally Origin.

[l] Ezek. xxxviii. 6. [m] Ezek. xxvii. 14. [n] Bochart. Phaleg. l. iv. c. 31.

nerally ſuppoſed by the rabbies to be Demyat or Demietta [o], commonly confounded with Peluſium.

Government. As to the ſtate of this nation in the early times we are quite in the dark. Cteſias, as quoted by Diodorus Siculus, tells us, that from the very beginning it was ſubject to foreign princes. But that writer is no-ways to be depended upon. Cappadocia was without all doubt a province of the kingdom of Lydia, and after the overthrow of Cræſus paſſed from the Lydians to the Perſians, to whom the Cappadocians paid an annual tribute, as Strabo writes [p], of fifteen hundred horſes, two thouſand mules, and fifty thouſand ſheep. The firſt king of Cappadocia we find mentioned in hiſtory is Pharnaces, a noble Perſian, who having ſaved Cyrus from a ravenous lion, running full ſpeed againſt him while he was hunting, was by him rewarded with his ſiſter Atoſſa and the kingdom of Cappadocia. Diodorus ſtiles him only governor of Cappadocia. This country was afterwards ſubdued by the Macedonians, and changed into a province; but again reſtored to its former ſtate by Ariarathes III. who laying hold of the opportunity which the diſſenſions that reigned among the ſucceſſors of Alexander gave him, put Amyntas their governor to death, and, with forces raiſed in Armenia reinſtated himſelf in the kingdom, which he tranſmitted to his poſterity, who held it till the reign of Ariarathes VIII. the laſt of the royal race of Pharnaces. Two other families reigned in Cappadocia, namely thoſe of Ariobarzanes and Archelaus; but under the latter the kingdom was changed into a province of the Roman empire, nor ever more returned to its former ſtate. It was greatly enlarged under the emperors, by the additions of Pontus and part of Paphlagonia; and thus it ſtood in the time of Ptolemy, who reckons Pontus Galaticus, Cappadocius, and Polemonaicus, as parts of this province. It was afterwards divided into ten prefectures; but in the time of Conſtantine the Great, Pontus, Lycaonia, and Piſidia being made diſtinct provinces, Cappadocia was confined to its former bounds. The emperor Valens divided Cappadocia into two provinces, Cappadocia Prima and Cappadocia Secunda, making Tyana the metropolis of the latter. We are told that Valens, who was a great abetter of the Arian faction, did this out of ſpite to St. Baſil, who being biſhop of Cœſarea, the metro-metropolis of all Cappadocia, prevented the ſpreading of that hereſy in places under his juriſdiction. In this ſtate Cappadocia continued till the erecting of the new empire of Trebiſond, with which it fell into the hands of the Turks, by whom the whole province with the addition of Pontus is now called Amaſia, after the name of that city where the beglerbeg of Anatolia reſides.

[o] Rabbi Saidas & Maimonides apnd Lightfoot. Oper. 2. p. 398.

[p] Strab. l. xi.

THE religion of the antient Cappadocians was much the ſame with that of the Perſians, of which we have given elſewhere an accurate account. At Comana there was a ſtately and rich temple conſecrated to Bellona, whoſe battles the prieſts and their attendants uſed to repreſent on ſtated days, cutting and wounding each other, as if ſeized with an enthuſiaſtic fury. No leſs famous and magnificent were the temples of Apollo Catanius or Cataonius at Daſtacum, and of Jupiter in the province of Morimena, which laſt had three thouſand ſacred ſervants or religious votaries. The chief-prieſt was next in rank to that of Comana, and had, as Strabo informs us [q], a yearly revenue of fifteen talents. Diana Perſica was worſhipped in the city of Caſtaballa, where women devoted to the worſhip of that goddeſs were reported to tread bare-foot on burning coals without receiving any harm [r]. The temples of Diana at Dioſpolis and of Anias at Zela were likewiſe had in great veneration both by the Cappadocians and Armenians, who flocked to them from all parts. In the latter were tendered all oaths in matters of conſequence; and the chief among the prieſts was no ways inferior in dignity, power, or wealth, to any in the kingdom, having a royal attendance, and an uncontrouled power over all the inferior officers and ſervants of the temple. The Romans, who willingly adopted all the ſuperſtitions and ſuperſtitious rites of the nations they conquered, greatly encreaſed the revenues of this and other temples, conferring the prieſt-hood on ſuch as they thought moſt fit for carrying on their deſigns. We are told that human ſacrifices were offered at Comana, and that this barbarous practice was brought by Oreſtes and his ſiſter Iphigenia from Taurica Scythica, where men and women were immolated to Diana. But this cuſtom, if it ever obtained in Cappadocia, was aboliſhed in the Roman times. Religion.

THE Cappadocians in the time of the Romans bore ſo bad a character, were reputed ſo vicious and lewd, ſo monſtrouſly addicted to all manner of vice, that beſides the ſhare they Character.

[q] Strab. l. xii. [r] Strab. ubi ſupra.

they had in the old Greek proverb, they had some peculiar to themselves reflecting on their enormous wickedness; which made them be so traduced by other nations, that a wicked and impious man was emphatically called a Cappadocian. However, this lewd disposition was in after-ages so corrected and restrained by the pure morals of christianity, that no country whatsoever has produced greater champions of the christian religion, or given to the church more prelates of unblemished characters.

Laws and trade.

We have no system of their laws, and scarce wherewithal to form any particular idea of them. As to their commerce, they carried on a very considerable trade in horses, great numbers whereof their country produced, and we read of them in scripture as frequenting the fairs of Tyre with this commodity. As Cappadocia abounded with mines of silver, brass, iron, and allom, and afforded great store of alabaster, chrystal, and jasper; it is reasonable to suppose that they supplied the neighbouring countries with these commodities. From the reigns of their kings we shall be able to judge of their military capacity.

SECT. II.

The reigns of the kings of Cappadocia.

Pharnaces.

The first king of Cappadocia we read of in history was Pharnaces, who was preferred by Cyrus to the crown, and honoured with the marriage of his sister Atossa, as we have hinted above. And this is all we read of him in antient writers. Xenophon calls him Aribæus, and says that he was killed in warring against the Hyrcanians.

Smerdis.

Pharnaces was succeeded by his son Smerdis, mentioned only by Diodorus; and he by his son Atamnas, or Atamnas.

Ariaramnes, as Ctesias calls him. He cultivated a good understanding with the Persians, and served in the army of Darius the son of Hystaspes, by whom he was employed against the Scythians. In which expedition he took Marsagetes their king's brother, and presented him bound to Darius.

Anaphas.

His son Anaphas is celebrated by the antients for his skill in military affairs. He renewed the alliance, which his father father had made with the Perſians, and was choſen for one of the ſeven princes of Perſia, probably in the room of Intaphernes, who was put to death by Darius for plotting a change in the government.

ANAPHAS II. ſucceeded his father; but did nothing worth mentioning. His ſon Datames ſucceeded him, the firſt of his family that waged war with the Perſians, we know not on what provocation. In that war having ventured a general engagement, his army was cut in pieces, and himſelf ſlain. Anaphas II. Datames.

HIS ſon Ariaramnes reigned fifty years. In his time the Perſians invaded Cappadocia, and having reduced great part of it appointed Datames, brother to Ariaramnes, governor thereof, by way of reward for his ſervices againſt the Caduſii, whom he had ſubdued. Ariaramnes.

ARIARATHES aſcended the throne on his father's death, and admitted his brother Olophernes to partake of the ſame power. He accompanied Artaxerxes Ochus in his expedition againſt the Egyptians, and on that occaſion ſignalized himſelf above all the other commanders of the Perſian army. He was ſucceeded by his brother Olophernes, who reigned alone; but in the ſucceſſion to the crown preferred Ariarathes his brother's ſon to his own children. Ariarathes I. Olophernes.

ARIARATHES II. reigned in the time of Alexander the Great, and continued faithful to the Perſians at a time when moſt of the other princes ſubmitted to the conqueror. Alexander was prevented by death from invading his dominions; but Perdiccas, marching againſt him with a powerful and well-diſciplined army, diſperſed his forces, and having taken Ariarathes himſelf priſoner, crucified him with all thoſe of the royal blood whom he could get into his power [s]. Diodorus [t] tells us, that he was killed in the battle. He is ſaid to have reigned eighty-two years. Ariarathes II.

HIS ſon Ariarathes III. having eſcaped the general ſlaughter of the royal family, fled into Armenia, where he lay concealed till the civil diſſenſions, which aroſe among the Macedonians, gave him a fair opportunity of recovering his paternal kingdom, which he tranſmitted to his poſterity. Amyntas, who was at that time governor of Cappadocia, oppoſed him, but was overcome in a pitched battle, and the Macedonians obliged to abandon the ſtrong-holds which they poſſeſſed. Ariarathes after a peaceable reign of many years left the kingdom to his ſon. Ariarathes III.

ARIARAMNES

[s] Appian. in Mithridatic. Curtius, l. xii. [t] Diodor. l. xviii.

Ariaramnes II.

ARIARAMNES II. who did nothing worth mentioning, but was greatly reſpected by all the neighbouring princes on account of his good nature, juſtice, and other princely virtues. During his reign the kingdom was in a more flouriſhing condition than it had been under any of his predeceſſors, he having maintained a good underſtanding with the adjoining ſtates, and applied himſelf more to the arts of peace than war. He was ſucceeded by his ſon, Ariarathes IV.

ARIARATHES IV. whom he had taken for partner of the kingdom during his life-time. Ariarathes proved a very warlike prince, and having overcome Arſaces, founder of the Parthian monarchy, conſiderably enlarged his own dominions.

Ariarathes V.

HE was ſucceeded by his ſon Ariarathes V. who marrying the daughter of Antiochus the Great, entered into an alliance with that prince againſt the Romans; but Antiochus being conquered, he ſent embaſſadors to ſue for peace, which he obtained after having paid two hundred talents by way of fine, for taking up arms againſt the people of Rome without any juſt provocation. He afterwards concluded an alliance with the Romans, and aſſiſted them with men and money againſt Perſes; on which conſideration he was by the ſenate honoured with the title of friend and ally of the people of Rome. In ſome diſputes that aroſe between him and Pharnaces II. king of Pontus, concerning the confines of Cappadocia and Galatia, he referred the whole matter to the Roman legates, who favoured him as far as the juſtice of his cauſe would allow. He left the kingdom in a very flouriſhing condition to his ſon Mithridates, who upon his acceſſion to the crown took the name of Ariarathes.

Ariarathes VI.

ARIARATHES VI. ſirnamed Philopator from the filial reſpect and love he ſhewed his father from his very infancy, after having performed with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence his exequies, diſpatched embaſſadors to Rome to acquaint the ſenate with his acceſſion to the crown, and to renew the alliance which his father had made with the people of Rome. The embaſſadors were kindly received, the alliance renewed, and the king highly commended by the ſenate for the reſpect he had ſhewn them. He reſtored Mithrobuzanes, ſon to Zadriades, king of the Leſſer Armenia, to his father's kingdom, merely out of good-nature, though he foreſaw that the Armenians would lay hold of that opportunity to join Artaxias, who threatened him with war

war and was ready to invade Cappadocia. But all theſe differences were ſettled, before they came to an open rupture, by the Roman legates, Tiberius Gracchus, Lucius Lentulus, and Servilius Glaucius. Ariarathes ſeeing himſelf thus delivered from an impending war by the mediation of the Romans, ſent embaſſadors to preſent the ſenate with a golden crown, and tender his ſervice where-ever they thought fit to employ him. The ſenate accepted of the crown, and requited the preſent with a ſtaff and chair of ivory, which they only beſtowed on ſuch as were looked upon as entirely addicted to their intereſt. Not long before Demetrius Soter, king of Syria, had proffered him in marriage his ſiſter, the widow of Perſeus king of Macedonia; but Ariarathes had rejected the offer for fear of giving offence to the Romans. For this in particular the ſenate returned him thanks, and enjoined the embaſſadors to acquaint their maſter, that the ſenate and people of Rome were fully convinced of his attachment to them, and ready to ſhew on all occaſions how much they had at heart the intereſt of their true friends and allies [u], among whom they accounted Ariarathes the chief and moſt to be depended on. Not long after the king found by experience that their proteſtations were ſincere; for Orophernes, or, as others call him, Holophernes, pretending to be the lawful ſon of Ariarathes V. and the elder brother, had recourſe to Demetrius Soter, who was greatly incenſed againſt Ariarathes for ſlighting the match which he had propoſed with his ſiſter. Demetrius was eaſily prevailed upon to eſpouſe his cauſe, though he well knew that Orophernes was but a ſuppoſititious, or, as ſome write, a natural, ſon of the deceaſed king. Eumenes king of Pergamus was ordered by the Romans to join Ariarathes with all his forces, and aſſiſt him againſt Demetrius to the utmoſt of his power, which he did accordingly. But to no effect; for the armies of the confederate kings were worſted, and Ariarathes obliged to abandon the kingdom to his rival [w]. Orophernes, being thus put in poſſeſſion of Cappadocia, diſpatched embaſſadors to Rome with a golden crown of great value, which Ariarathes driven out by Orophernes. Year after the flood 2840. Before Chriſt 159.

[u] Polyb. legat. 119. Diodor. Sicul. legat. 24. [w] Polyb. l. iii. p. 161. Liv. l. xlvii. Juſtin. l. xxxv. c. 1. Appian. Syriac. p. 118. Zonar. ex Dion.

the ſenate declined to accept, till ſuch time as they heard his pretenſions to the kingdom of Cappadocia, which he by ſuborned witneſſes made appear ſo plain, that the ſenate decreed Ariarathes and he ſhould reign together, as brothers and partners in the kingdom [x]. But Orophernes was the ſame year driven out by Attalus, brother to Eumenes, and his ſucceſſor in the kingdom of Pergamus, and Ariarathes reſtored to the entire poſſeſſion of his paternal kingdom. Orophernes being driven out, Ariarathes ſent embaſſadors to demand of the Prienians four hundred talents, which Orophernes had depoſited with them. The Prienians honeſtly replied, that as they had been truſted with the money, they could not, without breach of the truſt repoſed in them, deliver it to any one except Orophernes himſelf, or ſuch as came in his name. Hereupon the king entered their territories in a hoſtile manner, and putting all to fire and ſword, thought he ſhould frighten them into a compliance with his demands. But neither his threats, nor the calamities they ſuffered, could prevail upon them to betray their truſt; nay, in the height of their miſeries, while their city was beſieged by the joint forces of Ariarathes and Attalus, they found means to reſtore the entire ſum to Orophernes, though the king had threatened them with utter deſtruction, in caſe it was not delivered to him upon his entering the city, which he hoped to be maſter of in a few days. But in the mean time the Prienians recurring to the Romans, the two kings were enjoined by the legates to raiſe the ſiege, and withdraw their forces on pain of being deemed enemies to the republic [y]. Ariarathes readily complied with the legates orders, and marching his army into Syria joined Alexander Epiphanes againſt Demetrius Soter, by whom he had been formerly driven out of his kingdom. In the very firſt engagement Demetrius was ſlain, and his army entirely rcuted and diſperſed, Ariarathes having on that occaſion given uncommon proofs of his courage and conduct. Some years after a war breaking out between the Romans and Ariſtonicus, who claimed the kingdom of Pergamus in right of his father, he aſſiſted the former to the utmoſt of his power, and was ſlain in the ſame battle in which P. Craſſus, proconſul of Aſia, was taken, and the Roman army cut in pieces. He left ſix ſons by his wife Laodice, on whom the people of Rome beſtowed beſtowed Lycaonia and Cilicia. But Laodice fearing leſt her children, when they came of age, ſhould take the government out of her hands, poiſoned five of them, the youngeſt only having eſcaped her cruelty by being privately conveyed out of the kingdom. Laodice was ſoon after put to death by the Cappadocians, who could not brook her cruel and tyrannical government, and the young king placed on the throne of his anceſtors [z].

[x] Appian. Syriac. p. 118. Zonar. ex Dion.

[y] Polyb. in excerpt. Valeſ. p. 173.

ARIARATHES VII. ſoon after his acceſſion to the crown married Laodice daughter to Mithridates the Great, in hopes of having in that prince a powerful friend to ſupport him againſt Nicomedes king of Bithynia, who laid claim to part of Cappadocia, But Mithridates, without any regard either to friendſhip or affinity, ſuborned one Gordius to poiſon him, and on his death ſeized the kingdom under pretence of maintain ng the rights of the Cappadocians againſt Nicomedes, till the children of Ariarathes were in a condition to govern and defend the kingdom by themſelves. The Cappadocians were at firſt very thankful to Mithridates, as not entertaining any manner of ſuſpicion againſt him; but finding him unwilling to reſign the kingdom to the lawful heir, they roſe up in arms, and driving out all his garriſons, placed on the throne the eldeſt ſon of their deceaſed king, viz. Ariarathes VII.

ARIARATHES VIII. who was ſoon engaged in a war with Nicomedes king of Bithynia, that prince laying claim to ſome of the provinces that bordered on his kingdom. In this war Mithridates joined his nephew, and not only forced Nicomedes to abandon Cappadocia, but ſtripped him of great part of his own dominions. A peace being at laſt concluded between the kings of Bithynia and Cappadocia, Mithridates ſeeking ſome pretence to quarrel with Ariarathes, inſiſted upon his recalling Gordius, who had murdered his father; which propoſal he rejecting with abhorrence, both princes began to prepare for war. Mithridates took the field the firſt, hoping to over-run Cappadocia, before Ariarathes could be in a condition to make head againſt him. But contrary to his expectation, he was met on the frontiers by Ariarathes at the head of an army no-ways inferior to his own. Hereupon having recourſe to ſnares, he invited Ariarathes to a conference, and in the ſight of both armies ſtabbed him with a dag- Ariarathes VIII.

[z] Juſtin. l. xxxvii. c. 1.

ger, which he had concealed under his garment, as we have related elsewhere. This struck such terror into the Cappadocians, that they immediately dispersed, and gave Mithridates an opportunity of possessing himself of the kingdom without the least opposition. But he did not long enjoy his unjust conquests; for the Cappadocians, not being able to endure the tyranny and cruelty of his prefects, shook off the yoke, and recalling the king's brother, who had fled into the province of Asia, proclaimed him king.

Ariarathes IX.

ARIARATHES IX. was scarce warm in his throne, when Mithridates invaded his kingdom at the head of a very numerous army; and having drawn him to a battle, defeated his army with great slaughter, and obliged him to abandon the kingdom to the conqueror. The king soon after died of grief, and Mithridates bestowed Cappadocia on his own son, who was then but eight years old, giving him also the name of Ariarathes [z]. But Nicomedes Philopator, king of Bithynia, fearing lest Mithridates, having now got possession of the whole kingdom of Cappadocia, should invade his territories, suborned a youth to pass himself upon the senate for the third son of Ariarathes, and to present them a petition in order to be restored to his father's kingdom. With him he sent to Rome Laodice, sister to Mithridates, whom he had married after the death of her former husband Ariarathes. Laodice declared before the senate that she had three sons by Ariarathes, and that the petitioner was one of them; but that she had been obliged to keep him concealed, lest he should undergo the same fate as his brothers. The senate assured him that they would at all adventures reinstate him in his kingdom; for the whole matter was carried on with such craft, that they had not the least suspicion of any deceit. But in the mean time, Mithridates having notice of these transactions, dispatched Gordius to Rome to undeceive the senate, and persuade them, that the youth, to whom he had resigned the kingdom of Cappadocia, was the lawful son of the late king, and grandson to that Ariarathes who had assisted the Romans against Aristonicus, and lost his life in their service [a]. This unexpected embassy put the senate upon enquiring more narrowly into the matter, whereby the whole plot was discovered, and Mithridates ordered to resign Cappadocia. Paphlagonia was at the same time taken from Nicomedes, and both kingdoms declared declared free. But the Cappadocians ſent embaſſadors to Rome, acquainting the ſenate, that they could not live without a king, which the ſenate was greatly ſurprized at; but, however, humouring their inclination, gave them leave to elect a king of their own nation, for the royal family of Pharnaces was now extinct. They choſe unanimouſly Ariobarzanes, and their election was approved of by the ſenate, he having on all occaſions ſhewn himſelf a ſteady friend to the Romans [b].

[z] Justin. l. xxxviii. c. 1, 2. [a] Justin. ubi supra.

Ariobarzanes I.

ARIOBARZANES had ſcarce taken poſſeſſion of his new kingdom, when he was driven out by Tigranes king of the Greater Armenia, who reſigned it to the ſon of Mithridates, according to the articles of an alliance previouſly concluded between theſe two princes. Ariobarzanes fled to Rome, and having engaged the ſenate in his cauſe, he returned into Aſia with Sylla, who was enjoined to reſtore him to his kingdom; which he did accordingly, having with a ſmall body of men routed Gordius, who came to meet him on the borders of Cappadocia at the head of a numerous army. But Sylla had ſcarce turned his back, when he he was driven out anew by Ariarathes the ſon of Mithridates, on whom Tigranes had beſtowed the kingdom of Cappadocia. This obliged Sylla to return into Aſia, where he was attended with the ſame ſucceſs, and Ariobarzanes placed again on the throne. After the death of Sylla he was the third time forced by Mithridates to abandon his kingdom, but was ſoon reſtored by Pompey, who, after having entirely defeated Mithridates near mount Stella, rewarded Ariobarzanes, for his ſervices during the war, with the provinces of Sophene, Gordiene, and great part of Cilicia. But he being now advanced in years, and deſirous to ſpend the remainder of his life in eaſe and free from cares, reſigned the crown to his ſon Ariobarzanes in preſence of Pompey, and never afterwards interfered with publick affairs. Tully in one of his letters ſeems to inſinuate as if he had been killed [c].

Ariobarzanes II.

ARIOBARZANES II. proved a no leſs faithful ally and friend to the Romans than his father had been. He was very ſerviceable to Cicero, as he himſelf witneſſes, during the time he was proconſul of Cilicia. The civil war breaking out between Cæſar and Pompey, he ſided sided with the latter; but after the death of Pompey he was received into favour by Cæsar, who even bestowed upon him great part of Armenia. While Cæsar was engaged in a war with the Egyptians, Pharnaces king of Pontus invaded his territories, and stripped him of his paternal kingdom, as well as of his new acquisitions. But Pharnaces being overcome by Cæsar, he was not only restored to his kingdom, but honoured with new titles by the Romans. After the murder of Cæsar he refused to join Cassius and Brutus, who thereupon having declared him an enemy to the republick, invaded his dominions; and having taken him prisoner, caused him to be put to death.

[b] Juſtin. l. xxxviii. c. 2. Strab. l. xii. p. 540. [c] Cic. epiſt. famil. 15.

Ariobarzanes III.

He was succeeded by his brother Ariobarzanes III. who, as we have else-where mentioned, was by Marc Antony deprived both of his life and kingdom. In him ended the family of Ariobarzanes.

Archelaus.

Archelaus the grandson of that Archelaus, who in the Mithridatic war commanded in chief against Sylla, as we have mentioned above, was by Marc Antony placed on the throne of Cappadocia, though no-ways related either to the family of Pharnaces, or that of Ariobarzanes. His preferment was entirely owing to his mother Glaphyra, a woman of great beauty, but of a very loose behaviour; who having gained Antony's good graces by indulging his lust, obtained by way of reward for her compliance the kingdom of Cappadocia for her son. To this alludes the epigram of Augustus related by Martial [d]. In the war between Augustus and Antony he joined the latter; but at the intercession of the Cappadocians was not only pardoned by Augustus, but received from him Armenia the Lesser and Cilicia Trachea, for having assisted the Roman prætors in clearing the seas of pirates, who greatly infested the coasts of Asia. He contracted a strict friendship with Herod the Great, king of Judæa, and even married his daughter Glaphyra to Alexander, Herod's son. Herod becoming jealous of his son, as if he aspired to the kingdom, Archelaus took a journey into Judæa, with no other view but to remove his suspicions, and reconcile him to his son; which he happily effected, though on account of new suspicions Alexander was not long after by his father's order put to death. Herod accompanied in person Archelaus on his return into Cappadocia as far as Antioch, where he recommended him to Titus, then president of Syria, ria, as the beſt friend he had. After the death of Alexander, Archelaus gave his children a princely education, and ſhewed a particular tenderneſs and concern for them till the day of his death. In the reign of Tiberius he was ſummoned to appear before the ſenate; for he had been always hated by Tiberius, becauſe in his retirement at Rhodes he had paid him no ſort of court or diſtinction; which proceeded from no pride or averſion to Tiberius, but from the warning given him by his friends at Rome. For Caius Cæſar, the preſumptive heir to the empire, then lived, and had been ſent to compoſe the affairs of the eaſt. Whence the friendſhip of Tiberius was then reckoned dangerous. But when he came to the empire, remembering how Archelaus had behaved, he enticed him to Rome by means of letters from Livia, who, without diſſembling her ſon's reſentment, promiſed him his pardon, provided he came in perſon to implore it. He obeyed the ſummons, and haſtened to Rome, where he was received by the emperor with great wrath and contempt, and ſoon after accuſed as a criminal in the ſenate. The crimes alledged againſt him were mere fictions; but his concern in ſeeing himſelf treated like a malefactor was ſo great, that he died ſoon after of grief, or, as others ſay, laid violent hands on himſelf [e]. He is ſaid to have reigned fifty years. Pliny tells us [f], that he wrote a book of agriculture. Upon his death the kingdom of Cappadocia was reduced to a province, and governed by thoſe of the equeſtrian order (Y).

[d] Martial. l. vi. epigram. 11.

Archelaus dies, and his kingdom is reduced to a Roman province.

[e] Tacit. Annal. l. i. [f] Plin. l. xviii. c. 3.

(Y) Other authors tell us, that Archelaus would have been condemned by the ſervile ſenate, had not one of the evidences produced againſt him depoſed, that he had heard him ſay, if ever he went back into Cappadocia, Tiberius ſhould feel what nerves he had; which moved ſuch a laughter in the ſenate, the old king by reaſon of the gout and other diſtempers, not being able to ſtand by himſelf, that he was diſmiſſed; Tiberius thinking that he could not puniſh him more effectually, than by ſuffering him to live. This favour, ſay they, the old king conſtrued in the beſt manner, and out of gratitude bequeathed his kingdom to Rome.

CHAP. VI.

The history of the kings of Pergamus.

THE city of Pergamus we have already described in our History of Mysia, to which province it formerly belonged, and was subject to the same princes, till it became the metropolis of a separate kingdom. We shall therefore only add here the history of the Pergamenian kings, who from small beginnings came by degrees to make a considerable figure among the potentates of Asia, and proved very serviceable to the Romans in all their Asiatic wars.

Philetærus. Year of the flood 2715. Before Christ 284.

THE first of this family we find mentioned in history was one Philetærus, an eunuch, by birth a Paphlagonian, of a mean descent, and in his youth a menial servant to Antigonus, one of Alexander's captains. He afterwards served Lysimachus king of Thrace and Macedon, who appointed him keeper of his treasures lodged in Pergamus. While he held this employment, Lysimachus at the instigation of his wife Arsinoe, barbarously murdered his son Agathocles, who had attended him in all his Wars, and by whose conduct he had gained most of his victories. His death was publicly lamented by Philetærus, who was chiefly indebted to him for his preferment. Whereupon Arsinoe highly incensed against him, found means to work him by degrees out of his master's favour; which he being apprised of seised on the castle of Pergamus, and the treasures which he had been entrusted with, to the amount of ninety thousand talents, which he proffered with his service to Seleucus king of Syria. But both Lysimachus and Seleucus dying soon after, he kept the treasures, and with a strong body of mercenaries held the town till his death, which happened twenty years after he had revolted from Lysimachus. He died in the eightieth year of his age, and is by some stiled prince, by others king of Pergamus; he was at least the founder of this new kingdom, though perhaps he never assumed the title of king. He left the kingdom to Eumenes his brother, or, as some write, his brother's son, who laying hold of the dissensions that reigned among the Se-

Eumenes I.

leucidæ

leucidæ, invaded Aſia, poſſeſſed himſelf of many ſtrong-holds in that province, and having hired a ſtrong body of Galatians, defeated Antiochus as he was returning home, proud with a remarkable victory which he had gained over his brother Seleucus Callinicus [f]. This victory put him in poſſeſſion of the greater part of Aſia; but he did not long enjoy his new acquiſitions, for he died the next year of immoderate drinking, a vice which he was greatly addicted to, in the twenty-ſecond year of his ſovereignty; for we do not find that he ever took upon him the title of king.

EUMENES was ſucceeded by Attalus I. the ſon of Attalus brother to Philetærus by Antiochis the daughter of Achæus. For Attalus, though of a mean deſcent, being plentifully ſupplied with money by his brother Philetærus, viſited moſt of the courts of the Aſiatic princes, and was every where had in great eſteem, being a man of excellent natural parts. He proved ſo ſerviceable to Achæus, who revolting from Antiochus the Great, aſſumed the title of king, that he beſtowed upon him his favourite daughter Antiochis. By her Attalus had one ſon named alſo Attalus, who upon the death of Eumenes took poſſeſſion of Pergamus, and the places which he had added to his ſmall principality. In the very beginning of his reign he routed the Gauls with great ſlaughter, and forced them to abandon his territories, where they had propoſed to ſettle. After this victory he took upon himſelf the title of king, and as ſuch was acknowledged by all the neighbouring princes. Livy tells us that he was the firſt among the Aſiatic princes who refuſed to pay contribution to the Gauls, whom he worſted in a pitched battle [g]. While Seleucus Ceraunus was employed in other wars he raiſed a powerful army, and entering Aſia, ſubdued all the provinces on this ſide mount Taurus. But was ſoon driven out of his new acquiſitions by Seleucus, and his grandfather Achæus, who entering into an alliance againſt him, ſtript him of all his dominions, and even beſieged him in his metropolis. Attalus finding himſelf thus reduced to the laſt extremity, invited with great promiſes the Gauls, who had ſettled in Thrace, to his aſſiſtance, who marching with all ſpeed to Pergamus, obliged the enemy to raiſe the ſiege, and being headed by the king himſelf, recovered in a ſhort time all the cities and provinces which they had ſeized. Attalus having Attalus I.

[f] Juſtin. l, xxvii. c. 2. &. 3.

[g] Liv. l. xxxviii.

having thus recovered what the enemy had taken, while Achæus was busy in Paphlagonia, he marched into Ionia, and the neighbouring provinces, where the cities of Cuma, Smyrna, and Phocæa voluntarily submitted; the Teians, Colophonians, with the inhabitants of Egea and Lemnos, sent deputies, declaring themselves ready to acknowledge
His conquests. him for their sovereign; the Carsenes on the other side the river Lycus opened their gates to him, having first driven out Themistocles, whom Achæus had appointed governor of those provinces. From thence he advanced to Apia, and encamping on the banks of the river Megistus, received homage from all the neighbouring nations. Here the Gauls, being frightened with an eclipse of the moon, refused to pursue their march, which stopt the career of his conquests, and obliged him to return to the Hellespont, where he gave the Gauls leave to settle, and allowed them a large and fruitful territory, assuring them that he would always assist and protect them to the utmost of his power. Having thus enlarged his dominions, he returned to Pergamus, where he received with great pomp and magnificence Enters into an alliance with Rome. the Roman legate Lævius, and entered into an alliance with Room, which secured to him all his acquisitions. In the reign of Attalus a certain prophesy was found in the sibylline books by the college of the Decemviri, to whose care those books were entrusted, to this purport: 'Whensoever 'a foreign enemy shall invade Italy, he shall be driven out 'and overcome, if the image of the great mother of the gods 'at Ida, which fell from heaven, be sent for and brought Delivers to the Romans the great mother of of the gods. 'to Rome.' Whereupon five embassadors were without delay dispatched to Attalus, who received them with all possible marks of friendship and kindness, and attending them in person to Pessinus in Phrygia, there delivered into their hands a stone which the inhabitants worshipped as the great mother of the gods [h]. He joined the Romans in both their wars with Philip king of Macedon, who invaded his dominions, laying waste whole provinces, but was not able to reduce one city. In the second war Attalus had the command of the Rhodian fleet, with which he not only drove the Macedonians quite out of the seas, but even, in conjunction with his allies the Athenians, invaded Macedonia, and obliged Philip to march off from Athens, which he had greatly distressed, in order to defend his own kingdom. For which services the Athenians heaped upon Attalus all the favours they could, and even called one one of their own tribes after his name, an honour which they had never before beſtowed upon any foreigner [i]. He died of an apoplexy, which ſeized him at Thebes in Bæotia, while he was making an harangue to the Bæotians, and exhorting them with more vehemency, than his age and ſtrength could bear, to enter into an alliance with the Romans againſt Philip their common enemy. In the midſt of his harangue, he fell down ſpeechleſs; but returning to himſelf, deſired to be carried by ſea from Thebes to Pergamus, where he died ſoon after his arrival [k], in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age, and forty-third of his reign. He was a great encourager of learning, and wrote himſelf ſome books, which are often quoted by Pliny, Artemidorus, and Strabo. He cauſed the grammarian Daphidas to be thrown headlong from a high rock for ſpeaking diſreſpectfully of Homer [l]. His generoſity towards men of learning knew no bounds, whence he is highly commended by all the writers that flouriſhed in his time; as is alſo his wife Apollonias, or, as others, call her, Apollonis, whom, though of a mean extraction, they propoſe as a pattern of all princely virtues. By her he left four ſons, Eumenes, Attalus, Philetærus, and Athenæus [m] (Z). His death.

[h] Polyb. l. xxix. Liv. l. ix.

He was ſucceeded by Eumenes his eldeſt ſon, who upon his acceſſion to the crown renewed the alliance which his father had made with the Romans, and obſerved it ſo religiouſly, that Antiochus the Great having proffered him his daughter Antiochis in marriage, he declined his affinity, being Eumenes II. Year of the flood, 2802. Year before Chriſt 297.

[i] Liv. l. xxxi. Polyb. legat. 3. p. 786, 787. [k] Liv. l. xxxiii. Polyb. p. 820. Plutarch. in Quinto Flaminio. [l] Suidas. Val. Max. l. i. c. 8. [m] Suidas at the word Attalus.

(Z) The crown continued in his family to the third generation, of which Suidas relates an anſwer given him by the oracle of Delphos, in theſe words: Go on, Taurocerus; you ſhall wear a crown, and you ſon's ſons; but to no other ſhall it paſs. He was called Taurocerus from a pair of bull's horns, which were put we know not by whom, on the head of his ſtatue. He was alſo called the ſon of a bull by another oracle, wherein it was foretold that he ſhould one day make a great ſlaughter of the Gauls; the anſwer of the oracle is related by Pauſanias in the following words (72): Jupiter ſhall quickly ſend them a deliverer, the ſon of a bull, educated by Jupiter, who ſhall bring a diſmal day on the Gauls.

(72) Pauſan in Phocicis, p. 334.

ing appriſed that Antiochus courted his frienſhip with a vie to ſtrenghten himſelf by his alliance againſt the Romans for his eldeſt daughter he had beſtowed on Ptolemy king Egypt, and offered the ſecond to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and was at that time making great preparations fo war both by ſea and land [n]. Eumenes, who was very jealous of ſo powerful a neighbour, did not fail to acquain the ſenate with all his motions, who thereupon ſent P. Villius, and P. Sulpitius under appearance of an embaſſy t Antiochus; but really to inform themſelves of the prepara tions he was making, and by often converſing with Hanni bal, who was then in great eſteem with Antiochus, either t abate his hatred towards the Romans, or make Antiochu jealous of him; for they apprehended Hannibal to be at the bottom of thoſe vaſt preparations [o]. The embaſſadors went firſt to Elæa, and from thence to Pergamus; for their inſtructions were to confer with Eumenes, before they went to the court of Antiochus. Eumenes did all that lay in his power to inflame them againſt Antiochus, aſſuring them that he had nothing leſs in view than the empire of all Aſia. Soon after the departure of the embaſſadors, who returned very much diſſatisfied with Antiochus, Eumenes ſent his brother Attalus to Rome, to acquaint the ſenate, that Antiochus at the perſuaſion of the Ætolians had paſſed over into Greece with an army conſiſting of ten thouſand foot, five hundred horſe, and ſix elephants, and that the Ætolians were all to a man ready to join him. The ſenate received Attalus with the greateſt demonſtrations of friendſhip and kindneſs, returned thanks both to him and the king his brother, provided him with lodgings at the expence of the public, and diſmiſſed him loaded with preſents, promiſing to ſend an army into Greece, which ſhould defeat the king's meaſures, and keep in awe the Ætolians. Which they did accordingly, ſending M. Acilius conſul into Greece, who having vanquiſhed Antiochus at Thermopylæ, obliged him to fly back into Aſia [p]. In this war Attalus was appointed to command the Roman fleet; and his brother Eumenes aſſiſted the Romans both with his navy, and all the land forces he could raiſe. As the fleet of Antiochus was returning from Greece into Aſia under the command of Polyxenide

Inflames the Romans againſt Antiochus.

[n] Polyb. legat. 25. Liv. l. xxxvii. [o] Liv. l. xxxiv xxxv. Juſtin. l. xxxi. c. 4. Frontin. Strateg. l. i. c. 8. Appian in Syriac. p. 90, 91. [p] Liv. l. xxxvi. Plutarch. in Cato. Major. Appian, in Syriacis, Frontin. Strateg. l. ii

nides, they happened to fall in with the Roman fleet commanded by Eumenes and C. Livius Salinator, who falling upon them ſunk ten of their ſhips, took thirty, and diſperſed the reſt. This victory was in great meaſure owing to Eumenes, who boarded ſome of the enemies ſhips in perſon, and during the whole action behaved himſelf with uncommon bravery. Some time after Eumenes with a body of five thouſand men entered the territories of Antiochus, and having laid waſte all the country about Thyatira, returned to Canas, where the Roman fleet wintered, with an immenſe booty [q]. While Eumenes was thus employed in aiding the Romans abroad, he was unexpectedly called home to the defence of his own country. For Antiochus invading his territories, laid waſte the whole country about Elæa, and even ſent his ſon Seleucus to lay ſiege to the royal city of Pergamus. Attalus, the king's brother, held out with a handful of men, till the Achæans, the allies of Eumenes, ſent a thouſand foot and an hundred horſe to his aſſiſtance. Theſe were all choſen troops, who had ſerved under Philopœmen, and were commanded by Diophanes, a man of great experience in war. Diophanes obſerving from the walls of the town the careleſneſs of the enemy, obtained leave of Attalus to march out of the city, and encamp at a ſmall diſtance from them. Both Attalus and the citizens of Pergamus looked upon him as a mad-man, who durſt venture out while the city was beſieged by an army ten times their number. The enemy likewiſe were not a little ſurprized at firſt; but finding that he kept himſelf quiet in his camp, they returned to their former negligence and diſorders, not imagining that with ſuch a handful of men he would make any attempt upon their camp. Which Diophanes obſerving, ſallies out unexpectedly at the head of an hundred horſe, and having put in diſorder their advanced guards, attacked Seleucus in his camp, and the Achæan foot coming up in the mean time, drove the whole army from their poſts, and purſued them with great ſlaughter as far as he could ſafely venture, without loſing a man. The next day Seleucus encamped at a greater diſtance from the town, and drawing out his men offered the enemy battle; but Diophanes kept quiet in his camp, till Seleucus, deſpairing to draw him to an engagement, began to march his forces back to the camp, when falling upon their rear with his horſe, he purſued them to their trenches with greater ſlaughter than he Anticchus invades his territories, and lays ſiege to the city of Pergamus.

[q] Liv. l. xxxvii.

he had done the day before. The boldneſs of the Achæans ſtruck ſuch terror into the enemy, that Seleucus thought fit to abandon the ſiege, and retire. Attalus and the Pergamenians beheld from the walls of the town, and admired the gallant behaviour of the Achæans, but had not the courage to venture out, which if they had done, the army of Seleucus might have been that day eaſily cut in pieces. This cowardly behaviour reflected no ſmall diſhonour on Attalus, though he had on all other occaſions behaved with uncommon gallantry [r]. In the mean time Eumenes himſelf arriving at Pergamus, and the Rhodian and Roman fleets joining that king's, Antiochus and his ſon Seleucus retired with great precipitation out of his territories; and hearing that the conſul L. Scipio was ready to paſs over into Aſia with all his forces, diſpatched embaſſadors to L. Emilius, who commanded the Roman army, to ſue for a peace. Emilius ſent for Eumenes to adviſe with him in this conjuncture, as he likewiſe did with Eudamus and Pamphilidas, commanders of the Rhodian fleet. The Rhodians were not againſt a peace; but Eumenes, who would hearken to no terms, perſuaded Emilius to diſmiſs the embaſſadors with this anſwer; that no peace could be concluded before the arrival of the conſul; for L. Scipio was then in full march to join them. Antiochus ſeeing there was no hopes of obtaining a peace upon honourable conditions, either of Emilius, or afterwards of Scipio, reſolved to venture a general engagement, in which he was entirely defeated in great meaſure by the gallant behaviour of Eumenes, who not only bore, without giving ground, the firſt onſet of the elephants, and armed chariots, but drove them back upon their own men; which putting the ranks in diſorder, gave the Roman horſe an opportunity of attacking them, and throwing the whole army into the utmoſt confuſion. After this battle, which was fought at the foot of mount Sipylus, not far from Magneſia, Antiochus was glad to accept of peace upon any terms. One of the conditions was, that he ſhould pay four hundred talents to Eumenes, and a certain quantity of corn to make amends for the loſſes he had ſuſtained during the war. The peace being concluded, Eumenes took a journey to Rome, where he repreſented to the ſenate with a great deal of moderation what he had done in the ſervice of the republic, and told them, that he was come to beg of them, that that the Greek cities, which at the beginning of the war were ſubject to Antiochus, might be added to his dominions, ſince in him they might promiſe themſelves a faithful friend and ally, and look upon his new acquiſitions as their own. His demand was warmly oppoſed by the Rhodian embaſſadors and thoſe of all the Greek cities in Aſia. But both parties being heard, the ſenate after a long debate decreed, that all the countries on this ſide mount Taurus, which belonged to Antiochus, ſhould be given to Eumenes, together with the other provinces lying between the mountain and the river Mæander, except Lycia, and Caria, which were beſtowed on the Rhodians. Moreover all the cities, which had been tributary to Attalus, were ordered to pay the ſame tribute to Eumenes; but ſuch as had been tributary to Antiochus were declared free [s]. Eumenes having thus by ſiding with the Romans enlarged his dominions, was ſoon after engaged in a war with Pruſias king of Bithynia, who confiding altogether in Hannibal, whom he entertained at his court, invaded his territories. But Eumenes being aſſiſted by the Romans, gave him two great overthrows, one by ſea and the other by land, which ſo diſheartened him, that he was ready to accept of a peace upon any terms whatſoever. However, before the conditions were agreed upon, Hannibal found means to draw Philip king of Macedon into an alliance againſt Eumenes, and the Romans. Philip, who was highly incenſed againſt the Romans, who had obliged him to evacuate the cities of Enus and Maronæa in Thrace, and no leſs exaſperated againſt Eumenes, on whom they had beſtowed them, ſent Philocles, an old and experienced officer, with a conſiderable body to join Pruſias. Hereupon Eumenes ſent his brother Athenæus to Rome with a golden crown valued at fifteen thouſand talents, to complain of Philip for aiding Pruſias, and of Pruſias for making war upon the allies of the people of Rome without any manner of provocation. The ſenate accepted of the preſent, and promiſed to ſend forthwith embaſſadors to ſettle matters to the ſatisfaction of Eumenes, whom they looked upon as the moſt ſteady friend the republic had in Aſia. But in the mean time Pruſias having ventured a ſea-fight, obtained by a contrivance of Hannibal's, a complete victory over Eumenes. For Hannibal adviſed him to fill a great many earthen veſſels with various kind's of ſerpents, and other poiſonous reptiles, and How rewarded by the Romans.

The ſiege raiſed.

The gallant behaviour of Eumenes at the battle of Magneſia.

[r] Liv. l. xxxvii. Polyb. legat. 20. p. 810. Appian. 102.

His war with Pruſias king of Bithynia.

Defeated in a ſea-fight by a ſtratagem of Hannibal.

in

[s] Polyb. legat 25. & 36. Diodor. Sicul. legat. 10. Liv. l. xxxvii. & xxxviii. Appian. in Syriac. p. 116.

in the heat of the fight to throw them into the enemies ſhips, ſo as to break the veſſels, and let the ſerpents looſe. All the ſoldiers and ſea-men were enjoined to attack the ſhip, in which Eumenes himſelf was, and only defend themſelves againſt the others as well as they could; and that they might not miſtake the ſhip, a herald was ſent before the engagement with a letter to the king. As ſoon as the two fleets drew near, all the enemies ſhips ſingling out the king's, diſcharged ſuch a quantity of ſerpents againſt it, that neither the ſailors nor ſoldiers could perform their duty, but were forced to fly to the ſhore, leſt they ſhould fall into the enemies hands. The other ſhips after a faint reſiſtance followed the king's example, and were all driven aſhore with great ſlaughter, the ſoldiers being no leſs annoyed by the ſtings of the ſerpents than the arrows of the enemies. Moſt part of Eumenes's ſhips were ſet on fire, ſeveral taken, and the others ſo ſhattered that they could be of no further ſervice. Eumenes encamped on the ſhore where he had placed ſome companies of foot; but the enemy did not think fit to abandon their ſhips [t]. Thus Pruſias gained a complete victory by ſea, and the ſame year two remarkable victories by land, which were entirely owing to Hannibal, who by one ſtratagem or another ever put Eumenes to flight. Having once adviſed Pruſias to engage, and the king replying, that he durſt not venture, becauſe the entrails of the ſacrifices portended no good ſucceſs; What; ſaid Hannibal, do you rely more on the entrails of an undiſtinguiſhing beaſt, than on the judgment of an experienced commander? and commanding the ſignal to be given, put Eumenes to flight at the firſt onſet [u].

When news of the defeat of Eumenes was brought to Rome, the ſenate immediately diſpatched embaſſadors to conclude a peace between the two kings, and to demand Hannibal, who had ſtirred up Pruſias to this war [w] (A). By [t] Juſtin. l. xxxii. c. 4. Æmil. Prob. in Hannibale. [u] Cic. de divinat. l. ii. Plut. de exilio. Valer. Max. l. iii. c. 7. [w] Polyb. legat. 47. Liv. l. xxxvi.

(A) Polybius (73) tells us, that Ti. Qu. Flaminius was on this occaſion ſent both to Pruſias and to Seleucus king of Syria. But Livy (74) aſſures us, that L. Scipio Aſiaticus, and P. Scipio Naſica were joined with him in the ſame commiſſion.

(73) Polyb. legat. 47. (74) Liv. l. xxxvi. ex Caler. Amic.

By the mediation of the Roman embaſſadors a peace between the two kings was agreed on, and Pruſias even conſented that Hannibal ſhould be delivered up to the Romans. That great general kept himſelf cloſe in a caſtle, which had been given him by Pruſias. He had made ſeven doors in the caſtle, whereof ſome were private, and known to none but himſelf; for he entertained ſome diffidence of Pruſias, and therefore had contrived thoſe private out-lets, that he might be able to withdraw in caſe the king's ſoldiers ſhould come to apprehend him. But this contrivance ſtood him in no need; for the ſoldiers ſent by Pruſias ſurrounded the caſtle on all ſides, which Hannibal obſerving had recourſe to a preſent poiſon, which he ever carried about him, and thereby prevented the ill treatment he was likely to meet with from the Romans (B).

Eumenes engaged in a war with Pharnaces king of Pontus, &c.

A PEACE being thus concluded between Eumenes and Pruſias, a new war unexpectedly broke out between Eumenes and Ariarathes king of Cappadocia on one ſide, and Pharnaces king of Pontus, and the Aſiatic Gauls on the other. Pharnaces laying claim to ſome territories poſſeſſed by Eumenes, invaded his dominions, and ſeized on the city of Sinope, which by the articles of a former treaty was to remain free. Hereupon Eumenes and Ariarathes his ally took the field, and in ſix days march arrivingat Amiſus in Cappadocia, encamped in ſight of the enemy. But before they came to an engagement, news was brought of the arrival of the Roman legates who had been ſent by the ſenate to compoſe all differences in an amicable manner. Eumenes immediately diſpatched his brother Attalus to welcome the Roman commiſſaries into thoſe parts, and declared himſelf ready to refer all matters to their arbitration.

(B) He died in the ſeventieth year of his age. Of his death the following oracle is ſaid to have been uttered many years before: Λιβύσθα κρυψει βῶλος Αννιβα δέμας; that is, The land of Libya, or Libyſſa, ſhall cover the body of Hannibal. By Libya or Libyſſa Hannibal underſtood Libya in Afric; whereas the place meant by this oracle was a little village in Bithynia, near the ſeaſide, called by the ſame name, whereof Pliny (75) ſpeaks thus. There was formerly in thoſe parts a little town called Libyſſa; where there is now nothing worth ſeeing except Hannibal's tomb.

(75) Plin. l. v. c. 32.

tion. But Pharnaces could by no means be prevailed upon to assist at any conference where Attalus was present; however he sent his embassadors with full powers, declaring that he was willing to agree to such conditions as the Romans should think proper. But his embassadors behaved in such manner as plainly shewed that Pharnaces had no mind to come to an agreement. Whereupon the conferences were broke off, and Eumenes with the assistance of Ariarathes falling upon Galatia, reduced great part of that country, and was even preparing to invade Pontus, though he had sent at the same time a considerable body to the assistance of the Rhodians against the Lycians, refusing to live in subjection to their new masters. The success which attended the arms of the confederate kings, obliged at last Pharnaces to sue for a peace, which was granted on the following terms: that Pharnaces should forthwith march out of Galatia, and break off all former alliance with the Gauls; that he should likewise resign all the strong-holds which he possessed in Paphlagonia, and send home without ransom such of the inhabitants as he had carried from thence; that he should restore to Ariarathes all the places which he was in possession of before the war broke out, and deliver both to him and Eumenes all the deserters and fugitves who had fled over to him since the beginning of the war; that he should pay back to Morzias and Ariarathes nine hundred talents, which he had taken from them, and three hundred more to Eumenes, to defray the expences he had been at during the war. By this treaty Mithridates king of Armenia was likewise to pay three hundred talents to Ariarathes, for joining Pharnaces against him contrary to an agreement between Mithridates and Eumenes [w]. Pharnaces no sooner gave hostages for the performance of these articles, but the armies broke up, and retired to their respective countries. Eumenes restored to Prusias the city of Teius in Pontus, which Prusias had resigned to him pursuant to the articles of agreement [x].

A peace concluded.

EUMENES being thus delivered from any apprehension of war with his neighbours, entered into an alliance with Antiochus son of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, whom Heliodorus after the murder of his brother Seleucus with-held from his paternal kingdom. Some writers say, that he began now to grow jealous of the two great power of the Romans, and to strengthen himself with other alliances, fearing lest they should at last prove as troublesome neighbours as Eumenes enters into an alliance with Antiochus king of Syria.

[w] Polyb. legat. 59. [x] Idem. ibid.

as Antiochus the Great had been to the kings of Pergamus [y]. But be that as it will, Eumenes with the aſſiſtance of his brother Attalus, drove out the uſurper, and placed Antiochus on the throne of his anceſtors. About the ſame time Eumenes falling out with the Rhodians his antient allies, not only ſtirred up the Lycians to a revolt, but moreover made frequent inroads into their territories on the continent. Embaſſadors were therefore diſpatched to Rome to complain of the violent proceedings of Eumenes. But as the king himſelf happened to go to Rome at the ſame time upon another errand, the Rhodian embaſſadors could not obtain any ſatisfaction for the damages they had ſuffered. Eumenes had undertaken this journey to acquaint the ſenate with the vaſt preparations, which Perſeus king of Macedon, to whom Eumenes bore an implacable hatred, was making both by ſea and land. The king was received at Rome with the higheſt honours, and entertained in a manner ſuitable to his dignity. Being admitted into the ſenate, he made a long and elegant harrangue, wherein he told them, that beſides the deſire he had of ſeeing the gods and men to whom he owed his kingdom, and his preſent happy ſituation, he had been induced to expoſe his perſon to ſo dangerous a journey by the mighty preparations which Perſeus was carrying on with a deſign to drive the Romans out of Aſia; he enlarged upon this topic, and exhorted the ſenators with great vehemency to prevent the impending danger by falling upon the common enemy, before he was in a condition to hurt them or their allies; he offered himſelf ready to aſſiſt them with men and money to the utmoſt of his power, and ended his ſpeech with a modeſt rehearſal of his own ſervices in behalf of the republic [z]. What he ſaid on this occaſion, and the ſenate's anſwer, were kept ſo ſecret, that no one knew the true motive of his journey to Rome, till the war was ended, and Perſeus taken priſoner (C) [a]. After Eumenes

Goes to Rome to acquaint the ſenate with the deſigns of Perſeus.

[y] Appian. in Syriac. p. 116, 117. legat. 25. a Ful. Urſino edit.

[z] Liv. l. xlii. Appian.

[a] Liv. ubi ſupra. Valer, Maxim. l. ii. c. 2.

(C) Valerius Antias writes that Attalus brother to Eumenes, and not the king himſelf, came to Rome to give notice to the ſenate of the preparations which Perſeus was making. But all other writers agree, that Eumenes came in perſon, and mention many particulars of his journey and reception at Rome. Among others the embaſſadors of the Rhodians were heard, who inveighed againſt Eumenes for encouraging and abetting the Lycian rebels, and told the ſenate, that Eumenes under the ſhadow of their power was become as troubleſome to Aſia as Antiochus himſelf. But as the Rhodians were grown ſomewhat out of favour with the Romans for having conveyed Laodice the daughter of Seleucus to her huſband Perſeus, their ſpeech, though applauded by the Aſiatics, rather enhanced the eſteem and kindneſs of the ſenate to Eumenes, on whom they heaped all the honours they could, preſented him with a ſtately chariot, and ivory ſtaff, and ſent him home loaded with rich preſents [b]. On his return as he was going from Cirrha to perform a ſacrifice at Delphos, two aſſaſſins ſent by Perſeus rolled down two great ſtones upon him as he entered the ſtraights of the mountains. With one he was dangerouſly wounded on the head, with the other in the ſhoulder. As he fell with the blows from a ſteep place, and thereby received many other wounds, thoſe who attended him carried him on board of his ſhip, not well knowing whether he was dead or alive. From Cirrha, finding that he was ſtill alive, they conveyed him to Corinth, and from Corinth to Ægina, having cauſed their veſſels to be carried over the Iſthmus. There he was cured of his wounds with ſuch ſecreſy, that none being admitted to ſee him, the report of his death was ſpread all over Aſia, and even believed at Rome [c]. His brother Attalus being over-haſty in giving credit to the public fame, not only aſſumed the royal enſigns, but alſo married his brother's wife Stratonice daughter to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia. But not long after hearing that his brother was alive, and on his journey to Pergamus, laying down the diadem, he went to meet him, bearing an halbert as one of his guards. The king embraced both him and the queen with great tenderneſs, but is ſaid to have whiſpered in his brother's ear; Don't be again in haſte to marry my wife till you are ſure that I am dead. Nor did he during his whole life ever do or ſay any thing elſe that could reflect on his brother's or wife's raſh and imprudent Narrowly eſcapes being killed by two aſſaſſins ſent by Perſeus.

[b] Liv. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. 9. legat. 16. Appian. legat. 25.

[c] Liv. l. xlii.

others they tell us, that Cato could not be induced to viſit him, or ſhew him any kind of civility: and that being aſked the reaſon of his peculiar conduct on that occaſion, he anſwered, A king is by nature a carnivorous animal.

imprudent behaviour, but ſhewed them the ſame love and tenderneſs as he had ever done [d]. The news of his recovery cauſed an univerſal joy at Rome, whence embaſſadors were ſent to congratulate him on his ſafe arrival into his own kingdom without any other commiſſion or inſtructions. But Eumenes laying hold of that occaſion, did all that lay in his power to inflame them againſt Perſeus, and began himſelf, this treacherous attempt increaſing his antient hatred and averſion to the Macedonians, to make vaſt preparations in order to join the Romans and their allies againſt the king of Macedon. His example was followed by Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and the Romans drew into the ſame alliance Ptolemy king of Egypt, and Maſaniſſa king of Numidia. Perſeus in the mean time ſent embaſſadors to Rome to clear himſelf of the crimes laid to his charge by Eumenes; they made an artful ſpeech to the ſenate, but as they gave no ſatisfaction with relation to the treacherous attempt of their maſter upon the life of Eumenes, a war was decreed againſt Perſeus, and the embaſſador ordered to depart Rome the ſame day, and within thirty days all Italy [e].

Joins the Romans againſt Perſeus.

Eumenes, upon advice that the Romans had at laſt declared war againſt Perſeus, ſailed with his two brothers, Attalus and Athæneus to Chalcis in Bæotia, leaving his youngeſt brother Philetærus at Pergamus to defend his own dominions. From Chalcis he marched into Theſſaly, where he joined the conſul Licinius with four thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe. Athenæus was left at Chalchis with two thouſand foot to aſſiſt Marius Lucretius, who commanded a body of ten thouſand men at the ſiege of Haliartus [f]. The town was taken and levelled with the ground, and great part of Bœotia reduced. The like ſucceſs did not attend Licinius, Eumenes, and Attalus, in Theſſaly, where they had two encounters with Perſeus; in the firſt both parties claimed the victory, but in the ſecond the Romans with their allies were put to flight, and Caſſignatus, commander of the Gauls, with many other officers, killed on the ſpot [g]. After this defeat the conſul retired to Lariſſa, and from thence ſent Eumenes and Attalus home; the reſt of his army he kept during the winter in Theſſaly, in order to be ready [d] Liv. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valeſ. p. 306. Plutarch. in Apophthegm.

[e] Polyb. legat. 67. Diodor. Sicul. legat. 17. Liv. xlii.
[f] Liv. l. xlii.
[g] Liv. ubi ſupra.

to take the field early in the spring. In the mean time the Achæans foreseeing that with the kingdom of Macedon the liberties of Greece must inevitably fall, and in that view bearing a grudge to Eumenes, who had incensed the Romans against Perseus, abrogated by a public decree all the honours they had conferred upon him. Which Attalus, who then wintered at Elatia, no sooner heard, but he sent embassadors to expostulate thereupon with the common council of the nation. After the embassadors were heard, at the persuasion of Polybius the historian, a decree was made, whereby Eumenes was reinstated in all his antient honours, and embassadors dispatched to Attalus with a copy of the said decree. In that council it was likewise decreed, that auxiliaries should be sent to the Romans; and Polybius was appointed to command them [h]. Thus Attalus prevailed upon the Achæans, not only to restore his brother to the honours they had conferred upon him, but also to join him and the Romans against the king of Macedon, whom they had favoured to that time.

EARLY in the spring Eumenes sailing with twenty ships from Elæa, joined on the coast of the Cassandrenses Marcius Figulus the Roman admiral, and invested both by sea and land the city of Cassandrea, but was not able to reduce it. He likewise made unsuccessful attempts on the two strong-holds, Toron and Demetrias, being obliged with considerable loss to retire from before them. As Eumenes about this time grew cold in his affection towards the Romans, some writers tell us, that he did not exert himself on this occasion as he might. What alienated his mind from his antient allies, is uncertain; but it is agreed on all hands, that from Demetrias he returned home, and could not tho' earnestly entreated by the consul Marcius, be prevailed upon to leave behind him some troops of Gaulish horse, which would have proved very serviceable to the Romans. Some say, that a reconcilement between him and Perseus was privately negotiated by one Cydas of Crete, and Antimachus governor of Demetrias. For Cydas, who was greatly in favour with Eumenes, had had private conferences at Amphipolis with one Chimaras, likewise of Crete, and greatly addicted to Perseus, and at Demetrias had conferred with Menecrates, one of Perseus's commanders, and with Antimachus under the very walls of the city [i]. Others say, that having joined Marcius, as he had done the other consuls, Grows cold in his affection towards the Romans.

[h] Liv. l. xliv. Polyb. legat. 78.

[i] Liv. l. xliv.

ſuls, he was very coldly entertained by him, and not ſuffered to encamp within the ſame trenches; which he highly reſenting, took his leave of the conſul, and with his forces returned home to Pergamus [k]. Perſeus no ſooner heard that Eumenes had left the Romans, but he ſent Cryphontes, as Polybius calls him, or Eropontes, as he is named in the printed copies of Livy, to propoſe conditions of agreement between him and Eumenes. Cryphontes repreſented to Eumenes that there could be no ſincere friendſhip between a king and a free ſtate; that the Romans hated all kings alike, though they ſhewed the effects of their hatred to one only at a time, employing the forces and wealth of one king againſt another, with a deſign to compaſs the utter deſtruction of them all; that they had reduced Philip with the aſſiſtance of Attalus, Antiochus with the help of Philip and Eumenes, and now deſigned to deſtroy Perſeus with the forces of Eumenes and Pruſias; but when he was deſtroyed they would certainly fall upon Eumenes, whoſe territories lay next to theirs; that they already pretended to be diſſatisfied with him, in order to have a plauſible pretence of treating him as they had treated other kings. Eumenes anſwered, that he apprehended no greater danger from the Romans than from Perſeus, if he ſhould happen to get the better of them. But however, that he would ſtand neuter provided Perſeus paid him a thouſand talents, and for fifteen hundred talents more would perſuade the Romans to hearken to conditions of an honourable peace. Perſeus promiſed the ſum required, but would not pay it before-hand, though Eumenes offered to give hoſtages for the performance of what he promiſed. Perſeus finding that he could not prevail upon Eumenes but with ready money, offered to depoſit the ſum agreed on in a temple of Samothrace, whence it ſhould be conveyed to him as ſoon as the peace was concluded. But as the iſland of Samothrace was ſubject to Perſeus, Eumenes thought himſelf no ſurer of the money, while it was there, than if it had been kept in the king's treaſures at Pella. Beſides, he thought that his good offices deſerved ſome acknowledgment, whether they were attended with ſucceſs or no; and therefore inſiſted upon this, that part of the ſum ſhould be paid before he made any ſtep in the affair. This Perſeus, who miſtruſted Eumenes, could not be brought to; and thus the conferences were broke off, but the ſubject of them kept ſecret, Eumenes having ſent an expreſs to the Confers with an embaſſador ſent to him by Perſeus.

[k] Vellei. Patercul. hiſtor. l. i. c. 9.

Roman conſul, acquainting him that their negotiations were concerning the redemption of captives [1]. However, as the truth of the matter was ſoon after known by the Romans, they began to entertain no ſmall jealouſy of Eumenes, and heap all their favours on his brother Attalus who had ſtaid with the conſul, and given undoubted proofs of his fidelity during the whole time of the Macedonian war. After the overthrow of Perſeus, and utter deſtruction of the kingdom of Macedon, Eumenes ſent his brother Attalus to congratulate the ſenate on the happy iſſue of that war, and at the ſame time to crave their aſſiſtance againſt the Aſiatic Gauls, who began to be very troubleſome neighbours. Attalus was received at Rome, and entertained in a princely manner. Several of the ſenators who went to viſit him before he had his audience, encouraged him to lay down the character of an embaſſador from his brother, and treat for himſelf, aſſuring him, that, as the minds of the Romans were alienated from Eumenes, his brother's kingdom would be given to him, if he requeſted it of the ſenate. Theſe promiſes at firſt awaked his ambition; for he approved or ſeemed to approve of the motion, and even promiſed to beg of the ſenate his brother's kingdom. But his honeſt nature was ſoon reclaimed by the wholeſome admonitions of Stratius the phyſician, a man of great truſt and authority with Eumenes, who had been ſent with him to Rome as a truſty monitor, in caſe the Romans ſhould tempt his fidelity. Stratius repreſented to him, that at preſent he reigned no leſs than his brother; and, in a ſhort time, conſidering his brother's old age and infirmities, would have the kingdom entirely to himſelf without being guilty of rebellion; that the kingdom could ſcarcely be defended againſt the power of the Gauls by their mutual agreement, much leſs could they hold out againſt ſo warlike a nation, if their ſtrength were impaired and divided by civil diſſenſions. Theſe conſiderations had ſo good an effect upon Attalus, that when he was admitted into the ſenate, he firſt congratulated them on their victory over Perſeus, then modeſtly rehearſed his own ſervices during the Macedonian war, and laſtly acquainted them with the motive of his journey, entreating them to ſend embaſſadors to the Gauls, who by their authority might oblige them to lay down their arms, and forbear all hoſtilities againſt his brother Eumenes; he requeſted the ſenate, that the cities of Ænus and Maronea might be beſtowed on himſelf. As he omitted

The Romans grow jealous of him.

The ſenate encourages his brother Attalus to demand the kingdom for himſelf.

[1] Appian. Macedonic. in excerpt. Valeſ. p. 562.

omitted to ſue for his brother's kingdom, they ſuppoſed that he deſigned to aſk another day of audience for that affair alone. Wherefore they not only granted him all his requeſts, but ſent him more rich and magnificent preſents than they had ever done to any before. Nevertheleſs Attalus took no notice of their meaning, but left Rome contented with what they had granted him already. His unexpected departure provoked the ſenate to ſuch a degree, that while he was yet in Italy, they declared the cities of Ænus and Maronea free; thereby making their promiſe ineffectual, which otherwiſe they could not without ſhame revoke. And as for the Gauls, who were ready to fall upon the kingdom of Pergamus, they diſpatched embaſſadors to them with ſuch inſtructions as rather encouraged than prevented their deſign [m]. Eumenes being informed by his brother of what had paſſed at Rome, thought it well worth his while to go in perſon and juſtify his proceedings, before the ſenate. But his deſign being underſtood at Rome, a law was there enacted, that no king ſhould be permitted to come to Rome; for they did not think it expedient to treat him as an enemy; and to entertain him as a friend was more than their diſpleaſure for his ingratitude, as they ſtyled it, would permit. Upon the firſt notice of his landing at Brunduſium, the ſenate diſpatched the queſtor to him with a copy of the edict, enjoining him to acquaint the king, that if he had any thing to lay before the ſenate, he was commiſſioned to hear and propoſe it; but if he had no affairs to tranſact with the ſenators, to command him without delay to depart Italy. Eumenes underſtanding from the quæſtor the pleaſure of the ſenate, told him, that he had no buſineſs of conſequence to tranſact, and did not ſtand in any need of their aſſiſtance; and, without adding one word more, retired on board his ſhip and ſailed back to Pergamus. This treatment not only abated the courage of the king's friends, but animated the Gauls to invade his territories, ſeeing he could not expect any help from the Romans [n]. But Eumenes raiſing a powerful army, not only drove the Gauls out of his own dominions, but invaded at the ſame time Galatia and Bithynia, laying waſte thoſe countries, plundering the cities, and poſſeſſing himſelf of many ſtrong-holds. Whereupon Pruſias king of Bithynia ſent embaſſadors to Rome to complain

The generous behaviour of Attalus.

Eumenes reſolves to go to Rome to juſtify his proceedings.

But is prevented by the ſenate.

[m] Polyb. legat. 93. Liv. l. xlv.

[n] Polyb. legat. 97. Liv. l. xlvi.

complain of theſe violent proceedings, and acquaint the ſenate, that Eumenes had entered into an alliance with Antiochus king of Syria, and countenanced all theſe who ſhewed any averſion to to the Romans °. With the embaſſadors of Pruſias came alſo thoſe of the Gauls, of the Selgenſes, and many other cities of Aſia to accuſe Eumenes, as if he kept a ſecret correſpondence with Perſeus, which was alſo confirmed by ſome letters, which the Romans themſelves had intercepted. Eumenes fearing leſt the ſenate ſhould declare him an enemy, and join the Gauls and Pruſias, charged his two brothers, Attalus and Athenæus, to clear him at Rome of the crimes objected to him by his enemies. They were both received with all poſſible marks of honour, but could not diſſipate the jealouſies which the ſenate had conceived againſt Eumenes. For not long after their departure, C. Sulpitius Gallus and Marius Sergius were ſent into Aſia in quality of legates, and enjoined to make a ſtrict enquiry into the counſels and deſigns of Antiochus and Eumenes. Sulpitius Gallus, upon his entering Aſia, cauſed a proclamation to be made in the cities of that province, whereby all thoſe, who had any complaints againſt Eumenes, were ordered to repair to Sardis, where they ſhould have juſtice done them. The legate himſelf arriving by the time appointed at Sardis, cauſed a tribunal to be erected in a public place, on which for ten days together he received all the accuſations and complaints againſt Eumenes that were laid before him, as if he had been ſent on purpoſe to pick a quarrel with the king. Eumenes, who was well appriſed of his deſign, but unwilling to engage in a war againſt ſo powerful an enemy, eſpecially in his old age, again ſent his brother Attalus to Rome, hoping, that by his mediation he might be ſuffered to end his days in peace. Attalus did all that lay in his power to appeaſe the wrath of the ſenators, and bring his brother again into favour. But all was to no purpoſe, they could by no means be prevailed upon to forget his behaviour during the Macedonic war, and ſeemed obſtinately bent upon his deſtruction. But their deſigns were prevented by the death of the king, which happened ſoon after the return of Attalus, to whom he bequeathed both his wife and his kingdom. He died in the thirty-ninth year of his reign, leaving one ſon behind him, whom he had by Stratonice, the ſiſter of Ariarathes king of Cappadocia. But he Sends his two brothers to plead his cauſe at Rome.

Legates ſent from Rome to enquire into the deſigns of Eumenes.

Eumenes dies.

° Polyb. legat. 104. Liv. ubi ſupra.

he, being an infant at the time of his father's death, was incapable of governing the kingdom; and therefore Eumenes chose to put his brother Attalus into the present possession of the crown, reserving the next succession to his son [p] (D).

Attalus. Year of the flood 2840. Before Christ 159.

ATTALUS was scarce seated on the throne, when Prusias, king of Bithynia, surnamed the Hunter, invaded, upon what provocation we know not, his dominions, and committing every-where most dreadful ravages, advanced to the very walls of Pergamus, overthrew Attalus in a pitched battle, and made himself master of the capital of his kingdom. He expected to have found Attalus in the city, but that prince having saved himself by a timely retreat, Prusias vented his rage upon the unhappy citizens, putting a great number of them to the sword, and setting fire to their houses [q]. Hereupon Attalus dispatched embassadors to Italy to lay before the Roman senate the condition to which the kingdom of Pergamus was reduced. But Nicomedes the son of Prusias, who was then at Rome for his education, answered all the complaints that were made against his father, and even returned them against Attalus, as if he had been the aggressor. However, two commissioners were sent into the east to put an end to the disputes of the two kings on the spot: But Prusias, without paying them the least deference, continued ravaging the territories of Pergamus. Attalus therefore, taking the advantage of the return of one of the embassadors, sent his brother Athenæus with him to make new complaints to the senate. As he advanced nothing but what was confirmed by their own embassador, the senators were at last convinced that Prusias was the aggressor, and therefore sent him forthwith orders to withdraw his forces from the territories of Attalus. But Prusias under various pretences pursued the war for the space of three whole years, and reduced the kingdom of Pergamus to a most deplorable condition. At length he pretended to be Reduced to great straits by Prusias king of Bithynia.

[p] Polyb. ubi supra. Plutarch. in Apophthegm. Strab. l. xiii, p. 624. [q] Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Vales. p. 169, 170, 337. Suid. in voce Prusias.

(D) Suidas calls him the greatest and most powerful king of his time. We have elsewhere made mention of his famous library at Pergamus, wherein were lodged two hundred thousand chosen books all collected by himself. These Marc Anthony afterwards bestowed upon Cleopatra, by whose order they were carried from Pergamus to Alexandria.

be ready to obey the decrees of the ſenate, and deſired a conference with Atttalus. At his requeſt it was agreed, that the contending parties ſhould meet on the frontiers of the two kingdoms, each attended by a guard of a thouſand men, in order to put an end to their differences in the preſence of the Roman envoys. But Pruſias, who had no other view in this than to ſeize Attalus, marched his whole army to the frontiers, and concealing his troops behind the neighbouring hills, gave them orders to ſurround the Romans and Pergamenſes, as ſoon as they ſhould appear. But Attalus and the Romans, having timely notice of his deſign ſaved themſelves by flight, before the Bithynian forces could put the king's orders in execution. Pruſias followed them to Pergamus after he had plundered the baggage of the embaſſadors; and then marched to Elæa, a maritime city of Æolis, hoping to ſurprize it. But as the place was well garriſoned, and ſtored with all ſorts of proviſions, he did not think it adviſeable to attempt the reduction of it. He therefore ſent back his land-forces to Bithynia, and embarking on board his fleet ſet ſail for Thyatira [r].

Treachery of Pruſias.

The Romans ſend commiſſioners to put an end to the war.

THE ſenate, being upon the return of their embaſſadors informed of theſe proceedings, were highly provoked againſt Pruſias; but however, inſtead of declaring war againſt one who had affronted their embaſſadors and deſpiſed their orders, they contented themſelves with ſending ten commiſſioners, whoſe number at leaſt might make ſome impreſſion on the Bithynian. Among theſe were L. Anicius, C. Fannius, and Q. Fabius Maximus. Their inſtructions were to put an end to this war, to oblige Pruſias to ſatisfy Attalus for the damages he had ſuffered by it, and to break off the alliance of the republick with the Bithynian, in caſe he did not acquieſce to the decree of the ſenate [s]. In the mean time Attalus, having got together a conſiderable army (for both Ariarathes king of Cappadocia and Mithridates king of Pontus ſent him underhand powerful ſupplies) took the field, and meeting the Roman embaſſadors at Quada, marched directly againſt Pruſias, who was advancing towards the frontiers of Pergamus at the head of a numerous army. The two kings at the requeſt of the embaſſadors came to a conference at a place equally diſtant from both camps. Pruſias by many ſhifts and evaſions endeavoured to amuſe the embaſſadors; but they, at length exerting themſelves, told him

The two kings come to a conference.

[r] Polyb. legat. 128. [s] Polyb. legat. 123.

him, that he muſt either comply with the decree of the ſenate, or be declared an enemy to the republic; and accordingly, as he ſtill perſiſted obſtinate and untractable, they ſolemnly renounced the alliance and amity which had been between him and Rome. Pruſias endeavoured to gain them by promiſes and ſubmiſſions; but they were inflexible, and after having exhorted Attalus to continue on the defenſive, diſperſed themſelves in ſeveral ſtates of Aſia, to aſſemble forces againſt the king of Bithynia. Rhodes, Cyzicum, and many other maritime cities, fitted out ſhips, and ſent them to the aſſiſtance of Attalus; who having out of theſe reinforcements formed a fleet of eighty gallies, gave the command of it to his brother Athenæus, with orders to ravage the coaſts of Bithynia; which he did accordingly, putting all to fire and ſword, and carrying off an immenſe booty. Pruſias, finding he could not hold out againſt the ſtorm that threatened him, ſubmitted to the decree of the ſenate, and accepted the terms which Rome ſent him by three new embaſſadors, viz. Appius Claudius, Lucius Oppius, and Aulus Poſthumius. The terms were, that he ſhould forthwith deliver up to Attalus twenty ſhips with decks, that he ſhould pay him five hundred talents within the ſpace of twenty years; that both of them ſhould be contented with what they had before the breaking out of the war; and laſtly, that Pruſias ſhould pay the Methymneans, Egeans, Cumæi, and Heracleots an hundred talents by way of reparation for the damage he had done them. Theſe conditions being agreed on and ſigned by the contending parties, Attalus returned to Pergamus with all his ſea and land-forces, and Pruſias into Bithynia, after having evacuated all the cities and ſtrongholds which he had taken during the war [t].

Pruſias accepts the terms of peace ſent him from Rome by three new embaſſadors.

ATTALUS, being thus by the aſſiſtance of the Romans delivered from ſo dangerous a war, ſent his nephew, the ſon of Eumenes, named alſo Attalus, to thank the ſenate for their kind offices, and to renew the friendſhip and alliance which had been formerly between his father and the people of Rome. Young Attalus was received by the ſenate with all poſſible marks of diſtinction, the antient treaties with his father were renewed, and he loaded with preſents ſent back to his uncle, all the cities of Greece through which he was to paſs, being ordered to receive and treat him in a manner ſuitable to his condition [u].

PRUSIAS

[t] Polyb. legat. 136, 137. Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 173.
[u] Idem. legat. 140.

PRUSIAS having discharged part of the sum which he was to pay to Attalus, hoped by the interest of his son Nicomedes, who resided at Rome and was in great favour with the senate, to prevail upon the senators to forgive the remainder. With this view he sent one Menas, a chief lord of his court, to Rome in quality of embassador; his instructions were, to make use of Nicomedes's interest to gain his point; and in case he did not succeed, to dispatch Nicomedes, of whose great power at Rome he began to be jealous. For the more easy execution of this wicked design, he commanded two thousand men to embarque with his embassador; an extraordinary guard, but necessary to facilitate the escape of Menas after the assassination, and protect him after his return into Bithynia. Menas on his arrival at Rome employed Nicomedes to use his best offices with the senate; but Andronicus, the embassador of the king of Pergamus, pleaded his master's cause so well, that the former decree of the senate was confirmed. What therefore remained was to put the barbarous orders of Prusias in execution, and murder Nicomedes. But as the young prince was greatly beloved at Rome, it seemed dangerous to Menas, notwithstanding the numerous guard which he concealed on board his ships, to make any attempt upon his life in the sight of the senate. After he had been long in suspense, not knowing what to do, he resolved at last to communicate to the son his father's design, and to turn the plot against the author and contriver of it. Accordingly Menas discovered to him his private instructions, and at his request imparted the whole matter to Andronicus the Pergamian embassodor, who obtained leave of his master to transport Nicomedes into Asia on board his ship, that prince promising to take him under his protection, and support him against his father, who was no less intolerable to his neighbours, than to his own subjects. The two embassadors sailed from Ostia much about the same time, and arrived as it had been agreed on before-hand, at Berenice, a small city on the coast of Epirus. There they both landed their men under pretence of refreshing them after the voyage, and met privately to consult together with Nicomedes about the measures that might seem most proper for the execution of their design. The next morning Nicomedes, as it had been concerted the night before, went ashore in a purple robe, with the royal diadem on his head and a sceptre in his hand. Hereupon Andronicus, with an hundred men he had with him, saluted

Prusias makes an attempt upon the life of his son Nicomedes.

ſaluted and proclaimed him king of Bithynia. Menas pretending to be ſurprized at this ſtep, aſſembled in great haſte his two thouſand Bithynians, and in an artful ſpeech exhorted them to ſide with that party which was moſt likely to prevail, inſinuating at the ſame time that Pruſias was generally hated and Nicomedes beloved, not only by the Bithynians, but by the Romans and the ſubjects of the king of Pergamus, who were ready to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power. Having ended his ſpeech, he obſerved in the countenances of his men an unanimous determination to adhere to the young prince; whereupon ſeconding their inclination, he immediately joined the troops of Andronicus, and ſaluted Nicomedes king of Bithynia. After grear ſhouts and repeated acclamations, they all reimbarqued, ſet ſail, and landed in a port of the kingdom of Pergamus. Attalus received young Nicomedes with great joy, and immediately diſpatched meſſengers to Pruſias, requiring him to deliver up ſome provinces to his ſon, and fix certain revenues on him for his ſubſiſtence. To this demand the old king proudly anſwered, that Nicomedes ſhould ſoon have the whole kingdom of Pergamus aſſigned to him [w]. But notwithſtanding this haughty anſwer, he forthwith ſent embaſſadors to Rome, deſiring the ſenate to ſend commiſſioners into Bithynia, and ſettle matters between him and Attalus in an amicable manner. But in the mean time Attalus, having encouraged Nicomedes to make war upon his father, by interpreting in his favour the anſwer of an oracle in Epirus, as if the god promiſed the young prince the kingdom of Bithynia [x], took the field; and entering with Nicomedes the dominions of Pruſias, was every-where received with great joy and loud acclamations. The king not daring to truſt his Bithynians, had recourſe to Diegyles, one of the petty ſovereigns of Thrace, whoſe daughter he had married for his ſecond wife. But all the ſuccours that prince could ſpare him were only five hundred men. With theſe he ſhut himſelf up in the city of Nice; but obſerving that the citizens were ready to revolt, and only waited for the arrival of Nicomedes and Attalus, he left that place, and took refuge in Nicomedia, which he thought ſtrong enough to endure a long ſiege, not doubting but in the mean time embaſſadors would arrive from Rome, and by the interpoſition

Attalus encourages Nicomedes to make war upon his father.

[w] Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 174, 175.

[x] Zoſim. hiſtor. l. ii.

ſition of their authority and good offices, make up matters between him and his ſon [y]. But he was herein greatly diſappointed; for though his embaſſadors on their arrival at Rome deſired an audience of the ſenate without delay, yet the prætor, to favour Attalus, put it off under various pretences from day to day. At length he preſented them to the conſcript fathers, and being ordered to appoint three embaſſadors to be ſent into Bithynia, he made choice of ſuch as were no ways qualified for that commiſſion; for they were men of no parts, and beſides made a very ridiculous figure, one of them being ſtrangely diſfigured with ſcars, the other lame, and the third a meer idiot: whence the ſaying of Cato, that the Bithynian embaſſy had neither head, feet, nor underſtanding [z]. It may be eaſily imagined, that men of this figure and character had no great weight in the two courts. Attalus and Nicomedes made as if they were ready to ſubmit to the authority of the ſenate; but the Bithynians, ſuborned underhand by them, openly declared, that they could no longer bear the tyranny of Pruſias, and therefore entreated the embaſſadors to return to Rome, and lay their complaints before the ſenate, not doubting but they ſhould be able to ſettle Nicomedes on the throne, before any new reſolutions could be taken by the conſcript fathers. The embaſſadors were eaſily prevailed upon to leave Bithynia, and return for new inſtructions to Rome. They were no ſooner gone than Attalus and Nicomedes at the head of the Pergamian troops advanced to Nicomedia, which readily opened its gates to them, and left the old king to his ſon's mercy. Pruſias, ſeeing himſelf thus deſerted and betrayed by all, fled for refuge to the temple of Jupiter. But the holineſs of the place could not ſcreen him from the violence of his ſon, who, as he had been brought up at Rome, was tainted with the depravity of manners that prevailed there: for he no ſooner heard that his father had taken ſanctuary in the temple of Jupiter, but he ſent thither aſſaſſins to murder him [a]. Diodorus Siculus [b] tells us, that the unnatural ſon killed him with his own hand; Strabo [c] charges Attalus with the death of Pruſias; Dio Caſſius and Zonaras ſay, that he was aſſaſſinated by his own ſubjects [d]; but Livy [e] divides divides the guilt of this heinous murder between Nicomedes and Attalus. The Romans took no notice of what had paſſed in Bithynia, but treated Attalus with the ſame kindneſs they had formerly ſhewn him, and ſuffered Nicomedes to enjoy peaceably the fruits of his wickedneſs. Soon after Attalus joined the Romans againſt Andriſcus, who pretended to be the ſon of Perſeus king of Macedon and heir to his dominions. This was the laſt enterprize Attalus engaged in; for Andriſcus being taken priſoner, and an end put to that war, he returned home with his ſea and land-forces, and gave himſelf up to an idle and diſſolute life, as Plutarch informs us, adding, that Philopœmen, one of his courtiers, governed both the king and kingdom at his pleaſure; inſomuch, that no body applied to Attalus, but his prime miniſter Philopœmen, for favours or employments, the whole management of affairs being committed to his care alone [f]. We have obſerved above, that Eumenes had a ſon, and as he was a minor at the time of his father's death, the tuition of the young prince with the crown was left to Attalus the uncle, who ſo faithfully diſcharged his truſt, that he not only carefully bred up his pupil, but at his death, which happened in the eighty-ſecond year of his age, and twenty-firſt of his reign, he left the crown to him, paſſing by his own children: for he looked upon it as a meer depoſitum intruſted with him for his nephew, and therefore reſtored it to him in the next ſucceſſion; an inſtance of honeſty ſeldom to be met with, princes being commonly no leſs ſollicitous to preſerve their crowns for their poſterity than for themſelves [g]. He was ſirnamed Philadelphus from the ſincere affection which he had for his brother, whereof we have related a very remarkable inſtance in the foregoing reign. He was a great encourager of learning, and took particular pleaſure in the converſation of learned men, eſpecially of Lycon, a native of Troas and a philoſopher of great note, whom he entertained at his court with a magnificence worthy of a king. He built two cities in Lydia, the one called Attalia, from his name, and the other, from his ſirname, Philadelphia. The author of the firſt book of the Maccabees mentions him among the allies of the Roman people [h]; and Tully tells us, that he was a con-

Nicomedes with the aſſiſtance of Attalus drives his father from the throne.

[y] Appian. ibid. [z] Plut. in Cat. Major. [a] Appian in Mithridat. p. 174 175. [b] Diodor. Sicul. in Photii. Biblioth. cod. 244. [c] Strab, l. xiii. p. 624. [d] Dio. Caſs. l. xlii. Zonar. l. vi. [e] Liv. Epitom. lib. l.

Attalus gives himſelf up to an idle and diſſolute life.

Death of Attalus.

[f] Plut. in apoph.
[g] Plut. ibid. & in lib. περὶ Φιλαδελφίας.
[h] Maccab. l. i. c. 15.

a conſtant friend to Rome, and ſent magnificent preſents to Scipio Æmilianus, while he lay at the ſiege of Numantia in Spain [i].

Attalus III. Year after the flood 2861. Before Chriſt 138.

ATTALUS the ſon of Eumenes was ſcarce ſeated on the throne, when he began to act more like a madman, as Juſtin expreſſes it, than a prince [k]. In the firſt place he cauſed moſt of his relations, and the beſt friends of his family, to be inhumanly maſſacred, charging ſome of them with the death of his mother Stratonice, who died in an advanced age, and others with the murder of his wife Berenice, though it was well known, that ſhe had died of an incurable diſtemper, and was generally lamented. Many upon groundleſs ſuſpicions were cut off with their wives, children, and whole families. In theſe executions he made uſe of his mercenaries, whom he had hired for this purpoſe out of the moſt cruel and ſavage of the barbarous nations. After he had thus filled the city of Pergamus and the whole kingdom with blood and ſlaughter, and in a wild fury cut off the beſt men in his kingdom, and thoſe who had ſerved his father and uncle with the greateſt fidelity, being conſcious of the many murders he had committed, and imagining that the manes of his murdered relations were perpetually haunting him, he fell into a deep melancholy, and confining himſelf in his palace, put on a mean apparel, let his hair and beard grow, and quite ſequeſtered himſelf from the reſt of mankind. Afterwards he withdrew from the palace, and

His cruelty.

And wild extravagancies.

ſhut himſelf up in a garden, which he cultivated with his own hands, ſowing it with all ſorts of poiſonous herbs. Theſe he mixed with wholeſome pulſe, and in his mad fits ſent packets of them to thoſe whom his gloomy temper led him to ſuſpect. In theſe and ſuch-like wild extravagancies he ſpent the whole time of his reign, the beſt commendation of which was its ſhortneſs; for it ended after five years in his death, which happened in the following manner. As he was without friends, without relations, and even without courtiers, no one daring to come near him, he took a fancy to employ his time in the trade of a founder; and having undertaken to make a brazen monument for his mother, while he laboured in melting and working the braſs, the heat of the ſun and the furnace threw him into a fever, of which he died the ſeventh day after, delivering his people from the moſt cruel and barbarous tyrant

His death.

[i] Cic. in orat. pro Dejotaro. [k] Juſtin. l. xxxvi. c. 4.

rant that ever ſwayed a ſcepter [k]. All the antients ſpeak of him as a madman; and ſome writers tell us, that the grief, which he conceived for the death of his mother Stratonice, whom he loved with great tenderneſs, threw him into a deep melancholy, which at length deprived him of his ſenſes. From his tender affection for his mother he was ſirnamed Philometor, and not ironically, as Volaterranus would have it, as if he had hated, and even murdered, her. Juſtin tells us in expreſs terms [l], that he well deſerved that name for the extraordinary affection he always bore her; and nevertheleſs the above-mentioned author quotes Juſtin to prove what he advances, though diametrically oppoſite to what we read in that writer. Lucian and Zonaras accuſe this prince of having diſpatched his uncle Attalus with poiſon; but other writers without taking notice of any violence uſed on him, tell us, that he died in the eighty-ſecond year of his age, leaving the crown to his nephew, whom he had brought up with great care. Varro [m] and Columella [n] reckon Attalus Philometor among thoſe who have wrote of agriculture, and add, that he was ſkilled in phyſic, and had a thorough knowledge of ſimples. Hence ſome have conjectured, that the phyſician Attalus mentioned by Pliny [o], was the king of Pergamus, ſince that author elſewhere [p] mentions him among thoſe who have wrote of phyſic. At his death he left a will, whereby he made the Romans heirs of all his goods; in virtue of this will the republic ſeized on his kingdom, reckoning that among his goods, and reduced it to a province, which was known by the name of Aſia Propria or Proper Aſia. Eudemus of Pergamus brought this will to Rome, and there delivered it to Tiberius Gracchus tribune of the people, together with the deceaſed king's crown and purple robes q. But Ariſtoni-

Makes the Roman people heirs of all his goods.

[k] Juſtin. l. xxxvi. c. 4. [l] Juſtin. ibid. [m] Varro. de re ruſtic. l. i. c. 1. [n] Columell. de ruſtic. l. i. c. 1. [o] Plin. l. xxxiii. [p] Idem, l. viii. [q] Juſtin. l. xxxvi. c. 4. Plutarch. in Tiber. Gracch.

(E) The words of Attalus's will, were, Populus Romanus bonorum meorum hæres eſto; Let the people of Rome be the heirs of my goods: Theſe words the ſenate interpreted as comprehending his kingdom, which they reckoned among the king's goods. But ſome of the neighbouring princes, namely Mithridates king of Pontus (75), looked upon this will as a mere forgery; others were

(75) Salluſt. l. iv. hiſtoriar.

cus, the next heir, did not tamely ſubmit to the will which Attalus was ſaid to have made. He was the ſon of Eumenes and brother of Attalus, though by another mother, viz. by an Epheſian courteſan, the daughter of a muſician. As ſon of Eumenes he laid claim to the crown, and having aſſembled a conſiderable army, he put himſelf in a condition to maintain his pretenſions. With the aſſiſtance of a body of Thracians and Phocæans, whom he took into his ſervice, he made himſelf maſter of ſome ſtrong places, which opened him a way into the heart of the kingdom, where he was joined by great numbers of Pergamians, who being accuſtomed to a monarchical, dreaded a republican, government; and therefore, without minding the birth of their new leader, preferred his authority to that of a foreign prætor. Having by this means got together in a ſhort time a numerous and powerful army, he beſieged the places which were for maintaining the late king's will, and took the cities of Samos and Colophon in Ionia, and Myndos in Caria. The other places ſurrendered upon terms; ſo that he became, without Ariſtonicus lays claim to the crown.

And makes himſelf maſter of the whole kingdom.

were of opinion, that the Romans, allowing it to be genuine, were in virtue of the above-mentioned word entitled only to the deceaſed king's moveable goods, the kingdom itſelf belonging by right of ſucceſſion to Ariſtonicus the only ſurviving prince of the blood royal. 'Tis true, he was the natural ſon of Eumenes; but this, according to the cuſtom which obtained among all the eaſtern princes, did not by any means debar him from the crown, when there were no lawful children to ſucceed to it. Horace among the Latin writers ſeems to inſinuate, as Acron obſerves in his notes on that poet, that the Romans were intruders, and not lawful heirs to king Attalus, in the following words:

——— Neque Attali
Ignotus hæres regiam occupavi (76).

That is, neither have I, an unknown heir, or an heir no ways related to Attalus invaded his palace. It is not therefore true, that the kingdom of "Pergamus belonged in ſtrict equity to the "Romans, that the republic had an indiſputable right of dominion over the Pergamians, and that Ariſtonicus had no manner of "claim to the kingdom of Attalus, as certain modern writers confidently affirm (77).

(76) Horat. l. ii. Ode 18.

(77) Catrou and Rouillé hiſt. Rom. l. li. ad An. urb. 624.

without meeting with any conſiderable oppoſition, maſter of the whole kingdom [r].

THIS news was brought to Rome about the time the people were to chuſe conſuls, and among the candidates were two men of great abilities, but whoſe employments ſeemed to render them incapable of making war in Aſia. Theſe were Licinius Craſſus, high-pontiff, and Lucius Valerius Flaccus, flamen Martialis, or in other words, high-prieſt of Mars. Both obtained the conſulate for which they ſtood, and were both very deſirous of leading the armies of the republic into Aſia, no commiſſion being more profitable than that of commanding in thoſe diſtant countries; but, after a ſharp conteſt, it was determined in the comitia, that Craſſus might, tho' pontifex maximus, head the armies of the republic into Aſia, and he was accordingly appointed to diſpoſſeſs Ariſtonicus of the kingdom of Pergamus, and reduce it, agreeable to the late king's will, to a Roman province. Craſſus, notwithſtanding the inteſtine broils which then reigned at Rome, immediately ſet out for Aſia; but as we find no mention made by hiſtorians of troops, fleets, or proviſion ſent with the conſul, he, without all doubt, took it for granted, that the eaſtern kings and nations, in alliance with Rome, would furniſh him with ſufficient forces on the ſpot to drive out the uſurper. On his arrival in Aſia, he found that neither Syria nor Egypt were in a condition to lend him any aſſiſtance, both thoſe kingdoms being at that time involved in great troubles. The conſul therefore had recourſe to the kings of Pontus, Cappadocia, Bithynia, and Paphlagonia, who all furniſhed him with troops; ſo that he advanced at the head of a numerous army, or rather of four armies, towards the frontiers of the kingdom of Pergamus [s]. Ariſtonicus did not care to engage the conſul, but retiring as he advanced, ſuffered him to lay waſte the country, in hopes of finding an opportunity of falling upon him unawares, which ſoon offered; for Craſſus, who was a man of an avaricious temper, having got together an immenſe booty, began to retire from the inland parts of the kingdom toward the coaſt, in order to ſhip it off for Italy; but, as the ſeaſon was far advanced and the roads almoſt impaſſable, the army advanced very ſlowly; beſides, the great number of waggons, loaded with the riches almoſt of Craſſus ſent by the ſenate againſt him.

[r] Liv. l. lix. Vel. Paterc. l. ii. c. 4. Strabo, l. xiv. p. 646. Flor. l. iii. c. 20. [s] Strabo, ibid. Juſtin. l. xxxvii. c. 1. Europ. l. iv.

the whole kingdom, retarded their march ſtill more, and frequently occaſioned a great confuſion in the army; which Ariſtonicus being informed of, lay in wait for the conſul in a narrow paſſage between ſteep hills, and there fell upon him when he leaſt expected it. Craſſus, tho' thus ſurprized, might have eaſily repulſed the enemy, having under his command a very numerous and well-diſciplined army; but being wholly intent upon preſerving the ſpoils, he unadviſedly thinned the ranks to put a ſtronger guard on them; ſo that the allies, being attacked by Ariſtonicus's men, with great vigour and in a cloſe body, were entirely routed. In the flight the conſul himſelf was taken priſoner by a body of Thracians between Elea and Myrina; but as they were carrying him in triumph to the camp of Ariſtonicus, he began to conſider the reproach it would caſt both on himſelf and on his republic, if a conſul and a pontifex maximus ſhould become a ſlave to ſo deſpicable an enemy as Ariſtonicus, and on that conſideration would have laid violent hands on himſelf, had he not been diſarmed; but as he had a rod in his hand to guide the horſe on which he was mounted, he ſtruck the ſoldier, who was neareſt him, ſo violently with it, that he beat out one of his eyes. Hereupon the Thracian, in a tranſport of rage, drew his ſword, and, without further deliberation run the conſul through and killed him on the ſpot. By this means Ariſtonicus was deprived of the pleaſure of having a Roman conſul and a pontifex maximus in his power; however, the conſul's head was carried to the enemy's camp, and there preſented to Ariſtonicus, and expoſed to public view; but his body was honourably buried at Myrina, or as others will have it, at Smyrna [t].

Craſſus defeated, and taken priſoner.

WHEN news of this defeat was brought to Rome, the tribes promoted two perſons to the conſulate, who were very unequal in rank, viz. C. Claudius Pulcher, a man of an illuſtrious family, and M. Perperna, a ſoldier of fortune. The latter was ſent into Aſia to revenge the death of the conſul, and put an end to the Pergamian war. He appeared unexpectedly in the kingdom of Pergamus, where he found Ariſtonicus wholly intent on enjoying the fruits of his victory. Feaſts, revels, and entertainments, after the Aſiatic faſhion, took up all his thoughts and time; but Perperna ſent into Aſia in his room.

[t] Liv. l. lix. Vel. Paterc. l. ii. Strabo, l. xiv. p. 646. Val. Max. l. iii. c. 2. Flor. l. ii. c. 20. Juſtin. l. xxxvi. c. 4. Jul. Obſeq. de prodig. Eutrop. l. iv. Oroſ. l v. c. 10.

but he was ſoon rouſed out of his lethargy by the new conſul, who having aſſembled, with incredible expedition, the troops of the allies, came unexpectedly upon him, and having obliged him to venture an engagement, gained a complete victory over him. Ariſtonicus after the defeat fled to Stratonice (F), where he had no ſooner ſhut himſelf up than the conqueror was before the place, which he blocked up on all ſides, and, by that means, without expoſing his men to the dangers of an aſſault, reduced the garriſon to ſuch ſtraits, that they delivered both the city and their leader into his hands. The philoſopher Bloſius (G), who had aſſiſted Ariſtonicus with his counſels during

(F) The antient geographers mention three cities in Aſia by this name. That which is here ſpoken of ſtood in Caria, and was, according to Strabo (78), originally a Syro-Macedonian colony. It took its name, as Stephanus informs us, from Stratonice the wife of Antiochus Soter. The emperor Adrian, who rebuilt it, called it from his own name Adrianopolis; but in the antient notitiæ it retained its old name. Strabo (79) mentions another city bearing this name in the neighbourhood of mount Taurus; and Ptolemy a third, which he places in Meſopotamia.

(G) Bloſius was a native of Cumæ, and a philoſopher of great note. He warmly preſſed Tiberius Gracchus, who had a great opinion of his integrity and underſtanding, not to drop his deſign of paſſing the famous Agrarian law. After the death of his friend Gracchus, he was cited to appear before the conſul, and being aſked, why he had engaged in the party of that ſeditious tribune? he boldly anſwered, Becauſe he thought it the moſt juſt. The conſul further enquired, why he went ſo far as to be his agent? To this queſtion the philoſopher replied, that he did all that lay in his power to ſerve him, becauſe he deſerved to be ſerved and obeyed. Would you then have burnt the capitol, ſaid the conſul, if he had ordered you to do it? Spare his memory, replied Bloſius, with a ſurpriſing confidence; he was not capable of ſo black an attempt; but, if he had given me ſuch an order, I ſhould have certainly put it in execution, thinking his ordering it a ſufficient proof of its being neceſſary for the public good (80). The intrepidity of Bloſius ſurpriſed the conſul, who found means to reſcue nim from the puniſhment, which the ſenate had inflicted on the other friends of the tribune. He afterwards went over into Aſia, where he aſſiſted Ariſtonicus with his counſels; and, after having done all the miſchief he could to the Romans, ended his life in the manner we have related.

(78) Strabo, l. xiv. (79) Idem ibid. (80) Plut. in Gracch.

during the whole course of the war, exhorted him to prefer a voluntary death to a shameful captivity, and encouraged him to it by dispatching himself in his presence; but he, like the other Asiatic princes, not having courage enough to lay violent hands on himself, even in the most calamitous circumstances, suffered himself to be carried to the consul, who kept him in chains to grace his triumph [u].

Aristonicus defeated, and taken.

In the mean time new consuls being created at Rome, viz. C. Sempronius Tuditanus, and Manius Aquilius, the latter was appointed to succeed Perperna in Asia, and put an end to that war, by reducing the kingdom of Pergamus to a Roman province. On his arrival he sent a proud message to Perperna, commanding him to deliver up to him Aristonicus, as belonging to his triumph rather than to Perperna's. This order Perperna refused to comply with, and his refusal was very likely to be attended with bad consequences; but his death, which happened soon after the arrival of Aquilius, decided the question. He had quite exhausted himself in pursuing Aristonicus, and hurrying from place to place after him; however, before his death, he took care to ship off for Rome all the treasures of the deceased king; which was a great disappointment to the consul Aquilius [w].

The Pergamians, notwithstanding the captivity of their leader Aristonicus, and the signal victory gained by the brave Perperna, still held out against the Romans, the fear of serving new masters, and receiving laws from a foreign republic, keeping the people every-where in arms; so that Aquilius was obliged to besiege almost all the cities of the kingdom of Pergamus, and reduce them one by one. As most of the cities of the kingdom of Pergamus had no other water but what was brought from far in aqueducts, the consul, provoked at their obstinate resistance, instead of demolishing the aqueducts, as was customary in war, poisoned the springs, and by that means spread death and desolation in the places he besieged. All the antients declare their detestation of this perfidious and inhuman way of waging war, condemning it as a most notorious infraction of the law of nature; but Rome, it seems, was not so much offended at it, since she suffered the cruel Aquilius, who practised it, to govern the kingdom of Pergamus, [u] Liv. Strabo, Florus, Just. Oros. Eutrop. Val. Max. ibid.

[w] Strabo, l. xiv. p. 646. Val. Max. l. iii. c. 4. Justin. l. xxxvi. c. 4. Eutrop. l. iv. Oros. l. v. c. 10.

gamus, in quality of proconſul for three whole years after his conſulſhip was expired [x]. Aquilius having at laſt reduced the whole kingdom of Pergamus, the Roman ſenate appointed ten commiſſioners to ſettle it as a prætorian province, and put Aquilius at the head of the commiſſion. By them this great ſtate was divided into ſeveral diſtricts, each of them depending on the metropolis, where the Roman prætor fixed his reſidence. The whole province comprehended Lydia, Caria, the Helleſpont, and the two Phrygias. Some of theſe countries were beſtowed on the four kings who helped to conquer them. Lycaonia and Cilicia were given to the ſons of Ariarathes who was killed in this war. Phrygia Major, or the Greater Phrygia was, according to Juſtin [y], conferred upon Mithridates Euergetes by the ſenate; according to Appian [z], ſold to that prince by Aquilius for a conſiderable ſum of money, which the king paid on the ſpot. However that be, it is certain, that after the death of Mithridates, the ſenate took Phrygia from his ſon in his minority, and declared it a free and independent ſtate. As for the unhappy Ariſtonicus, he was led in chains before the triumphal chariot of Aquilius, as appears from the letter which Mithridates the Great wrote to Arſaces king of Parthia. The Romans, ſays he in that letter [a], forging a will, whereby Attalus bequeathed to them his kingdom, led Ariſtonicus the ſon of Eumenes in triumph, for attempting to recover, by force of arms, his father's kingdom. Velleius Paterculus tells us likewiſe, that he was led in triumph by Manius Aquilius, and afterwards beheaded [b]. Strabo ſays, that after the triumph he was carried back to priſon, and there ſtrangled by an order from the ſenate [c]; and with him agree Eutropius [d] and Oroſius [e]. It is therefore ſurpriſing, that certain modern writers [f], in oppoſition to theſe glaring authorities, ſhould tell us, that Ariſtonicus died before Aquilius's triumph, which happened three years after the entire reduction of the Pergamian kingdom.

The kingdom of Pergamus reduced by Aquilius to a Roman province. Year after the flood, 2870. Before Chriſt 119.

Rome

[x] Flor. l. ii. c. 20. [y] Juſtin, l. xxxviii. c. 5. [z] Appian. in Mithridatic. p. 177. & 208. & de bell. civil. p. 362, 363. Juſtin. ibid. Strabo, l. xiii. p. 624. & l. xi p. 646.
[a] Salluſt. Hiſtoriar. l. iv. [b] Vel. Paterc. l. ii. c. 4.
[c] Strabo, l. xiv. p. 646. [d] Eutrop. l. iv. [e] Oroſ. l. v. c. 10. [f] Catrou and Rouil. Hiſt. Rom. l. li. ad ann. urb. 624.

Rome having thus reduced the kingdom of Attalus to a province, maintained from this time a perpetual intercourſe with the Aſiatics; and hence that inundation of vices of all kinds, which over-ran the whole ſtate. The republic gained indeed a conſiderable increaſe of power and riches by this new conqueſt; but ſhe paid dear for it in that univerſal depravation of manners which it introduced. Rome, ſays Juſtin[g], gave law to Aſia; but Aſia, in her turn, revenged herſelf on Rome, by teaching the Romans refinements in debauchery, and profuſeneſs in entertainments and furniture (H).

[g] Juſtin. ibid.

(H) Pliny looks on the conqueſt of Pergamus as the origin of the many diſorders which afterwards prevailed in Rome. With the wealth of Pergamus, ſays he, debauchery, effeminacy, luxury, and all kinds of vices, came in crowds to Rome, and overwhelmed the capital of the world. Modeſty and innocence were no longer countenanced in a city given up to the pleaſures and delights of Aſia. The citizens, dazzled with the ſplendor of the rich moveables that were ſhewn them, began to be aſhamed of their antient ſimplicity. They picqued themſelves on knowing how to value what their anceſtors took pride in deſpiſing. They rivalled one another in the richneſs of their dreſs, in the furniture of their houſes, and expence of their tables. Thus Aſia, when ſubdued, had her full revenge on us, by bringing our city under a much worſe yoke, that of effeminacy. Thus far Pliny (81), whoſe teſtimony is confirmed by Florus, Valerius Maximus, Seneca, Juvenal, and all the other writers who make any mention of the general diſſolution of manners, which at this time began to reign, without reſtraint, at Rome.

(81) Plin. l. v. c. 7. & l. xxxiii. c. 11.

CHAP.

CHAP. VII.

The hiſtory of Thrace.

THRACE, a country frequently mentioned by the Greek and Latin hiſtorians, derives its name, according to ſome writers, from Thrax the ſon of Mars; according to others from the barrenneſs of the ſoil, or the barbarity of the inhabitants, the Greek original bearing either of theſe ſignifications [h]. Joſephus, whoſe opinion ſeems to us the moſt probable, thinks it was called Thrace and Thracia, from Thyras the ſon of Japhet, who firſt peopled this country; for in his time it ſtill retained the names of Thyras, and Thyracia, and Thyrace, which with a very ſmall alteration, were changed into Thracia and Thrace [i]. His opinion is confirmed by Iſidorus [k], St. Jerom [l], Zonaras [m], and moſt of the eccleſiaſtic writers, who all tell us, that Thracia was firſt called Thyracia, from Thyras, whoſe deſcendants firſt inhabited the large provinces comprehended under that name. It was bounded on the north by mount Hæmus; on the ſouth by the Ægean ſea; on the eaſt by the Euxine ſea, the Helleſpont, and the Propontis; and on the weſt by Macedon and the river Strymon [n]. Some of the antient geographers extend the bounds of Thrace far beyond the river Strymon and mount Hæmus. Pliny [o] carries its frontiers to the Iſter or Danube; Appian joins it to Illyricum [p], and Herodotus [q] calls it the largeſt country in the world, except India. Name, Situation, &c.

CITIES of note on the Ægean ſea were, Oeſyma, Neapolis, Topiris or Toperus, all three placed by Stephanus, Pliny, and Pomponius Mela, between the rivers Strymon and Neſtus or Neſſus; Datus, on the eaſtern bank of that river; and near it Abdera antiently one of the moſt famous cities of Thrace. Mela tells us, that Abdera, was founded Cities.

[h] Strabo, l. xiv. Plin. l. iv. c. 11. [i] Joſeph. Antiq. l. i. c. 7. [k] Iſidor. de origin. l. ix. [l] Hieronym. de quæſt. Hebraic. [m] Zonar. l. iv. [n] Pomp. Mela, l. xi. c. 11. Ptolemæus, l. iii. c. 11. [o] Plin. l. iv. c. 11. [p] Appian. in Syriac. [q] Herodot. l. v.

founded by the ſiſter of Diomedes; but Stephanus makes Hercules the founder of it, and adds, that he gave it the name of Abdera in memory of Abderus, one of his companions, who was devoured by the famous, or rather fabulous, horſes of Diomedes. In proceſs of time a colony of Clazomenians ſettled there; whence the city is by ſome writers called alſo Clazomene. The Clazomenians were driven out by the natives, who ſuffered the Teians to live peaceably in Abdera and other places of Thrace, after they had been driven out of their own country by Cyrus the Great; and hence Abdera is called by Strabo [r] and other writers a colony of the Teians. The Abderitani were looked upon by the antients as a dull, ſtupid people; but nevertheleſs their city gave birth to ſome great men, namely to Protagoras and the famous Democritus (I). This city is now generally known by the name of Polyſtylo, tho' Niger calls it Aſperoſa, and Nardus Aſtrizza. Near Abdera were the famous gold and ſilver mines ſpoke of by Plutarch [s], Thucydides, Ammianus Marcellinus, and moſt of the antient hiſtorians and geographers. The place was called Scaptefyle. Stephanus ſays it was a ſmall town, and places it over-againſt the iſland of Thaſus. Here Thucydides, as Plutarch informs us [t], wrote the hiſtory of the Peloponneſian war, his wife being a native of that place, as we read in Marcellinus [u]. On the ſame coaſt of the Ægean ſea were the cities of Dicæa, Tirida, Iſmaros, Stryma, Maronea, and Ænos. The two laſt places were conquered by Philip the father of Perſeus, and upon the defeat of the latter by the Romans, promiſed by that republick to Eumenes king of Pergamus; but afterwards, for political reaſons, declared by the ſenate free and independent [w]. On the Propontis were the cities of Macrontichos, Biſanthe, Ganos, Arzus, Perinthus, called afterwards Heraclea, Selymbria, and Bethynia. On the Thracian Boſphorus, Byzan-

[r] Strab. l. xiv. p. 443. [s] Plut. in Cim. [t] Idem, de exilio. [u] Marcel. in vita Thucyd. [w] Liv. l. xxxi. c. 31. Polyb. l. v. c. 34.

(I) This made Juvenal ſay, in ſpeaking of this philoſopher,

——Cujus prudentia monſtrat
Summos poſſe viros, & magna exempla daturos,
Vervecum in patria, craſſoque ſub aere naſci (82)

(82) Juvenal. ſatyr. 10.

Byzantium, and the port of Daphne. On the Euxine ſea, Phinopolis, Phrygia, Philea, Aulæum, Apollonia, Anchialus, and Meſembria. Byzantium, now known by the name of Conſtantinople, was founded, according to Euſebius [x], about the XXXth olympiad, while Tullus Hoſtilius reigned at Rome; but Diodorus Siculus will have the foundations of this city to have been laid in the time of the Argonauts, by one Byſas who then reigned in the neighbouring country, and from whoſe name the city was called Byzantium [y]. This Byſas, if Euſtathius is to be credited [z], arrived in Thrace a little before the Argonauts came into thoſe ſeas, and ſettled there with a colony of Megarenſes. Velleius Paterculus aſcribes the glory of founding this great metropolis to the Mileſians [a]; and Ammianus Marcellinus to the inhabitants of Attica [b]. Some antient medals of Byzantium, which have reached our times, bear the name and head of Byſas, with the prow of a ſhip on the reverſe, probably of that ſhip which brought him into Thrace. Juſtin was greatly miſtaken as to the origin and founder of this city, when he wrote, that Pauſanias king of Lacedæmon built it, ſince it is certain, that Pauſanias took it from the Perſians, who had made themſelves maſters of it before the king of Lacedæmon had ever ſet foot in Aſia [c]. It underwent many revolutions, having been ſometimes ſubject to the Perſians, ſometimes to the Lacedæmonians, and ſometimes to the Athenians. It is not without reaſon that Byzantium was looked upon by the antients as the moſt pleaſantly, and alſo the moſt conveniently ſituated for trade of any city in the world; but we ſhall have occaſion hereafter to ſpeak of it more at length. Perinthus was founded, according to Stephanus, by a companion of Oreſtes bearing that name, and afterwards called Heraclea, from Hercules, who conquered it. Ammianus Marcellinus tells us, that it was built by Hercules; but Marcianus of Heraclea will have it to be a colony of the Samians. Euſebius ſays it was founded in the XLIVth olympiad, which was many years after the time of Hercules. This city maintained its liberty againſt Philip the ſon of Amyntas, after all the other cities of Thrace had ſubmitted to him.

THE inland cities of Thrace were, Jemphorina, the metropolis of the Mædi; Pantalia, the capital of the Danthe[x] Euſeb. in Chron. [y] Diodor. Sicul. l. v. [z] Euſtath. in Dionyſ. [a] Vel. Paterc. l. ii. [b] Ammian. Marcel. l. iii. [c] Thucyd. l. iii. Herodot. l. iv.

Danthelitæ; Uſcudama, the chief city of the Beſſi; Philippopolis, built by Philip the father of Alexander, near the Hebrus; Nicopolis, founded by Trajan on the banks of the Neſtus; Mulolitum, ſtanding between the Neſtus and the Hebrus; Tempyrum, mentioned by Ovid [d] as ſituated on the banks of the Hebrus; Adrianopolis, built by Adrian, between the Hebrus and mount Rhodope; and Plotinopolis, ſo called from the wife of Trajan, that emperor having founded it.

Mountains and rivers.

THE mountains of this country, ſuch as may be proper to take notice of, are Hæmus, the higheſt of all the mountains in Thrace, and parting it from Lower Myſia to the north; Rhodope, the higheſt mountain after Hæmus, and famous among the poets for the fate of Orpheus; Pangæus, ſeparating Thrace from Macedon; and Orbelus, not far from the river Neſtus. Hæmus and Rhodope are two long chains of mountain, running almoſt in a parallel line from the confines of Macedon to the Euxine ſea. Pomponius Mela tells us, that, from one of the ſummits of mount Hæmus, one may diſcover the Euxine on one ſide, and the Adriatic on the other [e]; but herein he was certainly miſtaken. The rivers of note are, the Hebrus, which ſprings from mount Hœmus, waters the territories of Philippopolis, Adrianopolis, Plotinopolis, and Trajanopolis, and diſcharges itſelf by two mouths into the Ægean ſea, over-againſt the iſland of Samothrace; the Strymon, which riſes on mount Pangœus, on the borders of Macedon, and falls into the ſame ſea between Amphipolis and Oeſyma; the Neſſus or Neſtus, ſpringing from mount Rhodope, and diſemboguing itſelf into the ſea over-againſt the iſland of Thaſus; the Melas, the Arſus, the Panyſus; the firſt emptying itſelf into the Ægean, the ſecond into the Propontis, and the third into the Euxine ſea [f].

The Thracian Cherſoneſus.

THE Thracian Cherſoneſus is a peninſula, incloſed on the ſouth by the Ægean ſea, on the weſt by the gulf of Melas, and on the eaſt by the Helleſpont, being joined on the north to the continent by a neck of land about thirty-ſeven furlongs broad. It contained the following cities, Cardia, Agora, Panormus, Alopeconneſus, Elæus, Seſtus, Madytos, Ciſſa, Callipolis, Lyſimachia, and Pactye.

Cardia

[d] Ovid. Triſt. l. i. eleg. 9. [e] Pomp. Mela, l. ii. c. 11. [f] Vide Pomp. Mela, ibid. Plin. l. iv. c. 11. Strabo. l. vii. p. 220.

Cardia was ſituated on the gulf of Melas, at the entrance into the peninſula, and ſo called, according to Pliny [g], from its being built in the form of a heart. Agora, Panormus and Alopeconneſus ſtood on the ſame gulf; the latter was ſo called from the great number of foxes which infeſted its territory. Pliny [h], miſled by the name, which ſignifies in the original Greek the iſland of foxes, took it to be an iſland; but all the other geographers ſpeak of it as ſtanding on the Cherſoneſus. Elæus ſtood on the coaſt of the Helleſpont overagainſt cape Maſtuſia, now Cape Græco. Callipolis, now Gallipoli, is placed by Strabo and Pliny on the coaſt of the Propontis, near the northern mouth of the Helleſpont. It gives its name to the famous ſtreights which divide Europe from Aſia. Of Seſtus and Lyſimachia we ſpoke in the hiſtories of Perſia and Syria. As for the other cities of the Cherſoneſus, they contain nothing worthy notice.

Soil. THE inland parts of Thrace are very cold and barren, the ſnow lying on the mountains the greateſt part of the year; but the maritime provinces are productive of all ſorts of grain, and neceſſaries for life, and withal ſo pleaſant, that Mela compares them to the moſt fruitful and agreeable countries of Aſia [i].

Manners, religion, &c. THE antient Thracians were deemed a brave and warlike nation; but of a cruel and ſavage temper, being generally ſpeaking, quite ſtrangers to all humanity and good nature. In point of religion they ſcarce differed from the Macedonians their neighbours, adoring Jupiter, Hercules, Diana, Bacchus, and more eſpecially Mars and Hermes or Mercury, by whoſe name alone their kings uſed to ſwear, pretending to be deſcended from him [k]. Herodotus gives us the following account of their cuſtoms and manners: When a child is born, his relations ſitting round him in a circle, deplore his condition, on account of the evils he muſt ſuffer in the courſe of his life, enumerating the various calamities incident to mankind; but when any one dies, they inter him with great rejoicing, repeating the miſeries he has exchanged for a complete happineſs. Among the Creſtoneans, who inhabit the mountainous parts of Thrace, each man has many wives, who, at his death contend warmly, being ſupported by their ſeveral friends, who ſhall be accounted to have been the moſt dear to the huſband husband. In the end, she who is adjudged to have merited that honour, after having received great commendations, both from the men and women, is killed upon the grave by the nearest of her relations, and buried in the same tomb with her husband; which is a great mortification to the rest, they being ever after looked upon by all with the utmost contempt [l]. The Thracians in general, as our historian tells us, sell their children, and take no care of their daughters, suffering them to live with whom and in what manner they please; nevertheless they keep a strict guard over their wives, and purchase them of their relations at a very great rate. To be marked on the forehead is honourable; and a man without such marks is accounted ignoble. Idleness is esteemed an appendix of greatness; husbandry is looked upon as unbecoming, and to subsist by war and rapine highly glorious. The funerals of eminent persons among them are celebrated in the following manner: they expose the dead body to public view for three days, during which time they perform their lamentations, and sacrifice to the infernal gods various sorts of animals. When the sacrifices are over, they either burn or bury the body in the ground, and having thrown up a mound of earth over the grave, they apply themselves to feasting, and celebrate all manner of combats and sports round the place [m].

[g] Plin. l. iv. c. 11. [h] Plin. l. iv. c. 12. [i] Pomp. Mela, ibid. [k] Herodot. l. v.

Government and inhabitants.

THRACE was antiently divided into numberless kingdoms quite independent of each other. Herodotus tells us, that if the Thracians had been either under the government of one prince, or unanimous in their counsels, they would have been the most powerful nation in the world; but that they were no-ways formidable, being divided, as it were, into many different nations, and ever at variance among themselves [n]. These different nations were the Dolonci, Densseletæ, Bessi, Bistones, Odomantes, Cicones, Edoni, Brygi, Thyni, Pieres, Odrysæ, Autonomy, Crobyzi, Mædi, Sapæi, and Celetæ. The Dolonci were so called from Doloncus one of their kings, who according to Eustathius, first introduced polygamy among them [o]. At the time of Darius's expedition into Greece, they were possessed of the Thracian Chersonesus, and governed by princes of the family of Miltiades, who acquired the sovereignty in the following manner: The Dolonci

Dolonci,

[l] Idem ibid. [m] Idem. ibid. [n] Herodot. l. v. sub. init. [o] Eustath. in Dionys.

Ionci having ſuffered much in a war againſt the Abſynthians, ſent ſome of their chief men to conſult the oracle of Delphos about the event of it. The Pythian, inſtead of anſwering the queſtion they propoſed, ordered them to deſire the firſt man, who, after their departure, ſhould invite them to lodge in his houſe, to lead a colony into their country. With this anſwer the Dolonci departed, and paſſing through the territory of the Phocians and Bœotians, without receiving any offer of entertainment, turned into the road of Athens. As they paſſed through Athens, Miltiades, the ſon of Cypſelus, ſeeing them cloathed and armed in a different manner from the Athenians, and knowing thereby that they were ſtrangers, invited them to lodge in his houſe. They accepted the invitation, and, being hoſpitably entertained, acquainted him with the anſwer of the oracle, and exhorted him to comply with the admonition of the god. As Miltiades was grown weary of the government of Piſiſtratus, and wanted only ſome plauſible pretence to withdraw from Athens, he immediately went to conſult the Delphian oracle, whether he ſhould yield to the requeſt of the Dolonci or not; and having received an encouraging anſwer, he took with him ſuch of the Athenians as were willing to join in this expedition, and ſetting ſail for the Cherſoneſus with the Dolonci, was, upon his arrival, inveſted with the ſovereign power. The firſt thing he did after he was raiſed to the throne was, to build a wall upon the Iſthmus of the Cherſoneſus, from the city of Cardia to that of Pactya, to prevent the Abſynthians from infeſting the country for the future with their incurſions. Having completed this work, he, in the next place, made war on the Lampſacenians, and falling into an ambuſcade, was taken by the enemy; but Cræſus king of Lydia, who had a great eſteem for him, being acquainted with his misfortune, diſpatched a meſſenger to Lampſacus, with orders to demand the liberty of Miltiades, and to let them know, that in caſe they refuſed to comply with his demand, he would uſe them like pines. The Lampſacenians, differing in their opinion about the meaning of that menace, were not a little perplexed at this meſſage; but one of their ſenators obſerving, that of all trees the pine alone periſhes entirely when cut down, without leaving any ſhoots, they immediately ſet Miltiades at liberty, and ſent him home without ranſom. Having thus, by means of Cræſus, eſcaped ſlavery, he reſumed the government; but died ſoon after, leaving the kingdom, as he had no children of his own, to Steſagoras, the ſon of his brother Cimon. The Dolonci honoured his memory with ſacrifices, celebrating annually on this occaſion gymnaſtic and equeſtrian exerciſes, no Lampſacenian being permitted to contend at them for the prize [p]. During the war, which ſtill continued with the people of Lampſacus, Steſagoras likewiſe died without children, being mortally wounded with the blow of an ax, which he received on the head, from one who pretended to be a deſerter. After his death the ſons of Piſiſtratus ſent Miltiades, the ſon of Cimon and brother of Steſagoras, to the Cherſoneſus with one ſhip, to take upon him the government of that peninſula. On his arrival he kept himſelf retired, under colour of honouring the memory of his brother Steſagoras; which the Cherſoneſians hearing, ſent the chief men of each city to his houſe, to condole with him in the name of the whole nation. As he found that they had no inclination to beſtow the crown upon him, he cauſed all thoſe to be ſeized who were come to viſit him, and by that means reduced, with the few troops he had, the cities thus deſtitute of their leading men. In the third year of his government he abandoned his dominions, not daring to wait the coming of the Scythian Nomades, who having been irritated by the expedition of Darius, had aſſembled their forces, and were advancing to the frontiers of the Cherſoneſus. Upon the departure of the Scythians, he was re-inſtated in the ſovereignty by a ſtrong party he had among the Dolonci. In the ſixth year of his reign the Phœnicians, who attended Darius in his expedition into Greece, being arrived at Tenedos, with a deſign to invade the Cherſoneſus, he put all his riches on board five ſhips, and ſailed for Athens. The Phœnicians, upon his retreat, made themſelves maſters of the Cherſoneſus; and on this occaſion it was, that the Byzantians and Chalcedonians, leaving their antient habitations, fled to the coaſts of the Euxine ſea and there built the city of Meſambria [q]. This is all we can gather from the antients concerning the Dolonci.

Denſeletæ.

THE Denſeletæ are mentioned by Tully [r], Pliny [s], Strabo [t], who calls them Denthelitæ, and Livy [u]. All we know of them is, that they had at firſt a king of their own; that they were afterwards reduced by the Macedonians, [p] Herodot. l. vi.

[q] Idem ibid.
[r] Cic. orat. in Piſon.
[s] Plin. l. iv. c. 11.
[t] Strab. l. vii.
[u] Liv. l. ix. decad. 4.

nians ; that they aſſiſted the Romans againſt Philip and Perſeus kings of Macedon, and contiuued faithful to Rome, till being provoked by the oppreſſions and cruelties of Piſo, they took up arms againſt him, and committed great devaſtations in the neighbouring countries ſubject to the Romans [w]. In the reign of Auguſtus they were ſtill governed by their own princes; for we find one Sitas mentioned by Dion Caſſius [x], as reigning over them, and making war upon the Baſtarnæ, whom he entirely defeated with the troops ſent to his aſſiſtance by Craſſus, at that time prætor of Macedon.

THE Beſſi inhabited mount Hæmus, living there in huts, and maintaining themſelves by plundering their neighbours. They were by far the moſt ſavage and inhuman of all the Thracians, as appears from St. Jerom [y], Paulinus of Nola [z], Eutropius [a], and Ovid [b], who make particular mention of their cruelty. Their chief city, Uſcudama, is now known by the name of Adrianople. They lived under their own kings, the neighbouring princes not thinking it worth their while to diſturb them, till the conſulate of M. Licinius Lucullus and C. Caſſius Varus; that is, to the 681ſt year of Rome, when the conſul Lucullus invaded their country, and, having gained a ſignal victory over them, took their metropolis, and ſubjected the whole nation to the Roman laws [c]. The Romans, notwithſtanding they had reduced them by force of arms, ſtill ſuffered them to live under their own kings; for Piſo, while he governed Macedon in quality of proconſul, having treacherouſly ſeized Rabocentus, whom Suetonius calls prince of the Beſſi, cauſed him to be publicly beheaded; which affront ſo exaſperated the whole nation, that they ſhook off the Roman yoke; but were overthrown in a great battle by Octavius the father of Auguſtus [d]. During the civil wars of Rome, they attempted anew to recover their liberty; but were again conquered by the famous M. Brutus Junior [e]. In the reign of Auguſtus, one Vologæſes, a native of the country, and prieſt of Bacchus, having, under pretence of religion, drawn to himſelf great crowds of people, made himſelf maſter of the whole country; and entering the Cher-ſoneſus,

Beſſi.

[w] Cic. ibid. [x] Dio. Caſs. l. li. [y] Hieron. in epitaph. Nepotiani. [z] Paul. Nolan. carm. 17. ad Nicet. ver. 206. [a] Eutrop. l. vi. c. 8. [b] Ovid. Triſt. l. iv. eleg. i. [c] Eutrop. ibid. Oros, l. vi. c. 3. Hiſt. Miſcel. l. vi. Flor. in epit. l. xcvii. [d] Suet. in Octav. [e] Dion. Caſs. l. xlvii.

ſoneſus, committed there moſt dreadful ravages; but was at laſt overcome by L. Piſo, who obliged the ſavage inhabitants to lay down their arms, and ſubmit to ſuch conditions as he was pleaſed to impoſe upon them. From this time the Beſſi continued ſubject to the Romans, without making any further attempts towards the recovery of their ancient liberty [f].

Biſtones. THE Biſtones inhabited that part of Thrace which lies between mount Rhodope to the north, the river Hebrus to the eaſt, the Neſſus to the weſt, and the Ægæan ſea to the ſouth. Their metropolis Tinda is famous among the poets on account of the fabulous horſes of Diomedes king of this country. The Biſtones underwent the ſame fate as the other people of Thrace, having been firſt ſubdued by the Macedonians, and afterwards by the Romans.

Odomantes. THE Odomantes bordered on Macedon, being parted from that country by the river Strymon. Pliny confounds them with the Odryſæ [g]; but Thucydides ſpeaks of them as a diſtinct people [h]. Suidas, upon the authority of Ariſtophanes tells us that they uſed circumciſion. In the time of the Peloponneſian war they were governed by Polles, the only king of the Odomantes we find mentioned in hiſtory, who, in that war, ſided with the Athenians, as we read in Thucydides [i].

Cicones. THE Cicones inhabited the country lying between the Hebrus and the Mælas, and are mentioned by Homer [k], Virgil [l], Ovid [m], and Pliny [n]. The city of Ænos, famous on account of the tomb of Polydorus, was their capital. Homer ſpeaks of three of their kings, viz. Pirous, Imbraſus and Rhigmus. Pirous, if that poet is to be credited, eſpouſed the cauſe of the Trojans, and was killed by Thoas the Ætolian [o]. Rhigmus, his ſon and his ſucceſſor, was killed in the ſame war by Achilles [p].

Edoni. THE Edoni or Edones poſſeſſed that country which lay between the Strymon and the famous city of Philippi, and are mentioned by Herodotus [q], Thucydides [r], Pliny [s], &c. Thamyris, the celebrated muſician, was a native of this country. He is ſaid to have been the diſciple of Linus and contemporary with Hercules and Orpheus. He was ſo eminent for his ſkill in muſic, that he had the confidence to challenge the muſes themſelves, by whom he was overcon f Dion. Caſs. l. liv. Flor. l. iv. c. 12.

g Plin. l. iv. c. 11.
h Thucyd. l. 2.
i Idem, l. v.
k Homer. Iliad.
l Virg. Georg. l. iv.
m Ovid. Metam. x.
n Plin. iv. c. 11.
o Homer. Iliad. β′ & ε′.
p Idem, Iliad.
q Herodot. l. vii.
r Thucyd. l. v.
s Plin. l. iv. c. 11

come, and deprived both of his art and ſight [t]. The Edoni were governed by kings, like the other Thracian nations. The following princes are mentioned by the antients, viz. Dryas I. Lycurgus, Dryas II. and Pittacus. Dryas is mentioned by Apollodorus [u] and Ovid [w]; Lycurgus by Virgil [x], Apollodorus [y], Hyginus [z], and Diodorus Siculus [a], who tells us, that he made war with Bacchus. Dryas II. was killed, according to Apollodorus and Hyginus [b], by his father Lycurgus. Pittacus lived in the time of the Peloponneſian war, and was murdered, as Thucydides informs us [c], by the children of Goaxes, another petty prince of Thrace.

ALL we know of the Brygi is, that they were ſubdued by Mardonius, and ſerved under Xerxes when he invaded Greece [d]. Of the Thyni we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the hiſtory of the Bithynians. The Pieres firſt inhabited part of Macedon, where they conſecrated to the muſes, from them called Pierides, the countries of Pieria, Libetrus, and Pimplia, as they did alſo Helicon in Bœotia, having ſent ſome colonies into that country. Being driven out of Macedon by the Temenidæ, they ſettled under mount Pangæus near the banks of the Strymon. Thoſe who had ſettled in Bœotia were likwiſe driven from thence; and on this occaſion it was that they ſettled in Phocis, and conſecrated mount Parnaſſus to the muſes [e]. The kings of the Pieres mentioned by the antients are, Atlas, Tharops, and Oeager. Linus and Orpheus, ſo much celebrated by the poets, were the ſons of the latter [f].

Brygi.

Thyni.

Pieres.

THE Odryſæ poſſeſſed great part of that country which lies between the mountains of Hæmus and Rhodope, and were by far the moſt powerful people of all Thrace. When this kingdom began, is uncertain; Ovid [g] will have Eumolpus, who waged war with Erechtheus king of Athens, to have been the founder of the kingdom of the Odryſæ. However that be, it is certain that the Odryſæ made no figure till the reign of Teres, who was contemporary with Perdiccas II. king of Macedon. He was the Odryſæ.

[t] Vide Homer. Iliad. β. Plato, dialog. 8. de legib. Diodor. Sicul. l. iii. c. ult. Pauſan. in Atticis, & Natal. Com. l. vi. c. 14.
[u] Apollodor. l. iii. [w] Ovid. in Ibin. [x] Virg. Æneid. 3.
[y] Apollodor. ibid. [z] Hygin. fab. 132. [a] Diodor. Sicul. l. iii. c. 5. [b] Apollodor & Hygin. ibid.
[c] Thucyd. l. iv. [d] Herodot. l. vi. [e] Thucyd. l. ii. Strabo. l. ix. [f] Vide Diodor. Sicul. l. iii. c. 5. Euſeb. de præpar. evang. l. x. c. 2. [g] Ovid. l. ii. de Ponto, eleg. 9.

Kings of the Odryſæ.

Sitalces.

ſon of Sitalces, the firſt king of the Odryſæ whom we find mentioned in hiſtory. Sitalces attended Xerxes in his expedition into Geeece, and loſt his life in that war, as we read in Æſchylus [h]. He was ſucceeded by Teres, the firſt, according to Thucydides [i], who raiſed the kingdom of the Odryſæ above the other petty ſtates of Thrace; whence he is called by that writer the firſt king of the Odryſæ. He reduced great part of Thrace, and made himſelf formidable to the neighbouring princes; but was at laſt overthrown in a great battle by the Thyni. He died in the ninety-ſecond year of his age, having ſpent moſt part of his life in waging war with the other kings of Thrace [k]; for Plutarch tells us, that he uſed to ſay there was no difference between a pacific king and a groom [l].

Teres.

Sitalces II.

He was ſucceeded by his ſon Sitalces, who entered into an alliance with the Athenians againſt the Lacedæmonians, and even delivered up to the former the embaſſadors who had been ſent to his court from Sparta, in order to perſuade him to abandon his allies. He received into his kingdom, and entertained with great magnificence, Scylis king of the Scythians, who had been driven out of his kingdom, for attempting to introduce among his ſubjects the cuſtoms of the Greeks; but Octamaſas, the baniſhed king's brother, who had been raiſed to the throne, threatening to invade Thrace with a very numerous army, unleſs Sitalces delivered up the fugitive prince into his hands, he choſe rather to betray his gueſt, than engage in ſo dangerous a war. This prince afterwards made war upon the Pæonians, Macedonians, and Chalcedonians, in which he is ſaid by Thucydides to have had one hundred and fifty thouſand men under his command [m]. In all theſe expeditions he was attended with good ſucceſs, which ſtruck ſuch terror into the other princes of Thrace, that moſt of them voluntarily ſubmitted to him; inſomuch, that, at his death, he was poſſeſſed of all thoſe provinces, which extend from the city of Abdera, on the Ægean ſea, to the mouth of the Iſter, which diſcharges itſelf into the Euxine ſea [n]. Sitalces dying without children, left the kingdom to Seuthes the ſon of his brother Spardocus, who having married Stratonice the daughter of Per-

Seuthes.

[h] Æſchyl. Perſis. [i] Thucyd. l. ii. [k] Thucyd. l. i.
Xenoph. Anab. l. vii. [l] Plut. in apoph. [m] Thucyd. l. ii.
[n] Idem ibid. Herodot. l. iv. & vii. Diodor. Sicul. l. xii.

Perdiccas II. king of Macedon, entered into an alliance with that prince, and being assisted by him, made several new acquisitions, extending the confines of his dominions even beyond mount Hæmus [o]. Amadocus and Mesades, the sons of Seuthes, succeeded each other in the kingdom; but performed nothing worth mentioning. Seuthes II. who succeeded his father Mesades, subdued the Thyni, joined the Lacedæmonians against the Persians, obtained a considerable victory over the Athenians, who had made a descent on the coasts of Thrace &c. But as he was obliged to lay heavy taxes on his subjects to defray the expences of the many wars he was engaged in, the chief lords of his kingdom, entering into a conspiracy against him, drove him from the throne; however, he was afterwards restored by Iphicrates, and left the kingdom to Cotys the son of Amadochus [p]. Cotys was a most voluptuous prince; but at the same time a man of courage and resolution. He maintained, during the whole time of his reign, a war with the Athenians, and was at last assassinated by Python and Heraclidas, both natives of Ænos, who, after the murder, flying to Athens, were kindly received by the Athenians, made free of their city, and presented with crowns of gold, for having thus delivered them from so troublesome an enemy [q]. Upon his death his son Chersobleptes took possession of the kingdom, which the Athenians obliged him to divide with his two brothers, Berisades and Amodocus. The Chersonesus he gave up to the Athenians, chusing rather to part with that peninsula, than engage in a war against so powerful an enemy. However, he could not avoid coming to a rupture with Philip the father of Alexander, by whom he was overcome, and stripped of great part of his dominions [r]. He died after a reign of eleven years, leaving the kingdom to his son Seuthes, who was then an hostage at the court of Philip king of Macedon, who immediately sent him home to take possession of the throne; but he was scarce well seated in it, when he fell upon the Macedonians who inhabited the countries which had been taken from his father, drove them quite out, and recovered all the provinces which had formerly belonged to the kingdom of the Odrysæ. These he held under Alexander the Great, whom he assisted against the Persians; but upon that prince's death, he marched against Lysimachus

Amadocus, Mesades.

Seuthes II.

Cotys.

Chersobleptes

Seuthes III.

[o] Thucyd. ibid. & l. iv. [p] Xenoph. ibid. [q] Demosthen. contra Aristocrat. Athen. l. xii. c. 14. [r] Demosthen. ibid. Polyæn. l. vii. Isocrat. orat. de pace.

simachus at the head of twenty-thousand foot and eight thousand horse, protesting that he would not submit to the division which the captains of Alexander had made. He engaged Lysimachus twice; in the first battle no considerable advantage was gained on either side; but in the second Seuthes was entirely routed, and his army cut in pieces [s]. He died soon after this overthrow, and was succeeded by his brother Ariopharnes, who having, on his accession to the throne, espoused the cause of Eumelus against Satyrus king of Bosphorus, was by the latter overthrown, with the loss almost of his whole army [t]; which so grieved him, that he died soon after.

Ariopharnes

Seuthes IV. NEXT to him reigned Seuthes IV. who, as we read in Livy was attacked in the heart of his dominions by Philip the father of Perseus, and by that prince reduced to great straits, having lost Philippopolis and several other strong holds [u]. Seuthes was succeeded by Cotys II. who joined Perseus against the Romans, assisting him with a body of a thousand horse; but Eumenes king of Pergamus having stirred up against him a neighbouring prince named Atlesbis, and sent a body of troops into his dominions, under the command of Corrabus, one of his generals, Cotys was obliged to leave Perseus, and hasten to the defence of his own kingdom. As he had been ever faithful to Perseus, and almost the only ally on whom he could depend, the king of Macedon followed him in person, but the Pergamians and Thracians, who infested his territories, to flight, retook the cities he had lost, and restored tranquillity to his dominions. Perseus, on his parting with Cotys to return to Macedon, distributed two hundred talents among the Thracians who had served under him the last campaign; but as this was only six months pay, whereas he had promised a whole year's, Cotys, taking it amiss that his men should be thus defrauded of what was their due, refused to assist him the ensuing year, and no sooner heard he was defeated and taken by the Romans, than he sent embassadors to Rome to congratulate the senate on the success of their army, and excuse his joining Perseus. The embassadors were received very kindly by the senate, and the Thracian hostages, that had been taken together with Perseus, restored to them without ransom [w]. Cotys was succeeded by Cotys II.

Diegylis,

[s] Æschyn. de fals. legat. Diodor. Sicul. l. xviii. Curt. l. xi. [t] Diodor. Sicul. l. xx. [u] Liv. decad. 5. l. ii. & decad. 4. l. ix. [w] Liv. decad. 5. l. ii. & v. Zonar. Tom. II. Eutrop. l. iv. Oros. l. iv. c. 20. Hist. Miscell. l. iv.

by Diegylis, who having led a body of Thracians to the aſſiſtance of Pruſias his ſon-in-law, was defeated and taken priſoner by Attalus [x]; and this is all we know of him.

Sothymus. Sothymus the ſon of Diegylis reigned at the time of the ſocial war, or the war between Rome and her Italian allies. Theſe domeſtic diviſions he improved to his advantage, invading Greece, and laying waſte Macedon, whence he returned with an immenſe booty; but was at laſt overcome, and obliged to abandon the countries he had poſſeſſed himſelf of, by C. Sentius, prætor of Macedon [y].

Cotys III. Cotys III. the ſon of Sothymus, ſucceeding his father, entered into an alliance with Rome, and prevailed upon Piſo proconſul of Macedon, by a preſent of three hundred talents, to put to death Rabocentus king of the Beſſi, and beſtow part of his dominions on him. In the civil war of Rome he ſent five hundred horſe to the aſſiſtance of Pompey [z]. Cicero and Cæſar call him Cottus; but Lucan Cotys [a].

Saſales. His ſon Saſales, after his death, followed the ſame party, and had great ſhare in the ſignal victory which was gained over L. Caſſius Longinus. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the battle of Pharſalia; but nevertheleſs was pardoned by Cæſar. He died not long before the battle of Philippi, and left his kingdom, as he had no children, to the people of Rome; but M. Brutus ſeized it after Cæſar's death [b]. Plutarch tells us, that he was ſtill alive at the time of the battle of Actium, and ſerved in that war under Antony [c]. That writer calls him Sadalus, as does alſo Cicero; but we have followed Cæſar, who gives him the name of Saſales. Tho' he had bequeathed his dominions to the Romans, yet M. Brutus beſtowed them on his brother Cotys, who, dying ſoon after, left them to his ſon Rhymetalces, who being at his father's death under-age, was carefully educated, together with his brother Rhaſciporis, by Rhymetalces their uncle by the mother. Both brothers ſerved under Tiberius in the Pannonic war, and had a great ſhare in the victories he gained over thoſe barbarians. Upon the death of Rhymetalces, Auguſtus divided his kingdom between Rhaſciporis his brother and Cotys his ſon. In this partition the cities and countries bordering upon Greece fell to Cotys, and the mountainous and barren provinces to Rhaſciporis;

Cotys IV. Rhymetalces.

Rhaſciporis and Cotys V.

[x] Strabo, l. xiii. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 2. [y] Oros. l. v. c. 18. Hiſt. Miſcel. l. v. [z] Cic. in Piſon. Cæs. de bell. civil. l. iii. Lucan. l. v. [a] Cic. Cæs. Lucan. ibid. [b] Dio. l. xli. & xlvii. Cæs. l. iii. de bell. civil. Lucan. l. v. [c] Plut. in Anton.

poris; who thereupon invading his nephew's dominions, ſeized the moſt fruitful parts of them for himſelf. Cotys, thus provoked, raiſed a powerful army; but, while the two princes were ready to take the field, Tiberius, who had ſucceeded Auguſtus in the empire, diſpatched meſſengers to them, ordering them to lay down their arms, and refer the deciſion of their differences to the arbitration of the Roman people. Cotys forthwith diſmiſſed his army, and, at the requeſt of Rhaſciporis, came to an interview with him, where he was treacherouſly ſeized, and loaded with chains, Rhaſciporis pretending that he had formed a deſign of ſeizing him. When news of theſe proceedings were brought to Rome, Tiberius diſpatched meſſengers to Rhaſciporis, enjoining him to ſend Cotys to Rome, and to appear himſelf in perſon before the ſenate, to give an account of the whole matter; ſince neither he nor the ſenate could pronounce ſentence without hearing the cauſe. Hereupon Rhaſciporis cauſed Cotys to be murdered, giving out that he had laid violent hands on himſelf. This Tiberius feigned to believe; but, however, inſiſted upon the king's coming to Rome; which he refuſing to do, Tiberius preferred to the government of Mœſia, which bordered on the country of the Odryſæ, Pomponius Flaccus, an intimate friend of the king's, who, having treacherouſly drawn him into the Roman territories, cauſed him to be ſeized, and ſent to Rome, where he was accuſed by the wife of Cotys, and, being convicted of the crimes laid to his charge, condemned to exile, and ſent to Alexandria. He was ſoon after put to death by an order from Tiberius, for attempting to fly from the place of his baniſhment[d]. This prince is called by Dion Caſſius Rhaſcipolis; by Tacitus Rhaſcuporis; by Velleius Rhaſcupolis. Upon the baniſhment of Rhaſciporis the kingdom was divided between Rhymetalces his ſon, who had oppoſed all his father's meaſures, and the ſons of Cotys. As theſe were minors, Trebellienus Rufus was appointed their guardian, and charged with the adminiſtration. The ſons of Cotys having ſome how or other diſobeyed the emperor Caligula, were by him driven out of their kingdom, which was conferred upon Rhymetalces, who by this means became the ſole maſter of all the countries that had ever belonged to the Odryſæ[e].

Rhymetalces.

From

[d] Tacitus, Annal. l. ii. Suet. in Tiber. Dio, l. xliv. Vellei. Patercul. l. ultim. [e] Dio. Caſs. l. lv. Tacitus, Annal. l. ii, iii, iv.

From this time we find no mention made of the Odryſæ till the reign of Veſpaſian, who, as we read in Suetonius [f], reduced their country to a Roman province.

The Autonomi. THE Autonomi, ſo called becauſe every man among them was a law to himſelf, inhabited the moſt rocky and barren places of Thrace, being ſeparated from Mæſia by mount Hæmus[g]. Herodotus calls them ſometimes Autonomi, and ſometimes Satræ [h]. They were, according to that writer, the moſt gallant and warlike people of all Thrace. They were not afraid even to engage Alexander, and on that occaſion behaved with extraordinary valour; but their army was cut in pieces, their baggage taken, and their wives and children made priſoners. After this overthrow they ſubmitted to the conqueror, who, to prevent them from revolting in his abſence, took along with him into Aſia all the chief men of their nation [i]. They ſerved under Perſeus againſt the Romans; but, however, were allowed to live according to their own laws till the reign of Veſpaſian, who made their country part of the province of Thrace.

Crobyzi. The Crobyzi poſſeſſed that part of Thrace which lay between mount Hæmus and the Euxine ſea. They are mentioned by Herodotus [k] and Athenæus, the laſt writer telling us, that they had kings of their own, and amongſt others one Iſanthus, who was one of the moſt wealthy and comely princes of his age [l].

Mœdi. THE Mœdi inhabited that part of Thrace which bordered upon Macedon, and are mentioned by moſt of the antients, namely, by Thucydides [m], Plutarch [n], Vegetius [o], Pliny [p], Livy [q], Stephanus, &c. who all tell us, that they were a brave and gallant nation, ſtrangers to all manner of effeminacy, and inured to the fatigues of war. Their warlike temper gave occaſion to poets to feign, as Vegetius obſerves [r], that Mars the god of war was born in their country. However, they were reduced by Philip the ſon of Amyntas; but having ſhaken off the yoke while he was employed againſt the Byzantii, they were anew ſubdued by his ſon Alexander, who poſſeſſed himſelf of their metropolis, called formerly Jampharina; but from him Alexandropolis [s].

But

[f] Suet. in Veſpaſ. [g] Thucyd. l. ii. [h] Herodot. l. vii.
[i] Arrian. l. i. Frontin. l. ii. c. 11. [k] Herodot. l. iv.
[l] Athen. l. xii. c. 17. [m] Thucyd. l. ii. [n] Plut. in Æmil. Paul. [o] Veget. l. i. c. ult. [p] Plin. l. iv. c. 11.
[q] Liv. decad. 3. l. vi. [r] Veget. ibid. [s] Plutarch. in Alexand.

But, notwithstanding the great loss they sustained on this occasion, Alexander no sooner left Macedon, than they invaded that country anew, and penetrated as far as Greece, committing every-where most dreadful ravages; and thus they continued to harrass the Macedonians, till that kingdom became a Roman province, when they were at last, after a long war, entirely reduced by the Romans, in the consulate of Cn. Octavius and C. Scribonius, in the year of Rome 675. They had some years before plundered the rich temple of Delphos, and with part of the booty bribed L. Scipio, who had been sent against them, to let them depart unmolested, and even to conclude an alliance with them [t]. To this sacrilegious connivance of the Roman general, Appian ascribes the civil wars, and the many calamities which not long after fell upon Rome [u].

Sapæi. THE country of the Sapæi lay between the rivers Mela, and Arrus, bordering on the gulph of Melas, on the Chersonesus, and the Propontis. The Sapæi were governed by their own kings. Those, whose names have reached us, are, Olorus, Timotheus, Rhascipolis, Rhascus, and Cotys. Olorus gave his daughter Hegepole in marriage to Miltiades, the second of this name. From this Olorus, was descended the father of Thucydides the historian, called also Olorus, as Plutarch informs us [w]; but at what time, or on what occasion, he settled at Athens, is uncertain. Thucydides had great possessions and rich mines in Thrace [x]; and although they might have come to him by his wife, who was a native of Scapte-Hyle, as some have affirmed, yet it is manifest from Plutarch [y], Cicero [z], and Ammianus Marcellinus [a], that the great men of that country looked upon him as nearly related to them before his marriage. Timotheus is mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus as reigning in this part of Thrace; but neither he nor other writers give us any acccunt of his actions. Rhascipolis and Rhascus reigned many years, or rather ages, after Olorus; that is, in the time of the civil wars between Cæsar and Pompey; but as to the actions, and even the names, of the intermediate kings, we are quite in the dark, the works of Callisthenes and Socrates, who wrote a particular and distinct account of the affairs of Thrace, as Plutarch informs us [b], having been long since lost. Rhascipolis and Rhascus, in the the civil wars, ſided withPompey, and afterwards withBrutus; but being pardoned by Octavianus, aſſiſted Antony with three thouſand horſe, till he fell out with Octavianus, when they both declared for the latter. Cotys was the ſon of one of theſe two brothers, ſucceeded them in the kingdom, and enjoyed it till the latter end of the reign of Tiberius, when he was treacherouſly murdered by his own ſubjects, and his kingdom reduced to the form of a province[c].

[t] Liv. decad. 3. l. vi. Polyb. l. x. Appian in Illyric. [u] Appian ibid. [w] Plut. in Cimon. [x] Thucyd. l. ii. [y] Plut. ibid. [z] Cic. l. ii. de orator. [a] Ammian. Marcellin. l. iii. [b] Plut. in Parall.

Celetæ.

THE Celetæ inhabited part of mount Hæmus, and part of mount Rhodope, and are called by Pliny[d] the moſt ſavage of all the Thracians. Livy tells us, that they fell upon Cn. Manlius, as he was returning out of Aſia into Europe, and took from him great part of the booty which he had got by plundering the rich cities of Gallogræcia[e]. And this is all we find recorded of them in hiſtory.

Kings of the Thracian Cherſoneſus.

THE Thracian Cherſoneſus had likewiſe its own kings, among whom mention is made of Polymneſtor, Euſorus, and Acamas. Polymneſtor married Ilione the daughter of king Priam, and, after the deſtruction of Troy, treacherouſly murdered Polydorus, who had been ſent by his father Priam to be brought up at his court as in a place of ſafety[f]. Hyginus tells us, that Polydorus being ſent very young into Thrace, Ilione his ſiſter brought him up as the ſon of Polymneſtor; and that not Polydorus, but his own ſon Deiphilus, was murdered by the cruel Polymneſtor. Euſorus and Acamas are mentioned by Homer[g], and the latter ſaid to have led a body of Thracians to the relief of Troy, during the ſiege of which city he was killed by Ajax. His daughter Acete married Æneas a Theſſalian, by whom ſhe had Cyzicus, who built the famous city bearing his name[h]. Before we diſmiſs this ſubject, we cannot help obſerving, that the Greeks were chiefly indebted to the Thracians for the polite arts that flouriſhed among them; for Orpheus, Linus, Muſæus, Thamyris, and Eumolpus, all Thracians, were the firſt, as Euſtathius informs us[i], who charmed the inhabitants of Greece with their eloquence and melody, and perſuaded them to exchange their fierceneſs for a ſociable life and peaceful manners; nay, great part of Greece was antiently tiently peopled by Thracians, Tereus a Thracian governed at Daulis in Phocis, where the tragical story of Philomela and Progne was acted. From thence a body of Thracians passed over to Eubœa, and possessed themselves of that island. Of the same nation were the Aones, Tembices, and Hyanthians, who made themselves masters of Bœotia; and great part of Attica itself was inhabited by Thracians, ander the command of the celebrated Eumolpus [k]. It is not therefore without the utmost ingratitude and injustice, that the Greek style them Barbarians, since to them chiefly they were indebted both for the peopling and polishing of their country.

[c] Appian. l. iv. de bell. civil. Dio, l. xlvii. Lucan. l. v. Cæs. de bell. civil. l. iii. [d] Plin. l. iv. c. 7. [e] Liv. decad. 4. l. viii. [f] Plut. in Parall. Euripid. in Hecub. Virgil. Æneid. l. iii. ver. 45. & ſeq. Ovid. Metam. l. xiii. [g] Homer. Iliad. β′ & ζ′. [h] Scholiaſt. Apollonii, p. 149. [i] Eustath. in Iliad β′.

[k] Strabo, l. v. p. 392.

CHAP. VIII.

The History of the antient kingdom of Epirus.

Name, situation, &c.

EPIRUS, the antient kingdom of the Æacidæ, was at first called Epirus Dodonæa, that is, the continent of the Dodonæans, or the continent inhabited by the Dodonæans, and afterwards Epirus, or the continent, without any addition, that being the import of the Greek word Epeiros. It was bounded on the north by the Ceraunian mountains; on the south by the Ambracian gulf; on the east by Thessaly and Macedon; and on the west by the Ionian sea [l]. It was antiently divided into three districts or provinces, namely, Chaonia, Thesprotia, and Molossis, to which some authors add Cassopia, Cassiope or Cestrine, and Pindus. Chaonia, the most northern part of Epirus, was so called from its antient inhabitants the Chaones, who were descended, according to the scholiast of Aristophanes, from the Thracians, according to Aristotle, [l] Ptolem. l. iii. c. 14. Plin. l. iv. c. 1. Solin. c. 12. Pomp. Mela. l. ii. c. 1.

ſtotle, from the Oenotrii, one of the moſt antient nations of Italy. Cities of note in this part of Epirus, were, according to Ptolemy, Oricum or Oricus, ſituated on the coaſt of the Ionian ſea, at the foot of the Ceraunian mountains. It was founded, according to Pliny [m], by a colony from Colchis, had a famous harbour, and was in the Roman times a place of great note, but of no ſtrength, as we read in Livy and Cæſar [n]. Caſſiope, or Caſſope, famous on account of the temple of Jupiter Caſſius; whence ſome are of opinion that it borrowed its name. Torrentius and moſt of the modern writers confound Caſſiope in Epirus with another city in the iſland of Corcyra bearing antiently the ſame name [o]. This city was the metropolis of the province Caſſopia or Caſſiope, which contained, according to Strabo [p] and Pliny [q], three other ſmall towns, viz. Buchœtium, Elatria, and Pandoſia. The inland towns of Chaonia were, Antigonia, founded by Antigonus, Phœnice, Hecatompedum, Omphalium, Elæus, and the ſtrong town, or, as Pliny calls it, caſtle of Chimera, much [r] frequented on account of its hot baths. The moſt remarkable cities in Theſprotia. which lay between the Ambracian lake and the ſea, were, Buthrotum, Ephyra, Nicopolis built by Auguſtus after the Actiac victory, and called by Pliny [s] a free city and a Roman colony, Mæandria, Cæſtria, Charadra, and Ambracia. The latter city, which was one of the moſt conſiderable of Epirus, ſtood not far from the mouth of the river Arachtus, near the gulf to which it gave its name. It was in the Roman times a place of great ſtrength, as we have obſerved in the hiſtory of Greece, full of people, and about three miles in compaſs. In antient times it was a free city; but afterwards reduced by the Æacidæ kings of Epirus, who choſe it for the place of their reſidence [t]. In proceſs of time the Ætolians made themſelves maſters of it, and held it till they were ſubdued by the Romans [u]. Moloſſis was an inland province, and according toScylax, only forty ſtades or furlongs in compaſs [w]. It was called Moloſſis from Moloſſus the ſon of Pyrrhus and Andromache, and contained the following cities, Dodona, Paſſaron, Tecmon, Phylace, and Horeum. Dodona is placed placed by ſome writers in Theſprotia [x], and by others in Moloſſis [y]; but Strabo [z] reconciles theſe two oppoſite opinions, by telling us, that antiently it belonged to Theſprotia, and afterwards to Moloſſis; for it ſtood on the confines of theſe two provinces. This city was once famous for the temple and oracle of Jupiter Dodonæus, much ſpoke of by all the antient writers (K). The other cities of Moloſſis contained nothing worthy of obſervation. The kingdom

Cities.

[m] Plin. l. iii. c. 23. [n] Liv. l. xxiv. c. 40. Cæſ. de bell civil. l. iii. c. 7, 8, 15. [o] Vide Jac. Palmerium, l. ii. Antiq. Græc. c. 4. [p] Strabo. l. vii. p. 223. [q] Plin. l. iv. c. 1 [r] Idem ibid. [s] Idem ibid. [t] Polyb. legat. 28. Pomp Me a, l. xi. c. 1. Strabo, l. vii. p. 225. [u] Florus, l. xi. c. 9. Liv. l. xxxviii. c. 6. [w] Scylax, in Periplo.

[x] Marcian. Capella, l. vi. [y] Pauſan. in Attic. c. xvii.
[z] Strabo, l. vii. p. 227.

(K) The city of Dodona is ſaid to have been built by Deucalion, who, in that univerſal deluge, retreated to this place, which, by reaſon of its height, ſecured him from the waters. Hither reſorted to him all thoſe who had eſcaped from the inundation. With theſe he peopled his new-built city, calling it Dodona, according to ſome, from a ſea nymph of that name, according to others, from Dodon the ſon, or Dodone the daughter, of Jupiter and Europa. At the ſame time Deucalion is ſaid to have founded a temple, which he conſecrated to Jupiter, who is from thence ſtyled Dodonæus. This was the firſt temple of Greece; for the Epirots were antiently reckoned among the Greeks. But the oracle ſeems to have been a conſiderable time before it; for Herodotus (83) tells us, that it was the moſt antient of all the oracles of Greece, which could not be true, if it had not been before Deucalion's time; for he, having eſcaped the deluge, adviſed with the oracle of Themis on mount Parnaſſus, about the means he ſhould uſe to re-people the country; and the ſame oracle is ſaid to have belonged to the earth and Neptune before it was poſſeſſed by Themis. Herodotus (84) gives us two accounts of the origin of this oracle: in the firſt, which he received from the prieſts of Jupiter at Thebes in Egypt, he tells us, that the Phœnicians having carried away two prieſteſſes from that place, and ſold one of them in Lybia and the other in Greece, each of them eſtabliſhed the firſt oracles in thoſe nations, the one of Jupiter Hammon, the other of Jupiter Dodonæus. The other account was given him by the prieſteſs at Dodona, and confirmed by all thoſe who miniſtred in the temple, viz. That two black pigeons taking their flight from Thebes in Egypt, one of them arrived in Lybia, where ſhe commanded an oracle to be erected to Jupiter Hammon. The other came to Dodona, where ſhe pearched on an oak, and admoniſhed the inhabitants with an articulate voice to found an oracle

(83) Herodot. l. ii. (84) Idem ibid.

dom of Epirus muſt have comprehended in the Roman times a great many cities, of which no mention is made by the antient hiſtorians or geographers, if what Polybius, as quoted by Strabo [a], and after him Livy [b], tells us, be true, viz. that Æmilius Paulus diſmantled and plundered about ſeventy cities ſubject to the Epirots. Strabo [c] counts the Athamanes, Æthices, Tymphæi, Oreſtæ, Paroræi, Atintanes, and Perrhœbi among the Epirotic nations: but Pliny oracle in that place in honour of the ſame Jupiter. Afterwards Herodotus delivers his own opinion relating to this ſubject, viz. that if the Phœnicians did really carry away two women from Thebes, and ſell one of them in Lybia and the other in Greece, the latter was in all likelihood bought by the Theſprotians, who inhabited that country, which, in his time, was called Hellas; but formerly named Pelaſgia, where, during her ſervitude, ſhe conſecrated an altar to Jupiter under an oak, nothing being more natural than to ſuppoſe, that ſhe, who had been a prieſteſs of that god in Thebes, would not be unmindful of his worſhip in another place. To confirm this conjecture he adds, that theſe two oracles had a near reſemblance to each other; and moreover tells us, that, in his opinion, the two pigeons, or rather women, were ſaid to be black, becauſe they came from Egypt, and called pigeons, becauſe they were barbarians or foreigners, and their ſpeech no more underſtood than the chattering of birds; but as ſoon as they learned the Greek tongue, they were ſaid to ſpeak with a human voice. Euſtathius gives two reaſons more for this appellation (85), viz. that they were called Πελειαι or doves, becauſe they made their predictions by the obſervation of thoſe birds; as thoſe who made uſe of crows in divination were named Κορακομάντεις; and ſecondly, becauſe, in the Moloſſian language, old women were ſtyled Πελειαὶ, and old men Πελειοὶ; and that thoſe propheteſſes being old women, either by a miſtake of the word, or a poetical equivocation, were called doves. Why old perſons ſhould be thus termed, the old ſcholiaſt upon Sophocles informs us (86); for the old propheteſſes, ſays he, were called Πελειαὶ, becauſe of their grey hairs. Servius gives another reaſon for this appellation (87), viz. that, in the Theſſalian tongue, the word Πελειὰς ſignified both a dove and a propheteſs. Others tell us, that, in the hieroglyphical way of (85) Euſtath. Odyſſ. ξ'. p. 544, 545. (86) Trachin. ver. 176. (87) Servius in Virg. Eclog. 9. ver. 83.

[a] Strabo, l. vii. p. 223. [b] Liv. l. xlv. c. 34. [c] Strabo, ibid.

ny [d] and Livy [e] reckon the Athamanes, Tymphæi, and Perrhæbii among the Ætolians. In Chaonia were the Ceraunian or Acroceraunian mountains, now monti della Chimera, parting the Ionian and Adriatic seas, and so called from their being frequently struck with lightening. In Thesprotia were the Acherusian lake and the river Acheron, much spoke of by the poets. It had its springs, according to Pliny [f] in the above-mentioned lake, and emptied itself into the Ambracian gulf; but according to Ptolemy, Strabo, and Thucydides [g], it rose in the country of the Molossi, and, passing through the Acherusian lake, discharged itself into the Thesprotian bay. The rivers Aphas, Mountains, Rivers, &c.

[d] Plin. l. iv. c. 11. [e] Liv. l. xxxviii. sub. init. [f] Plin. ibid. [g] Thucyd. l. ii.

of writing, by a black pigeon was signified a widow, who remained unmarried till death. Some writers say, that this oracle was founded by the Pelasgians, who were the most antient of all the nations that inhabited Greece. Of this opinion is Strabo (88), being led hereunto by Homer, who bestows upon the same Jupiter the names of Dodonæus and Pelasgicus (89). The same Strabo relates another fabulous opinion concerning the origin of this oracle out of Suidas's Thessalica. That writer, says Strabo (90), to gratify the Thessalians with a new-invented fable, relates, that the oracle of Dodona was translated out of Pelasgia, a country of Thessaly, into Epirus, being accompanied by a great number of women, from whom the propheteſſes in after-ages were descended; and that from them Jupiter received the appellation of Pelasgicus. The persons who delivered the oracles were at first men, as Strabo and Eustathius observe out of Homer, who calls them in the masculine gender Προφήτας and Σέλλους (91). The same Strabo tells us (92) in his description of Bœotia, that, in after-ages, all those who consulted the oracle received answers from women, except the Bœotians, who had theirs from men; and of this custom he gives the following reason: in a war between the Bœotians and Pelasgians, the former consulting the oracle of Dodona about the event of the war, received for answer, that their enterprize should be crowned with success, if they acted wickedly. Hereupon the Bœotians suspecting that the propheteſs spoke in favour of the Pelasgians, seized her, and threw her into the fire. Those who ministred in the temple, immediately apprehended the Bœotians; but not thinking (88) Strabo, l. vii. (89) Hom. Iliad. π'. ver. 235.

(90) Strabo, ibid. (91) Homer ibid. (92) Strabo, l. ix.

phas and Aracthus are mentioned by Livy [h] as riſing in the ſame country. The celebrated mount Pindus parted Epirus and Theſſaly, and was therefore by ſome geographers placed in Theſſaly, by others in Epirus. The inland parts of Epirus were very barren and full of foreſts, but the coaſt pretty fruitful. The horſes of this country were in great requeſt among the antients, as were alſo the maſtiffs of Moloſſis, from thence called by the Latins Moloſſi [i]. The thinking it lawful to put them to death in ſo ſacred a place, before they were tried, and juridically condemned, adviſed them to refer the matter to the two ſurviving propheteſſes. On the other hand, the Bœotians alledging, that no laws in the world allowed women to ſit upon life and death, it was agreed, that two men ſhould judge them jointly with the two propheteſſes. When the judges came to pronounce ſentence, the Bœotians were found guilty by the women, and cleared by the men; whereupon they were diſmiſſed without any puniſhment, as was uſual when the number of voices was equal on both ſides; but on that occaſion it was eſtabliſhed, that men only ſhould give anſwers to the Bœotians. The prophets of this temple were commonly called Tomuri, and the propheteſſeſs Tomuræ, from Tomurus a mountain in Theſprotia, at the foot of which ſtood the temple. In proceſs of time this word came to be a general name for any prophet; for thus Heſychius expounds it, and in this ſenſe Lycophron applies it to Prylis the ſon of Mercury (93).

[h] Liv. l. viii. c. 24.

[i] Vide Virg. Georg. l. iii. v. 405, & Servium ibid.

Near the temple was a ſacred grove of oaks and beeches, which was ſuppoſed to be inhabited by the Dryades, Fauni, and Satyri, who, we are told, were often ſeen dancing under the ſhades of the trees. Before ſowing was invented, when men lived upon acorns, thoſe of this wood were in great requeſt, as appears from the following verſes of Virgil:

Liber & alma Ceres, veſtro ſi munere tellus
Chaoniam pingui glandem mutavit ariſta (94).

And again in the ſame book;

Prima Ceres ferro mortales vertere terram
Inſtituit; cum jam glandes atque arbuta ſacræ
Deficerent ſylvæ, & victum Dodona negaret (95).

Theſe

(93) Lycoph. Caſſand. ver. 223. (94) Virgil. Georg. l. i. ver. 27. (95) Idem ibid. ver. 146.

Mannners of the inhabitants.

Epirots were deemed a very warlike people, and generally behaved, as we shall see in the history of their kings, with great gallantry; but continued in their former savage condition long after their neighbours were civilized; whence the islanders used to threaten their offenders, as we read in Athenæus [k], with transportation to the continent, namely to Epirus.

Inhabitants.

This country was at first peopled by Dodanim the son of Javan, and grandson of Japhet, or at least by some of his posterity, as Josephus informs us [l]. Eusebius says, that Dodanim first settled in the island of Rhodes, and that some of his descendants being streightened there for want of room, passed these oaks or beeches were said to be endued with a human voice and prophetical spirit; for which reason they are called speaking and prophesying oaks. Argo, the ship of the Argonauts, which was built with the timber of this wood, is feigned to have been endued with the same power of speech, whence Lycophron calls it, λάληθρον πίσσαν, a chattering magpye (96). What gave occasion to this fiction was, as some writers tell us, that the prophets, when they gave answers, placed themselves in one of these trees, so that the oracle was thought to be uttered by the oak, which was only pronounced out of its hollow stock, or from amongst its hollow branches. Some are of opinion, that the oracles were delivered from the branches of the tree, because the prophetical pigeons are reported by Herodotus to have perched upon a tree (97); and the scholiast upon Sophocles tells us, that above the oracle there were two pigeons (98). Others are inclined to believe, that the oracles were uttered from the hollow stock, because the prophetess could best be concealed there (99). The brazen kettles of this place were no less famous than the speaking oaks. Some writers affirm, and others deny, that they were made use of in delivering the oracles; however that be, Demon in Suidas says, that they were so artificially placed about the temple, that, by striking one of them, the sound was communicated to all the rest. These kettles were consecrated by the Corcyræans to Jupiter Dodonæus, as Strabo informs us, (100). About what time, or on what account, this oracle ceased, is uncertain; but the above-mentioned writer, who flourished under Augustus, tells us, that in his time, the gods had deserted that and most other oracles (101).

[k] Athen. l. ii. c. 7. [l] Joseph. Antiq. l. iii. c. 7.

(96) Lycoph. Cassand. ver. 1319. (97) Herodot. ibid. (98) Trachin. ver. 174. (99) Hesiod. Eo. a. (100) Strabo, l. vii. (101) Idem ibid.

paſſed over to the continent, and fixed their abode in Epirus, where they built a city, calling it Dodona from their progenitor Dodanim [m]. If the opinion of Euſebius be true, the Dodonæans were originally Greeks, and not Barbarians, as moſt of the antients ſtile them. However, in proceſs of time ſeveral barbarous nations ſettled among them; and hence they are ſaid by Strabo [n] to have ſpoke promiſcuouſly the languages of the Greeks and Barbarians. The various nations we find mentioned by the moſt antient writers, as inhabited Epirus before they became one people, and were blended under the common name of Epirots, are, the Selli, Chaones, Moloſſi, Dolopes, Paravæi, Oreſti, Dryopes, Hellopes, Ænianes, and Pelaſgi; but as to the origin of theſe different tribes, there is a great diſagreement among authors, whoſe various opinions it would be too tedious to relate. We ſhall only obſerve, that the Selli were by prophane authors thought to have been the firſt inhabitants of Epirus, and to have miniſtered in the temple of Dodona. Homer ſpeaks of them as prieſts, living round the abode of the Pelaſgian Jove king of Dodona, that is, round the temple of Jupiter Dodonæus, and inſinuates, that they lay on the ground, and never waſhed their feet [o]; whence Strabo concludes, that they were not originally Greeks, but ſprung from ſome ſavage unpoliſhed nation [p].

THE form of government, which prevailed in Epirus, was without all doubt monarchical, the whole country being divided into ſmall kingdoms quite independent of each other. Strabo indeed tells us, that firſt the Chaones, and after them the Moloſſi, were maſters of all Epirus; but this, if true, muſt have been in the moſt early ages; for we find ſeveral kings mentioned by Homer and other antient writers, as reigning at the time of the Trojan war, viz, Aidoneus, Orcus, Phidon, Echetus, and Harpalicus. The other Epirotic nations continued for a long time to be governed by princes of their own blood; but the Moloſſi fell very early under the power of Pyrrhus, a foreign prince, whoſe deſcendants were from him ſtiled Pyrrhidæ, and from his family Æacidæ, they being the progeny of Æacus [q]. Some of theſe petty kingdoms in proceſs of time exchanged the monarchical for a republican form of government; for Thucydides [r] tells us, that in his time the Theſprotæ and Chaones were governed, not by kings, but by annual magiſtrates. But when, and on what occaſion, this change happened, is what we find no-where recorded. At the beginning of the Peloponneſian war the Paravæi and Oreſti were ſtill ruled by kings of their own nation; the former by Antiochus, and the latter by Oroedus. But the kingdom of the Moloſſi ſoon eclipſed all the others, the Moloſſian princes having ſubjected the whole country, and united the many ſmall kingdoms, of which it conſiſted, into one, known to the antients by the name of Epirus. And this alone affords us matter for a hiſtory, there being nothing upon record relating to the others, but the names of ſome of their kings, and a few fabulous accounts of their actions; for which we refer our readers to Hyginus [s] and Cyrillus [t], it being beneath the dignity of hiſtory to take notice of them.

Form of government.

[m] Euſeb. in Chron. [n] Strab. l. vii. [o] Homer. Iliad. π'. v. 235. [p] Strab. ibid. [q] Strab. ibid. [r] Thucyd. l. ii.

Pyrrhus. WE ſhall begin the hiſtory of the kings of Epirus with Pyrrhus, the firſt of the Æacidæ who reigned in that country, the times which preceded his reign being overcaſt with an impenetrable miſt, and the kings, who are ſuppoſed to have ruled over the Moloſſi before his arrival, more ſpoke of by the poets than the hiſtorians. Pyrrhus was the ſon of Achilles, by Deidamia the Daughter of Lycomedes, king of the iſland of Scyros. Upon the death of his father, who was killed at the ſiege of Troy, he was prevailed upon by Diomedes and Ulyſſes to leave his grandfather's court, where he had been brought up, and take upon him the command of the troops, which his father had led againſt Troy. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſiege of that city, if the poets are to be credited, by his brave and gallant behaviour; and after it was taken killed old king Priam with his own hand, threw Aſtyanax, the ſon of Hector and Andromache, headlong from a high tower, ſacrificed Polyxena, the daughter of king Priam, on the tomb of his father, and carried Andromache with him into Epirus, where he ſettled, by the advice of the famous ſoothſayer Helenus one of Priam's ſon's, with the Myrmidones, who had ſerved, during the Trojan war, both under his father and himſelf. He maintained himſelf in this new ſettlement with the aſſiſtance of the Pelopidæ, to whom he was nearly related, againſt the natives, who, finding they could not drive him out, ſubmitted at length, and and acknowledged him for their king. But his reign was not long; for he had ſcarce ſettled the affairs of his new kingdom, when he was murdered by Oreſtes in the very temple of Delphos, for marrying Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, who had been bethrothed to the ſaid Oreſtes. Some writers tell us, that, under pretence of conſulting the oracle of Delphos about his iſſue by Hermione, he attempted to plunder the temple, and was in that attempt killed by the prieſts [u]. His death gave riſe to the proverb Neoptolemic revenge, uſed by the antients, when one ſuffered the ſame evils which he had brought upon others; for Pyrrhus, ſirnamed Neoptolemus, had barbarouſly murdered king Priam at the altar of Jupiter Hercæus, and was himſelf murdered at the altar of Apollo Delphicus. The ſirname of Neoptolemus, or the young warrior, was given him when he firſt went to the ſiege of Troy, he being then very young. His body by command of the oracle was buried in the temple where he had been murdered; but no honours were there paid to him till the irruption of the Gauls, which happened many ages after, when he is ſaid to have appeared among other dead heroes, and to have with his ghaſtly looks ſtruck great terror into thoſe ſacrilegious Barbarians. From that time he was honoured with yearly ſacrifices, and ſolemn ſports exhibited at his tomb [w]. The Pyrrhica, a kind of tournement or dance in armour, was ſo called from him, he having firſt uſed it round the tomb of his father Achilles [x]. Pyrrhus had two wives, Lanaſſa the daughter of Cleodæus, one of the deſcendents of Hercules, and Hermione the daughter of Menelaus and Helena. By the latter he had no children; but the former brought him three ſons, Pyrrhus, Alevas, and Ethneſtus, and five daughters. By Andromache, whom ſome count among his lawful wives, others among his concubines, he had likewiſe three ſons, Moloſſus, Pielus, and Amphialus. Pyrrhus, his eldeſt ſon by Lanaſſa, died in his infancy. Alevas was brought up by Peleus his great-grand-father, king of Phthia in Theſſaly, and by him appointed his heir and ſucceſſor in that kingdom [y]. Ethneſtus lived in Theſſaly with his brother, and gave his name to the tribe of the Ethneſtæ mentioned by Stephanus [z].

[s] Hygin. fab. 193. 252. [t] Cyril. l. i. contra Julian

[u] Vide Scholiaſt. Pindar. Virgil. l. iii. v. 333. & ſeq. Pauſan. in Bœot. Euſeb. in Chron. [w] Vide Ser. in 2. Æneid. & Conſtant. Manaſſ. [x] Priſcian. l. xiv. Plin. l. vii. c. 56. & Eraſmi Chiliad. [y] Suidas voce Alevadæ. [z] Stephan. voce ἔθνεσσα.

Molossus. Molossus lived after the death of his father under the tuition of Helenus, the son of king Priam, on whom Pyrrhus had bestowed Andromache in marriage, and with her part of his kingdom, having always shewn a great kindness and particular friendship for that prophet [a]. Helenus brought him up with all possible care, and at his death left him that part of the kingdom which had been given him by Pyrrhus. As Molossus died without children, he bequeathed the whole Pielus. kingdom to his brother Pielus; for he had succeeded his father Pyrrhus as well as Helenus. Some authors write, that Molossus was succeeded by his son, and that from him were descended the Æacidæ or Pyrrhidæ of Epirus; but we have followed Pausanias, who tells us in express terms, that Molossus died without children, was succeed by his brother Pielus, and that from him the kings of Epirus were by the most antient writers sometimes stiled Pielidæ [b]. Amphialus, the third son of Pyrrhus by Andromache, sirnamed Pergamus, passed over into Asia with his mother, and having there killed in single combat Arias king of Teuthrania, reigned in his stead, fixing the place of his residence at Pergamus, whence he was stiled Amphialus Pergamus [c]. Pausanias will have the city of Pergamus to have been so called from him, but is herein contradicted by most of the antients, who tell us, that this city was built long before his time by the Mysians. Among the descendants of Amphialus we find one Praces mentioned by Pausanias [d], who is said to have founded a temple in honour of Achilles in Laconica, whither the young men resorted to offer sacrifices to that hero, before they entered the lists in the public combats. The five daughters, which Pyrrhus had by Lanassa, as we have observed above, were married, according to Justin [e], to the neighbouring princes.

The descendents of Alevas reigned in Thessaly, and are said by Herodotus [f] to have invited thither Xerxes king of Persia, and betrayed the country to him. When Alexander the Pherean attempted to make himself master of all Thessaly, they had recourse to Alexander king of Macedon, who assisted them with a powerful army, as we have related in the history of Macedon [g]. They were at last stript of all their dominions, and the cities they possessed declared free, by Philip the brother of Alexander, king of Macedon, cedon, as we read in Ulpianus [h], Diodorus Siculus [i], and Polyænus [k]. As to the immediate descendents of Pielus, we are quite in the dark both as to their exploits and succession, there being scarce any mention made of them by the antients till the time of the Persian war, when Admetus reigned in Epirus, and was master of the greatest part of that country. Antonius Liberalis indeed names the following intermediate princes, viz. Drius, Munichus, Aphidas, Genous, and Alcon; but upon what authority we know not. Admetus. Admetus reigned, as we have hinted above, in Epirus, when Xerxes invaded Greece, and refused to join either party. Upon the defeat of the Persians, he courted the friendship of the Athenians, offering to enter into an alliance with the republic; but his proposals were, at the instigation of Themistocles, rejected with scorn, because he had not lent them any assistance against their common enemy. Notwithstanding the ill offices done him on this occasion by Themistocles, he afterwards received him, when banished from his own country, with great marks of friendship and esteem, and refused to deliver him up to the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, though threatened with war, and plentifully supplied him with money and other necessaries on his leaving Epirus to pass over into Asia [l].

[a] Pausan. in Attic. Scholiast. Pindar. [b] Pausan in Bœotic. [c] Hygin. fab. 97. [d] Pausan. ibid. [e] Justin. l. xvii. [f] Herodot. l. vii. [g] See Vol. viii. Book ii. Cap ii. Sect ii. near the end.

He was succeeded by Tharymbas, the only child he had Tharymbas. by his wife Phthia; but as this prince was very young at his father's death, he was by a decree of the people put under the tuition of Sabylinthus, a man of great distinction in his country, and of an unblemished character. Sabylinthus attended him to Athens, where he applied himself with great earnestness to the study of polite literature; for he was reckoned one of the most learned princes of his age, and is said to have been the first who introduced and encouraged learning among the Epirots his subjects. He likewise made many wise and wholesome laws, and is on that account reckoned by Plutarch amongst the antient lawgivers. He is mentioned by Plutarch, Thucydides, Pausanias, and Justin, under the following names, Tharrytas, Tharyps, Tharypus, Arymbas, and Tharymbas. The Chaones, who had been formerly subject to the Molossian kings, were in the reign of this prince, as we read in Thucydides [m], subject to no king, but governed by their own laws and magistrates; the the Molossians and the Antitanians alone acknowledged Tharymbas for their king, the several other nations of Epirus having either their peculiar kings, or being free from all subjection, as is evident from the abovementioned writer[n].

[h] Ulpian. in Olynthiac. [i] Diodor. Sicul. l.xvi. [k] Polyæn. l. iv. [l] Thucyd. l. iv. Diodor. Sicul. l. xvi. Aristid. in orat. pro quatuor viris. Scholiast. Pindar. [m] Thucyd. l. iv.

Alcetas. ALCETAS is the next king of Epirus we find mentioned in history: he was driven from the throne by his own subjects; on which occasion he fled to Dionysius tyrant of Syracuse, by whom he was assisted with a body of Illyrians, who replaced him on the throne, after having overthrown his rebellious subjects in a pitched battle. His dominions were soon after invaded by Jason of Pherea; but having by means of Timotheus prevailed upon the Athenians to enter into an alliance with him, Jason thinking it advisable not to provoke so powerful a republic, withdrew his forces from Epirus, and suffered Alcetas to spend the remainder of his reign in peace[o].

Neoptolemus. ALCETAS was succeeded by his son Neoptolemus, who finding that his brother Arybas began to raise disturbances, and dreading the consequences of a civil war, took him of his own accord for his partner in the kingdom. Upon the death of Neoptolemus, for we are entirely in the dark as to Arybas. the particulars of his reign, Arybas remained sole master of the kingdom, which, contrary to the expectation of his subjects, he governed with great prudence, equity, and moderation. He was an encourager of learning, and shewed dreat favour to such as excelled in any branch of polite literature. To him Xenocrates, the Chalcedonian philosopher, dedicated, as Laertius informs us[p], four books, which he wrote on the art of reigning. He brought up with great care his brother's children, viz. Alexander, Neoptolemus, Arybas, Troas, Olympias, and Cadmia, and married his niece Olympias to Philip king of Macedon, who had by her Alexander the Great. At his death, which happened after

Alexander. a reign of ten years, his nephew Alexander, whom Gellius calls Molossus, was raised to the sole possession of the throne by the favour of Philip his brother-in-law, who gave him in marriage Cleopatra his daughter by Olympias; so that Alexander was both brother and son-in-law to Philip. This marriage was solemnized with the utmost pomp and magnificence at Ægæ, but proved fatal to Philip, who on this occasion was murdered by Pausanias, as we have related at at length in the hiſtory of Macedon [q], tho' Alexander in his letter to Darius ſays, that his father was murdered by aſſaſſins hired by him for that purpoſe, as we read in Curtius [r] and Arrian [s].

[n] Thucyd ibid. [o] Idem, l. iii. Pausan. in Bœotic. Diodor. Sicul. l. xvi. [p] Laertius, in vit. Philosoph.

Not long after the acceſſion of Alexander to the crown of Epirus, Archidamus king of Lacedæmon being killed in fighting for the Tarentini againſt the Lucani and Brutii, the former invited Alexander into Italy to their aſſiſtance. The king of Epirus, promiſing himſelf nothing leſs than the ſubduing of the weſt with as much rapidity, as Alexander the Great his nephew and brother-in-law had begun to conquer the eaſt, readily cloſed with the propoſal, and having made a deſcent at Pæſtum, a maritime city near the mouth of the river Sibarus, reduced ſeveral cities of the Lucani and Brutii, and became formidable to all the eaſtern parts of Italy. The Romans being at that time employed in ſuppreſſing the revolt of the Latins, and not caring to engage in a war with two ſo powerful enemies at once, entered into an alliance with the Epirot, as did alſo the Metapontini and Pediculi, after he had gained a ſignal victory over the united forces of the Brutii and Lucani. The ſucceſs which attended his arms in the two firſt campaigns, made him believe that he ſhould reap as great an harveſt of glory in Sicily, Italy, and Africa, as his nephew was reaping in Perſia and the reſt of Aſia; but the unhappy prince loſt his life, where he hoped to have enlarged his conqueſts. This memorable event is thus related, and no doubt blended with many fables, by the Greek and Latin hiſtorians [t]. Before Alexander left Epirus, ſay they, he conſulted the celebrated oracle of Dodona, about the ſucceſs that was to attend him during the remaining part of his life. The god returned him this anſwer; viz. that the waters of Acheron would prove fatal to him; and at the ſame time admoniſhed him to avoid the city of Pandoſia, leſt he ſhould there finiſh his days. Acheron was a river of Epirus, and Pandoſia a city of the ſame country: Alexander therefore, not knowing that in the country of the Brutii there was a river and a city bearing the ſame names, willingly complied with the invitation of the Tarentini, and left his own country, fearing it might prove fatal to him, to make war in that of the Brutii. As he was fully perſuaded that his life could be

[q] See Vol. viii. Book. ii. cap. ii. ſect. iv. near the end. [r] Q. Curtius, l. iv. c. 1. [s] Arrian. l. ii. p. 41. [t] Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. Strabo, l. vii. Pauſan. in Bœot. Liv. l. viii. c. 24. Oroſ. l. vi. Paul. Diac. Hiſt. Miſcell.

be in no danger there, he expoſed his perſon to the greateſt dangers, took ſeveral cities, namely Heraclea, Coſentia, Sipontum, Terina, &c. and ſent above three hundred hoſtages to Epirus, all choſen out of the beſt families of the places he had conquered. Having overcome the Brutii and Lucani in a ſecond battle, to reduce their country the ſooner, he divided his army into three bodies, poſting them on three hills divided by deep vallies, and ſending out from thence numerous parties to ravage the neighbouring countries. One of theſe vallies was waſhed by the Acheron, on the banks of which ſtood the ſmall city of Pandoſia. While Alexander continued in this camp, the vallies were by ſudden rains laid under water, which broke off the communication between the three bodies of the king's forces. The enemy laid hold of this favourable opportunity to attack firſt the two poſts, where the king was not, and which by reaſon of the inundation he could not any ways aſſiſt. Theſe two bodies with much ado defeated, and put to flight, the Brutii and Lucani without loſs of time ſurrounded with all their forces the hill, on which the king himſelf was encamped. His guard conſiſted of two hundred Lucani, who being driven from their country had fled to him for refuge. Thoſe wrote to the generals of their nation, promiſing to deliver up to them the king of Epirus dead or alive, provided they would receive them into favour, and ſuffer them to return to their native country. The propoſal was accepted, and the traitors only waited for a favourable opportunity to put their treachery in execution. As Alexander was a prince of great courage and reſolution, in ſpite of all oppoſition he forced his way through the enemy's army, killed one of their generals with his own hand, and having with a ſmall attendance made his eſcape, and gained a neighbouring wood, he took his rout from thence to the river, the name of which he knew not, with a deſign to break down the bridge after he had croſſed it. But finding the bridge carried away by the violence of the inundation, he threw himſelf into the river on horſeback, when one of the Epirots, who attended him, ſeeing him in danger of being drowned, cried out, Curſed Acheron, thou art juſtly called by a fatal name; for the Greek word Acheron ſignifies a torrent of grief. At theſe words Alexander, remembering the anſwer of the oracle, and fearing his fate approached, began to heſitate, being in ſuſpenſe whether he ſhould go quite croſs the river or no. While he was thus wavering, one of his attendants cried out to him, Haſten, betrayed

betrayed prince, haſten to the oppoſite bank ; the Lucani, your guard, ſeek to deſtroy you. At thoſe words the king turning about, and ſeeing the Lucani ready to fall upon him, drew his ſword, and made what haſte he could to reach the bank, which he had already gained when one of the traitors, diſcharging a dart at him, killed him on the ſpot. His body fell into the river, which carried it to the enemy's camp, where it was uſed with all the indignity which rage and revenge could ſuggeſt. After they had barbarouſly defaced it, they cut it in two, ſending one part to Coſentia, and ſetting up the other as a mark for the ſoldiers to diſcharge their arrows and darts at. At length a woman, whoſe huſband and children had been taken by Alexander's troops, entreating the ſoldiers with tears in her eyes, to give her the ſcattered remains of the unhappy prince, ſince ſhe could eaſily purchaſe with them the redemption of her huſband and children, that part of the body, which the ſoldiers poſſeſſed, was delivered to her, and conveyed by her means firſt to Metapontum, and from thence removed to Epirus, where they were conſigned to Cleopatra and Olympias, the former the wife, the latter the ſiſter of the deceaſed king. All the antients ſpeak of this prince as no ways inferior either in courage or conduct to his nephew Alexander the Great; but he had the misfortune to engage on his firſt ſetting out with nations inured to the toils of war, and no leſs brave than his own Epirots: whence he uſed to ſay, that the country, which he propoſed to conquer, was inhabited by men, whereas the provinces, his nephew Alexander went to ſubdue, were peopled by women only [s]: Thus he ſtyled the effeminate nations of Aſia, which the Macedonian had ſubdued. Oroſius [t] tells us, that he was killed by the Samnites, while he was making the neceſſary preparations for a war with Rome, and adds, that he was in ſuch favour with Philip his brother-in-law, as made the world believe that the inclination which that prince had for him, was more agreeable to the wickedneſs of thoſe times, than to the laws of nature. Theodectes wrote a panegyric on this king as Suidas informs us; he is alſo mentioned by Demoſthenes [u], and cried up as an able and experienced commander by all the antients who mentions him.

ALEXANDER was ſucceeded in the kingdom by Æacides Æacides. the ſon of Arybbas or Arybas, and grandſon of Alcetas. This

[s] Aul. Gell. l. xvii. c. 21. [t] Oroſ. l. vi. [u] Demoſthen. in orat. de Haloneſo.

This prince eſpouſed the cauſe of Olympias againſt Caſſander, and raiſed a powerful army with a deſign to relieve her while beſieged in the city of Pydna, but having on this occaſion forced many of his ſubjects into the ſervice much againſt their will, they began to mutiny in the camp, eſpecially after they found all the paſſes leading to Pydna ſeized on by Atarchias, Caſſander's general. Hereupon Æacides, being reſolved at all events to attempt the relief of Olympias, diſbanded all thoſe who ſeemed unwilling to follow him in this expedition, and taking with him ſuch only as ſhewed themſelves ready to run the ſame riſk with himſelf, he advanced towards Pydna; but he had ſcarce left Epirus, when thoſe he had ſent back revolted from him, and drawing their fellow citizens into the ſame revolt, declared by a common decree of the ſtate, that Æacides had forfeited the crown, baniſhed him the kingdom, and entered into an alliance with Caſſander. This, as Diodorus Siculus obſerves, was the firſt rebellion that had happened in Epirus from the time that Neoptolemus, the ſon of Achilles, had reigned there, the kingdom having ever before deſcended by right of ſucceſſion from father to ſon [w]. Caſſander immediately diſpatched Lyciſus into Epirus to take upon him in his name the government of that kingdom, injoining him to uſe the natives with all poſſible moderation. However, the Epirots were ſoon reconciled to their king, and, recalling him from baniſhment, replaced him on the throne of hisanceſtors, which he did not long enjoy, being killed the ſame year in a battle fought with Philip the brother of Caſſander [x].

Alcetas II.

Upon his death the crown was conferred upon Alcetas his brother, who had been baniſhed by his father Arybas on account of his violent temper. As he was an inveterate enemy to Caſſander, Lyciſcus, Caſſander's general in Acarnania, marched with an army into Epirus, hoping as the affairs of that kingdom were not yet well ſettled, to depoſe him. Alcetas, hearing of the enemy's march, diſpatched two of his ſons, Alexander and Teucer, into all the provinces and cities of his dominions, to raiſe what forces they could; and in the mean time marched out himſelf with the few troops he had to make head againſt Lyciſcus, whom he found encamped at Caſſopia. As Lyciſcus's army was far more numerous than the king's, they fell upon him before he had time to fortify his camp, and obliged him after he had been abandoned by moſt of his troops, to ſhut himſelf up in the city city of Eurymenas, where he was closely besieged. But in the mean time his son Alexander arriving with powerful succours, a sharp engagement ensued, in which great numbers of Lyciscus's men were cut off, and amongst the others Micythus, a commander of great reputation, Lysander the Athenian, governor of Leucadia, and many other persons of distinction. A few days after this victory Dinias brought new supplies for Lyciscus, whereupon a second battle being fought, Alexander and Teucer with their father Alcetas were forced to save themselves by flight, and abandon the city of Eurymenas to the enemy, who plundered it; and razed it to the ground. Cassander, upon the news of the defeat of his forces, not having received any intelligence of the victory they gained afterwards, hastened into Epirus to succour his general; but being informed on his arrival of the success that had attended him in the second engagement, instead of pursuing the war, he thought it adviseable to enter into a treaty with the Epirots; and having concluded a peace upon honourable terms, he withdrew his troops, and restored tranquillity to the kingdom of Epirus. Alcetas being thus disengaged from so troublesome a war, began to exercise, as he was a prince of a most tyrannical temper, all sorts of cruelties over his subjects; which so provoked them, that having made a general insurrection, they murdered both him and his two sons, Hesioneas and Nisus, who were then very young. Alexander and Teucer had the good fortune to make their escape, and never afterwards appeared in Epirus [y].

[w] Diodor. Sicul. l. xix. [x] Idem ibid.

Pyrrhus.

ALCETAS was succeeded by Pyrrhus, a prince of great fame in history. He was the son of Æacides, of whom we have spoke above, by Philip the daughter of Menon the Thessalian, one of the Heraclidæ; so that Pyrrhus was by the father descended from Achilles, and from Hercules by the mother [z]. When the Epirots revolted from his father, and drove him from the throne, it was with much difficulty that Pyrrhus, then an infant at the breast, escaped falling into the hands of the rebels. He was after various adventures conveyed by Androcles and Angelus, two Epirot lords, to the court of Glaucias king of Illyricum, who, as some authors conjecture, had married his aunt Beroa, the daughter of Arybbas, and grand-daughter of king Alcetas [a]. Glaucias Narrowly escapes falling into the hands of the rebellious Epirots.

[y] Idem ibid. Reineccium, Hist. Jul. tom. 2. in regno Epiri.

[z] Plut. in Pyrrh.

[a] Vide Reiner.

cias heſitated a great while, as Plutarch informs us [b], before he would admit the young prince into his palace, the fear he was in of provoking Caſſander, an implacable enemy to Æacides, keeping him in ſuſpenſe. Hereupon thoſe who had reſcued the infant prince from the fury of the rebels, had recourſe to entreaties, and imploring the king's protection, laid the child at his feet, who taking hold of his royal robes, raiſed himſelf up, and with his arms graſped the king's knees. Hereupon Glaucias tenderly embracing him, and proteſting that he would defend him at the hazard of his life and dominions, delivered him to his queen to be educated with his own children [c]. Other writers tell us, that the infant, actuated by ſome extraordinary impulſe, fixed his eyes on the altars of the domeſtic gods, as if he claimed the protection of thoſe deities, who were lovers of hoſpitality; and that Glaucias, ſtruck at this ſight, concluded, that the gods took the young prince under their protection, and thought it his duty to bring up young Pyrrhus with all poſſible care [d]. In the mean time Caſſander, hearing that the unfortunate prince had found a retreat in the court of Glaucias, ſollicited the king to deliver him up into his hands; but neither his repeated inſtances, nor the two hundred talents he offered Glaucias, could induce him to commit ſo baſe an action; he was ſtruck with horror at the propoſal, rejected it with indignation, and having given the baniſhed and perſecuted prince an education ſuitable to his rank, as ſoon as he attained the twelfth year of his age, he ſent him back into Epirus at the head of a powerful army, and placed him on the throne of his anceſtors [e]. Juſtin tells us that the Moloſſians, his ſubjects, changing their hatred into compaſſion, recalled him of their own accord, and aſſigned him guardians to govern the kingdom in his name till he was of age [f]. He enjoyed the kingdom in great peace and tranquillity till he was ſeventeen, when thinking himſelf ſufficiently ſettled on the throne, he left Epirus for a while in order to be preſent in Illyricum at the nuptials of one of the ſons of Glaucias, with whom he had been educated. But he was no ſooner gone than the Moloſſians, taking advantage of his abſence, revolted anew, drove all his friends out of the kingdom, ſeized on his treaſures, and conferred the crown on Neoptolemus his great uncle. Pyrrhus being by this unexpected revolt deveſted of all his dominions, and deſtitute of ſufficient ſuccours,

Placed on the throne by Glaucias king of Illyricum.

The Epirots place Neoptolemus on the throne.

[b] Plut. in Pyrrho. [c] Idem ibid. [d] Pauſan. in Attic. [e] Plut. ibid. [f] Juſtin. l. xvii. c. 3.

cours, to recover them, retired to Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus, commonly known by the ſirname of Poliorcetes, who had married his ſiſter Deidamia. From that great commander he learnt the art of war, ſerving under him with the companions and fellow-ſoldiers of Alexander the Great. In the famous battle of Ipſus he diſtinguiſhed himſelf young as he was, in a very eminent manner, having fought with incredible bravery, and repulſed the enemy on that ſide, where he was poſted [g]. Demetrius nevertheleſs loſt the battle; but Pyrrhus very ſeaſonably covered Greece, and ſaved for his brother-in-law the Greek cities, which that prince had confided to his care. Nor was this the only proof he gave of his affection for Demetrius; for a peace being at length concluded between him and Ptolemy by the interpoſition of Seleucus, Pyrrhus conſented to be one of the hoſtages, who were ſent into Egypt to ſecure the execution of the treaty.

During his abode at the court of Egypt he was generally admired for the ſweetneſs of his temper, the regularity of his conduct, and his great dexterity and addreſs in all ſorts of manly exerciſes. His chief aim was to make his court to Berenice, who had the greateſt aſcendant over Ptolemy, and ſurpaſſed all the other women of the court in beauty as well as prudence. And herein he was very ſucceſsful, for he ſo gained her by his noble and obliging behaviour, that ſhe prevailed upon her huſband to give him her daughter Antigone in preference to ſeveral young princes who demanded her. Antigone was the daughter of this favourite queen by Philip her firſt huſband, a Macedonian lord of no great fame. After Pyrrhus had married her, Berenice, deſirous to ſee her daughter become a queen, induced Ptolemy to ſupply her ſon-in-law with ſufficient forces to recover his kingdom. With theſe he ſailed into Epirus, and having defeated in a battle Neoptolemus, whom the Moloſſians had placed on the throne, he recovered his paternal dominions. Neoptolemus had recourſe to the neighbouring princes; but Pyrrhus, to avoid the evil conſequences of a civil war, condeſcended to give him up part of his dominions. Neoptolemus at firſt ſeemed to be well ſatisfied with part of the kingdom; but having ſoon after at the inſtigation of the enemies of Pyrrhus attempted to poiſon him, he Recovers his kingdom with the aſſiſtance of Ptolemy of Egypt.

[g] Plut. ibid. Arrian. l. vii. Appian. in Syriac.

he was by his orders put to death [h]. Pyrrhus having by his death got poſſeſſion of the whole kingdom of Epirus, continued no longer idle in his dominions; but marching into the neighbouring countries performed thoſe great feats we have deſcribed in the hiſtory of Macedon [i], and therefore ſhall not repeat in this place.

THIS warlike prince being obliged by Lyſimachus to abandon the kingdom of Macedon, which he had taken from his brother-in-law Demetrius, as we have related elſewhere [k], might have paſſed his days in tranquillity among his ſubjects, enjoying the ſweets of a peace, and governing his people agreeable to the rules of juſtice; but his reſtleſs temper and unbounded ambition made him ſeize with joy on the firſt opportunity that offered of plunging himſelf into new troubles.

THE inhabitants of Tarentum were then at war with the Romans, and not finding themſelves in a condition to oppoſe ſo formidable an enemy with their own ſtrength, they caſt their eyes upon Pyrrhus, and diſpatched embaſſadors to him, not only from themſelves, but from all the Greek cities in Italy, enjoining them to acquaint him, that they wanted only a leader of experience and reputation; that Tarentum was not the only city whoſe forces would join him; that the Meſſapians, Lucanians, Samnites, Brutians, and many other rich and populous nations, weary either of bearing the Roman yoke, or of being in a continual dread of it, were ready to aſſiſt him in exterminating that haughty and imperious republic; that he might depend on being ſupplied at his arrival with three hundred thouſand foot, and twenty thouſand horſe, &c. The joy with which Pyrrhus received a propoſal ſo agreeable to his diſpoſition, may be eaſily imagined. His head was filled with the exploits of Alexander the Great, and his frequently converſing with the generals, who had ſerved under that conqueror, had ſtrongly inclined him to attempt in the weſt what Alexander had with ſo much glory performed in the eaſt. He therefore willingly cloſed with the propoſal of the Tarentine embaſſadors, promiſing to paſs over into Italy with all poſſible expedition, and employ the whole ſtrength of his kingdom in reſcuing them from the oppreſſion they groaned under. However, before he began to make the neceſſary prepa-

Invited by the Tarentines into Italy.

[h] Plut. ibid. & Pauſan. in Attic. [i] See Vol. viii. ſect. viii.
[k] See Vol. viii. ſect viii.

preparations, he is said to have consulted the oracle of Delphos, about the success of his intended expedition; on which occasion the answer of the god was uttered in such terms as might equally signify, either that he should conquer the Romans, or the Romans him; but the desire he had of embarquing in this expedition, made him interpret the ambiguous answer in his own favour [1].

A THESSALIAN, named Cyneas, was at this time Pyrrhus's prime minister and chief favourite. He was a man of most extraordinary parts, being an experienced officer, an able politician, and the most eloquent orator of his age: the art of oratory he had learned under Demosthenes; that of war under the companions of Alexander the Great; and politics by long experience; having been always employed by Pyrrhus in the most difficult negotiations. The art of persuasion, of which he was master, and the secret he had of insinuatiug himself into the affections of those he dealt with, enabled him to conquer all difficulties in the business he transacted for his master; insomuch, that Pyrrhus himself used to say, that he had gained more cities by the eloquence and persuasive discourses of Cyneas, than he could possibly have conquered by force of arms. He was by profession a philosopher of the sect of Epicurus, which was not then come into disrepute through the ill use that corrupt men afterwards made of the principles they professed. At court he maintained the character of a man of virtue, and a lover of truth, who was not capable of deceiving by mean flatteries, and yet had submission enough to execute, without murmuring, the orders that were given contrary to his advice. Pyrrhus, who reposed an entire confidence in this great man, could not help communicating to him the vast projects he was forming. Having therefore called him into his cabinet, after he had dismissed the Tarentine embassadors; the Tarentines, said he, invite me over into Italy, which opens to me a large field of glory. To subdue the Romans is to conquer the west: and how easy is it to subdue them! Hetruria finds them employment on one hand, and all the nations on this side of the Tyber, quite to the sea-shore, are ready to take up arms under my command against that ambitious and haughty republic. Tell me impartially what you think of this expedition. Cyneas, without disapproving his design upon Italy, asked him whither Discloses his design to Cyneas.

[1] Plut, ibid. & Cic. de Divin. l. ii.

he designed to turn his arms, if the gods should be so gracious as to crown his attempts upon that country with the wished-for success. To this question Pyrrhus without hesitation answered, that from Italy he designed to pass over into Sicily, where he should find all things in confusion on account of the death of king Agathocles, who had kept the Sicilians in awe. And how many fruitful provinces, said he, shall I find there, either ready to receive me after the conquest of Italy, or not in a condition to oppose my victorious troops! And when Sicily shall have submitted to you, where do you intend to make war next? replied Cyneas. The thing speaks itself, answered Pyrrhus; from Sicily I will sail over into Africa. The Carthaginians are not invincible; Agathocles surprized them with a few ships, and was very near making himself king of Carthage. And when I shall have taken that city, who will be able to make head against me? Macedon, which I formerly conquered, and every province of Greece, shall be part of my future conquests. And after all these victories, said Cyneas, how shall we employ ourselves, and dispose of our time? I will then, subjoined Pyrrhus, take some rest after all my fatigues, and enjoy the pleasures of life with you. At these words the wise philosopher interrupting him; And what prevents you, said he, from enjoying that happiness now, which you propose to seek through so many toils and labours, with the hazard of never being able to find it? Why should you purchase, at so dear a rate, the gratifications which you may now enjoy without the least trouble? These words made some impression upon the king; but his ambition getting the better of his understanding, he persisted in his design; and covering his ambitious views with the appearance of virtue, It is hereditary in my family, said he, to assist the miserable: we ought not to make war for ourselves alone, but to relieve the oppressed. Being thus unalterably fixed in his design of subjecting all Italy, the better to conceal it, he caused a very artful clause to be inserted in his treaty with the Tarentines, viz. that when he had once relieved Tarentum, he should not be detained in Italy, but allowed to return to Epirus. He likewise required that some of the embassadors should continue in his dominions, under pretence of assisting him in making the necessary preparations for war; but in reality, that they might be as so many hostages to secure the fidelity of the Tarentines[m].

Resolves on a war with the Romans

[m] Plin. ibid. Dion. in excerpt. Zonar. l. viii.

HAVING

HAVING taken theſe prudent precautions, he immediately diſpatched Cyneas with part of his fleet and a detachment of three thouſand foot to Tarentum, where that artful miniſter ſoon changed the face of affairs, the chief men of the city being, notwithſtanding the embaſſy they had ſent to Pyrrhus, inclined to come to an agreement with the Romans; nay, they had even choſen for their chief magiſtrate one Agis, who was a ſincere friend to the Romans, and acted in concert with L. Æmilius Barbula the Roman general, hoping by that means to reconcile his countrymen to Rome, and make them lay aſide their deſign of receiving the king of Epirus. But Cyneas by his eloquence and inſinuating behaviour prevailed upon the Tarentines to depoſe Agis, and place one of the embaſſadors, who had been ſent to Epirus in his room. After this he perſuaded them to deliver up their citadel to one Milo an Epirote, who was arrived a few days before with freſh ſuccours, and the agreeable news, that Pyrrhus would ſoon be there in perſon at the head of a numerous army. The Tarentines, impatient to ſee the king of Epirus among them, upon this advice diſpatched their gallies and a great number of tranſports with all ſorts of proviſions and a large ſum of money, to Epirus, in order to convey Pyrrhus with his troops and elephants ſafe to Tarentum. The convoy no ſooner arrived than the king embarqued, Cyneas and Milo having paved the way for him ſo well, that his authority was already as well eſtabliſhed in Tarentum, as in Epirus. Before the arrival of the Tarentine fleet he had ſettled the government of his dominions during his abſence. He left Ptolemy, his ſon by Antigone the daughter of Berenice, who was then fifteen years old, regent of Epirus under the tuition of Ptolemy Ceraunus king of Macedon. He took his two younger ſons Alexander and Helenus (L) with him Pyrrhus embarques for Italy. Year after the flood, 2719. Year before Chriſt 280.

(L) After the death of Antigone, the daughter of Berenice, Pyrrhus married ſeveral wives. The firſt was the daughter of Antoleon, king of the Pæonians. The ſecond, by name Bircenna, was the daughter of Bardullis, king of the Illyrians. The third was Lanaſſa, the daughter of Agathocles, king of Syracuſe. The latter brought him the iſland of Corcyra, which her father had ſeized, for her portion. By her he had Alexander; and Helenus, the youngeſt of all his children, by Bercenna. Plutarch tells us, that all the children of Pyrrhus derived a warlike genius from their father, which was greatly improved by their education, and adds, that one of them having aſked him, to which of his children he deſigned to leave the kingdom of Epirus, the

king

into Italy, to amuſe and entertain him in this long expedition. Before his departure, he had likewiſe borrowed ſhips, men, and money, of the kings his friends; ſo that his army conſiſted of twenty-two thouſand foot, three thouſand horſe, five hundred ſlingers, and fifty elephants according to Juſtin [n], which Plutarch reduces to twenty [o]. Among theſe troops were about ſeven thouſand of thoſe brave Macedonians, who had conquered Aſia under Alexander the Great. His fleet was compoſed of the ſhips of Epirus, the gallies of Tarentum, and thoſe which Antigonus Gonatus had ſent him. With theſe he immediately ſet ſail about the end of the winter, the eager deſire he had of getting to Italy, not ſuffering him to wait for a more favourable ſeaſon. But his impatience had like to have coſt him dear; for he had ſcarce got out into the open ſea, when a violent ſtorm from the north drove him out of his courſe, and diſperſed his fleet. The ſhip, on board of which the king was, being large and high-built, gained by the care of the pilot and mariners the coaſt of Italy the firſt, after a voyage of infinite fatigue and danger. The few ſhips that followed the king ſtruck againſt the rocks on the Meſſapian ſhore, and were daſhed to pieces. While Pyrrhus was preparing to come aſhore, the inhabitants having flocked from all quarters to ſee him, a freſh accident was very near deſtroying the deliverer of Italy, as they ſtiled him, and diſappointing the expectation of the Tarentines. For a land wind riſing all on a ſudden with great violence, drove Pyrrhus out to ſea again. This new danger was greater than any he had met with in his paſſage, the mariners expecting that his ſhip, being furiouſly beat by huge waves, would founder at each ſhock it ſuſtained. In this extremity the intrepid Pyrrhus did not heſitate a moment, but as the ſhore was not far off, threw himſelf into the ſea, and was immediately followed by his guards, and thoſe friends he had on board, without doubt, to take care of his perſon, and ſave him at the danger of their own lives; but as the night was extremely dark and the ſea ran very high, he ſtruggled with the waves till day-break, when the wind abating, he reached the

His fleet diſperſed by a ſtorm.

And himſelf in danger of being loſt.

[n] Juſtin. l. xvii. c. 2. [o] Plut. Ibid.

king anſwered, To him who has the ſharpeſt ſword. Lanaſſa, who was once his favourite wife, grew at laſt jealous of him, thinking he preferred his other wives to her, and retiring to Corcyra, there married Demetrius (102).

(102) Plut. in Pyrrho.

the land with the aſſiſtance of the Meſſapians, who ſtood on the ſhore. The long fatigue he had ſuſtained during great part of the night, weakened him to ſuch a degree, that he could not ſtand without being ſupported by his guards. But what gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs, was the apprehenſion he was under of his army being loſt; for he had with him only two thouſand men, a few horſes, and two elephants, animals which had never before been ſeen in Italy. With theſe he croſſed Meſſapia, and marched directly to Tarentum [p].

Arrives at Tarentum.

CYNEAS no ſooner heard what had happened to Pyrrhus, but he advanced to meet him at the head of a ſtrong detachment, and conducted him ſafe to Tarentum, where he was received with loud acclamations and all poſſible demonſtrations of joy. The Tarentines, who were entirely devoted to their pleaſures, expected that he ſhould take all the fatigues of the war on himſelf, and expoſe his Epirots only to danger. And indeed Pyrrhus for ſome days diſſembled his deſign, and ſuffered the Tarentines to indulge without reſtraint their uſual diverſions. But his ſhips, which had been diſperſed all over the Ionian ſea, arriving one after another, and with them the troops which he had put on board of them in Epirus, he began to reform the diſorders that prevailed in the city. The theatre was the place to which the idle Tarentines reſorted daily in great numbers, and where the incendiaries ſtirred up the people to ſedition with their harangues; he therefore cauſed it to be ſhut up, as he did likewiſe the public gardens, porticos, and places of exerciſe, where the inhabitants uſed to entertain themſelves with news, and ſpeak with great freedom of their governors, cenſuring their conduct, and ſettling the government according to their different humours, which occaſioned great diviſions, and rent the city into various factions.

Reforms the manners of the Tarentines.

As they were a very voluptuous and indolent people, they ſpent whole days and nights in feaſts, maſquerades, plays, &c. and theſe Pyrrhus abſolutely prohibited as no leſs dangerous than the aſſemblies of prating politicians. They were utter ſtrangers to military exerciſes and the art of handling arms; but Pyrrhus having cauſed an exact regiſter to be made of all the young men who were fit for war, picked out the ſtrongeſt among them, and incorporated them among his own troops, ſaying, that he would take it upon him to give them courage. He exerciſed them daily for ſeveral hours, and on that occaſion behaved himſelf with an inexorable ſeverity, inflicting exemplary puniſhments on ſuch as did not attend, or failed in their duty. By theſe wiſe meaſues he prevented ſeditions among the citizens, and inured their youth to military diſcipline; and becauſe many, who had not been accuſtomed to ſuch ſeverity and rigour, withdrew from their native country, Pyrrhus, by a public proclamation declared all thoſe guilty of death, who ſhould attempt to abandon their country, or abſent themſelves from the common muſters [q].

[p] Plut. & Juſtin. ibid.

The Tarentines, being now ſenſible that Pyrrhus was determined to be their maſter, began loudly to complain of his conduct; but he being informed of whatever paſſed among them by his ſpies, who inſinuated themſelves into all companies, privately diſpatched the moſt factious, and ſent thoſe, whom he ſuſpected, under various pretences to his ſon's court in Epirus. Among the latter was Ariſtarchus, a famous orator, whoſe eloquence gave Pyrrhus no ſmall jealouſy; for orators had in thoſe days a great influence over the multitude, eſpecially in the Greek cities where popular government obtained. As Ariſtarchus had, we may ſay, an abſolute authority in the city, Pyrrhus made it his chief buſineſs to leſſen his reputation among his fellow-citizens, pretending a ſtrict friendſhip for the orator, and giving out, that in many things, which were diſpleaſing to the Tarentines, he had acted according to his advice. But Ariſtarchus in his private diſcourſes undeceived them, letting them know that he entertained the ſame thoughts of Pyrrhus as the multitude. The king therefore, thinking it neceſſary to remove ſo dangerous an enemy, ſent him to his ſon on an embaſſy, which, he ſaid, was of the utmoſt importance. Ariſtarchus ſaw through the artifice, but pretending to be altogether unacquainted with it, accepted the deputation, and chooſing a veſſel the commmander of which was entirely at his devotion, ſet ſail, as Pyrrhus imagined, for Epirus. But he had no ſooner loſt ſight of the land, than he ordered the pilot to return to Italy, and put into ſome port, from whence he might go ſafely by land into Rome. The pilot obeyed, and Ariſtarchus, on his arrival in that metropolis, acquainted the ſenate with the ſtate of Tarentum and the deſigns of Pyrrhus. Hereupon Fabricus was immediately diſpatched to viſit the Roman colonies and the allies of the republic, to fortify ſome places, and exhort the cities to continue ſteady in their alliance with Rome. And truly theſe precautions were neceſſary, the allies of the republic being being in many places inclined to deſert her, and ready to join a king famous for his exploits, who promiſed them a happy deliverance from all manner of ſubjection [r].

[q] Plut. ibid. Frontin. Strateg.

In the mean time P. Valerius Lævinas the Roman conſul, entering the country of the Lucanians, who were in alliance with the Tarentines, committed great ravages there, and having taken and fortified one of their caſtles, waited in that neighbourhood for Pyrrhus. The king, though he had not yet received any ſuccours from the Samnites, Meſſapians, and other allies of the Tarentines, thought it highly diſhonourable to continue ſhut up in a city, while the Romans were ravaging the country of his friends. He therefore took the field with the troops he had brought with him from Epirus, ſome recruits of Tarentum, and a ſmall number of Italians. But before he began hoſtilities he wrote the following letter to Lævinus: Pyrrhus to Lævinus health.

Writes a haughty letter to the conſul Lævinus. The conſul's anſwer.

" I am informed that you command an army, which is to " make war upon the Tarentines. Diſband it without de" lay, and lay your pretenſions before me. After I have " heard both parties, I will give judgment, and know how " to make my ſentence be obeyed. Lævinus anſwered the " king with all the haughtineſs of a Roman: Know, Pyr-
" rhus, that we neither admit you as a judge, nor fear you " as an enemy. Does it become you to take upon you to " judge us, who have yourſelf injured us by landing in Italy
" without the conſent of our republic? We will have no
" arbitrator but Mars, the author of our race, and pro" tector of our arms". The king upon the receipt of this letter immediately marched towards thoſe parts where Lævinus was waiting for him. The Romans were encamped on the hither ſide of the river Siris, and Pyrrhus, appearing on the oppoſite bank, made it his firſt buſineſs to reconnoitre the enemy's camp in perſon, and ſee what appearance they made. With this view he croſſed the river attended by Megacles one of his officers, and chief favourites; and having obſerved the conſul's intrenchments, the manner in which he had poſted his advanced guards, and the good order of his camp, he was greatly ſurprized; and addreſſing Megacles, Theſe people, ſaid he, are not ſuch barbarians as we take them to be; let us try them before we condemn them them (M). On his return he changed his resolution of attacking them, and shutting himself up in his intrenchments, waited for the arrival of the confederate troops. In the mean time he posted strong guards along the river to prevent the enemy from passing it, and continually sent out scouts to discover the designs, and watch the motions of the consul. Some of these being taken by the advanced guards of the Romans, the consul himself led them through his camp, and having shewed them his army, sent them back to the king, telling them that he had many other troops to shew them in due time[s].

[r] Plut. ibid. Dion. in excerpt. Urſin. Polyb. l. 1. c. 7.

Attacked by the Romans

LÆVINUS being determined to draw the enemy to a battle before Pyrrhus received the reinforcements he expected, having harangued his troops, marched to the banks of the Siris, and there drawing up his infantry in battalia, ordered the cavalry to file off, and march a great way about in order to find a passage at some place not defended by the enemy. Accordingly they passed the river without being observed, and falling upon the guards, which Pyrrhus had posted on the banks over-against the consular army, gave the infantry an opportunity of crossing the river on bridges, which Lævinus had prepared for that purpose. But before they got over, Pyrrhus hastening from his camp, which was at some distance from the river, hoped to cut the Roman army

[s] Plut. ibid. Justin. l. xviii. c. 2. Pausan. in Bœotic.

(M) Aurelius Victor and Florus make Pyrrhus talk in a very different manner on this occasion, and altogether foreign to the purpose. The first tells us, that at the sight of the Roman army he cried out, that his fate was like that of Hercules, since he likewise had a hydra to encounter; and Florus, that when he saw the Roman troops, he complained of his being born under the same constellation with Hercules, since so many enemies, like the heads of the hydra of Lerna, started up out of their own blood. Cyneas, according to Plutarch, and not Pyrrhus, made this comparison, after he had observed how quickly the Roman army was recruited, and the legions filled up, notwithstanding the great loss they had sustained in the first battle. On this occasion the reflection of Cyneas was a very sensible one, and the comparison obvious and natural; but it would have been highly absurd in the circumstances in which the above-mentioned authors suppose Pyrrhus to have made it, that is, before he had engaged the Romans, or gained any victory over them; for how could he then compare them to the hydra, whose heads grew up as fast as Hercules cut them off?

army in pieces, while they were diſordered with the difficulties of paſſing the river, and climbing up the ſteep banks. But the cavalry covering the infantry, and ſtanding between them and the Epirots, gave them time to form themſelves on the banks of the river. On the other hand, Pyrrhus drew up his men as faſt as they came from the camp, and performed ſuch feats of valour, that the Romans thought him worthy of the great reputation he had acquired.

As the cavalry alone had hitherto engaged, Pyrrhus, who confided moſt in his infantry, haſtened back to the camp in order to bring them to the charge: but took two precautions before he began the attack; the firſt was to ride through the ranks, and ſhew himſelf to the whole army; for his horſe having been killed under him in the firſt onſet, a report had been ſpread that he was killed; the ſecond was to change his habit and helmet with Megacles; for having been known in the engagement of the horſe by the richneſs of his attire and armour, many of the Romans had aimed at him in particular, ſo that he was with the utmoſt difficulty taken up and ſaved after his horſe was killed under him. Thus diſguiſed, he led his phalanx againſt the Roman legions, and attacked them with incredible fury. Lœvinus ſuſtained the ſhock with great reſolution, ſo that the victory was for many hours warmly diſputed. The Romans gave ſeveral times way to the Epirots, and the Epirots to the Romans; but both parties rallied again, and were brought back to the charge by their commanders. Megacles in the attire and helmet of Pyrrhus was in all places, and well ſupported the character he had aſſumed. But his diſguiſe at laſt proved fatal to him: For a Roman knight, by name Dexter, taking him for the king, followed him where-ever he went, and having found an opportunity of diſcharging a blow at him, ſtruck him dead on the ſpot, ſtript him of his helmet and armour, and carried them in triumph to the conſul, who by ſhewing to the Epirots the trius of their king, ſo terrified them, that they began to give ground. But Pyrrhus appearing bare-headed in the firſt files of his phalanx, and riding through all the lines undeceived his men, and inſpired them with new courage. The advantage ſeemed to be pretty equal on both ſides, when Lœvinus ordered his cavalry to advance; which Pyrrhus obſerving, drew up twenty elephants in the front of his army with towers on their backs full of bowmen. The very ſight of thoſe dreadful animals chilled the bravery of the Romans, who had never before ſeen them. However, they ſtill Pyrrhus is in great danger in the beginning of the battle.

But at laſt defeats the Romans.

ſtill advanced, till their horſes, not being able to bear the ſmell of them, and frightened at the ſtrange noiſe they made, took head, and either threw their riders, or carried them off full ſtretch in ſpite of their utmoſt efforts. In the mean time the archers, diſcharging ſhowers of darts from the towers, wounded ſeveral of the Romans in that confuſion, while others were trod to death by the elephants. Notwithſtanding the diſorder of the cavalry, the legionaries ſtill kept their ranks, and could not be broke, till Pyrrhus attacked them in perſon at the head of the Theſſalian horſe. The onſet was ſo furious, that they were forced to yield, and retire in diſorder. The king of Epirus reſtrained the ardour of his troops, and would not ſuffer them to purſue the enemy, an elephant which had been wounded by a Roman ſoldier, named Minuccius, having cauſed a great diſorder in his army. This accident favoured the retreat of the Romans, and gave them time to repaſs the river, and take refuge in Apulia [t]. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus make the loſs of the Romans in this firſt battle amount to fifteen thouſand men; but Hieronymus, quoted by the ſame hiſtorian, reduces it to ſeven thouſand: according to the former Pyrrhus loſt thirteen thouſand, and four thouſand only according to the latter. The Epirot remained maſter of the field, and had the pleaſure to ſee the Romans fly before him; but the victory coſt him dear, a great number of his beſt officers and ſoldiers having been ſlain in the battle; whence he was heard to ſay after the action, that he was both conqueror and conquered, and that if he gained ſuch another victory, he ſhould be obliged to return to Epirus alone. He was ſo far from being elated with the advantage he had got, that when he hung up the ſpoils he had taken from the enemy, in the temple of Jupiter at Tarentum, he cauſed this memorable inſcription to be engraved upon them: Great Jupiter, I have conquered an invincible nation, and am conquered by the ſame [u] (N). His firſt care after the action was to bury the dead, with which the plain was covered; and herein he made

His victory coſts him dear.

no

[t] Dion. Halicarnaſs. l. iii. Plut. ibid. Eutrop. l. ii. Oroſ. l. iv. c. 2. [u] Plut. ibid. Oroſ. l. iv. c 1.

(N) The words of this inſcription, as they have been tranſlated to us in verſe, are,

Qui invicti ante fuere viri, pater optime Olympi Hos et in pugna vici, victuſque ſum ab iiſdem

no diſtinction between the Romans and his own Epirots. In viewing the bodies of the former, he obſerved that none of them had received any diſhonourable wounds, that they had all fallen in the poſts aſſigned them, ſtill held their ſwords in their hands, and ſhewed even after their death a certain martial air and fierceneſs in their faces; and on this occaſion it was, that he uttered thoſe famous words: O that Pyrrhus had Romans for his ſoldiers, or the Romans, Pyrrhus for their leader! Together we ſhould ſubdue the whole world [w].

THE king of Epirus underſtood the art of war too well not to reap what advantage he could from his victory. He broke into the countries in alliance with the Romans like a torrent, plundered the lands of the republic, and made incurſions even into the neighbourhood of Rome. Many cities opened their gates to him, and in a ſhort time he made himſelf maſter of the greateſt part of Compania. While he was in that fruitful province, ſubſiſting his troops there at the expence of the Romans, he was joined by the Samnites, Lucanians, and Meſſapians, whom he had ſo long expected. After having reproached them for their delay, he gave them a good ſhare of the ſpoils he had taken from the enemy; and having by this means gained their affections, he marched without loſs of time to lay ſiege to Capua; but Lævinus, having already received a reinforcement of two legions, threw ſome troops into the city, which obliged Pyrrhus to drop his deſign, and leaving Capua to march ſtrait to Naples. Lævinus followed him, haraſſing his troops on their march, and at length, by keeping his army in that neighbourhood, forced him to give over all thoughts of making himſelf maſter of that important city. The king then all of a ſudden took his rout towards Rome by the Latin way, ſurprized Fregellæ, and marching through the country of the Hernici, ſat down before Præneſte. There from the top of a hill he had the pleaſure of ſeeing Rome, and is ſaid to have advanced ſo near the walls, that he drove a cloud of duſt into the city. But he was ſoon forced to retire by the other conſul T. Coruncanius, who having reduced Hetruria, was juſt then returned with his victorious army to Rome. The king of Epirus therefore, having no hopes of bringing the Hetrurians into his intereſt, and ſeeing two conſular armies ready to fall upon him, raiſed the ſiege of Præneſte, and haſtened back into Campania, where Makes himſelf maſter of the greateſt part of Campania.

Takes Fregellæ.

Raiſes the ſiege of Prænеſte, and returns to Campania.

[w] Flor. l. 8.

where, to his great ſurprize, he found Lævinus with a more numerous army than that which he had defeated on the banks of the Siris. The conſul went to meet him with a deſign to try the fate of another battle, which Pyrrhus being unwilling to decline, drew up his army, and to ſtrike terror into the Roman legions, ordered his men to beat their bucklers with their lances, and the leaders of the elephants to force them to make their hideous noiſe. But the noiſe was returned with ſuch an univerſal ſhout by the Romans that Pyrrhus, thinking ſo much alacrity on the part of the vanquiſhed too ſure a prognoſtic of victory, altered his mind, and, pretending that the auguries were not favourable, retired to Tarentum, and put an end to the campaign[x].

WHILE Pyrrhus continued quiet at Tarentum, he had time to reflect on the valour and conduct of the Romans; which made him conclude, that the war, in which he was engaged, muſt end in his ruin and diſgrace, if not terminated by an honourable peace. He was therefore overjoyed when he heard that the ſenate had determined to ſend an honourable embaſſy to him, not doubting but their errand was to propoſe terms of peace. He pleaſed himſelf with the imagination of ſeeing thoſe haughty republicans at his feet in a ſuppliant manner, and ſaying to them with the air of a conqueror, I grant you peace. In full expectation of this, he ſent Lycon the Moloſſian to wait for them with a guard on the frontiers of Tarentum; and as they approached the city went out in perſon to meet them; received them with all poſſible marks of honour, and oppointed them ſtately lodgings, commanding them to be plentifully ſupplied at the public expence with all neceſſaries. The embaſſadors were three men of diſtinguiſhed merit, viz. Cornelius Dolabella, who was famous for the ſignal victory he had gained over the Senones, the virtuous Fabricius, and Æmilius Papus, who had been his collegue in the conſulate two years before. When they were admitted to an audience, the only thing they demanded was a ſurrender of the priſoners, either by way of exchange, or at ſuch a ranſom as ſhould be agreed on; for Pyrrhus in the late battle had made eighteen hundred priſoners, moſt of them Roman knights, and men of diſtinction in the republic. They had fought with great bravery, till their horſes, frightened with the roaring of the king's king's elephants, had either thrown them, or obliged them to diſmount; by which unforeſeen accident they had fallen into the enemy's hands. The ſenate therefore pitying the condition of thoſe brave men, had determined, contrary to their cuſtom, to redeem them. Pyrrhus was greatly ſurprized and diſappointed when he found that they had no other propoſals to make; but concealing his thoughts, he only anſwered, that he would conſider of it, and let them know his reſolution [y].

The Romans ſend an embaſſy to him to deſire an exchange of priſoners.

[x] Plut. & Flor. ibid. Zonar. l. viii. c. 4.

ACCORDINGLY he aſſembled his council; but his chief favourites were divided in their opinions. Milo, who commanded in the citadel of Tarentum, was for coming to no compoſition with the Romans; but Cyneas, who knew his maſter's inclination, propoſed not only ſending back the priſoners without ranſom, but diſpatching an embaſſy to Rome to treat with the ſenate of a laſting peace. His advice was approved, and he himſelf appointed to go on that embaſſy. After theſe reſolutions the king acquainted the embaſſadors that he intended to releaſe the priſoners without ranſom, ſince he had already riches enough, and deſired nothing of their republic but her friendſhip. Afterwards he had ſeveral private conferences with Fabricius, whoſe virtue he tried with mighty offers of riches and grandeur; but finding him proof againſt all temptations, he reſolved to try whether his intrepidity and courage were equal to his virtue. With this view he cauſed an elephant to be placed behind a curtain in the hall where he received the Roman embaſſador. As Fabricius had never ſeen one of thoſe beaſts, the king, taking a turn or two in the hall with him, brought him within the elephant's reach, and then cauſed the curtain to be drawn all on a ſudden, and that monſtrous animal to make his uſual noiſe, and even lay his trunk on Fabricius's head. But the intrepid Roman, without betraying the leaſt fear or concern, Does the great king, ſaid he, with ſurpriſing calmneſs, who could not ſtagger me with his offers, think to frighten me with the braying of a beaſt? Pyrrhus, aſtoniſhed at his immoveable conſtancy invited him to dine with him; and on this occaſion it was, that the converſation turning upon the Epicuræan philoſophy, Fabricius made that celebrated exclamation; "O that Pyrrhus, both for Rome's ſake and his own, had placed his happineſs in the boaſted indolence of Epicurus! [z].

Cyneas ſent to Rome to treat of a peace.

Pyrrhus's conference with Fabricius.

EVERY

[y] Dion. Hal. legat. [z] Dion. Halicar. ibid.

EVERY thing Pyrrhus heard or saw of the Romans encreased his earnestness for peace. He sent for the three embassadors, released two hundred of the prisoners without ransom, and suffered the rest, on their parole, to return to Rome to celebrate the Saturnalia, or feasts of Saturn, in their own families. Having by this obliging behaviour gained the good-will of the Roman embassadors, he sent the famous Cyneas to Rome almost at the same time that they left Tarentum. The instructions he gave this faithful minister were to bring the Romans to grant these three articles: 1. That the Tarentines should be included in the treaty made with the king of Epirus: 2. That all the Greek cities in Italy should be suffered to enjoy their laws and liberties: 3. That the republic should restore to the Samnites, Lucanians, and Brutians, all the places she had taken from them. Upon these conditions Pyrrhus declared himself ready to forbear all further hostilities, and conclude a lasting peace. With these instructions Cyneas set out for Rome, where partly by his eloquence, partly by rich presents to the senators and their wives, he soon gained a good number of voices. When he was admitted into the senate, he made an harangue worthy of a disciple of the great Demosthenes; after which he read the conditions Pyrrhus proposed, and with a great deal of eloquence endeavoured to shew the reasonableness and moderation of his master's demands, asking leave for Pyrrhus to come in person to Rome to conclude and sign the treaty. The senators were generally inclined to agree to Pyrrhus's terms; but nevertheless, as several senators were absent, the determination of the affair was postponed to the next day, when Appius Claudius, the greatest orator and most learned civilian in Rome, old and blind as he was, caused himself to be carried to the senate, where he had not appeared for many years; and there, what with his eloquence, what with his authority, so prepossessed the minds of the senators against the king of Epirus and the conditions he offered, that when he had done speaking, the conscript fathers unanimously passed a decree, the substance of which was, that the war with Pyrrhus should be continued; that his embassador should be sent back that very day; that the king of Epirus should not be permitted to come to Rome; and that they should acquaint his embassador, that Rome would enter into no treaty of peace with his master till he had left Italy [a].

Cynea's negotiations at Rome.

The Romans refuse to enter into a treaty with Pyrrhus till he has left Italy.

CYNEAS

[a] Plut. ibid. Ennius apud Cic. in Cat. Maj.

CYNEAS, ſurprized at the anſwer given him, left Rome the ſame day, and returned to Tarentum, to acquaint the king with the final reſolution of the ſenate. Pyrrhus on hearing it admired the conſtancy and intrepidity of a conquered people, who ſpoke the language of conquerors; and having aſked Cyneas his opinion of the ſenate, into which he had been introduced, that miniſter told him, that the ſenate ſeemed to him an aſſembly of kings, whoſe appearance filled the ſpectators with awe and reverence. This anſwer greatly encreaſed the eſteem Pyrrhus had for the Romans; he would have willingly concluded a peace with them upon any honourable terms; but as the conditions they offered were not by any means conſiſtent with the reputation of his arms, he began, without loſs of time, to make all due preparations for the next campaign. On the other hand, the Romans having raiſed to the conſulate P. Sulpicius Saverrio, and P. Decius Mus, diſpatched them both into Apulia, where they found Pyrrhus encamped near a little town called Aſculum. There the conſuls, joining their armies, fortified themſelves at the foot of the Apennines, having between them and the enemy a large deep ſtream which divided the plain. Both armies continued a great while on the oppoſite banks before either ventured to paſs it to attack the other. The Epirots being informed that the father and grandfather of the conſul Decius had, by devoting themſelves to the Dii Manes, gained victories when every thing threatened the total defeat of their troops, believed that the Decii tranſmitted from father to ſon ſome unaccountable art of necromancy, whereby they ſecured the victory to their party whenever they loſt their lives in the battle. This vain apprehenſion filled the Epirots with terror; and Pyrrhus, to deſtroy ſo dangerous a prepoſſeſſion, ſent a meſſenger to Decius, acquainting him, that if he attempted to devote himſelf, he ſhould find the Epirots upon their guard, and reſolved not to put him to death, but to take him alive, and that the moſt cruel puniſhments ſhould be inflicted upon him as an impoſtor after the battle. To this meſſage the conſuls returned the following anſwer; Pyrrhus is not ſo formidable an enemy as to reduce us to expedients, which we make uſe of only in the greateſt and inevitable dangers. To ſhew how little we fear him, we offer him his choice, either to paſs the river unmoleſted, or to ſuffer us to do ſo; we ſhall then try in the open field, and upon equal terms, which of us ſhall have need of employing extraordinary methods to gain the victory. The king could not in point of honour decline the challenge, and therefore chose to continue where he was, and let the Romans cross the stream; which they did accordingly, and drew up in the plain. On the other hand, Pyrrhus placed his men likewise in order of battle in the same plain; and all the antients do him the justice to say, that no commander ever understood better the art of drawing up an army, and directing its motions.

His meſſage to Decius the Roman conſul.

Both armies prepare for a general engagement.

In the right wing he placed his Epirots and the Samnites, in his left the Lucanians, Brutians, and Salentines, and his phalanx in the centre. The centre of the Roman army consisted of four legions, which were to engage the enemy's phalanx; on their wings were posted the light-armed auxiliaries and the Roman horse. The consuls in order to guard their troops against the fury of the elephants, had prepared chariots, armed with long points of iron in the shape of forks, and filled with soldiers carrying firebrands, which they were directed to throw at the elephants, and by that means frighten them and set their wooden towers on fire. These chariots were posted over-against the king's elephants, and ordered not to stir till they entered upon action. To this precaution the Roman generals added another, which was, to order a body of Apulian troops to attack Pyrrhus's camp in the heat of the engagement, in order to force it, or at least draw off part of the enemy's forces to defend it.

The battle of Asculum.

At length the attack began, both parties being pretty equal in number; for each of them consisted of about forty thousand men. The phalanx sustained for a long time the furious onset of the legions with incredible bravery; but at length being forced to give way, Pyrrhus commanded his elephants to advance, but not on the side where the Romans had posted their chariots; they marched round, and falling upon the Roman horse, soon put them into confusion. Then the phalanx, returning with fresh courage to the charge, made the Roman legions in their turn give ground. On this occasion Decius was killed, so that one consul only was left to command the two Roman armies. But while all things seemed to favour Pyrrhus, the body of Apulians, which we have mentioned above, falling unexpectedly on the camp of the Epirots, obliged the king to dispatch a strong detachment to defend his intrenchments. Upon the departure of these troops, some of the Epirots imagining that the camp was taken, began to lose courage, and retire; those who were next to them followed their example, and in a short time the whole army gave way. Pyrrhus, having

The Epirots give way.

attempted attempted ſeveral times in vain to rally his forces, returned to the charge with a ſmall number of his friends, and the moſt courageous of his officers. With theſe he ſuſtained the fury of the victorious legions, and covered the retreat of his own men. But, being after a moſt gallant behaviour dangerouſly wounded, he retired at laſt with his ſmall band in good order, leaving the Romans maſters of the field. As the ſun was near ſetting, and the Romans extremely fatigued, and a great number of them wounded, the conſul Sulpicius, not thinking it adviſeable to purſue the enemy, ſounded a retreat, repaſſed the ſtream, and brought his troops back to the camp (O). Sulpicius appeared in the field of battle the next day with a deſign to bring the Epirots to a ſecond engagement; but finding they had withdrawn in the Pyrrhus is dangerouſly wounded.

(O) Hiſtorians gives us very different accounts of the battle of Aſculum. Plutarch, who will have it to have been a double action, relates it thus: Pyrrhus, ſays he, was pent up in a place, where the cavalry could not be of any uſe; and could not bring up his elephants, the ground being very marſhy. In this diſadvantageous poſt many of his men were killed, and more wounded; ſo that night alone, which put an end to the battle, ſaved him from an entire defeat. The next day the king, to retrieve his reputation, took poſſeſſion of a more even ground, where he placed his elephants. Early in the morning, having ſeized thoſe narrow paſſes, which had proved fatal to his army the day before, he drew up his men in the plain, poſting a great number of archers and pikemen among his elephants. In this order he advanced towards the enemy, and charged the Roman troops with incredible fury. The legions fought a long time with great bravery; but at length, not being able to withſtand the elephants, betook themſelves to flight (103). On the other hand, Eutropius tells us, that the Romans gained a complete victory, that Pyrrhus loſt his elephants in the action, and was obliged, though wounded, to fly to Tarentum to avoid falling into the enemy's hands (104). But his account is contradicted by other hiſtorians. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, as quoted by Plutarch, ſays, that there was but one battle fought near the city of Aſculum; that the ſucceſs of this great action was doubtful; that Pyrrhus was wounded in the arm with a ſpear, and that his baggage was plundered by the Samnites. The ſame author makes Pyrrhus on this occaſion give that famous anſwer to one, who congratulated him on his victory, "Such another would undo me (105).

(103) Plut. ibid. Dion. Hal. l. iii.

(104) Eutrop. l. ii.

(105)

night to Tarentum, he likewiſe retired, and put his troops into winter quarters in Apulia[b].

BOTH armies continued quiet in their quarters during winter; but early in the ſpring took the field anew. The Romans were commanded this year by two men of great fame, whom they had raiſed to the conſulate the ſecond time; theſe were the celebrated C. Fabricius, and Q. Æmilius Papus, who no ſooner arrived in Apulia, than they marched their troops into the territories of Tarentum. Pyrrhus, who had received conſiderable reinforcements from Epirus, met them near the frontiers, and encamped at a ſmall diſtance from the Roman army. While the conſuls were waiting here for a favourable opportunity to give battle, a meſſenger from Nicias, the king's phyſician, delivered a letter to Fabricius, wherein the traitor offered to take off his maſter by poiſon, provided the conſul would promiſe him a reward proportionable to the greatneſs of the ſervice. The virtuous Roman, being filled with horror at the bare propoſal of ſuch a crime, immediately communicated the affair to his collegue, who readily joined with him in writing a letter to Pyrrhus, wherein they warned him without diſcovering the criminal, to take care of himſelf, and be upon his guard againſt the treacherous deſigns of thoſe about him. The letter was couched in the following terms: C. Fabricius, and Q. Æmilius conſuls, to king Pyrrhus, health. You are unhappy both in the choice of your friends and enemies. This letter will ſatisfy you, that the former are the worſt of men, and the latter perſons of honour and probity. You are betrayed, Pyrrhus, and the man, who ought to be moſt faithful to you, offers to poiſon you. We give you this information, not to curry favour with you, but fearing leſt we ſhould be expected of conſenting to an aſſaſſination, which we deteſt and abhor. We do not deſire to end the war by ſecret and wicked attempts, but openly, and with our ſwords[c]. Pyrrhus, out of a deep ſenſe of gratitude for ſo great a benefit, releaſed immediately without ranſom all the priſoners he had taken. But the Romans, diſdaining to accept either a favour from an enemy, or a recompence for not committing the blackeſt treachery, declared, that they would not receive their priſoners but by way of exchange; and accordingly

The king's phyſician offers to poiſon his maſter.

The conſuls letter to the king on this occaſion.

[b] Plut. Dion. Hal. Flor. Juſtin. ibid.

[c] Plut. ibid. & auth. de vir. illuſt. Gellius noct. Attic. Senec. epiſt. 120. Eutrop. l. ii.

cordingly ſent to Pyrrhus an equal number of Samnite and Tarentine priſoners [d].

As the king of Epirus grew every day more weary of a war, which he feared would end in his diſgrace, he ſent Cyneas a ſecond time to Rome to try whether he could with his artful harangues prevail upon the conſcript fathers, to hearken to an accommodation, upon ſuch terms as were conſiſtent with his honour. But the embaſſador found the ſenators ſteady in their former reſolution, and determined not to enter into any treaty with his maſter till he had left Italy, and withdrawn from thence all his forces. This gave the king great uneaſineſs; for he had already loſt moſt of his veteran troops and beſt officers, and was ſenſible that he ſhould loſe the reſt, if he ventured another engagement. While he was revolving theſe melancholy thoughts in his mind, embaſſadors arrived at his camp from the Syracuſians, Agrigentines and Leontines, imploring the aſſiſtance of his arms to drive out the Carthaginians, and put an end to the troubles which threatened their reſpective ſtates with utter deſtruction. Pyrrhus, who wanted only ſome honourable pretence to leave Italy, laid hold of this, and, appointing Milo governor of Tarentum, with a ſtrong garriſon to keep the inhabitants in awe during his abſence, ſet ſail for Sicily with thirty thouſand foot and two thouſand five hundred horſe, on board a fleet of two hundred ſhips. We have elſewhere related at length the great ſucceſs that attended him at firſt in Sicily [e]; but the face of his affairs ſoon changed there likewiſe. The Sicilians, diſguſted at the reſolution he had taken of paſſing over into Africa, and much more at the enormous exactions and extortions of his miniſters and courtiers, had ſubmitted partly to the Carthaginians, and partly to the Mamertines. When Carthage heard of this change, new troops were raiſed all over Africa, and a numerous army ſent into Sicily to recover the cities which Pyrrhus had taken. As the Sicilians daily deſerted from him in crouds, he was no ways in a condition with his Epirots alone to withſtand ſo powerful an enemy; and therefore when deputies came to him from the Tarentines, Samnites, Brutians, and Lucanians, repreſenting, to him the loſſes they had ſuſtained ſince his departure, and demonſtrating, that without his aſſiſtance they muſt fall a ſacrifice to the Romans, he laid hold of that opportunity to abandon the iſland and return to Italy. His fleet was attacked by that Cyneas ſent a ſecond time to Rome.

Pyrrhus ſets ſail for Sicily.

Returns to Italy.

[d] Plut. ibid. & Eutrop. l. ii. [e] Vide vol. vii. p. 315, 316, 317.

of Carthage, and his army after their landing by the Mamertines, as we have related in the hiſtory of Syracuſe [f]. But Pyrrhus having by his heroic bravery eſcaped all danger, marched along the ſea-ſhore in order to reach Tarentum that way. As he paſſed through the country of the Locrians, who had not long before maſſacred the troops he had left there, he not only exerciſed all ſorts of cruelty on the inhabitants, but plundered the temple of Proſerpine to ſupply the wants of his army. The immenſe riches which he found there were by his orders ſent to Tarentum by ſea; but the ſhips that carried them, being daſhed againſt the rocks by a tempeſt, and the mariners all loſt, this proud prince being convinced, ſays Livy [g], that the gods were not imaginary beings, cauſed all the treaſure, which the ſea had thrown upon the ſhore, to be carefully gathered up, and replaced in the temple; nay, to appeaſe the wrath of the angry goddeſs, he put all thoſe to death who had adviſed him to plunder her temple. However, ſuperſtition made the antients aſcribe to this act of impiety all the misfortunes which afterwards befel that unhappy prince.

Arrives at Tarentum.

PYRRHUS at length arrived at Tarentum; but of the army he had carried into Sicily, be brought back into Italy only three thouſand horſe and not quite twenty thouſand foot, a ſmall body indeed to cope with two conſular armies. He therefore reinforced them with the beſt troops he could raiſe in the countries of the Samnites, Lucanians, and Brutians; and hearing that the two new conſuls, Curius Dentatus and Cornelius Lentulus, had divided their forces, the one invading Lucania, and the other Samnium; he likewiſe divided his army into two bodies, marching with the choice of his Epirots againſt Dentatus in hopes of ſurprizing him in his camp near Beneventum. But the conſul having notice of his approach, went out of his intrenchments with a ſtrong detachment of legionaries to meet him, Attacks Curius Dentatus near Beventum.

repulſed his van-guard, put many of the Epirots to the ſword, and took ſome of their elephants. Curius, encouraged with this firſt ſucceſs, marched his army into the Taurafian fields, and drew it up in a plain, which was wide enough for his troops, but too narrow for the Epirot phalanx, the phalangites being ſo crowded, that they could not handle their arms without difficulty; but the king's eagerneſs to try his ſtrength and ſkill with ſo renowned a commander, made him engage at ſo great a diſadvantage. Upon the [f] vol. vii. p. 319.

[g] Liv. l. xxix. c. 18.

the first signal the action began, and one of the king's wings giving way, the victory seemed to incline to the Romans. But that wing where the king fought in person, repulsed the enemy, and drove them back quite to their intrenchments. This advantage was in great part owing to the elephants, which Curius perceiving, commanded a corps-de-reserve, which he had posted near the camp, to advance, and fall upon the elephants. These carrying burning torches in one hand, and swords in the other, threw the former at the elephants, and with the latter defended themselves against their guides, by which means they were both forced to give way. The elephants being put to flight, broke into the phalank, close as it was, and there caused a general disorder, which was encreased by a remarkable accident: For it is said, that a young elephant being wounded, and thereupon making a dreadful noise, the mother quitting her rank; and hastening to the assistance of her young one, put those, who still kept their ranks, into the utmost confusion. But however that be, it is certain, that the Romans obtained at last a complete victory [h]. Orosius [i] and Eutropius [k] tell us, that Pyrrhus's army consisted of fourscore thousand foot and six thousand horse, including his Epirots and allies, whereas the consular army was scarce twenty thousand men strong. Those who exaggerate the king's loss say, that the number of the slain on his side amounted to thirty thousand men; but others reduce it to twenty thousand. All writers agree, that Curius took twelve hundred prisoners and eight elephants. This victory, which was the most decisive Rome had ever gained, brought all Italy under subjection, and paved the way for those vast conquests, which afterwards made the Romans masters of the whole known world.

But is utterly defeated.

PYRRHUS being no ways in a condition, after the great loss he had sustained, to keep the field, retired to Tarentum, being attended only by a small body of horse, leaving the Romans in possession of his camp, which they so much admired, that they made it ever after a model to form theirs by. And now the king of Epirus resolved to leave Italy as soon as possible, but concealed his design, and endeavoured to keep up the drooping spirits of his allies, by giving them hopes of speedy succours from Greece.

He retires to Tarentum

[h] Plut. in Pyrrh. Pausan. l. i. p. 22. Justin. l. xxiii. c. 3. Liv. l. xxix. c. 18. Dion. Hal. in excerpt p. 542.
[i] Oros. l. iv.
[k] Eutrop. l. ii.

Accordingly he dispatched embassadors into Ætolia, Illyricum, and Macedon, demanding supplies of men and money. But the answers from those courts not proving favourable, he forged such as might please those whom he was willing to deceive, and by this means supported the courage of his friends, and kept his enemy in play. When he could conceal his departure no longer, he pretended to be on a sudden in a great passion at the dilatoriness of his friends in sending him succours, and acquainted the Tarentines that he must go and bring them over himself. However, he left behind him a strong garrison in the citadel of Tarentum under the command of the same Milo, who had kept it for him during his stay in Sicily. In order to keep this governor in his duty, he is said to have made him a very strange present, viz. a chair covered with the skin of Nicias, the treacherous physician, who had offered Fabricius to poison his master [l]. After all these disguises and precautions Pyrrhus at last set sail for Epirus, and arrived safe at Acroceraunium with eight thousand foot and five hundred horse, after having spent, to no purpose, six years in Italy and Sicily [m].

And from thence into his own dominions.

On his return he found his treasures exhausted, and his people discouraged. To retrieve therefore his reputation, and make his troops some amends for the hardships they had suffered in Italy, he resolved to invade Macedon, where Antigonus Gonatus, who had refused to send him any succours, then reigned; and being reinforced with some companies of Gauls, he ravaged the country, took many cities, overthrew Antigonus in a pitched battle; and notwithstanding that prince had a great many Gauls in his pay, Pyrrhus drove him from place to place, and at length made himself master of the whole kingdom of Macedon. After the victory which he gained over Antigonus, he hung up the spoils of the Gauls in the temple of Pallas of Itonia, a small city between Phera and Larissa, with the following inscription; Pyrrhus, king of the Molossians, consecrates to the Itonian Minerva these bucklers of the fierce Gauls, after having defeated the whole army of Antigonus. The descendents of Æacus are still the same, brave and valiant [n]. Pyrrhus having taken Ægæ, the royal seat of the late kings of Macedon, treated the inhabitants with great severity, and Makes himself master of all Macedon.

on

[l] Zonar. l. viii. c. 7. Pausan. in Attic. d. 11. p. 12.

[m] Plut. ibid. Justin. l. xxv. c. 3.

[n] Plut. ibid. & Pausan. in Attic. p on his leaving the place, garrisoned it with part of his Gauls, who being told that rich treasures were concealed in the tombs of the kings who were buried there, opened them, and after having carried away the wealth they found in them, threw the bones of the princes, whose remains were deposited there, about the streets, and sacrilegiously trampled them under foot. Pyrrhus dissembled his knowledge of this infamous action, being unwilling to alienate the minds of those barbarians by inflicting on them the punishment they well deserved; and this shameful connivance raised a general disaffection among the Macedonians, who had abandoned Antigonus to side with him.

ANTIGONUS after his defeat had retired into Thessalonica with the remains of his shattered army, intending to wait there for a favourable opportunity of recovering his kingdom. But Ptolemy the son of Pyrrhus, a prince who almost equalled his father in bravery, though at that time but twenty-two years of age, pursued the unhappy Antigonus to his retreat, put to the sword the few troops he had with him, made himself master of Thessalonica, and reduced the king of Macedon to such streights that he had no place to retire to in his misfortunes but the forests [o].

His expedition into Peloponnesus.

IT was natural for Pyrrhus after these conquests, which had both enriched and encreased his army, to return to the assistance of the Tarentines and his allies in Italy. But his inconstancy, or rather the fear he was in of the Romans, made him take another course. New enemies, and new hopes, drew him into Peloponnesus, whither he took with him his two sons, Ptolemy and Helenus, instead of leaving at least one of them in Macedon to keep that country in awe, and watch the motions of Antigonus. He had been invited thither by Cleonymus king of Sparta, who being driven from his capital by Areus his ambitious nephew, and by the intrigues of his wife Chelidonis, had recourse to Pyrrhus, whose victories had made him famous all over Greece. The king, who was ever passing from one enterprize to another, readily complied with the request of Cleonymus, and, taking with him five and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and twelve elephants, entered Peloponnesus, not so much with a design to re-establish Cleonymus, as to make himself master of all Greece. But the obstinate resistance he met with at at Lacedæmon, not only from the men, but alſo from the women, who on that occaſion behaved like true heroines, obliged him to drop this enterprize, as we have related at length in the hiſtory of the Lacedæmonians [p]. He had ſcarce reſolved with himſelf to retire from before Lacedæmon, when a new project made him haſten his departure, in order to try his fortune in another quarter.

[o] Justin. l. xxv. c. 3. Plut. ibid. Diodor. Sicul. l. xxii. in excerpt. Valesii, p. 266.

His expedition againſt the city of Argos.

ARISTIPPUS and Ariſtias, two of the principal citizens of Argos, having excited a great ſedition in that city, the former, to make good his party againſt his rival, had drawn Antigonus into his intereſt, which was enough for the latter to call Pyrrhus to his aſſiſtance. The king was overjoyed at the arrival of an expreſs from Ariſtias, inviting him to engage in a new war; and deſpiſing Antigonus, who had already recovered great part of Macedon, he drew off from Lacedæmon, and haſtened to Argos. But Areus having timely notice of his departure, concealed his troops in the moſt difficult paſſes, and having ſuffered the advanced guard of the Epirot army, commanded by Pyrrhus, to march by, fell unexpectedly on the rear, and cut off a great number of the Gauls and Moloſſians, who compoſed it. Hereupon Pyrrhus detached his ſon Ptolemy to their relief; but the young prince, ſuffering himſelf to be hurried on by his too great courage, was killed in the engagement by one Oraſus a Cretan. The king being informed of his ſon's death, which affected him in a very ſenſible manner, ſuddenly faced about, and falling upon the Lacedæmonian cavalry, who under the command of Evalcus, an officer of great reputation, had imprudently advanced into the plain, made a great havock of thoſe troops. He was always dreadful in battles, but on this occaſion, when grief and the deſire of revenge inflamed his natural ardor, he even ſurpaſſed himſelf. He ſingled out Evalcus in the throng, and breaking through the troops that ſurrounded him, killed him on the ſpot at the firſt blow. The death of ſo brave a man diſheartened the Lacedæmonians, who now began to give ground. On the other hand the Epirots, being animated by the example of their king purſued the advantage with ſuch ardour, that the enemy was put into the utmoſt confuſion, and at length obliged to ſave themſelves by a diſorderly flight, after having loſt the greateſt part of their cavalry. After this victory, when the dead body of his ſon was brought to him, he expreſſed the deepeſt concern; but at the ſame time ſeemed to blame him on account of his too great boldneſs, ſaying, I am not at all ſurprized that my ſon has

His ſon Ptolemy killed.

Pyrrhus revenges his death.

[p] See vol. vi. p. 513, 514, &c.

has loſt his life; I did not expect he would have lived ſo long. Pyrrhus, having thus revenged the death of Ptolemy with ſtreams of Lacedæmonian blood, purſued his march to Argos, and arriving before that city, encamped in an advantageous ſituation at a ſmall diſtance from Antigonus, who had got there before him. The very next morning he ſent a herald to Antigonus, challenging him to a ſingle combat; but that prince returned him the following anſwer; If Pyrrhus is tired of his life, he may find ways enough to put an end to it. The inhabitants of Argos ſeeing two foreign kings ready to engage at their gates, and not doubting but the conqueror would ſeize on their city, and from a free people reduce them to a ſtate of ſlavery, ſent embaſſadors to both princes, entreating them to withdraw their forces, and ſuffer the citizens to compoſe their differences by themſelvs. Antigonus readily conſented to this propoſal, and, to convince them that he had no deſign upon their city, delivered up his ſon to them as an hoſtage. Pyrrhus likewiſe promiſed to retire; but as he offered no ſecurity for the performance of his promiſe, the Argians began to ſuſpect him of inſincerity. And indeed not without reaſon, the factious Ariſtias having agreed to open one of the gates to him that very night, and put him in poſſeſſion of the city. The traitor kept his word, opening the gate in the dead of the night, and conveying a body of Pyrrhus's Gauls into the market-place, which was in the centre of the city, without being diſcovered by any of Ariſtippus's party. But Pyrrhus, not thinking that body ſufficient to make head againſt the citizens, ordered his elephants to advance with a deſign to draw them up likewiſe in the market-place. But it unfortunately happened, that the gate, which was delivered up to Pyrrhus, was not high enough for the elephants to paſs with their towers on their backs; ſo that it was neceſſary to take them off, and replace them, after they had entered the city. As this could not be effected in the dark without ſome noiſe, the Argians hearing it, ran to arms, and finding the enemy poſted in the centre of the city, fled to the fortreſs, and from thence ſent meſſengers to Antigonus, preſſing him to advance without loſs of time to their aſſiſtance. He immediately marched up to the walls, and ordered his ſon Alcioneus to enter the city at the head of his beſt troops. In this critical juncture Areus king of Lacedæmon arrived likewiſe at Argos, with a thouſand Lacedæmonians and the ſame number of Cretans; and joining the Macedonians, charged the Gauls with the utmoſt fury, and threw them into diſorder. Pyrrhus haſtened to their Attempts to make himſelf maſter of Argos.

Enters Argos.

their relief with a body of Moloſſians but the darkneſs and confuſion were ſo great, that he could neither be heard nor obeyed. The fight laſted all night, and at break of day the ſtreets appeared covered with dead bodies, and ſtreaming with blood, the Macedonians, Argians, Cretans, Epirots, Gauls, and Lacedæmonians, having fought all pell-mell in the dark, without diſtinguiſhing their friends from their foes. Pyrrhus was not a little ſurprized to ſee the city filled with the enemy's troops; and imagining all was loſt, thought of nothing but a timely retreat. As he was under ſome apprehenſion with reſpect to the gates of the city, which were too narrow, he ſent orders to his ſon Helenus, whom he had left without with the main body of the army, to make a large breach in the wall, and be ready to cover his retreat, in caſe he ſhould be overpowered by the enemy. But the perſon he ſent to his ſon, miſunderſtanding his orders, delivered a quite contrary meſſage; in conſequence of which Helenus, inſtead of making a breach in the wall, drew out the flower of his troops, and attempted to get in at the gate in order to aſſiſt his father. But the paſſage being ſtopt up by an elephant of an enormous ſize, and the Argians crowding about the gate to prevent Helenus from entering it, a ſharp engagement enſued, in which great numbers were killed on both ſides. At length Helenus, fearing leaſt his father might be in danger, forced his paſſage through the thickeſt of the enemy's ranks, and made way for the reſt of his forces to follow him. But he had ſcarce got in, when he met his father ſurrounded by the enemy on all ſides, and fighting his way through them in order to retire by the ſame gate out of the city, which he could no longer hold, moſt of his men being either killed or wounded. The troops which Helenus led, were ſo thronged under the gate, that they wounded one another with their arms, aud ſo obſtructed the paſſage, that it was impoſſible for Pyrrhus to get through them. He often cried aloud to them to retire, and clear the way; but his voice not being heard in that noiſe and confuſion, they ſtill continued to advance preſſing upon one another, and putting the few troops that were with the king in great diſorder. Hereupon Pyrrhus pulling off his diadem, to prevent his being known faced about, and charged the enemy with the utmoſt fury. While he was thus fighting in the croud, and making a great ſlaughter of the enemy, a common ſoldier of Argos attacked and wounded him with his javelin. Hereupon the king, inflame

Attempts to retire.

But is ſurrounded on all ſides.

a

at the ſight of his blood, flew at the aggreſſor with a rage not to be expreſſed, and was ready to make him pay dear for his boldnſes; but the mother of the Argian, who with other women beheld the combat from the top of a houſe, being alarmed at the imminent danger of her ſon, threw down a tile, the firſt thing ſhe laid hold of, upon Pyrrhus, which falling upon his head, gave him ſuch a blow, that he ſtaggered a while, and fell ſenſeleſs to the ground; which one Zopyrus a Macedonian obſerving, and knowing who he was, dragged him into a porch, and there with a trembling hand cut off his head, and carried it to Alcioneus, who rid full ſpeed with it to his father Antigonus, and threw it down at his feet. But that prince reflecting on the inſtability of human affairs and viciſſitude of fortune, ſeverely rebuked his ſon for thus inſulting over the remains of ſo great a man; and taking up the head covered it with his own garment, and cauſed it to be honourably interred [q]. And killed. Year after the flood 2728. Year before Chriſt 271.

His Character.

SUCH was the end of Pyrrhus, a prince to whom the title of a great captain is juſtly due, ſince he was ſo highly eſteemed by the Romans themſelves, and by a perſon the moſt worthy to be credited with relation to the merit of a warrior, and the beſt qualified to form a right judgment in that particular. For Livy tells us [r], that Hannibal, when aſked by Scipio, who in his opinion were the greateſt generals in the world, named Alexander in the firſt place, Pyrrhus in the ſecond, and himſelf in the third (P). All the [q] Plut. ibid. Val. Max. l. v. c, 1. Pauſan. in Attic. p. 12. Juſtin. l. xxv. c. 4.

[r] Liv. l. xxxv. c. 14.

(P) Plutarch in his life of Pyrrhus relates this matter in a different way; his words are, "Hannibal ſaid, that of all the great "commanders in the world, Pyrrhus was the firſt both for expe- "rience and capacity; the ſecond place he gave to Scipio; and "reſerved the third for himſelf, as we have obſerved in the life of "Scipio." We do not diſpute what Plutarch may have ſaid in the laſt-mentioned work, which has not reached our times; but only obſerve, that in the life of Flaminius he relates the opinion of Hannibal otherwiſe than he does in the life of Pyrrhus. "This "general, (ſays he, in the life of Flaminius) and Scipio Africa- "nus had an interview at Epheſus, and the converſation turning "on this queſtion, Who were the greateſt generals? Han- "nibal named Alexander in the firſt place, Pyrrhus in the ſecond, "and himſelf in the third." Scipio is here excluded, whereas he is the ſecond in the life of Pyrrhus, where no mention is made of Alexander. Livy likewiſe gives us an account of this confe-

the antients tell us, that no general underſtood the art of war better than the king of Epirus, who learnt them by principles and rules, as well as by uſe and experience, and is ſaid to have wrote ſeveral volumes on encampments and the different ways of drawing up an army. Theſe books are mentioned by Tully [s]; and Donatus tells us, that Pyrrhus invented a ſort of game, like that of chefs, to repreſent the different ways of making attacks and drawing up armies in battalia [t]. Livy gives us the ſame account of Pyrrhus, or rather makes Hannibal ſay as much of him; he was, ſays that general, the firſt, who perfectly underſtood how to encamp, chuſe his ground, and poſt his men to advantage [u]. He is generally repreſented by the antient hiſtorians as a prince of an uncommon underſtanding, and of great ſagacity and penetration. It is therefore ſurprizing, that Tully ſhould take him to be included in the famous verſes of Ennius, wherein that poet ſays, that the whole race of the Æacidæ were naturally ſtupid, and remarkable for nothing but their martial courage [w] (Q.) Pyrrhus had, beſides his military talents, many other commendable qualities, viz. a great deal of good nature, much compaſſion for the unhappy, and no leſs gratitude for thoſe who had obliged conference, and exactly agrees with Plutarch iu the life of Flaminius (106). For according to him Hannibal gave the firſt place to Alexander, the ſecond to Pyrrhus, and the third to himſelf; whereupon Scipio ſeeing himſelf excluded, ſaid with a ſmile, "And what place would you claim, if you had overcome me? "HadI overcome you,replied Hannibal,I ſhould look upon myſelf "as ſuperior both to Alexander and to Pyrrhus"; which was implicitly owning, that Scipio had not his equal, and therefore was not to be brought into competition with other generals. The fathers Catrou and Rouillé, diſagreeing in this place with the antients, tell us, that Hannibal named Alexander in the firſt place, Pyrrhus in the ſecond, Scipio in the third, and himſelf in the laſt (107). It is an unpardonable fault in a writer to paſs his own conjectures upon the readers for matter of fact.

[s] Cic. l. ix. epiſt. 25. [t] Donat. in comment. Eunuch. Trenet. [u] Liv. ibid. [w] Cic. de divin. l. ii.

(Q) The verſes are.

Semper fuit ſtolidum genus Æacidarum,
Bellipotentes magis quam ſapientipotentes.

(106) Liv. l. xxxv. (107) Vide hiſt. Roman. ad ann. urb. 474.

obliged him. When Æropus, one of his chief favourites, who had done him conſiderable ſervice, died, he wept, and was heard to ſay, "It is not his death that moſt afflicts me; "he has paid the debt he owes to nature. My concern is, "that I ſo long delayed making him a ſuitable return for "his ſervices, and by that means I am deprived of the plea- "ſure of ſhewing my gratitude [x]." Cicero commends him even on account of his probity: two great generals, ſays that writer, diſputed the empire of Italy with the Romans, Pyrrhus and Hannibal; the probity of the former is ſtill remembered, and ſpoke of with reſpect in Rome; but the cruelty of the latter has rendered his name and memory odious to this city [y]. His only faults were ambition and inconſtancy; the former did not ſo much proceed from an avaricious deſire of enriching himſelf and poſſeſſing vaſt dominions, as from a love of glory; he had propoſed Alexander the Great to himſelf for a model, and in all his enterprizes had no other view, but to equal and even ſurpaſs that conqueror. His inconſtancy indeed was very remarkable, as is plain from what we have already ſaid of him. He had ſcarce tried one enemy, when he was for engaging another; ſcarce undertaken one enterprize, when he was for entering upon another; ſo that his whole life was a continued ſeries of new projects ſucceeding one another. When he had once conquered a country, he neglected all proper meaſures for the preſerving of it, how dear ſoever the conqueſt might have coſt him. Hence Antigonus uſed to compare him, as Plutarch informs us [z], to a lucky gameſter, who did not know how to make a good uſe of his fortune, but laviſhly ſpent whatever he got by gaming. Some authors find fault with him, and indeed not without a great deal of reaſon, for expoſing his perſon in all his battles, without the leaſt precaution, like a common ſoldier. A good commander, ſay they, ought to pique himſelf upon the wiſdom and prudence of his conduct, and not upon any action, which only diſplays ſtrength and intrepidity. A commander who brags of his courage, and raſhly expoſes himſelf to danger, confounds his own merit and function with thoſe of a private ſoldier. It is not the duty of a general to fight in the foremoſt ranks, but to be vigilant for the common ſafety of the army. Such were the ſentiments of the antients; but moſt of the generals and kings, who flouriſhed in the age we are now writing of, made no distinction between the duty of an officer and a soldier, being led astray by the fortunate temerity of Alexander, whom they pretended to imitate.

[x] Plut. in Pyrrh. [y] Cic. de Amicit. [z] Plut. ibid.

All the Epirots in Argos surrender at discretion.

But to return to the Epirots in Argos; they no sooner heard of the death of their king, but they threw down their arms, and surrendered at discretion. But Antigonus treated them with great humanity, and generously sent them back to Epirus, together with Helenus, the king's son, who was also taken prisoner, delivering to him the body of his unfortunate father inclosed in a golden urn [a]. When news of Pyrrhus's death was brought to Tarentum, the inhabitants sent embassadors to Carthage, imploring the assistance of that republic both against the Romans and Milo, who still held the citadel with a strong garrison of Epirots. The Carthaginians, desirous to get footing on the coast of Italy, sent immediately a powerful fleet to the assistance of the Tarentines, pretending, that they had no other view but to drive the Epirots out of the citadel. While the Carthaginians besieged the city by sea, the Romans under the conduct of Papirius Curso attacked it by land; so that Milo, being enclosed on all sides without any hopes of relief, sent a deputation to the Roman camp, offering to surrender the citadel to Papirius, on condition that he would suffer him and his men to retire to Epirus with all their baggage and effects. The consul, to frustrate the designs of the Carthaginians, willingly granted him all he asked. Whereupon the citadel was by Milo delivered up to the Romans, as was also the city soon after by the inhabitants, who gave up their arms, their ships, and themselves, into the consul's hands, and thus put an end to their war with Rome [b].

Tarentum delivered up to the Romans. Year of the flood 2727. Year before Christ 272.

Alexander II.

Pyrrhus was succeeded in the kingdom of Epirus by his son Alexander, who soon after his accession to the throne invaded Macedon, and there committed great depredations, while Antigonus Gonatus lay with his army before Athens. Hereupon the king of Macedon hastened with all his forces to the defence of his own dominions. But the Macedonians deserting him, when he least expected it, and joining the enemy, he was by Alexander stript of his kingdom, and obliged to seek for shelter in Greece. Upon his retreat his son Demetrius who was then very young, having drawn together a body of troops, engaged Alexander, defeated him in [a] Plut. ibid. Val. Max. l. v. c. 1. Oros. l. iv. c. 3. Frontin. Strateg. l. iii.

[b] Zonar. ex Dion.

in a pitched battle, and drove him not only out of Macedon, but alſo out of Epirus, his hereditary kingdom. Alexander, being thus in his turn expelled his dominions, fled to the Acarnanians, and having raiſed among them freſh forces returned into Epirus, where he was joined by ſuch numbers of his own ſubjects, that Demetrius thought it adviſeable to quit that kingdom, and withdraw into Macedon [c]. He afterwards engaged in a war with the Illyrians, and having gained over them a complete victory, paſſed the remainder of his reign in peace and tranquillity, without moleſting his neighbours, or being moleſted by them [d]. He is celebrated by Ælian as a great commander, and ſaid to have wrote a book on the method of drawing up an army [e]. Athenæus [f] tells us, that in this king's reign a certain kind of beans bloſſomed in a lake of Epirus, and for two years together brought their fruit to perfection; which ſeeming very ſtrange to Alexander, he placed a guard upon them with orders to let no one gather them, or even approach the lake. He no ſooner took this precaution, but the ſtalks of the beans withered, and the lake ſuddenly grew dry (R). Alexander left by his ſiſter Olympias, whom he

[c] Juſtin. l. xxvi. c 3. Pauſan. in Attic. [d] Frontin. Strateg. Val. Max. l. v. c. 1. [e] Ælian. var. hiſt. l. ii. [f] Athen. l. iii.

(R) The fathers Catrou and Rouillé, in their hiſtory of Rome (108), tell us, that he was perhaps murdered by the Locrenſes, with the Epirot garriſon, which Pyrrhus left at Locris, when he ſet out on his expedition into Sicily. For we don't ſee him appear, ſay they, with his brothers in the laſt adventures of the king their father. He does not appear, 'tis true, in the laſt adventures of his father; but had the good fathers remembered what they muſt have read in Plutarch's life of Pyrrhus, they would have inferred from thence, that he had been ſent back into Epirus; for he was there when his father was killed, as is manifeſt from the abovementioned writer, who tells us, that Antigonus delivered to Helenus the body of his father incloſed in a golden urn, deſiring him to carry it into Epirus to his brother Alexander. The ſame prince is mentioned as ſucceeding his father in the kingdom of Epirus, by Juſtin, Pauſanias, Frontinus, Valerius Maximus, and Athenæus, who give us a particular account of his wars with Antigonus Gonatus, with his ſon Demetrius, and alſo with the Illyrians.

(108) Ad. ann. urb. 477.

Ptolemy. he had married, a son and a daughter. His daughter, by name Phthia, married Demetrius II. king of Macedon. His son, named Ptolemy, succeeded him in the kingdom under the tuition of his mother Olympias, he being very young at his father's death. He was a prince of great expectation, but died when he was scarce out of his minority, as he was leading his army against the Ætolians, who had seized that part of Acarnania which belonged to Pyrrhus III the crown of Epirus [g]. He left one son, by name Pyrrhus, who, after a short reign under the guardianship of his grandmother Olympias, was treacherously murdered by the Ambracians, leaving behind him one daughter called by Justin, Laudamia, by Pausanias, Athenæus, and Polyænus, Deidamia. This princess succeeded her father; but the Epirots, disdaining to live under the government of a woman, suborned Nestor, one of her guards, to murder her; but the assassin's heart failing in the attempt, the unhappy Deidamia fled for refuge to the temple of Diana, where she was barbarously assassinated by one Milo, who being sentenced to death for the murder of his own mother Philotera, redeemed himself from the punishment due to his wickedness by murdering his sovereign [g]. But he did not long enjoy the fruit of his crime; for being seized with madness, he laid violent hands on himself twelve days after the death of Deidamia. As for the Epirots, they were severely punished by heaven, first with a dreadful famine, and afterwards with domestic troubles, foreign wars, and many other calamities, which reduced their country to the last extremity. This is the account we read in Polyænus [h]: but Pausanias tells us, that Deidamia, after a short and peaceable reign, died quietly in her bed, leaving the Epirots, as she had no issue, free to chuse what sort of government they liked best [i]. But however that be, it is certain, (for in this the antients are unanimous) that in this princess ended the family of the Pyrrhidæ, or the descendents of Pyrrhus Neoptolemus, and that upon her death the Epirots formed themselves into a republic, which was governed by annual magistrates, or prætors, chosen in the general assembly of the whole nation. Of this republic we have already given a distinct account in our history of Greece from the time it was at first formed, till it was reduced [g] Justin. l. xxviii. c. 3. Pausan. ibid.

[g] Justin. ibid. Polyæn. l. iii. Ovid. in Ibin. [h] Polyæn. ibid. [i] Pausan. in Messeniac duced by the Romans to a province [k]. We ſhall only obſerve here, that the Macedonians on one ſide, and the Illyrians on the other, taking advantage of the inteſtine diviſions, which, generally ſpeaking, attend a popular government, ſeized on ſeveral provinces belonging to the Epirots, and annexed them to their reſpective crowns; and hence it is, that though the kingdom of Epirus made a conſiderable figure, the republic ſcarce made any. Ariſtotle, as Stephanus informs us, wrote a particular book on the polity of the Epirots, whence we may infer, that they were governed by excellent laws; but as that work has not reached our times, we can give no account of them. Plutarch tells us, that the Epirots enjoyed a kind of liberty, and indeed the beſt ſort of liberty, under their kings; for, according to him, a general aſſembly of the people was yearly convened at Paſſaron, a city in the province of Moloſſis, where the king bound himſelf by a ſolemn oath to govern agreeable to the laws, and the people to obey and ſupport him as long as he did ſo. Their form of government was, it ſeems, of the ſame nature with ours, and therefore far preferable to any other. But it is now time to diſmiſs this ſubject, and paſs to the hiſtory of other kingdoms.

[k] See vol. vii. book 1. chap. 20. ſect. 3. near the end.

CHAP. IX.

The hiſtory of Bithynia.

Names, ſituation, &c.

THIS country, antiently known by the names of Myſia, Mygdonia, Bebrycia, Mariandynia, and Bithynia, was bounded on the weſt by Boſphorus Thracius, and part of the Propontis; on the ſouth by the river Rhyndacus and mount Olympus; on the north by the euxine ſea; and on the eaſt by the river Parthenius [l]. Ptolemy extends the confines of Bithynia on this ſide to Citorum on the coaſt, and to Juliopolis in the in land country, comprehending under the name of Bithynia ſome provinces belonging, according to other geographers, to Galatia and Paphlagonia.

Cities.

THE chief cities of Bithynia on the coaſt were, Myrlea on the Propontis, not far from the mouth of the Rhyndacus. This city was ſo called from Myrlus of Colophon its founder, as Stephanus informs us, or, as others will have it, from Myrlea, a celebrated Amazon, who either founded or embelliſhed it. It was demoliſhed by Philip of Macedon the father of Perſeus, and rebuilt by Pruſias king of Bithynia, who from his wife called it Apamea [m]. It was afterwards honoured with the title of a Roman colony, many Romans, who had ſerved in Aſia, having ſettled there, as Strabo and Pliny [n] inform us: but the latter was certainly miſtaken, when he placed this among the inland cities. Daſcylos, at a ſmall diſtance from the Rhyndacus. Cius, built by the Mileſians

[l] Plin. l. v. c. 32. [m] Strabo. l. xii. p. 388. [n] Strab. & Plin. ibid.

leſians on a river of the ſame name, deſtroyed by Philip the father of Perſeus, and rebuilt by Pruſias, whoſe name it bore ever after [o]. Nicomedia, the metropolis of Bithynia, ſo called from Nicomedes, the ſon of Zipœtes, its founder [p]. Strabo ſeems to doubt by which of the Bithynian kings it was founded [q]. All the antients ſpeak of it as a place of great note. Pliny calls it a plain and beautiful city [r]; Ammianus Marcellinus, the mother of all the cities of Bithynia [s]; Pauſanias the greateſt and firſt city of Bithynia [t]; Libanus compares it to Rome, Byzantium, Alexandria, and Antioch, at that time the four greateſt cities in the world; and ſays, that though it was perhaps inferior to them in bigneſs, it equalled them all in beauty. This author lived in the time of the emperor Julian the Apoſtate. Pauſanias, Marcellinus [u], and Trebellius Pollio [w] tell us, that this city was formerly called Aſtacus. Stephanus will have its antient name to have been Olbia. But Nicomedia, Aſtacus, and Olbia, are ſpoke of by Ptolemy as three neighbouring, but diſtinct cities. Strabo writes, that Nicomedes deſtroyed Aſtacus, and tranferred its inhabitants to Nicomedia [x]. In this city the Roman emperors reſided, when the affairs of the empire called them to the eaſt. Conſtantine the Great choſe Nicomedia, as we read in Nicephorus [y], for the place of his abode after he retired from Rome, and there remained till the buildings he had begun at Byzantium were finiſhed. This city, once ſo famous, is now but a ſmall village known to the Turks by the name of Schemith. Pronectus, a colony of the Phœnicians as Stephanus informs us; Drepanum or Drepane, ſpoke of by Livy, Florus, and moſt of the Latin hiſtorians. All theſe cities ſtood on the Propontis, now the ſea of Marmora. On the Boſphorus, which parts Europe from Aſia, and joins the Propontis with the Euxine ſea, ſtood the famous city of Chalcedon or Calcedon, antiently known by the names of Proceraſtis and Colbuſa. Pliny [z], Strabo [a], and Tacitus [b], call it the city of the blind, alluding, without all doubt, to the anſwer which the Pythian Apollo gave to the founders of Byzantium, who, conſulting the oracle about a place where to build a city, were directed to chuſe that ſpot which lay oppoſite to the habitation of the blind; that is, as was then underſtood, to Chalcedon, the Chalcedonians well deſerving that epithet, for having built their city in a barren and ſandy ſoil without ſeeing that advantageous and pleaſant ſpot on the oppoſite ſhore, which the Byzantines afterwards choſe. Conſtantine the Great, if Cedrenus is to be credited, had been guilty of the like overſight, had he not been warned by an aſtoniſhing prodigy. For that author tells us, that Chalcedon being deſtroyed by the Perſians, Conſtantine undertook the rebuilding of it with a deſign to ſettle there; but that ſeveral eagles, appearing unexpectedly, carried away in their talons the lines of the workmen, and let them drop at Byzantium. This miracle, which was ſeveral times repeated, made Conſtantine alter his mind, and prefer Byzantium to Chalcedon [c]. But what credit Cedrenus deſerves, we leave our readers to judge. Chalcedon in the chriſtian times became famous on account of the council, which was held there againſt Eutyches. The emperor Valens cauſed the walls of this city to be levelled with the ground for ſiding with Procopius, and the materials to be conveyed to Conſtantinople, where they were employed in building the famous Valentinian aqueduct. The Pelamides, or tunny-fiſh, of Chalcedon were in great requeſt among the antients, as Gellius and Varro inform us [d], and are to this day thought by ſome to have a better flavour than any taken elſewhere. It is therefore ſurprizing, that Pliny and Strabo [e] ſhould tell us, that this kind of fiſh never came near Chalcedon, but kept cloſe to the oppoſite ſhore of Byzantium, for fear of the white rocks concealed under water on the coaſt of Aſia. Chalcedon is at preſent a poor beggarly place, known to the Greeks by its antient name, and to the Turks by that of Cadiaci, or the judges town [f].

[o] Plin. ibid. Pomp. Mela, l. i. c. 19. [p] Tzetzes chil. 3. hiſtor. 115. v. 950. [q] Strab. l. xiii. p. 388. [r] Plin. l. v. c. ultim. [s] Ammian. Marcellin. l. xvii. c. 13. [t] Pauſan. Eliac. 1. c. 12. [u] Pauſan. & Ammian. Marcellin. ibid. [w] Trebell. Poll. in Gallienis, c. 4. [x] Strab. ibid. [y] Nicephor. l. vii. ſub. fin. [z] Plin. ibid. [a] Strab. l. vii. p. 221. [b] Tacit. Annal. xii. c. 63.

Heraclea. On the Euxine ſea ſtood the city of Heraclea, once a republic of no ſmall note. It is commonly called Pontica, or Heraclea on the Pontus, to diſtinguiſh it from ſeveral other cities of the ſame name. Pauſanias [g] and the ſcholiaſt of Apollonius [h] tell us, that it was founded and peopled by a colony of the Megarenſes and Tanagræi of Bœotia.

[c] Cedren. l. iii. [d] Aull.Gell. noct. Attic. Varro de re ruſtic. l. ii. [e] Plin. & Strab. ibid. [f] Tournefort. voyage an Levant, Vol. II. [g] Pauſan. l. v. [h] Scholiaſt. Apollon p. 190.

Bœotia. With them Juſtin agrees, and acquaints us on what occaſion the Bœotians undertook the building of this city. The Bœotians, ſays he, being reduced to great ſtreights by a plague, had recourſe to the oracle of Delphos, which enjoined them to ſend a colony into the country bordering on the Pontus, and there build a city in honour of Hercules. But the Bœotians chuſing rather to die in their own country, than expoſe themſelve to the dangers of ſo troubleſome a voyage, refuſed to comply with the injunctions of the oracle. Whereupon the Phocenſes invading their country, and committing every-where dreadful ravages, as they were not, by reaſon of the plague which ſtill raged among them, in a condition to defend themſelves, they ſent anew to conſult the oracle, which returned the following anſwer; viz. that what would put an end to the plague, would likewiſe put an end to the war. By this anſwer the Bœotians underſtood that the only means to redeem themſelves from the calamities they groaned under, was to follow the direction of the oracle; and accordingly ſent a colony into the country bordering on the Pontus, which ſettled on the coaſt, and built the city of Heraclea [i]. This city in proceſs of time acquired ſuch wealth and power, eſpecially by ſea, that it was not inferior to any of the Greek ſtates in Aſia. Xenophon tells us, that in his time the Heracleans had a numerous fleet, and that they ſupplied him with a ſquadron to convey his men, after their retreat, into Greece. There are ſcarce any wars mentioned by the antients as carried on by ſea in thoſe parts, in which the Heracleans were not concerned, their friendſhip being courted by all the princes of Aſia in regard of their maritime power. To them chiefly Ptolemy Ceraunus was indebted for the ſignal victory he had gained at ſea over Antigonus Gonatus; for they ſent him a numerous ſquadron of ſhips well manned and equipped, among which ſome were of an extraordinary ſize, eſpecially one, called the Leontifera, having on each ſide eight hundred rowers, beſides twelve hundred fighting men on board under the command of two experienced officers [k]. In the war which Antiochus waged firſt with Antigonus the ſon of Demetrius, aud afterwards with the Byzantines, the Heracleans aſſiſted the former againſt Antiochus with thirteen gallies, and the latter with forty [l]. They maintained for the ſpace

The antient hiſtory of this city.

[i] Juſtin. l. xvi. c. 17.

[k] Memnon. excerpt. c. 14, 15.

[l] Idem,

of eleven years a ſquadron of gallies in the ſervice of the Romans, which were of great uſe to them in their wars with the Aſiatic princes, and likewiſe againſt the Maruccini, a people of Africa. Many other inſtances are to be met with in hiſtory, which ſhew that Heraclea was once one of the moſt powerful ſtates, at leaſt by ſea, in Aſia. The Heracleans ſeem to have maintained a good underſtanding with the kings of Perſia; and on that account refuſed, as Juſtin informs us [m], to pay their quota, when the Athenians impoſed a tribute on the Greek cities of Aſia Minor, for the equipping and ſupporting of a fleet to be employed in the defence of the common liberty. Upon their refuſal Lamachus was ſent againſt them; but while he was ravaging their country with the troops he had landed, a violent ſtorm ſhattered his whole fleet, ſo that he ſaw himſelf abandoned to the mercy of thoſe he had provoked, not being in a condition to return to Athens either by ſea or land. But the Heracleans, inſtead of treating him like an enemy, as he had reaſon to expect, uſed both him and his troops with the greateſt humanity and kindneſs, ſupplying them not only with proviſions, but alſo with ſhips to convey them ſafe into Greece. They did not complain, ſays Juſtin [n], of the depredations committed in their territory, but looked upon them as highly advantageous to their ſtate, ſince they offered them an opportunity of gaining by civilities the friendſhip of ſo powerful a republic.

Form of government.

As to their form of government, it was, as we read in Ariſtotle [o], originally democratical; but democracy ſoon gave way to ariſtocracy; for the ſame writer tells us [p], that many of the nobles being ſent out to lead colonies into diſtant countries, the people, in whom the ſupreme power was lodged, began to oppreſs thoſe who ſtill remained; whereupon they ran to arms in their own defence, and having got the better of their adverſaries, took the whole power into their own hands. Soon after new diſturbances ariſing among the nobles, by reaſon that the moſt wealthy engroſſed the whole management of affairs to themſelves, it was agreed, that the ſupreme power ſhould be lodged in the ſenate, and that the ſenate ſhould conſiſt of ſix hundred members all choſen out of the nobility. This new regulation incenſed the common people to ſuch a degree, that with one conſent they they roſe againſt the nobles, and reduced them to ſuch ſtreights that they were obliged to implore the aſſiſtance, firſt of Timotheus the Athenian, and afterwards of Epaminondas the Theban. But neither of theſe generals caring to interfere with their domeſtic quarrels, they were forced to recal Clearchus, a ſenator, whom they themſelves had baniſhed. But as his baniſhment had neither improved his morals, nor inſpired him with better principles, he made the troubles, in which he found the city involved, ſubſervient to his wicked deſign of ſubjecting it, and uſurping the ſovereign power. With this view he openly declared for the people, and having by their means humbled the nobles, he cauſed himſelf to be inveſted with the whole power, which had been divided among them. Being thus become abſolute, he exerciſed all ſorts of cruelty upon ſuch as gave him any umbrage: moſt of the ſenators were either barbarouſly aſſaſſinated, or ſtript of their eſtates, and baniſhed their native country [p]. Dionyſius, tyrant of Syracuſe, for his model in the art of government [q]. The baniſhed ſenators having ſtirred up the neighbouring cities againſt him, he compelled their wives and daughters to marry his ſlaves, and with the aſſiſtance of theſe having vanquiſhed the troops they led againſt him, and taken many of them priſoners, he put them all to death after he had made them ſuffer the moſt exquiſite torments, which his cruel temper and an eager deſire of revenge could invent. Theopompus of Scio tell us, that he frequently obliged, without any provocation, ſuch of the citizens as came to wait on him, and even thoſe he met in the ſtreets, to drink a cup of the poiſonous juice of hemlock, and that, during his reign, no citizen of any diſtinction dared to venture out of his houſe till he had armed himſelf with rue, which is a powerful antidote, according to that writer, againſt the juice of hemlock, when taken before any other food [r]. Clearchus, after he had exerciſed a moſt cruel tyranny over his fellow-citizens for the ſpace of twelve years, was at laſt put to death by Chion and Leonides, two young citizens, and diſciples of Plato [s]. Nymphis of Heraclea, as quoted by Athenæus [t], tells us, that Clearchus, though he affected to be a god, and cauſed divine honours to be paid him, yet towards the end of his life was ſo apprehenſive of conſpi-

[m] Juſtin. l. xvi. c. 3. [n] Idem. ibid. [o] Ariſtot. l. v. Politic. c. 5. [p] Idem ibid.

Tyrants of Heraclea.

Clearchus.

His cruelty.

Is murdered.

[p] Juſtin. ibid. Plut. de fortun. Alexand. [q] Diodor. Sicul. l. xv. [r] Athen. l. iii. c. 5. & Antigon. de Mirabil. Narration. p. 144. [s] Diodor. Sicul. ibid. Suidas, Κλεαρχος. Polyæn. Strateg. l. ii. [t] Athen. ibid.

conſpiracies, that he not only kept at home, but gave audience ſhut upin a ſtrong cheſt, anſwering thoſe who applied to him through holes made for that purpoſe. But as he was murdered by the conſpirators, according to Plutarch [u] and Diodorus Siculus [w], while he was adminiſtering juſtice in public, we can hardly give credit to Nymphis.

Satyrus. THE conſpirators delivered their country from the tyrant; but the tyranny ſtill ſubſiſted. For Clearchus having left two ſons, Timotheus and Dionyſius, their uncle Satyrus ſeized on the ſovereign power, as their guardian and protector, and equalled his brother Clearchus in the tyranny of his government. For he not only put to death the conſpirators, their children, and all thoſe who were any ways related to them, but likewiſe ſuch of the citizens as he imagined capable of following their example. However, he brought up his nephews with great care, and reſigned the power to Timotheus as ſoon as he was of age, having held it himſelf ſeven years [x].

Timotheus. TIMOTHEUS governed with great equity and moderation; whence he had the ſirnames of Euergetes and Soter, that is, the beneficent, the ſaviour of his country. He ruled Dionyſius. fifteen years, and was ſucceeded by his brother Dionyſius, who, taking advantage of the retreat of the Perſians after the battle fought on the banks of the Granicus, reduced ſome of the neighbouring provinces, and conſiderably encreaſed the power of the Heracleans [y]. After the death of Alexander he married Ameſtris, the widow of Craterus, and daughter of Oxiathres the brother of Darius. Upon this marriage he aſſumed the title of king, and maintained it with great dignity, being a prince of a mild temper, and always ready to ſacrifice his own eaſe and private intereſt to the welfare of his ſubjects. Ælian [z] and Athenæus [a] tell us, that he grew immoderately corpulent, and fell into a kind of lethargy, from which his domeſtics could ſcarce recover him by running long needles, made for that purpoſe, into his fleſh. He died in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and twenty-third of his reign, and is highly commended by all the antients on account of his juſtice, moderation, good-nature, affability, and other princely qualities. Strabo no doubt had this prince and his brother Timotheus in view, when he wrote

[u] Plut. ad princ. indoct. [w] Diodor. Sicul. l. xvi. [x] Juſtin. l. xvi. Memnon. excerpt. c. 17. [y] Diodor. Sicul. & Memnon. ibid. [z] Ælian. V. H. l. ix. c. 13. [a] Athen. l. xii. c. 26.

wrote, that Heraclea had been governed by tyrants, and alſo by kings. He left two ſons by his wife Ameſtris viz. Clearchus and Oxatres, whom Diodorus Siculus calls Zathras. Upon his death Ameſtris married Lyſimachus, one of Alexander's captains, who by that means got poſſeſſion of Heraclea, which ſhe governed as guardian to her children; for they were both very young when their father died. Lyſimachus afterwards divorced Ameſtris to marry Arſinoe the daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt; but nevertheleſs kept poſſeſſion of the city, and brought up the two young princes with great care. They both attended him in his expedition againſt the Getæ, after which he ſuffered them to return home, and reſigned the government of Heraclea to Clearchus the eldeſt, allowing him to take upon him the title of king. With this title he governed Heraclea, according to Diodorus Siculus, ſeventeen years, and was at laſt put to death by Lyſimachus with his brother Oxatres for aſſaſſinating their mother Ameſtris [b]; for they both conſpired againſt her, and cauſed her to be ſmothered, while ſhe was going by ſea from Heraclea to Ameſtris, a city which ſhe had built, and called by her own name. Upon their death Lyſimachus reſtored the Heracleans to the full enjoyment of their antient liberties. But they did not long continue in that happy condition, Arſinoe, who had a great aſcendant over her huſband Lyſimachus, having prevailed upon him to deprive them of the liberty which he had not long before granted them, and appoint one Heraclitus Cimæus governor of the place, a man entirely at her devotion. After the famous battle of Coroupedion, in which Lyſimachus was killed by one Malacon, a native of Heraclea, the Heracleans conſpired to ſhake off the yoke, under which they had groaned for the ſpace of ſeventy-five years, determined either to recover their former liberty, or die in the attempt. With this reſolution the chief citizens went in a body to wait on Heraclitus, entreating him to retire of his own accord, and ſuffer them to live according to their own laws. They offered him all poſſible ſecurity for his perſon and effects, and beſides a large ſum of money to defray the charges of his journey. At this propoſal Heraclitus in a great rage commanded the officers, who attended him, to put immediately to death ſome of the leading men whom he named. But the officers, to his great ſurprize, inſtead of obey-

Clearchus II

Heraclitus Cimæus.

[b] Diodor. Sicul. l. xvi. Trog. in prolog. l. xvi. Memnon. excerpt. c. 19.

obeying his orders, seized him, and carried him to the public prison. For the Heracleans had before-hand gained them over to their party, by making them free of Heraclea, and promising to pay them the arrears which were due to them from Heraclitus. Having thus secured the tyrant, they demolished the citadel which Lysimachus had built, raised one of their own citizens, by name Phocrites, to the chief magistracy, and dispatched an embassy to Seleucus king of Syria, to acquaint him with what they had done, and implore his protection [c]. Seleucus had been greatly prejudiced against the Heracleans by one Aphrodisius, who being sent by him to visit the cities of Asia, had laid many things to their charge, and represented them as disaffected to his person. He was therefore so far from promising them his protection, that he threatened their embassadors, and let drop some expressions, which gave just grounds to suspect that he had some design upon their city. Hereupon the Heracleans entered into an offensive and defensive league with Mithridates king of Pontus; the Byzantines and Chalcedonians recalled all their exiles, and put themselves in a posture of defence. But the death of Seleucus soon delivered them from their apprehensions [d]. From this time the Heracleans enjoyed their liberties undisturbed for many years.

The Heracleans recover their antient liberty.

Enter into an alliance with Rome.

When the Romans became formidable in Asia, they made an alliance with them, the articles of which were engraved on tables of brass, and lodged at Rome in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and at Heraclea in a temple of the same god. Notwithstanding this alliance, the Heracleans suffered greatly by the wars, which they engaged in for the defence of their liberties, against the Bithynians and Galatians. However, they held out against their utmost efforts, and obliged them to withdraw their forces with disgrace. In the war which the Romans waged with Mithridates the Great, they resolved at first to observe a strict neutrality, and accordingly refused to admit that prince's fleet into their harbour. But, on the approach of his general Archelaus, they thought fit to change their measures, and side with him, after having murdered all the Romans who resided among them. Their treachery cost them dear; for Cotta, or rather Triarius, having after a two years siege taken their city, pillaged and reduced it to ashes, as we have related in the history of Pontus [e]. Cotta on his return to Rome was severely reprimanded Heraclea destroyed by Triarius.

[c] Justin. l. xvii. c. 3. Memnon. ibid. c. 8 & 10. [d] Memnon. ibid. c. 11, 12. See Vol. ix. p 426.

manded by the ſenate for ſuffering ſo great and wealthy a city to be deſtroyed. We gave you orders, ſaid the ſenate, to take Heraclea, but not to deſtroy it. All the captives were ſent home without ranſom, and the inhabitants reſtored to the poſſeſſion of their lands, and allowed the uſe of their harbour, and the freedom of commerce. Briagoras, one of the chief citizens, ſpared no pains to repeople it; but could not obtain for his fellow-citizens the reſtitution of their liberty and antient privileges. Strabo tells us that many of the citizens being killed during the ſiege, and more after the place was taken, a numerous colony was ſent from Rome to repeople it. Some of the new-comers ſettled in the city, and ſome in the country; but the former were all to a man maſſacred by Adioterix, the ſon of Demenecelius, king of the Galatians, not without the privity, as was then ſuſpected, of Marc Antony the triumvir, who had beſtowed on the Galatian that quarter of the city which was inhabited by the Romans [f]. But his cruelty did not go long unpuniſhed; for Octavianus having taken him priſoner after the famous battle of Actium, carried him in chains to Rome to grace his triumph, and afterwards cauſed both him and his ſon to be put to death. From this time Heraclea continued ſubject to the Roman emperors till the downfal of the empire, being with its territory made part of the province of Pontus. It did not loſe its antient ſplendor even after the loſs of its liberty, as appears from ſome antient inſcriptions, and alſo medals, which have reached us, and were ſtruck under the emperors [g]. Near this city was the famous cave through which Hercules is feigned to have deſcended to the infernal regions, and brought up from thence the fabulous Cerberus. This cave was ſtill to be ſeen in Xenophon's time; but is now quite cloſed up, though once two furlongs deep [h]. The antient hiſtory of Heraclea was wrote by Piſander, Timagenes, Panyaſis, Domitius, Calliſtus, Cynæthon, Nymphis, and Memnon; for to theſe Athenæus, Suidas, Stephanus, and the ſcholiaſt of Apollonius, refer us for a more full account of what they briefly relate of the Heracleans. But the works of theſe authors have been long ſince loſt, nothing now remaining of them but an extract of Memnon preſerved by Photius in his Bibliotheque; and from him we have in great part copied what we Made afterwards a Roman colony.

[f] Strab. l. xii. [g] Vide Tournefort. voyage, &c. Vol. II.
[h] Xenoph. Exped. Cyri Minor. l.vi. p. 220. Euſtath. ad Dionys. v. 167.

we have said here of Heraclea. This city is at present a very inconsiderable place, known to the Greeks by the name of Pendrachi, and to the Turks by that of Eregri. We cannot, with a modern traveller, take either of these names to be a corruption of Heraclea Pontica, or Heraclea [i].

The inland cities of Bithynia.

The inland cities of Bithynia, which it may proper to take notice of, were, Prusa at the foot of mount Olympus, built, according to Strabo [k], by Prusias king of Bithynia, who waged war with Crœsus and Cyrus, and not by Hannibal, as Pliny [l] would make us believe. Nay, this city must have been founded long before the times of Crœsus and Cyrus, if the tradition be true, which the inhabitants have transmitted to us on several medals, viz. that Ajax stabbed himself here with his sword. 'Tis surprizing, that Livy, who has so well described the neighbourhood of mount Olympus, where the Gauls were defeated by Manlius, should not mention this place. Prusa was the place where the Othoman princes resided before they extended their conquests into Europe, and is still one of the most beautiful and populous cities of Asia. We must not, with some geographers, confound the city of Prusa with that of Prusias, of which we have spoke above. Libyssa, famous for the death of Hannibal, and the tomb of that great commander, which was still extant in Pliny's time [m]. Some writers place Libyssa on the coast, but Strabo, and with him Stephanus, and most of the antients, count it among the inland cities. Cellarius conjectures, that it stood three or four miles distance from the sea, and was on that account called by some a maritime, by others an inland city, or rather castle. Nicæa, or Nice, which stood on the lake Ascanius, now the lake of Isnich. This city was built, according to Strabo, who calls it the metropolis of Bithynia [n], by Antigonus the son of Philip of Macedon, and from him called at first Antigonia. Afterwards it was repaired and embellished by Lysimachus, who gave it the name of his wife Nicæa, the daughter of Antipater. Stephanus tells us, that Nicæa was originally a colony of the Bottiæi, a People of Thrace, and called in the earliest times

Anchore.

[i] Tournefort. ibid. [k] Strab. l. xii. p. 388. [l] Plin. l. v. cap. ultim. [m] Plin. l. v. cap. ult. [n] Strab. l. xii. p. 389.

Anchore. Pliny ſpeaks of two cities in Bithynia bearing this name; the one he places twenty-five miles eaſt of Pruſa, now Burſa; the other forty-four north of Nicomedia on the lake Aſcanius. But Strabo, Ptolemy, Stephanus, Mela, &c. ſpeak of one city only in Bithynia bearing that name (S), which they place on the lake Aſcanius lying to the north of mount Olympus, and at a ſmall diſtance from the river Gallus. Nicæa, according to Strabo, ſtood in a large and fruitful plain, was ſixteen furlongs in compaſs, well peopled, and in the Roman times declared the metropolis of the ſecond Bithynia, Nicomedia being the capital of the firſt. For Pontus and Bithynia were by Auguſtus made one province, but by his ſucceſſors divided into two, called the firſt and ſecond Bithynia. The firſt general council held here, by the appointment of Conſtantine the Great, againſt Arius, gave new luſtre to this city; for it was ever after honoured with the title and privileges of a metropolis, as appears from the acts of the council of Chalcedon.

THE chief rivers of Bithynia were the Pſillis, Colpas, Sangarius or Sagaris, Hypius, Rhebas, and the Lycus, all diſcharging themſelves into the Euxine ſea between Chalcedon Rivers.

(S) The reverend fathers Catreu and Rouillê in their deſcription of Nice, tell us (110), that the antient geographers place it on the lake Aſcanius, which, ſay they, is now called the lake of Iſnich; and a few lines after queſtion whether there ever was a lake of that name, thinking it very natural to ſuppoſe, that Pliny, the only author, ſay they, who mentions it, by the lake Aſcanius meant the gulf of Olbia, now the gulf of Nicomedia. If the antient geographers place Nice, as they ſay, on the lake Aſcanius, Pliny is not the only author who mentions ſuch a lake; and if it be true, that the lake Aſcanius is by the modern geographers called the lake of Iſnich, how can we doubt whether there ever was a lake of that name. Beſides, it is ſo far from being natural to ſuppoſe Pliny to have meant the gulph of Olbia by the lake Aſcanius, that his words evidently deſtroy ſuch a ſuppoſition; for in the very paſſage, which the abovementioned writers quote, Pliny diſtinguiſhes the lake Aſcanius from the gulf, on which he places the antient city of Olbia (111). Laſtly, Pliny is not the only author who makes mention of the lake Aſcanius. Strabo tells us in expreſs terms (112), that Nicæa, the metropolis of Bithynia, ſtood ou the lake Aſcanius; and Ptolemy ſpeaks of it as falling into the Euxine ſea between Pruſias and the promontory Poſidium.

(110) Ad. Ann. Urb. 607. (111) Plin. l. v. cap. ultim.
(112) Strab. lxiii. p. 389.

'cedon and Heraclea. Livy was certainly miſtaken when he wrote that the Sangius, the chief river of Bithynia, falls into the Propontis. It ſprings from mount Dindymus, in Phrygia, at a ſmall diſtance from a town, which Strabo calls Sangia; waters Phrygia and Bithynia, and receiving in its courſe the Thymbrus and the Gallus, falls into the Euxine ſea over-againſt the ſmall iſland of Thynias. Some geographers place the river Parthenius in Bithynia; but theſe extend the bounds of this country a great way into Paphlagonia. As Bithynia lies between the forty-firſt and forty-third degrees of north latitude, and is watered by a great many rivers, it once abounded with all the neceſſaries of life. The antients compare ſome of the inland provinces to the fruitful and delicious vales of Tempe itſelf; but at preſent it lies in great part neglected and unmanured.

Inhabitants. BITHYNIA was antiently inhabited by various nations, differing in their manners, cuſtoms, and language, namely the Bebryces, the Mariandyni, the Caucones, the Dolliones, the Cimmerii, &c. But to enquire into the origin of theſe different nations would be both a tedious and uſeleſs taſk. Xenophon [o] and Strabo [p] are of opinion, that the Bithynians and the Mariandyni were originally Thracians, who croſſing the Boſphorus made themſelves maſters of this country, which from them was antiently called the Aſiatic Thrace. Some modern writers derive them from Aſhkenaz, one of Gomer's ſons; but the only proof they alledge to ſupport their opinion is, the ſmall likeneſs they diſcover between Aſhkenaz and Aſcanius, the name of a lake in this country. Stephanus ſays, that the Mariandyni were ſo called from one Mariandynus, a native of Æolis, who with ſome of his countrymen ſettled in that part of Bithynia, which lies between the rivers Hypius and Parthenius [q]. Theopompus, as quoted by Strabo [r], will have this Mariandynus to have been a petty king of Paphlagonia, and to have ſubdued that part of Bithynia, then called Bebrycia, which bordered on his dominions. Theſe different nations were antiently governed by kings of their own, Bithynia being in the earlieſt times divided into as many kingdoms as nations or tribes. For Plutarch, Polyænus, and Stephanus mention Mandron and Byſnus as reigning over [o] Xenoph. l. vi. de expedit. Cyr.

[p] Strab. l. xii. p. 373.
[q] Steph. ad Dionys. v. 788.
[r] Strab. ibid.

ver the Bebryces; and Hyginus ſpeaks of one Lycus king of the Mariandyni. But all we know of theſe ſmall kingdoms, and the princes, who ruled over them, is, that in proceſs of time they were reduced by the more powerful kings of the Bithynians. But as to the beginning of this kingdom, we are quite in the dark. Diodorus Siculus pretends, that the Bithynians were governed by their own princes in the time of Ninus king of Aſſyria, who, according to him, ſubdued their country. Pherecydes, as quoted by the ſcholiaſt of Apollonius, mentions Amycus and Phyneus as reigning in Bithynia at the time of the Argonautic expedition; and Appian tells us, that nine and forty kings had reigned in Bithynia before the Romans were acquainted with Aſia. If what theſe authors write be true, the kingdom of Bithynia muſt have been erected before the Trojan war; which we can hardly believe, ſince Homer, who is ſo exact in enumerating the nations in the neighbourhood of Troas, never once mentions the Bithynians. From his ſilence ſome have concluded, that Bithynia was uninhabited in the time of the Trojan war, and add, that the Thracians, who marched with Rheſus to the relief of Troy, after the death of their king and the taking of the city, ſettled in that part of Aſia, which was afterwards known by the name of Bithynia. This name, ſay they, the new-comers gave to the provinces, in which they ſettled, from the Bithyas, a river in their own country. Strabo [s] ſpeaks of one Pruſias reigning in Bithynia in the time of Crœſus, the laſt king of Lydia, by whom he was conquered. From this time the Bithynians continued ſubject, firſt to the Lydians, and afterwards to the Perſians, till the reign of Alexander the Great; for we find them mentioned by Herodotus among the many nations that attended Xerxes in his expedition into Greece. While they were ſubject to the Perſians, they were ſtill governed, it ſeems, by their own princes; for Memnon and Strabo tell us, that Dædalſus or Dydalſus, Boteras, and Bas ruled in Bithynia with ſovereign power in the time of the Perſian monarchy. Some writers place in the reign of Dædalſus the invaſion of the Byzantines, Chalcedonians, and Thracians, who entering Bithynia, committed there, as Diodorus Siculus informs us [t], moſt dreadful ravages; and having taken ſeveral towns, made a great many captives, whom they in-

Kings of Bithynia, Dædalſus, Boteras, and Bas.

[s] Strab. ibid. [t] Diodor. Sicul. l. xii.

inhumanly murdered, when they found themſelves obliged to leave the country. Boteras was, according to Memnon, the ſon of Dœdalſus, and died in the ſeventy-ſixth year of his age. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Bas, who having overcome Calantus, one of Alexander the Great's generals, peaceably enjoyed the kingdom of Bithynia for the ſpace of fifty years, and died in the ſeventy-firſt year of his age [u].

Zipœtes. Year of the flood, 2718. Before Chriſt 281.

Bas was ſucceeded by Zipœtes, who waged war firſt with the Heracleans, and afterwards with the Chalcedonians. Over the former he gained no conſiderable advantage, but reduced the latter to great ſtreights, beſieged their metropolis, and having drawn them to a battle, killed eight thouſand of them on the ſpot [w]. He was prevented from purſuing the victory, which would have ſoon put him in poſſeſſion of Chalcedon, by Patrocles, one of Antiochus Soter's generals, who entering Bithynia, put all to fire and ſword. Zipœtes marched againſt him, and having concealed his men in an ambuſh, fell upon him unexpectedly, and cut him off with his whole army, as we have related in the hiſtory of Syria [x]. Zipœtes was ſo overjoyed at this victory, that he died ſoon after in the ſeventy-ſixth year of his age, and forty-eighth of his reign [y]. He left four ſons, of which the eldeſt, called Nicomedes, took poſſeſſion of the throne, and cauſed, out of jealouſy, two of his brothers to be put to death. But the youngeſt, called by Memnon Zipœtes, by Livy [z] Zibœas, having ſaved himſelf by a timely flight, ſeized on the coaſt of Bithynia, which was then known by the names of Thracia, Thyniacia, and Thracia Aſiatica, and there maintained a long war with his brother; who being informed that Antiochus Soter, king of Syria, was making great preparations to attack him at the ſame time, becauſe he had declared for Antigonus Gonatus, called in the Gauls to his aſſiſtance; and on this occaſion it was that this people firſt paſſed over into Aſia. The terms agreed on between them and Nicomedes were, 1. That they ſhould ever maintain a ſtrict friendſhip with Nicomedes and his ſucceſſors in the kingdom of Bithynia: 2. That they ſhould not without his privity and conſent lend aſſiſtance to any other prince or ſtate: 3. That they ſhould at the ſame time enter into an alliance with the Tianians, Heracleans, Chalcedonians, and Cierians;

Nicomedes.

[u] Memnon excerpt. c. 8. & 10. [w] Idem ibid. c. 11. [x] See Vol. viii. Book ii. Chap. ii. ſect. ix. [y] Memnon ibid. c. 21. [z] Liv. l. xxxviii.

ans; for theſe ſtates had aſſiſted Nicomedes againſt his brother Zipœtes [a]. Upon theſe terms the Gauls paſſed over into Aſia in the third year of the hundred and twenty-fifth olympiad, as we read in Pauſanias [b]. Nicomedes having with their aſſiſtance repulſed Antiochus, overcome his brother, and acquired the poſſeſſion of all his father's dominions, beſtowed upon them that part of Aſia Minor which was called from them Gallo-Græcia, and Galatia. As for Zipœtes, he died in baniſhment, his army being routed by the Gauls, and the cities, which he poſſeſſed on the coaſt, obliged to ſubmit to the conqueror. Livy [c] and Juſtin [d] tell us, that the Gauls, having laid waſte the dominions of Zipœtes, kept the ſpoils for themſelves, but divided the country with Nicomedes, calling their portion Gallo-Græcia; and herein they agree with Demetrius Byzantius who informs us, that Gallo-Græcia was not given by Nicomedes to the Gauls, but held by them againſt his will after they had driven out his brother Zipœtes [e]. Demetrius Byzantius wrote thirteen books on the migration of the Gauls out of Europe into Aſia; but none of them have reached our times. Nicomedes having no enemies to contend with after the defeat of his brother, and the advantages gained over the king of Syria, applied himſelf to the enlarging and embelliſhing of the city of Aſtacus, which he called after his own name Nicomedia. This is what we read in Pauſanias [f], Trebellius Pollio [g], Ammianus Marcellinus [h], and Euſebius [i]. But Memnon ſays, that he built Nicomedia over-againſt the city of Aſtacus; ſo that Nicomedia and Aſtacus were, according to this writer [k], two diſtinct cities. Nicomedes had two wives, viz. Ditizele and Etazeta, the former brought him two ſons, Zela and Pruſias, and one daughter by name Lyſandra; by the latter he had one ſon named Tibites, to whom, at the inſtigation of his mother Etazeta, he left the kingdom. But Zela, who at the time of his father's death was in Armenia, whither he had been baniſhed by the intrigues of his ſtep-mother, having hired an army of Galatians, returned into Bithynia, drove out Tibites, and peaceably enjoyed the crown till his death. He was taken in a ſnare, Tibites.

Zela.

[a] Memnon. ibid. c. 21. Liv. l. xxxviii. Strab. l. xii. p. 566. [b] Pauſan. in Phoc. p. 340. [c] Liv. l. xxxviii. [d] Juſtin. l. xxv. c. 2. [e] Laert. in vita Demet. Phal. [f] Pauſan. in Eliac. l. ii. p. 159. [g] Trebell. Poll. in Gallienis. [h] Ammian. Marcellin. l. xxiii. [i] Euſeb. in Chron. [k] Memnon. ibid. c. 21.

which he had laid for the Galatians; for ſuſpecting their fidelity, he invited their leading men to a banquet with a deſign to cut them all off; but they, upon private intelligence of what was preparing againſt them, were beforehand with the treacherous prince, murdering him in the beginning of the banquet [l].

Pruſias. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Pruſias, ſirnamed Cholos, or the lame, and alſo Cunegos, or the hunter. This prince in the very beginning of his reign entered into an alliance with the Rhodians againſt the Byzantines, whom he reduced to great ſtreights, as we have related at length in the hiſtory of Rhodes [m]. Not long after he engaged in a war with the Galatians, whom Attalus I. king of Pergamus, had invited over into Aſia, defeated them in a pitched battle, took ſeveral of their ſtrong holds, and put all the Galatians he could get into his power to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex or age. When the war broke out between Antiochus the Great and the Romans, he was ſolicited by the former to join him againſt thoſe powerful republicans; but Scipio by a letter, and Livius, admiral of the Roman fleet, by the promiſes he made him in the name of the republic, fixed him in the intereſt of Rome, as the reader will find in the hiſtory of Syria [n]. But notwithſtanding his engagements with the Romans, he invaded the territories of Eumenes their conſtant friend and ally, being induced thereto by Hannibal, who had taken refuge in his dominions. The advantages he gained over Eumenes in this war were chiefly owing to Hannibal, who not only prevailed upon Ortyagon, one of the kings of the Galatians, and Philip king of Macedon, to ſend him powerful ſupplies, but took upon him the command of his forces, and in ſeveral encounters put the king of Pergamus to flight by ſome ſtratagem or other [o]. This awaked the jealouſy of the Romans, who thereupon ſent T. Flaminius, Scipio Africanus, and Scipio Naſica into Aſia to adjuſt the differences between the two kings, and to perſuade Pruſias to deliver Hannibal up to them [p]. On their arrival at the court of Bithynia, Hannibal retired to Libyſſa, a ſtrong caſtle, which he had been allowed by Pruſias to repair in ſuch manner as beſt ſuited the ſtate of his affairs.

He

[l] Memnon. ibid. Athen. l. ii. c. 18. Plin. l. viii. c. 4.
[m] See vol. vii. p. 420, & ſeq. [n] See p. 37. [o] Juſtin. l. xxxii. c. 4. Æmil. Probus in Hannib. [p] Polyb. legat. 47. Liv. l. xxxvi.

He had dug ſeveral private ways under-ground, which led from his lodgings to ſo many different iſſues, through which he could make his eſcape either by ſea or land upon the firſt alarm; for he had reaſon to ſuſpect that the king's inclinations might change with his intereſt. Flaminius after having propoſed a plan of accommodation between Pruſias and Eumenes, acquainted the former, that Rome would never look upon him as a ſincere friend unleſs he delivered up Hannibal, that irreconcileable enemy to their republic, who made no other uſe of his liberty and talents, but to draw kings and nations into the ſame dangerous enterprizes which had proved his ruin. Pruſias refuſed at firſt to comply with the requeſt of the embaſſadors, pleading in excuſe the laws of hoſpitality, and the age of Hannibal, which was too great for him to give any farther umbrage to the Roman ſenate. He alſo inſiſted on the reputation of that great general, whom he could not deliver up without drawing upon himſelf the indignation of all ages. But Flaminius threatening to treat him as an enemy if he perſiſted in favouring and protecting one who had ſwore an eternal hatred to Rome, the king thought it adviſeable to ſacrifice his gueſt to the revenge of the republic, and his own intereſt. But Hannibal, without heſitating a moment between death and captivity, diſappointed the deſigns of his enemies in a manner worthy of his great courage [q], as we have related in the hiſtory of Pergamus.

Pruſias delivers Hannibal to the Romans.

PRUSIAS having by thus abandoning his gueſt and ally to the revengeful temper of the Romans, gained their protection, in order to engage them ſtill more in his favour, aſſiſted them both with men and money in their war with Perſes, king of Macedon; and upon the reduction of that country was not content, like the other princes of the eaſt, with ſending an embaſſy to Rome to congratulate the ſenate on the ſucceſs of their arms; but went thither in perſon, and diſhonoured the royal dignity with his mean and ſervile flatteries. The ſenate no ſooner heard of his arrival in Italy, but they ſent Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the ſon of Scipio Aſiaticus, as far as Capua to meet him, with orders to defray his charges and conduct him to the capitol. Before he entered the city he cauſed his head to be ſhaved, and took the pileus, or cap which ſlaves wore after they had obtained their freedom, and in that odd dreſs advanced towards the forum, ſtopped at the

Goes to Rome.

[q] Æmil. Prob. in Hannib. Liv. l. xxxix. c. 4. Plut. in Flam. Appian. in Syriac. p. 97.

tribunal, where the Prætors used to administer justice, and there declared with a loud voice, that he had crossed the seas, on purpose to return thanks to the Roman gods, and congratulate the republic on her late victories. His arrival being notified to the senate, they sent deputies to receive and introduce him. These Prusias received with such mean flatteries and submissions as were well suited to the attire he assumed; "I have taken the habit and appearance of one of "your freedmen, said he, and am indeed no more than a "Roman slave set at liberty by your favour." The deputies were for introducing him to the senate immediately, but he desired that his audience might be put off for two days, being desirous to see first the city and temples, and visit his friends. The third day he was introduced, and on that occasion betrayed a baseness of mind unworthy of the rank and title he bore. For when he entered the senate, he kissed the threshold, saluted the senators with the titles of visible deities, saviours, deliverers, and pronounced an harangue suitable to that prelude; in the close of which he related what he had done for the republic in the course of the war, and desired the protection of the senate both for himself and his son. After this, he presented to the conscript fathers a petition, which contained two articles; whereof the first was, that he might be allowed to offer up sacrifices in the capitol and at Præneste, by way of thanksgiving to Jupiter and Fortune, for the success which had attended the arms of the republic in the late war; the second article was, that the senate would grant him a small territory, which had formerly belonged to Antiochus the Great, but was then held by the Galatians, who had seized it without the consent of the republic. The senate returned Prusias the following answer: We give the king of Bithynia leave to offer sacrifices at Rome and Præneste, and order that the expences of the victims and all other things for the sacrifices be defrayed by the public, in the same manner as if our own migistrates were to offer up sacrifices. As to the territory which the king desires, we shall send commissioners to judge of the affair on the spot, after both parties shall have been heard. After this the senate presented him with some silver vessels, and made over to him two hundred and twenty-five small ships, which had been taken from Gentius king of Illyricum. Then Prusias left Rome, embarqued at Brundusium, and set sail with a squadron of twenty gallies to take possession of the fleet, which the republic had given him [r]. Some years

His mean behaviour at Rome.

[r] Polyb. legat. 97. Liv. lxlv. c. 44.

years after that war broke out between him and Eumenes II. which we have described in the history of Pergamus, where we have also related in what manner, and on what provocation, he was first driven from the throne, and afterwards assassinated by his own son Nicomedes [s]. Polybius tells us, that he was a monster rather than a man; that he had not one single virtue to make amends for the many vices which rendered him insupportable to his subjects, and contemptible to foreigners. He was a stranger to all principles of honour or honesty, of a most cruel and savage temper, timorous, cowardly, and so addicted to pleasures of all sorts, that he seemed another Sardanapalus. His most important business was to dress himself, says our historian, to conceal the deformity of his ill-shaped and disfigured body. He was not ashamed to appear publicly in the attire of a woman, and shew his subjects a figure no less hideous than ridiculous, in a dress no-ways suited to it [t]. As he was himself unacquainted with the liberal arts, he despised all kinds of knowledge, discountenanced the study of philosophy, and polite literature, and carefully avoided the the conversation of such persons as could form his mind or improve his taste, [u]. Livy, in his account of the audience which the senate gave him, takes no notice of his submissions to the senators; perhaps he thought they reflected no less dishonour on the senate, who suffered them, than on the king, who acted so mean a part. But Polybius, after having given us, as it were, a specimen of the speech the slavish king made on that occasion, breaks it off abruptly, saying, that he was ashamed to repeat the expressions he made use of before that venerable assembly [w]. He had two wives, viz. Apame, the daughter of Dieglis, one of the kings of Thrace, who brought him two sons, Nicomedes and Prusias: The latter was surnamed Monodons, or the single-toothed, because instead of distinct teeth, he had one continued semi-circular bone in each jaw. Prusias married to his second wife the daughter of Philip king of Macedon, and had by her also children; for Justin tells us, that he intended to prefer his issue by the daughter of Philip to Nicomedes his eldest son by his first wife; and that Nicomedes, provoked at this unjust partiality, took up arms against his father, and drove him from the throne; but herein he disagrees with other writers, whom we have quoted elsewhere in our account of this revolution [x].

His death and character.

[s] See p. 496. [t] Polyb. in excerpt Valesii. [u] Athen. l. iii. c. 7. Suidas voce Prusias. [w] Polyb. legat. 97.

Nicomedes II.

NICOMEDES II. succeeded his father, and proved a no less cruel tyrant; for he had scarce ascended the throne, when he sacrificed all his brothers to his jealousy and ambition [y]. He assumed the name of Epiphanes, or the illustrious, though he performed nothing worthy of this title, or even of notice, during the whole time of his long reign. According to the accounts given us, by Strabo, Justin, and Memnon, he began to reign in the 607th year of Rome, and was still on the throne in the 649th. All we know of him, besides what we have related in the history of Pergamus, is, that he built a city, calling it by his mother's name, Apame, or Apamea. Strabo tells us [z], that he was killed, but by whom, or in what manner, we find no where recorded. Some writers conjecture, that as he had murdered his father, so he was treated in the same manner by his son Nicomedes, who on that account was by antiphrasis surnamed Philopator.

Nicomedes III.

HE was succeeded by his son Nicomedes III. who, entering into an alliance with Mithridates the Great, invaded Paphlagonia, and having seized on that country, attempted to make himself master likewise of Cappadocia, at that time subject to Mithridates, who thereupon marching into Bithynia at the head of a mighty army, drove Nicomedes from the throne, and raised his brother Socrates to it in his room. The dethroned prince had recourse to the Romans, who drove out the usurper, and restored him to his hereditary dominions. For this favour they pressed him, and at length prevailed upon him, contrary to his own inclination and the opinion of his friends, to make inroads into the territories of Mithridates, with whom Rome wanted to pick a quarrel. The king of Pontus bore for some time the devastations committed by Nicomedes with great patience, that he might not seem to be the agressor; but at last he made him pay dear for them; for having entirely routed his army on the banks of the Amnius, he drove him a second time from the throne, and obliged him to seek for shelter in Paphlagonia, where he led a private life till the time of Sylla, who replaced him on the throne [a]. He died not long after, and was succeeded by his son Nicomedes IV. who performed nothing

Nicomedes IV.

[x] See p. 496. [y] Appian. in Syriac. p. 147. [z] Strab. l. xii.
[a] Appian. in Mithridatic.

nothing which the many writers, who flouriſhed in his time, have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity. His too great familiarity with Julius Cæſar, while that young Roman was making his firſt campaign in Aſia under the prætor Thermus, gave occaſion to ſeveral lampoons and ſevere ſatires, ſome of which were ſung by the ſoldiery at Cæſar's triumph over the Gauls, according to the liberty allowed them on ſuch occaſions [z] (T). As he died withoutiſſue male, he left his kingdom by his laſt will to the Romans, who reduced it to the form of a province [a]. Salluſt, diſagreeing with the antients, tells us, that Nicomedes left a ſon by name Muſa, or Myſa, and introduces Mithridates as complaining of the Romans to Arſaces king of Parthia, for ſeizing on the kingdom of Bithynia, and excluding the ſon of a prince, who had on all occaſions ſhewn himſelf a ſteady friend to their republic [b]. But this Muſa was the daughter, and not the ſon, of Nicomedes, as we are told in expreſs terms by Suetonius, Velleius Paterculus, and Appian [c]. All we know of her is, that upon the death of her father ſhe claimed the kingdom of Bithynia for her ſon as the next male heir to the crown, but without ſucceſs, no motives of juſtice being of ſuch weight with the ambitious Romans, as to make them part with a kingdom. Cæſar eſpouſed her cauſe, and ſupported her claim in the ſenate with his uſual eloquence. But as he was enumerating the many obligations he owed her father, Cicero interrupting him, You need not, ſaid he, O Cæſar, enlarge on this topic; we all know how kind Nicomedes was to you, and what favours you granted to him [d]. The name of Muſa's ſon, ſo far as we can conjecture from Hirtius and Appian, was Nicomedes; but as to the name and condition of his father, hiſtory has left us quite in the dark. After the defeat of Pharnaces, Cæſar appointed Nicomedes high-prieſt of Comana in Pontus, depoſing Archelaus, whom Pompey had raiſed to that dignity, to make room for the grandſon of his old friend Nicomedes IV. in whom ended the ſucceſſion of the Bithynian [z] Vide Sueton. in Cæſar. Dion. l. xliii. Catull, &c. [a] Liv. l. xciii. Vellei. Patercul. l. ii. c. 4. & 39. Appian. l. i. bell. civil. p. 420. & Mithridatic. p. 175. 218. [b] Salluſt. hiſtor. l. iv. [c] Vellei. Patercul. Sueton. Appian. ibid. [d] Sueton. ibid.

(T) The verſes were,

Cæſar Gallias ſubegit, Nicomedes Cæſarem.
Ecce Cæſar nunc triumphat, qui ſubegit Gallias;
Nicomedes non triumphat, qui ſubegit Cæſarem.

thynian kings, that country continuing subject to Rome from this time to the division of the empire. Before we dismiss this subject, we must acquaint the reader, that some writers mention only three kings of Bithynia bearing the name of Nicomedes, and will have that Nicomedes to have died without issue, and bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans, who, at their instigation, made war upon Mithridates. But we have followed Appian, who seems to have wrote upon this subject with the greatest exactness.

CHAP. X.

Of the Kingdoms of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, Bosphorus, Media, Bactria, Edessa, Emesa, Adiabene, Characene, Elymais, Comagene, and Chalcidene.

Colchis. COLCHIS, now Mingrelia, was bounded on the east by Iberia, on the west by the Euxine sea, on the south by Armenia and part of Pontus, and on the north by mount Caucasus, parting it from Sarmatia Asiatica. Cities of note in this country were, Pityus, called by Strabo the Great City [e], and by Pliny [f], a place of great wealth. It stood on the frontiers of the Bosphorani, and was on that account in the Roman times well fortified, and garrisoned, as we read in Zosimus and Procopius, who tell us, that it served as a barrier to keep out the Sarmatians and other barbarous nations [g]. Dioscurias, or Dioscorias, on the Euxine sea, built either by Castor and Pollux, two of the Argonauts, as Mela will have it [h], or by Amphitus and Cercius their charioteers, as we read in Ammianus Marcellinus [i], and Isidorus [k]. It was named Dioscurias from Castor and Pollux,

Cities.

[e] Strab. l. xii. p. 378. [f] Plin. l. vi. c. 5. [g] Procop. l. iv. bell. Goth. c. 4. & Zosim l. i. c. 32. [h] Mela, l. i. c. 19. [i] Ammian Marcel. l. xxii. c. 15. [k] Isidor. Orig. l. xv. c. 1.

Pollux, whom the Greeks called Dioſcuroi. This name was, according to Arrian [l] and Ptolemy [m], in proceſs of time changed into that of Sebaſtopolis: but Pliny [n] will have Dioſcurias and Sebaſtopolis to be two different cities. Be that as it will, Dioſcurias was antiently a place of great trade; and reſorted to by merchants from moſt parts of the world; for Pliny [o] tells us, that three hundred different languages were ſpoke there; and that the Romans, who traded to Colchis, were obliged to maintain conſtantly in Dioſcurias a hundred and thirty interpreters. This city is at preſent known by the name of Savatopoli. Aea, on the Phaſis, and about fifteen miles from the Euxine ſea, called by Pliny [p] and Apollonius [q] a famous city. Some writers take this to be the ſame with the city of Æopolis mentioned by Ptolemy. Phaſis, ſo called from the river on which it ſtood. Here the Argonauts landed, which gave riſe to the Greek proverb, to ſail to Phaſis, expreſſing a long and dangerous navigation; for ſuch was that of the Argonauts eſteemed in thoſe early times. Cyta, at the mouth of the river Cyaneus, the birth-place of the famous Medea, called from thence by the poets Cytæis [r]. The cities of Saracæ, Zadris, Surium, Madia and Zaliſſa, are mentioned by Pliny, Strabo, and Ptolemy, but contained nothing worthy of notice. Colchis was watered by a great many rivers, viz. the Corax, the Hippus, the Cyaneus, the Chariſtus, the Phaſis, the Abſarus, the Ciſſa, and the Ophis, all emptying themſelves into the Euxine ſea. The Phaſis does not ſpring from the mountains of Armenia, near the ſources of the Euphrates, the Araxes, and the Tigris, as Strabo, Ptolemy, Pliny, Dionyſius, and after them Hadrian, Reland, Calmet and Sanſon have wrongly informed us; but riſes on mount Caucaſus, and flows, not from ſouth to north, but from north to ſouth, as appears from the map of Colchis or Mingrelia in Thevenot's collection, and the account which Sir John Chardin gives us of that country. This river forms in its courſes a ſmall iſland, called alſo Phaſis, whence the pheaſants, if Iſidorus is to be credited [s], were firſt brought into Europe, and thence called by the Greeks phaſianoi. The other rivers of Colchis are ſcarce worthy notice. Rivers.

THE

[l] Arrian. in Pont. periplo. [m] Ptol in Colch. l. v. c. 10. [n] Plin l. vi. c. 4. [o] Idem ibid. [p] Idem ibid. [q] Apollon. l. xi. ver. 424 & 1096. Val. Flac. l. vi. ver. 693, &c. [r] Propert. l. i. eleg. 1. [s] Iſidor. Origin. l. iii.

Inhabitants.

THE Colchians were, according to Herodotus [t], originally Egyptians, Sesostris having left part of the army with which he invaded Scythia, in Colchis, to people that country, and guard the passes. The Colchians, says our historian, are undoubtedly of Egyptain descent, as is visible from the personal similitude they bear to the Egyptians, being, like them, swarthy and frizle-haired; but more especially from the conformity of their customs, for they use circumcision, as the Egyptians do, and many other ceremonies practised by the inhabitants of Egypt. There is likewise, says the same historian, such an affinity between the language of Colchis and that which is commonly spoke in Egypt, as leaves us no room to doubt of their coming originally from that country. Apollonius [u], Diodorus Siculus [w], Strabo [x], Eustathius [y], and Marcellinus [z] agree with Herodotus. Bochart [a] takes the Colchians and the Casluhim of Moses, from whom the Philistines were descended, to be one and the same people, forgetting therein, that the Philistines did not use circumcision, which Herodotus assures us the Colchians did. In process of time many other nations settled in Colchis, viz. the Heniochi, the Ampreutæ, the Lazi, the Ligures, the Marsi, Istri, the Moschi, and the Manralæ. From the latter people some derive the present name of Mingrelia. The whole kingdom of Colchis was, in antient times, very pleasant and fruitful, abounded with all necessaries of life, and was enriched with many mines of gold; which gave occasion to the fable of the golden fleece, and the Argonautic expedition so much spoke of by the antients.

Government and kings.

THE Colchians were governed by their own kings in the earliest ages; for Pliny tells us, that Sesostris king of Egypt was overcome and put to flight by the king of Colchis [b]; which, if true, shews, that the Colchians not only had kings in those times, but were a very powerful people. We have observed above, that Herodotus derives the Colchians from the Egyptians; but that writer must have meant the Colchians of his own time, and not the first inhabitants, since Colchis, even according to his own account, was peopled before the arrival of the Egyptians in those parts.

[t] Herodot. l. ii. Sicul. l. i. Dionys. l. iv. c. 31.
[u] Apollon. l. iv.
[x] Strabo, l. i. & xvi.
[z] Marcellin. l. iii.
[b] Plin. l. xxxiii. c. 4.
[w] Diodor.
[y] Eustath. in [a] Bochart. Phaleg.

parts. It is not therefore impropable, that the deſcendents of Hul, who are ſaid to have ſettled in Armenia, paſſed from thence into the neighbouring country, calling it Colchis, from their progenitor Hul or Chol [c]. But of their kings we know very little. The names of thoſe we find mentioned in hiſtory, are Helius, Æetes, Æetes II. Salauces, Euſubopes, Olthaces, and Ariſtarchus. Helius is mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, Pauſanius, Strabo, and Cicero, as reigning before the Argonautic expedition; but what they relate of him is altogether fabulous, and therefore not worthy of notice in hiſtory. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Æetes, whom he had, according to ſome, by Ephyre, according to others by Antiope or Perſia. Æetes received Phryxus flying with his ſiſter Helle from their ſtep-mother Ino in a ſhip, on whoſe head was a golden, or rather a gilt, ram. In his reign happened the famous expedition of the Argonauts, of which we have ſpoke elſewhere [d]. The Argonauts were a company of Greek adventurers, who hearing of the gold mines of Colchis and the immenſe riches of king Æetes, reſolved to ſail thither, in hopes of making their fortunes by one voyage. Accordingly they cauſed a ſhip to be built at Pegaſa by one Argos, from whom they called it Argos; and hence they were ſtiled Argonauts. On this ſhip they embarqued, and having one Typhis for their pilot, they ſteered their courſe through the Ægean ſea, the Helleſpont, the Propontis, the Thracian Boſphorus, and after many adventures entering the Euxine ſea, landed at Phaſis, where king Æetes, who then reſided there, received them with great kindneſs. As that prince had great ſtore of gold in his palace, the Argonauts, thoſe heroes ſo much cried up by the antients, conſpired among themſelves, either to ſeize on his treaſures by force, or to ſteal them privately, and, ſaving themſelves on board their ſhip, return with the booty into Greece; but finding them to be too well guarded to be either taken by force, or privately conveyed away, they corrupted the guards by means of Medea the king's daughter, who was in love with Jaſon, got into the palace undiſcovered, and carrying off the treaſures, returned into Greece with Medea, whom Jaſon had promiſed to marry. This is, according to Natalis Comes [e], the genuine account of the Argonautic expedition, which the poets, as it was the moſt remarkable voyage

Helius.

Æetes.

[c] Vide Bochart. Phaleg. l. ii. c. 9.
[d] See vol. vi. p. 19.
[e] Natal. Com. l. vi. c. 7.

voyage the Greeks undertook in thoſe early days, have embelliſhed and diſguiſed with innumerable fictions, but not without ſome ground as to the golden fleece; for Strabo tells us [f], that as the rivers iſſuing from the mountains of Colchis carrried with them great quantity of gold ore, it was a cuſtom among the inhabitants to lay fleeces in the water, and by that means ſtopt the ore. Paſiphae and the famous Circe are ſaid by ſome to be the daughters of Helius, by others of Æetes. Of them many things are related by the poets, which it is beneath the dignity of hiſtory to take notice of. The reader will find the fables of the poets relating to Circe, Medea and Paſiphae very ingeniouſly explained by Natalis Comes in his mythology [g]. Upon the death of Æetes, Colchis, as Strabo informs us [h], was divided into ſeveral petty kingdoms; but on what occaſion we know not; for we find no further mention of the affairs of Colchis, or the princes who reigned there, till the time of Xenophon, who tells us, that the ſon of Æetes, the ſecond of that name, reigned in Colchis, while he was making war in Aſia [i]. Salauces and Euſubopes are mentioned by Pliny [k], and ſaid to have diſcovered rich mines of gold in the country of the Savani; but that writer leaves us quite in the dark as to the time in which they reigned. Colchis was afterwards ſubdued by Mithridates the Great; but revolted from him while his forces were employed againſt the Romans. The king of Pontus had no ſooner concluded a peace with Sylla, than he marched againſt the Colchians, who offered to ſubmit, upon condition that he would appoint his ſon to reign over them, with the title of king of Colchis. This propoſal provoked Mithridates to ſuch a degree, that he cauſed the ſon, whom they had demanded, to be arreſted and loaded with chains of gold, ſacrificing him ſoon after to his jealouſy and ambition. Hereupon the Colchians obſtinately refuſed to ſubmit upon any terms; which obliged Mithridates to draw together all his troops in order to reduce them by force, but as he paſſed through the country of the Achæans, that people attacked him with ſo much vigour, and defended the paſſes with ſuch reſolution, that he was forced to return into Pontus, after having loſt great part of his army, what by the enemy's ambuſcades, what by the exceſſive cold of the country [l]. Theſe Achæans were were originally Greeks, and are ſaid to have ſettled on the eaſtern coaſt of the Euxine ſea, whither they had been driven by a ſtorm, as they were returning from the ſiege of Troy. Colchis while ſubject to Mithridates, was governed by prefects ſent thither by him. One of theſe was Moaphernes, great-uncle to Strabo the geographer, as that writer informs us [m]. Memnon tells us, that Mithridates complied with the requeſt of the Colchians, and appointed his ſon Mithridates to reign over them; but ſoon after cauſed him to be put to death. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the Colchians ſided with Mithridates againſt Pompey, and were, during that war, governed by a king of their own, viz. by Olthaces, who was overcome, taken priſoner, and led in triumph by Pompey [n]. Olthaces was ſucceeded by one Ariſtarchus; but all we know of him is, that Pompey conferred upon him the kingdom of Colchis for his eminent ſervices during the Mithridatic war [o]. Pharnaces II. king of Pontus ſeized on the kingdom of Colchis, and recovered great part of Pontus, while Cæſar was diverting himſelf with Cleopatra in Egypt; but was ſoon obliged to abandon his conqueſts, and retire into the country of the Boſphorani, where he was killed by Aſander, as we have related in the hiſtory of Pontus. From this time we find no mention made of the Colchians till the reign of the emperor Trajan, to whom they ſubmitted of their own accord [p]. Perhaps they were governed by their own kings; for Strabo makes the river Phaſis the northern boundary of the Roman empire. Under the emperors Colchis was ſubject to the prætors who governed Bithynia and Pontus; but never was made part of any province.

[f] Strab. l. xi. [g] Natal. Com. ibid. [h] Strabo, ibid. [i] Xenoph. Ἀναβάσ. l. v. [k] Plin. l. xxxii. c. 3. [l] Appian. in Mithri

Olthaces.

Ariſtarchus.

[m] Strabo, l. xi.
[n] Appian. ibid. Flor. l. iii. c. 5.
[o] Appian ibid. Eutrop. l. vi. Sex. Ruf. in epitome Jornand. de regnor. ſucceſſ. Eutrop. l. vi.
[p] Euſeb. in Chron. Sex. Ruf. in epitom.

IBERIA.

IBERIA.

IBERIA, now Georgia, was bounded on the west by Colchis and part of Pontus; on the north by mount Caucasus; on the east by Albania; and on the south by Armenia. It contained the following cities, Nubium, Varica, Sura, Artaniſſa, Meſtleta, Zaliſſa, Armactica, and Phryxum, called afterwards Ideeſſa. Theſe cities are mentioned by Strabo [q], Pliny [r], and Ptolemy. The only rivers of note in Iberia are the Cyrus, of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the deſcription of Albania, and the Aragus, which ſprings from the mountains ſeparating Iberia from Colchis, and falls into the Cyrus. Pliny mentions another river, which he calls Iberus, and from which ſome writers derive the name of Iberia. Of mount Caucaſus, which ſeparates Iberia from Sarmatia Aſiatica, we have ſpoke elſewhere [s]; and in the hiſtory of Pontus and Armenia deſcribed the Paryadrian and Moſchian mountains. This country was antiently inhabited by the following nations or tribes enumerated by Pliny [t], viz. the Moſchi, the Armenochalybes, the Sacaſſani, the Macrones, the Sylvi, the Diduri, and the Sodii. Iberia was firſt peopled, according to Joſephus [u], by Tubal the brother of Gomer and Magog. His opinion is confirmed by the ſeptuagint; for Meſheſch and Tubal are by thoſe interpreters rendered Moſchi and Iberians [w]. Some have taken the Iberia which was peopled by Tubal, according to Joſephus, for Spain, called alſo Iberia; but this opinion we have confuted elſewhere [x]. Strabo [y], and after him Euſtathius [z], derive the Iberians in Aſia from the Iberians in Celtiberia or Spain; others, as Appian informs us, derive the latter from the former. As theſe two nations lay at a great diſtance from one another, and greatly differed in their manners, cuſtoms and language, ſome were of opinion, as we read in the ſame Appian [a], that they were no-ways

[q] Strabo, l. xi. p. 344. & l. i. p. 31. [r] Plin. l. vi. c. 10. [s] See Vol. i. p. 295, & vol. 5. p. 440. [t] Plin. l. vi. c. 10. [u] Joſeph. Antiq. l. i. c. 7. [w] In Ezech. c. 27, 32, 39. [x] See vol. i. p. 468, and vol. 5. p. 439. [y] Strabo. l, i. [z] Euſtath. in Dionyſ. [a] Appian. in Mithridat.

no-ways related to each other. Tacitus supposes both the Iberians, and the Albanians, their neighbours, to have come originally from Thessaly with Jason [b]; but whatever their origin was, they were a very brave and warlike nation, and maintained their independency, if Plutarch is to be credited [c], against the utmost efforts of the Medes, Persians, and Macedonians. Strabo, gives us the following account of their customs and polity [d]. The Iberians, says he, are divided into four ranks or classes; the first consists of the nobility; the second of priests; the third of soldiers and husbandmen; and the fourth of the common people. Out of the first class they chuse their king, and, upon his death, raise always to that dignity the eldest of his relations. The next in age to him of the royal family administers justice, and commands the army. The common people are employed in the lowest ministries, and treated no better than slaves. The priests, besides their peculiar function, hear causes, and decide such controversies as arise between the natives and foreigners. The Iberians who inhabit the champaign country, are very industrious, and well skilled in agriculture; but those who live on the mountains, are a wild and savage race, and in their manners bear a great resemblance to the Scythians and Sarmatians; whereas the former imitate both the dress and customs of the Medes and Armenians. Thus far Strabo. The monarchical form of government prevailed among them, as is plain from this passage; but we find no mention made of their kings till the reign of Mithridates the Great king of Pontus, when they were governed by one Artoces, who sided with that prince, first against Lucullus, and afterwards against Pompey. After the defeat of Mithridates by Pompey, Artoces sent embassadors to the Roman camp, enjoining them to conclude a peace with Pompey upon honourable terms, and, in the mean time, drew together an army of seventy thousand men, with a design to fall upon the Romans unawares, in case they did not grant him the conditions he required; but Pompey, being informed of the measures he was taking, advanced by long marches into Iberia, took Horopolis, a city or fort, built, as appears from the name, on the summit of a mountain, penetrated into the very heart of the kingdom, and obliged Artoces

Government and kings.

[b] Tacitus, l. v. [c] Plut. in Pomp. [d] Strab. l. xi.

Artoces to ſhelter himſelf in the moſt remote parts of his dominions. From thence he ſent embaſſadors anew to Pompey, and by their means obtained a peace upon very reaſonable terms; but notwithſtanding this agreement, Artoces, ſtill kept his troops together, deſigning to fall upon the Romans as they paſſed the river Pelorus. This Pompey ſuſpected, and therefore following him cloſe, came up with him before he reached the above-mentioned river, and drew him to an engagement, in which the Iberians behaved with great gallantry, but were obliged to give way to the ſuperior valour of the Romans, who killed nine thouſand on the ſpot, and took above ten thouſand priſoners. Great numbers were drowned as they attempted to ſave themſelves by ſwimming over the Pelorus. Many fled to the foreſts, and climbing up to the tops of the talleſt trees, defended themſelves from thence with their arrows; but the Romans ſetting fire to the foreſt, obliged them to ſurrender at diſcretion [e]. After this defeat, Artoces, ſuing for a peace in good earneſt, ſent from beyond the Pelorus rich preſents to Pompey, viz. his bed, his table, and his throne, all of maſſy gold, which the Roman general accepted, and delivered to the quæſtor of the army; but would not hearken to any terms of an accommodation, till the king had delivered to him his ſons as hoſtages; and then he concluded a peace upon terms no-ways diſhonourable to the Iberian nation [f]. This king is called by Appian Artocus, by Eutropius Arthaces, by Sextus Rufus Arſaces, and laſtly, by Dion Florus, and Oroſius, whom we have followed, Artoces. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Pharnabazus, who being overcome by Canidius, Mark Antony's lieutenant, joined the Romans againſt Zoberes king of Albania [g]. The other kings of Iberia mentioned by the antients are, Mithridates, Pharaſmenes, Mithridates II. Rhadamiſtus, and Pharaſmenes II. But as theſe were alſo lords of Armenia, we have ſpoke of them in the hiſtory of that kingdom. Pharraſmenes II. who reigned in the time of the emperor Adrian, went to Rome with his wife and children, to clear himſelf before the emperor of ſeveral things laid to his charge by Vologeſes II. king of Parthia, and was there not only allowed to offer ſacrifices in the capitol, but honoured with with an equeſtrian ſtatue erected in the temple of Bellona [h]. From this time, to the diviſion of the empire, there is a profound ſilence among authors with reſpect to the affairs of Iberia. They continued in all likelihood to be governed by their own kings, who were tributaries to Rome; for we do not find Iberia counted by any writer, or mentioned in the antient notitias, among the provinces of the empire; and beſides, we know, that, long after the diviſion of the empire, they were ſubject to their own princes; for Procopius tells us, that after they had embraced the Chriſtian religion, Gyrgenes, their king, being threatened with a war by Cavades king of Perſia, in caſe he did not conform to that of the Perſians, implored the aſſiſtance of the emperor Juſtin, which kindled a war between the two empires. Zonabarzes, another of their kings, came to Conſtantinople, as the ſame author informs us, in the time of the emperor Juſtinian, to be baptized, with his queen, his children, and ſeveral noblemen of his court. Iberia is at preſent ſubject to the king of Perſia, and known to the Perſians by the name of Gurgiſtan, that is, the land of the Georgians; for 'tan' is an antient Celtic word, ſignifying a country, and ſtill in uſe among the eaſtern nations, as appears from the modern names of Curdiſtan, Indoſtan, &c. that is, the country of the Curdes, of the Indians, &c. As to the name of Georgia, ſome writers are of opinion, that the antient Iberia was ſo called, either from St. George the famous Cappadocian martyr, held here in great veneration, or from George a Cappadocian biſhop, by whom the inhabitants were firſt converted to chriſtianity. Others, ſuppoſing the country to have been called antiently Gordiæa, and the inhabitants Gordiæans, from the Gordiæan mountains, take the words Georgia and Georgians to be a corruption of Gordiæa and Gordiæans; but this opinion is entirely groundleſs, the Gordiæan mountains being placed by all the antient geographers in Armenia, at a conſiderable diſtance from Iberia. Some think, that the inhabitants were called Georgi, from their ſkill in huſbandry, the Greek word 'georgos' ſignifying a huſbandman, and that the country was from them named Georgia. Pliny, enumerating the Caſpian nations, mentions the Georgi, from whom perhaps the antient Iberia borrowed the name of Georgia, that country lying at a ſmall diſtance from the coaſt of the Caſpian ſea, which was inhabited,

[e] Plut. in Lucul. & Pomp. Dion. l. xxxvii. Flor. l. iii. c. 5. Zonar. Tom. II. Oroſ. l. vi. c. 4.

[f] Plut. Dion. Flor. ibid. Eutrop. l. vi.

[g] Plut. in Anton. Appian. in Parthic. Dio. l. xlix.

[h] Theodoſ. Minor, in fragment.

according to Pliny, by the Georgi, who, in proceſs of time, may have ſettled in Iberia, from which they were parted by the ſmall kingdom of Albania.

ALBANIA.

Albania.

ALBANIA, was bounded on the weſt by Iberia; on the eaſt by the Caſpian ſea; on the north by mount Caucaſus; and on the ſouth by Armenia [i]. It contained antiently a great many cities, but not any of note.

Cities and rivers.

The following are mentioned by Strabo, Ptolemy, and Pliny; Teleba, Thalbis, Gelda, Thiauna, Thabilaca, Albana, Chadaca, Miſia, Boziata, and Cabalica, which Pliny calls the metropolis of Albania. The rivers which it may be proper to take notice of, are the Cyrus or Cyrnus, the Albanus, the Caſius, the Gerrhus, the Soana, the Cambyſes, and the Alazon [k], all emptying themſelves into the Caſpian ſea. The Cyrus, now the Kûr, ſprings from the Moſchian mountains, which ſeparate Colchis from Armenia, waters the country now called Mokau, receives into its channel the Aragus and the Araxes, and falls into the Caſpian ſea, within, but at a ſmall diſtance from, the ſouthern borders of the antient Albania. There is a great diſagreement among the antient geographers about the mouths of this river; Strabo, Plutarch and Appian ſay, that it diſcharges itſelf into the ſea by twelve mouths. Strabo indeed, who advances nothing for certain in his deſcriptions of countries but what he has ſeen, ſpeaks with great reſerve, and only tells us, that the Cyrus is ſaid to diſcharge itſelf by twelve mouths into the Caſpian ſea. Herodotus will have this river to fall into the ſea by forty mouths; but Pliny, with whom all our modern travellers agree, allows it but one. The whole country, now known by the names of Scirwan and eaſt Georgia, is extremely fruitful and pleaſant. Strabo deſcribes the antient Albanians as tall and ſtrong-bodied men, and adds, that they had, generally ſpeaking, a very graceful mien, and far excelled all other nations in comelineſs, as well as in ſtature. Our modern tra-

[i] Strabo, l. xi. p. 345. & Ptolem. l. v. c. 12. [k] Strabo, & Ptolem. ibid. Plin. l. vi. c. 13. & c. 10. Pompon. Mela, l. iii. c. 5.

travellers cry up the women of Georgia and Scirwan for perfect beauties, but find nothing extraordinary in the men; whereas the antients admired the men, without taking any notice of the women. The ſame Strabo tells us, that the manners of the Albanians were very ſimple; that they were unacquainted with weights, meaſures, and the uſe of money; that they could not count above a hundred; and that trade was carried on among them only by exchange. Pliny tells us, that they held old age in great veneration; that they were of a very fair complexion, and thence, according to ſome, called Albani; that they could ſee as well by night as by day; and that not only the men were ſtout and courageous, but alſo the women, whom he pretends to be deſcended from the antient Amazons. As to their origin, Tacitus [l] and Pliny [m] derive them from the Theſſalians who attended Jaſon in his expedition into Colchis, and ſettled in this part of the iſthmus between the Euxine and Caſpian ſeas. Juſtin [n] will have them to be deſcended from the inhabitants of Alba in Italy, who followed Hercules into thoſe parts, after he had overcome Geryon. Ammianus Marcelinus takes the Albani and Alani to be one and the ſame people, and derives them both from the Maſſagetæ, of whom we have ſpoke elſewhere [o]. As to their form of government, the country was in antient times divided into a great many ſmall kingdoms. Strabo tells us, that no fewer than twenty-ſix different languages were ſpoke formerly in Albania; and that there were as many different kings and kingdoms as languages, each tribe having their peculiar king [p]. But the Albani, in proceſs of time, prevailed over the other petty princes, and made themſelves maſters of the whole country. In Pompey's time they could bring into the field, as Strabo informs us [q], ſixty thouſand foot and twenty thouſand horſe. We find no mention made of their kings till the reign of Alexander the Great, to whom the king of Albania is ſaid, by Pliny [r] and Solinus [s], to have preſented a dog of an extraordinary fierceneſs and ſize. The next king of Albania we find mentioned in hiſtory is Oræſes, who, entering into an alliance with Tigranes the ſon of Tigranes the Great, obliged Pompey to march againſt him. Coſis, the king's brother, a brave and enterprizing prince, commanded the Government.

Kings.

Oræſes.

[l] Tacitus, l. v. [m] Plin. l. vi. c. 13. [n] Juſtin. l. xlii. [o] Vol. v. p. 467. [p] Strabo, l. xi. [q] Idem ibid. [r] Plin. l. viii. c. 4. [s] Solin. l. ix.

Albanians and waited for Pompey on the banks of the Cyrus, which he fortified at certain diſtances with high paliſades. Hereupon Pompey feigning to return to Armenia, marching his army a great way about, and drawing up his cavalry and beaſts of burthen in the bed of the river, to break the force of the ſtream, paſſed it without being diſcovered by the enemy. From the Cyrus he purſued his march to the Cambyſes, through a dry country, where his army ſuffered much for want of water. At length, after having rambled far out of the way, being led aſtray by his guides, who were Albanians, he reached the Cambyſes, where his ſoldiers were ſeized with ſtrange diſtempers, occaſioned by their drinking too greedily of the water of that river while they were hot after their march; however, he ſtill advanced, with the precaution of carrying ten thouſand ſkins full of water, leſt he ſhould be again reduced to the ſame ſtreights. He heard no news of the enemy till he had paſſed the Abas, or Albanus, when he was informed, that Coſis was advancing full march againſt him, at the head of threeſcore thouſand foot and twelve thouſand horſe. Upon his approach he concealed the legionaries among the thick buſhes, with which the whole plain was covered, commanding them to cover their helmets with their bucklers, leſt the rays of the ſun reflecting on them, ſhould diſcover them at a diſtance. Then he detached the cavalry, with orders to attack the enemy, and retiring before them, draw them into the ambuſcade. The ſtratagem had all the ſucceſs Pompey could expect; for the legionaries ſtarting up all on a ſudden, and widening their ranks to let the cavalry retire, ſurrounded the Albanians on all ſides, and put them to flight with great ſlaughter. On this occaſion Coſis behaved with great valour and intrepidity; for he kept cloſe to Pompey during the whole time of the engagement, and having had at laſt an opportunity of diſcharging a blow at him, pierced his breaſt-plate. Hereupon Pompey facing his adverſary, threw his javelin at him with ſuch vigour, that he laid him dead at his feet. The Albanians, diſheartened by the death of their general, fled in diſorder to the neighbouring foreſts, which the Romans ſet on fire, crying aloud, while the foreſt was burning, Saturnalia, Saturnalia, to remind the Albanians, that they had attempted to ſuprize them in their quarters during the feaſts of Saturn, and therefore ought to expect no quarter. Oræſes, after the defeat of his troops, retired to mount Caucaſus, and from thence ſent embaſſadors to ſtrike up a peace with the conqueror; queror, who willingly granted it, being deſirous to put an end to this war, and turn his arms againſt the king of Parthia, who had entered Gordyene at the head of a mighty army [t]. It was conſtantly reported before the engagement we have ſpoke of above, that there were many Amazons in the Albanian army; but the Romans, who had given credit to that rumour, in ſtripping the dead in the field of battle, found none of thoſe warlike females among them; whence they concluded this republic of military women to be a mere fable, adopted on too ſlight grounds by many credulous hiſtorians. Oræſes is by ſome writers called Orodes and ſaid to have fought three unſucceſsful battles with Pompey [u].

Oræses was ſucceeded by his ſon Zoberes, who having ventured an engagement with P. Canidius, Mark Antony's lieutenant, was by him entirely defeated, and obliged to ſue for peace. In this war Canidius was powerfully aſſiſted by Pharnabazus king of Iberia [w]. The next king of Albania we find mentioned in hiſtory is Pharaſmanes, who in the time of the emperor Adrian, committed great devaſtations in Armenia, Cappadocia and Media, and was on that account ſummoned by the emperor to Rome. Pharaſmanes refuſed to comply with the ſummons; but in the mean time to appeaſe Adrian, ſent him ſome valuable preſents, among which were many great-coats, ſuch as were wore in thoſe days by military men, all cloath of gold. Theſe alone the emperor accepted, but with no other view than to affront the king who had ſent them; for he cauſed three hundred criminals to be clad with them, and in that attire fight the wild beaſts in the public theatre. Upon Adrian's death the king of Albania came to Rome, upon the firſt ſummons from his ſucceſſor Antoninus Pius, who received him with great marks of eſteem, and ſent him back loaded with preſents to his kingdom [x]. Trebellius [y] and Marcellinus [z] ſpeak of two kings of Albania, whom they do not name, the one contemporary with Sapor I. king of Perſia and the emperor Valerian; the other reigning in the time of Sapor II. and entering into an alliance with him againſt Conſtantius, the ſon of Conſtantine the Great. The Albanians continued to be govern-

Zoberes.

Pharaſmanes.

[t] Dio, l. xxxvi. Plut. in Pomp. Appian. in Mithridat. Flor. l. iii. c. 5. Eutrop. vi. Oros. l. vi. c. 4. Sex. Ruf. in epitome Frontin. Stratag. l. ii. c. 3. [u] Flor Oros. Sex Ruf. ibid. Jornand. de regnor. ſucceſſ. [w] Plut. in Anton. Dio, l. xlix. [x] Dio, ibid. Zonar. & Spartian. in Adrian. Capitolin. in Antonin. Pio. [y] Trebel. in Valer. [z] Marcellin. l. xviii.

ed by their own princes till the death of Juſtinian II. who is ſaid by Zonarius [a] and other writers [b], to have ſubdued Albania by his general Leontius. The three kingdoms which we have here deſcribed, viz. Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, took up the whole iſthmus between the Caſpian and Euxine ſeas, and extended from the borders of Media Atropatene, Armenia, and Pontus on the ſouth, to the mountains Corax and Caucaſus on the north. Theſe mountains have been the ſubject of many poetical fables; but nothing has been feigned by the poets more improbable than what we read in ſome of the antient geographers, viz. that they were ſo high as to be illuminated by the rays of the ſun even at mid-night, it being certain that they are not much above two perpendicular miles in height [c]. They are known to the preſent inhabitants by the names of Cocas and Cochias, which are, without doubt, a corruption of the antient name Corax. The Arabs call them the mountains of Raf. We ſhall conclude our account of theſe three kingdoms with the words of Sir John Chardin, who, in deſcribing the preſent Georgia, which comprehends the greater part of the antient Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, ſpeaks of it thus: "Georgia is as fertil a country as can be ſeen; the "bread is as good there as in any part of the world; the "fruit of an exquiſite flavour, and of different ſorts; no "place in Europe yields better pears and apples; no place "in Aſia better pomegranates. The country abounds with "cattle, veniſon, and wild fowl of all ſorts; the river Kûr "is well ſtocked with fiſh; the wine is ſo rich, that the "king of Perſia has always ſome of it for his own table, "&c. The inhabitants are robuſt, valiant, and of a jovial "temper, great lovers of wine, and eſteemed very truſty "and faithful, endowed with good natural parts, but, for "want of education, very vicious. The women are ge-"nerally fair and comely, and by their beauty recommen-"ded to the court of the king of Perſia, whoſe wives and "concubines are for the moſt part Georgian women. Na-"ture has adorned them with graces no-where elſe to be "met with; it is impoſſible to ſee them and not love them; "they are of a full ſize, clean-limbed, ſmall-waiſted, fair, "and well-proportioned." Thus far Sir John Chardin, to whoſe words, or rather panegyric on the Georgian women, we we beg leave to ſubjoin a paſſage out of another modern traveller of no mean character [d]: "As to the Georgian "women, ſays he, they did not at all ſurprize us, for "we expected to find them perfect beauties; they are not "at all diſagreeable, and may be counted beauties "if compared with the Curdes; they have an air of health "that is pleaſing enough; but, after all, they are neither "ſo handſome nor ſo well-ſhaped as is reported. Thoſe who "live in the towns have nothing extraordinary more than "the others; ſo that I may, I think, venture to contradict "the accounts that have been given us of them by moſt tra-"vellers." But it is now time for us to take our leave of Georgia, and paſs into the neighbouring kingdom of Boſphorus.

[a] Zonar. in Juſtin. [b] Hiſt. Miſc. l. xix. [c] Vide Voſ. in Melam, l. ii. c. 2. Kircher. in mundo ſubterr. l. i. c. 14. Varen. in Geog. l. ii, c. 30.

[d] Tournef. Voyage, &c. Vol. II. epiſt. 6.

BOSPHORUS

THE antient kingdom of Boſphorus, comprehending all the provinces that were ſubject to the Boſphoran princes, was bounded on the eaſt by Colchis; on the weſt by the gulf Carcinites; on the ſouth by the Euxine ſea; and on the north by the Tanais, where that river falls into the Palus Mœotis; ſo that it compriſed the Cherſoneſus Taurica in Europe, and in Aſia all that tract which lies between the Palus Mœotis and the Euxine ſea. Diodorus Siculus [e] confines the kingdom of Boſphorus within the Boſphorus Cimmerius, the boundary of Europe and Aſia on that ſide; but Strabo [f], whom we have followed, extends it to the gulf Carcinites, which, with the Palus Mœotis, form the iſthmus of the Cherſoneſus. Cities of note in the Aſiatic Boſphorus were antiently, Phanagoria, placed by ſome geographers on the Euxine ſea, by others on the Palus Mœotis; but by Pliny [g] and Mela [h] at ſome diſtance from both, on a peninſula, which they call Corocondama. Near this city was formerly a famous temple dedicated to Venus Apatura, ſo called from the Greek word 'apate', ſignifying, 'deceit'; for Boſphorus.

Cities.

[e] Diodor. Sicul. l. xii. [f] Strabo, l. vii. [g] Plin. l. vi. c. 6. [h] Pomp. Mela, l. i. c. 19.

for she is feigned to have overcome the giants here by a stratagem suggested to her by Hercules. This city was, according to Strabo [i], the metropolis of Bosphorus in Asia. Cepi, Hermonassa, Stratoclea, and Cimmerium stood on the Bosphorus, and are said by Pliny to have been once remarkable cities. From the latter the Bosphorus Cimmerius borrowed its name. Strabo, Pliny, and Pomponius Mela tell us, that Cimmerium was the chief city of the Cimmerians, a people famous for their robberies as early as in the days of Homer. These barbarians being driven out of their country by the Scythian Nomades, ravaged the finest provinces in the east, and penetrated as far as Sardis in Lydia, which they reduced; but being afterwards overcome by Halyattes king of Lydia, some of them returned to their antient habitation; and others, as most historians conjecture, advanced towards the north as far as the Baltic, and settled in the Cimbrica Chersonesus now Jutland; for the Cimbri and Cimmerii are by most historians thought to be one and the same people. The other cities taken notice of by the antients in the Asiatic Bosphorus, are, Sinda, on the Palus Mœotis; Tanais, at the mouth of the river bearing that name, where the city of Asoph now stands; Paniardis, Tyrambe, and Gerasum, called by Ptolemy a Cimbrian village. The coast of the Euxine sea was inhabited by the Cercetæ, the Heniochi, the Moschi, and the Achæi, of whom we have spoke above. Strabo enumerates on the coast of the Palus Mœotis the following nations, the Sindi, Dandarii, Agri, Arrichi, Tarpetes, Obidiaceni, Sittaceni, Dosci, and Aspungitani. To these Scylax adds the Coraxi, the Coraci, or, as Vossius will have it, the Colici, and the Melanchleni. The country bordering on the Palus Mœotis and the Bosphorus, which was inhabited by the Cimmerii, is represented by the antients as an inhospitable place, covered with thick forests and continual fogs, which the rays of the sun could not break through. This frightful description gave Cicero and Ovid occasion to say, that an eternal night reigned in this gloomy climate, and that sleep had taken up its abode here; and hence Cimmerian darkness became, according to Lactantius, a proverb, signifying an impenetrable darkness, and likewise a gloomy and stupid mind. Lycophron, Pliny, Eustathius, Servius, and others, have planted a colony of Cimmerians in Italy between Cumæ and Baiæ, near the lake Avernus, and tell us, Inhabitants.

[i] Strabo, l. xi.

us, that the sun never shined on that small canton; but Strabo, who was better acquainted with the countries we are speaking of, describes them as abounding with all the necessaries of life, and rather pleasant than disagreeable. The rivers mentioned by the antient geographers in this tract are, the Anticites or Vardanus, the Psathis, the greater and lesser Rhombites, and the Marubius, most of them springing from the mountains of Sarmatia Asiatica, and all emptying themselves into the Palus Mœotis. Rivers.

THE Taurica Chersonesus, so named from its being a peninsula, antiently inhabited by the Tauri, or Tauroscythæ, as Pliny and Ptolemy call them, lies between the Euxine sea, the Palus Mœotis, and the Bosphorus Cimmerius; extends, according to Sir John Chardin, sixty-one leagues from east to west, and about thirty-five from north to south, and is joined to the continent by a narrow isthmus about a mile over. The cities here of note in former times were, Taphræ or Taphrus, on the Isthmus, where the present city of Przekop or Precop stands. The modern city is so called from the word 'przkop', signifying a ditch; for it was built on the ditch which the Tartars cut across the isthmus. Cherronesus, or, as the more modern Greek writers call it, Cherson, was according to Strabo, built by the Greeks on the gulf Carcinites, now the gulf of Nigropoli, on the west coast of the Chersonesus. Of this city, now called Topetarkan, there are still many ruins to be seen. Theodosia, or Theudosia, another Greek city on the east coast of the peninsula, once a place of great note. It is now known by the name of Caffa, and is the capital of Little Tartary. From this city the Bosphorus Cimmerius of the antients is called by the present inhabitants the streights of Caffa. Sanson places Theodosia where the modern city of Tusba stands. Nymphæum, Lagyra, Charax, &c. stood on the Euxine sea, and Panticapæum on the Bosphorus. This city was, according to Strabo, the metropolis of the European Bosphorus. It was founded by the Milesians, and for some ages governed by its own laws; but at length subdued by the kings of Bosphorus. Some writers have confounded the cities of Panticapæum and Bosphorus; but Pliny, Strabo, and Stephanus speak of them as two different cities. Procopius often mentions the latter; but never takes any notice of Panticapæum, tho' the capital of Taurica Chersonesus. This peninsula is at present possessed by the Tartars, and commonly known by the name of the Crim, which it borTaurica Chersonesus.

rowed

rowed from the city of Krym, antiently called Cremnos. The Boſphorus Cimmerius, now the ſtreights of Kertzi or Caffa, which divides Europe and Aſia, or the Crim and Kuban, is not above four leagues over. The Palus Mæotis extends from ſouth-weſt to north-eaſt about one hundred and thirty leagues, having on the north and weſt Little Tartary; on the ſouth-weſt the Cherſoneſus Taurica, now the Crim; and on the eaſt and ſouth-eaſt Sarmatia Aſiatica, now Circaſs Tartary. This ſea or lake was called by the antients Palus Mæotis from the Mæotæ or Mæotici, a people inhabiting the European, and part of the Aſiatic coaſt, and alſo Palus Sarmatiæ, Cimmeriæ Paludes, Scythica Stagna, and Ponti Euxini mater, or, the mother of the Euxine ſea; but its modern name is the ſea of Zabach, borrowed from a fiſh taken there at certain ſeaſons of year.

Kings of Boſphorus.

THE Boſphorani were governed by princes of their own in the earlieſt times; but as the works of Trogus Pompeius, who wrote the hiſtory of the Boſphoran kings [k], have not reached us, we can give but a very indifferent account of them. The firſt we meet with in hiſtory is Leucon, who is mentioned by Strabo [l]; but we are quite in the dark both as to his reign and to that of Pariſades, whom Strabo calls the laſt of his race. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that many kings had reigned in Boſphorus before the conſulate of M. Genutius Augurinus and P. Curiatius Philo. Hence it is plain, that Leucon and Pariſades were not, as ſome authors have thought, the founders of the Boſphoran kingdom, but preceded by a long ſeries of princes of the ſame race. Spartacus I. ſucceeded Pariſades, and is ſaid by Diodorus Siculus in one place to have reigned ſeven years, and in another ſeventeen [m]. He had two ſons, viz. Seleucus and Spartacus. He left the kingdom to the former, who reigned four years, and dying without children, was ſucceeded by his brother Spartacus II. and he, after a reign of twenty-ſix years, by his ſon Satyrus, who reigned fourteen years [n]. After him came Leucon II. who waged war with one Mnemon, probably a neighbouring prince, by whom he was overcome, and with the Heracleans, over whom he gained conſiderable advantages. He had a particular regard for the Athenians, whom he ſupplied with a great quantity quantity of corn in the time of a famine, and allowed their merchants a free trade to all the parts of his dominions. The Athenians, in return for his kindneſs, made him and his children free of Athens, and granted to his trading ſubjects the ſame privileges and exemptions in Attica, which their citizens enjoyed in Boſphorus, erecting three pillars in memory of the good underſtanding that paſſed between the two ſtates, viz. one in the city of Boſphorus, another in the Pireæus, and the third near the temple of the Argonauts. He was a great encourager of trade, granting ample privileges to all foreign merchants ſettling at Theodoſia in the Cherſoneſus; by which means that city became one of the moſt rich and populous of the eaſt [o]. His exploits were celebrated by Chryſippus the philoſopher, as Plutarch informs us, but have not reached our times. He left two ſons, Spartacus and Pariſades. The former, ſirnamed Satyrus, ſucceeded him in the kingdom, and is called by Dinarchus the tyrant of Boſphorus. He reſtored Hecatæus, a neighbouring prince, to his kingdom, obliging him to marry his daughter, and murder Tirgataone his former wife, in order to make room for her. This kindled a bloody war between him and the ſubjects of Hecatæus, in which he loſt his ſon, with whoſe death he was ſo ſenſibly affected, that he did not long out-live him [p]. Dinarchus tells us [q], that both he and his brother Pariſades ſent yearly to Demoſthenes a thouſand buſhels of wheat. He reigned only five years, and was ſucceeded, according to ſome, by his younger ſon Gorgippus; according to others, by his brother Pariſades. Of Gorgippus we find nothing upon record. Pariſades is ſaid by Diodorus Siculus [r] to have reigned thirty-eight years. He left three ſons, Satyrus, Eumelus, and Prytanis, who made war upon one another. Satyrus II. the eldeſt, ſucceeded his father; but his brother Eumelus, being aſſiſted by Ariophames king of Thrace, attempted to drive him from the throne. Satyrus had recourſe to the Sythians, who ſent to his aſſiſtance twenty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe. With theſe, two thouſand Greeks, and an equal number of Thracians, he engaged and put to flight Eumelus, whoſe army conſiſted of

[k] Vide Prolog. l. xxxvii. [l] Strabo, l. vii. [m] Diodor. Sicul. l. xii. c. 4 & 5. [n] Idem l. xiv.

[o] Demoſthen. contra Leptin. Diodor. Sicul. l. xiv. & xvi. Strabo, l. vii. Polyæn. l. v. Dion. Chryſoſt. orat. 2. de regno. [p] Diodor. Sicul. xvi. Polyæn. l. viii. [q] Dinarch. in orat. contra. Demoſthen. [r] Diodor. Sicul. l. xvi.

of two-and-twenty thouſand foot, and twenty thouſand horſe, all Thracians, under the command of Ariophames or Ariopharnes their king. After this defeat Eumelus and the Thracian king retired to a ſtrong hold, where they were cloſely beſieged by the conqueror. While Satyrus continued before this place, Meniſcus, who commanded the mercenaries, being ſurrounded by the enemy while he was attempting to ſtorm the fort, Satyrus haſtened to his relief, and reſcued him from the imminent danger he was in; but was himſelf run through the arm with a ſpear, and died of the wound the night following, after a ſhort reign of nine months. Upon his death Meniſcus, breaking up the ſiege, retired with the army to the city of Gargaza, and from thence carried the king's body to Panticapæum, and there delivered it to his brother Prytanis, who having buried it with great pomp, took upon himſelf the command of the army, and the title of king. Eumelus ſent embaſſadors to the new king, offering to diſband his forces, upon condition that he would divide the kingdom with him; but Prytanis not hearkening to his propoſals, by the aſſiſtance of the neighbouring barbarians, he made himſelf maſter of Gargara, and ſeveral other cities. Hereupon Prytanis marched againſt him, at the head of a numerous army; but was overcome in a pitched battle, and being ſhut up within a narrow neck of land between the Palus Mæotis and a lake, was forced to ſurrender, give up his army, and depart the kingdom; but he ſoon returned, and, by the aſſiſtance of his friends, made himſelf maſter of ſome ſtrong holds. Whereupon Eumelus marched againſt him anew, and having put his army to flight, purſued him to a place called the gardens, where he endeavoured to make head againſt his brother's victorious army, but was killed in the attempt. Upon his death Eumelus ordered all the friends and children of his two brothers Satyrus and Prytanis to be murdered. Pariſades alone, the ſon of Satyrus, had the good luck to make his eſcape to the court of Agaras king of the Scythians; all the others were inhumanly maſſacred. This cruelty incenſed the people, who were ready to revolt, and revenge the death of their friends with that of the tyrant, when Eumelus calling them together, promiſed to alter his conduct, reſtore to the cities their former privileges, freed them from all kinds of taxes, and having by that means regained their affections, governed the kingdom with great equity and moderation to his death. He is celebrated by the antients as the greateſt king who had ever

ver reigned in Bosphorus; for he had not only defended his dominions against the neighbouring barbarians, who, at different times, invaded it with numerous armies, but would have brought all the nations round him under subjection, as Diodorus informs us, had he not been prevented by death, after a reign of five years and as many months; for as he was returning out of Scythia in a chariot covered with a canopy, the horses taking fright, and the driver not being able to stop them in their career, the king threw himself out, but his sword entangling with one of the wheels, he was hurried away with the violent motion of the chariot, and killed. We are told, that he had been forewarned by an oracle to beware of a moving house, and therefore never ventured to go into any house, till his servants had thoroughly examined both the roof and foundation; but when they understood that the horses had been frightened at the canopy placed on his chariot, they concluded that the prophecy was fulfilled [s]. He was succeeded by his son Spartacus III. who reigned twenty years. Many years after we read of Leucanor reigning in the Bosphorus Cimmerius, and paying a yearly tribute to the Scythians. He was treacherously murdered by one Arsacomas, a Scythian prince, for having refused him his daughter in marriage [t]. Upon his death Euboitus, his brother by a concubine, was placed on the throne by the Sarmatians, and maintained on it by them and by the Alani, and the Greek states of Asia, who willingly joined him against the Scythians, who began to be too powerful in those parts; however, he could never enjoy his kingdom in peace and tranquillity, till he submitted to pay the Scythians a double tribute [u]. The next prince we find reigning in Bosphorus is Parisades III. who not being able to pay to Scilurus king of Scythia the unreasonable tribute he exacted, nor withstand so powerful an enemy, voluntarily resigned the kingdom to Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, after it had been held by his ancestors for the space of four hundred years, as Lucian, Diodorus Siculus [w], and Strabo, inform us [x]. In the time of the last Mithridatic war the Bosphorans revolted from Mithridates, and admitted Roman garrisons into the cities of Phanagoria, Theodosia, Chersonesus, and Nymphæum; but, upon the death

[s] Diodor. Sicul. l. xx. [t] Lucian. in Toxari. [u] Idem ibid. [w] Lucian. & Diodor. Sicul. ibid. [x] Strabo. l. vii.

death of that prince, the whole country was reſtored by Pompey to his ſon Pharnaces, whom he honoured with the title of a friend and ally of the Roman people. During the civil war between Cæſar and Pompey, Pharnaces, not ſatisfied with the kingdom of Boſphorus, attempted the recovery of his father's dominions, croſſed the Euxine ſea, and reduced Colchis, Armenia Minor, and ſeveral places in Cappadocia, Pontus, and Bithynia [y]. After the battle of Pharſalia, Cæſar ſent Domitius Calvinus againſt him with part of his army; but Domitius being overcome in a pitched battle, Pharnaces made himſelf maſter of the remaining part of Pontus and Cappadocia, and of all Bithynia; whence he was preparing to advance into Aſia properly ſo called; but in the mean time Cæſar leaving Egypt, where he was paſſing his time in banquets and revels with Cleopatra, and croſſing Syria, came unexpectedly upon Pharnaces, and having attacked him, without allowing any reſpite either to his own men or to the enemy, gained a complete victory; an account whereof he wrote to one of his friends in the celebrated words, veni, vidi, vici, I came, I ſaw, I conquered; which, as they well expreſſed the expedition by which he obtained ſo ſignal a victory, he cauſed to be wrote in capital letters, and carried before him in his triumph [z]. Pharnaces, after this defeat, fled to Sinope with a thouſand horſe, and from thence ſailed back into Boſphorus; where he no ſooner landed, but Aſander, whom he had appointed governor of that country during his abſence, ſeized him, and put him to death, taking upon himſelf the title of king of Boſphorus [a]. Hereupon Cæſar beſtowed the kingdom of Boſphorus on Mithridates the Pergamian, in regard of the eminent ſervice he had done him in Egypt, as we have related in the hiſtory of that country [b]. At the ſame time he appointed him tetrarch of Galatia, which he had a title to in right of his mother, who was deſcended from one of thoſe tetrarchs. He might alſo have laid claim to the kingdom of Boſphorus in right of his father; for he was ſuppoſed to be the ſon of Mithridates the Great, his mother having been one of that prince's concubines, after the death of Menodotus of Pergamus her huſband. But Cæſar, in appointing him king of Boſphorus, gave him only an empty title;

[y] Plut. in Cæſ. Hirt. de bell. Alexandrin. Dio Caſs. l. xlii. Appian. de bell. civil. l. ii. in Cæſ. Suet. in Julio.

[z] Appian. l. ii. p 485. Plut.

[a] Appian. Hirt. & Plut. ibid.

[b] Vide p. 282, 286 & ſeq.

title; for Aſander being in poſſeſſion of the whole country, he was to ſettle himſelf on the throne by force of arms. With this view he raiſed what forces he could; but, inſtead of gaining the kingdom, loſt his life, being overcome and ſlain in battle by Aſander, who, after his death, held the kingdom without any further moleſtation, the Romans not being at leiſure, on account of their inteſtine broils, to give him any diſturbance [c]. He was a man of great courage and ſkill in the military art, and in neither reckoned inferior to any of the age he lived in; however, the emperor Auguſtus diſtruſting him, gave the command of the Boſphoran troops, who ſerved in the Roman army, to Scribonius; which Aſander took ſo much amiſs, that he abſtained from all food, and by that means put an end to his life in the ninety-third year of his age [d]. Upon his death, Scribonius giving out that he was the grandſon of Mithridates, married Dynamis the daughter of Pharnaces, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the kingdom of Boſphorus; but was ſoon driven out by Polemon, on whom Auguſtus had beſtowed that kingdom. Polemon was the ſon of Zeno, a famous orator of Laodicea, and, after the battle of Philippi, had been by Marc Anto ny rewarded, for his gallant behaviour, with that part of the kingdom of Pontus which lay next to Cappadocia. He attended the ſame Marc Antony in his expedition againſt the Parthians, by whom he was taken priſoner. He was afterwards ſent by the king of Media to negotiate a peace between him and Antony; which he concluded to the great ſatisfaction of the triumvir, by whom he was on that conſideration made king of Armenia Minor. After the battle of Actium, in which he fought with great bravery for Antony, he was not only pardoned by Auguſtus, but ſent by him, or rather by Agrippa, againſt Scribonius, whom he defeated, and drove from the throne. He engaged in ſeveral wars with the neighbouring barbarians, whom he kept in awe, preventing them from making incurſions into the Roman territories; but was at length overcome, taken, and put to death by the Aſpungitani, whom Strabo reckons among the nations that bordered on the Palus Mœotis. He had been honoured by Auguſtus ſome time before his death with with the title of a friend and ally of the Roman people [e]. He left two ſons, Zeno and Polemon II. The former, ſirnamed Artaxias, was by Germanicus made king of Armenia, to the great ſatisfaction of the Armenians, among whom he had been brought up [f]. The latter ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Boſphorus, which he afterwards exchanged in the reign of Claudius for part of Cilicia. We find no further mentioned in hiſtory of the Boſphorani till the reign of Trajan, who, as Eutropius informs us [g], received the king of Boſphorus under his protection. In the time of Antoninus Pius, one Rhymetalces reigned in the Boſphorus Cimmerius, and came to Rome to treat with the emperor about the affairs of his kingdom, as we read in Capitolinus [h]. Lucian tells us [i], that the Boſphorans, in his time, were governed by a king named Eupator; but what fate attended them thenceforth to the diviſion of the empire, we find no-where recorded; and therefore ſhall proceed to a ſuccinct account of the other kingdoms mentioned in the title prefixed to this chapter.

[c] Appian. in Mithridat. p. 254. Strabo. l. xiii. p. 625. Hirt. ibid. [d] Strabo. & Dio, ibid. Lucian. in Macrob.

[e] Strabo, l. xi. Plut. in Anton Appian. de bell, civil. l. v. Dion. l. xlix. liii. liv. [f] Tacit. Annal. l. ii. c. 54. 56. [g] Eutrop. l. viii. [h] Capitol in Antonin. Pio. [i] Lucian. ibid.

MEDIA.

Media. WE have delivered elſewhere [k] the hiſtory of Media, from the earlieſt account of time to its being reduced by the Perſians, by whom it was held to the reign of Darius Codomanus, when the other provinces of Media fell under the power of the Macedonians; but that which lay between mount Taurus and the Caſpian ſea, withſtood Alexander, being defended by one Atropatus, who, upon the downfal of the Perſian monarchy, kept it for himſelf, and tranſmitted it to his poſterity, who held it as ſovereigns to Strabo's time [l]. From Atropatus it was called Media Atropatia, or ſimply Atropatene. In proceſs of time it became a very conſiderable kingdom; for Strabo tells us [m], that the kings [k] Vol. iv. p. 445. & ſeq. [l] Strabo, l. xi. p. 523. [m] Idem ibid.

kings of Atropatene could bring into the field forty thouſand foot and twenty thouſand horſe. The metropolis of this kingdom is called by Strabo, Gaza; by Plutarch, Phrahata; an by Dion Praaſpa. But as we have deſcribed elſewhere [n] this country, and given an account of the cities it contained, we ſhall proceed to the hiſtory of its kings. The firſt who reigned here was Atropatus, who, being governor of this province in the time of Darius Codomanus, as we have hinted above, defended the narrow paſſes leading into it againſt Alexander, and upon his departure cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged king of the country. Upon the death of Alexander, Perdiccas, who had married his daughter, ſuffered him to enjoy his new kingdom without moleſtation. The other kings of Media we find mentioned in hiſtory, are, Timarchus, Mithridates, Darius, and Artuaſdes. Timarchus reigned in the time of Demetrius Soter king of Syria, who attempted, but without ſucceſs, to reduce Media, as Trogus informs [o]. Mithridates was contemporary with Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, whom he aſſiſted againſt Lucullus. He married the daughter of Tigranes king of Armenia; but dying without iſſue, left the kingdom to his brother Darius who likewiſe ſided with Mithridates; but was overcome by Pompey [p]. Darius was ſucceeded by his ſon Artuaſdes, or Artauaſedes on whom Marc Antony made war at the inſtigation of Artabazes king of Armenia; but was therein attended with bad ſucceſs, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of Parthia. Upon the retreat of Marc Antony, Artuaſdes falling out with his allies the Parthians, about the diviſion of the Roman ſpoils, ſent embaſſadors into Egypt, acquainting Antony, that he was ready to join him with all his forces, and aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of his power in the reduction of Parthia. Hereupon the triumvir reſolved to return into Parthia by the way of Media, and to attach Artuaſdes more firmly to his intereſt, firſt ſent him as a preſent the head of Artabazes his inveterate enemy, whom he had treacherouſly ſeized, and afterwards contracted a marriage for Alexander, one of his ſons by Cleopatra, with a daughter of the king of Media; but in the mean time the civil war breaking out between Antony and Octavianus, Artuaſdes ſent his forces to join the former, which gave the Parthians an opportunity of invading his dominions, and driving him from the throne. After having lived some time in Syria, he had recourse to the clemency of Octavianus, who received him into favour, and bestowed upon him the kingdom of Armenia Minor [q]. As for the kingdom of Media, it continued subject to the Parthians, who held it for many years, as we shall see in the history of that people. Some authors indeed speak of kings reigning in Media long after the times we are now writing of, but these princes were probably of the race of the Arsacidæ; for Dion, Tacitus, and Josephus tell us, that the Parthian kings sometimes suffered their younger brothers to reign in Media.

[n] Vol. iv. p. 445. & ſeq. [o] Trog. Pomp. Prolog. l. xxxiv. [p] Dion. l. xxxv. Plut. in Pomp. Appian. in Mithridat.

[q] Dion. l. xlix. p. 415. Zonar. Tom. II.

BACTRIA.

Bactria. BACTRIA or Bactriana, now Chorassan, was bounded on the west by Margiana; on the north by the river Oxus; on the south by mount Paropamisus; and on the east by Asiatic Scythia and the country of the Massagetæ. It was a large, fruitful, and well-peopled country, containing, if Ammianus Marcellinus is to be credited [r], a thousand cities; but of these we find only the following mentioned by the antients. Bactra, the metropolis of the country, called antiently Zariaspe. Some writers indeed make Bactra and Zariaspe two different cities; but Strabo [s] and Pliny [t] tell us in expres terms, that Bactra and Zariaspe were two names of one and the same city. Pliny places Bactra on the river Zariaspa; and Curtius on the Bactrus, at the foot of mount Paropamisus; but Ptolemy, disagreeing with both these writers, describes it as standing on the river Dargidus, in the heart of the country, at a great distance from mount Paropamisus, which was the southern boundary. From the river Bactrius, Curtius [u] will have both the city and country to have borrowed their names. The other cities of Bactria, mentioned by the antient geographers, are, Alexandria, probably built by Alexander; Darapsa or Adraspa, the same city which Arrian calls Drapsaca [w]; Eucratidia, Cariata, both spoke of by Strabo [x]; the latter latter was destroyed by Alexander; Sisimethræ Petra, where Alexander solemnized his marriage with Roxana, who was kept there; Maracanda, repaired, but not built, as Æneas Sylvius and Cambinus have imagined, by Tamerlan. The same writer tells us, that Maracanda was the birth-place of that great commander, but are therein contradicted by Chalcocondyles [y]. This city is now known by the name of Samaracanda; whence the present kings of Persia style themselves princes of Samaracanda, as David Chytræus informs us [z]. Ebusmi and Charracharta, now Chiariachar, were once two places of great note, being called by Ptolemy royal cities. The chief rivers of Bactria were, the Ochus, the Oxus, the Orgomenes, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Dargomenes, the Zariaspa or Zariaspes, the Artimis, and the Dargidus. Most of these rivers fall into the Ochus, which springs from mount Paropamisus, and discharges itself into the Caspian sea. Paropamisus or Parapamisus is a part of mount Taurus, and not of mount Caucasus, as those who attended Alexander in his expedition into India were pleased to call it [a]. That part of Bactria which was watered by the river Oxus, is described by the antients as a very fruitful country, abounding with pastures, and well stocked with cattle of a very large size; but the southern parts were nothing but sandy deserts, without any tract or beaten way; insomuch, that travellers used to rest in the day-time, and pursue their journey in the night, guiding themselves by the stars, as on the sea, not without danger of being buried in the sand. The country was inhabited by the following nations, viz. the Salataræ, Zariaspæ, Chomatri, Comi, Acinacæ, Tambyzæ, Thocaræ, Marycæi, Amarispii, and several others of less note. The Bactrians in general were reckoned good soldiers, being always at war, either among themselves, or with the neighbouring nations, and enemies to all manner of luxury. Pliny tells us, that they used to expose their old people, when they attained to a certain age, to be devoured by fierce mastiffs, which they kept for that purpose, and called sepulchral dogs. The same author adds, that they allowed their daughters to keep company with whom they pleased, and that incontinency was no ways disreputable even to the women [b]. As to their government, they were ruled by kings in the earliest ages. Zoroaster is said by Eusebius [c] to have reigned in Bactria, and to have been contemporary with Ninus, who made war upon him, and subdued his country. But Ctesias mentions one Oxyartes as reigning in Bactria, when that country was reduced by Ninus, and will have Zoroaster to have been contemporary with Cyrus the Great. Pliny questioned whether he ever reigned in Bactria; but of him and his writings we have spoke elsewhere [d]. All authors agree, that Bactria was subdued, first by the Assyrians, and afterwards by the Persians under Cyrus the great, as we have related in the history of those two empires. It fell afterwards under the power of the Macedonians, and was held by the successors of Seleucus Nicator till the reign of Antiochus Theos, when Theodotus, from governor of that province, became king, and strengthened himself so effectually in his new kingdom, while Antiochus was engaged in a war with Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt, that he could never afterwards dispossess him of his acquisitions [e]. He was succeeded by his son, named also Theodotus, who, entering into an alliance with Arsaces, the founder of the Parthian monarchy, considerably enlarged his kingdom, while the two brothers Seleucus Callinicus and Antiochus Hierax were wasting their strength against each other [f]. Theodotus was overcome in battle, and driven out by Euthydemus his brother, who, as he was a very valiant and prudent prince, maintained a long war against Antiochus the Great, in defence of his country, obliging him at last to lay aside all thoughts of ever reducing it, as we have related in the history of Syria. Euthydemus was succeeded by his brother Menander, who passing the river Hypanis, subdued the kingdom of Sigertis, the large province of Pattalena, and several other countries unknown even to Alexander the Great; but while he was preparing to make new conquests, and invade the Syrian dominions, he was taken off by a violent fever, to the great grief of his subjects, among whom his ashes were distributed, to quell the disturbances that arose on account of his body, which many cities laid claim to. By this means magnificent monuments were erected to his memory in most cities of Bactria [g]. He was succeeded by his nephew Demetrius, the Revolt of the Bactrians.

[r] Ammian. Marcel. l. xxiii. [s] Strabo, l. xi. [t] Plin. l. vi. c. 15, 16. [u] Q. Curt. l. vii. c. 4. [w] Arrian. l. iii. c. 29. [x] Strabo, l. xv. p. 493.

[y] Chalcocond. l. iii. [z] Chytræus in chron. [a] Strabo, l. xi. p. 348. Arrian. Indic. c. 11. [b] Plin. ibid.

Year after the flood 2699.
Year before Christ 300.

[c] Euseb. in chron. [d] Vide Vol. v. p. 34, 35, 41, 302. & seq. [e] Arrian. in Parthic. apud cod. 58. Syncel. p. 284. Justin. l. xii. c. 4. Strabo. l. xi. p. 515. [f] Justin. l. xli. c. 4. [g] Arrian. Perip. p. 32. Trog. in Prolog. l. xli.

the ſon of Euthydemus, in whoſe name he had governed, that prince being very young at his father's death. Demetrius was no ways inferior to his uncle in courage and bravery; for he had not only maintained himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the provinces which Menander had reduced, but made ſeveral new acquiſitions, and at his death left the kingdom of Bactria in a moſt flouriſhing condition. His ſon Eucratides built the city of Eucratidia, and having invaded India, made himſelf maſter of all thoſe provinces which had been ſubjected by Alexander. On his return to his own dominions, he was treacherouſly murdered by his ſon, named alſo Eucratides, to whom he had committed the government of the kingdom during his abſence. So wicked an action did not go long unpuniſhed; for the Scythians invading Bactria on one ſide, and the Parthians on the other, Eucratides was driven from the throne, and ſoon after killed in attempting to recover it. Upon his death the Parthians ſeized on the provinces of Aſpionia and Thuriva, leaving all the reſt to the Scythians, who held the kingdom of Bactria till the invaſion of the Huns, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in a more proper place. The kings, whom we find mentioned as reigning in Bactria in the times of the emperors Adrian, Antoninus Pius, and Valerian, were all of Scythian extraction; but the Scythians were in their turn driven out by the Huns, who reigned in Bactria, as we read in our modern hiſtorians, in the time of Ladiſlaus IV. king of Hungary.

E D E S S A.

THE antient city of Edeſſa is placed by geographers in Meſopotamia, on the banks of the Scirtus, between mount Maſius and the Euphrates, into which the Scirtus empties itſelf. It was once a place of great note, and famous for a temple of the Syrian goddeſs, which was reckoned one of the richeſt in the world, nations and princes ſending thither preſents and offerings from all parts of the eaſt. From this temple Edeſſa was ſtyled Hierapolis, or the holy city. During the inteſtine broils, which greatly weakened the kingdom of Syria, one Augarus or Abgarus ſeized on the city of Edeſſa and its fruitful territory, Edeſſa.

tory, which he erected into a new kingdom, ſtyling himſelf king of Edeſſa, and tranſmitting the ſame title to his poſterity. Under which of the Syrian kings this revolution happened, we find no-where recorded. All we know of the founder of this new kingdom is, that he often defeated the Syrians, to whom the country which he poſſeſſed had been long ſubject, and, in ſpite of their utmoſt efforts, left at his death his ſmall principality, as Egnatius [h] and Xylander ſtyle it [i], in a very flouriſhing condition. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Ariamnes, or Abgarus II. for the name of Abgarus was common to all the kings of Edeſſa. This prince made himſelf maſter of the whole province of Oſroene, and entering into an alliance with Pompey againſt Tigranes the Great, king of Armenia, ſupplied his army with all manner of proviſions. In the Parthian war he pretended to ſide with Craſſus; but in the mean time maintaining a private correſpondence with the enemy, was the chief cauſe of the great overthrow which the Romans received at Carrhæ, as we ſhall relate at length in the hiſtory of the Parthians. He left the kingdom to his ſon Uchanias, mentioned by Euſebius [k], who was ſucceeded by his ſon Abgarus III. a prince much ſpoke of by the eccleſiaſtic writers, on account of the letters which he is ſuppoſed to have wrote to our Saviour, and our Saviour to him. Theſe letters were found by Euſebius, as he aſſures us, in the public archives of Edeſſa, and by him tranſlated out of the original Syriac into Greek, and inſerted in his eccleſiaſtic hiſtory [l]. They are alſo ſpoke of by Nicephorus [m], Cedrenus [n], Dorotheus [o], Evagrius [p], Glycas [q], Curopalates [r], Nicetas [s], &c. The laſt mentioned writer tells us, that our Saviour's letter was ſtolen in the reign of Andronicus Comnenus, and never after heard of [t]. Theſe letters have given occaſion to many diſputes among our modern writers, ſome maintaining them to be genuine, and others to be forged. This ſubject has been learnedly handled by Caſaubon, Gretſerus, Tillemont, Du Pin, and the late father Alexander, a writer of great note of the Dominican order, to whom we refer ſuch of our readers as are are deſirous to be well acquainted with this controverſy, which is altogether foreign to our ſubject. Abgarus IV. the ſon of the above-mentioned prince, reigned in the time of the emperor Claudius, and joined C. Caſſius governor of Syria, who had been ordered by that emperor to place Meherdates on the throne of Parthia. When Meherdates arrived at Edeſſa, Abgarus, who had been gained over by the Parthians, detained him there, under various pretences, till ſuch time as the enemy had drawn together their forces, and, in the heat of the engagement, abandoning the Romans with the king of the Adiabenians, brought on the defeat of their army [u]. The next prince of Edeſſa we find mentioned in hiſtory is that Abgarus, who was contemporary with the emperor Trajan, to whom he ſent, during the war he waged with the Parthians, two hundred and fifty fine horſes, a great many complete ſuits of armour, and ſixty thouſand javelins. Trajan accepted of three breaſt-plates only, and declared Abgarus a friend and ally of the Roman people [w]. Suidas ſometimes calls him Abgarus, and ſometimes Augarus, giving him in one place the title of king, and elſewhere ſtyling him the chief, of the Edeſſans. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Arbandes, who was highly favoured by Trajan. Abgarus VI. the ſon of Arbandes, is mentioned by Capitolinus, in his life of Antoninus Pius, and by Epiphanius, who calls him a moſt pious prince. Another prince of the ſame name reigned at Edeſſa in the time of the emperor Severus, aſſiſted him in the wars he waged in the eaſt, and attended him to Rome, where he was, by the emperor's orders, received and entertained with the utmoſt pomp and ſplendor [x]. He was afterwards ſuſpected by Caracalla of holding a correſpondence with the enemies of Rome, and being ſummoned to juſtify himſelf before the emperor, he was, by his orders, confined, and his kingdom reduced to a Roman province [y]. He is by Spartianus called king of Perſia; but by Dion, Zonaras, and Herodianus king of the Oſoreni, the dominions of the kings of Edeſſa being confined within the narrow bounds of Oſroene, or, as others call it, Oſdroene, a province of Meſopotamia, bounded on the weſt and ſouth by the Euphrates; on the eaſt by the Chaboras or

[h] Egnat. in Spart. Sever. [i] Xylander, in Dion. l. xl. [k] Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. i. c. 15. [l] Idem, l. i. c. 15. & l. ii. c. 1. [m] Niceph. Calliſt. l. ii. c. 7. [n] Cedren. p. 144. & ſeq. [o] Doroth. in Synopſi. [p] Evagrius, l. iv. c. 27. [q] Glycas, p. 393, 441. [r] Curopalat. p. 60, 99. [s] Nicetas, l. ii. [t] Nicetas, ibid.

[u] Tacit. l. xii. [w] Suidas, voce Εδεσσα. Theodos. Min. in fragment. [x] Spartian. in Severo. [y] Dion, & Zonar. in Caracalla & Heliogabalo, Spartian. ubi ſupra. Herodian. l. iii.

or Aborras; and on the north by mount Taurus, dividing it from the Greater Armenia.

EMESA.

Emesa. EMESA, Emisa, or Emissa, was a city of Syria, placed by most of the antient geographers on the Orontes, between Apamea and Laodicea Cabiosa. This city one Sampsiceramus, an Arabian, seized during the troubles of Syria, and assuming the title of king, held Emesa, and its small territory, without the least disturbance from the Seleucidæ, who had other more important wars on their hands [z]. Sampsiceramus is often mentioned by Cicero in his letters to Atticus [a]. But Nizolius is of opinion, that Cicero, under that disguise, meant Pompey, who had overcome Sampsiceramus. He left two sons, Jamblichus and Alexander. The former succeeded his father, and, as he was greatly attached to the Romans, acquainted Cicero, while he governed Cilicia in quality of proconsul, with the motions and designs of the Parthians, who, under the conduct of Pacorus their king, were preparing to invade Syria. In the civil wars of Rome, he sided first with Cæsar against Pompey, and afterwards with Antony against Octavianus. After the victory gained by the latter at Actium, Antony, apprehending that he designed to follow the example of the neighbouring princes, who had all declared for the conqueror, got him into his power, and, upon that bare suspicion, caused him to be put to a most cruel death [b]. He is styled by Strabo, the petty king of the Emesseni; by Josephus, a petty prince of Arabia; and by Dion, prince of the Arabians. Upon his death the kingdom was by Antony bestowed on his brother Alexander, who, continuing faithful to his benefactor in his greatest distress, was taken prisoner by Octavianus, and not only deprived of his kingdom, but carried in triumph, and afterwards put to death [c]. His son Jamblichus II. was received into favour by Octavianus, and by by him reſtored to his father's kingdom, after he had lived ſome time in baniſhment [d]. Many years after him reigned Sampſiceramus II. whom ſome writers take to have been his grandſon. He is mentioned by Joſephus, who ſtyles him king of the Emeſeni [e]. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Azizus, who falling in love with Druſilla, the ſiſter of Agrippa Minor, embraced the Jewiſh religion, in order to marry her [f]. His ſiſter Jotape was married to Ariſtobulus the brother of Agrippa the Great [g]. Azizus is the laſt king of Emeſa we find mentioned in hiſtory. This ſmall kingdom was perhaps ſeized by the Arabians; for ſome years after we find it poſſeſſed by the Ituræans. The emperor Heliogabalus was a native, as Evagrius informs us, of the city of Emeſa.

[z] Strabo, l. xvi. [a] Cic. ad Attic. l. ii. epist. 14, 16, 17, & 23. [b] Strabo, ibid. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 13. Dion' lib. l. Cic. epist. ad fam. l. xv. epist. 1. [c] Dion, l. ii

[d] Idem, l. liv. [e] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 7. & l. xix. c. 7.
[f] Idem, l. xx. c. 5. Zonar. Tom. I. [g] Idem, l. xviii. c. 7.

ADIABENE.

Adiabene.

AS we have deſcribed elſewhere the province of Adiabene [h], which was the richeſt and moſt fruitful of all Aſſyria, we ſhall in this place only give a ſuccinct account of the king's, who taking advantage of the diſturbances that reigned among the Seleucidæ, erected here a new kingdom, and held it in ſpite of the Syrian kings, till they were driven out by the ſuperior power of the Roman emperors. The firſt king we find mentioned in hiſtory, reigned in the time of the Mithridatic war, and joined Tigranes againſt Lucullus, as we read in Plutarch, tho' that author does not acquaint us with his name [i]. Many years after, that is, in the reign of the emperor Claudius, one Monobazus, called alſo Bazeos, ruled over the Adiabenians. This prince falling in love with his ſiſter Helena, married her, and had by her two ſons, viz. Monobazus and Izates. He had ſeveral children by other wives; but as he favoured Izates above all the reſt, this raiſed no ſmall jealouſy in his other ſons, eſpecially in Monobazus the eldeſt. To prevent therefore the evil conſequences which his partiality might occaſion in his family, he ſent Izates to [h] Vol. iv. p. 196. [i] Plut. in Lucul.

to be brought up by one Abemerigus, lord, or, as Josephus calls him, king, of a rich country in that neighbourhood. Abemerigus, who then resided at a place called Spasinus, brought him up with great care, and gave him his daughter Samacha in marriage, and with her a rich and fruitful country by way of dowry. In the mean time Monobazus, as he was stricken in years, and desirous to see his favourite child before his death, sent for him, and receiving him with great tenderness, bestowed upon him the country of Cæron, which abounded with odoriferous plants, and was famous, as Josephus informs us, on account of the remains of Noah's ark, which were still to be seen there in his time. In this country Izates remained till his father's death, when his mother Helena calling together the chief lords of the kingdom, told them, That the deceased king had by his last will, appointed Izates to reign in his stead, as the most worthy of all his children; but that she had not thought proper to acquaint him therewith, till the honour, to which he had been destined by his father, was confirmed to him by the unanimous consent of his subjects. She had scarce uttered these words, when the nobles, prostrating themselves on the ground before the queen, according to the custom of the country, declared that they approved the king's election, and were ready, not only to obey Izates, who had been deservedly preferred to his brothers, but to put them all to death, that he might enjoy the kingdom without disturbance. The queen thanked them for their zeal, but at the same time desired them to forbear shedding the blood of any of the royal family, till the will of their new sovereign was known. Hereupon they entreated the queen to confine at least the young princes till the king's arrival, and in the mean time to appoint one to govern in his name. Helena readily complied with their request, and named her eldest son Monobazus, guardian of the kingdom during his brother's absence, placing with her own hand the diadem on his head, and delivering to him his father's seal, with the robe, called by the Adiabenians sampsera, and exhorting him to govern with justice and moderation till the arrival of his brother, to whom the crown belonged, both by the last will of his father, and the unanimous election of the people. In the mean time Izates, being acquainted with his father's death and the zeal his new subjects had shewn for him, hastened to his kingdom, where he was received with great rejoicings, and met by his brother ther Monobazus, who, on his arrival, reſigned to him the diadem and other enſigns of royalty.

WHILE Izates was at the court of Abemerigus, he had been inſtructed in the Jewiſh religion by one Ananias, who, at his requeſt, had attended him into the kingdom of Adiabene, and continued with him in the province of Cæron, which his father, as we have ſaid above, had beſtowed on him. His mother likewiſe, having been inſtructed by another Jew, had embraced that religion; but nevertheleſs did all that lay in her power to diſſuade her ſon from circumciſion, to which, as a zealous proſelyte, he had a great inclination, thinking himſelf obliged to comply with all the duties of the religion he had embraced. Ananias his inſtructor agreed with the queen, and fearing leſt ſome misfortune might befal him, if the king's converſion, which had been brought about by his means, were publicly known, repreſented to him, that he might ſerve the true God without being circumciſed; that ſince he had reſolved to live according to the other laws of the Jews, God would pardon him this neglect in conſideration of that reſolution; that true religion conſiſted in the pious ſentiments of the ſoul, and not in the circumciſion of the body; which was indeed enjoined by Moſes, but might be diſpenſed with in the preſent circumſtances, conſidering the danger he was in of forfeiting his kingdom by an open profeſſion of the Jewiſh religion, &c. Laſtly, Ananias, who, it ſeems, was a time-ſerver, threatened to forſake the pious prince, if he did not lay aſide, for the preſent, all thoughts of circumciſion. By theſe remonſtrances Izates was prevailed upon to ſuſpend the execution of his deſign; but not long after another Jew, by name Eleazer, a man well verſed in the law of Moſes, and of great learning, arriving at the court, and finding the king, when he went to wait on him, reading the books of Moſes, told him in plain terms, that he offended both againſt God and the law; for it is not enough, ſaid he, for any man to underſtand his religion; the main duty incumbent upon us is, to do what our religion commands us. How long will you remain uncircumciſed? If you are unacquainted with the injunctions of the law touching this point, read it now, that you may no longer be ignorant of the guilt you incur, in omitting one of the moſt eſſential duties of your religion. Izates, ſtruck with theſe words, immediately withdrew, and, in compliance with the law, ſubmitted to the ceremony which it preſcribed ed [k]. In his reign Artabanus king of the Parthians, being driven out by his rebellious ſubjects, had recourſe to him, and was not only kindly received at his court and treated like a king, but, by his good offices, reſtored to the crown, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of Parthia; in acknowledgement of which kindneſs, Artabanus yielded to him the fruitful province of Niſibis, which he had lately taken from the king of Armenia. Upon the death of Artabanus a civil war breaking out in Parthia, between Gotarzes, and Meherdates, Izates pretended to favour the latter, whoſe claim was ſupported by the emperor Claudius, but maintained the whole time a private correſpondence with the former, and joined him at laſt with all his forces, which brought on the ruin of Meherdates, as we ſhall have occaſion to relate in the hiſtory of Parthia [l].

Monobazus, the king's elder brother, and the other princes of the royal family, finding that Izates had been attended with wonderful ſucceſs, ſays Joſephus [m], in all his undertakings, ever ſince the change of his religion, reſolved to follow his example; which ſo offended the chief lords of the kingdom, that entering into a conſpiracy againſt their prince, who had firſt introduced the Jewiſh religion among them, they wrote privately to Abias king of Arabia, promiſing him great ſums of money, on condition he would aſſiſt them in driving Izates from the throne, and aſſuring him that they were all to a man reſolved to forſake him, and deliver him up to the firſt that ſhould invade his dominions. Hereupon Abias, having drawn together a conſiderable army entered the kingdom of Adiabene, where he was met by Izates, and a battle enſuing, the Adiabenians, at the firſt onſet, fled as if they had been ſeized with a panic fear, and retired in great diſorder to their camp. The king ſeeing himſelf abandoned by his men, retired with them, and having found, on examining the cauſe of ſo ſudden a flight, that the private men had only followed the example of their leaders, and by that means diſcovered the whole plot, he cauſed the chief conſpirators to be immediately put to death, and marching out the next day with the reſt, fell unexpectedly upon the enemy, and gained a complete victory. The king of Arabia, being cloſely purſued by the Adiabenians, ſheltered himſelf in the fortreſs of Arſam, which Izates immediately beſieged, and aſſaulted with ſuch vigour, that it

[k] Joſeph. Antiq. l. xx. c. 2.
[l] Tacitus. Annal. l. xii.
[m] Joſeph. ibid.

it was ſoon obliged to ſurrender. He found there an immenſe booty, and great ſtore of proviſions; but Abias, by a voluntary death, eſcaped captivity, as did many of the Arabian lords who attended him [n]. The conſpirators, tho' thus diſappointed, ſtill perſiſted in their former reſolution of getting rid, by ſome means or other, of a king, who endeavoured to aboliſh their antient religion and introduce a ſtrange law. They therefore had recourſe to Vologeſes king of the Parthians, entreating him to aſſiſt them in driving from the throne Izates, and to give them a king of the race of the Arſacidæ, ſince they could not live under a prince, who countenanced a religion differing from that of his own country. Upon this invitation Vologeſes marched with a mighty army againſt Izates, who, finding himſelf no-ways in a condition to oppoſe ſo powerful an enemy with his own ſtrength, had recourſe to prayers, beſeeching the Almighty, for whoſe ſake he was reduced to ſuch ſtreights, to exert his power in the defence of one who put all his confidence in him. He had ſcarce ended his prayer, when news was brought him, that Vologeſes, who had encamped over-againſt him on the other ſide of the river, which parted Adiabene from Media, was retiring with great haſte and confuſion, upon certain advice, that the Dahæ and Sacæ, taking advantage of his abſence, had invaded Parthia, and were committing every-where moſt dreadful ravages [o]. Izates, being thus delivered, by the protection of heaven, from the imminent danger he was in of loſing both his life and his kingdom, ſpent the remainder of his days in peace and tranquillity, and died in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and twenty-fourth of his reign. Joſephus gives him a moſt extraordinary character, which he well deſerved, if all that writer relates of him be true. He had by his wife Samacha or Samaco, the daughter of Abemerigus, five ſons, who were all brought up under their grandmother Helena at Jeruſalem, and there taught both the Jewiſh language and religion. They were in that city while it was beſieged by Titus, who generouſly pardoned them, and carried them with him to Rome, where they remained as hoſtages [p]. Helena, who was both mother and aunt to Izates, and a zealous proſelyte to the Jewiſh religion, no ſooner ſaw her favourite ſon ſettled on the throne, but ſhe undertook a journey to Jeruſalem, being deſirous to viſit the holy city, and [n] Idem ibid. Jud. Ant. vii. C. 13.

[o] Idem ibid.

[p] Idem, de bell.

and offer sacrifices of thanksgiving in the temple, which was so renowned over all the world. Izates not only supplied her with all things that were necessary for her journey, in a royal and magnificent manner, and with large sums of money, but attended her in person great part of the way. On her arrival at Jerusalem, she was received by the priests and chief men of the nation in a manner suitable to her rank, and entertained with great splendor and magnificence; but soon after, the city being most grievously oppressed by a famine, that, in all likelihood, which had been foretold by the prophet Agabus, as we read in the Acts [q], the pious queen not only refused to be maintained at the public expence, but plentifully supplied the poor of the city with corn from Egypt, and other provisions from the island of Cyprus. She likewise persuaded her son Izates to send a considerable sum of money to the governor of Jerusalem, for the relief of the afflicted citizens [r]. These pious offices, and the zeal she shewed for the Jewish religion, gained her as Josephus informs us, the affection of the whole nation. She continued in Jerusalem, where she built a magnificent palace, which was burnt by the Romans under Titus, till the death of Izates, when she returned to Adiabene, and soon after died. Monobazus, who succeeded his brother Izates, sent his body, with that of his mother Helena, to be deposited in the magnificent monument, which she had erected with three lofty pyramids, about three furlongs from the city of Jerusalem [s]. This monument is mentioned by Eusebius [t], St. Jerom [u], and Pausanias [w]. The latter speaks of it in the following terms: Tho' I have heard of many monuments worthy of admiration, yet I shall here take notice of two only; the one at Halicarnassus, the other in the country of the Jews. The former erected in honour of Mausolus king of Halicarnassus, was so magnificent and stately an edifice that the Romans, struck with its extraordinary beauty and grandeur, called all majestic monuments mausoleums. The other, a monument of surprising workmanship, stands at a small distance from Jerusalem, and is the sepulchre of one Helena, a native of that country. It is all of marble, and has a door, which on a stated day and hour of the year, opens by some hidden springs, and soon after shuts again. At

[q] Acts, c. xi. ver. 28. [r] Joseph. Antiq. l. xx. c. 2. [s] Idem ibid. [t] Euseb. Hist. Eccles. l. ii. c. 12 [u] Hieronym. ad Eustoch. [w] Pausan. l. viii.

As other times you may break it down, but it is impossible to open it. Thus far Pausanias; but Josephus, who was better acquainted with the monuments of his own country than any of the Greeks, takes no notice of this prodigy. Orosius tells us [x], that Helena embraced the Christian religion, and, during the above-mentioned famine, supplied the indigent and distressed Christians with corn brought from Egypt for that purpose.

THO' Izates had several children, yet by his last will he bequeathed the crown to his brother Monobazus, rewarding him thereby for the great care and indefatigable fidelity with which he had governed the kingdom during his absence, and the entire submission he had shewn him, tho' a younger brother, the whole time of his reign. But as to the affairs of this kingdom, there is a profound silence among authors, from the death of Izates, who was contemporary with the emperor Claudius, to the reign of Trajan, when one Mebarsapes ruled there, and joined Cosh-roes king of the Persians against the Romans; but that war proving unsuccessful for him and his allies, he was driven from the throne, and obliged to shelter himself in the dominions of Manus king of Arabia, who attempted to restore him to his kingdom; but as the strong castle of Adenystræ was held by a Roman garrison, which he could never dislodge, he was forced to drop the enterprize, and abandoning his friend and ally, conclude a peace with Rome[y]. We find no further mention made of the Adiabenians, till the reign of Sapor II. king of Persia, when they embraced the Christian religion, as Sozomenus [z] and Nicephorus [a] inform us, and were, on that account, treated with great cruelty by the above-mentioned king, to whom they were at that time subject.

[x] Oros. l. vii. c. 6. [y] Dion, in Trajan. Sex. Ruf. in epit. Theodos. Min. in fragment. l. lxxv. Dionys. [z] Sozom. l. ii. c. 12. [a] Niceph. Histor. Tripar. l. viii. c. 38.

ELYMAIS.

ELYMAIS, or, as Strabo calls it [b], Elymatis, was a province of Persia, lying between the rivers Eulæus and Oroates, and extending from the confines of Media Elymais.

[b] Strabo, l. xvi.

dia to the Erythræan ſea, or Perſian gulf. It was formerly divided into three great diſtricts, viz. Meſabatene, Gabene or Gabiene, and Carbiana, and contained the following cities; Seleucia, in more antient times Soloce, on the banks of the Hedypos or Hedypnus, which Strabo [c] calls a great city; Saſirate, at a ſmall diſtance from mount Caſyrus; Badaca, on the Eulæus; and Elymais, the metropolis of the province, famous for a rich temple conſecrated to Diana, which Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to plunder; but was obliged by the inhabitants to retire with diſgrace, as we have related in the hiſtory of Syria. We muſt not confound this city with that of Perſepolis, called alſo by ſome writers Elymais; for the city we are here ſpeaking of ſtood in the province of Elymais, and the other in that of Perſis. The temple of Elymais was afterwards plundered by one of the Parthian kings, who found in it, as Strabo tells us [d], ten thouſand talents. In this country there was alſo a very rich temple conſecrated to Jupiter Belus, which Antiochus the Great attempted to plunder, but loſt his life in the attempt, as we have related in the hiſtory of his reign. The country of Elymais was inhabited according to Pliny [e], by the following nations, viz. the Oxii or Uxii, Mizæi, Parthuſi, Mardi, Saitæ, Hyi, Coſſæi, Parætaceni, and Meſſabatæ. The Elymæans were as Strabo informs us [f], a powerful people, inured to the toils of war, ſkilful bowmen, &c. and never ſubdued either by the Syro-Macedonian or Parthian kings, but governed by their own princes. If what Strabo writes be true, we may date the riſe of this kingdom from the downfal of the Perſian monarchy; for it is agreed on by all the antients, that the Elymæans were ſubject to the kings of Perſia, and if they never ſubmitted to the Syrian yoke, they muſt have been firſt governed by their own princes, either in Alexander's life-time, or ſoon after his death. Their kings are often ſpoke of by the antients; but not one of them, which is ſomewhat ſurpriſing, named by any writer. All we know of them is, that they aſſiſted Antiochus the Great in his wars with Rome; but afterwards cut off both him and his army in defence of their temple. The like fate would have attended Antiochus Epiphanes, when he attempted to plunder the temple of Diana, had he not, by a timely flight, retired into Media [g]. They afterwards, under under the conduct of their king, engaged in a war against the Babylonians and Susians, in which they were assisted by the Cossæans, who, it seems, were not subject to the kings of Elymais, with thirteen thousand archers [h]. Justin writes [i], that Mithridates king of Parthia, having overcome the king of the Elymæans, made himself master of all his dominions. But what Justin says is contradicted by Strabo, and also by Plutarch, who tells us in express words, that the Elymæans in Pompey's time were governed by their own kings [k]. But as neither their actions nor names have been transmitted to us, we shall dwell no longer on this barren subject.

[c] Idem ibid. p. 512. [d] Idem ibid. p. 744 [e] Plin. l. vi. c. 27. [f] Idem ibid. [g] Polyb. in excerpt. Val. p. 144. Appian. in Syriac. Maccab. 1. c. vi. ver. 1, 2. &c.

[h] Strabo, ibid. [i] Justin. l. xli. [k] Plut. in Pomp.

CHARACENE.

CHARACENE was the most southern part of Susiana, a province of Persia, lying on the Persian gulf, between the Tigris and the Eulæus. It was so named from the city of Chorax, called first Alexandria, from its founder Alexander the Great; afterwards Antiochia, from Antiochus V. king of Syria, who repaired and embellished it; and lastly, Chorax Spasinæ or Pasinæ, that is, the mole of Spasines, an Arabian king of that name having secured it against the overflowing of the Tigris, which often laid it under water, by a high bank or mole, extending three miles, which served as a fence to all that country [l]. Dionysius Periegetes and Isidorus, author of the Parthicæ Mansiones, were both natives of this city. The small district of Characene was seized by Pasines the son of Sogdonacus, king of the neighbouring Arabs, during the troubles of Syria, and erected into a kingdom [m]. Lucian calls him Hyspasines, and adds, that he ruled over the Characeni and the neighbouring people, and died in the eighty-fifth year of his age [n]. The other kings of this country we find mentioned by the antients, are Teræus, who died in the ninety-second year of his age, and after him Artabazus the seventh, as Lucian informs us, who was driven from the throne by his own subjects; but restored Characene.

[l] Plin. l. vi. c. 27. [m] Idem ibid. [n] Lucian. in Macrob.

ſtored by the Parthians [o]. And this is all we find in the antients relating to the kings of Characene.

[o] Idem ibid.

COMMAGENE.

Commagene or Comagene.

THIS country, which was part of Syria, we have deſcribed elſewhere [p], and therefore ſhall proceed to the hiſtory of its kings. Commagene was ſubject to the Syrians in the time of Antiochus the Great, and left to him by the treaty of peace, which he concluded with Rome after the famous battle of Magneſia; whence it is probable, that it was ſeized by ſome of the princes of the Seleucian family, during their inteſtine wars; for we find no mention made of the kings of Commagene till Pompy's time, and the names of thoſe, who afterwards reigned there, are entirely Syrian. The firſt we find mentioned in hiſtory, is Antiochus, who, together with Darius king of Media, oppoſed Pompey as he entered Syria, after the defeat of Tigranes; but being overcome in battle, he ſubmitted to the conqueror, and was for his ſubmiſſion not only confirmed by Pompey in his kingdom, but rewarded with part of Meſopotamia [q]. In the civil war between Cæſar and Pompey he ſent large ſupplies to the latter. He afterwards joined Pacorus king of Parthia, whom Labienus had invited into Syria, and was on that occaſion beſieged by Ventidius in the city of Samoſatæ, and obliged to purchaſe a peace with Marc Antony with three hundred talents. In the reign of Auguſtus a diſpute ariſing between him and his brother Mithridates, he cauſed the embaſſador whom his brother had ſent to plead his cauſe at Rome, to be treacherouſly aſſaſſinated. Whereupon he was ſummoned to appear before the ſenate, and being by that body found guilty of the murder laid to his charge, he was by the emperor's orders put to death [r]. He was ſucceeded by Mithridates, on whom Auguſtus beſtowed the kingdom of Commagene, tho' no-ways related to the deceaſed king, as a reward for his ſervices during the war with Antony and Cleopatra. Mithridates the king's brother was excluded from the throne, for having ſided with Antony [s]. Upon the [p] Vol. ii. p. 263.

[q] Joſeph. Antiq. l. ii. Oros. l. vi.
[r] Dion. l. lii. p. 495.
[s] Idem, l. liv.

the death of Mithridates Auguſtus ſuffered Antiochus II. the ſon of Antiochus I. to take poſſeſſion of his father's kingdom. He died in the reign of Tiberius, and upon his death great diſturbances ariſing between the nobles and the people, the latter demanding a king, and the former deſiring to be governed by a magiſtrate ſent them from Rome, Tiberius complied with the requeſt of the nobles, and appointed Q. Servæus to govern Commagene in quality of Prætor [t]. But Caligula reſtored the kingdom of Commagene to Antiochus the ſon of Antiochus II. adding to it the maritime parts of Cilicia. He defeated the Cilicians, who refuſed to acknowledge him for their king, and took Troſobor their ringleader priſoner. He aſſiſted Veſpaſian againſt Vitellius, and ſerved under Titus at the ſiege of Jeruſalem; but being afterwards ſuſpected of holding a private correſpondence with the Parthians, he was taken priſoner by Ceſennius, and ſent in chains to the emperor Veſpaſian, who baniſhed him to Lacedæmon; but afterwards ſuffered him to lead a private life at Rome. Antiochus left two ſons, viz. Antiochus and Callinicus, and one daughter, named Jotape. Antiochus, ſirnamed Epiphanes, ſerved under Otho againſt Vitellius, and under Veſpaſian in his war with the Jews, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſiege of Jeruſalem. Callinicus is mentioned by Joſephus [u], who tells us, that his ſiſter Jotape was married to Alexander king of Leſis in Cilicia. But Veſpaſian, having reduced Commagene to the form of a Roman province, would not allow any of the ſons of Antiochus to ſucceed him. This country was afterwards made part of the province called Auguſtophratenſis, or, as Ammianus has it, Euphratenſis, and was commonly known by the name of Euphrateſia.

[t] Tacit. Annal. l. ii. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 3. [u] Joſeph. de bell. Jud. l. vii. c. 27.

CHALCIDENE.

CHALCIDENE, one of the moſt fruitful provinces of Syria, was bounded on the eaſt by Chalybonitis; on the weſt by Antiochis; on the ſouth by Apamene and Cœle-Syria; and on the north by Cyrrheſtica. It was called Chalcidene from the city of Chalcis, the metropolis of the province, ſituated at the foot of mount Li- Chalcidene.

banus

banus. This province was seized by Ptolemy the son of Mennæus, during the troubles of Syria, and by him made a separate kingdom. Ptolemy himself is styled by Josephus [w] and Hegesippus [x] only prince of Chalcis; but his son Lysanias is honoured both by Josephus [y] and Dion [z] with the title of king. Upon the death of Antiochus Dionysius king of Syria, he attempted to make himself master of Damascus and all Cœle-Syria; but the inhabitants having an utter aversion to him on account of his cruelty and wickedness, chose rather to submit to Aretas king of Arabia, by whom Antiochus and his whole army had been cut off [a]. He opposed Pompey on his entering Syria, but was by him defeated, taken prisoner, and sentenced to death; which, however, he escaped, by paying to Pompey a thousand talents [b], who left him also in the possession of his kingdom. After Aristobulus king of Judæa had been poisoned by the friends of Pompey, and Alexander his son beheaded at Antioch, as we shall relate in the history of the Jews, he sent Philippion his son to Askalon, whither the widow of Aristobulus had retired with her other children, to bring them all to Chalcis, proposing, as he was in love with one of the daughters, named Alexandria, to maintain them in his own kingdom in a manner suitable to their rank; but Philippion likewise falling in love with Alexandria, married her on the way, for which Ptolemy put him to death on his return, and then married her himself [c]. By reason of this affinity, he assisted to the utmost of his power Antigonus, the younger son of Aristobulus, who being thus assisted by him, took the field at the head of a considerable army; but, on his first entering Judæa, was entirely defeated by Herod [d]. Ptolemy soon after died, and was succeeded by his son Lysanias, who espousing the cause of the Asmonæan family with no less warmth than his father had done, promised to Barzapharnes, who commanded the Parthian troops in Syria, and to Pacorus the king's son, a thousand talents and five hundred women, provided they put Antigonus in possession of the kingdom of Judæa, and deposed Hyrcanus [e]. He was not long after put to death by Marc Antony, at the instigation gation of Cleopatra, who, in order to have his dominions granted to her, accuſed him falſly of having entered into an alliance with the Parthians [f]. Dion Caſſius calls him king of Chalcis and Ituræa; but Strabo informs us [g], that he poſſeſſed only the mountainous parts of Ituræa, as we ſhall ſee in the hiſtory of Arabia, to which the ſmall kingdom of Ituræa belonged.

[w] Joseph. Antiq. l xiv. c. 13. [x] Hegesip. l. i. c. 24. [y] Joseph. de bell. Jud. l. 1. c. 17. [z] Dio, l. xlix. [a] Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 23. & de bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 4. [b] Joseph. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 5 [c] Idem, l. xiv. c. 13. [d] Idem, l. xiv. c. 21. [e] Joseph. de bell. Jud. l. i. c. 11.

And thus far of the conqueſts of Alexander the Great, and the ſeveral kingdoms which ſprung up on the downfal of the Macedonian empire, from their riſe to their being ſubdued by the Romans, the hiſtory of which people will be the chief ſubject of the next volume.

[f] Idem, Antiq. l. xv. c. 4. Dio, l. xlix. p. 411. [g] Strabo, l. xvi.

End of the Ninth VOLUME.

THE

AN INDEX TO THE NINTH VOLUME.

The Figures direct to the Page, and Letter n to the Notes.

A.

ABA, Abus, a mountain in Armenia, 321

Abdera, by whom founded, 507, 508. The inhabitants deemed a dull ſtupid people, ibid

Abgarus I. founder of the kingdom of Edeſſa, 631. ------ II. his conqueſts, 632. --- III. his letter to Chriſt, ibid. ---- IV. his treachery to the Romans, 633. --- V. allies with Rome, ibid, ---VI. &c. ibid, &ſeq

Abias invades Abilene, 638. Defeated by Izates, ibid. Eſcapes captivity by a voluntary death, 639

Abſarus, river in Colchis, 603

Abulpharagus, his works, 186, n

Abydos forſaken by Antiochus, 40

Accaron given to Jonathan, 119

Acheruſian lake in Chaonia, 530

Achillas drives out Cleopatra, 275. Beſieges Cæſar in Alexandria, 280. Not able to force the city, ibid. Put to death, 282.

Actiac æra, how computed, 312

Adiabene, the kings of 635, & ſeq. Embraces chriſtianity, 641. Conquered by Tigranes, 331

Admetus, king of Epirus, kindneſs to Themiſtocles, 537

Adrianople in Thrace, built by Adrian, 510

Aea, a city in Colchis, 603

Æacides, king of Epirus, driven out, 542 Slain by the Macedonians, ibid.

Æetes, king of Colchis, 605. Ill-treated for his kind reception of the Argonauts, ibid

Ægypt, the kings of, 173, & ſeq

Æmilius ſent againſt Antiochus, 33, & ſeq. Defeats his fleet, 38

Ænos metropolis of the Cicones, 516

Agathoclea married to Philopator, 220. Endeavours to uſurp the regency, ibid. Her ſad cataſtrophe, 222

Albana, a city in Albania, 612

Albania, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 612, & ſeq

Albanians, their ſimple manners, 613. Women remarkable for beauty, ibid. Government, kings, ibid. & ſeq

Albanus, the river of, 612

Alcetas I. king of Epirus, driven out, flies to Dionyſius, 538

Alcetas II. defeated by Caſſander, 542 Murdered, 543

Alexander king of Epirus allies with Philip, 538. Wars againſt the Brutii, 539. Deceived by an oracle, ibid. & ſeq. Defeated and killed, 540, 541. His character, ibid

-- The ſon of Pyrrhus, invades Macedon, 576. Driven out by Demetrius, ibid

---- Balas ſet up againſt Demetrius, 110. Acknowledged by the Romans, 112. Courts the Jews, 113. Defeats and kills Demetrius, 115. Marries Cleopatra, ibid. Degenerates, generates, 116, & seq. Abandoned by Philometor, 123. Defeated and killed, ibid. & seq. His Character, 122, & seq. & n. His coin, 169, n

- - - - Zebina set up against Demetrius, 146, & n. Defeats Demetrius, 147. His character, 149. Defeated by Physcon, 150. His death, ibid. Coin, 171, n.

- - - Janneus defeated by Aretas, 158. Besieges Ptolemais, 248. Defeated by Lathurus, 249. Spared by Cleopatra, 251

- - - the son of Physcon set up against his elder brother, 247. Kills his mother, 252. Defeated and killed, 253

- - -II. the grandson of Physcon, murders Cleopatra, 259, & seq. Banished for his cruelties, 260. Dies in exile, ibid. Bequeaths Egypt to the Romans, 261

- - - king of Emessa taken prisoner, 634

Alexandria, queen of the Jews, sues to Tigranes, 333

Alexandria besieged by Antiochus, 76

Alexandrians their fidelity to Philometor, 76. Greatly oppressed by Physcon, 238. Massacred, 242

Alexandrian library described, 184. Destroyed by the Saracens, 186

Alopeconnesus, where situate, 511. Why so called, ibid

Amadocus, king of the Odrysæ, 519

Amasia, a city in Pontus, described, 372

Amestris murdered by her sons, 587

- - - a city built by her, ibid

Amazons, some account of them, 373

Ambracia, a city in Epirus, 528

Amisus, a city in Pontus, described, 372. Surrendered to Lucullus, 427, 428

Ammonius's cruelties, 116. Murdered by the Antiochians, 120

Amphialus kills Arius king of Teuthrania, and settles at Pergamus, 536

Ananias, a Jewish time-server, 637

Anaphas I. and II. kings of Cappadocia, 462, 463.

Andronicus murders Onias, 69. Put to death for it, ibid. - - - a cruel governor of Samaria, 75

Anicetus invades Pontus, 455. His success there, ibid. Delivered up to the Romans, 456

Antioch burnt by the Jews, 198

Antiochis, her spurious brood, 108

Antiochus Theos, his coin, 166, n

Antiochus the Great, puts Achæus to death, 1. Invades Bactria, 2. India, 3. Joins Philip against Egypt, 4. Recovers Palestine, &c. 6, 7. Allies with Ptolemy, 8. His conquests in Asia Minor, ibid & seq. In Chersonesus, 10. Answer to the Roman embassadors, 11. Sends embassadors to Rome, 15, 16. Declares war against it, 18, & seq. Invades Pisidia, 21, His conference with the Roman deputies, 23, & seq. Marries a young wife, 28. Defeated at Thermopylæ by the Romans, 29. At sea, 30. Invades Pergamus, 33, & seq. Defeated at sea, 38, 39. His ill conduct, 39. Sues to the Romans, 41. His propofals rejected, 42. His gallant army, 46. Defeated at Magnesia, 49. Makes peace with Rome, 51, & seq n. His death and character, 55. Reign foretold by Daniel, 56 n. & seq n. His coin, 167 n

- - - Epiphanes, the son of Antiochus the Great, sent hostage to Rome, 51. Exchanged for Demetrius, 61. Mounts the Syrian throne, 64. His character, ibid & seq. Sirnamed Epimanes, 65. War with Egypt, 68, & seq. His embassy to Rome, 70. Injustice to the Jews, 72. Conquers Egypt, ibid & seq. Marches into Judæa, 73. Profanes and plunders the temple, 74. Returns into Egypt, 75. His career stopt by the Romans, 81, & seq. Wreaks his revenge on the Jews, 83, & seq. His gambols at the games of Daphne, 84, 85. Repulsed at Elymais, 88. His miserable end, ibid. His coin, 167 n

- - - Eupator succeeds his father in Syria, 91. The Romans usurp the guardianship of him, 95. His ill success against the Jews, 96. Treachery to them, 99. Put to death, 105. His coin, 167, n

- - - Theos the son of Balas, set up by Tryphon, 129. Crowned at Antioch, ibid. His coin, 170 n

- - - Sidetes, whence so called, 136, n. Marries his brother's wife, ibid & seq. His letter to Simon Maccabee, 137. Treachery to him, 139, & seq. Defeats the Parthians, 140, & seq. His death, 142. And character, ibid & seq. His coin, 170 n

- - - Grypus set upon the Syrian throne, 151. Puts to death Zebina, 150. Defeats his brother Cyzicenus, 152. Defeated by him, 153. Divides the kingdom with him, ibid. Falls out with him, 154. Assassinated by one of his subjects, ibid. Coin, 171, n. 172 n

- - - Cyzicenus mounts the throne, 155. Defeated and killed by Seleucus, ibid

- - - Eusebes defeats Seleucus, 155. Wars with Philip, ibid & seq. Defeated, 156. Driven out by Tigranes, 158

- - - Dionysius supplants his brother Philip, 177. Cut off by the Arabians, ibid

- - - Asiaticus sent to Rome, 159. His adventure at Syracuse, ibid & seq. Reigns over part of Syria, 162. Stript of it by Pompey, ibid & seq. His death, 164

- - - king

--- king of Comagene defeated, and reſtored by Pompey, 644. Put to death, ibid
--- II. ſucceeds his father, 645. --- III. aſſiſts Veſpaſian, ibid. --- IV. ſerves under the Romans, ibid
Antipater the Jew, aſſiſts Cæſar in Egypt, 286. Relieves him when beſieged in Alexandria, ibid Is wounded, 287
Antony, Marc, ſent into Egypt, 270. His ſucceſs there, 271. Captivated by Cleopatra, 280, & ſeq. Marries Octavia, 292. Bewitched from her by Cleopatra, 293. His profuſeneſs to her, 295. Treachery to Artabanes, ibid & ſeq. Betrayed by Artuaſdes, 347. Seizes on his kingdom, 348. Marches againſt Octavianus, 296, & ſeq Defeated by him, 299. Betrayed by Cleopatra, 303. Kills himſelf, 305
Apamea taken by Triarius, 420
Apellicon's noble library, 409 n. Carried by Sylla to Rome, ibid
Apion, the ſon of Phyſcon, made king of Cyrene, 245. Reigns in Peace, ibid. Bequeaths his kingdom to the Romans, 253
Apollonius's bloody expedition againſt the Jews, 83. Defeated by Jonathan, 118. Several generals of that name, 117 n
Appius, Claudius ſpeech againſt Pyrrhus, 560
Aquilius's inhumanity to the Pergamenians, 504. Subdues the kingdom to the Romans, ibid Defeated by Mithridates, 393. His cruel death, 394
Aratus, highly favoured by Ptolemy Phil. 200
Araxes, a river in Armenia, 315, 318, & n. From whom ſo called, 323
Archelais, in Cappadocia, whence ſo called, 458
Archelaus, king of Egypt, defeated by Gabinius, 271. His gallant death, 272 Archelaus's ſucceſſes in Aſia, 397, & ſeq. Defeat and treachery, 400, 401, & n
--- king of Cappadocia, 470
Archias, governor of Cyprus's treachery to Ptolemy puniſhed, 235
Aretas choſen king of Damaſcus, 158. Defeats the Jews, ibid
Argaus, mount, deſcribed, 459
Argonauts, their expedition into Colchis, 605
Argos, doubly beſet, 570, & ſeq. Treacherouſly entered by Pyrrhus, 571. Relieved by Antigonus, ibid & ſeq
Ariaramnes, I and II. kings of Cappadocia. 462, 463
Ariarathes, I. king of Cappadocia, 463
--- II. Crucified by Perdiccas, 463
--- III. Recovers his father's kingdom, ib.
Ariarathes, IV. Defeats Arſaces, 464
--- V. Allies with the Romans, 464
--- VI. His character, 108, 464, & ſeq. Dethroned by Demetrius 109, 465
--- VII. Poiſoned by Mithridates, 467
--- VIII Stabbed by the ſame hand, 388, 467
-- IX. Dethroned by the ſame, 468
Ariobarzanes, king of Armenia, 351
Ariſtarchus, made king of Colchis, by Pompey, 607
Ariſtobulus, a learned Jewiſh philoſopher, Preceptor, to Ptolemy, 236
Ariſtomenes, ſent guardian of Egypt 5, 225. Put to death for his fidelity, 226 Ariobarzanes, made king of Cappadocia, 469. Wars with Mithridates, ibid & ſeq
---II. Friend to the Romans, 469. Put to death by Caſſius, 470
-- III. Killed by Marc Antony, 470
Ariſtonicus ſeizes on Pergamus, 500. Defeats Craſſus, 502. Defeated by Perpenna, 503. Sent priſoner to Rome, ibid. & ſeq.
Ariſtotle, his books carried off by Sylla, 409 n
Armenia, the Leſſer, deſcribed, 367. Its kings, 368, & ſeq. Kingdom of, deſcribed, 313, & ſeq. Its rivers, mountains, and ſoil, 318, & ſeq. Origin and Government, 322, 323 Kings, 328, & ſeq. Given to Cleopatra's ſon, 348. Recovered, 349. Becomes tributary to Rome, ibid. & 366, & ſeq. Its various fates ſince, ibid. & ſeq.
Armoſata, city of Armenia, where ſituate, 316
Arſaces ſeizes the Armenian crown, 351. Murdered, 352
Arſinoe, queen of Egypt, murdered, 220
--- Daughter of Auletes, ſet up by Ganymede, 282. Taken priſoner by Cæſar, 288. Led in triumph, ibid. Reſides at Miletus, ibid. Put to death by Antony, at the inſtigation of her ſiſter Cleopatra, ibid
--- A city in Cyrene, deſcribed, 253, 254
Artabazus, led in triumph by Marc Antony, 295
Artabanus's bold letter to Tiberius, 352
Artabazes, firſt king of Pontus, 379
--- King of Media, wars with the Parthians, 627
Artagera, taken and razed by the Romans, 310
Artanes, killed by Tigranes, 331, 368
Artaniſſa, a city in Iberia, 608
Artaxata, metropolis of Armenia, 314. Taken by Pharaſmenes, 352. Razed by Cor-

Corbulo, 361 Rebuilt by Tiridates, 366
Artaxias I king of Armenia, revolts againſt Antiochus, 86, 87, & n. Defeated by him, ibid. & 329, & ſeq. Taken priſoner, ibid
--- II. Driven out of Armenia, 348. Recovers it, 349. Strangled, ibid
--- III. Crowned by Germanicus, 351
Artoces king of Iberia, wars with Pompey, 609. Acts very deceitfully, 610. Makes an honourable peace, ibid
Artuaſdes I. ſucceeds Tigranes in Armenia, 347. His treachery to Marc Antony, ibid. Caught and put to death by him, 348
--- II. invaded by Phraartes, 349. Reſtored by Caius, 350. His death ibid
Aſander gets the kingdom of Boſphorus, 624, 625. Starves himſelf, ibid
Aſcalon taken by the Jews, 118
Aſculum, the battle of, 563, & n
Aſps of Egypt, how they kill, 310
Aſtacus in Bithynia, different from Nicomedia, 581
Atamnas, king of Cappadocia, 462
Atargatis,, the temple of, burnt, 96
Athenians, betrayed to Mithridates, 397
Athenion ſent into Judæa, 208. His kindneſs to Joſeph, 209
Athens beſieged and taken by Sylla, 399, & ſeq Atropatene, by whom ſo called, 526. The kings of it, 627, & ſeq. By whom conquered, ibid & ſeq
Atropatus makes himſelf ſovereign of Atropatene, 626
Attalus king of Pergamus defeats the Gauls, 473. His conqueſts, 474. Friendſhip to the Romans, ibid. Love of learning, 475. Death, ibid
--- II. brother to Eumenes, ſent to Rome, 476. His cowardiſe at Pergamus, 478. Generoſity at Rome, 488. Succeeds his brother, 490, 491. Invaded by Pruſias, ibid, Aſſiſted by the Romans, 493. Aſſiſts Nicomedes againſt his father, 495. His death and excellent character, 497
--- III. his cruelties, and wild extravagancies, 498. Death, ibid. Why ſirnamed Philometor, 499. Bequeaths his kingdom to the Romans, ibid & n
Autolychus, the famed ſtatue of, 429, n. Carried by Lucullus to Rome, 430
Autonomi ſubdued by Alexander, 523
Azizus, laſt king of Emeſſa, turns Jew, 635

B.

BABYLON, freed by Demetrius, 106
Bactra, metropolis of Bactria, 628
Bactria, the kingdom of deſcribed, 628, & ſeq Invaded by the Scythians, 631
Bactrians, their character and brutiſh cuſtoms, 629
Balas, Vid Alexander Balas, 111
Baris worſhipped by the Armenians, 325
Barzanes, by whom conquered, 323
Bas, king of Bithynia, 593. Beats Calantus, and reigns peaceably, 594
Baſcama, where ſituate, 133, & 131 n
Baſil, ſaint, his epiſcopal ſee, 458
Battus made king of Lybia, 573. Governs with great Prudence, ibid
Beans, a wonderful kind ſpring out of a lake, 577
Bebryces, their origin, 592
Bellona, the temple of, at Comana, 458, 461
Belus, the temple of, at Elymais, 55
Berenice, daughter of Auletes ſet upon the throne, 264. Murders her huſband Seleucus, 265. Marries Archelaus, ibid & ſeq. Put to death, 272
Berenice's Coma made a conſtellation, 206, 207
Beſſi, a people of Thrace, deſcribed, 515. Conquered by the Romans, ibid & ſeq Bethſan deſcribed, 131, n
Bethſura beſieged by Lyſias, 98
Bibulus's ſons murdered in Egypt, 275
Births, how celebrated by the Thracians, 511
Biſtones in Thrace ſubdued by the Romans, 516
Bithynia, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 580, & ſeq. Its origin and government, 584, 592, & ſeq. Invaded by Mithridates, 390. Reduced into a Roman province, 601
Bithynian embaſſy, whence a proverb, 496
Bithynians, their origin, 592. Kings, &c. 593, & ſeq. Defeated by Mithridates, 392. Set up Nicomedes againſt Pruſias, 496
Bloſſius the philoſopher, his character and death, 503, & n
Bœotians, reduced by a Plague, forced to build Heraclea, 583
Boſphorans revolt from Mithridates, 623
Boſphorus, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 617, & ſeq. Its government, kings, &c. 620, & ſeq. Given to Pharnaces, 624
Boterus king of Bithynia, 593
Bottiæi, antient Thracians, 590
Bruttius defeats Metrophanes, 398
Bryges, a people of Thrace, 517
Byſas, the ſuppoſed founder of Byzantium, 509
Byzantium, by whom founded, 509

C.

CABIRA, a city in Pontus, 372. Memorable for the defeat of Mithridates, ibid. Surrendered to the Romans, 425

Cabiſta, a city in Cappadocia, 458

Cæſar, Julius, ſtudies oratory at Rhodes, 412. Compounds with Auletes for a large ſum, 262. Lands in Egypt, 277. Is in great danger, ibid. Arbitrates between Ptolemy, and his ſiſter, 278. Is gained by Cleopatra, 279. Beſieged in Alexandria, 280. Burns Ptolemy's ſhips, 281. Defeats Ganymede, 283. Forced to ſwim for his life, 284. His victory at Canopus, 285. On the Nile, 287. Settles the crown on Cleopatra, ibid. & ſeq. Defeats Pharnaces, 453, & ſeq.

Cæſarion, ſon of Cæſar by Cleopatra, made king of Egypt by Marc Antony, 296. Put to death by Octavianus, 311

Caffa, antient Theodoſia, metropolis of Little Tartary, 619

Caius ſent to oppoſe the Parthians, 349. Drives Tygranes out of Armenia, 350. Wounded at Atagera, ibid. His death, 351

Calcedon, a city in Bithynia, 581. Why called the city of the blind, ibid

Callicrates prevents the Achæans ſuccouring Egypt, 79 n & ſeq. n

Callimachus favoured by Philadelphus, 207. His hymns extant, ibid

--- a famous engineer, 342, 427. Sets Amiſus on fire, ibid. Defends Niſibis, 428. Taken and put to death by Lucullus, ibid

Callipolis, now Gallipoli, the ſtreights of, in Thrace, 511

Callycadnus, promontory, where ſituate, 54, n

Cappadocia, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 457, & ſeq. Product, 459. Origin, government, &c. ibid. & ſeq. Kings, 462 & ſeq. Subdued by Tigranes, 331. Invaded by Mithridates, 387. Made a Roman province, 471

Cardia in Cherſoneſus, where ſituate, 511

Cariata deſtroyed by Alexander, 628, 629

Carnion taken and burnt by the Maccabees, 96

Cars, a city in Armenia, deſcribed, 316, 317, & n

Caſſiope, a city in Epirus, famous for the temple of Jupiter Caſſius, 528

Caſſius ſent againſt Mithridates, 392, & ſeq

Catanius, Apollo, his temple at Daſtacum, 461

Cato, his advice to Auletes, 263, 264

--- Portius expounds the Sybilline oracle, 267

Celetæ, a people of Thrace, 525

Cendebæus ſent againſt the Jews, 139, & ſeq

Ceraſus, a city in Pontus, why ſo called, 374. Firſt cherries carried thence into Italy by Lucullus, ibid

Ceraunian mountains in Epirus, 530

Ceſtrius, river, deſcribed, 52, n

Chadaca, city of Albania, 612

Chalcedon, vid. Calcedon, 581

Chalcidene, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 645, & ſeq

Chaonia, a province in Epirus, deſcribed, 526

Characene, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 643, & ſeq. Founded by Paſines, ibid. Its kings, ibid

Chariſtus, a river in Cholcis, 603

Cherries, why called Ceraſa, 374

Cherſon, the ruins of, 619

Cherſoneſus Thracian deſcribed, 510. & ſeq The kings of, 525. Taurica deſcribed, 619, & ſeq

Chimæra, its hot baths, 528

Chorſa, a city in Armenia, taken by ſome for the city Cars. 316, n & 317, & n

Chryſippus put to death for treaſon by Ptolemy Philadelphus, 195

Cicero, his letter to Lentulus, 269

Cicones, a people of Thrace 516. Their kings, ibid.

Cimmerians, their character, 618. A colony of them in Italy, ibid

Ciſſa river in Colchis, 603

Clazomenians driven out of Abdera, 508

Clearchus, tyrant of Heraclea, 587. His parricide and death, ibid

Cleomenes king of Sparta, well received by Euergetes, 212. Ill treated by Philopator 214. His ſad cataſtrophe, 215, 216

Cleopatra, a common name of the Egyptian princeſſes, 258

Cleopatra, daughter of Antiochus, married to Ptolemy, 20

--- wife of Demetrius, marries young Sidetes, 136. Shares Syria with Zebina, 147. Murders her own ſon, 149. Her death and character, 151 wife of Phyſcon, invites Demetrius againſt him, 145, & ſeq

--- daughter of Phyſcon marries Cyzicenus, 152, & ſeq. Murdered by her ſiſter, 153. Her coin, 171, n. --- wife of Philometor, left regent, 237. --- Cruelly uſed by Phyſcon, 241. Divorced from him, ibid. Takes refuge in Syria 244, & ſeq. --- widow of Phyſcon, left regent

gent in Egypt, 245. Her ambition and partiality, 246. Treachery to Lathurus, 247. Drives him out of Phœnice, 251. Takes Ptolemais, ibid. Murdered by her ſon Alexander, 252. Falſely confounded with the former Cleopatra, 257, n & ſeq. n. --- daughter of Lathurus, ſucceeds him, 257, & ſeq. Marries Alexander II. 259. Aſſaſſinated by him, 260

--- daughter of Auletes, married to her brother, 275. Driven out by his miniſters, ibid. Is privately carried to Cæſar, 279. Reinthroned by him, 287, & ſeq. Declares for the triumvirs, 289. Goes to Marc Antony at Tarſus, ibid. Her magnificence and profuſeneſs, ibid & ſeq. Cruelty and avarice, 293, & ſeq. Takes the name of Iſis, 296. Her fatal counſel to Marc Antony, 299. Treachery to him, 301, & ſeq. Treats with Proculeius, 305. Surpriſed by him, 307. Buries Marc Antony, 308. Deceives Octavianus, 309, & ſeq. Kills herſelf, 310. Her character and funeral, 311, & ſeq.

--- wife of Antiochus Pius, put to death by Tigranes, 333

Clodius Publius, his unjuſt decree againſt Cyprus, 263. Raiſes a mutiny againſt Lucullus, 343

Cocas, the famed mountain of, 616

Coin, of Syria, 165, n & ſeq. n

Colchis, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 602, & ſeq. Origin, kings, &c. 604. Gold mines, 605. Subdued by Mithridates, 606

Colonia, the ſtrongeſt city in Armenia, 316

Colophon, the city of, deſcribed, 37

Colpas, a river in Bithynia, 591

Comana, a city in Pontus, 372, 373. --- in Cappadocia, 458

Comets, two large ones at the birth of Mithridates, 385, & n

Commagene, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 644, & ſeq. Subdued by the Romans, 645

Comneni, their reſidence at Trapeſus, 375

Conacorix betrays Heraclea to the Romans, 426

Conon, the contriver of Berenice's coma, 606, 607

Conſtantiue miraculouſly hindered from rebuilding Chalcedon, 582. Reſides at Nicomedia, ibid

Coraceſium beſieged by Antiochus, 9

Corax, river in Colchis, 603

Corbulo ſent to quiet Armenia, 357. Exhorts Vologeſes to peace, 358. His diſpute with Quadratus, ibid. His ſevere diſcipline, ibid & ſeq. Succeſs againſt Tiridates, 360, & ſeq. Interview with him, 364

Cornelia rejects Phyſcon's offer, 232

Corycus, the naval fight of 30

Coſis, a brave prince of Albania, killed by Pompey, 614

Cotta's ill ſucceſs againſt Mithridates, 413, & ſeq. --- Againſt Heraclea, 426. Returns to Rome, 427. Honoured with the title of Ponticus, ibid

Cotys I. king of the Odryſæ, aſſaſſinated, 519

--- II. joins the Perſians againſt the Macedonians, 520

--- III. allies with the Romans, 521

--- IV. made king by Brutus, 521

--- V. murdered by his brother, 522

--- king of the Sapæi, 524. Murdered, 525

Craſſus ſent into Pergamus, 501. Defeated, taken priſoner, and killed, 502

Crobyzi, a people of Thrace, 523

Crœſus's ambiguous threats to the Lampſacians, 513. Explained, ibid

Cyaneas, a river in Colchis, 603

Cyneas, his excellent character, 547. Advice to Pyrrhus, 548. Sent to Tarentum, 549. His judicious remark on the Romans, 553, 554 n. Sent embaſſadors to Rome, 559. His ill ſucceſs there, 560, 561. Sent a ſecond time, 565

Cyprus iſland, taken by Antiochus, 80, & ſeq. Sold by Archias to Demetrius, 235. Given to a baſtard of Lathurus, 262. Seized by the Romans, 262 & ſeq

Cyrene deſcribed, 253. Yielded to Phyſcon, 231. Revolts from him, 233, & ſeq Given to Apion, 245. Left by him to the Romans, 253

Cyrus, a river of Armenia, 318. --- of Albania, 612

Cyta, a city in Colchis, 603. Birthplace of Medea, thence called Cytæis, ibid

Cyzicum city, beſieged by Mithridates, 415. Relieved by Lucullus, 418

D.

DAGON's temple burnt by Jonathan, 118

Daniel, ſeveral of his prophecies fulfilled, 56, n. & ſeq. n. 62, 64, 86, 91, & ſeq. n

Daphne, the games of, deſcribed, 84, 85 n

Darius Hyſtaſpis the ſon of Pharnaces, made king of Boſphorus, 454

--- king of Atropatene, 627

Daſcylus, a city in Bithynia, 580

Datames king of Cappadocia, 463

Decius's anſwer to Pyrrhus, 561. Killed, 562

Decius Magius an illuſtrious Capuan reſcued

cued by Philopator, 219
Deidamia, queen of Epirus, whether murdered, 578
Dejoratus I. made king of Armenia Minor, 368
--- His fidelity to the Romans, 369
--- II. his reign, 370. Succeſſors, ibid
Demetrius ſon of Antigonus, his coin, 172 n
--- the ſon of Seleucus, his ſuit to the Roman ſenate, 94. Rejected, 95. Preſents a ſecond, 101. Eſcapes into Syria, 103, & n. His letter to the ſenate, 104. Wars againſt Ariarathes, 107. Degenerates, 109. Courts the friendſhip of the Jews, 112, 113. Defeated, 114. His extraordinary valour, ibid. Killed, 115, ibid
--- Nicator, dethrones Alexander Balas, 121. Allies with Philometor, 120. Reſtored to his kingdom, 121. Degenerates, 127. Saved by the Jews, 128. Treachery to them, 129. Taken and kept priſoner in Parthia, 135, & ſeq. 140. Reſtored to his kingdom, 145. Invaded by Zebina, 146. His death, 147. Coin, 169, n
--- Eucheres crowned at Damaſcus, 156. Defeated and killed, ibid. & ſeq
--- Phalereus, his character and office, 188. Perſuades Ptolemy Soter to build a library, 189. His great integrity, 194. Death, ibid
--- king of Bactria, his character, &c. 630, 631
Democritus, where born, 508
Denſeletæ, a people of Thrace, 514, & ſeq
Diana Perſica worſhipped in Cappadocia, 461. Her ſtatue taken and reſtored by Philadelphus, 201
Diegylis, king of the Odryſæ, 521
Diocæſarea, where ſituate, 458
Diodatus, vid. Tryphon, 127
--- a Syrian, facilitates Demetrius's eſcape, 102
Dion the philoſopher, aſſaſſinated by Pompey, 266
Dionyſius, tyrant of Heraclea, 586. His death and character, ibid
Diophanes's brave attempt againſt Seleucus, 34, 35, n
Dioſcurias, a city in Colchis, 602, & n
Dioſcorides murdered by Achillas, 281
Dodanim, the firſt peoplers of Epirus, 532
Doedalſus king of Bithynia, 593
Dodona, the city of, deſcribed, 528. 529, The temple, grove, and oracle, of, ibid & n
Dolabella Cornel. in love with Cleopatra, 310. Sends word of the deſigns of Octavianus, ibid
Dolonci, who, and whence, 512, & ſeq
Domitius defeated by Pharnaces, 451. Marches back into Cappadocia, ibid
Dorylaus, general of Mithridates, defeated by Sylla, 401
Drepane, a city in Bithynia, 581

E.

ECLIPSE of the moon, frightens the Gauls, 474
Ecron taken, and razed by Judas Maccabeus, 97
Edeſſa, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 631, & ſeq. Made a Roman province, 633
--- metropolis of that kingdom, 631
--- the famous temple of, 631
Edoni, a people of Thrace, 516. Their kings, 517
Elea, where ſituate, 22 n
Eleazer reproves Izate's hypocriſy, 637
Elephants of Pyrrhus rout the Romans, 555. A remedy found againſt them, 562, 567. Put the army of Pyrrhus in confuſion, 567
Elymais, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 641, & ſeq
--- metropolis of that kingdom, 642
--- the temple of, Epiphanes attempted to be plundered by Antiochus, 642
Elymean kings, unknown by name, 642
Emeſa, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 634. Kings thereof, ibid n
Epaphroditus ſent to watch Cleopatra, 309
Epheſus taken by Antiochus, 9
Epirots, their character, 532. Defeated at Argos, 572. Surrender themſelves, 576. Their commonwealth, 578, & ſeq
Epirus, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 526, & ſeq. By whom peopled, 531. Its government, ibid. Its kings, 534 Eratoſthenes made library-keeper at Alexandria, 207, 208. His works, ibid n
Eros's fidelity to Marc Antony, 304, 305
Erzeron, where ſituate, 319
Eucratides I. firſt king of Bactria, his character, 631. Murdered by his ſon, ibid
--- II. ſucceeds his father, ibid His parricide puniſhed, ibid
Eulæus, regent of Egypt, 67. Corrupts the young king, 73
Eumelus, prince of Boſphorus, wars with his two brothers, 621. His character and death, 622, 623
Eumenes I. ſucceeds his brother in Pergamus, 472

--- II. wars with Antiochus, 31, & seq. 475, & seq. His bravery at the battle of Magnesia, 48, 478. Rewarded by the Romans, 479. Opposed by the Rhodians, ibid. Wars with Prusias, ibid. Makes peace with him, 481, & seq. Defeated by Hannibal's stratagem, ibid. Invaded by Pharnaces, 481, & seq. Makes peace with him, 482. Assists Antiochus, 64, 482. His speech to the Roman senate, 483. Wounded by Perseus's assassins, 484. Allies with Rome against him, 485. Becomes obnoxious to them, 488. Accused to the senate, 490, & seq. His death, 490

Euphrates, a river in Armenia, described, 319

Euthydemus, king of Bactria, invaded by Antiochus, 2 Makes peace with him, 3

F.

FABIUS betrayed by the Thracians, 430, 431, & n

Fabricius sent embassador to Pyrrhus, 558. His intrepid gallantry there, 559. Sent against him, 564. His generous letter to him, ibid.

Fanagoria, a city of Pontus, 372

Favonius's accusation against Auletes, 266

Faustinopolis, from whom so called, 458

Fimbria discarded by Flaccus, 402. His revenge and cruelties, 403, & seq. Success against Mithridates, ibid. & seq. Takes and destroys Troy, 405. His soldiers desert him and go over to Sylla, 407, 408. Kills himself, ibid

Fire ships invented by the Rhodians, 38

Flaccus sent against Sylla, 400. Falls out with Fimbria, ibid. & seq

Flaminius's answer to Antiochus's embassadors, 16, 17, 402

Funerals how performed by the Thracians, 512

G.

GABINIUS's extortions in Syria, 270. Upon Auletes, ibid. Goes into Egypt, 271. Restores that monarch, 272. Accused by Cicero, 274. Condemned to banishment, ibid

Galatia invaded by Phraartes, 482

Galilee invaded by Demetrius, 130

Gallus, first governor of Egypt, 311

--- Sulpitius sent to receive complaints against Eumenes, 490

Ganymedes supplants Achillas, 282. Distresses Cæsar in Alexandria, ibid. & seq. Defeated at sea by Cæsar, 285, 284

Gauls scared at a lunar eclipse, 474. Their sacrilegious covetousness, 569

Gaza taken by Antiochus, 7

--- metropolis of Atropatene, 627

Georgia, why so called, 611. Described, 616. The rest, vid. sub Iberia, 608

Georgian women, famed for their beauty, 613, 616, 617. Men formerly famous, ibid

Glabrio sent against Mithridates, 434

Glaphyra obtains Cappadocia for her son, 470. Her character, ibid

Glaucias king of Illyrium, protects and educates Pyrrhus, 544. Refuses to deliver him up to Cassander, ibid

Gordiæan mountains in Armenia, 321

Gracchus sent to watch over Antiochus, 84. Behaviour of Antiochus to him, 86. His report to the senate, ibid

Gurges, Q. Fabius sent embassador to Ptolemy, 195. His gallantry to him, ibid & seq

Gyrgenes, king of Iberia, turns christian, 611

H.

HALYS river described, 54 n. Divides Pontus from Paphlagonia, 376. Runs through Cappadocia into the Euxine, 458

Hannibal shelters himself with Antiochus, 14. Sends Aristo to Carthage, 18, & seq. Outwitted by the Romans, 23. His advice to Antiochus, 25, 26. Untimely rejected, ibid. Forms the plan of Artaxata, 314, 315. His stratagem against the Pergamenians, 479, & seq. Poisons himself, 481, & n. His judgment of Pyrrhus, 573, n. Tomb at Lybissa, 590

Hebrus, a river in Thrace, 510

Hegesianax's speech to the Roman commissaries, 17

Helena, queen of Adiabene, embraces judaism, 637. Journey to, and piety at Jerusalem, 639. Turns christian, 641

Helenus's fruitless attempt to succour his father Pyrrhus, 572. Taken prisoner, 576. Released generously by Antigonus, ibid. & seq.

Helepolis, a warlike machine, described, 416, & n

Helidorus's attempt on the temple at Jerusalem, punished, 60, & seq. Poisons the king, 62

Helius, king of Colchis, 605

Heptastadium, by whom built, 181

Heraclea, a republic in Bithynia, described, vid. Heracleans

--- a city in Sicily, 148. Why called Minoa,

Minoa, ibid. - - - In Pontus, betrayed to Mithridates, 420. Taken by the Romans, 426. Burnt, ibid

Heracleans, their hiſtory and bravery, 583. Generoſity to Lamachut, 584. Their government, tyrants, &c. ibid. & ſeq. Recover their liberty, 588. Ally with Rome, ibid. Maſſacred by Adiatorix, 589. Deſtroyed by the Romans, ibid. Made a Roman colony, ibid

Heraclides, baniſhed for oppreſſion, 106. Plots againſt the king of Syria, 110, & ſeq. His ſpeech to the Roman ſenate, 111

Heraclitus Cimæus, tyrant of Heraclidæ, 587. Impriſoned, ibid & ſeq

Hercules, the cave of, near Heraclea, 583

Herod entertains Cleopatra at Jeruſalem, 295. Reſolves to put her to death, ibid. His advice to Marc Antony concerning her, 301. Offers his ſervice to Octavius, ibid

Hierax, formerly governor of Antioch, prime miniſter of Phyſcon, his character, 242

Hippus, a river in Colchis, 603

Hœmus, a mount in Thrace, 510

Holophernes's pretenſions to the Cappadocian crown, 108. Supported by Demetrius, 109

Hony of Pontus, its wonderful qualities, 376

Huns conquer Bactria, 631

Hyppius a river in Bithynia, 591

Hyrcanus made governor of Judæa by Seleucus, 62. Succeeds his brother, 139. Makes peace with the Sidetes, ibid. His feats in Hyrcania, 141. Shakes off the foreign yoke, 145. Sides with Zebina, 147. His conqueſts, 154, & ſeq

I.

JAMBLICUS I. king of Emeſſa, 634

- - - II. Reſtored by Octavianus, ibid

Jaſion al. Jeſus, buys the Jewiſh prieſthood, 66. Supplanted by his brother, 68, & ſeq. Drives him out, 73

Iberia, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 608. Origin, government, &c. ibid, & ſeq. Invaded by Pompey, 609. By the Perſians, 611. Tributary to Rome, ibid. Now called Gurgiſtan, ibid

Iberians, whence deſcended, 608. Their character, 609. Divided into four claſſes, ibid

Jemphorina, a city of Thrace, 509

Jeruſalem garriſoned by Scopas, 6. Taken by Antiochus. 74, & n. Burnt and ſacked by Apollonius, 8, & ſeq

Jews, in high favour with Antiochus, 7. Perſecuted by his ſon, 83, & ſeq. Burn and ſack Antioch, 128. Why they conſtantly ſided with the beſt bidder, 148, n. Perſecuted by Philopator, in Egypt, 216, & ſeq. Miraculouſly preſerved, 218

Jonathan ſucceeds Judas Maccabæus, 106. Courted by the kings of Syria, 113. His victories, 118. Honours, 119 & 127. Joins with Antiochus Theos, 130. Murdered by Tryphon, 133

Joppa, retaken by Jonathan, 118

Joſeph, a noble Jewiſh youth, his character, 208. Saves his nation, 209. In great favour with Ptolemy, 210. Outwits the Syrian and Phœnician farmers, ibid. Farms the revenues of Cœle-Syria, ibid. Gives the king and queen ſecurity for the payment, ibid. How long he enjoyed that place, 211

Iris, a river of Pontus, deſcribed, 372, 376

Iſanthus. a king of the Crobyzi, 523

Judæa, Syria, &c. recovered by Antiochus, 6. How it continued in the poſſeſſion of Seleucus, 62, 63. Waſted by Antiochus, 74, 83.

Izates, prince of Adiabene, preferred before his brothers, 635, 636. Inclined to judaiſm, 637. Is circumciſed, ibid. Invaded by Abias, 638. By Vologeſes, 639. His deliverance and death, ibid. Character, ibid, & ſeq. Body depoſited in a Pyramid by Helena near Jeruſalem, 640

K.

KRIM, or Crim, the peninſula of, 619. Whence ſo called, ibid, & ſeq

Kur, a river in Georgia, 612. Geographers diſagree about it, ibid

L.

LÆVINUS's anſwer to Pyrrhus's letter, 553. Defeated by him, 556. Recruits his army, 557. Goes to meet Pyrrhus, 558. Obliges him to retreat, ibid

Lageian, the order of, whence, 176

Lagides, the ſon of the Ptolemies, ibid

Lagus, his extract, 175. Whether the father of Ptolemy, ibid

Lamachus, governor of Heraclea, betrays Sicily to Mithridates, 420, & n

Lampſacus, beſieged by Antiochus, 10

Laodice of Mithridates, her lewdneſs puniſhed, 387

- - - of Orophernes, her cruelty puniſhed, 467

Laſſar or Laſerpitium, ſhrub, deſcribed, 254, 255, & n. Not Aſſa fætida, ibid
Laſthenes, his character, 116, & n Cruelties, 126
Laudamia, vid. Deidama, 578
Learning, how revived in Greece, 239, & ſeq
Leontifera, an Heraclean ſhip, ſo called, 583
Lepidus made guardian of Ptolemy Epiphanes, 5, & 9
Leucanor, king of Boſphorus treacherouſly murdered, 623
Leucon, I. and II. kings of Boſphorus, 620
Libyſſa, a city in Bithynia, deſcribed, 590. Famous for the death of Hannibal, ibid
Livius the Roman admiral, defeats Antiochus, 30. His ſucceſs in the Helleſpont, 31. Succeeded by Æmilius, 32
Lucania laid waſte, by the Romans, 553
Lucullea, games ſo called, 418
Lucullus ſent by Sylla into Egypt, 256. Enters Alexandria, in a kind of triumph, ibid. His haughty meſſage to Tigranes, 334. Marches into Armenia, 335. Defeats Tigranes, 337, & ſeq. Takes Tigranocerta, 340. His ſucceſs againſt Mithridates, 341. Forſaken by his army, 343. Recalled, ibid. His treachery to Fimbria, 401. To Mithridates, 412, & ſeq. Succeſs againſt him, 415, & ſeq. Enters Cyzicum, 418. Reduces Paphlagonia and Bithynia, 420. Diſtreſſes Mithridates, 424. Subdues Pontus, 425. Takes Amiſus, 427. Sinope, 429, & n. Forſook by his army, 433. Succeeded by Pompey, 434. Returns to Rome, 436
Lycus, a river in Armenia, deſcribed, 318
Lyſanias, king of Chalchis, aſſiſts the Aſmoneans, 646. Put to death by Antony, ibid
Lyſias ſent againſt the Jews, 84. Defeated by them, 88. Seizes on the government of Syria, 92. Defeated by Judas Maccabæus, 96, & ſeq. Cauſes Octavius to be aſſaſſinated, 100. Seized by his own ſoldiers, 105. Put to death by Demetrius, ibid
Lyſimachia, rebuilt by Antiochus, 10. Forſaken by him, 40

M.

MACCABEES, their victories over the Syrians, 84, 88, 96. Make peace with Lyſias, ibid
Macron's treachery to the king of Egypt, 72, & n. Mentioned often in the Maccabees, ibid Magas, brother of Philadelphus, revolts from him, 197. Is reconciled to him, 200 ——— brother of Philopator put to death by him, 214
Magneſia, the battle of, 45, & ſeq.
Manius ſent by Sertorius to aſſiſt Mithridates, 415. Put to death by Lucullus, 419
Maracanda, by whom built, 629
Mariandyni, their origin, 592
Maſius mount in Armenia, 321
Mazaca, metropolis of Cappadocia, 458
Mebarſapes, king of Adiabene, driven out, 641
Media, Atropatia, vid. Atropatene, 626, & ſeq
Megacles, killed inſtead of Pyrrhus, 555
Megadates, made governor of Syria, 158. Recalled, 163
Melas, a river of Cappadocia, 458
Menander, king of Bactria, his conqueſts, 630
Menelaus the Jew, buys the high-prieſthood, 68. Apoſtatiſes, 69. Cauſes Onias to be murdered, ibid. Convicted of many crimes, 71, & ſeq
Menippa's ſpeech to the Romans, 16
Menythillus facilitates Demetrius's eſcape, 102
--- ſpeech to the Roman ſenate, 230, 231
Meſades, king of the Odryſſæ, 519
Meſopotamia conquered by Tigranes, 332
Metrodorus, ſent embaſſador to Tigranes, 331. His advice to him, ibid. & ſeq. Cauſe of his death, 333
Metrophanes ravages Eubœa, 398
Milo ſurrenders Tarentum, 576. Puniſhed for his double parricide, 578 Miltiades I. choſen king of the Dolonci, 513. Reſcued from the Lampſacians, ibid. His death, ibid
--- II. ſeizes the kingdom of the Dolonci. 514
Minios's haughty ſpeech to the Roman embaſſadors, 23, 24
Mithridates I. third king of Pontus, 379
--- II. wars with Antigonus, 380, & ſeq
--- III. his reign, 381
--- IV. invaded by the Galatians, 382
--- V. wars with the Sinopians, 382
--- VI. a firm ally to the Romans, 384. Murdered, ibid

--- VII. his glorious reign, 385. Conquests, 387. & seq. Treachery, 388. Invades Bithynia, 390. Beats the Romans, 393. Cruelty to them, 394, & seq. Defeated by the Rhodians, 397. Ominous prodigies against him, 399, n. Defeated by Sylla, 400. By Fimbria, 403. Makes peace with Sylla, 407, & seq. His cruelty to his son, 409. Begins a new war, 410, & seq. Ill success before Cyzicum, 415, & 417 n & seq. Defeats the Romans, 422, Forsaken by his army, 424, & seq. Murders all his wives, &c, ibid. Renews the war against the Romans, 429. Defeated, 431. His letter to Arsaces, 339, n. Overthrows the Romans, 432, & seq. Besieged by Pompey, 436. Defeated again, 438. Flees into Scythia, 439. Appears afresh, 441. Forsaken by his army, 443. Betrayed by his son, 444, & seq. Kills himself, 445. His character, 446, 447 Burial, 448

--- Iberus crowned king of Armenia by Tiberius, 352. Invaded by Artabanus, ibid. Sent prisoner to Rome, ibid. Restored, ibid. Betrayed by Pollio, 354. Murdered by Rhadamistus, 355

--- II. king of Armenia, joins with the king of Pontus, 383

--- king of Parthia, takes Demetrius prisoner, 135, & seq

--- king of Pergamus's great services to Julius Cæsar, 282, 286. Made king of Bosphorus, 624. Killed, 625

--- I. and II. kings of Iberia, 610, & seq.

--- king of Atropatene, 627

--- of Comagene, made so by the Romans, 624

Mithrsdatic war, 387, & seq. Renewed, 390, & seq. The length of it, 446 n

Mœdi plunder the Delphic temple, 524

Molossis, a province of Epirus, described, 528. Whence so called, ibid. Famed for its mastiffs and horses, 531. Subdued by Pyrrhus, 533

Molossus, king of Epirus brought up by Helenus, 536

Monima put to death by Mithridates, 425, n

Monobasus I. king of Adiabene, 635

--- II. made regent, 636. Mounts the throne, 640. Honourable interment of his mother and brother, ibid

Mopsuestians murder Seleucus, 155. Punished by Eusebes, ibid. & seq

Morimena, Jupiter's temple at, 461

Moschick mountains in Armenia, whence so called, 320

Mulolitum, where situate, 510

Muræna left prætor of Asia, 409. Defeated by Mithridates, 410. His son more successful against him, 422, & n

Musa, princess of Bithynia, deprived of her succession, 601. Sallust mistakes in calling her son of Nicomedes, ibid

Musæum of Alexandria, described, 187

Mygdonia, a province in Asia, conquered by Tigranes, 332

Myrlea in Bithynia, by whom founded, 580

N.

NANEA, the same with Diana, 142 n. Her temple attempted by Sidetes, ibid

Nazianzum, a city in Cappadocia, 458

Neapolis a city in Thrace, 507

Neocæsarea, a city in Pontus, 373

Neoptolemus I. king of Epirus, 538

--- II. set up against Pyrrhus, 544. Reigns jointly with him, ibid. Put to death by him, ibid & seq

Neronia, new Artaxata, so called, 315

Nicæa, taken by Triarius, 420

--- in Bithynia, by whom built, 590. Described, ibid

Nicias Pyrrhus's physician's treacherous offer, 564. Rejected by the Romans, ibid. His punishment, 568

Nicomedes prince of Bithynia escapes his father's treachery, 494. Takes up arms against him, 495. Put him to death, 496. Calls in the Gauls, 594. Gives them part of Asia Minor, 595. Builds Nicomedia, ibid

--- II. his obscure reign, 600

--- III. allies with Mithridates, 600. Driven out of Cappadocia, ibid. Wars against Pontus, 391 600. Reduced to a private life, ibid. Restored and dies, ibid

--- IV. lampooned for his familiarity with Julius Cœsar, 601. The last Bithynian king, ibid

Nicomedia metropolis of Bithynia, 581. 595. Made Constantine's residence, 581, At present a small village, ibid. Where situate, 591

Nicopolis in Armenia Minor, by whom built, 368

--- in Thrace, by whom founded, 510

Niphates mount in Armenia, celebrated by the poets, 321

Nisibis taken by Tigranes, 332. By Lucullus, 342, 428

Nisyra, island, how parted from that of Cos, 570

Noah worſhipped by the antient Armenians, 325. Some remains of his ark at Cæron, 636
Nubium, a city in Iberia, 608
Nyſa, a city in Cappadocia, 458

O.

OATHS how taken and given by the Romans, 53, & ſeq
Ochus, a river in Bactria, 629
Octavia married to Marc Antony, 282. Supplanted by Cleopatra, 294. Divorced and turned out, 298
Octavianus gives his ſiſter to Marc Antony, 282. Marches againſt him, 298. Defeats him at ſea, 299. Invades Egypt, 301, & ſeq. Takes Cleopatra priſoner, 306. Enters Alexandria, 307. His behaviour to Cleopatra, 309, & ſeq. Outwitted by her, 310. Returns to Rome, 312
Octavius ſent to be guardian to young Eupator, 95. Murdered by Lyſias, 100
Odomantes a people of Thrace,, 516
Odryſæ a people or Thrace, 517. Their kings, ibid & ſeq. Country made a Roman province, 523
Oeſyma, a city of Thrace, 507
Olbia not the ſame with Nicomedia, 581
Olophernes I. king of Cappadocia, 463
--- or Orophernes, dethrones Ariarathes VI. 108 465. Driven out by Attalus, 466. Slain, ibid
Olthaces king of Colchis, 607
Omar deſtroys the Alexandrian library, 187
Onias, the worthy Jewiſh high-prieſt, falls out with Simon, 59. Oppoſes Heliodorus, 60, & ſeq. Depoſed by Antiochus, 66. Murdered at Antioch by Andronicus, 69
--- a ſordid high-prieſt endangers the Jewiſh nation, 208
--- builds a Jewiſh temple in Egypt, 236
Oppius Q. ſent againſt Mithridates, 392. Delivered up to him in chains, 394
Orbelus mount in Thrace, 510
Orgomenes, a river in Bactria, 629
Oricum, a city in Epirus, 527
Orobius reſcues Delos from Mithridates, 398
Oroeſes king of Albania defeated by Pompey, 614
Orodes king of Armenia depoſed by Germanicus, 351
Orophernes, vid. Olophernes, 108, 465
Orphitus Pactius defeated, 359. Puniſhed, ibid.
Oxathres, the ſon of Dionyſius, tyrant of Heraclea, his parricide and death, 587
Oxus, river in Bactria, 629
Oxyartes king of Bactria, 630

P.

PÆTUS ſent into Armenia, 362. Surrenders to Vologeſes, ibid. Withdraws into Cappadocia, 363
Palladium found at Troy, 405 n
Palus Mœotis deſcribed, 620
Pangeas mount in Thrace, 510
Panticapæum, by whom built, 619. Not taken off by Procopius, ibid
Paphlagonia, invaded by Mithridates, 387. Divided between him and Nicomedes, ibid
Paradiſe, ſome conjectures about its ſituation, 320, & n
Pariſades I. and II. king of Boſphorus, 621
--- III. reſigns his kingdom to Mithridates, 623
Paryadræ, mountains in Armenia, 320
Paſſaron, the grand council of Epirus, held at, 579
Pelamides an excellent fiſh, 582. Beſt at Chalcedon, ibid
Pelaſgias and Peleia, the etymon of, 529 n
Pelignus, Julius, an infamous freebooter, 355
Peluſium taken by Antiochus, 72, 79
Perga delivered up to the Romans, 52, & n
Pergamenian library, deſcribed, 184. Given to Cleopatra by Marc Antony, and removed to Alexandria, 186
Pergamus, the kingdom of, 472, & ſeq. Its kings, ibid. Invaded and waſted by the Bithynians, 491. Reduced to a Roman province, 504, & ſeq
Perinthus, or Perynthus, by whom founded, 509
Perperna ſent againſt Ariſtonicus, 502
Phanagoria, metropolis of Boſphorus, 623
Pharaſmenes, king of Iberia, recovers Armenia, 352. Supplants his uncle Mithridates, 353. His cruelty to him, 354, & ſeq. vid. & 610, & ſeq.
--- king of Albania, favoured by the Romans, 615
Pharnaces I. king of Pontus, wars with Eumenes, 381, & ſeq. Makes peace with him, 383
--- II. revolts againſt his father, 414, & ſeq. Made king of Boſphorus, 449. Recovers

Recovers part of Pontus, 450. Defeats the Romans, 451. Defeated by Julius Cæsar, 453. Killed, 454

--- king of Cappadocia, 460, 462

Pharos, the famous tower of, described, 180

Phaselus, the tower of, described, 181, n

Phasis, a river in Armenia, 318, 603

--- city in Colchis, 603

Pheasants, whence brought, 603

Philadelphian works, why so called, 205

Philammon murders Arsinoe, 220. Assassinated by her women, 222

Philip Cassander, a Phrygian and cruel governor of Judæa, 75

--- regent of Syria, 91. Defeated and put to death by Lysias, 99

--- the son of Grypus, defeats the Mopsuestians 155, and Eucheres, 156. Invaded by Eusebes and Dionysius, 157

Philippopolis in Thrace, by whom built, 510

Philotærus, first king of Pergamus, seizes the castle of Pergamus, 472

Phocrites made chief magistrate of Heraclea, 588

Phœnice conquered by Tigranes, 333

Phœnix, one seen in Egypt, 213

Phrahates defeated by Sidetes, 147. Destroys all the Syrians, in their winter quarters, ibid

Pielus, king of Epirus, 536

Pieres, a people of Thrace, 517. Hence the muses call Pierides, ibid

Pindus, the famous mount of, 531

Pityus, metropolis of Colchis, 602

Plotinopolis, a city of Thrace, 510

Polemon made king of Pontus, 454

--- II. turns Jew, 455. Exchanges his kingdom, ibid & 626. Taken prisoner, 347

Polemonium, a city in Pontus, 373. Hence Pontus, Polemoniacus called, ibid

Polybius's advice to young Demetrius, 101, & seq

Polycrates, prime minister of Epiphanes, his character, 226

Polymestor, king of the Thracian Chersonesus, 525 Murders Polydor, ibid

Polyxenidas, defeated by the Romans, 30 His second defeat, 38

Pompey's haughty answer to Asiaticus, 164. Seizes on Syria, ibid. Friendship to Auletes, 266. Sent into Armenia, 343. Restores Tigranes to his crown, 346. Succeeds Lucullus in Pontus, 434. Defeats Mithridates, 438, & seq. And pursues him into Scythia, 440. Subdues Pontus, 449. His generosity at his triumph, 450. Expedition against Iberia, 609, & seq. Against Albania, 613, & seq

Pomponius or Pompeius, general of the horse to Lucullus, taken prisoner, 422, & n

Pontus, the kingdom of, whence so called, 371. Its description and division, ibid & seq

--- Polemoniacus, whence so called, 373

--- Cappadocius described, 374. Its honey described, 376. Origin and Government, 377. Kings, 379, & seq. Reduced by Lucullus, 425. Made a Roman province, 428. Its various changes since, 455, & seq

Popilius, his speech to Antiochus, 81

Potinus's treachery to Cleopatra, 275, & seq. To Cæsar, 280. Put to death, 282

Pronectus, a city in Bithynia, 581

Prusa, a city in Bithynia, described, 581. Taken by Triarius, 420

Prusias, king of Bithynia, 430, 431. Rejects the offers of Antiochus, 36, 37. Defeats the Pergamenian fleet, 479, & seq. Makes peace with Eumenes, 481. Invades Pergamus, 491. His treachery to Attalus, 492, & seq. Forced to a peace by the Romans, 493. His treachery to his son, 494. To Hannibal, 597. Journey to Rome, ibid Mean behaviour there, 598. Taken by Triarius, 420. Deposed by his son, 496. Assassinated, ibid His character, 599

Prytanis, king of Bosphorus, defeated and killed by his brother Eumelus, 622

Psillis, a river in Bithynia, 591

Pterium, a city in Cappadocia, 458. Memorable for the overthrow of Crœsus.

Ptolemais described, 254. Betrayed to Antiochus, 200. Besieged by Alexander Janneus, 248. Taken by Cleopatra, 249

Ptolemies of Egypt, a list of them, 173. & seq

Ptolemy Soter, his origin, 175, & seq. His character, and miraculous cure, 176, 177. Post and government, 177. Flourishing kingdom, 178. Whence surnamed Soter, 177. Takes the title of king, 178. Takes his son partner of the kingdom, 179. Builds the tower of Pharos, 179, 180. Procures the Sinopean Serapis, 181, & seq. Founds the Alexandrian library, 186, & seq. The Musæum, 187. His death and character, 190. Issue, 191

--- Ceraunus disinherited, 179, 191. His treachery to Seleucus, 191. Seizes the Macedonian crown, 191. Treachery to to Arsinoe, 192, 193, & seq. Slain by the Gauls, 193

--- Philadelphus succeeds his father, 193. Enmity to Demetrius Phalerus, ibid. Marries his sister Arsinoe, 194. Sends an embassy to Rome, 195. Invades Magas, 197. Improves the Egyptian trade, 198, &c. His kindness to the Sicyonians, 200. Love to Arsinoe, 201. Death and character, 202, & seq. Works, 204, & seq

--- Euergetes, whence so called, 205. His conquests, 206. Sacrifices to the God of Israel, 207. Improves his father's library, ibid. His kindness to Joseph the Jew, 209. His conquests, 212. Assists Cleomenes, ibid. His death and character, 213

-- Philopator, why so called, 213. Cruel character, 214. Makes peace with Antiochus, 216. Persecutes the Jews, ibid. & seq. Takes them into favour, 218. Receives a Roman embassy, 219 & seq. Murders his wife, 220. His death, 221, & seq. Character, 223

--- Epiphanes born, 220 Succeeds his father, 221, & seq. Invaded by Philip and Antiochus, 4, & seq. Protected by the Romans, ibid & seq. & 224. Degenerates into a tyrant, 226. Allies with Rome, and the Achæans, ibid. & 227. Poisoned, ibid

--- Philometor succeeds his father, 228. Invaded by Antiochus, 71. Taken by him, 74. Restored to his crown, 79, 228. Divides his kingdom with Physcon, 79, 229. Goes to Rome, 82, 229. His speech to the senate, 230. Opposed by Physcon, ibid. & seq. Rejects the Roman decree in his favour, 233. Defeats him, 235. Marches into Judæa, 119. Allies with Demetrius, 120, & seq. Reinthrones him, ibid. Falls out with him, 235. His death and character, 122, & seq. & 235. Favour tothe Jews, 236

--- Physcon disputes the crown with his brother, 75, 228. Divides it with him, 229. Drives him out, ibid. & seq. Goes to Rome, 77, 230. Attempts on Cyprus, 232. Repulsed and wounded by the Cyrenians, 233. Defeated, and carressed by Philometor, 235. Cruelty to his son and widow, 237. To the Jews and Egyptians, 238. Aukward reception of the Roman embassadors, 240. Driven out for his cruelties, 242. Returns, 244. Sets up Zebina against Demetrius, 146. Defeats him, 150, 244. His death, character, and learning, 245

--- Lathyrus why so called, 246. Oppressed by his mother, ibid. Dethroned, 248. Defeats the king of the Jews, 249. A cruel action of his, 250. Driven out of Judæa, 251. Restored to his kingdom, 253. Takes Thebes, 256. His death, 257

--- Auletes, an effeminate prince, 262. Driven out of his kingdom, 263. His interview with Cato, ibid. Goes to Rome, 264. Obtains a decree in his favour, 266. Retires into the Ephesian asylum, 268. Bargains with Gabinius, 269, 270. Restored to his crown, 272. His cruelties, ibid. & seq. Death, 275

-- the son of Auletes, drives his sister from the crown, 275. Stirs up the Alexandrians against Cæsar, 279. His treachery to him, 285, & seq. Defeated, 286. Drowned, 287

--- the son of Pyrrhus, left regent of Epirus, 549. Subdues Thessalonica, 569. Killed, 570

--- the son of Alexander, his short reign, 578

--- Prince of Chalchis, 646. Puts his son to death, ibid

Pyrrhus I. king of Epirus, his descent, 534. Killed before Troy by Orestes, 535

--- II. his descent, 543. Brought up by Glaucias, 544. Allies with Demetrius, 545. With Ptolemy, ibid. Succours the Tarentines, 546. His projects merrily checked by Cyneas, 548 Sails for Italy, 549. His wives and children, ibid. n. In danger by a storm, 550. Reforms the Tarentines, 551. Outwitted by Aristarchus, 552. His haughty letter to the Roman consul, 553. Defeats the Romans, 555, & seq. Forced to retire from Rome, 557. Receives an embassy from thence, 558. His offers rejected by the senate, 561. Message to Decius, ibid. Wounded and defeated by Sulpitius, 563. In danger of poison, 564. Defeated at sea, 565. Cruel revenge on the Locrians, 566. His sacrilege punished, ibid. & seq. Takes Macedon, 568. His successful attempt against Greece, 569. Against Argos, 570. Defeats the Lacedæmonians, ibid. Enters Argos, 571 Killed by a woman, 573. His character, ibid. & seq & n

--- III. murdered, 578

Q.

QUADRATUS Numid, governor of Syria, 354. His dispute with Corbulo, 358. His message to Vologeses, ibid

R.

RABINIUS, lends Auletes vaſt ſums on Pompey's ſecurity, 271, & ſeq. Ill requited by him, 273. Proſecuted by the ſenate, 274

Raphia, where ſituate, 20 n

Rhadamiſtus, king of Iberia, 610

--- the ſon of Pharaſmenes, cunningly ſent into Armenia, 353. Treachery to his uncle, 354, & ſeq. Seizes on that kingdom, 355. Driven out, 356. Put to death by his father, 359

Rhodians, their haughty meſſage to Antiochus, 9. Great ſervices to Cæſar, 283, & ſeq

Rhodobartes, ſecond king of Pontus, 379

Rhodope, a mountain in Thrace, 510

Romans, protect young Ptolemy, 5. And the free cities of Aſia, 10. Their firſt embaſſy to Antiochus, 11. The ſecond, 22. Defeat him by ſea and land, 30. And at Magneſia, 49, & ſeq. Make peace with him, 51, & ſeq. The treaty at length, 52 n. & ſeq. n. Their degeneracy from that time, 55. Partiality to Phyſcon, 231, & ſeq. Embaſſy to him, 240. Seize on the iſland of Cyprus, 263. War with Mithridates, 391, & ſeq. 150,000 maſſacred by his order, 395. Their cruel revenge, 401, & ſeq. Defeated by him, 432. Their joy at his death, 447

Ruſſians, defeated with a great ſlaughter, and ſubdued by Mithridates, 398

Rutilius, whether the adviſer of Mithridates's cruelty to the Romans, 395, n

S.

SABYLINTHUS, a faithful guardian to Tharymbas king of Epirus, 537

Salii, among the Romans, their office, 40, n

Samaria taken by Hyrcanus, 154

Samſirenus, founder of Emeſſa's kingdom 634.--- II 635

Sangarius, a river in Bithynia, 591. Livy's miſtake, 592

Sapei in Thrace, their kings, &c. 524

Sapteſyle, the rich mines of, 508

Saracens burn the Alexandrian library, 186, & ſeq. On what account, ibid

Saſales king of the Odryſſæ, 521

Satyrus I. king of Boſphorus, 621. His tribute to Demoſthenes, ibid

--- II. killed, ibid. Tyrant of Heraclea, 586

Scipio L. Cornel. ſent againſt Antiochus, 30. Comes to Troy, 40. Defeats Antiochus, 49, & ſeq. Makes peace with him, 51, & ſeq

--- Africanus ſerves under his brother, 30. His anſwer to Antiochus, 42. Advice to him, 43. His ſon reſtored to him, ibid. Speech to his embaſſadors, 50, & ſeq

Scopas's ſervices to Egypt, 6, & n. Taken priſoner, 7. Treaſonable attempt againſt Ptolemy, 13. Puniſhed, ibid

Scribonius driven out of Boſphorus, 625

Scydrothemis ſends the Serapis into Egypt, 183

Scytha, a fabulous founder of Armenia, 323

Scythians driven out of Bactria by the Huns, 631

Scythopolis betrayed to Hyrcanus, 154

Sebaſtia, ſecond city in Armenia, 316. In Pontus, 373

Selene, wife of Antiochus Euſebes, keeps Ptolemais, 159. Put to death by Tigranes, 163

Seleucia Trachiotis, by whom built, 13, n

Seleucus Nicator, his coin, 165, n

--- Callinicus, his coins, 166, n

--- Philopator, the ſon of Antiochus's ſucceſs in Aſia, 31. Driven out of Pergamus, 34. Succeeds his father, 57. His generoſity to the temple of Jeruſalem, ibid. & ſeq. Poiſoned by Heliodorus, 62. His coin, 167, n

--- the ſon of Demetrius Nicator, murdered by his own mother, 149

--- the ſon of Gryphus, defeats his uncle, 150. His defeat and death, ibid. & ſeq

--- king of Boſphorus, 620

--- Cybioſactes, who ſo called, 264. Sent to Rome, 159. Made king of Egypt, 164. His death, 165, & n. & 265

Selga, where ſituate, 21, n

Selli, who, 533

Serapeum, deſcribed, 183, & n. & ſeq. The library of, 184. Repleniſhed with the Pergamean library, 186. Burnnt by the Saracens, ibid

Serapion, murdered by Achilles, 281

Serapis, the ſtatue of, brought to Egypt, 183, & n. & ſeq. Whence ſo called, 184, n. Not Egyptian originally, ibid

Seuthes mounts the Odryſian throne, 518.

--- III. and IV. their wars with the Macedonians, 519, 520

Sidon taken by Antiochus, 7
Simon, a Benjamite, plots againſt the Jews, 59
--- the Maccabee, his exploits againſt Demetrius, 130. Succeeds his brother Jonathan, 132 Allies with Demetrius, 135. With Sidetes, 137
Sinope taken by Pharnaces, 381. By Lucullus, 429, & ſeq. & n. Lucullus's ſtrange viſion there, ibid
Sitalces I. king of the Odryſſæ, 518. Attends Xerxes into Greece, and is there ſlain, ibid
--- II. a warlike prince, ibid
Sitas, king of the Denſeletæ, wars againſt the Baſtarnæ, 515
Smerdis, king of Cappadocia, 462
Smyrna, beſieged by Antiochus, 10
Socrates vindicated from cynœdeiſm, 197, n.
Soſibius Philopator's wicked miniſter, 215. His treatment of Cleomenes king of Sparta, ibid
--- ſon of Soſibius murders the queen, 220. Turned out, 221. Made guardian of Epiphanes, 222. His character, ibid. & ſeq Soſtratus builds the tower of Pharos, 180. Outwits Ptolemy in the inſcription, ibid
Sotades, the cynædic poet, put to death, 197, & n
Sothymus, king of the Odryſſæ, 521. Waſtes Greece, but is overcome by Sentius, ibid
Spartacus, I. king of Boſphorus, 620 --- II. ibid --- III. 623
Spaſines ſecures by a Mole Chorax againſt the overflowing of the Tigris, 643
Statianus defeated and killed, 347
Stella, a mountain in Pontus, 373. Famous for the overthrow of Mithridates, ibid
Steſagoras, king of the Dolonci, 514
Stratonice, three cities of that name, 503, n
Stratonice, concubine of Mithridates, delivers up the caſtle of Symphori to Pompey, 441
Strymon, a river in Thrace, 510
Suffes at Carthage, what, 14
Sulpitius P. ſent to Antiochus, 21 & ſeq
Sura, a city in Iberia, 608
Sylla, dictator of Rome, 258. Sends Alexander II. into Egypt, ibid. Sent againſt Mithridates, 398. Defeats him at Chæronea, 400. Makes peace with him, 407. Returns to Rome, 408
Syrian coins, deſcribed, 165, n. & ſeq. n

T.

TABÆ, where ſituate, 88, & n. Thought by ſome to be Ecbatan, ibid
Talaura, the great riches of, 449
Tanais worſhipped by the Armenians, 325. Cuſtom obſerved in her worſhip, ibid. Stately temple at Acileſina, ibid
Tauri, where ſeated, 619
Teios in Galatia taken by Leocritus, 382. Its garriſon maſſacred, ibid
Tempyrium, a city in Thrace, 510
Teos, the city of, deſcribed, 38
Teres, a warlike king of the Odryſſæ, 518
Tereus, a long-lived king of Characene, 643
Thamyris, a boaſting muſician puniſhed, 516
Tharymbas, king of Epirus, 537. A learned prince, and great encourager of learning, ibid Thebes in Egypt, taken and deſtroyed by Lathyrus, 256.
Themiſcyra in Pontus, deſcribed, 372. Surrendered to the Romans, 425
Theodorus revolts from Syria, 154
Theodoſiopolis burnt by the Turks, 317, n. The preſent Erzeron, ibid
Theodotus I. founder of the Bactrian kingdom, 630
--- II. allies with Arſaces againſt Seleucus, ibid. Defeated by Eutydemus, 630
--- Egyptian rhetorician, bold to diſplay his eloquence, adviſes the murdering of Pompey, 276
Thermodon, a river in Pontus, waters the empire of the Amazons, 376
Theſprotia, the cities of, 528
Theas, Ætolian embaſſador's ſpeech to Antiochus, 27
Thrace, the kingdom of, deſcribed, 507. Its ſoil, cuſtoms, and government, 511. The various nations of it, 512, & ſeq. Its kings, ibid. & ſeq. Subdued by the Romans, 523
Thracians greatly ſkilled in muſic, 525. In eloquence, ibid. Greece indebted to them for polite arts, ibid
Thucydides deſcended from the Sapean kings, 524

Thyni, inhabitants of Thrace, 517
Thyras, the ſon of Japhet, gives name to Thrace, 507
Tibites, king of Bithynia, depoſed by his brother, 595
Tigranes I. king of Armenia, invades Cappadocia, 330. Choſen king of Syria, ibid. 158. Driven out by Pompey, 163, 330. His conqueſts, 331. Allies with Mithridates, 329, 332. His cold reception of him, ibid. & ſeq. & 428, & n. New conqueſts, 332, 333. Anſwer to Lucullus, 333, 334. Invaded by him, 335. Defeated by Sextilius, 336. By Lucullus, 337. Jointly with Mithridates, 341. Defeats his rebellious ſon, 344. Goes and ſubmits himſelf to Pompey, 345. His great attachment to the Romans, 346. Death, ibid
--- the ſon of the former rebels againſt his father, 344. Leads Pompey to Armenia, 345. Sent in chains to Rome, 346
--- II. crowned by Tiberius, 349. Put to death, ibid
--- III. defeated by Caius, 350
Tigranocerta, by whom built, 316, 331. Signification of its name, ibid. Beſieged by Lucullus, 336. Betrayed to him, 340, & n
Tigris, a river in Armenia, 319. Deſcribed, ibid. & ſeq Timarchus, king of Atropatene, 627. His vain attempt to reduce Media, ibid
--- a creature of Antiochus, put to death for oppreſſion, 106
Timotheus defeated by the Maccabees, with a prodigious loſs, 96
--- a tyrant of Heraclea, 586
Tinda the metropolis of the Biſtones, 516. Celebrated for the horſes of Diomedes, ibid
Tiridates oppoſed by Corbulo, 358. Driven out of Armenia, 360, Sues to the Romans for the crown, 363. Interview with Corbulo, 364. Crowned at Rome by Nero, 365. His ſucceſſors, 366
Tlepolomus, prime miniſter of Philopator, 221. Falſly accuſed, 222. Cleared, ibid
Togarmah peoples Cappadocia, 459
Trapeſus, a city in Pontus, 375 By whom founded, ibid. The reſidence of the Comneni, ibid Triarius's ſucceſs againſt Mithridates, 420, 425. Takes Heraclea, 426. Defeats Mithridates, 431. Defeated by him, 432.
Tripoli, whence ſo called, 100, n.
--- a city in Pontus, 375. Now a poor village, ibid.
Trocmi, a people in Pontus, &c. 459
Troy, its great poverty at the coming of Scipio, 41, & n. Taken by Fimbria, 405. Burnt, and the inhabitants put to the ſword, ibid
Tryphœna married to Gryphus, 150. Her cruelty to her ſiſter, 153. Puniſhed, ibid
Tryphon's character, 127. Sets up the ſon of Balas, 128, & n. His treachery to Jonathan, 132. To Simon, 133. To Antiochus, 134. Seizes the crown, ibid. Rejected by the Romans, ibid. Forſaken by his forces, 136. Forced to fly, 138. His death, 139 Coin, 170
Tubal, firſt inhabiter of Iberia, 608
Tyre, why made independent, 147, n
Tyrians, murder king Demetrius, 147, & n

V.

VARICA, a city in Iberia, 608
Uchanias king of Edeſſa, 632
Venus Apatura, her temple near Phanagoria, 617
Verres's villainy to Antiochus, 160, & ſeq
Vertabiets in Armenia, their office, 326, & n
Vologeſes king of Parthia, aſſiſts his brother Tiridates, 358. Wars againſt the Romans, 362. Drives them out of Armenia, ibid. & ſeq. Sends an embaſſy to Rome, 363
--- a Thracian prieſt, ſeizes on Cherſoneſus 515. Overcome by Piſo, 516
Vonones king of Armenia, driven out, 351
Uſcudama, capital of Beſſi, 515. Now Adrianople, ibid

W.

WAR, Mithridatic, 287, & ſeq. Renewed, 410. The length of it, 446.

X.

XIPHARES put to death by his father Mithridates, 442

Z.

ZABDIEL murders Alexander Balas, 121
Zadriades, revolts from Anticchus the Great, 328. Founds the kingdom of Armenia minor, ibid
Zadris, a city of Iberia, 603
Zaliſſa, a city in Iberia, 603
Zarbienus, king of the Gordians, put to death by Triarius for entering into an alliance with the Romans, 334, 335. His funeral obſequies, 341
Zariaſpa, whether the ſame with Bactra, 628
--- a river in Bactria, 629
Zebina, Alexander, vid. Alexander, 146
Zela, a city in Pontus, 373. Famous for the defeat of Triarius, ibid
--- king of Bithynia, killed by the Galatians, 595
Zeno king of Armenia, vid. Artaxias III. 351
Zenobia's adventure, 356, 357
Zenobius, library-keeper to Ptolemy Soter, 189
Zenodotus, the firſt perſon who corrected Homer's works, 203
Zephyrian Venus, her temple, built in honour of Arſinoe, 206
Zephyrium and other cities ſubmit to Antiochus, 9
Zipœtes I. king of Bithynia, his wars with the Heracleans, 594 Dies for joy, ibid.
--II. Dies in baniſhment, 595
Zobores, king of Albania defeated by Marc Antony, 615
Zoilus revolts from Syria, 154
--- the critic, writs againſt Homer, 203 His miſerable end, 204
Zonobazes, king of Iberia, baptized, 611
Zoroaſter king af Bactria, 630. Opinions concerning him, ibid

End of the NINTH VOLUME.

Directions to the BINDER.

MAP of Egypt, Page 173

Map of the Kingdoms of Armenia, Pontus, Cappadocia, Media, &c. 313